The Washington Post Endorses Russet Perry

LEESBURG, VA – On Friday, the Washington Post Editorial Board announced it has endorsed Russet Perry in the primary for Virginia Senate District 31.

“Russet Perry has an ideal profile to win an open seat in Loudoun and Fauquier counties,” said The Washington Post. “We think she has a better chance of prevailing in a general election against a deep-pocketed opponent by making the race a referendum on abortion rights. This will probably be a tipping point seat and could determine which party controls the Senate.”

“I am honored to have received the endorsement of The Washington Post,” said Russet Perry. “With so much at stake in our election – from our public schools to our safe communities to our fundamental rights – I’m determined to keep meeting every voter where they are to talk about how to move our Commonwealth forward. Our campaign is building a grassroots movement, and I’m excited to continue the work to earn every vote ahead of the June 20th Primary.”
