History of Graham County, NC

The Cherokee Indian

From a document contributed by Leota Wilcox

The Cherokee are "the largest American Indian tribe of the southeastern culture area. In colonial times they inhabited the southern Appalachian region and spoke a language belonging to the Iroquoian linguistic stock. The Cherokee Indian lived in permanent villages and were farmers growing maize, beans, squash and gourds. Cherokee families built conical earth-covered winter homes and larger rectangular summer homes. Their large ceremonial houses were typical of the Southeast. Cont'd Pg. 2

GCHA HIGHLIGHTS

The campaign to transform the old Snider's Department Store into a museum received a $25,000 boost from the state legislature on Monday. State Rep. Kevin Corbin presented the check to Graham County Historical Association President Edd Satterfield.

"Thanks for helping us get started. That pays for our plan," Satterfield remarked. "It will help revitalize this particular property and also help us get a cultural designation for downtown."

At the GREAT meeting at the high school on July 19, 2018, Leota Wilcox represented GCHA on a panel of volunteer organizations with the goal of educating participants as to the accomplishments, challenges, and vision. Great Job, Leota!

Fantastic response from the public at the Heritage Festival in Downtown Robbinsville. Thank you to our volunteers who generously give their time for Outreach efforts during fairs and festivals.

The Cherokee Indian (Cont'd)

In the winter of 1838-39, the U.S. Army forced them to move to Oklahoma under the command of Andrew Jackson. The journey accompanied by considerable hardship and the loss of one-fourth of the number of the Cherokee people. For those that stayed behind hid in caves along the Tennessee River and Great Smokey Mountains."

I am glad that my great ancestor who stayed here in the mountains of western North Carolina; I am proud to be a Cherokee Indian. Today the Cherokee Indians live just as any other human being doing their daily living.

"The hardships that Cherokee Indians and four other tribes faced was called the Trail of Tears. Part of this trail is the Tatham Gap Road." (to be continued)

Charlie Denton was a living History Lesson

Reprinted from a Graham Star article by Marshall McClung

PART I

A study of Charlie Denton is a study of the history of the area. He was born in Benton, Tennessee in Polk County in 1868, but moved with his parents to what is now Graham County at the age of eleven in 1879. They moved to a section of Little Santeetlah Creek in what is now a portion of the Joyce Kilmer Forest. His father was John Denton, who whipped most of Robbinsville over a disagreement about a poll tax as covered in the store "The Great Graham County Tax Fight" published last year in the Graham Star.

At the time the Dentons moved to Graham County, there were only about forth white families living here. The Dentons moved to Little Snowbird in 1895, and lived near a Cherokee Indian settlement.

Charlie's playmates when he was a young boy were Indians. He spent much of his young live in the woods hunting and fishing. A lot of their hunting companions were Civil War veterans. He recalls meeting John Jackson "Bushwhacker" Kirkland, who lived in Graham County.

Beginning in 1903, and for the next twenty years or so following, Charlie Denton was employed by U.S. Indian Land Office of the Department of the Interior, and was associated with the Cherokee Indian Reservation lands. As a result, he learned much of the early history of the Cherokee in Graham County.

Charlie said that the earliest white settlers to come to Graham County took the best farm land, first in private settlements with t he Cherokee prior to 1837. Following that time, the state of North Carolina surveyed the lands, operating from an office in Murphy.

Charlie learned much early history of the Indians coming into Graham County. He said that some of the very intelligent Cherokee told him that the Iroquois and Cherokees came from the Great Lakes, and after much fighting between them, settled near the mouth of the Tellico River and called their settlement Echota. They later moved on through Tennessee into Georgia and South Carolina and set up a new headquarters and called it New Echota.

In 1835, the North Carolina Militia moved in to begin the round-up of the Cherokee in preparation for their removal. Many Cherokee hid out in the mountains, staying there until the final removal was over. Charlie said one family that lived near them, Conseen, also spelled Conesene at the time, was one of the families that hid out and escaped the removal. They were living on Santeetlah Creek at the time, but hid in Slickrock near the Big Flats, which is below Big Fat Gap and near Slickrock Creek. They stayed hid in Slickrock for three years. Charlie recalled that most of the Cherokee lived in log houses, but didn't hew the logs like the white man did, but left them round.

Whisky was downfall of Eagle Rose, Brothers

*Reprinted from an article by John Parris'
"Roaming the Mountains" Column in the Asheville Citizen*

HANGOVER MOUNTAIN –

Eagle Rose grew up in a stillhouse and died at the hands of another blockader in an ambush on a lonely mountain trail.

"Whiskey was his downfall," said his 72-year-old son Floyd T. Rose, a retired Baptist preacher who lives in Brevard. "and it was whiskey that brought on the murders of his two brothers before him."

Eagle Rose, born in 1876, was the son of Jacob Rose and a nephew of the widely known blockader Aquilla Eagleton Rose for whom he was named.

"My granddaddy Jake made a lot of whiskey too," Floyd Rose recalled. "But he was converted to Christ when he was 70 years old. And he tried to get my daddy to straighten up.

"One day he said to my daddy, 'Why don't you quit that drinking, Eagle, and straighten up and try to live right?'

"My daddy looked at him as straight as a gun-barrel and said, 'Why, Pap, you ought to have thought about that when you was raising me. You raised me in a stillhouse.'"

Floyd Rose slowly shook his head.

"I never will forget that," he said. "I was only about 10 or 11 years old. I was standing right there by my daddy w hen he said it.

"We were living in the Dave Orr mountains, high under Hangover that adjoins the Joyce Kilmer-Slickrock Wilderness Area in Graham County. He had been pretty sick, spitting up blood. He took me out there on a log by that cold spring and said he wanted to talk to me.

Whisky was downfall of Eagle Rose, Brothers (cont'd)

"Then he said, 'Whatever you are in life, even if you're a dirtroad tramp, be good at it. But don't make no pretense. Just be what you are.'

"That never did register until I became a Christian. And then I began to see how shallow the average church member was living. I said, I don't know where my daddy went, but I said the Lord will remember him for that.

When Floyd was only a few years old, his mother and father separated and for the next few years he was shunted about from one relative to another. When he was about nine years old he went to live with his father.

"We couldn't hardly get into the Dave Orr mountains where me and my daddy batched after I came to live with him," he recalled. "We lived in an old log cabin right under the Hangover. It was three miles out on the mountain.

"We had to sled everything we took in there. No road except a rough, steep sled path. We did our trading at Topoca, three miles away. We had a mule that pulled the sled. I walked that three-mile twice a day to get what little schooling I had there at Tapoco.

"My daddy followed his dad's habit and his Uncle Quill's habit. He made a lot of whiskey. I helped him make it back there in the Dave Orr mountains. A two-gallon keg was all I could muck up over the ridge with.

"Like his Uncle Quill, my daddy made good whiskey, pure whiskey. He would run off what you call the 'singlings', which is a weak and impure liquid that has to be redistilled at a lower temperature to rid it of water and rank oils.
