

Free Dot Edu: Resources to assist students.

Washington, DC

The Oscar Paz Institute, an economic development think tank creating free tools to assist students, has launched Free Dot Edu, an initiative to bring resources to the students of the nation.

“Free Dot Edu is letting students know that opportunities exist.” says Oscar Paz, Founder and Executive Director.

Students, education staff members and neighborhood organizations are invited to visit www.PazInstitute.com to review available tools and share them with the classrooms of their communities.

From guiding students on how to navigate college databases to providing free programs that can help them build their portfolios to earn opportunities, the platform is available for all students to use, from those currently enrolled in high school to working adults looking to advance their careers.

“I thoroughly understand that each individual has their own life circumstances, resources available to them and definition of a successful future. Free Dot Edu has been specifically designed to sit with each student to ask them where they are interested in going with their career and share available tools that can help them accomplish their goals.”

There are no products to purchase, services to subscribe to or profiles to create. Students do not even need to share an email address to access information.

While students can use the platform to find academic or athletics opportunities, Free Dot Edu focuses on helping them earn their credentials to begin their careers of helping others.

As City, State and National officials continue to focus on increasing literacy, high school graduation and employment rates, Free Dot Edu is here to act as a supplement to educational programming, encouraging students to meet with their guidance counselors to ensure that they are on track to complete their curriculums and learn of local resources available to them.

“Free Dot Edu is providing bulletin board material for classrooms to use each year, ensuring that each graduating class has access to resources that can help them build their careers, their communities and their futures.”

Students know where they are interested in going.
Free Dot Edu is here to help them get there.
