How Being Thrifty Can Cost You Money: Suggestions For Smarter Money Moves Part 2

check out part 1 in our newsletter!

Despite the best of intentions, there are instances when being thrifty costs more than it saves. Here are a few ways being thrifty can cost you money, ranging from buying things that don't last a long time to skipping opportunities to earn rewards for spending money you spend every month anyway:

4. Homemade is NOT always cheaper

If you own a house, you're already conscious that there are some unanticipated expenses. DIY might occasionally save you money and the bother of employing assistance, but it might also not. Yes, you can repair the leaky faucet in your kitchen yourself. However, you might be hiding a more serious issue that a professional would have noticed and could have avoided water damage.

The DIY method brings pleasure and satisfaction to many individuals. But "homemade" can cost you money if it affects quality and efficiency.

The next time you find yourself in a DIY scenario, ask yourself if you're being too thrifty. Question if you really possess the abilities required to complete the task successfully and within a fair period of time. Even if you decide to hire an expert, you can still cut expenses on the job by purchasing your own supplies, leaving you to pay only for work.

5. Using your time inefficiently

Spending excessive amounts of your own time attempting to save money is another way that being thrifty can cost you money. Is it worthwhile to invest a lot of time looking for deals? Is it worthwhile to handle the fitting of the parquet flooring yourself? In both situations, you might save money, but you might also lose a lot of time that would lower your standard of living.

We advise people to develop the practice of inquiring what their time is worth in order to prevent this expense of being parsimonious.
