Dick's Hobby Turning Feathers into Arrows

So,...I've been asked, "What do you do with those feathers that are donated?" The easy answer would be, "use them" and use them I do, but there is a process I go through before "using them" for anything. In the next few issues of the Tattered Feather. I will try to explain how I turn the donated primary feathers from a turkey into useable fletching for arrows. These feathers also work well for Muddler Minnows when fly tying but I'll stick to arrow fletching at this time.

After collecting the turkey wings, I cut the primary feathers off of the wings*. The primaries are the 6-8 feathers along the leading edge of a turkey wing. I say 6-8 because I typically get an extra feather or two from a more mature bird. These primary feathers also have a greater contrast between an off-white and the grayish brown on the feather...the secondary feathers appear tawny brown with little if any white. Occasionally, a primary will be a solid color...usually a tawny brown similar to that of a goose feather. When I remove the feathers, I cut them up the quill to the point where the barbs and barbules actually begin and place them in bags marked LW or RW. LW, to me, means feathers that came from the left wing of a bird; RW means right wing. If storing, place the bags of feathers in a freezer to avoid bugs and smells. After gathering a mess of feathers, I place them in an old pillow case; SECURE it and wash the feathers with a mild soap...in the washing machine. Keep the LW and RW feathers in separate pillow cases for ease in the future. After washing, you can place the SECURED pillow cases in the clothes dryer on a cooler setting for a bit or spread them out on a flat surface to dry them.

After cleaning the feathers (remember, these birds clean themselves by bathing in dirt) you can decide if you want to use them displaying their natural colors or by dyeing them. I've dyed them: red, blue, orange, green, yellow, chartreuse...just like Easter eggs, your choice. The colors still reflect to the light and dark contrast of a natural feather; how much, depends on how long you leave the feather in the dye.

At this point, I do my best to split the quill with a utility knife. After splitting the quills, I place the feather in a clamp and use a drum sander and my drill press to grind the quill flat. I've read that breathing the dust this grinding process creates is harmful to your health. A dust collector system similar to that of a responsible wood worker is highly recommended.

Once you have the feather ground, you need to decide what size and shape you want and whether to chop or burn the feather into what you want. I chop my feathers. There are a few different shapes and sizes of feather choppers that can be purchased. Occasionally, I'll want a different size or shape feather, then I'll just cut a template out of cardboard and cut feathers in the size and shape which is preferred with scissors.

Additionally, when beginning, I try to collect enough feathers to make the washing, splitting, grinding mess worth my effort. You can always store your feathers in a bag in the freezer until you collect enough of them. I've done this for years and never had a problem with bugs or any "off" odors. Once the feathers have been washed, ground... I store them in a plastic tub; again, never a problem but I do keep the various colors separated. *Next month: wing bone turkey calls and other than hotdogs, where do old automobile hubcaps go...
