If you are responsible for preparing high school students for life after high school, make plans to attend the How to Counsel College & Corporate-Bound Students training. The purpose of this training is to teach busy counselors how to make the best use of the limited time they have to give unbiased advice to the whole student; and feel confident they are working equitably with all students --- regardless of whether the student chooses to earn a badge, license, industry certification, certificate or degree.

Who Should Attend: This training is designed for counseling professionals who do not have an academic background in aspirational attainment theory or college student development theory. Participants will be introduced to a new holistic conceptual framework grounded in theory-based practices that simplify the counseling process. Tools for structuring formal, informal, individual or group sessions will be provided.

Topics Covered: You will be taught how to help students become aware of:

- their desire to attain different aspirations simultaneously;
- their propensity to attain their aspirations;
- their ability to rely on themselves and rely on communal resources;
- differences in individual and peer goals, objectives, and end states sought;
- different processes and resources individuals use to attain their aspirations;
- how they commit to or abandon their aspirations based on judgments about their likelihood of success or failure; and
- how they make choices that maximize satisfaction and minimize dissatisfaction.
