

Dick Jones (2019)

Feb 9, 2022: An Interactive Demonstration of the MIT-Sloan ENROADS Climate Simulator

Dick Jones is retired from the R.W. Jones Agency, a national media relations and program counseling firm that, since 1987, has served colleges and universities around the United States. Dick was CEO of the company, formerly known as Dick Jones Communications, for 25 years before turning over ownership in 2012. Before that he was public relations director at the University of Scranton, where he also taught journalism and public relations. Previously he worked in the news bureau of Penn State's Department of Public Information and Relations. In the mid-1970s, Dick was co-founder, publisher and editor of The Observer, a weekly newspaper in Mifflin County which continues to publish. Dick also has worked as a reporter and editor for daily newspapers and radio stations. A native of Natrona Heights, PA, he has a B.A. in journalism from Penn State and the M.S. from Syracuse. Dick lives in State College with his wife, Ann. They are the parents of a daughter, Barbara, and a son, David, and have two grandsons. In retirement, Dick has become active with Citizens' Climate Lobby. He likes to fish and is a licensed private pilot but hasn't flown in years.

Updated 12/22/2024