In The Nature of Reality, San Francisco based artist Lillian Shanahan investigates the shifting boundary between our physical and digital worlds. Through a mashup of organic and inorganic forms, her work reflects the tension between tactile experience and simulated existence.

Drawing from the pixelated language of early computer graphics, Shanahan uses Perler beads, the creative building blocks of her childhood- to question how technology is reshaping human perception. As the line between lived and digital experience continues to blur, she invites us to consider: how quickly can our understanding of the world be transformed?

For her second solo exhibition at The Birdcage, Shanahan focuses almost entirely on Perler beads, a type of “fusion” bead commonly used in children’s crafts. Each piece is meticulously constructed by placing thousands of beads onto pegboards and fusing them with heat. She pairs this structured medium with watercolor, juxtaposing the rigid precision of plastic with the organic fluidity of paint, creating a visual dialogue between the mechanical and the natural.
