Development of the Saskatchewan Milling Industry

The oldest-known image of a flour mill in Saskatchewan

Captain Henry Stewart Moore's board and batten-clad Grist and Sawmill, Prince Albert - built 1874-75.

Sketched by: Hayter Reed, Canadian Illustrated News, 19 July, 1879, p. 36.

Grain milling has been a world-wide activity for at least 14,000 years, but it is only known to have started in Saskatchewan in the latter half of the 19th century. In 1870-71, Rev. John McKay, an Anglican missionary at Holy Trinity Anglican Church, Stanley Mission, established a horse-powered grist mill at the mission, thereby enabling the small community to grind its own flour. That was followed in 1873-74 by construction of a more efficient water-powered mill, located on a nearby creek that flowed into the Churchill River – then one of the major transportation routes into the Canadian western frontier. Likewise, horse-powered milling began at Prince Albert by Presbyterian minister Rev. James Nisbet around 1870, and ultimately saw 11 mills of varying technology and material erected at or near that community – more than in any other location in Saskatchewan.

It was during the 1870s that the southern portion of what is now Saskatchewan began to be settled for agricultural development, starting along the major waterways (such as the North and South Saskatchewan Rivers), and later further south, after the construction of the Canadian Pacific

Railway's main line in the early 1880s. This arrival of settlers with primarily European ancestry brought with them a greater need for local milling, and before the beginning of the 20th century, at least 25 flour mills had been established: including Prince Albert (1877), Duck Lake (c.1878), Battleford (1883), Yorkton (1883), Indian Head (1884), Qu'Appelle (1885), Fort Qu'Appelle (c.1885), Cannington Manor (c.1885), Moosomin (1887), Moose Jaw (c.1890), Grenfell (c.1890), Regina (c.1894), Wolseley (c.1895), and Rosthern (1897). Some communities even had more than one mill, or were onto their second or third mill after earlier structures were destroyed by fire – a constant problem in the milling industry due to the flammable nature of grain dust.

By the middle of the 20th century, the number of flour mills had increased to at least 150, with mills located in many smaller communities throughout southern Saskatchewan, as well as all of the major towns and cities. Early in the 20th century large milling companies, like Robin Hood and Quaker Oats, began to erect massive mills and storage facilities at Moose Jaw and Saskatoon. Between 1875 and 1950 – the 75-year era of major flour mill construction – most flour mills were made of lumber, a few were masonry - either stone or brick. All included heavy timber interior structures, wooden floors and extensive wooden equipment, such as the roller mills. Needless to say, fire was a constant concern and threat, and at least 23 mills are known to have burned down. Most of the others were demolished after they ceased to be viable business operations. Today, only three non-operational historic flour mills remain in Saskatchewan, located at Yorkton (1899-1900), Esterhazy (1906-07) and Viscount (1925); while modern mills continue to operate at Humboldt and Saskatoon.

Although the total number of grist or flour mills constructed in Saskatchewan has not yet been determined, this Inventory provides an overview of over 150 mills that have been located to date. They were constructed during the era when grain processing at local mills was a vital part of the province's grain industry. Starting at Stanley Mission in the 1870s, the number of mills increased dramatically in the 1880s and 1890s, after the railway enabled settlers to both populate and cultivate the vast open prairie, and to sell their produce to national grain companies and to local flour mills. Perhaps the last community flour mill to be erected in Saskatchewan was at Weekes in 1938-39. As with grain elevators, flour mills were filled with explosive grain dust, and a substantial number of flour mills were consequently destroyed by fire.

The Mill Builders at Prairie Towns:

As with any building type, the names of the designers and builders is often not well documented. However, in one instance – Benjamin J. Allbright – he is recorded as having built seven mills in Saskatchewan, including: Craik, Girvin and Sturgis. His biography is provided in the Craik local history: Craik: friendliest place by a dam site. p, 5-6. Allbright learned his trade in England, and migrated with his wife Emiline Payne and son Harvey from Northampton to Canada in 1911. He returned to England during World War I (1914-1918), then returned to Saskatchewan and his mill construction trade. In 1921, competition forced many small mills to close, and the Craik mill's engine house was then converted by Allbright into a Power Plant for the community. The family moved to Prince Albert in 1932, where B.J. died in 1954.

Flour Mills on First Nation Reserves:

At this point, at least one flour mill has been located – constructed in 1891 at the Cowessess First Nation; while a second mill was proposed that same year in Alberta at the Saddle Lake First Nation. Further research will certainly identify the location of other flour mills erected by or for First Nation peoples in present-day Saskatchewan.

Brick Flour Mills:

To date, only five Saskatchewan mills have been confirmed as being constructed of brick: Regina (c.1894), Yorkton (1899), Prince Albert (1906), Radisson (1908), and Saskatoon (1909). However, it is quite probably that other mills (such as Moose Jaw) were also of brick but poor photographs and/ or a lack of historical information prevent positive identification of the construction materials.

Disappearance of Saskatchewan’s Flour Mills:

The reason for the disappearance of Saskatchewan’s flour mills is not well documented. Less than 10 are recorded as being dismantled or demolished; while at least 23 burned down. However, it is generally acknowledged that many flour mills, like grain elevators, burned down.

Heritage Designation:

The Yorkton Brick Mill has been designated as a Municipal Heritage Property, and the Esterhazy Flour Mill has been designated as both a Provincial Heritage Property and as a National Historic Site of Canada. This Inventory will therefore help to develop interpretive programs that will enable the current mill owners to place their structures into a broader provincial and national context.

Primary Resources Consulted:

Following is a list of the primary resources consulted to compile this Inventory. As well, photographs of the mills were obtained from various archives, websites and local histories.

 “In small communities, flour and grist mills were often the only industries to provide off-farm employment to rural people. Because of the services they offered, access to a mill was crucial to the settlement of the prairies, and difficulties in transportation necessitated a dense network of mills throughout the countryside. In 1915, at least thirty-seven flour mills were located in the towns of Annaheim, Asquith, Balgonie, Battleford, Blaine Lake, Canora, Cupar, Duck Lake, Esterhazy, Foam Lake, Grenfell, Hague, Herbert, Humboldt, Indian Head, Jasmin, Lanigan, Leney, Lloydminster, Lumsden, Maple Creek, Melville, Moose Jaw, North Battleford, Outlook, Prince Albert, Radisson, Regina, Rosthern, Saltcoats, Saskatoon, Shellbrook, Swift Current, Verigin, Weyburn, and Wilkie.” - Raymond Ambrosi.
