

Insurance is Killing America

Insurance fucks on everything with the consistent need to make a profit. When you have things like healthcare under an insurance umbrella, someone, somewhere wants to make money. For them to make money requires you paying but not receiving care, or at least only a marginal amount of care.

Insurance companies need exact, precise information. These figures are not for your benefit but instead to benefit the capital potential in their industry. When the Behavioral Invention Technician is working with the autistic individual, they must refer to them as a client, because the insurance company has turned that person into a commodity, to be bought and sold. The technician takes copious amounts of notes, not just for the sake of your child in need, but also because the insurance company must know if each individual second is necessary for care.

Insurance companies need your copay to be higher, so their margins can be higher. They demand more from us, but squeeze us in our times of need. Not only from your individual perspective, but also behind the scenes. They are demanding that your doctors skip surgeries, apply below adequate care, and overlook potential outcomes for the sake of paying out dividends to investors and c-suite executives.

The insurance companies blame it on us and say it our fault rates get raised and care gets denied, but I say if that is true, give it to us then. If the blame is truly on us, then we deserve complete control, because you are obviously not doing a good enough job managing our ability to receive healthcare. Give power and control back to the government, which is run by the people. Give us all healthcare, and remove the necessity or even privilege of private healthcare. Let us completely, utterly, fail in our endeavors to make ourselves better, and then lets beg for insurance to come back.

Until then, insurance is killing us.
