

Molico CEO Steps Down from ADIESA Board

Molico has announced its Group CEO Mike Johnson will step down from the board of ADIESA on January 19, 2025.

Whilst the Molico business group continues to develop and refine its offerings across aerospace, family office functions and the broader advisory services, Mike Johnson will step into a pivotal role with an iconic Australian member based company, which has found itself without current operational leadership.

Mike Johnson has been named the CEO of Australian Industry & Defence Network Ltd, assuming responsibility for future performance and financial stability.

When asked about the appointment, Mike was optimistic:

“I am looking forward to the challenge of leading a key industry body that has existed for thirty years. Following the nationalisation of a federated state model about four years ago, AIDN has meandered under the previous leadership. Having been a member of the AIDN ACT Board for several years, I have firsthand experience in the challenges I will face in this role, at a time when a federal government election is due in 2025, Defence budgets are at best, nominal, and Australia’s sovereign defence industry is grinding to a halt, in extreme pain. I will be taking a very thorough approach to changing not only the business, but its ability to affect change within the broader Defence landscape.”

With experience in key areas of focus including aerospace, federal government lobbying, international trade and running member organisations, Mike is approaching the role with a deep history of identifying new and value adding opportunities. First on his list is to grow brand value and increase market awareness activities.

Molico group of companies has provided media, public relations, data collection and analysis, advisory and consulting services across Australia since 2014. For more information, visit www.molicogroup.com.au
