

FROM THE DIRECTOR

Welcome to the 2020 Winter Term of the Course of Study School of Ohio (COSSO)!

For Christians the “desert” is not simply a place of physical barrenness and desolation. It is a place rich in spiritual significance. As found in the Scriptures, it was often in the desert that God encountered, formed, and transformed God’s people. As David Rensberger wrote, the gift of the desert is above all “solitude, the chance to be alone before God.” To be in “the desert . . . requires us to strip off all that is nonessential about ourselves.” It is in the solitude of the desert that we get “to know God through the loss of all that is false about ourselves and all that stands between us and our Creator.” It is in the desert that we learn to “remain attentive to God, [and] stay utterly dependent on God” (“Deserted Spaces” in Weavings 16/3 [2001]).

The United Methodist Church is now in a liminal space, that is, in the desert, with an uncertain future. No matter the outcome of the General Conference in May, the shape of The United Methodist Church would change considerably. Yet “now” should not be a time of despair or inactivity but an opportunity to rethink of and rediscover the church’s identity and purpose as God’s missionary community. Fully attentive to and utterly dependent on God, we are to seek our most truthful and creative responses to this time of inevitable change. We would need to continue to faithfully carry out our ministry, trusting in God’s sovereign faithfulness.

There is an important and exciting development for COSSO this year, to which I would like to call your attention. As announced, we have adopted a learning management system to enhance your learning experience. The program called Populi is user-friendly and covers both academics and online registration. Since January 15, all current COSSO students have been granted user access to Populi and now can register online for future courses! Let me take this opportunity to express my appreciation to Grace Wallace, COSSO Coordinator, for her hard and gifted work on setting up online registration and creating the course pages on Populi.

All of us on the COSSO staff are delighted to welcome you all—including fourteen new students and six graduating students—to the campus of MTSO. May God’s grace and continued guidance be with you through your COS journey in 2020.

Peace,

Joon-Sik Park

FROM THE WRITING LAB

“Do we have to cite our sources?”

This question, when asked to an instructor assigning an essay, is usually accompanied with anxiety. When I think about why students are so anxious about citing the sources of information in their writing, I conclude that it must be related to the way citation has been generally taught to students. Citation of sources is accompanied with all kinds of unfamiliar terms that seem to refer to enormous and complex rules. For example, an instructor might respond to the aforementioned question with, “Yes, of course. Use the Chicago system, but not Chicago Author-Date, use the Chicago Note-Bibliography system.” An unfamiliar student is surely overwhelmed with talk of systems and windy cities. Indeed, the Chicago Manual of Style is an enormous book with page after page of rules and guidelines for citing sources. Perhaps some students assume that the instructor has such an expensive paper weight committed to memory and can spot the lone errant comma that should have been a period in the footnote. But the truth is that, while there are guidelines for every citation possibility, the student isn’t expected to know them all. The student only needs to understand why they exist so they can refer to the manual when they need to. Citation exists to help your writing by creating a framework for efficiently telling the reader which ideas belong to the author, and which ideas belong to other, outside authors. Many students feel anxious because they are uncertain when an idea should be cited to an author. The simple way to determine this is to ask yourself from a reader’s perspective, “Is it clear in my writing whose ideas belong to which authors?”

SPIRITUAL FORMATION

LET'S GET AWAY FROM IT ALL

The Christmas season is over and we are getting ready to head into another season of Lent, which will include more services and require more preparations. Lord have mercy. We've barely had time to recover since the New Year began. Perhaps, you were hoping for some down time to "get away" and relax a little or prepare COS assignments, and then more demands came – a funeral, a wedding or baptism, someone in the hospital, someone's mother died, someone in your family was ill, you got the flu, and the story goes on. The demands of ministry never end, they just change week to week, and there's never any time to relax, read, pray, and just "be." There's always something to "do" (besides write papers). Christ have mercy.

Ministry is like that – it always was and will be. Maybe no one has told you this but I'm telling you - ministry will suck the life out of you if you let it. Lord have mercy. Being a pastor is a non-stop job, lonely and isolating, but here you are and you now know it's not a 9-5 job. You won't know when to stop unless you stop. But God called you and you said "yes," and no one told you what kind of schedule you should have. And it is a blessing and you are a blessing, but you can't do this job without taking breaks, without pausing and praying and renewing your body, mind and spirit and getting away from it all. You must find ways to feed and renew your soul, and that will look different for each one of us. You must "get away" or you will surely burnout or fadeout or worse yet, dropout. But all is not doom and gloom – Praise God. You can take mini-breaks (half a day), mini-pauses (a few quiet minutes), a half hour walk or listen to music or take a nap. Lord in your mercy. Whatever you choose just do it, and then start planning a longer get away. The thing is, you need this, your church needs you to do this, in order to faithfully respond to God's call.

And one more thing. Getting away isn't wasting time, it's your responsibility, just as prayer is your responsibility, part of your job description as the spiritual leader of the church, and I'm not talking about praying at the hospital or in the car, I'm talking about quiet, set-aside intentional time with you and the One who called you. So, get the calendar out and make plans for "getting away from it all."

Joan Chittister talks about this in terms of those times when we are so weary that we actually think about leaving or quitting: "Why don't we just leave where we are, quit what we're doing and 'get away from it all'? Because we can't. Because it simply isn't possible." She goes on to say that "Getting away from it all is a myth. The purpose of life is to go where we need to go in order to get more of what our souls must have, in order to pour ourselves out again." (from Welcome to the Wisdom of the World, Eerdmans).

My prayer is that this year each of us will go where we need to go, so it won't be said that we burned out or dropped out, but that we took care of ourselves so we could pour ourselves out for the One who never stops calling us.

Praise God from whom all blessings flow.
