

Minor Nobles

This sheet contains minor nobles for your players to encounter.

Lord Amspeth val Selk – Amspeth married into the Selk family, tying the knot with his husband Jerrid. Amspeth himself comes from an even smaller house, one that is gold poor, but land rich. Marrying into the Selks tied the wealthier House to his own, and granted them access to his family's extensive lands, and their ripe hunting. Amspeth is himself quite a hunter, spending more days on the hunt than not. He pays handsomely for rumors of unusual prey, doubly so if it leads to a successful hunt, and a new trophy for his walls.

Sir Illian of Groverdale – Sir Illian is the lord of the small village of Groverdale. Well into his 60s now, he is mostly deaf and partially blind. Otherwise though, his mind is keen and his body sturdy. He takes the protection of Groverdale seriously, often striding out of the small tower he calls home to patrol the borders of the demesne. He is much beloved by the townsfolk, who can recall countless times over the years that he has protected them. Now though, he is more likely to hire adventurers to help him put down rogue griffons, than to tackle them himself.

Lady Lauren vor Highwood – The Highwoods were once one of the realms Great Houses. It has fallen low now however, and its members scattered. Lauren has the title of Baroness of Lockenvale, but in effect just looking after the place for the Ellerson Family who bought the estate for a song years earlier. Effectively a renter on what had been her own land, she is desperate to find a way to take back what is hers. The years have made her bitter however, and not many would rush to aid someone so angry.

Ornden val Quinn – This minor border lord controls the logging town of Reston, and its little used ferry. This rarely interests the man however. His is instead focused on his intense rivalry with the Lady of the next valley over, Willa val Cy'Vor. The two have been feuding for over decade, a fight about the use of the river. Ornden uses the river to ship his logs south, while Willa keeps a large number of fish traps in the river, that get destroyed by the logs. There hasn't been any open violence yet, but who knows how heated it might get.

Lord Blue Everdeen – Everdeen is a wizard, and technically a lord. He is the lord of Hamden Vale, but he ignores it, in hopes that it will ignore him back. He just wants to stay in the small manor home he inherited and work on his experiments. The vale however does occasionally need him. At these moments, he puts his spellcasting ability to good use, and turns himself invisible. The vale is growing desperate and are looking for anyone who can help force their lord to, well, lord.

Lady Celia vor Hisura – A far distant cousin of Great House Hisura, Celia is somewhat of a prodigal child. She could call upon her families connections and riches, but instead has sought to make her own way in the world. She captains a small merchant sloop, that she uses to trade up and down the coast. She is actually one of the best smugglers on the coast, but she acts in that capacity only rarely, preferring to make her money honestly.

Creti val Hawkin – The heir to the barony of Keswit, Creti is out 'sowing his wild oats' as it were, by leading a small band of mercenary knights. A half dozen strong, with as many again retainers, they hire themselves out in the many border squabbles that plague the west. He's young still, barely 18, but already regarded as a fair leader. As long as he stays out of the liquor before battle, which has, sadly, started to become a bit of an issue. Rumor has it his father would pay handsomely to anyone who convinces the boy to come home before he gets killed in some senseless battle.
