Dear Families,

Thank you for your grace as I get this newsletter to you on Tuesday instead of Monday this week.

I spent yesterday preparing for Ms. Christi's maternity leave and making sure her leave of absence will be smooth for our students. We are on baby watch and anticipate the healthy delivery of a little girl soon!

If your child is in Ms. Christi's class and you have any questions about her maternity leave, please reach out to me. Ms. Rachel and I will take very good care of her classroom over the 6 weeks Ms. Christi is home with her new baby.

I look forward to having a new bundle of joy around school!

What Comes After Hello?

Teaching Your Child How to Have a Conversation

We often tell children to “go talk to someone,” “say hello,” or “make a friend,” but conversation is actually a skill that has to be learned, practiced, and refined. In this week’s episode, we explore how we can help children learn the skills that lead to real connection.

- How to respond when someone shares something about themselves
- How children can practice asking a relevant question or making a relevant statement
- Why adults sometimes step in too quickly when a child pauses or doesn’t know what to say
- Simple ways families can practice conversation skills during meals, errands, car rides, and everyday interactions
- Why modern childhood may offer fewer natural opportunities for children to practice talking with other people

The goal isn’t to make every child outgoing or talkative. It’s to give children the tools to listen, respond, and connect with confidence when they want to engage with someone else.

Because sometimes one of the most important things we can teach a child is simply...what comes after hello.
