

Entropion

Feline entropion is when the upper or lower eyelids roll inwards and rub against the eye's surface. As you can imagine, this irritates the cornea.

There are several symptoms that you will notice if your Maine Coon cat is suffering from this ailment. They may exhibit eye or nasal discharge, red or swollen eyes, or eyelid spasms.

The most common type of feline entropion is acquired spastic entropion. This is when the cat's eye was normal but became irritated, and the damage became normal. This type of entropion typically affects only one eye.

A veterinarian will perform an eye test to diagnose the problem. Once entropion has been diagnosed, there are several choices regarding treatment. It will depend on the cause of the entropion. Veterinarians may recommend topical or injectable antibiotics, or they may recommend eyelid surgery.
