The language (the soul's ability to express itself) might be key for misunderstanding and misinterpretation. Let's say you say the word 'useless' rather than 'incompetent'. That specific word will trigger probably 20 thoughts about the person you are communicating with. There will be a communication failure, and hierarchy does not actually work.

Language is the human species way to communicate with each other. Animals have a different language which basically relies on behavior, in short terms. You can always communicate by actions rather than words. By this meaning you can be physical towards another person, or you can as a Norwegian judge pretend to be nice and then do actions which are negative for you, or your child. The language used by the judge, means nothing. Justice.

English is basically becoming the most universal language. If you compare English (which may have the most words included) to another language, you will understand that tone does not necessarily matter. This is a result of the amount of words available in this specific language. Rumors say that ancient ET language is quite monotone.

An example: If you talk/write to a Norwegian judge, their result of judgment reflects on your vocabulary.

Questions: What does it even matter for society, on your level of vocabulary? And why do you even want to be associated with snobs if you are different? And why is that a judge is the person who lacks the most understanding of how society is functioning?

Who the f are you trying to impress
