

State System Regulative Systems 301

A question: If you know politics, do you then understand what's better for the population?

In Norway, a strong democratic system, we seem to have minister posts delegated to people who do not necessarily have the current available information regarding development up against available information. In Norway there is also a name for it(them): Broiler. A Broiler is a person who knows politics, and does not have the background of knowledge regarding the specific minister post. So, a random politician (or a Broiler) can switch minister posts and be used for basically everything when it comes to the state democratic system. It is the system vs. knowledge.

An example: A former finance minister is educated within the media. The corruption scandale results in a situation where the minister of agriculture and food is moved to the post of minister of research and higher education.

Explaining the example: This minister seems to have a background within jurisprudence. The prime minister at this point, did have a choice to replace this minister post with a person who actually has experience within the subject.

So, by switching important minister posts, the knowledge needed is politics. Not related knowledge for further development regarding the minister post. If this is a good or a bad thing to do is uncertain. The skills of knowing thy system is good. And maybe knowing thy power position for the people is greater when it comes to the people.

The prime minister in this country does not actually have that much of a power. The power lies within lobbyism. This is a problem for the people, because the power of the people is now transferred to the system, which has no supervisor. With time the Norwegian state system will create a situation where the citizens are frustrated. You can actually call it mind manipulated regarding how the media system operates. You might consider it as bad leadership.

This document refers to the Norwegian system, as a result of lack of knowledge of other countries and systems. It is highly possible that many other nationalities and state systems operate within the same usage of distributing power positions in return of better results, number-wise and strategically. The outcome has not yet seen to be existing.

All of Earth's problems seem to be a result of the human mind's symbiotic relation adapting to these systems.
