High Pressure Dominance Set To Continue "Over Weeks" After All + With Even Warmer Temperatures Over The Next Several Days & Next Week...

Hi everyone, and we hope you're enjoying the much more settled and gradual warming up of the weather and the developing sunshine from the expected high-pressure influenced weather we have promised you over a several-week period in ALL the following digitally-dated and public updates for in and around mid-April and over a period of "weeks" and with maximum temperatures creeping into at least the low 20s in the warmest spots over the coming days.

Additionally, high pressure influenced weather will continue through much of next week and with even warmer to potentially very warm temperatures in places by midweek that could easily reach into the mid to high 20s in the warmest parts of the country and also matching and as covered for these exact dates in our last TWO weekly weather forecast updates in our private update to members and publicly in the following links available below for these expected dates of next week and for these also expected types of temperatures in at least the mid to high 20s also developing (your weather Apps will update nearer the time or after this update goes live).

Unfortunately, beyond the start of May and the first several days of the new month and the final month of spring, we will begin to see a sharp reversion to some much cooler and more unsettled weather conditions developing once again for many and as covered in our several weeks ahead and recent updates for May for which there is much greater detail within the members area.
