New: Expected Heat In The High 30s Giving Way To Expectant Cooler & More Unsettled Weather & Even Rain + For How Long...

After top temperatures expectantly reached into the high 30s once again in recent days from another blast of major heat this year over several days on our part since the back end of last week (heatwave 5 and extreme heat and to our earlier scale of expectancy), it is now also turning expectantly cooler and gradually somewhat more unsettled with some much-needed rain and developing thundery rumbles over the next several days and into next week.

The most recent heatwave start and end dates and the overall scale were also covered much earlier than anywhere else or copying weather pages in the provided and dated links below from as far back as earlier in July (see posting times and dates), as were the gradually cooler and more unsettled conditions from the north from this weekend and/or early next week.

Additionally, these exact same reports above also opted for another high pressure build of sorts (latest GFS/ECM both show signals for this) and further warm temperatures beyond this and during later next week and late August over a handful of days (probably also not as hot or as intense as this week and prior to a significant and also expected thundery breakdown on our part for afterwards and during the final days of August).
