

Further Colder Weather & Widespread Snow Possibilities Gaining Significant Ground For Mid To Late November After All . . .

We are now starting to see some major and widespread snow and cold opportunities "intensifying" and appearing for our exact and previous dates of from mid and into late November for parts as far south as southern England and Ireland from other and recent and now repeated main third-party models such as the GFS and ECM computer runs from in and around 18th November (see below).

Our last dated public update on this below also stated the following in reference to this exact scenario and with the wording "WILL" in capital letters for this same period:

"Additionally, the longer-term model runs and projections want to build something majorly cold and wintry with snow possibilities at lower elevations during the final third of November (around 20–22 and onwards are the ones to monitor for), but it is not quite there yet and is something we have already stated WILL also intensify further and nearer time."

Currently showing for around 18th November and a day or two away from our original

To conclude, for now, this will also be the fourth year in succession on our part (myself/Exacta) that we will have unravelled and identified with ease from some strong pattern recognition on our part/methodology for some notable and widespread cold and snow across our shores for NOVEMBER from several months ahead once again (And when others said it would NOT happen AGAIN).

Please also feel free to check out our past 3 digitally-dated November claims and widespread snow images for 2023, 2024 and 2025 here (our Facebook archives) . . .
