Regret the dearth of club news but it seems that unless a member of the Viewpoint staff is present, nothing is written for the paper. Unfortunate are the club members who for reasons of their own cannot attend these functions and rely upon the club organ for information. (Don't forget, they pay dues.) We hear that in September and October there were some outstanding speakers and yet at the last business meeting no-one could remember their names! This is a sad thing for we know as a fact that the Viewpoint is saved by many members for future reference and all this knowledge is lost forever. The same holds true for the driving events.

One of my favorite James Thurber pieces is "Recollections of the Gas Buggy", in which he described his curiously equivocal relationship with the motor-car. They never really liked each other, and while cars may have understood Thurber, it is certain that Thurber never understood cars. From time to time friends would try to explain the mechanism to him, but always unsuccessfully. "I developed the notion," he said, "that the gas engine was more soundly constructed than I was."

The full impact of that comment didn't hit me until a short time ago, when for a couple of days I had the use of a car that was six months older than I am. It was 1926 Morris Cowley 11.9 hp two-seater, one of the last of the classic Bullnose models. and the startling thing about it lay in the fact that it was not the usual restoration job - not by any means. Every part of it was either an original factory component or a genuine contemporary accessory. It was not repainted, retrimmed, replated or tarted up in any way, but had simply grown old gracefully, with little traces of shabbiness here and there, a certain amount of honest wear and tear, but everything working nicely. The more I looked at that damned motor-car the more I had to admit that if it was older than me, it was definitely in better shape. I almost hated it.

Anybody my age (still below the half-century, but not much below) finds today's prices upsetting, to put it mildly, when looking back on the cars we could have bought but didn't, or did buy but didn't keep. There was the M.G. K.3 offered to me for $500; the seller didn't know, as I did, that it was a Le Mans classwinner with a long racing history. But I hadn't a spare $500 at the time, anyway.

A friend of mine has just paid $7000 for an Austin Seven, the perky little poor man's runabout that made Austin famous in the late 1920s. It was sold in Germany as a Dixi, in France as a Rosengart, in Japan as (would you believe?) a Datsun, and in the USA as a Bantam - by the Pennsylvania company that later designed and built the Jeep.

I never owned a Seven, but I once paid $25 for its brother, the Austin Ten-Four; a lovely little 1934 tourer in perfect working order with original paintwork, trim, top and sidescreens. I bought it for my wife, who took one look and remarked that she wouldn't be seen dead in a thing like that. So, short of storage space as every old car enthusiast always is, I tried to sell it again - but the Government had just introduced compulsory annual testing for all cars 10 years old and more, so nobody wanted to know. Eventually I gave it away (to the local vicar, who was holding a rummage sale in aid of the church restoration fund). Today's price? Well, somewhere between $1500 and $2000 wouldn't be far out, I suppose. And that's happened in less than 15 years.

What I find much harder to understand is the present-day enthusiasm for replicas, which to my mind have neither the good qualities of a well-engineered modern car nor the aesthetic appeal of an old one. Maybe it's not too surprising that they seem to hold a special attraction for youngsters who are not too familiar with the real thing. At the last London Motor Show the big crowd-stopper was the Panther stand, displaying all kinds of unlikely machinery at prices ranging from about $18,000 to more than $40,000. At the Racing Car Show in January this year there were more replicas to be seen, including a modern version of the 328 BMW based on BMW 2002 components and with a $16,000 price-tag. And at the last Beaulieu Cavalcade of Motoring I remember seeing a bastard cousin of the Type 35 Bugatti which someone had built and sold - for a while - at some $20,000. It was called the Dri-Sleeve Moonraker Special, and it looked it.

It's a cockeyed world if replicas survive and a company like Aston Martin goes bankrupt. Poor Aston Martin, whose magnificent vee-8 was priced at a little over $25,000 in this country and outperformed almost everything else on the market; 146 mph maximum, and zero to 60 in a mere 6.2 secs. And as I saw for myself when I visited the factory a year ago, it was beautifully, beautifully made.

Gentlemen:

I am restoring a 1951 MG-TD and have been able to find everything that I need except a screw-type oil cap that fits in the cast aluminum cylinder head cover assembly. I believe that the part number is #433 490 (not sure).

Can you direct me to a supplier for this item either new or used? MG distributor advises me that this type cap is no longer available as this type of cover was replaced and new cover uses snap-in type of cap. I will need to find a cap or replace entire cover.

Yours truly,

E. H. White

Dear Members,

We are currently forming a manufacturing company for the production of antique and classic car parts. We are interested in making obsolete parts that are no longer available, or hard to get items.

I am a Tool & Die Maker with twelve years experience with Ford Motor Company. I have dealt with almost every aspect of automobile parts manufacturing. I am combining my talents with my father-in-law, also a Tool & Die Maker, and my brother-in-law, a Manufacturing Engineer. We have all been associated with automobile parts production and manufacturing.
