Red Sea crisis: What it takes to reroute the world's biggest cargo ships safely?

LOGISTICS

Hundreds of cargo ships are being rerouted around the southern tip of Africa to avoid Houthi attacks in the Red Sea. But just how easy is it to divert the world's biggest ships?

An estimated 12% of global trade passes through the Red Sea every year, worth more than $1tn (£790bn). But many shipping firms have begun avoiding the area altogether. Hundreds of giant container ships, some of them more than 300m (984ft) long, are now choosing a lengthy detour around the continent of Africa instead of heading up the Red Sea and through the Suez Canal on voyages from Asia to Europe. But rerouting such large vessels is no easy task – the logistics involved can be enormous and time consuming.

Elsewhere, the severe drought afflicting the Panama Canal and the war in Ukraine – which has curtailed grain shipments via the Black Sea – are also strangling global supply chains. There is an urgency to adapt and reroute, though it comes with serious financial and environmental consequences.

What is the future of Sports Illustrated?

STRAUSS: Yeah, Sports Illustrated has a super complicated ownership structure. So there's a company that owns Sports Illustrated called the Authentic Brands Group, and then they sell the publishing license to another company called the Arena Group. And the Arena Group pays the parent company a licensing fee to publish it. And they missed a payment earlier this month. And that is what precipitated the termination of the license. And in response to the termination of the license, the publishing group announced that they are going to lay off the staff. Now, the second part of that is two companies at the, you know, the top of Sports Illustrated are continuing to negotiate what a new license could look like. And so if they are able to reach a new agreement, most of these people will in fact keep their jobs.

Will Oil Go Back To $100? If tensions in the Middle East rise, and the Suez Canal loses most of its traffic because of risk to shipping due to attacks by Houthi rebels, oil prices will rise. The question is, by how much? The very few times crude oil has topped $100, geopolitical problems were the causes.
