Trip to Arctic Circle

Dave and Sue Ryan took a once in a lifetime trip consisted of 14 Model A's and 26 people who traveled 8,200 miles in 36 days to the Arctic Circle. The trip took place from Aug 21 -Sept 25, 1988. "Our itinerary took us through 12 states in the United States and 3 provinces in Canada. We saw six National Parks. We traveled on many different road conditions. We traveled several hundred miles by inland waterways on ferries and also on a flatcar of a train. (Wait until you hear this story). Dave has a slide presentation of the highlights of his trip which he will share with you in April. "

Sunshine Report

Happy March everyone!

Two cards were sent in February:

" A get well card was sent to Charles Wilkes, who had major hand surgery in late January.

" A sympathy card was sent to the family of Donald Lobner. Ken Coleman shared that in addition to serving in the US Army as a machinist mechanic, Don was also a diesel mechanic for Studebaker, and retired from Dean Machinery. Don was an active member of the POA's for many years and, with his valued mechanical skills, served as the "motor builder" for the club, building 138 motors for Plain Ol' A members and others. Many thanks to Ken Coleman for sharing Don's legacy with the POA's.

Hoping that the weather warms up before the St. Patrick Day parades and hope to see you soon at an upcoming Model A event or meeting!

The Iconic Snap-Brim Fedora Hat

By Brian Carlson (reprinted from The Flying Quail)

Advertised in 1928 as being "Blocked in one of the most approved styles." this description reflects the legacy of a hat with a history spanning more than a century. During the Model A Era the fedora was the favorite of men ranging from the fashionable young collegiate to the conservative head of the family. It was the most adopted of available hat styles both for social daytime and business occasions. Its popularity can be attributed to a rugged workable design combined with a perfection of curvature and dimension.

During the Model A Era social expectations dictated that the well-dressed gentleman's wardrobe included hats and caps appropriate to their circumstance. The wearing of a head covering upon leaving home was the accepted practice, only to be removed indoors as appropriate or being engaged in conversation with women. Further, it was a strong economic statement about the wearer and status symbol.

The fedora is a soft felt hat with wide brim and features a prominent crown. Its styling descends from the traditional brimmed hat worn as part of the customary costume of Tyrol, a mountainous region of the Austrian Alps. The hat's name was derived from French dramatist Victorien Sardou's successful 1882 tragic romance stage play Fedora which starred the extremely popular actress Sarah Bernhardt as the heroine Lady Fedora. To the delight of her numerous French, German, and English fans, she was reported to have worn a stylish soft felt hat replete with a crease in the crown which the fans quickly emulated in their own wardrobes. The fedora then made its way across the Atlantic and was being advertised in New York by 1884 as a newly offered hat style. It is fair to state that the early fedora could have easily become a footnote in history, but subsequent events interceded. Italian hatmaker Giuseppe Borsalino, his legacy still a world-wide force in the hat world, turned his attention to the then new hat. His creative genius transformed it by undertaking innovative improvements resulting in the 'modern fedora' styling available in the Model A Era. Borsalino's styling improvements met with ever increasing popularity including the attention of England's Prince Edward VIII, a fashion icon in his own right. A 1924 visit to the United States influenced the fashion world when he wore a fedora with dressy suits. Americans embraced the fashionable boldness of a royal socialite. Sears, Roebuck and Company also noticed; mass production of the fedora was quickly undertaken. This resulted in the eroding popularity of homburg and derby hats.

The fedora was the most popular men's hat of the Model A Era. Its style remained constant during those years, as did all other aspects of men's hats. This was in sharp contrast to the constantly changing contemporary designs encountered by women. Reinforcing the popularity of the fedora was its fashionable choice in contrast to the previously stiffer hats, enhanced versatility and the emerging influence of theatre palaces that portrayed Hollywood's leading men wearing a fedora. This suggested that the purchase of a good quality hat would ensure years of service with no fear of becoming dated.

While original fedoras can be sourced (online, antique stores or swap meets), there are often challenges as to condition and fit. Fortunately, there are many quality fedora hats for sale through haberdashers or online. The challenge is to select a hat that closely adheres to what was available during the Model A Era.

The 'modern fedora' of the Model A Era encompasses several key stylistic components and materials. The Fedora is fashioned from a soft felt material: fabric made from animal fur such as rabbit, or wool, processed to form a smooth or napped finish. The felt is typically dyed black, brown, or gray with blue, green and tan sometimes at offer. A prominent crown of over five inches features a crease (also termed a bash or dent) in the form of a lengthwise trough but also commonly available is the teardrop (also known as the 'C') style. In addition, the crown has a "pinch" at the front sides, claimed to have been originated by Borsalino in order to facilitate a gentleman undertaking to doff his chapeau. A one and 3/4-inch-wide grosgrain ribbon featuring a bow completes the crown.

The brim of a fedora is also a defining feature. There are three distinct edge finishings associated with the fedora style: raw or unfinished, finished with a sewn overwelt or underwelt or bound with grosgrain ribbon. These finishings allow the brim to be worn in a variety of angles resulting in the 'snap-brim' designation. Width of hat brims range from two and 3/8 to two and 2 5/8 inches. Rounding out the construction of the hat is the lining. Quality products feature satin or silk material, often with a top plastic protector, combined with a leather sweatband. An unlined fedora with fabric sweatband is a summer alternative.

The fedora hat continues to be an enduring fashion favorite. This popularity still makes it possible for a gentleman to acquire an authentically styled Model A Era hat as a fundamental component of his everyday period wardrobe.
