Toba of Hope N.W ★
PP

Amina stood at the crest of a dune in the Cholistan Desert just as the dawn light spilled in from the east. The sky, soft pink and gold, edged over rolling hills of sand that stretched, wave after wave into nothing. The air was still, a hush before the world began again. As the day went by, the intensity of the heat increased as well. Amina wiped the sweat from her brow as she trudged across the white glare of sand. The sun was high, too heavy to lift the spirit. She carried two water-filled claypots on a bamboo yoke, the only source of water she had was a natural pond, the toba, that cooled after the last monsoon rains. Cholistan water becomes a prayer, a trembling wish. Here the land cracks in long lines, thirst writes its name on skin. Yet, people like Amina rise before dawn, the silver hush before the sun arrives, and walk. Goats followed her across the sand, hooves carefully stepping, ears alert for hawks circling the sky. She neared a cluster of date palms, ancient and red, her heart lifted. These palms had survived
