What Great CEOs Do: How to Learn from Mistakes and Move On Real-life, one-page, CEO Challenge-Solution Case Studies
Introduction

This compilation of CEO case studies is based on real-life challenges faced by members of MacKay CEO Forums. The case studies were originally written for and published in Business in Vancouver as part of Dr. Nancy MacKay’s monthly BIV column The CEO Advantage.

We gratefully acknowledge our members and Business in Vancouver for making this content available for the benefit of all CEOs and Executives.

It is our honour to work with exceptional leaders on a daily basis and to share the benefits of peer learning with our ever-growing community of CEOs. We hope you enjoy this booklet of case studies as a preview or complement to your own peer learning journey.

[Signature]

Nancy
MacKay CEO Forums is committed to accelerating CEO and Executive performance through world class peer groups. We provide results oriented, professionally facilitated, CEO peer learning groups for medium to large companies across Canada.

Our forums enable exceptional leaders to surround themselves with successful peers who help them to become better CEOs and accelerate their business results while saving time for greater life balance.

MacKay CEO Forums is led by co-founder and CEO Dr. Nancy MacKay. Nancy and her team of highly skilled, trusted advisors and business leaders share a passion for helping CEOs and their companies accelerate performance, and currently have hundreds of members participating in forums across Canada. MacKay CEO Forums has an alliance with and is a national sponsor of the Deloitte Canada’s Best Managed Companies Program
WHAT GREAT CEOS DO: HOW TO LEARN FROM MISTAKES AND MOVE ON

Topic Area

CEO Happiness, Time Mastery & Life Balance
CEO SOLUTION

To tackle this time-management problem, the CEO and her team participated in a time-mastery workshop. To begin, the executives listed their top 10 activities in each of their current roles and then self-rated their ability to perform each activity as masterful, excellent, competent or incompetent. They then gave each other feedback on individual strengths as well as opportunities for improvement.

It got really interesting when each person was challenged to stop doing or minimize the activities rated as either competent or incompetent. Instead, he or she was to focus on spending 80% of his or her time on areas of strength—activities ranked as masterful or excellent.

To ease the transition, executives developed a 90-day plan with clear objectives to build on their strengths. In each case, they were instructed to spend most of their time on the three most vital activities needed to drive the results for which they were accountable.

In addition, each executive developed a top 20 list of key business relationships, both internal and external, to foster over the next 90 days.

At the end of the 90-day period, there was a new and significant vitality to the executive team as each member reported being more productive and less frazzled. Building on strengths may not be what comes to mind when considering time management, but ultimately it is the path to driving continued and growing performance.
CEO SOLUTION

Now in a personal crisis, the CEO realized for the first time that there was more to life than work.

He needed to take charge or continue to face serious personal, financial and/or physical consequences.

With assistance, he was shown how to start setting goals in all areas of his life: career, money, partner, friends and family, health, personal growth, physical environment and fun and hobbies. It was hard for him to think outside the context of work, but he persisted despite the discomfort.

The CEO then developed a 90-day action plan to achieve greater satisfaction in three key areas.

First, he made a commitment to work with a financial planner to sort out his finances and formulate long-term money strategies.

Second, he committed to getting a medical exam, one which was specifically geared to executives and could address the implications of his work profile and habits.

Third, he committed to having dinner regularly with each one of his kids and to spending more time nurturing friendships, important first steps to building deeper personal, non-work relationships.

By applying the same level of focus to his entire life, and not just work, the CEO felt more settled and in control. He vowed never to let work take over, and he encouraged his direct reports to achieve the same balance in their lives. Not only did he become a model for his employees, he also helped ensure they didn’t experience the burnout that he had.

Why Workaholics Turn Talent Advantages into Disadvantages

CEO CHALLENGE

After the best year of his career, an executive was appointed CEO. He had accomplished an important goal and, to all appearances, he was a success. Yet the rest of his life was out of control.

To get that promotion, he had spent more than 80 hours a week working and travelling extensively. Not surprisingly, it had taken its toll.

His wife had called him six months ago while he was on a business trip to let him know that she was leaving him and would be gone when he returned. He had been too busy travelling to have developed much of a relationship with his teenage children, and he had no close friends. He hadn’t had a medical examination for more than three years because he was too busy to fit it in. And, even though he was a CA, he didn’t have a financial planner—a fact of which he was now acutely aware given that his marriage was dissolving.

CEO MISTAKE

Clearly, this CEO had made his work his priority in life and, at the young age of 53, he was burning out. Neglecting the other aspects of his life had now cost him. He felt lost, disconnected and unmotivated.

To feel fulfilled and happy in life, six human needs must be met. They are: love and connection, learning and growth, certainty, variety, contribution and significance. In this case, all of these needs were being met through work. Our CEO was a classic workaholic.
Executive Assistants are Critical to CEO Success

CEO CHALLENGE
A CEO had been working with his executive assistant for the past year and things just weren’t working out well. Their personalities clashed, and her performance wasn’t meeting his expectations, so they agreed to part ways during a very busy time in the company’s business cycle.

This was the CEO’s third assistant in three years, and the hiring process in each case had used up a lot of time that he really didn’t have. He liked to be self-sufficient, so decided to go it alone and manage all his own administration.

Three months later, his office was piling up with paperwork, he had missed some important customer meetings and he was being told by his executive team that the whole company was suffering.

CEO MISTAKE
In hiring his last three assistants, the CEO had informally reached out to his network instead of using a formal recruiting process.

Because he didn’t appreciate the potential value of a top executive assistant, the CEO hadn’t paid close attention to the level of skill and experience of the job candidates. He also hadn’t viewed the relationship as a partnership from which he had as much or more to gain.

In the case of each of his three former assistants, the CEO had also neglected to set any specific priorities to focus the assistant’s work. As was his style, he worked somewhat independently while his assistants did their best to tread water.

CEO SOLUTION
Top talent is necessary for more than just your executive team. The best assistants can be a significant asset not only to the CEO, but to the organization as a whole.

View your assistant is part of your CEO “brand.” As the gatekeeper and frequent first point of contact, your assistant is often the initial impression others have of you and your organization. With that understanding, it's not hard to realize that your assistant's work style and capabilities should enhance, not detract, from you and your brand.

First, it’s essential to use an experienced recruiter who specializes in executive support. Focus on finding someone who is a great personality fit and is professionally trained to be an executive assistant.

Second, develop and train your assistant. Meet weekly to plan your time and then daily to check in and make sure both of you are on track. An effective assistant will help you set appropriate boundaries to manage your priorities, so be sure he or she understands those priorities. Ask your assistant for feedback regularly and let him or her know whether your expectations are being met.

Last, don’t let a great assistant get away. Make sure you say thank you and acknowledge his or her efforts daily. Compensate well and recognize the significant contribution your assistant makes to your success.
CEO SOLUTION
When you get stuck in your job as a leader, it's time to figuratively fire yourself from that job and create a new one. Sounds crazy perhaps, but see how this can play out.

In this case, the CEO was a member of a peer-sharing group and he asked for some advice. One of the other CEOs explained how she had been in a similar situation and had developed a list of the 40%—those activities that were dragging her down as well.

Her strategy had been to go to her executive team and asked them to step up and take on most of what she regarded as dreaded activities.

Much to her surprise, there was a lot of excitement and enthusiasm from her team to support her and relieve her of what she really didn’t want to have to do any more.

As a result, she enthusiastically redefined her role with a focus on three key activities:

- developing a new strategy to deal with the increased competition;
- creating an "execution" culture throughout the organization to drive action; and
- attracting, retaining and developing talent to ensure successful strategy implementation.

From his peers, the CEO in the job crisis learned that it’s common to feel stuck at times and that the journey to reinventing his job could not only be relatively straightforward, it could be positively invigorating and was absolutely necessary.
For information about our CEO programs, please contact Nancy MacKay or visit us online.

Nancy MacKay
PH (604) 329-4998
EMAIL nancy@mackayceoforums.com

#317 – 1641 Lonsdale Ave,
North Vancouver, BC, Canada  V7M 2J5
mackayceoforums.com