The Lightning Thief by Rick Riordan: What would happen if the Greek Gods from old times were still around, and residing over New York City? The Lightning Thief is one of five in a series. The Percy Jackson and the Olympians series brings all of the old myths to life, a lesson that Percy Jackson, the protagonist, has to learn. I like this book because it has a setting everyone can understand, and it explains the fictional part of the world well. For ages 10-14.

Ink and Bone by Rachel Caine: Book one of a series of five. The Great Library of Alexandria has never burned down, and they now control the flow of all knowledge. The only way to get books is through the Library. Jess Brightwell is the son of a book smuggler, someone who sells copies of books the Library doesn't control. To get close to the enemy, Jess joins a class of people who want to work at the Library. However, as Jess and his new friends learn firsthand, the Library will do anything to control knowledge. I like this book series because it shows what could have happened if the Great Library did not burn down. For ages 14+.

We Hunt the Flame by Hafsah Faizal: Book one of a duology. In another world, a magical country is magicless and closed in by a forest. The forest is creeping up on the country, the curse upon the land to strip it of magic growing dire. Zafira is on a hunt to restore magic, and so is Nasir- except he is ordered to kill the Hunter, Zafira, as well. I like this book because it has a found family by the end of the book, and it is a whole new world that you get sucked into when you open the book. For ages 14-18.
