[68] Rule 14.67 does not contravene the principle grounded in the preamble of the Constitution Act, 1867 and stated by the Supreme Court of Canada in Trial Lawyers' Association of British Columbia v. British Columbia[71] – legislative barriers that unjustifiably restrict access to a superior court are unconstitutional.

[69] The Supreme Court of Canada declared unconstitutional a provision in British Columbia's Supreme Court Rules[72] that requires a plaintiff advancing a "non-frivolous or non-vexatious" action[73] to pay a trial hearing fee – no fee for the first three days of trial, $500 for each day of trial in excess of three days, and $800 for each day of trial over ten – before the registry would schedule trial dates unless the plaintiff met the criteria for a hearing fee waiver – the plaintiff was impoverished.

[70] Mr. Duchnij's constitutional challenge to rule 14.67 of the Alberta Rules of Court faces three insurmountable hurdles.

[71] First, the Trial Lawyers' Association of British Columbia v. British Columbia standard applied to a court rule that restricted access to a trial court. The rule that Mr. Duchnij contests – rule 14.67 – has the potential to restrict access to the Court of Appeal of Alberta – an appeal court, not a trial court. Rule 14.67 did not deny Mr. Duchnij access to the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta. In fact, Mr. Duchnij was a defendant in proceedings Trisura Insurance instituted. He has already had his dispute with Trisura Insurance adjudicated by the Court of Queen's Bench.

[72] There is no constitutional right to appeal a decision of a superior court or any other court.[74]

[73] If there is no constitutional right of appeal, statutory provisions that allow some appeals to proceed only with permission of the appeal court[75] cannot be unconstitutional on the ground that they may contravene the access-to-court principle.

[74] Lord Justice Bowen, in Cowell v. Taylor,[76] drew a distinction between the effect poverty had on the ability of a plaintiff to proceed to trial and an appellant to appeal an adverse trial judgment. At common law and equity poverty did not deprive a plaintiff of the right to prosecute an action. But poverty had consequences for an appellant:[77]

> There is an exception in the case of appeals, but there the appellant has had the benefit of a decision by one of Her Majesty's Courts, and so an insolvent party is not excluded from the Courts, but only prevented, if he cannot find security, from dragging his opponent from one court to another.

[75] Second, even if the open-court principle applies to appeal courts, there is no reason to abandon the qualification introduced by the Trial Lawyers' Association of British Columbia principle that a litigant with a frivolous or vexatious claim is not exempt from the burden of paying trial court fees – complying with obligations other litigants encounter.

Memorandum of Decision of the Honourable Mr. Justice J.T. Eamon

I. Introduction

[1] The Defendants apply to declare the Plaintiff a vexatious litigant pursuant to section 23.1 Judicature Act, RSA 2000, c J-2, and to bar him from commencing any further proceedings in his own name or in the name of any other person without leave of the Court.

[2] The application is based on the Plaintiff's historical conduct in litigation involving the City of Calgary ("City") or its representatives, employees or agents. The Defendants claim Mr. Chisan's law suits against the City, or its employees, representatives or agents include collateral attacks on previously decided issues concerning the legality of the use of a building in the City known as 2214/2216 - 42nd Street, SE ("2214/2216") and frivolous or vexatious claims. They also point to numerous appeals over the years, most of which were unsuccessful or abandoned. They say Mr. Chisan's conduct in legal proceedings demonstrate that he cannot be trusted to use court resources properly and causes those sued by him to incur needless expense and effort in responding to his frivolous claims.

[3] The proceedings relied on by the Defendants include:

(a) A prosecution against Mr. Chisan for committing an offence under the Planning Act in relation to the use of 2214/2216, leading to trial and conviction on September 16, 1992 (the "1992 Trial"), Mr. Chisan's unsuccessful application to this Court to stay the decision pending appeal to this Court, his unsuccessful appeal of the 1992 Trial decision to this Court (QB no. 9201-0408-S2), and his unsuccessful attempt to further appeal to the Alberta Court of Appeal (no. 14417AC/14462);

(b) Mr. Chisan's unsuccessful certiorari application attempting to remove the above mentioned prosecution to Queen's Bench (QB no. 9201-1386-CO) ("Certiorari Application") and his unsuccessful appeal therefrom to the Alberta Court of Appeal (no. 9201-13620-A1-01);

(c) Mr. Chisan's civil suit in this Court (action no. 9701-09641 filed July 3, 1997), which was discontinued ("First 1997 Action");

(d) Mr. Chisan's civil suit in this Court (action no. 9701-16441 filed November 19, 1997), which was dismissed for want of prosecution against several defendants, and has been stayed as against City defendants since 2002 ("Second 1997 Action");

(e) A contempt of Court proceeding against Mr. Chisan in this Court (action no. 9301-02696), which led to Mr. Chisan's imprisonment and other relief (the "Contempt Proceeding"), and Mr. Chisan's unsuccessful appeal to the Alberta Court of Appeal which was dismissed for failure to prosecute (no. 0201-0106AC);

(f) An application against Mr. Chisan in this Court (action no. 9910-18117), for an order permitting the City to inspect 2214/2216 ("Inspection Application"), leading to Mr. Chisan's unsuccessful appeal to the Alberta Court of Appeal (no. 00-18723) and unsuccessful applications by Mr. Chisan in the appeal;

(g) Mr. Chisan's civil suit in this Court (action no. 0201-17504 filed October 16, 2002), which has been stayed since 2002 ("2002 Action");

(h) An injunction application by the City against Susannah Chisan in this Court (action no 0701-13288 filed December 28, 2007) ("2007 Injunction Application"), in which Mr. Chisan participated;

(i) Mr. Chisan's civil suit in this Court (action no. 1301-15170 filed December 24, 2013) ("2013 Action"). Parts of this action were summarily struck out, and the remainder dismissed by summary judgment;

(j) Mr. Chisan's civil suit in this Court (action no. 1601-06249 filed May 10, 2016) ("2016 Action"). This action was summarily struck out by a Master of this Court, leading to Mr. Chisan's appeal in this Court which was struck out, and Mr. Chisan's appeal from that decision to the Alberta Court of Appeal (no. 1601-02555AC) which was struck for failure to prosecute.

II. The background, procedural objections, and evidence considered

a. Background

[4] The present application arises in the 2016 Action. Mr. Chisan sued various named and un-named parties, alleging loss from various allegedly unlawful actions. The underlying complaint in the action is described in para 1 of the Statement of Claim:

> "The cause of this Action is that the Defendants failed to effect disclosure respecting their actions and omissions, trespassed, and impaired the Plaintiff's constitutional rights not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice."

[5] Generally speaking, the allegations relate to seizure of various properties, without "disclosure". The Plaintiff says he was the owner of a property in the City referred to in these reasons as "Lots 19 to 24", before the lots were seized by "Defendants A to E". Another property (2214/2216) was allegedly seized by a City investigator and a City bylaw officer. "Defendant F" was another bylaw officer allegedly engaged to seize personal property and renovation materials at the same address. Neither allegation specifies the type of seizure. It is further alleged in para 5 of the Statement of Claim that a City manager has the obligation to effect disclosure and "facilitate actions of The City Actors that demonstrate compliance with the Plaintiff's right to be secure against unreasonable seizure". The Plaintiff also complains about a notice issued by a City corporate security officer prohibiting him from being on lands owned or occupied by the City. Finally, Mr. Chisan sued a City lawyer for allegedly committing fraud by failing to disclose that he did not have a solicitor and client relationship with the individual defendants in the 2013 Action.

[6] The Plaintiff seeks various damages and "an order for disclosure".

[7] The named Defendants and un-named Defendant F are alleged to be various representatives of the City -- two investigators, a manager, a corporate security officer, and a lawyer.

[8] The Statement of Claim does not explicitly allege a nexus between the seizure of Lots 19 to 24 and activities of the City (or identify the persons who effected seizure of Lots 19 to 24 as the City or its personnel), but in fact that nexus exists.

[9] Lots 19 to 24 were under enforcement proceedings commenced by a writ of enforcement issued by the City, who as instructing creditor instructed that they be sold in the enforcement proceedings. The City is a corporation (Municipal Government Act, RSA 2000, c. M-26, s. 4), and therefore a person. With that context and the allegations of para 5 of the Statement of Claim, it is obvious that the un-named Defendants are the instructing creditor (the City) and perhaps individual representatives or agents of the City.

[10] The 2016 Action was struck by a Master in Chambers on June 10, 2016. The Plaintiff appealed that order. His appeal was returnable in morning Chambers on August 19, 2016.

[11] This caused the Defendants to file the present vexatious litigant application on August 9, 2016 in the 2016 Action, also returnable on August 19, 2016.

[12] At the return of the applications on August 19, 2016 Campbell J adjourned the vexatious litigant application to a full day special chambers application.

[13] Notice of the present application was provided to the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General, as required by section 23.1 of the Judicature Act. By letter dated August 10, 2016 Alberta Justice and Solicitor General acknowledged notice to the Attorney General of Alberta (who is also the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General) and advised the Attorney General of Alberta would not be taking a position or appearing.

[14] The Court raised during the special chambers application whether it might be an irregularity to make a motion in a struck action. However, Rule 6.3(1) permits such an application. Even if it did not, Campbell J's order obviously was meant to continue the application so that it could be heard on its merits. A section 23.1 application would be an appropriate response in the 2016 Action to ongoing efforts by the Plaintiff to try to keep the action alive. In any case, it would now be too late to complain about such an irregularity, if it was irregular: Rule 1.5(3).

b. Mr. Chisan's procedural objections

[15] At the outset of the application before me, Mr. Chisan raised various procedural objections.

[16] First, he noted Ms. Sinclair (a lawyer with the City of Calgary Law Department, who appeared on behalf of counsel for the Defendants at the application) is a "corporate lawyer" for the City of Calgary. He requested a clear statement of who she represents and how that comes to be. Second, he said the Defendants needed leave to allegedly limit Mr. Chisan's freedom of expression rights under the Canadian constitution. Third, he submitted the City cannot initiate proceedings under the Judicature Act.

[17] The Court dismissed the first objection, relating to Ms. Sinclair's role as counsel, during the hearing.

[18] Pursuant to Rule 2.24(1) of the Alberta Rules of Court, a lawyer becomes a lawyer of record by filing a record in an action. Ms. Sinclair or the City of Calgary Law Department became the lawyer of record for the Defendants in the 2016 Action by filing the motion to strike the action, and continued to be described in that capacity in the present vexatious litigant application.

[19] This Court has jurisdiction to embark on the inquiry requested by Mr. Chisan. Courts of inherent jurisdiction have supervisory power over lawyers as officers of the court and may exercise this power to ensure the proper administration of justice: Canadian National Railway Co v. McKercher LLP, 2013 SCC 39 at paras 13 - 16.

[20] Generally speaking, the Court should be reluctant to inquire into the retainer of counsel who becomes a lawyer of record. Lawyers are officers of the Court who have ethical obligations, including of competence and candour, which makes reliance on their representations of authority appropriate in most cases. The terms of their retainers with their clients are privileged from disclosure.

[22] Mr. Chisan's second objection was that the application will limit his constitutional right to freedom of expression so the Defendants would require leave of the Court. Later in his submissions, he acknowledged that he was not challenging the validity of the applicable provisions of the Judicature Act. Rather, he was submitting that his constitutional rights are to be considered in the balance in deciding whether to make an order.

[23] There is no requirement on the Defendants, who are parties to the action, to get leave to apply under section 23.1 of the Judicature Act.

[24] It may be that Mr. Chisan is referring to the requirement in sub-section 23.1(2) that a person, other than a party, a clerk of the Court or the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General, obtain permission to apply. The City is not explicitly named as a Defendant, so Mr. Chisan might perceive that permission is required where counsel making the application was a member of the City law department.

[25] As explained above, the application has been made by the Defendants. The City is obviously one of the Defendants. No permission is required.

[26] There is no merit to the second objection.

[27] The third objection is that the City cannot initiate proceedings under the Judicature Act or bring a proceeding to limit one's freedom of expression.

[28] A municipality has the powers of a natural person except to the extent they are limited by an enactment: Municipal Government Act, s. 6. No limitation was cited to me that the City cannot protect itself from vexatious litigation arising from enforcement or litigation proceedings that arise in the course of its governmental operations. I conclude that there are no such gaps in its powers. In any case, other Defendants also made the application.

[29] The third objection is without merit.

c. The evidence tendered by the Defendants

[30] The motion proceeded on the basis of books tendered by the Defendants containing copies of numerous pleadings, orders and other records in previous court proceedings and the 2016 Action. These were served on Mr. Chisan on August 17, 2016 with a letter informing him that they would be relied on in support of the application. Additional records were appended to the Defendants' written brief later served on Mr. Chisan. There was no clerk's certificate authenticating the records as true copies of records on the Court's file. Counsel, who is an officer of the Court, represented that these records are true copies of the original court proceedings by tendering them to the Court.

[31] Mr. Chisan did not object before me to the manner in which the Defendants provided these materials for use in the application. He did not suggest any individual records were not authentic or complete copies.

[32] It would have been preferable that the Defendants obtain and provide copies of records obviously bearing an original certification or authentication under Rule 13.29(2) or the Evidence Act RSA 2000, C.A-18, section 33, 44 or by following the procedure in R v Tatomir (1990), 1989 ABCA 233 (CanLII), 69 Alta. L.R. (2d) 305 (CA), leave refused [1989] S.C.C.A. No. 448.

[33] For each transcript, it would be preferable to provide transcripts certified by the reporter, including digitally certified versions. Those are admissible in evidence, without proof of the signature of the reporter: Recording of Evidence Act, RSA 2000, c. R-7.5 and the Recording of Evidence Regulation, A.R. 169/2009 and predecessor regulations; Rule 13.47.

[34] Notwithstanding the preferable procedures, it is not unusual for counsel to rely on photocopies of court records because any objection will typically result in a brief adjournment to obtain a certified or authenticated record. The present matter was booked for hearing on the special list for many months. Mr. Chisan knew the City would rely on the records. Mr. Chisan did not file any written brief prior to the application as required by Queen's Bench Practice Note 2, and did not otherwise object to the admissibility or authenticity of the copies. Mr. Chisan has frequently represented himself in the Alberta Courts since at least 1992, including in Chambers and Special Chambers applications and should know the rules by now.

[35] In this case, not all records were authenticated in the ordinary ways. However, there is really no doubt that the records submitted by the Defendants are authentic for the reasons outlined below. Asking for the formality of additional certifications would be useless and would cause further delay. The Court therefore accepts the records tendered by the City as true copies of the original proceedings as represented by counsel and given the absence of objection by Mr. Chisan.

[37] All of the records provided by the Defendants, other than transcripts of proceedings, reasons for decision, a letter from the Registrar of the Alberta Court of Appeal dated April 4, 2003, and a Struck Certificate - Late Appeal Record dated January 31, 2017 issued by the Registrar of the Alberta Court of Appeal, appear to be photocopies of stamped office copies of court filed documents or, in some cases, photocopies of court certified copies.

[38] All of the transcripts, save two, were proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench. The two exceptions were:

(a) A transcript of the 1992 Trial in the Provincial Court. A certified copy of that transcript was filed in this Court in relation to various proceedings in this Court following Mr. Chisan's conviction.

(b) An extract from a transcript of a provincial offence proceeding on September 23, 2008 against Mr. Chisan's spouse in the Provincial Court. That document appears to be a photocopy of a certified copy.

[39] Transcripts provided by the Defendants for pre-2015 proceedings in Queen's Bench were photocopies of certified transcripts, other than the oral reasons for judgment of Phillips J on April 19, 2002 and an extract of reasons delivered October 23, 2002 where no certificates were provided.

[40] Transcripts provided by the Defendants for 2015 and 2016 proceedings in Queen's Bench were digitally certified.

[41] Most of the reasons for decision reproduced by the Defendants in their books are published versions of previous reasons for decision of the Alberta courts in matters concerning Mr. Chisan or are copies from the Court:

(a) R v Chisan, [1992] A.J. No. 1108, the decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal in appeal no. 13266 dismissing Mr. Chisan's appeal from a decision by Power J wherein Mr. Chisan argued that the court lost jurisdiction in a provincial offence proceeding;

(b) R v Chisan, 1992 CanLII 6234 (AB KB), [1992] A.J. No 1267, 7 Alta. L.R. (3d) 254, the decision of Montgomery J refusing Mr. Chisan's application to stay the decision of Stevenson PCJ in the 1992 Trial pending appeal;

(c) R v Chisan, 1993 CanLII 16395 (AB KB), [1993] A.J. No. 509, 142 A.R. 201, 15 M.P.L.R. (2d) 275, the decision of Dixon J dismissing Mr. Chisan's appeal from conviction in the 1992 Trial (The original reasons for this reported decision are on the Queen's Bench appeal file, and are the same as the reported version other than the paragraph numbers added);

(d) R v Chisan, 1994 ABCA 14 (CanLII), [1994] A.J. No. 63, 149 A.R. 394, 16 Alta. L.R. (3d) 371 (CA), leave to appeal dismissed [1994] S.C.C.A. No. 109, the dismissal of Mr. Chisan's appeal from the decision of Waite J in the Certiorari Application;

(e) R v Chisan, 1994 ABCA 209 (CanLII), [1994] A.J. No. 515, [1994] 9 W.W.R. 147, 21 Alta. L.R. (3d) 95, 155 A.R. 264, the decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal finding that court did not have jurisdiction to entertain Mr. Chisan's appeal from the decision of a single judge refusing leave to appeal from the decision of Dixon J;

(f) 478370 Alberta Inc v. Chisan, 1998 ABCA 169, 219 A.R. 6, leave to appeal dismissed [1998] SCCA No 485, the decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal dismissing Mr. Chisan's appeal from a Queen's Bench chambers decision granting an application for judgment against Mr. Chisan. This decision reviews the "difficult history" of that litigation, including the contempt finding against Mr. Chisan for refusing to answer questions on cross-examination, Mr. Chisan's abandonment of an appeal of a contempt order, and Mr. Chisan's failing to call oral evidence at the final application after obtaining an order for viva voce evidence in the application. Mr. Chisan was represented by counsel in the application and on the appeal;

(g) Calgary v Chisan, 2000 ABCA 313, 271 A.R. 384, 4 C.P.C. (5th) 222, 16 M.P.L.R. (3d) 178, the decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal in appeal no. 99-18427 allowing the City's appeal from the decision of Lutz J striking out the Contempt Proceeding for want of prosecution, and restoring the Contempt Proceeding;

(h) Calgary v Chisan, 2001 ABCA 14, 286 A.R. 85, 21 M.P.L.R. (3d) 194, the decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal on Mr. Chisan's appeal from the Order of Wilkins J in the Inspection Application;

(i) Calgary v Chisan, [2002] A.J. No. 1713, 32 M.P.L.R. (3d) 256, the decision of Phillips, J. issued March 1, 2002 in the Contempt Proceeding finding Mr. Chisan in contempt of court;

(j) R v Chisan, 2003 ABCA 19, [2003] A.J. No. 49, the decision of O'Leary JA granting Mr. Chisan judicial interim release from imprisonment ordered by Phillips J;

(k) R v Chisan, 2003 ABCA 68, [2003] A.J. No. 241, the January 31, 2003 decision of the panel imposing conditions on Mr. Chisan's appeal from the decision of Phillips J finding Mr. Chisan in contempt of court and sanctioning him;

(l) Calgary v Susannah Chisan, 2008 ABQB 320, [2008] A.J. No. 807, the decision of Erb J in the 2007 Injunction Application against Susannah Chisan.

[42] The Court may take notice of court records in appropriate cases: Wong v Giannacopoulos, 2011 ABCA 277 at para 6; Calgary (City) v. Alberta (Energy and Utilities Board), 2010 ABCA 132, at para 193, Kin Franchising v. Donco (1993), 1993 ABCA 7 (CanLII), 7 Alta. L.R. (3d) 313 (C.A.) at para 7 (C.A.). This principle applies to published reasons for decision and records on the Court's proceedings file. It also applies to records of lower courts removed to this Court by certiorari: Stevenson and Côté, Civil Procedure Encyclopedia (Edmonton: Juriliber, 2003), p 45-55. Similarly, the principle obviously applies to records of proceedings of a lower court deposited in this Court in connection with an appeal to this Court, or to records of a higher court placed on the files of this Court in the course of an appeal from this Court. Examples are transcripts filed in connection with a summary conviction appeal to this Court, or a notice of appeal from an order in this Court to the Alberta Court of Appeal.

[43] The Court may take notice of proceedings in the Court and did so. The Court reviewed Queen's Bench files in action no. 9201-0408-S2, 9201-1386-CO, 9301-02696, 9701-09641, 9701-16441, 9901-18117, 0201-17504, 0701-13288, 1301-15170, and 1601-06249 to ensure that the copies of records tendered by the Defendants which were on those files were authentic.

[44] In reviewing the Queen's Bench files, the Court did not take note of other records in the files except: (1) a warrant of committal issued October 23, 2002 reflecting the decision of Phillips J contained in the extract of the transcript of proceedings of the same date submitted by the Defendants; and (2) an Order of Master Laycock made May 26, 2005 dismissing the Second 2007 Action against Her Majesty, as noted in a procedure record print of that action from the Clerk of the Court and submitted by the Defendants.

[45] The Court concluded there was no real doubt over authenticity because:

(a) the pleadings, affidavits, motions, discontinuance of the First 1997 Action, formal orders filed in Queen's Bench, transcript of the 1992 Trial, reasons for decision of Dixon J dated June 21, 1993, Mr. Chisan's Notice of Appeal filed July 22, 1993 from the decision of Dixon J, Mr. Chisan's Notice of Appeal filed March 10, 2000 from the decision of Wilkins J in the Inspection Application (appeal no. 00-18723), Order of Hunt JA made October 31, 2000 in appeal no. 99-18427 and 00-18724, Mr. Chisan's Notice of Appeal filed March 27, 2002 from decisions of Phillips J in the Contempt Proceeding, and Mr. Chisan's Notice of Appeal from the decision of Campbell J in Action no. 1601 - 06249, were confirmed to be authentic by comparing them to the Court copies on the Queen's Bench files;

(b) the transcripts of all proceedings taking place in 2015 and 2016 attached to the special Defendants' chambers brief are digitally certified and admissible under the Recording of Evidence Act;

(c) the rest of the transcripts (other than two extracts from transcript being reasons of Phillips J on October 19, 2002 and October 23, 2002 re further sanction of 6 months imprisonment, the latter attached to the Defendants' special chambers brief) purport to bear a signed certification and no objection was taken to their admission or use in the present application;

(d) the contempt findings and sanction decisions of Phillips J described in the transcripts referenced in sub-para 45(c) are accurately reflected in her formal Order of April 19, 2002, and a subsequent a warrant of committal that she signed dated October 23, 2002. No objection was taken by Mr. Chisan to the use or admission of those transcripts;

(e) the Court can take and has taken judicial notice of the published reasons for decision listed in para 41;

(f) the remainder of the records tendered by the Defendants is a small group of photocopies of records not found filed on the Queen's Bench files: (1) Mr. Chisan's filed Notice of Appeal in the Alberta Court of Appeal, 1992, in appeal no 13266 (appeal dismissed - see para 41(a) above); (2) Mr. Chisan's filed Notice of Motion in appeal no. 14417 seeking leave to appeal (leave refused - see para 41(e) above); (3) Mr. Chisan's filed motions, July 25, 2000 and October 26, 2000, Mr. Chisan's filed affidavit, October 26, 2000, and the Orders of Hunt JA filed August 3, 2000, in appeal no. 99-18427 and 00-18723; (4) Order of Paperny JA dated March 13, 2003 and letter from the Registrar of the Alberta Court of Appeal dated April 4, 2003 in appeal no. 02-0106AC; (5) Struck Certificate – Late Appeal Record, January 31, 2017, in appeal no. 1601-0255AC. No objection was taken by Mr. Chisan to their use or admission into evidence.

[46] Moving from authenticity to use of the records, the Court was mindful of limitations on the evidence:

(a) Mr. Chisan suggested that the Court should not refer to Madam Justice Erb's reasons for decision in the 2007 Injunction Application. Mr. Chisan said he was not a party to that proceeding. The records provided by the Defendants do not provide sufficient information to make a finding that he was a privy to that proceeding. Therefore, the Court has not considered the findings in Madam Justice Erb's reasons for judgment in its deliberations;

(b) A similar issue arises with respect to an Order of Romaine J in the 2007 Injunction Application disqualifying Mr. Chisan from representing Mrs. Chisan in those proceedings. It is not apparent from the face of the Order that Mr. Chisan participated in the submissions concerning disqualification or was privy to it. The Court has not considered that part of the Order in its deliberations;

(c) A similar issue arises with respect to the September 23, 2008 transcript in the City's materials recording a provincial court judge's disqualification of Mr. Chisan from representing Susannah Chisan in a prosecution in Provincial Court. Again, it is not apparent from the materials tendered by the City whether Mr. Chisan participated in that disqualification application. So the Court has disregarded it;

(d) Where transcripts were reviewed, they were taken as proof of what was said or found by the court, but not otherwise as proof of the truth of the contents. For this distinction, see for example, R. v. WBC, 2000 CanLII 5659 (ON CA), [2000] O. J. No 397 (CA) at paras 30 - 34.

[47] Mr. Chisan provided an affidavit sworn April 15, 2008 supporting Susannah Chisan in the 2007 Injunction Application. The Court has considered all of Mr. Chisan's affidavits provided in the Defendant's supporting materials in considering whether he is a vexatious litigant.

III. Applicable Law

a. General principles

[48] Section 23.1 of the Judicature Act authorizes a judge of this Court to restrict the right of a person start or continue litigation in Alberta courts where that person has initiated or engaged in vexatious proceedings:

> 23.1(1) Where on application or on its own motion, with notice to the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General, a Court is satisfied that a person is instituting vexatious proceedings in the Court or is conducting a proceeding in a vexatious manner, the Court may order that
> (a) the person shall not institute a further proceeding or institute proceedings on behalf of any other person, or
>
> (b) a proceeding instituted by the person may not be continued, without the permission of the Court.
>
> (2) An application under subsection (1) may be made by a party against whom vexatious proceedings are being instituted or conducted, a clerk of the Court or the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General or, with the permission of the Court, any other person.
>
> (7) A person against whom an order has been made under subsection (1) or (4) may apply to a Court for permission to institute or continue a proceeding in that Court and the Court may, subject to any terms or conditions it may impose, grant permission if it is satisfied that the proceeding is not an abuse of process and that there are reasonable grounds for the proceeding.

[49] Section 23(2) of the Judicature Act provides a non-exclusive definition of instituting vexatious proceedings or conducting a proceeding in a vexatious manner:

> For the purposes of this Part, instituting vexatious proceedings or conducting a proceeding in a vexatious manner includes, without limitation, any one or more of the following:
>
> (a) persistently bringing proceedings to determine an issue that has already been determined by a court of competent jurisdiction;
>
> (b) persistently bringing proceedings that cannot succeed or that have no reasonable expectation of providing relief;
> (c) persistently bringing proceedings for improper purposes;
>
> (d) persistently using previously raised grounds and issues in subsequent proceedings inappropriately;
>
> (e) persistently failing to pay the costs of unsuccessful proceedings on the part of the person who commenced those proceedings;
>
> (f) persistently taking unsuccessful appeals from judicial decisions;
> (g) persistently engaging in inappropriate courtroom behaviour.

[50] Any one or more of those indicia is a basis to find a person has engaged in vexatious misconduct: Chutskoff v. Bonora, 2014 ABQB 389 at para 131, leave to appeal refused, 2014 ABCA 444.

[51] In Chutskoff at para 92, Justice Michalyshyn provided a catalogue of potential features of vexatious litigation or abusive proceedings, which provides a useful guide to assessing a litigant's conduct. The Court was mindful of this catalogue in assessing Mr. Chiasan's litigation history.

[52] In determining whether to make an order the Court was also mindful of the difference between vexatious proceedings and vexatious litigants. Section 23.1 contemplates persistent conduct: O. (R.) v F. (D.), 2016 ABCA 170 at para 38.

[53] The entire history of the matter must be reviewed, to determine if there is a principled basis to make an order. That basis is demonstrated where the litigation history demonstrates a need to have litigation activities restricted to prevent future abuses of court processes: 644036 Alberta Ltd v Morbank Financial Inc, 2014 ABQB 681, at paras 51 - 97.

[54] In Hok v Alberta, 2016 ABQB 651, leave to appeal refused 2017 ABCA 63, Verville J describes the issues that should be considered relating to the impact or scope of a vexatious litigant order:

> 36 I conclude that when a court considers limits to future court access by a person with a history of litigation misconduct the key questions for a court are:
> 1. Can the court determine the identity or type of persons who are likely to be the target of future abusive litigation?
> 2. What litigation subject or subjects are likely involved in that abuse of court processes?
> 3. In what forums will that abuse occur?

[55] The Order should be a proportional response to the conduct proved on the application. Where the vexatious litigant focussed their litigation efforts on an identified group, it may not be justifiable to regulate that litigant's access to Courts to pursue claims against others: O.(R.) at para 39 - 40.

b. Mr. Chisan's constitutional objections

[56] As stated above, Mr. Chisan suggests the Court take into account his freedom of speech interests in deciding whether to make an order.

[57] No authority was cited to the Court that the act of filing a statement of claim is a form of speech that is protected under the Charter. Whether or not filing a statement of claim is protected speech, there is no doubt access to a Canadian superior court is protected: Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 59, at para 18 to 43.

[58] However, the Court is satisfied that whatever the source of the right to file or bring legal proceedings, the right does not extend to vexatious or abusive litigation.

[59] In Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia, McLachlin CJC speaking for the majority stated:

> 47 Of course, hearing fees that prevent litigants from bringing frivolous or vexatious claims do not offend the Constitution. There is no constitutional right to bring frivolous or vexatious cases, and measures that deter such cases may actually increase efficiency and overall access to justice.

[60] A vexatious litigants order is a reasonable screening procedure:

> 8 The applicant argues that the vexatious litigant order denies her the basic right of a Canadian citizen to commence a legal action. That is not the true effect of the order. The applicant can still commence any legitimate action; she is only subject to a screening procedure to make sure that any action she proposes is properly founded in fact and law, and will be diligently prosecuted. The vexatious litigant order does not substantially prejudice the applicant.
> Wong, at para 8.

[61] Given the Court's focus, in deciding whether to make a vexatious litigant order, on the nature of the litigant and the need to protect from anticipated abuse of court process, the control of frivolous, vexatious, and abusive litigation is a valid exercise of legislative and court authority: Hok, at para 37 of 2016 ABQB 651.

c. Form of order

[62] In KE v CSM, 2016 ABQB 342 at para 36 the Court provided recommendations for court orders to assist persons who are typically self-represented litigants to make informative and focussed applications for permission to commence an action, for example:

1. The legislation that authorizes the restriction to access court processes.
2. A description of what activity has been restricted, for example, whether the vexatious litigant has been restricted from filing any application, or instead certain kinds of applications.
3. What preliminary requirements or preconditions may be necessary prior to a leave application.
4. The documents and information that are required for a proper leave application to obtain permission to file and application.
5. To what judge or judges the application should be directed.
6. In what forum the application will be heard, typically in open court and on the record or thorough paper appreciation.
7. That notice of the leave application to other parties is required, and to any other persons as the court directs.

[63] The reported cases show differing approaches to whether an unsuccessful applicant for permission to sue may apply more than once. Some orders provide that an application for permission shall not be made again before another judge unless the applicant discloses in writing to the second judge that the application has previously been dismissed (for example, Wong v. Giannacopoulos, 2011 ABCA 206 at para 11; Chutskoff at para 135). Others provide that an application for permission which is dismissed shall not be made again (Re Boisjoli, 2015 ABQB 629 at para 110; Hok, at para 51 of 2016 ABQB 651).

[64] A permission application engages the same values of finality and prudent use of court resources as any other application. An applicant should be obliged to diligently assemble his or her evidence and arguments on the first application, and should not be permitted or encouraged to make multiple applications if new evidence or theories of the claim are later developed. However, sometimes legitimate claims must be commenced out of concern for an expiring limitation period or other good reason where not all the evidence is yet discovered and could not be discovered using due diligence.

[65] The Court is reluctant to permanently prohibit what may be a meritorious action only because the applicant may have applied prematurely and been refused leave for that reason. A vexatious litigant order should provide some ground rules about what the applicant must establish if there has been a previous dismissal, to balance a litigant's interest where not all evidence may be available at the outset of litigation and the public interest in ensuring that if a subsequent application is brought it is only because there is material, fresh information that could not have previously been discovered by a claimant who investigated his or her claim in a diligent fashion.

IV. Mr. Chisan's litigation history

[66] As noted, it is necessary to review the entire history of the matter to ascertain whether there is a principled basis on which to make a Section 23.1 order. The facts determined by the Court are set out below.

a. The background - the prosecution alleging an offence under the Planning Act

[67] In 1991, Mr. Chisan and Susannah Chisan were charged that:

> "On or about the 6th day of November A.D. 1991, aforesaid, did unlawfully contravene [amended during trial on September 16, 1992 to "did commit an offence under"] Section 154 (a.1) of the Planning Act R.S.A. 1980 C., P-9, by contravening Section 16(1)(b) of the City of Calgary Land Use Bylaw, Number 2P80, as amended, in that the aforesaid did make use of land in a manner contrary to the provisions of this bylaw, to wit: to have more than the allowable number of dwelling units in the building at 2214/2216 42 St. S.E., Calgary."
> [Information on Behalf of her Majesty the Queen, sworn November 22, 1991, Provincial Court docket no. 11593753P1]

[68] The basis of the prosecution was that the building configuration was an illegal fourplex under zoning or land use provisions that permitted a maximum of 2 dwelling units in a semi-detached building. The City law department had conduct of the prosecution.

b. Certiorari Application

[69] Mr. Chisan made a certiorari application in respect of the prosecution described in para 67 by motion filed by Mr. Chisan (and Susannah Chisan, against whom the charge was later withdrawn) on August 27, 1992, returnable November 30, 1992.

[70] This application included an autrefois acquit plea, alleging that a previous dismissal of another prosecution was a bar to any subsequent proceedings in the same cause. The previous dismissal relied on was an order of Egbert J on November 25, 1991 dismissing a charge of contravening a development officer's order in relation to the same property.

[71] The application further stated that if there was not sufficient evidence in respect of the same cause to demonstrate the autrefois acquit argument, then the Provincial Court declined jurisdiction to permit the applicants to call evidence or there was a breach section 7 of the Charter because the Provincial Court allegedly declined the applicants the right to call evidence before trial about the dismissal, the date of the unlawful development and exemptions under the Planning Act.

[72] The motion also claimed:

> "If the Provincial Court is not willing to respect the presumption of innocence, the Applicants seek the opportunity to prove exemption to the law, if the law is applicable."

[73] The motion was addressed to the Crown and 8 judges of the Provincial Court.

[74] The Crown (as noted, the City law department had carriage of the proceeding) applied to this Court, by motion filed September 8, 1992 in the Certiorari Application, to quash that proceeding so that the trial could proceed in Provincial Court as scheduled for September 16, 1992. This motion was returnable September 14, 1992.

[75] Mr. Chisan filed a motion in the Certiorari Proceeding on September 14, 1992 returnable September 14, 1992 for a remedy under section 24(1) of the Charter. The precise remedy sought is not specified. This motion quotes directly from the Crown's motion and re-asserts the autrefois acquit plea. It advances various objections including that the "Respondent" (clearly a reference to counsel from the City law department) knew the special plea was disposed of without evidence and that this lawyer "failed in his duty to be fair and as an officer of the Court" in failing to advise another judge that the plea of autrefois acquit does not require there to have been a trial on the merits. The motion also accuses that counsel of knowingly making a false statement in a submission in response to Mr. Chisan's position that the Provincial Court had lost jurisdiction, and of "deliberately and wilfully choosing to ignore the law". It says that the Crown's application was "purely vexatious and malicious". This motion concludes with the following ground:

> The Respondent knows that, notwithstanding his personal motives or views, the decision of the Court of Appeal is binding until and unless varied by the S.C.C."

[76] Waite J heard the Crown's motion on September 14 1992, and heard submissions from Mr. Chisan. Waite J ordered that the scheduled trial of the matter in Provincial Court proceed, and vacated the Certiorari Application and struck it from the November 30, 1992 Chambers list.

[77] Mr. Chisan's appeal from the decision of Waite J was dismissed by the Alberta Court of Appeal on January 14, 1994. The court found that the previous charge of contravening the development officer's order was factually and legally distinct from the charge of making use of the land contrary to the land use bylaw.

[78] A motion by Mr. Chisan for leave to appeal from that decision was dismissed by the Supreme Court of Canada on June 9, 1994.

c. 1992 Trial and appeal therefrom

[79] Mr. Chisan did not appear on September 16, 1992 for the trial of the charge described in para 60. The Trial Judge, Stevenson PCJ, was informed that Mr. Chisan had appealed Waite J's decision to the Alberta Court of Appeal. Stevenson PCJ decided to proceed ex parte in the absence of the accused, following the Crown's submission that the accused was well aware of his trial date. The charge was withdrawn against Susannah Chisan on the same appearance.

[80] Mr. Chisan was convicted of the offence on September 16, 1992. He was fined $2500. The Court ordered him to make the property comply with the land use bylaw by December 31, 1992 by converting it into a single family dwelling or a duplex.

[81] Mr. Chisan appealed the summary conviction on October 16, 1992 to this Court. This appeal included his theory that the property was built before Bylaw 2P80 came into force and the existing use was grandfathered. Various Charter and other breaches were claimed arising from what Mr. Chisan characterized as an "ex parte trial", and Mr. Chisan asserted that the court lost jurisdiction, proceedings were barred by statutory time limitations, Mr. Chisan was denied the right to be informed of the specific offence, and, the offence was unknown to law. The notice of appeal concludes with the following ground:

> 11. The ex parte sentence of the maximum penalty ($2500) permitted under the planning act is contrary to s2 of the said statute and sanitizes the wanton conduct of the City of Calgary: The injunctive like order disposses [sic] the Appellant of his property".

[82] Mr. Chisan applied to this Court to stay the fine and the compliance order pending determination of his appeal. That application was dismissed by Montgomery J on December 18, 1992. The requested stay of the fine was dismissed because "Mr. Chisan has delayed these proceedings without cause over a lengthy period of time in the earlier part of this year and continues to delay …." The request for a stay of the compliance order was dismissed because the Court had no jurisdiction to stay it.

[83] Mr. Chisan's appeal from the conviction and sentence was dismissed on June 21, 1993 by Dixon J. His Lordship ordered compliance with Judge Stevenson's compliance order by August 31, 1993.

[84] Dixon J observed:

> "Mr. Chisan elected to adopt what I describe as a "cute" or "fancy" posture as regards this proceeding in general, including his refusal to plead to the charge or to accommodate the setting of trial dates …"

[85] Mr. Chisan attempted to appeal Dixon J's decision to the Alberta Court of Appeal on July 22, 1993. This notice again propounded the theory that the property was effectively grandfatherd from Bylaw 2P80. Various Charter grounds were raised, and the grounds of the notice of appeal concluded with a request:

> … I ask the Court of Appeal to answer one simple question:
> What have I done that is prohibited by law?"
> [bold face in original]

[86] A single judge of the Alberta Court of Appeal refused leave to appeal from the decision of Dixon J, concluding the judgment did not involve a question of law of sufficient importance to justify a further appeal. Mr. Chisan appealed the refusal of leave to appeal. A three judge panel held on June 28, 1994 that the Court did not have jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from the refusal of leave to appeal.

d. First 1997 Action

[87] On July 3, 1997, Mr. Chisan and 4 other individuals sued, in this Court, the City of Calgary and an individual alleged to be a coordinator in the City finance department. This action claimed damages, and various injunctions and disclosure orders. The complaint concerned the alleged insufficiency of a local improvement petition and negligence in relation thereto. The suit also advanced claims based on alleged City refusals to provide information, and includes the following particular of negligence:

> "11. by asserting by conduct that he determines matters and that both the Municipal Government Act and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms are intrusive nuisances administratively, and that the taxpayer is irrelevant, except to the paying of taxes."

[88] The Plaintiffs were represented by counsel in that action.

[89] That action was discontinued (without costs, on the City's consent) on August 1, 1997. The Defendants' materials include a release purporting to be executed by the Plaintiffs and reciting that the City paid $2000 to the Plaintiffs in return for a release of this claim.

e. Second 1997 Action

[90] On November 19, 1997 Mr. Chisan and various tenants in properties alleged to be owned or managed by Chisan (some of whom were not named other than as Tenant A and Tenant B) launched another suit in this Court against the Province, the City, a natural gas utility, the VP Operations of the gas utility, several safety codes officers and employees of the City, the Calgary Police Commission, the Chief of Police, and a police officer. The claim alleges inter alia

(a) Unlawful entry by safety codes officers into a property in Calgary that I will refer to as "2006/2008";

(b) Certain safety code officers who entered 2006/2008 wilfully and deceptively misrepresented their powers, or in the alternative if they honestly believed their representations, they were "constitutionally illiterate, resulting in unconstitutional actions";

(c) The gas utility terminated gas service to 2006/2008. The Statement of Claim does not allege facts for concluding the service termination was unlawful. The claim includes an incomprehensible plea about the VP Operations of the gas utility to the effect that the company executed the wishes of the safety codes officer and "The defendant Stevens confirms this action on the basis of a close relationship with Safety Codes Officers."

(d) The police officer unlawfully arrested a tenant of 2006/2008;

(e) Safety codes officers unlawfully entered 2216;

(f) The City and employees seized property at 16 Varsity Estates Court under an unlawful clean up order;

(g) Safety codes officers unlawfully entered 2214, and city employees improperly made a clean-up order either by wilfully refusing to consider the Municipal Government Act or being unable to comprehend the words of the Municipal Government Act, resulting in unconstitutional actions.

(h) The Police Commission and the Chief of Police were both vicariously liable for the actions of all police officers in the city;

(i) The City, supported by the Province, effected a "personally motivated snitch program" whereby officers engage resources of the state to address a civil dispute for the benefit of a complainant or to satisfy the vindictive desire of one citizen to the detriment of another citizen, all of which conflicts with peace, order and good government.

[91] The Plaintiffs were represented by the same counsel as in the First 1997 Action.

[92] Master Laycock of this Court summarily dismissed the Second 1997 Action against Her Majesty on May 26, 2005 for want of prosecution.

[93] On March 27, 2006, Master Waller of this Court summarily dismissed the Second 1997 Action against the Police Commission, Chief of Police, and the gas utility and its VP Operations, for want of prosecution.

[94] On October 23, 2002, in the Contempt Proceeding, Phillips J prohibited Mr. Chisan from taking any steps in the Second 1997 Action against the City and its employees without leave of the Court until certain conditions occurred. There is nothing to indicate Mr. Chisan ever complied with the conditions or attempted to obtain leave. A procedure record print from the Court Clerk's office provided by the Defendants (the Court obtained a copy from the Clerk's office to verify its authenticity) indicates that motions were brought for summary dismissal, leading to the Orders of May 26, 2005 and March 27, 2006, but otherwise there has been no activity in the Court on this action since 1999.

f. Contempt Proceeding

[95] By motion filed February 17, 1993 the City applied for an order declaring Mr. Chisan in contempt of court for failing to comply with the compliance order of Stevenson PCJ.

[96] On June 3, 1999 Rooke J (now ACJ) ordered that Chisan appear and show cause why he should not be held in contempt. This generated a dispute whether the Contempt Proceeding was in good standing or should be dismissed under the 5 year drop dead rule. The Defendants' materials indicate Mr. Chisan intended to appeal Rooke J's Order, then later applied to set the Order aside. Lutz J struck the proceeding out on June 22, 1999, but the Court of Appeal allowed the City's appeal and restored the contempt application. The Contempt Proceeding went into case management in 2000.

[97] The Contempt Proceeding came to trial before Phillips J. The trial lasted 5 days, and she gave judgment on March 1, 2002.

[98] Phillips J found Mr. Chisan guilty of contempt for breach of the order of Stevenson PCJ. Phillips J stated it is revealing and worthy of note that in the application before Wilkins J on March 6, 2000 (in the Inspection Application) Mr. Chisan through counsel advised that he did not admit the fourplex at 2214/2216 was "illegal under whatever the law happens to be", and continued:

> "Essentially, Mr. Chisan is still to this day attacking the underpinnings or correctness of Judge Stevenson's conclusive and binding order, which he has failed to challenge successfully."

[99] Mr. Chisan also alleged breach of his Charter rights in the Contempt Proceeding, including that his security of the person was violated by oppressive actions by the City. Phillips J dismissed these complaints, and noted that there was "no evidence" the City acted in a manner oppressive toward him and any problems he faced were caused by his own actions.

[100] Mr. Chisan appealed the contempt finding to the Alberta Court of Appeal on March 27, 2002.

[101] On April 19, 2002 Phillips J ordered Mr. Chisan to remove the basement suites in 2214/2216, stayed the Second 1997 Action as against the City and its employees pending compliance with Stevenson PCJ's order, and fined Mr. Chisan $25,000 and in default of payment sentenced him to imprisonment for 90 days. Her Order detailed the work to be completed by Mr. Chisan and ordered completion by September 30, 2002. A further hearing was set in the Order for October 23, 2002 to determine whether the work was completed and the fine paid.

[102] In assessing the fine Phillips J accepted that Mr. Chisan perverted the court process, made a game out of the proceedings, and prolonged his contempt of the order through his abuse of the proceedings. She found that Mr. Chisan's contempt was part of an ongoing pattern of conduct over 10 years; and rather than purge his contempt, provided the court with novel, cute and fancy arguments, none of which the Court accepted. He displayed "defiance in the extreme". Phillips J noted there were unpaid costs awards dating back to 1993.

[103] Following a further hearing on October 23, 2002, Phillips J found that Mr. Chisan had not purged his contempt, showed no remorse for his contempt, did not complete the work he was required to do under the April 19, 2002 order, and never intended to purge his contempt. Phillips J authorized the City to enter and do the work, at Mr. Chisan's expense, and imprisoned him for 6 months.

[104] Mr. Chisan appealed the contempt finding and sanction of Phillips J. He obtained judicial interim release from jail on December 19, 2002 from O'Leary JA.

[105] On January 31, 2003 a panel of the Alberta Court of Appeal established various deadlines for the appeal. Some of these were extended, on Mr. Chisan's application, by Paperny JA on March 13, 2003. Her Order provided that if Mr. Chisan did not file the appeal book within 7 days, the appeal is dismissed. Mr. Chisan did not comply with the deadlines so the appeal stood dismissed and a warrant of committal was issued.

g. Inspection Application

[106] On November 17, 1999 the City commenced an originating notice proceeding for orders permitting the City to inspect 2214/2216, as Mr. Chisan allegedly refused city inspectors the entry to which they are entitled under the Municipal Government Act.

[107] Mr. Chisan opposed the motion, asserting inter alia the "refusal of the City of Calgary to produce any authority for its requested action or authorizing its alleged designated officer, notwithstanding that such authority has been requested several times".

[108] On March 6, 2000 Wilkins J ordered Mr. Chisan to permit City representatives to enter and inspect 2214/2216.

[109] Mr. Chisan appealed Wilkins J's order to the Alberta Court of Appeal on March 10, 2000.

[110] Mr. Chisan applied in his appeal (as well as in the City's appeal no. 99-18247 from the decision of Lutz J) by motion and memorandum filed July 25, 2000 for an order that the City's lawyer provide him with the "resolution wherein the R-2 designation was affixed" to 2214/2216 and "the law of that date, common or statutory, which forbad the use of 4 suites".

[112] Mr. Chisan applied in his appeal (as well as in the City's appeal no. 99-18247 from the decision of Lutz J) by motion and memorandum filed October 26, 2000 for a stay or adjournment of the appeals "until a lawyer purportedly acting for The City of Calgary demonstrates standing to be heard". The grounds included that the City refused to provide resolutions of City Council authorizing the actions appealed from. This was addressed to counsel representing the City on the appeal, described by Mr. Chisan as "Purported Counsel for the City of Calgary". An affidavit in support from Mr. Chisan said the resolution sought may have shown grounds why his property was selected among 300,000 other properties and for what purpose. His affidavit indicates that the appeals were scheduled to be heard on November 10, 2000.

[113] That application was dismissed by Hunt JA on October 31, 2000. Mr. Chisan was ordered to pay costs in any event of the cause.

[114] On November 10, 2000 the Court of Appeal dismissed Mr. Chisan's appeal, stating the grounds of appeal were without merit. Following discussion, the Court directed the matter go back to the Chambers Judge for further directions regarding particulars of the inspection.

[115] Following the appeal the City issued a motion to vary the Order of Wilkins J as it relates to time and manner of entry to Mr. Chisan's property. The motion is dated 17 November 2000. The filing and service date(s) are unknown.

[116] Mr. Chisan cross-applied by motion filed November 24, 2000 to Wilkins J to vary the Order, stating he may rely on the Charter and the Alberta Bill of Rights, and on the transcript of the original proceedings before Wilkins J "wherein reliance on the Charter respecting government conduct was denied" by Wilkins J.

[117] The records provided by the Defendants do not contain any further proceedings in the Inspection Application. It is reasonable to infer, as the appeal was dismissed, that further directions were made to implement the inspection.

h. 2002 Action

[118] On October 16, 2002 Mr. Chisan again sued the City over 2214/2216. This action again asserts the theory that Bylaw 2P80 did not apply to 2214/2216. Mr. Chisan sought a declaration that the buildings were essentially legal non-conforming properties.

[119] Mr. Chisan stated in an affidavit filed October 22, 2002 opposing the City's motion to strike the claim, "Foremost in my Statement of Claim is the non-conforming status of the subject building, and the right of non-compliance." And further:

> "Fourteen years of litigation, including the contempt action, is the direct result of the City's refusal to apply the test to determine the right of non-compliance and its refusal to disclose".

[120] This action was another attempt by Mr. Chisan to re-litigate the decisions of Stevenson PCJ that 2214/2216 was regulated by the land use bylaw and that by November 6, 1991 the fourplex configuration was illegal. Nothing was pled in the 2002 Action as a new occurrence over the ensuing 10 years that changed that result.

[121] There are other indications of abusive litigation conduct in Mr. Chisan's affidavit filed October 22, 2002:

(a) He deposed that at the outset of the contempt trial in the Contempt Proceeding he was prohibited from calling subpoenaed witnesses relative to the jurisdiction of Stevenson PCJ. As stated earlier in these reasons, Dixon J dismissed Mr. Chisan's appeal from that decision and the Alberta Court of Appeal refused leave to appeal. The issue of the validity of Stevenson PCJ's Order was authoritatively determined in 1994, but Mr. Chisan refused to accept it.

(b) He provided a second example of making groundless allegations about judges, saying:

> "I have very serious concerns in that this matter should not be decided by Justice Phillips. People like to believe they are right even at the cost of defeating the pursuit of innocence".
> As mentioned above, his Certiorari Application expressed concerns that the Provincial Court would not respect the presumption of innocence.

[122] Phillips J ordered on October 23, 2002 that the proceedings in the 2002 Action were stayed until the later of Mr. Chisan having completed his sentence of incarceration and the City having completed the work authorized by the October 23, 2002 order. The Order provided that before taking further steps in the action, Mr. Chisan must attend before a judge to confirm the stay has been lifted.

[123] There is nothing in the records provided by the Defendants to indicate the stay was lifted. According to a procedure record obtained by the Court from the Court Clerk's Office, there have not been any steps in the 2002 Action for over 10 years.

i. 2007 Injunction Application

[124] At some time prior to late 2007, Mr. Chisan conveyed his interest in 2214/2216 to Susannah Chisan. On December 28, 2007 the City applied in this Court against for an injunction to force her to comply with the land use bylaw concerning 2214/2216.

[125] Mr. Chisan provided an affidavit sworn April 15, 2008 in the injunction proceeding.

[126] In his affidavit Mr. Chisan said he had previously been a part owner of 2214/2216. He re-argued his position that the building use is not precluded by land use bylaws, even quoting some of the prosecutor's submissions verbatim from the transcript of the 1992 Trial before Stevenson PCJ and seeking to refute them; complained about alleged lack of disclosure by the prosecution in respect of the 1992 charge; asserted the courts have not ever addressed the non-conforming status of the property; alleged the City chose to ignore prior decisions of the Court of Appeal about land use; accused a City trainer of fraud; accused the City of making false claims on its website about the jurisdiction of the Subdivision Appeal Board; expressed beliefs as to whether certain conduct of the City was intentional and motivated in certain ways; and accused counsel for the City of making a "carefully fabricated fiction" by asserting the facilities had been rebuilt.

[127] He said he swore the affidavit "in support of any fair process that seeks to discover the truth as to whether or not the subject property is a statutory non-confirming building, so that the evidence may be transferred to the [Subdivision Appeal Board], the only tribunal that has jurisdiction, as determined by Justice Chrumka and as confirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada in the R v. Al Klippert case".

[128] As stated in Part II, the Court has not considered the reasons of Erb J on the injunction application because Mr. Chisan has not been shown to be a party or privy to the application.

[129] The Court therefore has nothing before it to indicate whether the facilities had been rebuilt as challenged by Mr. Chisan in his affidavit. The statement in his affidavit about fabrication of that matter by counsel acting for the City is nevertheless concerning from the perspective of assessing his conduct in litigation. The affidavit did not provide any detail or admissions as to the physical facilities in the building, nor any facts that would show the City's assertion is incorrect:

(a) It is an obvious example of an evasive argument that seeks to avoid providing any admissions that might be used against the respondent in the injunction application.

(b) It is a bare assertion unsupported by any recitation of the actual facts, calculated not only to challenge the underlying facts but also to attempt to impugn the personal conduct of lawyers acting for the City.

j. 2013 Action

[130] On December 24, 2013 Mr. Chisan sued various Councillors and employees of the City in this Court.

[131] The Plaintiff was named as follows:

JAMES B. CHISAN: AKA "SMALLIFY" LOCAL GOVERNMENT, AND JOHN DOE II

[132] The Statement of Claim:

(a) alleged Mr. Chisan is a property owner and taxpayer in the City. The Plaintiff "John Doe II" represents "other taxpayers who were overtaxed";

(b) alleged Calgary property owners were over taxed by $52 million or more. The Plaintiff sought an order that "requires pay back" of the alleged $52 million of over-taxation in 2013 with the cost to be borne by the Councillors who voted in favor of Bylaw 11M2013.

(c) complained about various enforcement proceedings by the City, including a complaint about invoices for the cost to remove items from various properties including 2214/2216.

(d) advanced a damages claim for the City's alleged trespass onto 2214/2216 and boarding it up. That plea again raised the land use issue:

"This is the same property wherein members of the law department had falsely claimed R-2 designation".

(This allegation demonstrates Mr. Chisan's propensity to assert irrelevant impropriety against counsel representing the City.)

(e) asserted various claims for wrongdoing of many types against several un-named individuals associated with the City.

(f) included claims against un-named lawyers in the City law department who provided advice to the corporate security department or gave instructions to a third party security company.

(g) demanded:

i. payback of 2013 property tax of $52 million;

ii. with respect to a notice issued by the City to Mr. Chisan, various disclosures by the City, including various information and resolutions, and damages from the City.

[133] On January 23 2014 Hunt-MacDonald J struck the claim of John Doe II, various allegations in the 2013 Action seeking disclosure on various issues, and many of the allegations against the City law department. She also struck the action against several defendants.

[134] The rest of the 2013 Action was summarily dismissed by Jeffrey J on January 27, 2015 on the application of the remaining defendants for summary judgment.

[135] In the proceedings before Jeffrey J, Mr. Chisan challenged the authority of a member of the City law department to represent the remaining defendants. Jeffrey J rejected that challenge, stating the "ostensible authority alone from a member of the bar is sufficient for my purposes."

[136] The transcript of proceedings before Jeffrey J records that Mr. Chisan is aware of the protections of section 535 of the Municipal Government Act that councillors and municipal officers and employees are not liable for loss or damage caused by acts or omissions done or omitted to be done in good faith in the performance or intended performance of their duties. In the January 2015 application, Mr. Chisan saw the onus on the City to prove good faith of its representatives in a claim against them. Jeffrey J stated, in dismissing the remainder of the 2013 Action:

> "… There is no onus shift to them, and, in any event, the law, the Municipal Government Act, works on the basis that employees of a municipality are entitled to liability protection and the Court of Appeal has said there needs to be some pleading and more than just a … bare allegation of bad faith..."

k. 2016 Action

[137] Notwithstanding the ruling by Jeffrey J, Mr. Chisan's 2016 Action (described at paras 4 - 12 above) again asserted allegations against City personnel without the necessary pleas of bad faith supported by particulars.

[138] The 2016 Action also includes a claim against the City lawyer who successfully represented the defendants in the 2013 Action for allegedly falsely representing that he was instructed by all the defendants in that action.

[139] Master Farrington of this Court struck the 2016 Action on June 10, 2016.

[140] Mr. Chisan appealed that decision. His appeal came on before Campbell J in ordinary chambers on August 19, 2016.

[141] Campbell J accepted the Defendants' position that Mr. Chisan's appeal must be adjourned to the special chambers list. The Defendants' counsel indicated the earliest dates were in September 2017. Mr. Chisan refused to provide dates in 2017, noting he just received the materials. Mr. Chisan asked that his application be set over for 2 weeks. Campbell J disagreed. Mr. Chisan again refused to provide dates in 2017 so his appeal was struck.

[142] During this hearing, a representative of a civil enforcement agency instructed by the City was present. He stated he had with him a bank draft in the approximate amount of $446,000 together with an accounting of the proceeds from the sale of Mr. Chisan's property that had been sold in execution proceedings instructed by the City. He said he wanted to give the money and the accounting to Mr. Chisan. The Court asked Mr. Chisan whether he wanted to take the money or have it paid into court. The following exchange occurred:

> THE COURT: …So, Mr. Chisan, they want to give you $445,000. So, you can either take it from them now – it's a cheque payable to you – if you don't want to take it from them for whatever reason then I'm going to order that the money be paid into court and then you can apply to the clerk of the court to get the money if you don't want to accept the cheque from him directly. It's your choice. So, would you like to take the money from him directly or would you like me to order the money paid into court to your credit and then you can take steps to get that money from the clerk of the court should you wish? It's your money.
> MR. CHISAN: My Lady, you didn't want to hear from me a few minutes ago, so why should I speak now?
>
> THE COURT: Well, you don't have to.
> MR. CHISAN: Whatever you decide. You decide whatever you feel like. It doesn't matter what I say."

[143] Campbell J directed payment of the civil enforcement funds into court and declared them to be Mr. Chisan's property.

[144] Mr. Chisan appealed Campbell J's Order to the Alberta Court of Appeal by notice of appeal filed September 30, 2016. The grounds of appeal are:

1. Arrest and detention not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.
2. No jurisdiction to ignore s. 8, Constitution Act, 1982.
3. No jurisdiction to decide on a record of no evidence.
4. No jurisdiction to ignore application for adjournment.
5. Who does Colleen Sinclair represent?

[145] Colleen Sinclair was the lawyer from the City of Calgary law department who appeared for the Defendants on August 19, 2016.

[146] The relief sought in the appeal is:

> "An Order that requires non-partisan disclosure by City Manager, Jeff Fielding respecting the seizure of my land."

[147] The appeal to the Alberta Court of Appeal was struck because no appeal record was filed on time.

[148] In the present application, Mr. Chisan again challenged the authority of a City of Calgary law department lawyer (again, Colleen Sinclair) to act. He also said he did not want to speak about the merits of the application lest his statements be used against him. He also said if he was seriously going to oppose, he should make a written submission on the matter of 2214/2216 and raise the old zoning and disclosure issues. The Court was not prepared to adjourn, as Mr. Chisan was required to file his written submission well in advance of the application.

V. Assessment of Mr. Chisan's litigation history

[149] Mr. Chisan has persistently instituted vexatious proceedings and has persistently engaged in vexatious behaviours in litigation. He probably will continue to commence groundless and hopeless proceedings against the City or its representatives, or third parties that are somehow drawn into Mr. Chisan's disputes with the City or its representatives. He probably will behave in vexatious ways in those proceedings, including making groundless appeals, failing to prosecute matters, and making groundless allegations about the authority or conduct of lawyers acting for parties he sues. The considerations leading me to these conclusions are set forth below.

[150] In assessing Mr. Chisan's litigation history, it is useful to be mindful of the basic substantive and procedural rules concerning the liability of statutory authorities, their representatives, and corporate officers.

[151] Litigation against a statutory authority or its representatives engages underlying legal principles that are vastly different than litigation with a private person. These types of defendants have defences where they purported to act under statutory authority. The Municipal Government Act confers wide powers on a municipality or its officers to conduct inspections and remedy contraventions: Municipal Government Act, sections 542, 544, 545, 546, 549, 550, 551, and 555. Appeals are provided from some types of municipal orders: Municipal Government Act, sections 547, 548. The municipality is liable only in limited circumstances: sections 527.2, 529. Section 535 protects City Councillors, officers and employees who act in good faith in the course of their duties: Municipal Government Act, section 535.

[152] Similar considerations apply in the case of the execution of duties by officers of commercial corporations. For example, an officer of a corporation is not guilty of inducing breach of a contract by that corporation or conspiring with that corporation without specific allegations sufficient to establish actions that are themselves tortious or exhibit a separate identity or interest from that of the corporation so as to make the act or conduct complained of their own. See, for example, Bower v Evans, 2016 ABQB 717; Kent v Postmedia Network Inc., 2015 ABQB 461 at para 60 - 65; Hogarth v Rocky Mountain Slate Inc, 2013 ABCA 57; Blacklaws v Morrow, 2000 ABCA 175 at para 41; Criak v. Aetna Life Insurance Company of Canada, [1995] OJ No 3286 (Gen Div), aff'd [1996] OJ No 2377 (CA). Sufficient facts must be pled for such a claim to survive an application to strike: Micro-watt Control Devices Ltd. v. Krohne Inc., 2012 ABQB 53 at para 54 - 56.

[153] The Plaintiff has the burden to properly plead a case that, if the allegations were proved, would result in liability: Rule 13.6(2). The Plaintiff must allege facts capable of sustaining a determination that a duty was owed, that an act or omission occurred breaching that duty, and (where damages are a necessary element of the claim) that damages resulted. It is not sufficient to allege a legal conclusion alone. Tottrup v. Alberta (Minister of Environmental Protection), 2000 ABCA 121, 81 Alta.L.R. (3d) 27, 255 A.R. 204, at para. 11.

[154] Where it is necessary to establish bad faith, a bare allegation of bad faith without particulars is insufficient. Factual particulars must be provided where bad faith is alleged: Rule 13.6(3): Walton International Group Inc. v. Rocky View Municipal District, 2007 ABCA 21, at para 12; Grenon v Canada Revenue Agency, 2016 ABQB 260 at para 23 - 28, 32; Irwin v Buote, 2016 ABQB 530 at para 41 - 47.

[155] Mr. Chisan's litigation history demonstrates a disregard for those basic concepts in litigation, as well as these concepts: finality of judicial decisions and the rules against collateral attacks and re-litigating settled issues; and, the rules against bringing groundless litigation.

[156] Many manifestations of Mr. Chisan's vexatious litigation and vexatious or abusive tactics in litigation since the early 1990's have been proved by the Defendants in the application. These propensities manifest themselves in pleadings, motions and appeals:

(a) attempting to re-litigate previously decided issues: his refusal to accept the decision of the Courts that the land use of the fourplex at 2214/2216 is unlawful:

   a. his attempt in the Contempt Proceeding to call witnesses to attack the jurisdiction of the trial judge in the 1992 Trial, years after his appeal from that trail decision was dismissed,

   b. his position in the 1993 Contempt Proceeding refusing to accept the fourplex was unlawful and the basement suites must be removed, and his refusal to abide by court orders made by Stevenson PCJ, Dixon J and Phillips J to remove them,

c. the Second 1997 Action,

d. the 2002 Action;

e. his attempt to seek disclosure of the basis for the City's land use bylaws in the appeal from Wilson J's Order in the Inspection Application,

(b) pleading bare allegations or legal conclusions in Statements of Claim without sufficient underlying facts:

a. his claim against the gas utility and its VP Operations in the Second 1997 Action,

b. his claims against City representatives in the Second 1997 Action,

c. his claims against City representatives in the 2013 Action, and

d. his claims against the City and City representatives in the 2016 Action;

(c) making bare allegations of dishonesty against lawyers with the City law department or allegations that City lawyers must prove their authority in specific proceedings:

a. his motion filed September 14, 1992 in the Certiorari Application (allegations of dishonest or dishonourable conduct by City lawyer conducting prosecution),

b. his appeal from the Order of Wilson J in the Inspection Application (applied to stay appeal until provided proof of authority of counsel to appear for City),

c. his affidavit in the 2007 Injunction Application (alleged fabrication by City lawyer),

d. the 2013 Action (required proof of authority of counsel to appear for defendants), and

e. the 2016 Action (required proof of authority of counsel to appear for Defendants at the application before Campbell J, repeated same in the Notice of Appeal therefrom and in the present application);

(d) casting groundless aspersions on judges:

a. his suggestion in the Certiorari Proceeding that judges of the Provincial Court would not respect the presumption of innocence, and

b. his expression of concerns over the impartiality of Phillips J in his October 22, 2002 affidavit;

(e) taking frequent and unsuccessful appeals:

1. his unsuccessful appeal from the decision of Power J in 1992 (dismissed after hearing),

2. his unsuccessful appeal from the decision of Stevenson PCJ in the 1992 Trial to Queen's Bench (dismissed after hearing),

3. his unsuccessful appeal from the decision of Waite J striking his certiorari application (dismissed after hearing),

4. his unsuccessful application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from the decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal dismissing the appeal from Waite J (dismissed),

5. his unsuccessful attempt to appeal from the decision of Dixon J to the Alberta Court of Appeal (leave refused),

6. his unsuccessful attempt to appeal to the Alberta Court of Appeal from the aforementioned decision refusing leave to appeal (refused for lack of jurisdiction),
7. his unsuccessful appeal from the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench to the Alberta Court of Appeal in his litigation with 478370 Alberta Inc. (dismissed after hearing),
8. his unsuccessful application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada in his litigation with 478370 Alberta Inc. (dismissed),
9. his unsuccessful appeal from Wilson J in the Inspection Application (dismissed after argument),
10. his unsuccessful appeal from Phillips J in the Contempt Proceeding (dismissed for failure to meet court ordered deadlines),
11. his unsuccessful appeal from Master Farrington's decision to strike the 2016 Action (struck because he refused to provide his availability for the appeal), and
12. his unsuccessful appeal from Campbell J's decision to the Alberta Court of Appeal (struck for late filing of appeal book);

(f) failing to prosecute litigation:

a. the Second 1997 Action, which was struck against some defendants and remains stayed against others,
b. the 2002 Action, which remains stayed,
c. the struck appeals mentioned above;

(g) launching groundless busybody litigation purporting to benefit others:

a. his claim by "JOHN DOE II" in the 2013 Action for damages of $25 million against Councillors who voted for a taxing bylaw. (The First 1997 Action may have been such a suit, but as the City appears to have paid a settlement to resolve the issue and no explanation of that was provided in the present application by the Defendants, the Court has disregarded it).

[157] The 2013 Action and the 2016 Action are recent examples of this persistent misconduct that show Mr. Chisan probably will continue his pattern of bringing vexatious litigation and using vexatious litigation tactics.

[158] The claims in these actions disregard the basic substantive law and procedural rules described above. Both actions were summarily struck out.

[159] In addition, the 2013 Action made baseless allegations of dishonesty in relation to the land use designation of 2214/2216. No one, having been through Mr. Chisan's litigation experience in the Contempt Proceeding and the Inspection Application could reasonably think that there was anything to argue over the land use of that property. Mr. Chisan was bound by the findings in the 1992 Trial, Contempt Proceeding and Inspection Application, all of which found that the fourplex was an illegal land use.

[160] Mr. Chisan's conduct in raising this again in the form of bare allegations of irrelevant falsehood against the City law department in the 2013 Action was egregious.

[161] His conduct in the 2016 Action again demonstrated persistent misuse of legal proceedings. He made the same types of allegations having the same fatal defects that the Court held could not be maintained in the 2013 Action. Worse, he advanced bare allegations of fraud against the City law department lawyer involved in the 2013 Action. He has continued to challenge the authority of lawyers appearing on the record in proceedings without articulating any basis for doing so. His pattern of persistent groundless appeals has also resurfaced in the 2016 Action.

[162] The Court is satisfied that based on his litigation history that it is likely that he will continue to bring frivolous or vexatious litigation against the City or its representatives.

[163] The Court finds on the basis of the foregoing that Mr. Chisan is a vexatious litigant.

[164] Mr. Chisan asks the Court to consider his section 2(b) Charter rights in the balance. The exercise of discretion may engage consideration of Charter rights like any other fundamental legal or civil right. Mr. Chisan has freedom of expression and the right to access courts like any other Canadian.

[165] As discussed in Part III (b), whatever rights of access or expression Mr. Chisan has do not extend to vexatious or abusive lawsuits. Mr. Chisan has many other avenues to express himself, and the requirement that he seek permission to sue does not preclude him from pursuing legitimate actions in the Courts.

[166] The Court has considered that the vast majority of the abusive behaviour by Mr. Chisan in litigation relates to claims against the City or its representatives. This behaviour has extended to others drawn into his disputes with the City, such as the gas utility and its VP Operations, and police. The Court must therefore be concerned not only for actions against the City and its representatives or agents, but also actions against others where there is a reasonable prospect that claims-over against the City and its representatives and agents will arise.

[167] There is evidence, in the decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal concerning Mr. Chisan's litigation with 478370 Alberta Inc., of a similar litigation pattern with other parties. However, there are no other proved instances of vexatious litigation with persons not related to the City since 1998. The Court is not satisfied that Mr. Chisan should be regulated at this time in any disputes he may have with unrelated litigants. Any order the Court makes can be varied to add others or increase its scope, should that later prove justified.

[168] In all the circumstances it is appropriate to make an order relating to claims against the City or its present or former representatives, or against anyone else relating to or arising in whole or in part from alleged acts or omissions on the part of the City or those representatives. There will be a provision permitting the restriction to be expanded if subsequent actions show that to be necessary.

VI. Order

[169] James Brian Chisan is declared to be a vexatious litigant, on the following conditions.

(a) James Brian Chisan is prohibited, under the Judicature Act, section 23.1, from commencing, or attempting to commence, or continuing any appeal, action, application or proceeding in the Alberta Court of Appeal, the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta or the Provincial Court of Alberta, on his own behalf or on behalf of any other person or entity:

   a. against the City of Calgary,

   b. against any current or former councillor, officer, employee, representative or agent of the City of Calgary, or

   c. against any person or entity not referred to in sub-para a. or b. above, in respect of any matter or allegation that relates to or arises from, in whole or in part, any alleged act, omission, or representation on the part of any person mentioned in sub-para a. or b. above, without an order of a judge of the court in which the proceeding is conducted.

(b) An application for permission to commence a proceeding described in sub-para (a) must be in writing, and notice must be given

a. to the City of Calgary to the attention of the City of Calgary law department by serving the same, together with a true copy of all supporting affidavits or other materials, in accordance with the requirements of the Alberta Rules of Court for serving a commencement document,

b. to any other person directed by a justice or judge at any time (on application or on his or her own motion) by serving the same, together with a true copy of all supporting affidavits or other materials, in accordance with the requirements of the Alberta Rules of Court for serving a commencement document or such other manner prescribed by such judge,

c. the time for service shall be the time required for service of an originating application under the Alberta Rules of Court, subject to any expansion or abridgment granted by a judge or justice of the Court in which permission is sought.

(c) James Brian Chisan must describe himself in the application and any pleadings by his full name ("James Brian Chisan"), and not by using initials, a pseudonym, an alternative name structure, or any other name which he might have used or uses.

(d) An application to commence any appeal, action, application or proceeding must be accompanied by an affidavit:

a. attaching a copy of the order declaring Mr. Chisan to be a vexatious litigant,

b. attaching a copy of the appeal, pleading, application or process Mr. Chisan proposes to issue or file,

c. deposing fully and completely to the facts and circumstances surrounding the proposed claim or proceeding, so as to demonstrate that the proceeding is not an abuse of process, and that there are reasonable grounds for it,

d. indicating whether Mr. Chisan has ever sued some or all of the defendants or respondents previously in any jurisdiction or court, and if so providing full particulars,

e. indicating whether Mr. Chisan has previously applied for permission under this Order in respect of the same claim or matter, and if so the affidavit must include:

i. a certified copy of any order refusing permission or otherwise disposing of or adjourning the application,

ii. a certified copy of the transcript of the hearing and disposition of any prior request for permission,

iii. a true copy of the materials relied on for the previous application,

iv. a statement of new evidence or facts on which the applicant relies for the application, the source of such information, the reasons why the information was not previously known, and the facts if any demonstrating that the applicant investigated his claim diligently and did not previously discover such information,

f. undertaking that, if leave is granted, the authorized appeal, pleading, application or process, the order granting leave to proceed, and the affidavit in support of the order will promptly be served on the defendants or respondents, and

g. undertaking to the Court to diligently prosecute the proceeding.

(e) The application shall be made in open court before a regularly assigned duty or chambers judge or justice (not in private chambers), and shall be recorded.

(f) Where an application for permission is dismissed, an application shall not be made again in relation to the same claim or matter unless (a) the fact an application was previously made is disclosed to the judge or justice hearing the application, and (b) the applicant provides relevant, credible and substantial information that could reasonably be expected to have affected the result, which was not before the judge or justice hearing the previous application and could not have been through due diligence provided in the previous application.

(g) Leave to commence proceedings may be given on conditions, including the posting of security for costs.

(h) This Order does not affect Mr. Chisan's right to apply to the Clerk of the Court pursuant to para 6 of the Order of Madam Justice Campbell made August 19, 2016 in action no. 1601-06249 in this Court, to obtain payment out of funds standing to his credit in that action.

(i) Nothing in this Order limits the authority of a Court to stay or dismiss a proceeding as an abuse of process or on any other ground.

(j) An application to vary this Order (including extending the scope of this order) or to set aside this Order must be made on notice to the Attorney General of Alberta, the City of Calgary, and any other person as directed by a justice of this Court.

[170] The Defendants' counsel are to prepare the formal order for my review. Subject to any request by the Defendants for an extension, they are to submit the draft to the Court for consideration within 14 days of the date of these reasons, and to mail a copy of their draft to Mr. Chisan by ordinary mail to any address for service that has been provided by him in the 2016 Action within the same period. Rule 9.4(2)(c) is invoked and approval of the draft by Mr. Chisan is not required.

[171] The parties are reminded that the above order is effective from pronouncement of these reasons, and notwithstanding any delay in entering the formal order.

Heard on the 24th day of February, 2017.

Dated at the City of Calgary, Alberta this 31st day of March, 2017.

Croll J.

Counsel:
J. Pinkovsky, for accused, applicant.
J. Lofft, for the Crown, respondent.
P. Stem, for The Queen in Right of Ontario and the Ontario Court of Justice, Co-respondent Record Keepers.

[1]CROLL J.: —On October 4, 2004, Mr. Li was charged with assault, assault with a weapon, attempt murder and two counts of forgery. His wife Fiona Sun is the complainant in the assault and attempt murder charges, and the forgery relates to an alleged false credit application presented to the TD Canada Trust.

[2]Mr. Li (the Applicant) has brought an 11(b) application in which he claims that the charges against him should be stayed on account of delay. As part of the 11(b) application, the Applicant seeks an order directing the Ontario Court of Justice at 111 Yonge Street, Toronto (College Park) to praecipe the contents of his file in its possession or control to the Trial Coordinator of the Superior Court in Toronto.

[3]In this case, two judicial pre-trials were held at College Park, one on August 5, 2005 and one on September 9, 2005. The file that has been provided by College Park contains the Information; Notice of Assignment Court; Trial Confirmation forms dated April 4, 2006 and April 7, 2006; Verification of Special Date(s) provided by the Trial Co-ordinator's Office; Recognizance of Bail; the Judicial Interim Release Order; Designation and Acknowledgment of Counsel of Record; Appendix A (Name, Address and Charges); and Statement-Section 536.3 of the Criminal Code. No pre-trial reports, forms or information about the pre-trials are in the court file. While the application is broadly framed, it is the notes of the judges who presided at the pre-trials that are the subject of the application. To this end, the Applicant served notice of the application on the Senior Administrative Judge at College Park, the Chief Justice of the Ontario Court of Justice and the Attorney General for Ontario.

[4]The position of the Ontario Court of Justice is that the notes of the pre-trial judges are privileged and in the ordinary course should not be provided to the Superior Court. The Crown Attorney charged with the prosecution of this matter has advised that she is also acting as counsel for the Attorney General (Ontario) for all purposes on this application. In this regard, the Crown Attorney as counsel for the Attorney General (Ontario) adopts the position taken by the Ontario Court of Justice. During submissions on the praecipe application, the Applicant brought a further application for removal of the Crown Attorney from acting as counsel to the Attorney General (Ontario) in his capacity as the administrative superintendent of the Ontario Court of Justice, on the basis of institutional and personal conflict of interest. However, for reasons delivered at that time, the conflict application was dismissed.

[5]Having heard all the submissions on the praecipe application, I have determined that the application will not be granted. These are my reasons for that ruling.

[6]The Applicant submits that the records from the two judicial pre-trials held at College Park will shed some light on what occurred in the Ontario Court of Justice and, in particular, why a second judicial pre-trial was needed, The Applicant suggests that one of the issues canvassed was in the nature of an offer to withdraw the attempt murder charge, and that this may have necessitated the need for a second judicial pre-trial. The Applicant's position is that the notes of the pre-trial judges should be conveyed to the Trial Coordinator of this court, given that attribution of fault and an examination of the conduct of the parties are important in an 11(b) application. The Applicant relies on the decision in R. v. McNeilly, [2005] O.J. No, 1297 (QL), 64 W.C.B. (2d) 635, in which Hill J. stated at para. 24: "The experience with s. 11(b)/24(1) Charter applications in Brampton has consistently demonstrated that there are documents in the Ontario Court of Justice court file of particular relevance to these applications."

[7]Similarly, in R. v. Cowell, [2004] O.J. No. 71 (QL), 60 W.C.B. (2d) 168, Durno R.S.J. of the Superior Court in Brampton stated at para. 45 that "[j]ust as the trial co-ordinator's 'Verification of Trial Dates Offered' form is admissible to establish the dates offered and counsel 's position on them, the judge's pre-trial notes in regards to `case management' issues such as time estimates, witnesses to be called, and Charter issues, are essential when examining s. 11(b) issues. The forms should contain only the case management' issues, and no reference to discussions regarding resolutions, offers to resolve from either party, or the pre-trial Judge's opinion on sentence."

[8]I accept that there may be some relevance to the pre-trial information. and that the relevance should not depend on the region in which a person is charged. However, in both McNeilly and Cowell, the reference to the pre-trial information provided to the Superior Court from the Ontario Court of Justice is a specific reference to pre-trial forms (Sec McNeilly, supra at para. 25; Cowell, supra at paras. 45, 46). This is in accordance with Rule 27.04(1) of the Rules of the Ontario Court of Justice in Criminal Proceedings, SI/97-133, which provides as follows:

> (1) The pre-hearing conference judge, upon the completion of the hearing may complete a Pre-Hearing Conference Report in Form 14, a copy of which shall be provided to the prosecutor and counsel of record for the accused, or to the accused if the accused is not represented by counsel of record, and may be provided to the judge, presiding over the proceedings, together with any materials filed by counsel of record on the pre-hearing conference relating to matters to be raised at proceedings, [emphasis added]

[9]It is clear that although the pre-trial judge is not required to complete the Pre-Hearing Conference Report, if it is completed, it must be provided. It is the position of the Applicant that although the pre-trial form was not completed by either pre-trial judge, her or his notes of the pre-trial conference should nonetheless be provided. The Applicant submits that as a pre-trial is not an adjudicative process, the notes are merely a record of the position of the parties, and whether they are completed on the prescribed form, or in some other fashion, is of no significance. The Applicant submits that without the pre-trial information from the College Park judges, the Applicant will not have all the facts or data about the pre-trials and, in particular, will not have disclosure as to why there was a need for a second pre-trial. The Applicant submits that this, in turn, will mean that he cannot present a complete factual and legal argument on the reasons for delay, which is a violation of his constitutional right to fundamental justice (See Charkaoui v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 SCC 9 (CanLII), [2007] 1 S.C.R. 350 (right to answer the case as an aspect of fundamental justice)).

[10] In my view, the factual context of this application is very different from those in cases like Dersch v. Canada (Attorney General), 1990 CanLII 3820 (SCC), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1505, 60 C.C.C. (3d) 132, and Charkaoui, upon which the Applicant relies. In Dersch, the applicant sought access to a sealed wiretap packet under section 178.14 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, and the court held it was not necessary for him to show prima facie misconduct on the part of the applicant for the wiretap authorization in order to gain access. Rather, the court found that an assertion that the admission of the evidence obtained through the interception is challenged, and that access is required to make full answer and defense, was sufficient to grant access. Charkaoui dealt with the constitutionality of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, S.C. 2001, c. 27, which allowed the government to issue a certificate of inadmissibility to Canada on the grounds of security that would lead to the detention of the named person. While the certificate and detention were subject to review by a Federal Court judge, some or all of the information on which the certificate was based could not be disclosed to the named person or his or her representative in the review process. The court held that the principles of fundamental justice require that before a person is deprived of his or her liberty, he or she must be afforded a hearing before an independent and impartial judge; a decision by the judge on the facts and the law; and the right to know and to answer the case he or she is facing (Charkaoui, supra at para. 29).

[11] This is not a case where the Applicant is challenging a judicial order, such as a wiretap authorization or an arrest warrant. This is a case where the Applicant seeks a judge's notes. The Applicant claims that as the notes are simply the records of administrative proceedings, they do not attract any judicial privilege, and that they must be produced to ensure transparency in the criminal justice system,

[12] With respect, I do not accept the Applicant's position. Pre-trials are vital to effective case management and to ensuring that trials are efficient and focused (see Rules of the Ontario Court of Justice in Criminal Proceedings, r. 27.03(2)). Pre-trials often lead to agreement on a particular issue or to resolution, both of which save trial time, and resolution, as well, may impact sentence. A pre-trial judge has the discretion to require that an accused who has counsel be available for consultation with counsel, or that an investigating officer be available for consultation with the prosecution (see Rules of the Ontario Court of Justice in Criminal Proceedings, r. 27.02(2)). Although a pre-trial judge does not make any adjudicative decisions on a pre-trial, she or he clearly is performing a judicial function when she or he conducts a pre-trial (see Edwards y. Canada (Attorney General) (1999), 1999 CanLII 15109 (ON SC), 46 O.R. (3d) 447 (S.C.J.)). A pre-trial judge is not, as the Applicant suggests, a kind of judicial stenographer of positions taken. Rather, pre-trials are held to facilitate and resolve matters before the court and, as such, a judge at a pre-trial is engaged in an integral part of the judicial function (Edwards, supra at para. 29).

[13] The determination that a judge conducting a pre-trial is fulfilling a judicial function, and thereby afforded judicial immunity, does not beg the question as suggested by the Applicant, nor is it the type of inference drawing criticized by Ducharme J. in R. v. Munoz, 2006 CanLII 3269 (ON SC), [2006] O.J. No. 446 (QL), 205 C.C.C. (3d) 70 (S.C.J.). This is because judicial immunity is an established legal principle. Ducharme J.'s criticism of deductive reasoning in Munoz related to the drawing of impermissible factual inferences from evidence, not the drawing of legal conclusions through the application of legal principles. In this case, what needs to be established on the evidence is whether the actions of the judges conducting the judicial pre-trials satisfy the requirements of judicial immunity. This entails an examination of whether they were carrying out a judicial function. Where it is established on the evidence that the actions of the judges do satisfy the preconditions to judicial immunity, the end result follows. This is not an impermissible inference, but rather the application of a legal principle.

[14] Given that a pre-trial judge is acting qua judge at a pre-trial, her or his judicial acts, including her or his note-taking, enjoy complete immunity. This principle is succinctly set out by Lax J. in Edwards at para. 18, where she referred to the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in MacKeigan v. Hickman, 1989 CanLII 40 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R 796, 50 C.C.C. (3d) 449, as "authority for the proposition that the thought processes of a judge may not be penetrated, nor may her administrative arts later be questioned."

[15] The Applicant also submits that the notes taken by the pre-trial judge are connected with the administration of the courts and thereby superintended by the Attorney General (Ontario) (see Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43, s. 72, as am. by Access to Justice Act, 2006, S.O. 2006, c. 21, s. 14) While section 72 of the Courts of Justice Act provides that the Attorney-General shall superintend all matters connected with the administration of the courts, paragraph 1 of the section specifically exempts matters that are assigned by law to the judiciary. Given that I am satisfied that there is no issue that judicial pre-trials are assigned by law to the judiciary, I also reject the Applicant's submission that the notes belong to the court as a record of the proceedings and that they do not belong to the pre-trial judge (See Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 625.1).

[16] Similarly, paragraph 3 of section 72 of the Court of Justice Act exempts matters assigned by a memorandum of understanding under section 77 of the Act from being superintended by the Attorney General. The Applicant reviewed the current memorandum in some detail in support of his position that the judiciary is not independent of the Attorney General as superintendent of the courts with respect to the records of the pre-trial judges. The Applicant seems to suggest that because the memorandum is silent in respect of judge's notes at a pre-trial, they are not exempt from the superintendence of the Attorney General and therefore producible. However, in my view, this submission ignores the fact that judicial pre-trials are assigned by law to the judiciary and are thus exempt from the superintendence of the Attorney General under paragraph 1.

[17] The Applicant further relies on the memorandum to establish a more general lack of independence of the judiciary in the administration of The Ontario Court of Justice. He points to the administrative support services performed by the Ministry of the Attorney General on behalf of the Office of the Chief Justice, and to the acknowledgement in the memorandum that ". . .some of these additional support services may more appropriately be the responsibility of the Office of the Chief Justice, but that it is not possible to make this determination at this time" (Memorandum of Understanding between the Attorney General of Ontario and the Chief Justice of the Ontario Court of Justice, December 16, 2004 at 5). The Applicant alleges that numerous aspects of the memorandum, dealing with matters from financing to staffing, undermine the Ontario Court's judicial independence. In support of this contention the Applicant refers to a line of cases dealing with judicial independence: R. v. Valente, 1985 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 673, 23 C.C.C. (3d) 193; R. v. Lippé, 1990 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 114, 64 C.C.C. (3d) 513; Ref re Remuneration of Judges of the Prov. Court of P.E.I.; Ref re Independence and Impartiality of the Prov. Court of P.E.L, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3, 118 C.C.C. (3d) 193; Newfoundland Assn. of Provincial Court Judges u Newfoundland, 1998 CanLII 14092 (NL SC), [1998] N.J. No, 120 (QL), 160 D.L.R. (4th) 337; Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance): Rice v. New Brunswick, 2002 SCC 13 (CanLII), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 405; Re Application under s. 83.28 of the Criminal Code, 2004 SCC 42 (CanLII), [2004] 2 S.C.R. 248, 184 C.C.C. (3d) 449 sub nom. R. u Bagri.

[18] While these cases are instructive on the evolution of the principle of judicial independence, in my view they do not assist the Applicant in this application. The Applicant has not established a nexus between the requisite level of administrative independence and judges' notes taken in a judicial context.

[19] The Applicant also points to the Court Services Division Policies and Procedures on Public Access to Court Files, Documents and Exhibits. The Applicant submits that while the policies and procedures set out in this document recognize that access to court files and documents is subject to "judicial direction", no such "direction" existed in this case, and accordingly, the records should be subject to production. Firstly, in my view, the notes kept by the pre-trial judges in this case are not within the scope of the files and documents encompassed by the Court Services Division policy manual. The policy manual deals with public access to official court records, access to exhibits, the effects of publication bans, and associated matters. It does not contemplate a judge's notes. Moreover, "judicial direction", in the context of the policy manual, should not be limited to a formal written direction or practice guideline. Rather, when one reads the phrase in context, it can be seen to refer to the fact that the court itself "... has a supervisory and protecting power over its records, and as a result determines rules for public access". (CSD Policy Manual August 17, 2007 s. 1.1) The direction may be in the form of a formal direction or practice guideline applying broadly, or may be the direction of an individual judge in an individual case.

[20] In my view, in many of the submissions and material provided to the court, The Applicant is conflating judicial independence with judicial immunity or privilege. Among other things, the Applicant provided the court with discussion papers on judicial independence, including The Governance of Britain: A Consultation on the Role of the Attorney General and the Canadian Judicial Counsel's report Administering Justice for the Public. While these papers include interesting discussion on possible court reform, it provides this court with little material that is relevant to the praecipe issue at hand.

[21] The practice at College Park differs from the practice at Peel, where it appears that the pre-trial judges complete Form 14, which, in turn, must be provided to the parties. At College Park, pre-trial information is kept in a judge's own notes, and, as I have indicated, these notes are presumptively private and protected by judicial immunity. While the Applicant asserts that it is facile to suggest that pre-trial information from College Park should not be disclosed simply because it is not recorded on a prescribed form, in my view, that is precisely what the legislation allows. There is no ambiguity in the word "may" in Rule 27.04(1) and, accordingly, no ability to read into the rule words to the effect that the judge may complete a Pre-Hearing Conference Report in Form 14 or make any other record deemed appropriate, as suggested by the Applicant. This is not a case where the wording of the rule can be subject to more than one interpretation, such that it would be proper to embark on any exercise of statutory interpretation guided by Charter values (See the discussion of Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership v. Rex, 2002 SCC 42 (CanLII), [2002] 2 S.C.R. 559, in Ruth Sullivan, Statutory Interpretation, 2nd ed. (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2007) at 240).

[22] In urging this court to accept a broad construction of Rule 27.04(1), the Applicant refers to, among other things, the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. Potvin, 1989 CanLII 130 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 525, 47 C.C.C. (3d) 289, in which the court addressed the proper interpretation of the word "may" in the former section 643(1) of the Criminal Code. Section 643(1) dealt with the admission of evidence previously taken. The court held that the word "may" in section 643(1) was not directed at the parties, but rather at the trial judge, and gave him or her a discretion to not admit the previous testimony where it would be unfair to do so, even when the other requirements of the section had been met. The court considered the plain, literal meaning of the word "may" and noted that "...'may' is commonly used to denote a discretion, while the word is used to denote an obligation" (Potvin, supra at para. 32). In my view, a complete reading of Potvin supports the position taken by the Ontario Court of Justice, namely that the judges have the discretion as to whether or not to complete the Pre-trial Report, and it is only when they do so that the Report shall be produced. As stated by Ruth Sullivan, "[w]hen a statutory power is conferred using the word 'may', the implication is that the power is discretionary and that its recipient can lawfully decide whether or not to exercise it. After all, if the legislature wished to impose an obligation, it could easily have used instead of 'may" (Ruth Sullivan, Sullivan and Driedger on the Construction of Statutes, 4th ed. (Vancouver: Butterworths, 2002) at 57). While recognizing that the use of "may" is not conclusive, I am not satisfied that there is anything in the Rules of the Ontario Court of Justice in Criminal Proceedings that expressly or impliedly requires a pre-trial judge to complete Form 14. Given the purpose and context of pre-trials, this is not, in my view, a case where the failure to exercise the discretion to complete the form will undermine the purpose of the pre-trial rules (See Sullivan, Statutory Interpretation, supra at 74).

[23] I also note that prior to October 2006, the Superior Court of Justice Criminal Proceedings Rules, SI/92-99, of the Ontario Superior Court did not require a report to the trial judge, and it was not until the rules were changed that the pre-trial judge was required to complete a report that now becomes part of the Superior Court file (See Ontario, Criminal Proceedings Rules, r. 28.04(16), which replaces the former Ontario Supreme Court Rules Respecting Pre-Hearing Conferences in Criminal Matters, r. 6(a) [S1/86-145, C. Gaz. 1986 II. 3397]). There has been no comparable change to the Rules of the Ontario Court of Justice in Criminal Proceedings. While it is arguable that the same transparency which is now part of the Superior Court process should be part of the process of the Ontario Court of Justice, this is not what the rules prescribe.

[24] I return to the Supreme Court decision in MacKeigan v. Hickman. In that case, as indicated, while the majority of the court held that the administrative function of a judge also carried absolute immunity, Cory J., together with Lamer C.J.C. and Wilson J., were of the opinion that administrative functions are only protected by a qualified judicial immunity. In this regard, the comments of Cory J. are apposite: The qualified privilege of judges on administrative matters will clearly apply in most situations; however, there are exceptional cases in which the qualified privilege of immunity from testifying must give way; this will occur when it is necessary to reaffirm public confidence in the administration of justice.

[25] In this case, the Applicant seeks the pre-trial notes in an 11(b) application on the basis that they may elucidate a 5 week period of delay in an overall period of 114 weeks. I note that the Crown, on the record, indicated that it was prepared to assume the 5 weeks of delay for purposes of the 11(b) application. As such, it cannot be said that the information sought goes to the ability of the Applicant to make full answer and defence. This can be contrasted to R. y. Mills, 1999 CanLII 637 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 668, 139 C.C.C. (3d) 321, a case of record production where the court noted that where records are part of the case to meet, the concern about production is "particularly acute as such a situation very directly implicates the accused's ability to raise a doubt concerning his or her innocence" (Mills, supra at para. 71). This is also not a case where there is no other extrinsic evidence to establish the pre-trial information (see Dersch, supra at para. 15). In this case, there was a representative of the Applicant at each of the two pre-trials, and the potential significance of any pre-trial notes must be assessed in light of the fact that the Applicant was always represented (R. v. Scott, 2002 CanLII 44950 (ON CA), [2002] O.J. No. 2180 (QL) (C.A.)). Accordingly, even if I am incorrect in my finding that the privilege attaching to the judges' pre-trial notes is absolute, I am not satisfied that this is an exceptional case where privilege must give way to ensure public- confidence in the administration of justice.

[26] For these reasons, the praecipe application is dismissed.

Application dismissed.

Supplementary Reasons of the Court

Summary:

The appellants apply to adduce fresh evidence and have this Court re-open and allow their previously dismissed appeal. They allege that they discovered new evidence after the dismissal of their appeal that demonstrates the respondent and a key witness perjured themselves during the original trial. Held: Application dismissed. While this Court does retain inherent jurisdiction to set aside a fraudulently obtained judgment, it would not be appropriate to do so in this case. Where a party seeks to set aside a prior judgment on the basis that it was obtained by fraud, the traditional approach in British Columbia is to bring a new action in the trial court. That is the most appropriate forum here, where the respondent denies all of the alleged fraud.

Supplementary Reasons for Judgment of the Court:

[1] On July 12, 2017, we dismissed an appeal brought by Red Branch Investments Limited ("Red Branch") and Gerald Wright from the order of Wong J. granting judgment in favour of David P. Long. Reasons for judgment at trial are indexed as 2015 BCSC 2192. Our reasons are found at 2017 BCCA 256. In the course of proceedings to recover the costs of the appeal, subsequent to our judgment, the respondent disclosed information from the solicitors' file that has given rise to new controversy.

[2] The appellants seek to adduce this information as fresh evidence and ask this Court to re-open and allow the appeal.

Background

[3] The litigation arises from a dispute over ownership of a royalty interest in a potash mine in Thailand. Its resolution hinged upon an assessment of the parties' credibility and the credibility and reliability of certain witnesses.

[4] In February 1999, Mr. Wright registered his share of the royalty interest in Mr. Long's name. Mr. Long paid for the royalty interest by a promissory note. He later repaid the promissory note using funds provided to him by Mr. Wright for that purpose.

[5] In June 2010, Mr. Wright asked Mr. Long to transfer the royalty interest to Red Branch, Mr. Wright's company. He provided Mr. Long with a document dated September 1, 2009, transferring the royalty interest to Red Branch for $1. Mr. Long executed it.

[6] In late June 2011, the parties had a falling out and Mr. Long asked Red Branch to confirm it held half the royalty in trust for him. Red Branch refused to do so and these proceedings were commenced.

[7] In our reasons for judgment, we summarized the trial judgment as follows:

> [10] The trial judge accepted Long's evidence that when Wright's share in the royalty was transferred to Long in 1999, Wright told Long they would each have a 50% beneficial interest in it. He accepted Long's evidence that Wright made the following representations to Long when the 2010 Agreement was signed:
> a) Wright was the beneficial owner of Red Branch and he controlled the company;
>
> b) Wright wanted to transfer the royalty to Red Branch because there were tax advantages of having the royalty held by a Hong Kong company; and
> c) Red Branch would continue to hold the royalty in trust for both Long and Wright as before, with each of them receiving an equal beneficial interest and, to that end, Wright would make Long a 50% shareholder and director of Red Branch.
> [11] While the 2010 Agreement made no reference to the fact Red Branch held the royalty in trust for Long and Wright, the trial judge accepted that Long relied upon these representations and assurances when he signed the agreement.

[8] The judge found that 50% of Mr. Wright's share in the royalty was, in fact, given to Mr. Long in consideration for holding the royalty, which was, at all times, intended to be shared between the two men.

[9] We considered the following finding of the trial judge to be critical to the outcome:

> [47] Mr. John Darch, who was a long-time business associate of Mr. Wright and a fellow Royalty holder testified that he knew that Mr. Wright was appointing Mr. Long as his nominee for the royalty and that he clearly told Mr. Darch that he was sharing this royalty with Mr. Long. Mr. Darch also said that Mr. Wright told him that he would rather receive half of the royalty than one quarter, the reason being that he would lose half to Canada Revenue Agency and he would have to share the other half with his wife Gail whom he was planning to leave for his Thai mistress. Mr. Darch said that Mr. Wright told him this on more than one occasion.

[10] Mr. Wright's appeal was founded upon the argument that the trial judge committed a palpable and overriding error by ignoring, forgetting, or misconceiving relevant evidence that went to the core of the case, including, specifically, the evidence of Mr. Wright's accountant, Paul Royce.

[11] At paras. 30-43 of our reasons for judgment, we discussed the trial judge's consideration of the evidence of the parties' intentions. We expressed the view that while it would have been preferable for the trial judge to have expressly addressed the evidence of Mr. Royce, we noted, at para. 31, that the trial judge had effectively done so by preferring the evidence of Mr. Darch, who he considered to be more impartial. The trial judge had concluded, at para. 50:

> Mr. Darch is a neutral witness, having no bias in favour of either of the parties. He has no financial interest in the outcome of this litigation.

[12] We found the trial judge had given reasons that, while less than ideal in their consideration of the conflicts in the evidence, were reasonably intelligible to the parties and sufficient to provide a basis for meaningful appellate review.

The Fresh Evidence

[13] On August 11, 2017, the respondent filed an application to settle the costs below to which was attached an affidavit with the solicitors' accounts. On receipt of those accounts, the appellants made enquiries which resulted in the disclosure of portions of the respondent's counsel's file. The documents obtained must be considered in light of the chronology: the notice of civil claim was filed on April 16, 2012, and the response on May 15, 2012; discoveries took place in February 2013; and the trial was originally scheduled for July 2013. The documents included:

a) Records of funds paid by Western Investments "on behalf of David Long" to his solicitors to pay their accounts in 2012 and 2013, as well as correspondence indicating that John Darch directed Western Investments to forward some of those funds to Mr. Long's counsel;

b) January 2012 correspondence from Mr. Long to his counsel advising them that Mr. Darch, described as a "trusted friend and colleague", had "volunteered to act as a witness (against Mr. Wright) in the action and assist in any way he can";

c) June 2012 correspondence from Mr. Darch to Mr. Long (after the close of pleadings) with advice on how to question Mr. Wright on examination for discovery and offering advice on the pleadings and conduct of the litigation, including the following advice:

> At some stage, as it unfolds that Gail [Mr. Wright's wife] is an officer (director or shareholder?) of Red Branch it may be worthwhile to add her name as a defendant as she was conspiring with GW [Mr. Wright] to defraud you of your Royalty.
>
> Don't provide what you should not have [sic] until the right time, which to me is after GW has stated things under oath at his Discovery.
>
> The goal is to prove GW is a liar, discredit him, expose his scheme to evade tax, and in 1998 to leave Gail.
>
> I have to be the last witness and the one who ties a bow on the case. You have to win with the documents and other witnesses leaving me to confirm. GW's lawyer will do everything to destroy my credibility and use the argument that I am supporting you through malice because of the lawsuit between GW and me. Or that I have been promised a part of the royalty or some compensation.
>
> Probably much more to come up after the case gets underway and some brain storming.

d) June 2012 correspondence from Mr. Long to his counsel, referring to Mr. Darch as "[m]y business partner, friend and confidant", advising them that Mr. Darch would be arriving in Vancouver from Bangkok and would be "carrying some documents for you", and inviting counsel to meet with him;

e) June 2012 correspondence from Mr. Darch to Mr. Long and his counsel describing a meeting with counsel for the estate of another holder of a royalty interest to "appraise them about the dispute" and offering further advice about proving the claim;

f) Later correspondence in the same month from Mr. Darch to Mr. Long and his counsel summarizing his review of files in the offices of Fasken Martineau LLP. and enclosing copies of documents he had obtained from them;

g) February 2013 correspondence from Mr. Darch to Mr. Long (at about the time discoveries were taking place) in which he states: "I feel that your lawyer MUST present to the judge that you were deceived by GW on the whole issue of tax and that he abused your trust in him and he conned you into signing the transfer[ ]to Red Branch and ask the judge to rule that your 50% be reinstated in your name";

h) February 2013 correspondence from Mr. Long's counsel to Mr. Long referring to Mr. Darch's correspondence and advice;

i) March 2015 correspondence from Mr. Long to his counsel in which he writes: "I note that John (Darch) has responded. Seems to be trying to run the show again? He hasn't made another mention of the missing files which I definitely left in his office immediately after the Discovery" (emphasis added).

[14] This material is said to be significant given the testimony of Messrs. Long and Darch at trial. Mr. Darch testified at the conclusion of his examination-in-chief:

Q All right. And so what is the reason you're here today, sir?

A I'm here because I had a subpoena to attend this case, and I'm pretty sure that either Mr. Wright or Mr. Long is going to be unhappy with what I have said, but I have no friendship interest, I have no financial interest, I have no business interest in either of the parties. So really to me it makes no difference who wins or who loses. What I have told you are the facts as much as I know them.

[15] And, in cross-examination:

Q And, sir, have you ever discussed this legal proceeding with Mr. Long?

A I did.

Q And when did you discuss it with him?

A In the early part of 2012.

Q And so you discussed this with him before he -- he initiated these proceedings?

A Yes.

Q You encouraged him to do so?

A No.

Q Sir, have you ever directly or indirectly contributed to his legal fees related to this proceeding?

A No. Never.

Q Have you provided him or his lawyers with documents relevant to this proceeding?

A I had a meeting with his lawyers, and we reviewed some documents.

Q And when was that?

Q Before the proceedings started?

A Yes.

Q And you provided them with documents?

A No, there may have been some emails that I had at the time.

Q Did you also provide those emails to Mr. Long?

A I think I might have given them to Mr. Long for his lawyer.

[16] When it was suggested to Mr. Darch that he had made efforts to preserve certain solicitor's records so as to assist Mr. Long, he testified as follows: "It's not entirely clear whose records those were … it's complicated":

Q Sir, why would you -- why would you volunteer that information? You would have volunteered that information to Mr. Long because you had been assisting him in this litigation?

A I have not been assisting Mr. Long in the litigation. I gave him this information at the time, that if he was being denied something which he claimed was justly his, then it would be inappropriate of me not to tell him where he might find the proof that he needs.

Q Sir, I suggest to you that you hired Mr. Long for a position he wasn't qualified for so that he would have sufficient income to pursue this lawsuit?

MS. TRIBE: Sir, I'm going to object. The question has been asked if he provided any financial assistance. He said no. That has been asked and answered, My Lord.

THE COURT: I will permit the question to be put just to settle the matter.

Because he has particularized it in another fashion.

THE WITNESS: Then my response will be to this, My Lord, absolutely I did not hire Mr. Long for any purpose of pursuing any claim against Mr. Wright. That is absolutely not my interest. I have no interest who wins, friendship-wise, business-wise, any other reason. So whatever you may be trying to suggest over and over again is simply not true.

[17] And at the conclusion of his cross-examination:

> Q Just to be clear, Doi Chang is a company in which you have an interest?
>
> A I have 50 percent. And if I may just say this, so it's absolutely clear, Long never received anything from me personally, nothing from Western Investments, nothing from Doi Chang. No money was given directly or indirectly in respect of this lawsuit. I am not in favour of the lawsuit. I wish I had no part of it.

[18] Mr. Long, in turn, testified as follows in cross-examination:

> Q Sir, has Mr. Darch provided you with any assistance in this litigation?
>
> A No, My Lord.
> Q No financial assistance?
>
> A No, My Lord.
> Q But he has provided your lawyers with documents relevant to the litigation?
>
> A I can't answer for my lawyers, My Lord.
>
> Q Are you aware as to whether or not he has provided documents to your lawyers in this litigation?
>
> A I can't say for sure, My Lord.
>
> Q Has he provided you with documents that are relevant to this litigation?
>
> A No, My Lord.
> Q Have you ever met with him to discuss the issues in -- that relate to this litigation?
>
> A We've not discussed the litigation, My Lord.
>
> Q Sir, I suggest to you that that is, in fact, not true, that you have spoken to Mr. Darch about, in particular, this litigation.
>
> A My Lord, my recollection is that there has been no discussion of the litigation.
>
> Q That, in fact, sir, you had a discussion with Mr. Darch shortly before these proceedings were initiated, and he told you that if what you were saying was true, that you should start proceedings because you might have a claim?
>
> A No, My Lord, that was not his advice.
>
> Q So just so that I'm perfectly clear, you've never had a discussion with Mr. Darch about this proceeding?
>
> A No, My Lord.

The Application

[19] The appellants seek orders re-opening the appeal, admitting fresh evidence, allowing the appeal, setting aside the judgment at trial, and ordering a new trial.

[20] They say the fresh evidence establishes that the testimony of Messrs. Long and Darch at trial was false and misleading and intended to create the false impression that Mr. Darch was uninterested and impartial. Mr. Darch's impartiality was material as the trial judge expressly considered it to be an important factor in the assessment of the evidence, and the outcome hinged upon the parties' credibility.

[21] In particular, the evidence of Messrs. Long and Darch at trial is said to be directly contradicted by the recently produced records which show that Mr. Darch:

a) indirectly contributed to the financing of the litigation;

b) was a friend, business partner, and confidant of Mr. Long;

c) was in favour of, and encouraged, the lawsuit;

d) was actively assisting Mr. Long and his counsel in the litigation, after the pleadings in April–May 2012, and through examinations for discovery in February 2013;

e) provided documents to Mr. Long and his lawyers; and

f) had conversations with Mr. Long about the litigation after the commencement of the proceedings.

Applicable Law

[22] The appellants seek to re-open the appeal with a view toward setting aside the judgment at trial on the ground it was founded upon misrepresentation amounting to perjury. This Court has inherent jurisdiction, founded upon control of its own process, to re-open an appeal after the appeal has been heard and judgment entered*: R. v. Hummel*, 2003 YKCA 4. The scope of that power in civil cases is described in, among other cases, Menzies v. Harlos (1989), 1989 CanLII

2760 (BC CA), 37 B.C.L.R. (2d) 249 (C.A.), and Mayer v. Mayer Estate (1993), 1993 CanLII 6861 (BC CA), 106 D.L.R. (4th) 353 (B.C.C.A.).

[23] In Temple Consulting Group Ltd. v. Abakhan & Associates Inc., 2013 BCCA 119, Chiasson J.A., for the Court, addressed the circumstances in which the Court should re-consider an appeal as follows:

> [17] In my view, reconsidering a decision of this Court involves a two-step process: first, should the appeal be re-opened in order to consider a position advanced by a party; second, if so, should the decision be reconsidered, that is, changed. This is the approach taken by the court in R. v. Hummel, 2003 YKCA 4, 175 C.C.C. (3d) 1, leave to appeal dismissed, [2002] S.C.C.A. No. 434, and applied by this Court in Hadcock v. Georgia Pacific Securities Corp., 2007 BCCA 127, 64 B.C.L.R. (4th) 316. I recognize that often, from a practical perspective, the two steps are conflated, but in a case like the present, this Court must consider whether to re-open the appeal to determine whether to admit the tendered fresh evidence. If we were to do so, only then would we decide whether to reconsider our decision based on the fresh evidence.
> [18] Reconsideration is guided by the words of this Court in Doman Forest Products Ltd. v. GMAC Commercial Credit Corp., 2005 BCCA 111, 209 B.C.A.C. 197 at para. 6:
> > The circumstances in which a reconsideration will be undertaken are limited and do not include simple re-argument of the appeal. Something in the nature of overlooked or misapprehended evidence, or failing that, a clear and compelling case in law on the point and the prospect of a very serious injustice absent reconsideration, is required: Mayer v. Mayer. That is to say, an application for reconsideration is of an extraordinary nature.

[24] The respondent would have us set a particularly high bar, both in relation to the admission of fresh evidence and in relation to the substantive relief sought by the appellant: setting aside the judgment at trial. In relation to the admission of fresh evidence, the respondent refers us not only to the test in Palmer v. The Queen, 1979 CanLII 8 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 759, but also to Ascent Developments Corp. v. Stonehenge Projects Inc., 2016 BCCA 287. In the latter case, Goepel J.A., for the Court, followed Jens v. Jens, 2008 BCCA 392, in holding, at para. 64, that the case was "one of the rare situations where fresh evidence should be admitted" because "[t]o not admit the evidence could well lead to an injustice" (emphasis added).

[25] In our view, Ascent is not a departure from precedent. Goepel J.A. clearly follows Albu v. The University of British Columbia, 2015 BCCA 41, and Golder Associates Ltd. v. North Coast Wind Energy Corp., 2010 BCCA 263, and applies the test set out in Palmer.

[26] On the question of the substantive relief, the appellants say they can establish, on a balance of probability, on the affidavit evidence before us: Messrs. Long and Darch gave false testimony at trial; their perjured evidence is material; the fraud was not known to the appellants at the time of trial and could not have been known to them; and they are bringing the application in a timely fashion. In short, they say they can meet the test described in Wentworth v. Rogers (No. 5) (1986), 6 N.S.W.L.R. 534 (C.A.) at 538:

> …it must be shown, by the party asserting that a judgment was procured by fraud, that there has been a new discovery of something material, in the sense that fresh facts have been found which, by themselves or in combination with previously known facts, would provide a reason for setting aside the judgment.

[27] The respondent says the conflict between the testimony of Messrs. Long and Darch at trial, on one hand, and the recently produced documentary record, on the other, may be explained. The conflict he says, does not clearly demonstrate perjury. Further, certain conflicts in the evidence were apparent at trial and with due diligence the conflicts upon which the application is founded might have been brought to light.

[28] In our view, before addressing these arguments it is necessary to determine whether we can and should resolve the allegation of perjury on the material in hand, when the affiants have not been cross-examined on their affidavits or testified in relation to the alleged perjury.

[29] Many of the cases referred to by counsel in their submissions have come on for hearing before appellate courts after examination of the alleged perjury issue by a judge of first instance. There is some authority for the proposition that an allegation that a judgment has been obtained by misrepresentation should not be determined in the first instance in this Court.

[30] In Landreville v. Town of Boucherville, 1978 CanLII 202 (SCC), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 801 at 814, Beetz J., for the Court, noted:

> Fraud, dishonesty, bad faith, extortion and bribery form a special category of causes of nullity, which transcends all others.
> > Fraud unravels everything. The Court is careful not to find fraud unless it is distinctly pleaded and proved; but once it is proved, it vitiates judgments, contracts and all > transactions whatsoever…

> Lord Denning in Lazarus Estates Ltd. v. Beasley, at p. 712.

[31] In doing so, he emphasized two important principles: first, that fraud can vitiate a judgment, and second, that fraud must be distinctly pleaded and proved.

[32] The early cases deal with the grounds upon which an action can be brought to set aside an entered judgment. The dissent of Duff J. in the leading early case, MacDonald v. Pier (1922), 1922 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1923] S.C.R. 107, has frequently been cited as an authoritative description of the general principles. He wrote at 120-22:

> Now Lord Selborne [in Boswell v. Coaks] explicitly says that he has no doubt that a judgment may be set aside on the ground of fraud and it is to be noted that the observations of Lord Justice James [in Flower v. Lloyd] are not confined in their application to cases where the fraud charged consists of perjury; false answers to interrogatories, misleading production of documents, subornation of perjury are all pointed out in the passage quoted above, and I think that notwithstanding Lord Selborne's expressed approval of the spirit of those observations and notwithstanding the weight and force of the observations themselves one is constrained to the conclusion upon an examination of the authorities that there is jurisdiction in the court to entertain an action to set aside a judgment on the ground that it has been obtained through perjury. The principle I conceive to be this; such jurisdiction exists but in the exercise of it the court will not permit its process to be made use of and will exert the utmost care and caution to prevent its process being used for the purpose of obtaining a re-trial of an issue already determined, of an issue which transivit in rem judicatam under the guise of impugning a judgment as procured by fraud. … The principle upon which both these cases proceeded is that, to quote the judgment in the Duchess of Kingston's case:
> > Although it is not permitted to show that the court was mistaken it may be shown that it was misled.
> Where the court is misled by the fraud of the parties that is something which vitiates the most solemn proceedings of courts of justice and as Lord Coke says, it avoids all judicial acts ecclesiastical or temporal. In the very nature of things as Lord Coleridge C.J. said in Abouloff v. Oppenheimer at p. 302, the question whether the court was misled in pronouncing judgment never could have been submitted to them, never could have been in issue before them and therefore never could have been decided by them. Brett L.J. at p. 307 discusses the judgment of James L.J. in Flower v. Lloyd and he expressly dissents from the proposition that there can be any doubt that the fraud of the party to the action committed before the court for the purpose of deceiving the court is a ground for setting aside the judgment.

[33] The question of appropriate procedure is clearly addressed in Ontario. The Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, R. 59.06 (formerly R. 529 of the Rules of Court) provide:

> (2) A party who seeks to,
>
> > (a) have an order set aside or varied on the ground of fraud or of facts arising or discovered after it was made;
> may make a motion in the proceeding for the relief claimed.

[34] In 100 Main Street East Ltd. v. Sakas (1974), 1974 CanLII 637 (ON SC), 3 O.R. (2d) 361 (H. Ct. J.), the trial judge set aside a judgment in a real estate dispute, after trial, on the basis that material evidence had been concealed. Justice Holland held, at 368:

> I think it comes down to this: that fraud has been clearly established on the part of the defendant which, if known to the trial Judge, may reasonably have affected the result. I cannot say that of necessity it would have affected the result. I am of the view, however, that where fraud has been clearly established the test of the effect of the fraud on the result should not be placed too high.

[35] On appeal, in 100 Main Street East Ltd. v. Sakas (1975), 1975 CanLII 381 (ON CA), 8 O.R. (2d) 385 (C.A.), Estey J.A. described the procedure that had brought the case before the Ontario Court of Appeal, utilization of Rule 529 of the Ontario Rules of Court:

> The test applicable in these circumstances has not changed over the years although the procedure in obtaining the desired relief has. Formerly (and it is still the case in England), the party alleging that the judgment has been obtained by fraud was required to bring an action to set aside such judgment. In Ontario, such a person is required, by Rule 529 of the Rules of Court, to apply by motion in the original proceedings for such order as could formerly have been obtained by the bringing of a new action. This new procedure is of course not a form of appeal, nor are the principles to be applied in resolving such application those which would apply in the case of newly discovered evidence not revealing fraud, except that the fraud must not have been known to the complaining party at the time of the trial.

[36] International Corona Resources Ltd. v. LAC Minerals Ltd. (1988), 1988 CanLII 4534 (ON SC), 66 O.R. (2d) 610 (H. Ct. J.), to which both parties have referred as an authoritative statement of the applicable test on an application

v. Granitile Inc. (2008), 2008 CanLII 63568 (ON SC), 302 D.L.R. (4th) 40 (Ont. Sup. Ct.), where the motion was converted into a trial in order to review the evidence of fraud.

[37] Hill v. Hill, 2016 ABCA 49, came on before the Court of Appeal of Alberta by a circuitous route. Ultimately, the appeal arose from a second action in the trial court seeking to set aside an earlier judgment on the basis of newly discovered evidence.

[38] There is, however, in Alberta a statutory provision applicable in some situations that is similar to the rule relied upon in Ontario. In Re Smolak and Necula (1973), 1973 CanLII 1085 (AB CA), 39 D.L.R. (3d) 730 (Alta. C.A.), Clement J.A. cited the provisions of the Maintenance and Recovery Act, R.S.A. 1970, c. 223:

> 30. Where an order has been made or an application for an order has been dismissed, a judge may, on the discovery of new evidence or of fraud, grant leave to reopen and may reopen and consider a previous decision.

[39] Smolak was an appeal from the refusal of a trial judge to re-open his previous decision.

[40] Wentworth, the leading Australian case, to which counsel referred, came on before the Court of Appeal as an appeal from the summary dismissal of an action to set aside a prior judgment. Interestingly, the case had previously come before the Court of Appeal but was remitted to the trial division, for reasons summarized by President Kirby, at 538, as follows:

> The appellant has appealed from the judgment entered by Maxwell, J pursuant to the jury's verdict. Her appeal was to have been heard in May 1986. She then commenced proceedings, supplementary to the appeal, to have the judgment set aside on the ground that it was obtained by fraud. Such proceedings are well-established in our law. They are independent of the appeal and equitable in origin and nature. That is the principal reason why this Court declined to consolidate the attack on the judgment for fraud with the appeal and required it to be tried separately in the Equity Division of the Court. When Young J received the matter by remission from this Court, he directed that a statement of claim be filed. This was subsequently done and the appellant verified it. It was later amended with the leave of the Court. It was the amended statement of claim, as verified, which was the subject of the motion by the respondent that gave rise to his Honour's peremptory orders now under challenge.

[41] There are certainly instances where appellate courts have admitted fresh evidence, found a judgment to be vitiated by fraud, and set a trial judgment aside without a new trial. That appears to have been the result in the leading English case, Meek v. Fleming, [1961] 3 All E.R. 148 (C.A.). In that case, the English Court of Appeal described its ability to address misrepresentation or nondisclosure at trial. Holroyd Pearce L.J. held, at 154:

> Where a party deliberately misleads the court in a material matter, and that deception has probably tipped the scale in his favour (or even, as I think, where it may reasonably have done so) it would be wrong to allow him to retain the judgment thus unfairly procured. Finis litium is a desirable object, but it must not be sought by so great a sacrifice of justice which is and must remain the supreme object. Moreover, to allow the victor to keep the spoils so unworthily obtained would be an encouragement to such behaviour, and do even greater harm than the multiplication of trials. In every case it must be a question of degree, weighing one principle against the other.

[42] Lord Pearson held, at 156:

> In the present case the fresh evidence only affects the credit of the defendant, and does not relate directly to any issue in the case. Accordingly it would not be right to order a new trial unless there is some feature of paramount importance outweighing the grave disadvantage of protracting in the litigation. In my opinion, however, there is such a feature in the present case.

And, at 157:

> There was in the result at the trial of this action the deception of the court, and the defendant in cross-examination was giving uncandid (and at one point false) evidence in order to preserve the concealment of the truth.
> The fresh evidence has materiality.

[43] Similarly, in Vagi v. Peters, 1989 CanLII 5121 (SK CA), [1990] 2 W.W.R. 170 (Sask. C.A.), the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal set aside a judgment at trial and ordered a new trial on the basis that the respondent's testimony at trial involved "concealment of relevant information which pertained either to the quantum of damages or had a bearing upon his credibility" (at 171). The Palmer test was found to have been met. Wakeling J.A., for the majority, held, at 172:

> This court has consistently indicated its concerns for the maintenance of respect for the administration of justice. To that end, I do not consider it appropriate to permit a judgment which is to at least some degree based upon evidence which is untruthful or conceals relevant information to be upheld. This is so even though every aspect of that evidence > cannot be said to clearly bear on the judgment rendered. It is enough if the evidence is of some consequence and therefore might have some bearing upon the result of the trial: see Meek v. Fleming ….

[44] There is no discussion in Vagi of the Court's jurisdiction or the English practice of requiring the party alleging that the judgment has been obtained by fraud to bring an action to set aside the judgment. Nor does there appear to have been any doubt in Vagi that the respondent was untruthful or concealed relevant information at trial.

[45] In British Columbia, we have no equivalent to the Ontario provision referred to above, except rules that provide for the setting aside of orders made without notice or in default. In Coughlin v. Kuntz (1997), 1997 CanLII 2995 (BC SC), 43 B.C.L.R. (3d) 360 (S.C.), Cohen J. addressed the English practice referred to by Estey J.A. in 100 Main Street East. After discuss v. Gusola (1991), 50 C.P.C. (2d) 154 (B.C.S.C.), and this Court's judgment in D.K. Investments Ltd. v. S.W.S. Investments Ltd. (1990), 1990 CanLII 586 (BC CA), 44 B.C.L.R. (2d) 1 (C.A.), he held:

> [35] Some of the cases cited above were brought as separate actions, and others brought as motions. The general rule in British Columbia has traditionally been that after a judgment or order has been entered, a new action must be brought to set aside that judgment. This was made clear by the Supreme Court of Canada in Royal Trust Co. v. Jones, [1962] S.C.R. 133, where at pp. 145-146 Cartwright J. said:
> > An examination of the authorities leads me to the conclusion that it has long been settled in England that the proper method of impeaching a judgment of the High Court on the ground of fraud or of seeking to set it aside on the ground of subsequently discovered evidence is by action, whether or not the judgment which is attacked has been affirmed or otherwise dealt with by the Court of Appeal or other appellate tribunal.... There appears to be nothing in the statutes constituting and continuing the courts in British Columbia or in the Rules of Court of that Province to suggest that there is any difference between the law and practice on this point in British Columbia and in England; in my opinion they are the same.
> [36] In D.K. Investments Ltd., supra, the Court of Appeal confirmed that Royal Trust Co. v. Jones, supra, is still the law in British Columbia.
>
> [38] The cases which involve a motion to set aside a judgment, as opposed to an action, are Ontario cases. Ontario provides for the setting aside or varying of a judgment by way of motion in its Rules of Civil Procedure ….
> [39] There is no equivalent rule in the British Columbia Rules of Court to allow for the setting aside of a judgment on the basis of fraud by motion. The Rules do allow for applications to set aside judgments in circumstances where judgment was granted upon the default of one of the parties. …
> [40] It appears therefore, that, as a general principle, the jurisdiction of the trial judge ends with the entry of judgment and that when a party seeks to set aside a judgment which has been entered, a new action must be commenced. However, there is some authority to suggest that the court has an inherent jurisdiction to set aside its own entered order and may do so without the party having to commence a new action.
> [48] … [I]n C. (C.A.) v. H. (J.R.) (1992), 1992 CanLII 1419 (BC CA), 67 B.C.L.R. (2d) 268, (C.A.), an application was brought to set aside a child maintenance order made by the Provincial Court. The application was dismissed in the Supreme Court, and the applicant appealed. In the course of her judgment dismissing the appeal, Southin J.A. stated at p. 271:
>
> > An order of a court of competent jurisdiction can be set aside in a number of ways. First, under the Rules of the court that made it if those Rules contain provisions for the setting aside of, for instance, a default judgment; secondly, by judicial review if the court is an inferior court, properly brought under the Judicial Review Procedure Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 209; thirdly, by way of appeal - none of those proceedings have been taken; and fourthly, by what one might call by way of short-hand an action in the nature of Royal Trust Co. v. Jones, 1961 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1962] S.C.R. 132, 37 W.W.R. 1, 31 D.L.R. (2d) 292, a form of action which was discussed by this Court in D.K. Investments Ltd. v. S.W.S. Investments Ltd. (1990), 1990 CanLII 586 (BC CA), 44 B.C.L.R. (2d) 1. It is not necessary in this case to expand on those authorities.
> [49] This passage is most significant because, first, it enumerates the ways in which an entered order might be upset in British Columbia, and second, because it does not contain any reference to setting aside an entered judgment or order by way of a motion in the action pursuant to the inherent jurisdiction of the court. In my view, this case, which was decided after [Racz v. District of Mission (1988), 1988 CanLII 2937 (BC CA), 22 B.C.L.R. (2d) 70 (C.A.)], brings into question the jurisdiction of this court, on a motion, to re-open, or to set aside, vary, or amend the original judgment in the instant case.
> [51] In my opinion, the court does not have jurisdiction in the case at bar to re-open the trial or vary the entered judgment on a motion in the action. I think that the procedure approved in Racz, supra, is limited to setting aside a consent order. In my view, the result in that case does not operate to overrule the well-established law that once a judgment is entered the court is functus officio and its judgment can be set aside or varied only in a fresh action brought for that purpose. This, I find, is particularly so where, as in the instant case, > the relief sought by the applicant raises complex issues which must be decided on controversial evidence.

[46] In Lemmon, Josephson J. presided over trial in an action to set aside a prior judgment on the basis it was obtained by fraudulent testimony. Applying the test described in 100 Main Street East, Meek, and Hip Foong Hong v. H. Neotia & Co., [1918] A.C. 888 (P.C.), he allowed the action and set aside the prior judgment.

[47] Bains v. Bhandar, 1999 BCCA 32, came on before this Court as an appeal from a trial judge's order refusing to order a new trial of the original action in response to allegations of fraud. The trial judge was alleged to have erred in his findings regarding due diligence and in describing the evidentiary onus on the applicant. The application was not brought, in the first instance, in the Court of Appeal.

[48] Similarly, D.K. Investments was an appeal from the summary dismissal of an action to set aside a prior judgment. The trial judge found that the misrepresentation alleged was immaterial and the party seeking to set aside the judgment had not exercised due diligence.

[49] The judgment of this Court referred extensively to the decision in Royal Trust Company v. E.M. Jones (1961), 1961 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1962] S.C.R 132, where, Cartwright J. said, at 145-46:

> An examination of the authorities leads me to the conclusion that it has long been settled in England that the proper method of impeaching a judgment of the High Court on the ground of fraud or of seeking to set it aside on the ground of subsequently discovered evidence is by action, whether or not the judgment which is attacked has been affirmed or otherwise dealt with by the Court of Appeal or other appellate tribunal. Section 9 of the Supreme Court Act, R.S.B.C. 1936, c. 56, which was in force at the time when Manson J. [the trial judge] dealt with the matter (and which is now section 9 of the R.S.B.C. 1960, c. 374) reads as follows:
> > 9. The Court is and shall continue to be a Court of original jurisdiction, and shall have complete cognizance of all pleas whatsoever, and shall have jurisdiction in all cases, civil as well as criminal, arising within the Province.
>
> There appears to be nothing in the statutes constituting and continuing the courts in British Columbia or in the Rules of Court of that Province to suggest that there is any difference between the law and the practice on this point in British Columbia and in England; in my opinion they are the same.

[50] Madam Justice Southin, for this Court, found that the action to set aside the judgment should not have been summarily dismissed and remitted some of the issues to be determined after a trial. She wrote, at 21:

> In my opinion, this was a case, at least on the issue of due diligence, where the court, whatever the parties wanted, should have declined to grant judgment. The learned judge spoke of evidence not adduced but in a case of so rare a nature in which there is no established practice -- no understood standard of evidence -- and where, as here, the issue is one of a man's honour, it behooves the court to give an opportunity for a full hearing.

[51] In our opinion, the judgment in D.K. Investments speaks strongly in favour of permitting the trial court to determine the issue the parties seek to put before us. The trial court continues to have the inherent jurisdiction to consider the question, notwithstanding our dismissal of the appeal, and it is the forum in which the parties may have a full hearing.

Application of the Law

[52] In response to the application to re-open the appeal, C. Michelle Tribe, counsel for the respondent at trial, has sworn an affidavit in which she attests to her unfamiliarity with the contents of the file said to establish the falsity of the evidence of Messrs. Darch and Long. She does not dispute that her firm was offered assistance by Mr. Darch, received documents from him, and was aware of discussions between Messrs. Long and Darch that took place after the commencement of the litigation.

[53] Mr. Darch has filed an affidavit in which he says, among other things: "It is not true, as alleged in these proceedings, that I offered and provided assistance over the period from June 2012 to February 2013. In fact, to the best of my recollection, I was involved in this matter on four separate occasions: June 2012; December 2012; February 2013; and shortly prior to trial." He deposes that he sent money to Mr. Long's lawyers at his request but those funds were "paid from Mr. Long's remuneration on his written instructions".

[54] Mr. Long has also filed an affidavit in which he deposes to the fact that he paid little attention to Mr. Darch's advice and at trial had forgotten the extent of his communication with Mr. Darch. He also swears that he did not regard Mr. Darch's correspondence or advice as assistance with the litigation.

[55] He says the evidence now before us could have been elicited at trial if the appellants had exercised due diligence and, in any event, the evidence does not bear on a decisive or potentially decisive issue.

[56] In their submissions, Mr. Long's counsel say there was no perjury or fraud. They say the allegation of perjury is in relation to a nebulous concept: whether Mr. Darch provided "assistance" or was "biased". In relation to Mr. Long's evidence, the respondent's counsel says: "the trial judge was aware, from the cross-examination, of the contradiction between Mr. Long's evidence and Mr. Darch's evidence … and to the extent that that affected Mr. Long's credibility, it must have been included in the trial judge's assessment of the case."

[57] In addition, the respondent says there is "no evidence at all to suggest anything other than that Long's memory was faded".

[58] On all of the relevant issues – falsity of the evidence at trial, knowledge of falsity, intention to mislead, materiality and, to the extent it is relevant, due diligence – the respondent joins issue with the appellants. While this Court has jurisdiction to re-open an appeal, hear fresh evidence in support of an allegation that a judgment was improperly obtained, and set aside a judgment on those grounds, we would be loath to do so in a case where the falsity of the impugned evidence is in issue. We say that because there is no doubt that the trial court retains jurisdiction to hear and determine a challenge to an entered judgment founded upon an allegation of fraud or perjury, and because courts of first instance are in a privileged position with respect to the determination of such factual disputes.

Disposition

[59] For those reasons, we would dismiss the applications to re-open the appeal and admit fresh evidence because our judgment does not pose an impediment to a future action in the British Columbia Supreme Court to set aside the judgment below as vitiated by fraud.

DECISION ON A PRELIMINARY ISSUE

Before: Arbitrator John Wilson

Heard: July 28, 2008 at the offices of the Financial Services Commission of Ontario in Toronto.

Appearances: Mrs. S., on her own behalf
Eric K. Grossman for Allstate Insurance Company of Canada

Issues:

The Applicant, S.S., was injured in a motor vehicle accident on November 21, 2001. She applied for and received statutory accident benefits from Allstate Insurance Company of Canada ("Allstate"), payable under the Schedule.[1] The parties were unable to resolve their disputes through mediation, and Mrs. S applied for arbitration at the Financial Services Commission of Ontario under the Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c.I.8, as amended.

The preliminary issue is:

1. Should the arbitrator recuse himself from the hearing of this arbitration and declare a mistrial?

Result:

1. There are no grounds for recusal and consequently no mistrial will be ordered.

EVIDENCE AND ANALYSIS

On Monday, July 28, 2008, I heard a motion for a mistrial brought by Allstate in the above matter. Due to the fast-approaching hearing dates I decided to advise the parties by letter as to the outcome of the motion with full reasons for my decision to follow in due course.

The following are my complete reasons for this decision.

As both sides are well aware, the circumstances leading up to the motion arose out of events that took place at the end of the first set of hearing dates on June 12, 2008.

There is no dispute that during her cross-examination by Mr. Grossman, Mrs. S became quite upset, and in the words of her own attendant, Ms. Martin, became hysterical.

It is in the context of this episode that Mrs. S is alleged to have divulged information relating to an attempt to settle her dispute with Allstate. Specifically, she is alleged to have revealed the amount of a settlement offer that she had refused to accept.

There is some confusion about what exactly was said at the time. Neither Mrs. S nor Ms. Martin has a specific recollection of her having made the statement in question. The affidavit material filed by Allstate, however, suggests the contrary.

Although I certainly recall the confusion resulting from Mrs. S's outbursts, and indeed recall certain other statements that gave rise to concerns about the safety of persons both inside and outside of the hearing room, I have no specific recollection of hearing the reference to a settlement offer allegedly made by Mrs. S at that time.

As noted in Allstate's affidavit material, I had ordered the hearing adjourned at the onset of the outburst. As a consequence there was no official record of what may have been said at that time. In any event, my recollection of the situation is not dispositive of a finding of what was or was not said in those crucial minutes.

My lack of recall, however, is relevant as to whether the uttering of such remarks, if such was the situation, would have necessarily created a situation in which my neutrality as to the parties to this arbitration was compromised. In this context, I take some consolation from the decision of the Divisional Court in Authorson, which, in a case that tuned on the alleged utterances of the presiding judge, observed as follows:

> [2] The allegations of bias against the Judge in acting in his case management judge role stem from comments apparently made during some of the sessions. There is no transcript, and there is some dispute amongst the parties, as to exactly what and how certain statements were made. In such circumstances, a certain degree of deference has to be given to a judge. We do not interpret the Judge's reasons as concluding that he was the dispositive witness as can be seen by his advice that he "... would add that I have no recall of making such a statement. If I had ever made a statement anything like that, I would have remembered it, and I would not then have continued on with the case."[3]

However, for the purposes of deciding this mistrial motion, I will assume that Mrs. S may well have disclosed the existence of a settlement offer, whether intentionally or by inadvertence, as well as considering the possibility that I may have unconsciously been compromised by the utterance, as Mr. Grossman has suggested.

Mr. Grossman submits that the mere fact of such a disclosure would be fatal to this arbitration process and would necessarily result in a mistrial.

It is trite law that a decision-maker must not favour the position of one side or another, and in hearing a matter and making his or her decision must keep an open mind as to the positions advocated by both the parties.

This common sense principle was further elaborated by Lord Denning in Metropolitan Properties:

> There must be circumstances from which a reasonable man would think it likely or probable that the justice, or chairman, as the case may be, would, or did, favour one side unfairly at the expense of the other. The court will not inquire whether he did, in fact, favour one side unfairly. Suffice it that reasonable people might think he did. The reason is plain enough. Justice must be rooted in confidence: and confidence is destroyed when right-minded people go away thinking: "The judge was biased."[4]

In Canada, the Supreme Court has also examined the principles raised by an allegation of bias. Bastarache J. stated in Arsenault-Cameron v. Prince Edward Island[5]:

> ... True impartiality does not require that the judge have no sympathies or opinions; it requires that the judge nevertheless be free to entertain and act upon different points of view with an open mind.

As also noted in Authorson,[6] a request for recusal must be timely. Mrs. S has suggested that in the context of this hearing, the request for recusal is not timely. Mr. Grossman believes otherwise, pointing to the gravity of the situation and the need for serious consideration before bringing such a motion.

Although unsupported by any direct evidence as to this aspect, Mr. Grossman claims that steps were underway well before the formal request was made to bring a recusal motion, and that only the need to take due consideration delayed initiating this procedure.

The rationale for timeliness was outlined by the Supreme Court in Curragh:

> The contrary view runs counter to the rule of law and the practical functioning of our judicial system. For example, if this view were to hold, parties perceiving bias could lie in the weeds and long after the trial judge rules against them, have the entire proceeding invalidated ab initio. A party who was not prejudiced by the bias could move to have the proceedings and verdict set aside on the ground of nullity. Persons affected by a court order would look to see whether there is some bias on which the Judge's jurisdiction could be impugned and decide accordingly whether to obey the order or not.[7]

As noted, Mrs. S attaches some importance to what may just be a coincidence of timing. [8] Allstate's first communication on the recusal issue came immediately after I released my ruling denying Allstate's request to waive the time limit for an expert report and to admit Dr. Brigham's report on catastrophic impairment. While I admit that the coincidence of timing is certainly suggestive of an ulterior motive behind the recusal request, I accept Mr. Grossman's word as an officer of the court that neither he nor Allstate had any such ulterior motive.

I would prefer, in any event, to analyze the allegations of potential bias or appearance of bias on the grounds put forward by Allstate, since it must be admitted that even a finding of improper purpose, or lack of timeliness by a party bringing a motion would not preclude a finding of actual bias on the part of an adjudicator.

Mr. Grossman has cited my decision in Webber[9] as standing for the assertion that as a matter of principle, settlement discussions and the hearing process cannot co-exist. In that case, it was alleged that critical details of the settlement position and a party's evaluation of its own case might have been inadvertently disclosed to the arbitrator by that party. Such is not the case here.

Settlement offers, it should be remembered, are part and parcel of the accident benefit scheme. Every arbitration goes through settlement discussions as part of normal procedure at the Commission. Everyone, including the arbitrator, is in a position to surmise that settlement offers were made and rejected on virtually every file that goes to arbitration.

Nor is there any magic in the mere mention of settlement numbers. Indeed, section 281(3) of the Insurance Act provides for the insurer to pay benefits pending arbitration on the basis of their last settlement offer.[10] In such cases, the existence and value of a settlement offer can hardly be a secret once evidence as to the quantum of the benefit claimed by the insured or the repayment requested by the insurer has been tendered.[11]

I do not accept that the necessary outcome of a mention of settlement offers in itself must always be a mistrial and the recommencement of the arbitration process. Rather, the outcome is fact dependent, based on the nature of the prejudice caused by such statements, the nature of the legal process, and the possibility that safeguards can be erected to prevent any possibility of a miscarriage of justice.

Arbitration is not a jury trial. Much of the jurisprudence surrounding mistrials arose from the perceived need to avoid the possibility of lay jurors making decisions based on extraneous criteria, or having their decision-making capability impaired by the disclosure of inappropriate or scandalous information, with the aim of avoiding a miscarriage of justice.[12]

I am not convinced that even if the amount of a settlement proposal was inadvertently disclosed during this arbitration process that prejudice to Allstate and a miscarriage of justice would necessarily result from a continuation of the hearing process.

The arbitration process, in addition to being less formal and more efficient, is also necessarily more robust. While a jury might well be tainted by a reference to insurance or influenced by irregularities, an arbitrator, as a professional adjudicator, is alert to the need to direct his or her attention only to the relevant facts, and to exclude extraneous considerations.

One such “extraneous consideration” might well be Mr. Grossman’s concern that I might possibly be influenced by having witnessed the behavior of a party, outside of the formal hearing, the effect of which, either consciously or unconsciously I would consider when evaluating Mrs. S’s claim for catastrophic impairment.

While I do not accept that Mr. Grossman’s fears in this regard are credible, the British Columbia Supreme Court in McQueen’s Boat Works [13] has suggested that an arbitrator may well consider direct demonstrative evidence outside of the hearing room (in this case inspecting damaged fiberglass panels during a “viewing” – damage that may well have gone to the heart of the case in arbitration…) without being irrevocably tainted. It further suggested that where such concerns were raised, it would be appropriate for the opposing party to be given the opportunity to address the “evidence” in cross-examination and in submissions.

Clearly, the arbitration process is somewhat more resilient than imagined by Mr. Grossman. A professional adjudicator or an arbitrator is in a position to weigh the evidence, to disregard improper or irrelevant evidence, and to provide a fair process to all parties.

Just as an arbitrator may hear evidence as part of a voir dire that may not be admitted as evidence in the arbitration, and still be capable of hearing the balance of the substantive dispute, so the mention of information relating to settlement that does not betray a party’s litigation strategy, or its own evaluation of its case, cannot in itself impair partiality. The courts recognize both the common sense and the judicial awareness of arbitrators and professional adjudicators, and have been reluctant to support a finding of mistrial in such cases. Even the disclosure of the details of settlement discussions has been found not to taint an arbitrator.

> The arbitrator, like a trial judge, will receive in evidence relevant background information provided by the parties which will help him/her to understand the issues and decide the dispute. In this case, it cannot be said that the > arbitrator received any information which is unlikely to be provided to him by the parties either through motions or in evidence in support of their case. There was no breach of confidence by the mediator or by the applicant of the sort that would taint the arbitration process.[14]

In this matter, Mr. Grossman has yet to complete his cross-examination of Mrs. S. It is precisely Mrs. S's conduct that is at the heart of Mr. Grossman's concerns. I see no reason that Mrs. S's conduct at the close of the hearing could not form part of Mr. Grossman's ongoing cross-examination.

A claim for catastrophic impairment, such as that put forward by Mrs S in this matter, is a highly technical claim involving a complex rating system and based on expert evidence of disability within the criteria set out by the AMA guides. While an arbitrator certainly has expertise in interpreting legislative criteria as to catastrophic impairment, it would be unusual for any adjudicator to substitute his or her own assessment of disability, based solely on witnessing the behaviour or demeanour of a party in a hearing room setting.

Allstate's speculative suggestion that I might somehow unconsciously use information not on the record in deciding this case does not meet the high threshold for this motion nor satisfy the onus of demonstrating a real likelihood or probability of bias.

Mr. Grossman also takes exception to my actions in remaining in the hearing room after having adjourned the matter due to the ongoing commotion. Arbitrators also sit alone, without the panoply of supporting personnel to be found in a court. If a problem arises during the hearing process, it is the responsibility of the hearing arbitrator to control the process during the hearing and to maintain decorum and security. Although the Statutory Powers Procedure Act ("SPPA")[15] provides for calling on the support of a peace officer to maintain order in a hearing room, this is perhaps the ultimate step in the security continuum.

Security during a hearing is a proper concern for both judges and adjudicators. The SPPA recognizes this need. Even though courts may have more elaborate security protocols, and security resources provided by other branches of government, ultimate responsibility for the activities in the court or hearing rooms lies with the judge or adjudicator. As the Australian Federal Court of Appeal noted in Skuse[16]:

> …Judges, not the Executive or the Legislature, control activities within their Courts. They control the conduct of proceedings within them and the behaviour of those who are before them.

This stems directly from the principle of the independence of the judiciary from the executive and the legislature, an independence that also extends to adjudicators in a court-like system such as arbitration.[17]

Obviously an adjudicator must use his or her powers to control the process sparingly and judiciously. What is proper and judicious depends on the specific circumstances of the case. Threatening, without cause, to find someone in contempt, continually correcting minor defaults in behavior, or consistently interrupting a party or counsel might justifiably give rise to a perception of bias. Such was not the case in this matter.

My recollection of the incident, which appears to coincide with that in the affidavit material file by Allstate, is that during the outburst, Mrs. S uttered what could only be interpreted as threats against certain politicians and others she held responsible for her situation and what she evidently perceived as the unfairness of the accident benefit system.

In addition, during her outburst Mrs. S precipitously took out a bottle of pills with the obvious risk in her agitated state that she might indeed take an overdose of medication.

This was a serious situation, and in the absence of formal security measures, I would have been remiss in my duty towards those in the hearing room, and the arbitration process, if I merely left the room, as advocated by Mr. Grossman, without first ascertaining whether I felt that there was any risk to Mrs. S or others arising from her conduct.

Once I was satisfied that the situation was under control, I left the room and reported my concerns to the administration. In the context of this arbitration, and the highly unusual circumstances that occurred during Mrs. S's cross-examination, that was the appropriate route to take.

It should be remembered that a mistrial, the relief requested by Allstate in this motion, is an extraordinary remedy in the context of an arbitration hearing. It should only be granted if the prejudice to the moving party, once established, cannot be addressed in any other way. Abbey J. commented as follows in an analogous matter:

> No matter which of these approaches is adopted, essentially, as I see it, the Court must weigh all of the circumstances of the particular case and determine whether the disclosure which has been made would likely result in real prejudice such that it would be unjust to continue the trial as presently constituted. [18]

Likewise, Nordheimer J. observed:

> The declaration of a mistrial, like the declaration of a stay, should be granted only as a last resort, in the clearest of cases and where no remedy short of that relief will adequately redress the actual harm occasioned.

None of the other options I have mentioned were explored by the trial judge prior to declaring the mistrial. [19]

Other than perhaps a delay of a few hours to the hearing process, I do not accept that Allstate was irrevocably prejudiced by Mrs. S's outburst.

That is not to say that I find Mrs. S's conduct in any way excusable. She was clearly wrong to behave as she did on June 12, 2008, especially in a formal hearing setting.

I am, however, not convinced that her behaviour, however unacceptable, constituted outright contempt, especially given the description of her outburst as "hysterical."

The proper remedy however for her misconduct, in the context of this arbitration, is in the consideration of an award of costs or expenses, not in an order for a mistrial, which would waste the significant time and effort that has been spent in getting this hearing underway.

When this arbitration is completed Allstate may address the conduct issue as part of its submissions on expenses in this arbitration.

In summary, I do not accept that a reasonable, fully informed person would believe that by possibly hearing a reference to settlement, and remaining in the hearing room until I determined that there appeared to be no risk to the parties or others, I compromised my ability to continue to hear this matter and to impartially adjudicate the issues referred to arbitration.

Nor do I accept that this arbitration process has been so compromised that the only practical alternative is to declare a mistrial.

For the reasons noted above I dismiss the Insurer's motion.

Judges and Courts — Judicial review of Canadian Judicial Council's (CJC) decision to constitute Judicial Conduct Review Panel (Review Panel), Review Panel's conclusion that applicant contravening Judges Act, s. 55 — Applicant, Ontario Superior Court of Justice judge, accepting appointment to position of Interim Dean of law school — Chief Justice granting applicant special leave pursuant to Judges Act, s. 54(1)(a) after obtaining approval from Minister of Justice — Executive Director of CJC of view that in light of Judges Act, ss. 54, 55, general duties, ethical obligations of Judges, acceptance by applicant of Interim Dean role may warrant consideration by Council — Referring matter to Judicial Conduct Committee Vice-Chairperson — Matter referred to Review Panel — Review Panel concluding that leave of absence granted under Judges Act, s. 54 not removing prohibition under s. 55 — Finding applicant breaching ethical obligations, impermissibly using prestige of judicial office — Vice-Chairperson endorsing Review Panel's decision — Whether Review Panel decision reasonable, CJC proceedings procedurally unfair or abuse of process — Review Panel's interpretation of Judges Act, s. 55 unreasonable — "Prohibition" identified by Review Panel not "on judges carrying on extra-judicial activities" but rather on judges engaging "in any occupation or business other than his or her judicial duties" — Review Committee's broad interpretation exhibiting neither justification nor intelligibility — Applicant not breaching s. 55 when accepting appointment — S. 55 not complete ban on judges taking on non-judicial roles — S. 54 allowing for leave from judicial duties for reasons not inconsistent with those duties — Review Panel's decision as to ethical breach by applicant unreasonable — Review Panel failing to examine applicant's conduct on basis of informed public exercising mature judgment — CJC process involving applicant unfair, contrary to interests of justice — Constituting abuse of process — Nothing in record explaining how, on what basis Executive Director concluding that referral to Judicial Conduct Committee in public interest, due administration of justice — Applicant also denied procedural fairness by Executive Director — Not receiving fundamental procedural right to know case to be met — Initial referral to Judicial Conduct Committee failing to accord with CJC procedures — Executive Director raising matter on his own in absence of public complaint — In such circumstances, Executive Director ought to weight conduct against test set out in Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) for conduct worthy of removal from bench, be convinced that conduct could result in such a finding — Here, removal of applicant by Minister of Justice inconceivable — Applications allowed.

These were applications for judicial review of the Canadian Judicial Council's (CJC) decision to constitute a Judicial Conduct Review Panel (Review Panel) and of the Review Panel's conclusion that the applicant contravened section 55 of the Judges Act.

The applicant, an Ontario Superior Court of Justice judge, accepted an appointment as Interim Dean of the Bora Laskin Faculty of Law at Lakehead University (the Law School). After obtaining the approval of the Minister of Justice, the Chief Justice granted the applicant special leave pursuant to paragraph 54(1)(a) of the Judges Act to accept the assignment, subject to certain parameters, including that his role be confined to "academic leadership". The Executive Director of the CJC subsequently wrote to the applicant informing him that "in light of sections 54 and 55 of the Judges Act, and given the general duties and ethical obligations of judges," acceptance of the Interim Dean role "brings me to the view that the situation may warrant consideration by Council." The Chief Justice informed the Executive Director of the CJC that the appointment would attract no remuneration, that the applicant's duties would be restricted to providing only academic leadership, and that he would be insulated from concerns about future litigation. The Executive Director nevertheless referred the matter to the Vice-Chairperson of the Judicial Conduct Committee (Vice-Chairperson). The applicant responded that he did not view section 55 of the Judges Act as a bar to his acceptance of the position at the Law School. The applicant later signed a written agreement setting out the limitations of his appointment with Lakehead University. In August 2018, the Executive Director advised the applicant that the Vice-Chairperson had decided to constitute a review panel in respect of the appointment. The CJC later issued a press release stating that the applicant's decision to become Interim Dean raised some questions about whether such duties were compatible with judicial office. The Vice-Chairperson's reasons for referral rested on his view that the applicant accepted the role without considering the reaction from First Nations chiefs or the potential effect on the prestige of judicial office. Following notice that the matter had been referred to the Review Panel, the applicant advised the Executive Director that he had resigned from his position at the Law School in September 2018 and would return to his judicial duties with the Superior Court of Justice. The Review Panel concluded that section 55 of the Judges Act "requires judges … to confine themselves to their judicial role" and that a leave of absence granted under section 54 does not remove this prohibition. It further found that the applicant had breached an ethical obligation to avoid becoming involved in public controversy, and he had impermissibly used the prestige of judicial office to bolster the Law School, but his conduct was not serious enough to warrant removal from the bench and it therefore decided not to constitute an inquiry committee. The Vice-Chairperson endorsed the decision of the Review Panel and concluded that in light of the applicant's resignation from the position, no further measures were needed. The applicant sought a declaration that he did not contravene section 55 of the Judges Act.

The main issues were whether the decision of the Review Panel was reasonable, and whether the CJC proceedings were procedurally unfair or an abuse of process.

Held, the applications should be allowed.

The interpretation given by the Review Panel to section 55 of the Judges Act was unreasonable. The "prohibition" identified by the Review Panel is set out in clear and explicit terms in the English version. However, the prohibition is not "on judges carrying on extra-judicial activities". Rather, it is on judges engaging "in any occupation or business other than his or her judicial duties". The Review Committee interpreted the phrase "occupation or business" in isolation from its context. Properly read, the phrase says that judicial duties are an occupation or business. By failing to include and examine this critical qualifier in its initial summary of the section, the Review Panel may have engaged in "reverse engineering" to achieve a desired outcome rather than discerning the meaning and legislative intent of the section. In ignoring the context, the Review Panel's reasoning failed to properly apply the modern principle of statutory construction. The Review Panel's conclusion that the phrase "occupation or business" is to be broadly interpreted exhibited neither justification nor intelligibility. It was problematic in several respects, including the failure to consider the entire phrase. When considering the legislative history of section 55, the Review Panel did not address or consider the original wording of the provision. In neither official language do the words of section 55 support the conclusion of the Review Panel that the intent of Parliament was to restrict judges from performing non-remunerative engagements. To the contrary, they are focused on remunerative commercial engagements. When a judge is appointed by Parliament or a Legislature to head a commission or act as an arbitrator, his or her judicial compensation under the Judges Act continues and pursuant to section 57, there is no additional remuneration. However, that does not mean that these exceptional duties are done on a non-remunerative basis. Rather, they are done for the judge's regular remuneration. The Review Panel's reasoning was flawed and led to an unreasonable conclusion on interpretation. The applicant did not breach section 55 of the Judges Act when he accepted the appointment of Interim Dean. There is nothing in the language of section 54 of the Judges Act, suggesting that leaves of absence may not be granted to enable judges to take on responsibilities outside of their judicial duties. This leave provision was not enacted to be used exclusively for absences "such as an illness, a period of recovery from accident or parental leave" as the Review Panel suggested. Leaves under section 54 are not restricted to maternity or parental leaves. Section 55 is not a complete ban on judges taking on non-judicial roles. Parliament's intention was that judges are able to assume non-judicial roles in certain circumstances and section 54 of the Act allows for a leave from judicial duties for a variety of reasons that are not inconsistent with those duties. The decision of the Review Panel as to the ethical breach of the applicant in accepting the appointment was unreasonable and could not stand. The Review Panel failed to examine whether the applicant's conduct unnecessarily exposed him to criticism or attack on the basis of an informed public exercising mature judgment.

The CJC process involving the applicant was unfair to the point that it was contrary to the interests of justice. It was an abuse of process. The CJC disciplinary procedure was misused from the beginning, i.e. when the Executive Director determined that the applicant accepting the appointment to the Law School was a matter that "warrants consideration." There was nothing in the record explaining how and on what basis the Executive Director concluded that his referral to the Judicial Conduct Committee was in the public interest and the due administration of justice. The Executive Director placed no weight on the Minister's approval of the applicant's appointment. The Minister's approval could not reasonably be said to be "unofficial" simply because she did not expressly use the word "approved." In addition to the improper decision of the Executive Director that the matter "warrants consideration" there was evidence in the record that the applicant was also denied procedural fairness by the Executive Director. Specifically, the applicant was not informed of the Executive Director's concerns about the call for him to resign, nor was he provided with any of the "public comments" made in response to statements made by First Nations chiefs, nor those statements. The Executive Director failed to give to the applicant the fundamental procedural right to know the case to be met. If the real concern of the Executive Director was the adverse reaction of some First Nations chiefs to his appointment, then the applicant was entitled to know that and respond to it. Accordingly, the initial referral to the Judicial Conduct Committee by the Executive Director failed to accord with the procedures established by the CJC. It was not a matter that warranted consideration, and the referral was done in a procedurally unfair manner. In raising matters on his own in the absence of any complaint from the public, the Executive Director would be well advised seriously to consider whether to do so. The Executive Director ought to weigh conduct against the test set by the Supreme Court in Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) for conduct worthy of removal from the bench. Although that ultimate decision is not his to make, he ought to be convinced that it could result in such a finding. Here, in light of the approval of the Minister of Justice, removal action by the Minister of Justice was inconceivable.

The declarations sought by the applicant were appropriate. The Court declared that the applicant, in accepting the appointment of Interim Dean, did not breach section 55 of the Judges Act, nor did he breach his judicial ethics.

I. INTRODUCTION

[1] The Honourable Justice Patrick Smith (Justice Smith) is a judge of the Superior Court of Justice of Ontario.

[2] He challenges two decisions of the Canadian Judicial Council (CJC). The first is the August 28, 2018, decision of Québec Superior Court Associate Chief Justice Robert Pidgeon, in his capacity as Vice-Chairperson of the Judicial Conduct Committee (Pidgeon A.C.J.), to constitute a Judicial Conduct Review Panel (Review Panel) (Court File T-1713-18). Second, Justice Smith challenges the November 5, 2018, decision of the Review Panel [Report of the Review Panel constituted by the Canadian Judicial Council regarding the Honourable Patrick Smith] (Court File T-2055-18).

[3] The Review Panel concluded that Justice Smith, in accepting the appointment of Interim Dean (Academic) at Bora Laskin Faculty of Law at Lakehead University (the Law School), contravened section 55 of the Judges Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. J-1 [the Act]. It further found that Justice Smith failed in his “ethical obligations as a judge to avoid involvement in public debate that may unnecessarily expose him to political attack or be inconsistent with the dignity of judicial office.” It recommended that an Inquiry Committee not be constituted, and remitted the matter back to Pidgeon A.C.J. for a decision on the most appropriate way to resolve the matter.

[4] Pidgeon A.C.J., in a letter to Justice Smith dated November 6, 2018 (Letter of Concern), writes that he “fully support[s] the Panel’s reasons and conclusions” and describes the decision to accept the role of Interim Dean as “ill-advised.” As Justice Smith had resigned as Interim Dean (Academic) of the Law School prior to the decision of the Review Panel and had resumed his judicial duties, it was concluded that no further measures were necessary.

[5] In their memoranda and oral submissions, Justice Smith and the CJC focused on the decision of the Review Panel and the subsequent Letter of Concern as they overtook the decision to refer the conduct of Justice Smith to the Review Panel. Likewise, I shall focus on the decision of the Review Panel and the Letter of Concern, except when relevant to the submission of Justice Smith that the CJC proceedings were procedurally unfair and an abuse of process.

[6] The Review Panel decision and this application bring into issue the interpretation of several sections of the Judges Act, which are reproduced in Appendix A.

[7] For the reasons that follow, I conclude that these applications must be allowed. The decision of the Review Panel is not reasonable, and the CJC procedure was applied unfairly to Justice Smith and was an abuse of process. Justice Smith is entitled to a meaningful remedy.

II. BACKGROUND

A. Procedural History

[8] Both applications for judicial review were under case management. By her July 4, 2019 order, the Case Management Judge consolidated these applications. Pursuant to rule 109 of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106 [Rules], leave to intervene was granted to the Canadian Superior Courts Judges Association and the Ontario Superior Court Judges' Association.

[9] The Attorney General of Canada was named as the respondent pursuant to subsection 303(2) [of the Rules]. The Attorney General agrees with Justice Smith that the decision of the Review Panel is unreasonable, and that its interpretation of sections 54 to 56.1 of the Judges Act, as adopted by Pidgeon A.C.J. in the Letter of Concern, is unreasonable.

[10] The Case Management Judge granted the CJC leave to intervene in these applications, restricted to the issue of its jurisdiction. That issue was resolved by the decisions in Girouard v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 FC 865, [2019] 1 F.C.R. 404, appeal dismissed Canadian Judicial Council v. Girouard, 2019 FCA 148, [2019] 3 F.C.R. 503, leave to appeal to the S.C.C. refused December 12, 2019.

[11] In her October 17, 2019 order, the Case Management Judge expanded the scope of the CJC's intervention permitting it to defend its decision on the merits, within the parameters set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Ontario (Energy Board) v. Ontario Power Generation Inc., 2015 SCC 44, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 147.

B. Facts

[12] On April 16, 2018, the Interim President and Vice Chancellor, Lakehead University, wrote to Justice Smith asking him to accept an appointment to the position of Interim Dean of the Law School. The Law School has existed only since 2013. Its mandate is "Aboriginal and Indigenous Law, Natural Resources and Environmental Law, and small firm and Sole Practice." The second permanent dean of the Law School, Angelique EagleWoman, resigned earlier in 2018, alleging institutional racism. In her letter to Justice Smith, the Interim President notes the importance that it "maintain the confidence and support of the Law Society of Ontario, the Federation of Law Societies of Canada, and of our local bar and extended communities." The Interim President explains why he is being asked to take on this interim position:

> We make this urgent request based on your knowledge, skills, and experience as a Judge of the Superior Court of Ontario. In addition, your long standing connections and the respect you garner in the local, provincial and national legal communities, combined with your significant work with Indigenous communities and your important publications focused on Aboriginal Law in Canada, are critical to the ongoing evolution and success of the Faculty of Law.

[13] Justice Smith sits in the Northwest Region and before becoming a judge in 2001, practised law in Thunder Bay for 25 years. He has significant expertise in Aboriginal and Indigenous law. In October 2009, he was appointed to the Specific Claims Tribunal. Justice Smith worked with former judge and current Senator Murray Sinclair, Chair of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, on various judicial education initiatives, including developing and co-chairing a three-day intensive course, sponsored by the National Judicial Institute on Aboriginal Law for judges from across Canada, and creating and updating a Judicial Bench Book on Aboriginal Law. He is often invited by legal organizations to speak on Aboriginal and Indigenous law, and is called upon regularly by judges across Canada to assist with the mediation of land claims and other litigation between First Nations and various levels of government.

[14] Justice Smith informed the Honourable Heather J. Forster Smith, Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Justice (the Chief Justice) of the request from the Law School. In his letter, Justice Smith says, “the affairs at the school are in a crisis.” This characterization of the situation at the Law School is not questioned. He asked for the approval of his Chief Justice and the Minister of Justice to accept this short-term appointment.

[15] The Chief Justice wrote to Minister of Justice, Jody Wilson-Raybould, expressing her support for Justice Smith to accept this role. She notes that this request “would take him outside of his judicial duties in a role that is unprecedented for a judge of our Court.” She also notes that Justice Smith is a supernumerary judge “so the impact may be less than it would in other circumstances, particularly until the fall.” As a supernumerary judge, Justice Smith performs judicial duties for only six months each year. She indicates that this is an exceptional situation and “an opportunity for our Court to respond positively to a number of Truth and Reconciliation Commission recommendations.”

[16] The Chief Justice proposes to grant Justice Smith a leave of up to six months, from June 1, 2018, into November 2018, under the authority given to her in paragraph 54(1)(a) of the Judges Act. She notes that anything beyond that would require an Order in Council.

[17] The Chief Justice writes that Justice Smith appreciates that he can only accept the role “within certain clear parameters” including that his role be confined to “academic leadership.” He would delegate administrative authority over recruitment, financial decisions, and academic appeals to others within the school. Lastly, she observes, “given the restrictions of s. 55 of the Judges Act (which prohibits extra-judicial employment, occupation or business) he could not accept any remuneration from the university.”

> As Chief Justice, you have authority to grant Justice Smith a “special leave” under the Judges Act, for a period up to six months.…

> I have no concerns about your granting Justice Smith a "special leave" from June 2018 to November 2018, as outlined in your letter. In the event that more than six months is required, I will consider any requests for additional leave at the appropriate time. [Emphasis added.]

[19] On April 30, 2018, the Chief Justice granted Justice Smith special leave pursuant to paragraph 54(1)(a) of the Judges Act from June 1, 2018, to accept the assignment of Interim Dean at the Law School, subject to the parameters set out in her letter to the Minister of Justice.

[20] On May 9, 2018, the Executive Director of the CJC, Norman Sabourin, wrote to Justice Smith, with a copy to his Chief Justice. He observed that pursuant to section 4.2 of the Canadian Judicial Council Procedures for the Review of Complaints or Allegations About Federally Appointed Judges (the Review Procedures), in addition to receiving and reviewing complaints, he may "review any other matter involving the conduct of a superior court judge that comes to the attention of the Executive Director and appears to warrant consideration." He further noted that under section 4.3 of the Review Procedures, if he determines that the matter warrants consideration, he "must" refer it to the Judicial Conduct Committee.

[21] With that background, Mr. Sabourin writes in his letter to Justice Smith that media reports indicate that he has accepted to serve as "Dean of Lakehead University (on an interim basis)" and he attaches a CBC web report posted May 3, 2018, entitled "Justice Patrick Smith named interim dean of Lakehead law school." It reports on the departure of former Dean Angelique EagleWoman who on stepping down said, "Systemic issues within the university and challenges to implementing the Bora Laskin Faculty of Law's Aboriginal and Indigenous law mandate have made my continued involvement in the law school untenable." The news report concludes with the reaction of some Indigenous leaders to the situation at the Law School:

> Since then Indigenous leaders representing dozens of First Nations communities across northwestern Ontario called for "immediate change" at Lakehead University. They made several recommendations, including that Lakehead commit to appointing an Indigenous person as EagleWoman's successor, that an independent review examine "all issues and allegations" raised by her and that appropriate measures are subsequently taken.

[22] Mr. Sabourin says, "in light of sections 54 and 55 of the Judges Act, and given the general duties and ethical obligations of judges," acceptance of the Interim Dean role "brings me to the view that the situation may warrant consideration by Council." Prior to reaching any decision, Mr. Sabourin invites Justice Smith's views.

[23] The Chief Justice quickly responds by letter of May 11, 2018, noting that Justice Smith is unable to respond as he is out of the country. She assures Mr. Sabourin that she considered the request "very carefully taking into account the CJC's ethical principles and the Judges Act." She informs him that she obtained assurances that the appointment would attract no remuneration, that Justice Smith's duties would be restricted to providing only academic leadership, and that he would be insulated from concerns about future litigation. Further, she informs Mr. Sabourin that she had sought and obtained approval from the Minister of Justice. She closes her letter with the following:

> I trust that the above clarifies how the matter unfolded and that it was thoroughly considered and approved both by me and the Minister of Justice. As such, I trust that you will agree that any further review of this matter is unwarranted.
> I anticipate that this explanation will satisfy all concerns you may have, but if not, please advise me and we may be able to suggest possible solutions.

[24] This response apparently did not satisfy Mr. Sabourin. He did not accept the invitation of the Chief Justice to contact her; he referred the matter to Pidgeon A.C.J.. On his behalf, Mr. Sabourin requests “more information about the precise scope and nature of the duties”. Justice Smith will undertake at the Law School and asks for his comments on the following:

> * who first contacted you in respect of the proposed appointment as Dean;
> * whether you have been granted leave from your judicial duties and, if so, by whom and on what basis;
>
> * whether, in your view, section 55 of the Judges Act is a bar to a judge engaging in professional activities other than judicial duties, whether remunerated or not;
>
> * whether you intend to engage in any judicial activities while acting as Dean;
>
> * whether there is any possibility of litigation in relation to Lakehead University;
> * whether the public confidence in the judiciary might be undermined by your engaging in the activities you propose at Lakehead University.

[25] Justice Smith responds directly to Pidgeon A.C.J. on May 24, 2018. He points out that the position he was invited to fulfill is not Dean of the Law School, as Mr. Sabourin’s letter states, but Interim Dean. He reiterates that he has been granted a leave of absence from his judicial duties by his Chief Justice who has consulted with the Minister of Justice who has “no concerns” with that.

[26] Justice Smith responds that he does not view section 55 of the Judges Act as a bar to his acceptance of the position at the Law School:

> While I do not believe that this provision creates a blanket ban on engaging in any “professional activities other than judicial duties”, I am hesitant to opine in the abstract on the circumstances in which section 55 prohibits such activities. I am pleased, however, to have the opportunity to provide submissions on whether this provision prohibits my proposed activities as Interim Dean.
> The role of “Interim Dean”, as defined above, does not in my respectful view qualify as an “occupation or business” in which the Legislature intended to prohibit judges from engaging. The Legislature intended to prohibit judges from moonlighting in other roles – particularly remunerative ones – that could undermine their ability to devote themselves fully to their judicial duties.

> Moreover, the role that I intend to play at the Bora Laskin Faculty of Law is not unlike a study leave granted to a judge to reflect, research, or teach at a Canadian Law School, as authorized by the Canadian Judicial Council and the Minister of Justice.
> Further, section 55 must be read in conjunction with section 54, which expressly contemplates that a judge may "be granted a leave of absence from his or her judicial duties." It is necessarily inferred that during a period of leave granted pursuant to section 54, a judge is relieved of the obligation in section 55 to "devote himself or herself exclusively to those judicial duties."
>
> Viewed in this context, as well as in the circumstances in which I would be fulfilling the temporary role of Interim Dean (i.e., during a period of leave pursuant to section 54), I respectfully submit that section 55 does not prohibit taking on this role, as defined above.
> Nevertheless, if this remains a concern for you, I would be open to suggestions on how this role might be more tightly tailored or differently stylized (e.g., "Interim Academic Dean", "Interim Dean/Judge-in-Residence", "Academic Lead" or "Special Academic Advisor") to ensure I do not run afoul of section 55.

[27] Justice Smith says that the restrictions placed on him to providing academic leadership "are intended, in part, to insulate me from concerns about future litigation." Upon his return to judicial duties, he will recuse himself from any matter in which Lakehead University is a party.

[28] Additionally, he expresses his view that public confidence in the judiciary would be enhanced and not undermined by him engaging in the proposed activities at the Law School:

> I share Chief Justice Smith's concerns about the current risk to Lakehead University's Faculty of Law, which includes a real possibility that the Faculty may collapse. I have only accepted to take on the role of Interim Dean in order to try to help the Faculty navigate a period of real crisis. I do not believe the public confidence in the judiciary could be undermined by me providing assistance to the Faculty as proposed. To the contrary; I believe the public confidence in the judiciary would be enhanced by knowing that a judge of the Superior Court is willing and enthusiastic to answer a call to service made by Lakehead University to assist its Faculty of Law through an existential crisis, while also ensuring full compliance with his obligations as a judge. That confidence would only be further enhanced by knowing that the Chief Justice of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice, the federal Minister of Justice, and the Canadian Judicial Council are united in their support of this effort to ensure that a Law Faculty with such important mandates continues to survive and thrive, and to address one of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's Calls to Action in furthering the project of reconciliation. This will contribute to the public perception of the judiciary and the Canadian Judicial Council as relevant and responsive to a crisis in the community. [Emphasis in original.]

[29] The Chief Justice also wrote to Pidgeon A.C.J. on May 28, 2018, repeating her support of Justice Smith accepting the position. Further, she provided a legal opinion from former Ontario Deputy Attorney General Murray Segal who, after outlining the legislative history of and parliamentary intention regarding sections 54 and 55 of the Judges Act concludes that the appointment did not contravene section 55 of the Judges Act:

> In sum, our view is that ss. 54 and 55 of the Judges Act did not prevent Chief Justice H. Smith from granting special leave to Justice P. Smith to act as Acting Dean in a limited capacity, nor do they prevent Justice P. Smith from taking such leave.
> Granting special leave was within Chief Justice H. Smith's power and did not contravene s. 55 of the Judges Act. When leave is granted under s. 54, it must be for a purpose that is consistent with the office of the judge and judicial ethics, and it must be particularly sensitive to the judge's eventual return to the bench. These considerations were apparent in Chief Justice H. Smith's decision to grant leave on carefully designed conditions. Given the plain meaning and history of ss. 54 and 55, the history of judges pursuing roles in academia, and the principles of judicial ethics, granting special leave for Justice P. Smith to take on a closely circumscribed role as Acting Dean did not contravene s. 55. Emphasis added.

[30] In his opinion, Mr. Segal notes, as had Justice Smith, that academic leaves of absence established by the CJC were not viewed as offending the Judges Act or a judge's ethical principles. Further, he points out that there are precedents for a Superior Court justice acting as Dean of a law school. Former Chief Justice Gerald Fauteux was a justice of the Superior Court of Québec while serving as Dean of McGill Law School (1949–1950) and a justice of the Supreme Court of Canada while serving as Dean of Ottawa Law School (1953–1962). Mr. Segal also points out that while a Superior Court judge, Justice Bora Laskin joined the Board of Governors of York University (1967–1970) and was Chair of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

[31] Mr. Segal recommends some additional conditions on Justice Smith's role at the Law School, including that a written agreement be entered into setting out the limitations of his appointment. Justice Smith and Lakehead University signed such a written agreement on May 31, 2018, and it was sent to Pidgeon A.C.J.. His position title was modified to Interim Dean (Academic) to reflect the limitations on his role.

[32] On July 12, 2018, Pidgeon A.C.J. sought further information from Justice Smith on the additional limitations on his role (as recommended in Mr. Segal's opinion), his duties, the written agreement, and the status of the search for a permanent dean. Justice Smith replied on July 17, 2018, stating that the agreement embodied the additional recommended limitations, except the condition that he approach his Chief Justice if there was a change in circumstances or the appearance of controversy. In its place, he confirmed that he had "undertaken to Chief Justice Smith to approach her or her office immediately should circumstances change, or any issues arise which may raise new ethical implications, possibly lead to public controversy, or generally on which I require direction."

[33] Mr. Sabourin notified Justice Smith by telephone on August 20, 2018, that Pigeon A.C.J. decided to constitute a Review Panel in respect of the appointment, and that a press release would be issued by the CJC.

[34] Justice Smith replied on August 23, 2018, providing an update on his duties and the results he had achieved, and asking the CJC not to issue a press release because of the negative effect this would have on the morale and reputation of the Law School. The CJC later issued a Press Release on October 3, 2018 ["Canadian Judicial Council review of a matter involving the Honourable Patrick Smith"], stating, "Specifically, the decision of the Honourable Patrick Smith to become the Interim Dean of the Bora Laskin Law School at Lakehead University raises some questions about whether such duties are compatible with judicial office."

[35] Justice Smith received a letter from the CJC dated August 28, 2018, attaching the reasons for the decision to appoint a Review Panel "in respect of your appointment as Dean [sic] of the Faculty of Law at Lakehead University." Justice Smith was invited "to provide any written comments you may wish to make to the Panel, including on whether or not an Inquiry Committee should be constituted."

[36] The reasons provided by Pidgeon A.C.J. for the referral include his interpretation of the relevant provisions of the Judges Act. However, and contrary to the explanation in the press release, his decision to refer rests on his view that Justice Smith accepted the role "without considering the possible public controversy associated with the reaction from First Nations chiefs and without considering the political environment or the potential effect on the prestige of judicial office."

[37] The reasons for referral [Reasons for the referral of a complaint to a Judicial Conduct Review Panel in the matter of the Honourable Patrick Smith of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice, October 3, 2018], in relevant part, are as follows [at pages 3, 5, 6, 7,10, 11]:

> …. I begin my review by noting that this matter raises a question of interpretation with regard to sections 54, 55 and 56 of the Judges Act. Indeed, Justice Smith and his Chief Justice obtained a legal opinion in this respect (attached), prepared by Mr. Murray Segal, former Deputy Attorney General of Ontario. Mr. Segal provides a broad interpretation of sections 55 and 56 of the Judges Act:
> > The history of s. 55 and its predecessors does not suggest that it was targeted at preventing judges from engaging in unpaid academic pursuits. The history of s. 55 suggests it was aimed at preventing judges from: (1) engaging in paid employment while acting as judges, and thereby neglecting their judicial duties; (2) being involved in commercial enterprises; and (3) being involved in matter of public controversy. [Emphasis added by Pidgeon ACJ.]
>
>
> In my view, a somewhat different interpretation must be given to the provision in question. In my respectful opinion, the question for Council in this matter is whether Justice Patrick Smith's conduct in accepting an appointment as Interim Dean of the Law Faculty potentially contravenes the Judges Act or his ethical obligations as a member of the judiciary.
>
> Section 55 of the Judges Act requires judges to devote themselves exclusively to their judicial duties, and to abstain from businesses and occupations falling outside the judicial sphere. This is confirmed by the legislative history of sections 55, 56 and 56.1 of the Judges Act. Being granted a leave of absence under section 54 of the Judges Act does not permit a judge to take on a business or occupation outside of the judicial sphere (except for acting as a commissioner, arbitrator, adjudicator, referee conciliator or mediator on any commission or on any inquiry, provided certain statutory conditions under section 56 of the Judges Act are met). The meaning of "occupation" should be broadly interpreted to capture all non-judicial activities that interfere with the judicial role, whether due to their onerous or time-consuming nature or given their incompatibility with judicial office.

In addition, it is worth noting that in a decision rendered on 22 June 2015 (attached), regarding a complaint made against an Ontario Court of Appeal judge who had accepted a position as chancellor at Brescia University College, the Chairperson of the Judicial Conduct Committee, the Honourable Michael MacDonald, concluded:

> Chief Justice MacDonald came to the opinion that Justice Gillese's appointment to the Chancellor's post did not place her in a position that is incompatible with her judicial functions. Chief Justice MacDonald took into consideration the strict limitations that were agreed upon by officials from Brescia and by Justice Gillese, as well as her pro-active course of action which included discussions with her Chief Justice to avoid any potential conflict and limit any associated risks. In these specific circumstances, Chief Justice MacDonald agrees with Chief Justice Strathy that Justice Gillese's acceptance of this ceremonial post is not contrary to judicial ethics and may, in fact, be of benefit to the judiciary. [Emphasis added by Pidgeon A.C.J..]

Note that in that case, the Chief Justice of the Ontario Court of Appeal, the Honourable George Strathy, in response to a request from Chief Justice MacDonald regarding the interpretation of sections 55 and 56 of the Judges Act, suggested the following:

> The words "occupation and business" cannot be interpreted to apply to any activity. Otherwise they would prohibit such things as hobbies or personal activities. The words "occupation or business" certainly prohibit judges from engaging in any remunerative employment or business, but they cannot be interpreted to prohibit any unremunerated activity. [Emphasis added.]

After considering the interpretation of the relevant legislative provisions, only one question remains: did Justice Smith err by incorrectly assessing the situation, that is, by erroneously weighing the inherent risks of the situation? [Emphasis added.]

My answer is that he did….

In summary, I am of the view that Justice Patrick Smith engaged in misconduct by accepting a position as Interim Dean without considering the possible public controversy associated with the reaction from chiefs of First Nations and without considering the political environment or the potential effect on the prestige of judicial office.

I had to answer this question bearing in mind that (1) an interim or permanent dean is the public face of a faculty and (2) Justice Smith accepted the appointment while the media attention was underway. In addition, and with respect, it is my opinion that the situation is exacerbated by his erroneous assessment of the risks that will continue to exist at an institution where litigation would surely come before the Court of which he is a member.

I therefore conclude that the matter might be serious enough to warrant the removal of Justice Patrick Smith from office. I accordingly refer the matter to a Review Panel, in keeping with subsection 2(1) of the Canadian Judicial Council Inquiries and Investigations By-Laws, 2015, to decide whether an Inquiry Committee should be constituted in accordance with subsection 63(3) of the Judges Act.

[38] Subsection 2(1) of the Canadian Judicial Council Inquiries and Investigations By-laws, 2015, SOR/2015-203 (the By-laws) provides:

Establishment of Judicial Conduct Review Panel

2 (1) The Chairperson or Vice-Chairperson of the Judicial Conduct Committee, established by the Council in order to consider complaints or allegations made in respect of a judge of a superior court may, if they determine that a complaint or allegation on its face might be serious enough to warrant the removal of the judge, establish a Judicial Conduct Review Panel to decide whether an Inquiry Committee should be constituted in accordance with subsection 63(3) of the Act.

[39] In concluding that the conduct of Justice Smith was contrary to judicial ethics, Pidgeon A.C.J. relies on passages from the CJC's Ethical Principles for Judges (the Ethical Principles), and particularly the following statement under the heading "Impartiality:" "Judges are free to participate in civic, charitable and religious activities subject to the following consideration: … (c) Judges should avoid involvement in causes or organizations that are likely to be engaged in litigation." He also notes section C.9 of the Commentary:

C.9 Several Canadian judges have served as chancellors of universities or dioceses. Others have served on the boards of schools, hospitals or charitable foundations. Such participation may now present risks that did not appear evident in the past. These risks must be carefully weighed. Universities, churches and charitable and service organizations are now involved in litigation and matters of public controversy in ways that were virtually unheard of even in the very recent past. A judge serving as a chancellor of a university or a diocese or as a board member may be placed in an awkward position if the organization should become involved in litigation or matters of public controversy.

[40] The Court notes that Pidgeon A.C.J. does not reference the statement in the Ethical Principles that it is provided for guidance and "does not preclude reasonable disagreements about their application or imply that departures from them warrant disapproval."

[41] I also note that in the referral decision Pidgeon A.C.J. writes [at page 8] that the conditions imposed on Justice Smith in the role of Interim Dean (Academic) "for all intents and purposes would limit his role to a ceremonial one." This suggests that his role was no different from that of Justice Gillese as chancellor of a university.

[42] Justice Smith outlines the duties he performed in this role in a letter to Mr. Sabourin. He says that he delivered an address to graduating students of the Law School; he recommended the installation of a video conference facility to connect academics, elders, jurists, and others with the student body; through his efforts Senator Murray Sinclair delivered a keynote address during a special lecture at the Law School; and his efforts resulted in the engagement with the Aboriginal Advisory Committee regarding the content of Indigenous courses, and the provision of support for and connection with Indigenous students. While these arguably take his role outside a purely ceremonial one, as is noted by Pidgeon A.C.J. elsewhere in his reasons, the content of his role is not examined by the Review Panel in its decision. In my view, his duties as reflected in the record are consistent with the description given by his Chief Justice as one of academic leadership.

[43] Following notice that the matter had been referred to the Review Panel, Justice Smith's counsel wrote to Mr. Sabourin on September 4, 2018, stating that he had resigned his position at the Law School effective September 14, 2018, and would return to his judicial duties with the Superior Court of Justice on the following business day.

[44] On September 14, 2018, counsel for Justice Smith wrote to the CJC requesting that Pidgeon A.C.J. reconsider his decision to refer the matter to the Review Panel. Mr. Sabourin replied on September 19, 2018, that Pidgeon A.C.J. believes he is unable to reconsider his decision and that his function in the matter has concluded, unless and until the Review Panel returns it to him after a conclusion that no Inquiry Committee should be constituted.

[46] On September 24, 2018, Justice Smith commenced his application for judicial review challenging the decision to refer the matter to the Review Panel and refusing to reconsider that decision. He also brought a motion seeking an order staying the Review Panel's consideration of the matter referred to it.

[47] Counsel for Justice Smith together with counsel for the Attorney General on October 1, 2018, wrote to the CJC, asking the Review Panel not to proceed with the review until the stay motion had been decided. The CJC replied that the request had been put before the Chair of the Review Panel. The Panel never responded. The stay motion was adjourned at the request of counsel for Justice Smith and the Attorney General of Canada, and subsequently rescheduled by the Court to a special sitting on November 20, 2018. The CJC was informed of this revised hearing date. Prior to the scheduled motion date, the Review Panel issued its decision, rendering the motion moot.

[48] The Review Panel issued its decision on November 5, 2018. It concluded [at paragraph 47] that section 55 of the Judges Act "requires judges, subject to a limited number of narrow exceptions, to confine themselves to their judicial role" and that a leave of absence granted under section 54 does not remove this prohibition. It further found that, regardless of the interpretation of these sections, Justice Smith breached an ethical obligation to avoid becoming involved in public controversy, and he impermissibly used the prestige of judicial office to bolster the Law School. The Review Panel found that as Justice Smith had no bad behaviour or improper motives, his conduct was not serious enough to warrant removal from the bench and it therefore decided not to constitute an Inquiry Committee.

[49] The matter then returned to Pidgeon A.C.J. [at paragraph 80] to make "a decision on the most appropriate way to resolve this matter." He endorsed the decision of the Review Panel and noted that Justice Smith had resigned from the position and returned to his judicial duties. He concluded that no further measures were needed.

[50] On November 6, 2018, the CJC told two reporters that the Review Panel had reached its decision and that it would be released that day without having so informed Justice Smith or his counsel. The CJC published a press release on its Web site the same day, with a link to the Panel Decision.

III. ISSUES

[51] These applications focus on three issues:

i. whether the decision of the Review Panel decision is reasonable;
ii. whether the CJC proceedings were procedurally unfair or an abuse of process; and
iii. if the applications succeed, what is the appropriate remedy?

IV. ANALYSIS

A. Is the Review Panel Decision Reasonable?

[52] The Review Panel [at paragraph 76] reached two conclusions concerning the conduct of Justice Smith. First, that Justice Smith breached section 55 of the Judges Act. Second, that Justice Smith breached his ethical obligation "to avoid involvement in public debate that may unnecessarily expose him to political attack or be inconsistent with the dignity of judicial office" and he and the Superior Court of Justice, in lending their support to the Law School, put their reputations at risk.

[53] All parties agree, as does the Court, that the standard of review of the Review Panel decision is reasonableness, regardless of whether one is reviewing its interpretation of section 55 of the Judges Act or its finding that Justice Smith breached his ethical obligations.

[54] The Supreme Court of Canada in Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65, 441 D.L.R. (4th) 1 (Vavilov), at paragraph 16, teaches that there is "a presumption that reasonableness is the applicable standard whenever a court reviews administrative decisions." Moreover, it makes it clear at paragraph 115 that "Matters of statutory interpretation are not treated uniquely and, as with other questions of law, may be evaluated on a reasonableness standard."

[55] As the Supreme Court explains at paragraph 87 of Vavilov, "a court conducting a reasonableness review properly considers both the outcome of the decision and the reasoning process that led to that outcome."

[56] In Canada Post Corp. v. Canadian Union of Postal Workers, 2019 SCC 67, 441 D.L.R. (4th) 269, which was issued with Vavilov, the majority at paragraph 31, explains that when conducting a reasonableness review, a court should start with the reasons, looking to see if there is a coherent and rational chain of analysis based on the facts and law:

> A reasonable decision is "one that is based on an internally coherent and rational chain of analysis and that is justified in relation to the facts and law that constrain the decision maker" (Vavilov, at para. 85). Accordingly, when conducting reasonableness review "[a] reviewing court must begin its inquiry into the reasonableness of a decision by examining the reasons provided with 'respectful attention' and seeking to understand the reasoning process followed by the decision maker to arrive at [the] conclusion" (Vavilov, at para. 84, quoting Dunsmuir, at para. 48). The reasons should be read holistically and contextually in order to understand "the basis on which a decision was made" (Vavilov, at para. 97, citing Newfoundland Nurses).

[57] Other helpful guidance from Vavilov, when conducting a reasonableness review, includes the observation at paragraph 105 that a decision "must be justified in relation to the constellation of law and facts that are relevant to the decision." We are told at paragraph 106 that these considerations are many and varied:

> It is unnecessary to catalogue all of the legal or factual considerations that could constrain an administrative decision maker in a particular case. However, in the sections that follow, we discuss a number of elements that will generally be relevant in evaluating whether a given decision is reasonable, namely the governing statutory scheme; other relevant statutory or common law; the principles of statutory interpretation; the evidence before the decision maker and facts of which the decision maker may take notice; the submissions of the parties; the past practices and decisions of the administrative body; and the potential impact of the decision on the individual to whom it applies. These elements are not a checklist for conducting reasonableness review, and they may vary in significance depending on the context. They are offered merely to highlight some elements of the surrounding context that can cause a reviewing court to lose confidence in the outcome reached.

[58] In Vavilov, like the present matter, the decision under review involved the decision maker's interpretation of a statutory provision. The Supreme Court at paragraphs 115 to 124 provides extensive guidance to a reviewing court when reviewing such decisions. The main principles therein on which I rely in reviewing the Review Panel's interpretation of section 55 of the Judges Act, are the following:

1. The proper approach to interpreting a statutory provision, whether done by a court or an administrative decision maker, is the "modern principle" of statutory interpretation, that is, that the words of a statute must be read "'in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament'" (paragraphs 117–118);

2. "[T]he merits of an administrative decision maker's interpretation of a statutory provision must be consistent with the text, context and purpose of the provision." "[T]he usual principles of statutory interpretation apply equally when an administrative decision maker interprets a provision. Where, for example, the words used are 'precise and unequivocal', their ordinary meaning will usually play a more significant role in the interpretive exercise" (paragraph 120); and

3. "[E]ven though the task of a court conducting a reasonableness review is not to perform a de novo analysis or to determine the 'correct' interpretation of a disputed provision, it may sometimes become clear in the course of reviewing a decision that the interplay of text, context and purpose leaves room for a single reasonable interpretation of the statutory provision, or aspect of the statutory provision, that is at issue" [italics in original] (paragraph 124).

[60] Justice Smith takes issue with the claim of the CJC that it has any such constitutional role. He correctly notes that the Federal Court of Appeal has concluded that the investigative power of the CJC is a statutory power and that the only procedure provided for in the constitution for removal of a superior court judge is that set out in subsection 99(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867: See Canadian Judicial Council v. Girouard, 2019 FCA 148, [2019] 3 F.C.R. 503, paragraphs 38–46.

[61] He further notes that the CJC at paragraphs 10, 67, and 87 of its memorandum, contends that it has a constitutional role in judicial discipline delegated to it under the Judges Act, that it is a special body with a special purpose performing the essential constitutional task of determining the boundaries of ethical judicial conduct and judicial independence, and that the composition and constitutional role of the Council demands deference to its assessment of judicial conduct. He submits that in making those submissions, the CJC has clothed itself with a role that does not belong to it. He says that the only constitutional actor in this process is the Minister of Justice, who is responsible for making any address to Parliament under section 99 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[63] I also agree with the submissions of the Attorney General of Canada regarding deference. Although the concept of deference in judicial review continues to have a role, Vavilov, at paragraphs 30 and 31, makes it clear that the previous rationale for the proposition that deference is owed by a reviewing court to the decision maker's relative expertise, no longer holds true:

> While specialized expertise and these other rationales may all be reasons for a legislature to delegate decision-making authority, a reviewing court need not evaluate which of these rationales apply in the case of a particular decision maker in order to determine the standard of review. Instead, in our view, it is the very fact that the legislature has chosen to delegate authority which justifies a default position of reasonableness review.
> We wish to emphasize that because these reasons adopt a presumption of reasonableness as the starting point, expertise is no longer relevant to a determination of the standard of review as it was in the contextual analysis. [Italics in original.]

[64] In summary, as the Supreme Court states at paragraph 58 of Vavilov, "the consideration of expertise is folded into the new starting point adopted in these reasons, namely the presumption of reasonableness review."

[65] The CJC also cites paragraph 49 of Moreau-Bérubé wherein the Supreme Court of Canada writes, “There is no basis upon which one could claim that a single judge sitting in judicial review of a decision of the Council would enjoy a legal or judicial advantage.” With respect, I may not enjoy a legal or judicial advantage to the Review Panel, but neither do I suffer any disadvantage. Indeed, one might ask what advantage the Review Panel has in this matter in light of the Attorney General and two judges’ associations, one of which represents superior court judges across Canada, expressing the view that the Review Panel’s decision is unreasonable. The point surely is that judicial review is not a quantitative analysis, but a qualitative one; one judge is as well placed as several when performing that task.

[66] In any event, Moreau-Bérubé was decided before Vavilov and the Supreme Court of Canada’s “revised framework” for judicial review of administrative decisions. Thus, it must be read with some caution. The comment the CJC relies on is directed at the suggested expertise of the decision maker and that is no longer the separate consideration it once was.

[67] The standard of review applicable to Justice Smith’s claim that the CJC process and resulting decision was procedurally unfair and an abuse of process is not reasonableness. In my view, Vavilov has not changed the law pertaining to procedural fairness; the standard of review remains correctness: Mission Institution v. Khela, 2014 SCC 24, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 502, at paragraph 79; Canada (Citizenship and Immigration) v. Khosa, 2009 SCC 12, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 339, at paragraph 43; and see Garces Caceres v. Canada (Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness), 2020 FC 4, at paragraph 23; Ebrahimshani v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2020 FC 89, at paragraph 12; Ennis v. Canada (Attorney General), 2020 FC 43, at paragraph 18. Whether a particular process was procedurally fair remains “‘eminently variable’, inherently flexible and context-specific”: Vavilov, at paragraph 77. This Court will consider whether the process employed was fair in the specific context of the decision, having regard to the Baker[1] factors: Vavilov, at paragraph 23; Canadian Pacific Railway Company v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 FCA 69, [2019] 1 F.C.R. 121, at paragraphs 40, 54–56.

(1) Section 55 of the Judges Act

[68] I turn first to consider whether the Review Panel’s interpretation of section 55 of the Judges Act is reasonable. Did it read the words of that section “in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament?”

[69] In conducting this exercise it is important to recall that federal statutes are bilingual, in French and in English, and both are equally authoritative. The shared meaning principle stipulates that in cases of discrepancies between the English and French versions of a statute, the meaning common to both versions must be accepted, unless evidence of legislative intent indicates otherwise: R. v. Daoust, 2004 SCC 6, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 217. If the meaning of one version is broader than the other, the narrower version should be adopted: Sandoz Canada Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2014 FC 501 122 C.P.R. (4th) 195.

[70] Section 55 was first enacted in 1905 as section 7 of An Act to amend the Act respecting the Judges of Provincial Courts, S.C. 1905, 4-5 Edward VII, c. 31. The marginal note to section 7 is "Judges restricted to judicial duties / Les juges ne s'occuperont que de leurs fonctions judiciaires" and it reads as follows:

> Judges restricted to judicial duties
> 7. No judge mentioned in this Act shall, either directly or indirectly as director or manager of any corporation, company, or firm, or in any other manner whatever, for himself or for others, engage in any occupation or business other than his judicial duties; but every such judge shall devote himself exclusively to such judicial duties.

[71] This provision is section 33 of the Judges Act, R.S.C. 1906, c. 138, headed "JUDGES NOT TO ENGAGE IN BUSINESS / LES JUGES NE PEUVENT SE LIVRER AUX AFFAIRES" and with a marginal note that reads "No judge to engage in business other than his judicial duties / Les juges doivent se consacrer exclusivement à leurs fonctions judiciaires". It reads as follows:

> No judge to engage in business other than his judicial duties
> 33. No judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or of the Exchequer Court of Canada or of any superior or county court in Canada shall, either directly, or indirectly as director or manager of any corporation, company, or firm, or in any other manner whatever, for himself or others, engage in any occupation or business other than his judicial duties; but every such judge shall devote himself exclusively to such judicial duties.

[72] The heading of sections 55 to 56.1, as they currently read, is "EXTRA-JUDICIAL EMPLOYMENT / FONCTIONS EXTRAJUDICIARES" and the marginal note for section 55 is "Judicial duties exclusively/Incompatibilités". Section 55 reads:

> Judicial duties exclusively
> 55 No judge shall, either directly or indirectly, for himself or herself or others, engage in any occupation or business other than his or her judicial duties, but every judge shall devote himself or herself exclusively to those judicial duties.

[73] The Review Panel at paragraphs 38 and 39 of its decision says of section 55:

> …. Although its wording has been changed periodically, the section has always been comprised of two foundational components:
>
> (a) A prohibition on judges carrying on extra-judicial activities; and
>
> (b) A requirement that judges devote themselves exclusively to their judicial duties.
> The prohibition, and the requirement are set forth in clear and explicit terms in the current version of section 55. [Emphasis added.]

[74] The noted prohibition component on "carrying out extra-judicial activities" is found in the first phrase of the English language version of the section—"No judge shall … engage in any occupation or business other than his or her judicial duties." However, the French language version reads differently. A more literal translation of the French version is that “Judges shall devote themselves to their judicial functions to the exclusion of any other activity.” This does not appear to have the two components noted by the Review Panel. Rather, it is directed only to the second foundational component identified by the Review Panel - a requirement that judges devote themselves exclusively to their judicial duties.

[75] I agree with the Review Panel that the “prohibition” it identifies is set out in clear and explicit terms in the English version. However, the Review Panel does not accurately capture that prohibition in its passage quoted above. The prohibition is not, as it writes [at paragraph 38], “on judges carrying on extra-judicial activities” [emphasis added.] Rather, as the section explicitly states, it is on judges engaging “in any occupation or business other than his or her judicial duties” [emphasis added.]

[76] Although subsequently the Review Panel interprets the phrase “occupation or business” it does so in isolation from its context. The full phrase—“any occupation or business other than his or her judicial duties”—provides an important interpretative context. Properly read, it says that judicial duties are an occupation or business. They are therefore reliable examples of what is meant by the phrase “occupation or business” guiding the reader in how the phrase is to be interpreted. The same holds true if one looks to the French language phrase “à leurs fonctions judicaires à l’exclusion de toute autre activité”.

[77] The failure to include and examine this critical qualifier in its initial summary of the section leads me to wonder whether the Review Panel is engaging in “reverse engineering” to achieve a desired outcome rather than discerning the meaning and legislative intent of the section. The Supreme Court of Canada at paragraph 121 of Vavilov expressly warned against that manner of proceeding. In any event, in ignoring the context, the Review Panel’s reasoning fails to apply properly the modern principle of statutory construction.

[78] When the Review Panel does turn its attention to the phrase “occupation or business” albeit standing alone, it concludes that it is to be broadly interpreted. It reaches that conclusion by looking at the French language equivalent—“activité”—and dictionary definitions of the English language word occupation [at paragraphs 40–41]:

> The prohibition in the English version is expressed in terms of an “occupation or business”, whereas the French version uses the broader term “activité”. The English version, by referring to “occupation or business” may imply that the prohibition is limited to some form of remunerative livelihood, but the French version, by using the broader term, is more explicit in prohibiting any activity other than judicial functions.
> The broader interpretation of the word “occupation” to include non-remunerative pursuits and activities is consistent with various dictionary definitions of the word and with the French version of section 55. [Emphasis added.]

[79] This reasoning exhibits neither justification nor intelligibility. It is problematic in several respects, including the failure to consider the entire phrase as previously discussed.

[80] First, the Review Panel states [at paragraph 41] that the "broader interpretation of the word 'occupation' to include non-remunerative pursuits and activities is consistent with various dictionary definitions of the word" but it does not point to any dictionary definition it relies on. The record contains none, leading me to question whether any were before the Review Panel.

[81] Second, while one use of the English word "occupation" might be said to include non-remunerative activity—such as in the statement "On Saturdays my occupation is chauffeur because every Saturday I drive my son to his football match"—others (and I suggest most) clearly reflect remunerated activities. In response to the question: "What is your occupation?" I daresay the response of four members of the Review Panel would be "Judge"—a paid occupation.

[82] Third, the Review Panel only examines the word "occupation" and ignores the word "business" in section 55. In my view, the plain and clear import when it is said that one is engaging in business is that they are being remunerated.

[83] The view of the Review Panel that section 55 is to be interpreted as prohibiting any activity (remunerated or not) other than judicial functions is not one shared by all. Indeed, as Pidgeon A.C.J. himself noted in his letter referring the matter to the Review Panel, in 2015, the Chief Justice of the Ontario Court of Appeal, the Honourable George Strathy, in response to a request from the Judicial Conduct Committee regarding the interpretation of sections 55 and 56 of the Judges Act, said [reasons for referral, at page 7]:

> The words "occupation and business" cannot be interpreted to apply to any activity. Otherwise they would prohibit such things as hobbies or personal activities. The words "occupation or business" certainly prohibit judges from engaging in any remunerative employment or business, but they cannot be interpreted to prohibit any unremunerated activity. [Emphasis added.]

[84] The Review Panel considers the legislative history of section 55 and, in reference to the opinion of Murray Segal, notes, "some of the remarks during the initial debates in the House of Commons in 1905, including those of Prime Minister Laurier, reflected a concern to restrict the commercial activities of judges." In those debates, the Prime Minister, responding to a question of whether the provision would prevent judges from acting as arbitrators in a reference involving Canada and the Provinces, responded:

> But what parliament intends and what we are all agreed to is that judges should not be allowed to participate in any kind of business which is of a commercial character; they should not be directors of insurance companies or banks or such. But as regards anything of a judicial character, I do not think any one has the intention of preventing the judges from acting. [Emphasis added.]

[85] A statement made by the Prime Minister at the time as to the intent of Parliament and its members ought to be accorded significant weight, if not considered conclusive on the issue of parliamentary intent. However, in response to the Prime Minister's statement, the Review Panel writes [at paragraph 42]:

> …. other members took a broader view. The Minister of Justice, Charles Fitzpatrick (later Chief Justice of Canada) commented that "The less a judge has to do with matters which are not clearly within the scope of his duties, the better for himself and the dignity of the bench."

[86] I agree with the submission of the Attorney General of Canada, that the Review Panel ignores the context in which that statement was made. In extracting a single sentence from its context, the Review Panel gives it a meaning it does not have.

[87] The Minister of Justice had been asked by Mr. Foster whether the provision being debated would prevent judges from "going on commissions." The context discloses that the Minister of Justice was not, as the Review Panel says, stating his preference that judges do nothing outside their judicial duties, rather his comment focuses on judges sitting on minor commissions, as the full report shows:

> Mr. FOSTER. Will that [clause] prevent judges from going on commissions? We know that a good deal of discussion has arisen of late about judges being appointed to commissions at various times. Sometimes these are high matters of interest in which it might be desirable to appoint judges; but in other cases they are minor matters, and the judges are left open to a great deal of criticism and cross currents of opinion, which do not seem to add very much to the dignity of the bench or to the respect in which judges should be held throughout the country. In fact, when you take a judge from the bench and make him commissioner in a matter involving other than legal points, you rather take his robe of dignity from him. He becomes then more like an ordinary individual and becomes subject to criticism to which a judge ought not to be subject. He comes down, so to speak, into the general arena, and stands to get a good deal of dust upon his clothes. I would like to know how far this goes towards preventing judges taking up commissions of the smaller kind and which are outside their judicial functions, or international affairs. I quite agree that on an international commission it may be quite necessary to have judges; but the Minister of Justice will understand what I allude when I say that there are commissions and employments which, when participated in by judges, detract from the general respect to which the bench ought to be held.
> Mr. FITZPATRICK. This amendment to the Act respecting judges will operate as a clear notice that judges are not to be employed in connection with commissions, except where it is important in the public interest that they should be so employed. I think the less a judge has to do with matters which are not clearly within the scope of his judicial duties, the better for himself and the dignity of the bench. Of that I am absolutely convinced. I would even go so far as to say that I entertain grave doubts as to the constitutionality of such appointments. That question arose in Parliament when it was decided by the British Parliament to refer matters arising out of contested elections to the courts. When the courts were first charged with the duties investigating such matters, Chief Justice Cockburn wrote a strong letter of protest from the constitutional standpoint. That protest was of no avail, but nevertheless it showed that there was considerable doubt as to the right of the judges to sit in such matters. There are cases, however, where it is in the public interest that we should utilize the service of the judges outside the bench, but only in matters of urgent public necessity.

[88] The Attorney General of Canada also references Bill 13 in 1906, which proposed further amendments to the section. It was introduced, but failed to receive Royal Assent. Importantly, and not referenced by the Review Panel, there was further discussion "providing additional insight into the intention of Parliament." Specifically, there was reference to the ability of a judge to teach in a law school, notwithstanding the restrictions set out in the Judges Act. The same Minister of Justice, Mr. Fitzpatrick, was asked whether "the law of last year excludes also the teaching in universities." The Minister responded that it did not prohibit teaching:

> No. I would be disposed, myself, to think, and I was acting upon that supposition, that those who are engaged in the teaching of the law in connection with our universities would not come within the law of last session. I think that must fairly be considered as in line with the performance of their professional work and I expressed that opinion, I think, last session when the Act was passed. [Emphasis added.]

I will add that it is my experience that judges are not remunerated when asked to teach in law schools.

[89] When considering the legislative history of section 55, the Review Panel does not address or consider the original wording of the provision. The English language version reads, "No judge … shall, either directly or indirectly as director or manager of any corporation, company, or firm, or in any other manner whatever … engage in any occupation or business other than his judicial duties ". The French language version reads, "Aucun juge … ne peut se livrer ni directement ni indirectement, en qualité de directeur ou gérant de corporation, de compagnie ou de maison d'affaires, non plus qu'en aucune autre manière … à une occupation ou affaire autre que ses fonctions judiciaires."

[90] In neither language do these words support the conclusion of the Review Panel that the intent of Parliament was to restrict judges from performing non-remunerative engagements. To the contrary, they are focused on remunerative commercial engagements.

[91] At paragraph 43 of its decision, the Review Panel asserts that the legislated exceptions to the general prohibition in section 55 reinforces the broader interpretation it has given to section 55:

> Furthermore, the broader interpretation of the word "occupation" to include non-remunerative pursuits and activities is reinforced by the narrow and specific exceptions to the general prohibition in section 55.

[92] It states that the narrow and specific exceptions are those set out in sections 56 and 56.1 of the Judges Act; namely, (1) a judge acting in a specific dispute resolution capacity when expressly authorized by an Act of Parliament or a Provincial Legislature, or the Governor in Council or lieutenant governor in council of a province, (2) a judge acting as an arbitrator or assessor of compensation or damages under a public Act of Canada or a province, and (3) Madam Justice Arbour serving as Prosecutor of the United Nations International Tribunal.

[93] The Review Panel [at paragraph 41] provides no reason or explanation why these exceptions provide support for its "broader interpretation of the word 'occupation' to include 'non-remunerative' pursuits and activities". Indeed, it is not obvious or evident how these exceptions support the view of the Review Panel. Its reasoning is unintelligible.

[94] It is to be noted that none of these exceptions is stated to be on a non-remunerated basis. When a judge is appointed by Parliament or a Legislature to head a commission or act as an arbitrator, his or her judicial compensation under the Judges Act continues and pursuant to section 57, there is no additional remuneration. However, in my view, that does not mean that these exceptional duties are done on a non-remunerative basis. Rather, they are done for the judge's regular remuneration. The remuneration received when performing these exceptional duties cannot be said to be remuneration for judicial duties, as the judge is not performing his judicial duties when acting as a commissioner or arbitrator. Even if it were otherwise, the exception regarding Justice Louise Arbour in section 56.1 expressly provides that she may elect to receive a leave of absence to accept the position offered by the United Nations without receiving her judge's pay if she receives remuneration from the United Nations. In fact, the record shows that the United Nations insisted that she not be remunerated as a judge but that it pay her. In her circumstance, one of the exceptions the Review Panel relies on to support its interpretation, it is without doubt that the exception to judicial duties is remunerated. Accordingly, it cannot be said to support the interpretation given by the Review Panel.

[95] For these reasons, I find that the analysis of the Review Panel, the manner in which it reaches its interpretation of section 55, is not in keeping with the modern principle of interpretation. The Review Panel, in its analysis, fails to read the words of the section "in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament." Specifically, it ignores some words; it fails to properly consider the legislative history of the provision; it fails to properly consider the context in which the provision is found; and it fails to properly consider all of the evidence of Parliamentary intention. As such, the reasoning is flawed and leads to an unreasonable conclusion on interpretation.

> In summary, section 55 of the Judges Act contains a prohibition on judges carrying on extra-judicial activities and a requirement that judges devote themselves exclusively to their judicial functions. In circumstances in which Parliament is of the view that there is a sufficiently important public goal to justify judges engaging in other activities, it has legislated specific, narrowly defined exceptions.
>
> Accordingly, the Review Panel has concluded that:
>
> (a) Section 55 requires judges, subject to a limited number of narrow exceptions, to confine themselves to their judicial role, and
>
> (b) Subject to those exceptions, judges are prohibited from engaging in any other occupation, whether paid or unpaid.
> The above-noted conclusions are consistent with the objectives of maintaining judicial independence and the preservation of the dignity and respect associated with the judicial office. Section 55 of the Judges Act is also intended to promote the efficient administration of justice and to uphold the dignity and integrity of the judiciary by restricting judges, except in very limited circumstances, to performing judicial functions. [Emphasis added.]

[97] The Review Panel [at paragraph 47] does not explain what it means by “any other occupation, whether paid or unpaid” but at paragraph 43 it describes its “broader” interpretation of the word “occupation” to include “non-remunerative pursuits and activities” (emphasis added).

[98] Counsel for the CJC, in its memorandum, says that the interpretation the Review Panel gives to section 55 is that it is “to prohibit judges from devoting their ‘productive time’ to vocations other than judging, such that they will work as judges” (emphasis added). In my view, counsel’s characterization does not reflect the interpretation given the section by the Review Panel. Nowhere in its decision does the Review Panel use the phrase “productive time” or the word “vocation.”

[99] It is unclear what legal counsel means by “productive time.” Other than time when sleeping, it is arguable that all of one’s time is productive time. As I pointed out at the hearing, my experience is that judging is not a 9 am to 5 pm, five days a week job. Judges, like lawyers and many others, work days, nights, and weekends.

[101] This question and these examples illustrate the unreasonableness of the outcome of the Review Panel’s interpretation. Its interpretation restricts judges from all non-judicial activities or pursuits, other than the narrow exceptions in sections 56 and 56.1 of the Act.

(2) The Impact of a Section 54 Leave of Absence on Section 55

[103] After interpreting section 55, the Review Panel turns to section 54 of the Judges Act and the impact a leave of absence granted thereunder may have on a judge’s obligations under section 55.

[104] The Review Panel sees a leave of absence granted under section 54 as relieving a judge from the obligation in section 55 to “devote himself or herself exclusively to those judicial duties” but finds that it does not affect the prohibition in that section on carrying out extra-judicial duties. It finds that section 54 does not permit a judge, while on a leave of absence, taking up extra-judicial activities. In support of that interpretation, the Review Panel relies on (1) its interpretation of section 55 (which I have found to be unreasonable), and (2) the language of section 54. It writes at paragraph 51 of its decision:

> There is nothing in the language of section 54 of the Judges Act, to suggest that leaves of absence properly granted and with proper notices issued, may be granted to enable judges to take on responsibilities outside of the judicial sphere.

[105] I begin by noting that there is nothing in the language of section 54 of the Judges Act, suggesting that such leaves of absence may not be granted to enable judges to take on responsibilities outside of their judicial duties. Indeed, as noted by Justice Smith, that has previously happened and with the approval of the CJC:

> In Canada, the Council's Study Leave Program has permitted judges to take academic leaves longer than six months to engage in teaching, talks with faculty, curriculum development, organizing conferences, guest lectures, and both formal; and informal discussions with students.

[106] The Review Panel provides no review of the legislative history of section 54, nor does any analysis of parliamentary intent. The Attorney General of Canada provides a very informative history of section 54 that supports an interpretation different from that provided by the Review Panel of both sections 54 and 55.

[107] The leave of absence provisions in section 54 were introduced in 1946, in a slightly different wording than at present. Section 34 of The Judges Act, 1946, [S.C. 1946] 10 George VI, c. 56 provides that no judge is to be granted a leave of absence from judicial duties for a period in excess of 30 days without the approval of the Governor in Council. If a judge were absent for a period in excess of 30 days without that approval, the judge and the Chief Justice are to inform the Minister of Justice.

[108] A reading of the Parliamentary debates confirms the submission of the Attorney General of Canada at paragraphs 42 and 43 of his memorandum, reproduced below, that this leave provision was not enacted to be used exclusively for absences "such as an illness, a period of recovery from accident or parental leave" as the Review Panel suggests at paragraph 49 of its decision:

> In enacting this provision, a concern was raised during the debates that some judges had been absent from the bench for several months without having obtained any sort of permission for a leave of absence. The Minister of Justice stated, "I think the clause does indicate, if it is passed by parliament, that parliament wants the Minister of Justice to see to it that gentlemen who are absent without leave are not paid."
> There is no indication here that this provision was enacted to be used exclusively for circumstances of disability or parental leave. Rather, the rationale for the provision was to ensure that judges were not being paid when they were absent from the bench, for any reason.

[109] In 1996, the section was amended to create the current system. Leaves of six months or less can be granted by a chief justice but a longer leave requires approval from the Governor in Council. The debates indicate that the revision was recommended:

> … by the 1992 Triennial Commission on Judges' Salaries and Benefits and endorsed by the Canadian Judicial Council. It allows a judge to request maternity or parental leave without having to seek cabinet approval.

[110] I agree with the Attorney General of Canada that leaves under section 54 are not restricted to maternity or parental leaves. The reference above to those purposes was to illustrate and support the expansion of the leave period from 30 days to 6 months. Evidence of that is the statement then Justice Minister Rock gave to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs when it was considering the amendment to the Judges Act relating to Justice Louise Arbour [Proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, 35th Parl., 2nd Sess., Issue No. 29 (October 3, 1996)]. He stated, "It might be noted that the Judges Act already provides for judges to be granted leaves of absence in order to perform non-judicial duties, such as serving as commissioners of inquiry … or to assist foreign countries developing codes of human rights" (emphasis added). While the first exception is provided for in section 56, the second exception is not. Later, the Minister of Justice describes the parameters of leaves other than for personal reasons:

> [Mr. Rock:] Second, while [judges] are there they should only be doing the work of judges and not working on the side for businesses or in some other fashion. While that is an important principle, the Judges Act itself already contemplates exceptions. As I mentioned in my opening remarks, a judge might be appointed to chair a commission of inquiry or to arbitrate a dispute. That goes on all the time. It is a necessary adjunct to a judge's life.
> Senator Beaudoin: We agree entirely.
> Mr. Rock: What I am suggesting, senator, is that it is consistent with section 56. It grows out of the same notion that we would permit a sitting judge to leave her duties for a stated period to go on an international organization and fulfil a worthy endeavour. That is not inconsistent with her judicial role. [Emphasis added.]

[111] The Attorney General concludes with his submission as to the proper interpretation of section 55:

> This legislative history demonstrates that Parliament did not intend for section 55 of the Act to act as a complete ban on judges taking on non-judicial roles. Section 55 instead functions to prohibit judges from taking on employment in a commercial, private, or political capacity that could call into question their judicial independence or otherwise threaten public confidence in their integrity or impartiality. The record consistently reiterates that judges should remain able to assume non-judicial roles in certain circumstances, particularly when that role serves an important public purpose. Additionally, the legislative record demonstrates that section 54 of the Act is to be read together with sections 55-57 and allows for a leave from judicial duties for a variety of reasons, including to assume a non-judicial role, as long as that role would not otherwise conflict with his or her eventual return to the bench.

[112] I agree (1) that section 55 of the Act is not a complete ban on judges taking on non-judicial roles; (2) that Parliament's intention was that judges are able to assume non-judicial roles in certain circumstances; and (3) that section 54 of the Act allows for a leave from judicial duties for a variety of reasons that are not inconsistent with the judge's judicial duties.

[113] I further agree that section 55, interpreted using the modern principle of interpretation, provides that a judge cannot assume employment in a commercial, private, or political capacity as that could call into question their judicial independence or threaten public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judge and the judiciary. These are inconsistent with his or her judicial duties. It is a matter for the chief justice or Minister of Justice to determine whether a leave request under section 54 warrants being granted. It is expected that they will consider whether the purpose of the leave serves an important public purpose and whether it could call into question their judicial independence or otherwise threaten public confidence in their integrity or impartiality. However, these requirements cannot be read into section 55.

[114] Collectively, the three findings set out above at paragraph 112 result in the conclusion that Justice Smith did not breach section 55 of the Judges Act when, on a leave of absence granted by his Chief Justice and approved by the Minister of Justice, he accepted the appointment of Interim Dean (Academic) of the Law School.

(3) Ethical Obligations

[115] I turn next to the Review Panel finding that Justice Smith breached his ethical duties. It writes [at paragraph 76]:

> (d) Regardless of the interpretation ascribed to sections 54 to 56.1 of the Judges Act, Justice Smith has an ethical obligation as a judge to avoid involvement in public debate that may unnecessarily expose him to political attack or be inconsistent with the dignity of judicial office. There were also reputational risks to Justice Smith and to the Ontario Court of Justice associated with lending their support to the Faculty of Law at Lakehead during a time of crisis.

[116] In so concluding, the Review Panel considered the Ethical Principles and the past circumstances of Justice Fauteux serving as Dean of two separate law schools, and Justice Gillese occupying the position of university Chancellor.

[117] With respect to Justice Fauteux, the Review Panel [at paragraph 61] says only "that societal norms are shifting, and that it is much more likely in the present day that individuals assuming leadership roles within universities will be required to deal with controversial and highly public topical issues, than was formerly the case." Even if the Review Panel had any evidence that universities in the 1960s dealt with fewer controversial and highly public topical issues than today (and none is in the record), the Review Panel fails to note that unlike Justice Fauteux, Justice Smith's deanship was limited to academic matters —an area that can hardly be said to be a wellspring of "controversial and highly public topical issues".

[118] With respect to Justice Gillese, the Review Panel notes [at paragraph 62] that the CJC agreed to her appointment as Chancellor because "of the strict limitations" agreed to by the university and the judge, and because "of the ceremonial nature of the post." This fails to reference the view of Pidgeon A.C.J. that the limitations agreed to by Justice Smith and the Law School limited his role to a ceremonial one. As to the conditions, it writes [at paragraph 74], "the use of such conditions may be an imperfect attempt to address unknowable contingencies arising in a dynamic environment". Nonetheless, significant conditions were agreed upon that removed Justice Smith from the administration of the Law School and the university. Most importantly, he had undertaken to inform and seek guidance from his Chief Justice if circumstances changed or "any issues arise which may raise new ethical implications, or [possibly] lead to public controversy" [at paragraph 72]. A condition not mentioned by the Review Panel.

[119] Moreover, and critically, his acceptance of the Interim Dean (Academic) role with these conditions was approved by his Chief Justice. If his decision was ill-advised, what does that say of the decisions of his Chief Justice and the Minister of Justice?

[120] The role of his Chief Justice both in terms of consenting to the appointment and her subsequent role should any public controversy arise was worthy of consideration and weight. In Ruffo v. Conseil de la magistrature, 1995 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 267, at paragraph 59, Justice Gonthier for the majority, notes the important role a chief justice plays in ethical decisions:

> We must recognize that the chief judge, as primus inter pares in the court, the efficient operation of which he or she oversees in all other respects, is in a preferred position to ensure compliance with judicial ethics. First, because of the chief judge's role as co-ordinator, events that may raise ethical issues are more readily brought to his or her attention. As well, because of the chief judge's status, he or she is often the best situated to deal with such delicate matters, thereby relieving the other judges of the court of the difficult task of laying a complaint against one of their colleagues where necessary. In short, the power to lay a complaint is an intrinsic part of the chief judge's responsibility in this area and it would not be fitting for the chief judge to act through someone else, whether a judge or a person outside the judiciary, to fulfil his or her obligations in this regard.

[121] The underpinning for the conclusion the Review Panel reaches on its consideration of the judicial ethics question is: (1) media reports that the former Dean had threatened litigation; (2) the possibility of litigation should the Law Society of Ontario remove the Law School's accreditation; (3) "extensive" media reports "which included allegations of a failure on the part of Lakehead to fulfill the Faculty of Law's Indigenous mandate and some criticism of Justice Smith's appointment from Indigenous leaders" [at paragraph 27]; and (4) that prior to accepting the appointment, the CJC Executive Director informed Justice Smith that it could be a matter for the CJC's consideration.

[122] As to the first two of these, although any litigation by the former Dean would come before the Superior Court, Justice Smith had already and appropriately indicated that he would recuse himself from any litigation in his Court relating to the University. This removes all possibility that he would be in a conflict of interest, or even appear to be in one, should litigation arise. This is equally true if a decision on accreditation were challenged before the Divisional Court. Justice Abella in Yukon Francophone School Board, Education Area #23 v. Yukon (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 25, [2015] 2 S.C.R. 282 (Yukon), at paragraph 59 noted the absence of restrictions on judges' associations when there is little likelihood of potential conflict:

> While I fully acknowledge the importance of judges avoiding affiliations with certain organizations, such as advocacy or political groups, judges should not be required to immunize themselves from participation in community service where there is little likelihood of potential conflicts of interest.

[123] Should the former Dean sue the Law School, it is extremely unlikely that she or any reasonably informed person would think her suit could be influenced by Justice Smith's involvement with the Law School. She is a lawyer and knows otherwise. Moreover, her taking legal action was not a certainty when the Review Panel report issued.

[124] The Review Panel's consideration of litigation regarding the accreditation of the Law School is entirely speculative and unworthy of its consideration. Again, both the Law School and the Law Society of Ontario being well informed of judicial matters would be extremely unlikely to have any concern if Justice Smith accepted the appointment and recused himself from such litigation.

[125] At paragraph 60 of Yukon, Justice Abella considers the Ethical Principles and observes that they "advise that while judges should clearly exercise common sense about joining organizations, they are not prohibited from continuing to serve their communities outside their judicial role" (emphasis added). Moreover, she wisely observes at paragraph 61, "We expect a degree of mature judgment on the part of an informed public which recognizes that not everything a judge does or joins predetermines how he or she will judge a case." The decision of the Review Panel, in my assessment, in examining whether Justice Smith's conduct unnecessarily exposed him to criticism or attack, fails to do so on the basis of an informed public exercising mature judgment.

[126] The Review Panel [at paragraph 27] exaggerates when it writes of the "extensive" media coverage generated by Justice Smith's appointment. There was some coverage; however, most of the media coverage was directed to the University and the resignation of the Dean. There was very little directed to Justice Smith's interim appointment and even the Review Panel describes it as "arguably unfounded" [at paragraph 64]. Moreover, as is noted by Pidgeon A.C.J. in his referral decision, following a meeting between a First Nations advisory committee and the university on May 10, 2018, "no public comments were made subsequently."

[127] I agree entirely with the submission of the Canadian Superior Courts Judges Association at paragraph 49 of its memorandum of argument that “CJC’s response to Justice Smith’s acceptance of the appointment resulted in a torrent of public criticism, not of Justice Smith or his conduct, but of the CJC itself.” This criticism from judges, lawyers, and the public directed to the CJC’s conduct far outweighs and is more damning than the sparse coverage directed to Justice Smith.

[128] As to the Review Panel relying on Justice Smith having received the letter from the Executive Director of the CJC as a fact underpinning its decision, I concur with the submission of The Canadian Superior Courts Judges Association that the letter “raised particularized concerns” and must be considered against the backdrop of the consent of the Chief Justice and the Minister of Justice. As it submits “the CJC’s Executive Director has no status or authority to advise judges on ethical matters and it would raise significant constitutional issues if he did.”

[129] The CJC submits, “Judicial ethics prohibit the prestige of judicial office from being used to bolster the reputation, status or public confidence in extra-judicial organizations.” The Ethical Principles do not make that broad statement. Section C.1 under Statement 6 dealing with impartiality provides that while judges are free to participate in “civic, charitable and religious activities” they “should not solicit funds … or lend the prestige of judicial office to such solicitations.” The commentary to that section repeats the same in C.6. C.10 speaks of using the prestige of judicial office to advance a person’s private interests.

[130] The association of a judge with any extra-judicial organization will, to some degree, bolster its reputation, status and public confidence. It is for precisely that reason that law schools seek to have judges teach. I daresay it was also for such reason that McGill and Ottawa Law School sought out Justice Fauteux as their Dean, and Brescia University College sought out Justice Gillese as its Chancellor. If that were the test, then no judge could ever join or participate in any extra-judicial civic, religious, or charitable organization.

[131] For these reasons, I find the decision of the Review Panel as to the ethical breach of Justice Smith in accepting this appointment to be unreasonable and it cannot stand.

B. Were the Proceedings Procedurally Unfair Amounting to an Abuse of Process?

[132] Counsel for Justice Smith submits that the CJC’s “treatment of Justice Smith’s case from its inception has been unfair and oppressive, such that it is an abuse of the Council’s process.”

[133] The Supreme Court of Canada in Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307, at paragraph 120, held that it is an abuse of process where an administrative proceeding has been conducted so unfairly that it is contrary to the interests of justice:

> In order to find an abuse of process, the court must be satisfied that, "the damage to the public interest in the fairness of the administrative process should the proceeding go ahead would exceed the harm to the public interest in the enforcement of the legislation if the proceedings were halted" (Brown and Evans, supra, at p. 9-68). According to L'Heureux-Dubé J. in Power, supra, at p. 616, "abuse of process" has been characterized in the jurisprudence as a process tainted to such a degree that it amounts to one of the clearest of cases. In my opinion, this would apply equally to abuse of process in administrative proceedings. For there to be abuse of process, the proceedings must, in the words of L'Heureux-Dubé J., be "unfair to the point that they are contrary to the interests of justice" (p. 616). "Cases of this nature will be extremely rare" (Power, supra, at p. 616). In the administrative context, there may be abuse of process where conduct is equally oppressive.

[134] The judicial conduct review process established by the CJC is ultimately directed to the possible removal of a judge because of conduct. In Therrien (Re), 2001 SCC 35, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 3, at paragraph 147, the Supreme Court describes the severity of conduct that warrants removal:

> …. before making a recommendation that a judge be removed, the question to be asked is whether the conduct for which he or she is blamed is so manifestly and totally contrary to the impartiality, integrity and independence of the judiciary that the confidence of individuals appearing before the judge, or of the public in its justice system, would be undermined, rendering the judge incapable of performing the duties of his office. [Emphasis added.]

[135] When analyzing whether the process of the CJC regarding the conduct of Justice Smith was so unfair as to constitute an abuse of process, this high standard should be kept in mind because, as is discussed below, the referral to the Review Panel can only be done if it is determined that the conduct may be serious enough to warrant removal from office.

[136] The submission of Justice Smith is that on the facts of this matter, the CJC misused its disciplinary procedure in a manner that is excessive and unreasonable, putting Justice Smith's livelihood and reputation at risk, causing him prejudice, and eroding public confidence in the judiciary and the fairness of the CJC's process. This is a serious allegation; however, on the record before me, I find that the CJC did misuse its disciplinary procedure in a manner that is excessive and unreasonable.

[137] I find that the CJC disciplinary procedure was misused from the beginning —when the Executive Director determined that Justice Smith accepting the appointment to the Law School was a matter that "warrants consideration."

[138] Subject to my comments below at paragraphs 171 to 175, I take no issue with the Executive Director, on May 9, 2018, writing to Justice Smith, informing him that this appointment has come to his attention and that under section 4.2 of the Review Procedures, it appears to him to be a matter that may warrant consideration. Although he references "Media reports", he attaches only one, a CBC web post that reports that Justice Smith has accepted the appointment.

[139] The Court notes that there is nothing in that attached report that criticises Justice Smith's conduct in accepting the position, nor is anything reported that is critical of the Law School appointing him on an interim basis. One part of the report sets out the position of some indigenous leaders about the conduct of the Law School, but this report does not show any objection by it to this appointment or to Justice Smith:

> Since then indigenous leaders representing dozens of First Nations communities across northwestern Ontario called for "immediate change" at Lakehead University. They made several recommendations, including that Lakehead commit to appointing an Indigenous person as EagleWoman's successor, that an independent review examine "all issues and allegations" raised by her and that appropriate measures are subsequently taken.

[140] In his letter to Justice Smith, the Executive Director writes, "In light of sections 54 and 55 of the Judges Act, and given the general duties and ethical obligations of judges, the information provided in these news reports brings me to the view that the situation may warrant consideration by Council." Based on the single report attached to the letter, one can only conclude that the "situation" that concerned the Executive Director was that Justice Smith accepted this appointment.

[141] Indeed, that appears to be exactly how the Chief Justice, who was copied on the letter read it. She responds by letter of May 11, 2018, providing the background facts leading to the appointment. She provides the Executive Director with the letter from the Law School requesting Justice Smith to accept the appointment, the letter of the Chief Justice to the Minister of Justice concerning it, and the Minister's response.

[142] Based on the record, these letters set out the facts on which the Executive Director made his decision that the matter warranted consideration by the CJC and, under section 4.3 of the Review Procedures, referred it to the Judicial Conduct Committee on May 16, 2018.

[143] Prior to making this determination, the Executive Director had to screen the matter as required under the Review Procedures. Indeed, in his affidavit, the Executive Director states that he refers every complaint or matter not falling within the exceptions described in section 5 of the Review Procedures, to the Chairperson of the Judicial Conduct Committee. Section 5 reads as follows:

> 5. Early Screening Criteria
>
> For the purposes of these Procedures, the following matters do not warrant consideration:
>
> (a) complaints that are trivial, vexatious, made for an improper purpose, are manifestly without substance or constitute an abuse of the complaint process;
>
> (b) complaints that do not involve conduct; and
> (c) any other complaints that are not in the public interest and the due administration of justice to consider.

[144] How did the Executive Director fail to conclude that it is "not in the public interest and the due administration of justice" to consider the matter of Justice Smith's appointment?

[145] That question is asked because the information the Executive Director had leads me to only one conclusion; namely, that the referral to the Judicial Conduct Committee of the matter raised by the Executive Director himself was "not in the public interest and the due administration of justice to consider." I arrive at that conclusion based on the following facts:

1. The Law School approached Justice Smith to consider the appointment, in part because of his "significant work with Indigenous communities" and his publications focused on Aboriginal Law in Canada;

2. Justice Smith immediately informed his Chief Justice that he had been contacted "out of the blue" with this request and that he would "accept a short term appointment with your approval and that of the Minister of Justice";

3. The Chief Justice writes to the Minister of Justice setting out the facts, including the role being limited to academic leadership, describing this as a "very exceptional situation" and one which provides "an opportunity for our Court to respond positively to a number of Truth and Reconciliation Commission recommendations" and advising, "With your approval, I am anxious to authorize this special leave" (emphasis in original);

4. The Minister of Justice responds, "I have no concerns about your granting Justice Smith a 'special leave' … as outlined in your letter [and] in the event that more than six months is required, I will consider any requests for additional leave";

5. Justice Smith's judicial colleagues in the Northwest Region support him being granted a leave to take this appointment; and

6. No complaint was made to the CJC by anyone at any time regarding the conduct of Justice Smith in accepting this appointment.

[146] There is nothing in the record explaining how and on what basis the Executive Director concluded that his referral to the Judicial Conduct Committee was in the public interest and the due administration of justice. The information disclosed to Justice Smith prior to the referral did not indicate any public debate or concern about the appointment, and the approval of his Chief Justice and Minister of Justice belie any suggestion that it affected the due administration of justice.

[147] Again, without evidence from the Executive Director we do not know what weight he placed on the Minister's approval; however, based on his affidavit, I find that he gave it none. Regarding the Minister's letter, he swears:

> On 11 May 2018, the Applicant sent me an email attaching a letter from Chief Justice Heather Smith which he referred to as Leave of Absence Approval from Chief Justice Smith. On the same date, the Applicant sent another email attaching a letter from the Honourable Judy

> Wilson-Raybould, Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada (as she then was) which he referred to as a Letter of Approval of the Minister of Justice for Secondment as (Interim) Dean. The Minister's letter did not indicate that the Minister has made any decision in respect of the matter, but that the Minister recognized that the authority to grant leave for less than six months rested with Chief Justice Smith. The Minister concluded her letter thus: "I would encourage the university to move quickly in appointing a permanent Dean, both to ensure long-term leadership for the Faculty of Law, and to minimize Justice Smith's time away from his regular duties as a supernumerary judge." [Emphasis added.]

[148] The following underlined passages of the Minister's letter are not referred to by Mr. Sabourin, and in my view, clearly show that the Minister made a decision, namely, that she has no concerns about the appointment and will consider an extension if asked:

> As Chief Justice, you have the authority to grant Justice Smith a "special leave" under the Judges Act, for a period up to six months. I also understand that Justice Smith's judicial colleagues in the Northwest Region are supportive of his taking a "special leave" in order to accept this position.
> I have no concerns about your granting Justice Smith a "special leave" from June 2018 to November 2018, as outlined in your letter. In the event that more than six months is required, I will consider any requests for additional leave at the appropriate time. I would encourage the university to move quickly in appointing a permanent Dean, both to ensure long-term leadership for the Faculty of Law, and to minimize Justice Smith's time away from his regular duties as a supernumerary judge. [Emphasis added.]

[149] The CJC and the Attorney General, echoing Mr. Sabourin, both submit that the response by the Minister was not an "approval" of the leave being granted. I disagree. The Chief Justice explicitly asked for the Minister's "approval" of her granting the leave. The Minister responded that she had no concerns with the leave being granted. The leave was granted by the Chief Justice who obviously considered the Minister's response to indicate approval. Further, Justice Smith indicated that he would accept the assignment with the approval of his Chief Justice and the Minister of Justice, and so he too viewed this as ministerial approval as he accepted the appointment.

[150] The position that there was no ministerial approval on these facts is absurd. If the Minister was not approving, then it was simple enough for her to say so. She did not. Moreover, she expressed a willingness to consider an extension which is not what one would expect from someone opposed to the initial leave. Apprised of all the facts, the Minister had no concerns.

[152] Consider an analogy. A teenager who has a 10 p.m. curfew approaches father seeking a later curfew as the child and friends are going to a movie that runs longer than usual. Father says he is inclined to approve, but that they need to speak to mother. They go to mother to discuss the request and she responds that father can grant the request and she has no concerns. She adds that if the child is going to be later than an hour to seek her approval for an extension. On this basis, the child goes to the movie and arrives home 30 minutes past her 10 p.m. curfew. Is there anyone who would think it fair if the mother were to ground the child for having been 30 minutes late because she did not grant her approval? Can anyone seriously suggest that the mother had not made a decision on the request and had not approved it?

[153] The Court is equally troubled by the treatment Pidgeon A.C.J. gives to the approval of the Minister. In his decision to refer the matter to the Review Panel, he writes of the Minister's letter that she had "unofficially" approved the leave to allow Justice Smith to serve as Interim Dean. He writes [at page 5 of the reasons for referral]:

> …. In my view, Chief Justice Heather Smith's consent and support for Justice P. Smith's leave of absence, and the Minister of Justice's apparent lack of concern, are simply factors to be weighed in assessing the nature and gravity of Justice Patrick Smith's conduct, and whether this conduct is appropriate. [Emphasis added.]

[154] My view, as earlier stated, is that the Minister's approval cannot be reasonably said to be "unofficial" simply because she did not expressly use the word "approved." Second, it is not an honest description of the Minister's actions to describe them as an "apparent lack of concern" when she expressly writes, "I have no concerns." She is to be taken at her word.

[155] It is unclear to me what Pidgeon A.C.J. means when he writes that these approvals are factors to be weighed in assessing whether Justice Smith's "conduct is appropriate." Pidgeon A.C.J. referred the matter to the Review Panel. Under section 8.2(d) of the Review Procedures, he could do that only if he "determines that the matter may be serious enough to warrant the removal of the judge."

[156] Counsel for Justice Smith submits that the CJC "pursued Justice Smith knowing that the Minister of Justice had already approved of his actions." She says that "it is inconceivable that the Minister of Justice would make an address to both Houses of Parliament asking … for Justice Smith's removal on the basis of actions that he took with her express approval."

[158] Under section 8.2(d) of the Review Procedures, the Chairman of the Judicial Conduct Committee may "refer the matter to a Panel, in accordance with subsection 2(1) of the By-laws, if the Chairperson determines that the matter may be serious enough to warrant the removal of the judge." How, one must ask, could Pidgeon A.C.J. determine that the matter may be serious enough to warrant the removal of Justice Smith when removal will never occur?

[159] As in the case of the Executive Director, he could only have made this decision based on his improper characterization of the Minister's approval.

[160] In addition to the improper decision of the Executive Director that the matter "warrants consideration" there is evidence in the record that Justice Smith was also denied procedural fairness by the Executive Director.

[161] As noted above, the only information Justice Smith had as to the substance of the matter was the initial letter of the Executive Director attaching one web page reporting that he had accepted the appointment, and his reference to sections 54 and 55 of the Judges Act and "the general duties and obligations of judges." However, Pidgeon A.C.J., in his reasons for referring the matter to the Review Panel, indicates that other material was before the Executive Director which guided his actions and decisions. He writes [at page 2]:

> Following Justice Smith's appointment as Interim Dean, First Nations leaders were upset and criticized the lack of prior consultation and failure to follow the recommendations of the national advisory committee on aboriginal issues. They called on the university to rescind the appointment.
> On 9 May 2018, given the public comments made in response to the statements made by First Nations chiefs, the Executive Director of the Canadian Judicial Council wrote to Justice Patrick Smith and his Chief Justice to obtain more information. [Emphasis added.]

[162] None of this information was provided to Justice Smith. Specifically, he was not informed of the Executive Director's concerns about the call for him to resign, nor was he provided with any of the "public comments" made in response to statements made by First Nations chiefs, nor those statements.

[163] Procedural fairness dictates that one is entitled to know the case to be met. This is a fundamental procedural right that the Executive Director failed to give to Justice Smith.

[164] A finding of judicial misconduct may result in the removal of the judge from office. In Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817, 1999 CanLII 699 , the Supreme Court observed that the duty of procedural fairness is flexible and variable and depends on an appreciation of many matters. These were said to include: (1) the nature of the decision being made and process followed in making it; (2) the nature of the statutory scheme and the terms of the statute pursuant to which the body operates; (3) the importance of the decision to the individual or individuals affected; (4) the legitimate expectations of the person challenging the decision; and (5) the choices of procedure made by the agency itself.

[165] Specifically, at paragraph 25, it was observed, "The importance of a decision to the individuals affected … constitutes a significant factor affecting the content of the duty of procedural fairness." That factor alone, in the context of a complaint regarding judicial conduct, points to the CJC being required to accord a judge significant procedural fairness.

[166] If the real concern of the Executive Director was the adverse reaction of some First Nations chiefs to his appointment, then Justice Smith was entitled to know that and respond to it. In an affidavit filed in this application, Justice Smith describes the response he would have provided if this were the concern.

[167] Justice Smith submits that the decision(s) to refer his acceptance of the appointment in the face of the approvals received and the lack of public complaint was done for an improper purpose. He points to statements made by the CJC in three publications:

1. The CJC Press Release ["Canadian Judicial Council review of a matter involving the Honourable Patrick Smith"] of October 3, 2018, announcing that the matter had been referred to the Review Panel, which says:

   > Council believes that all judges, and the public alike, will benefit from greater clarity regarding the permissible scope of activities for judges outside their normal judicial duties.

2. The report ["Judge fights against disciplinary body's ruling that said he engaged in misconduct" by Michelle McQuigge] in The Star [Toronto Star] of September 27, 2018, in which the Executive Director is quoted as saying: "We believe that all judges would benefit from clarity in this regard;" and

3. An article in The Lawyer's Daily of October 4, 2018 ["Canadian judges rally around judge facing discipline for accepting interim law dean post at Lakehead University" by Cristin Schmitz], in which the Executive Director is quoted as saying with respect to the referral to the Review Panel, "This will greatly assist [the judicial] council, and its Independence Committee, in its ongoing work of revising Ethical Principles for Judges, a project that is expected to be completed in the fall of 2019."

> The purpose of judicial conduct proceedings is not to provide "clarity" to judges and the public. By improperly wielding its authority over Justice Smith in this way, including unreasonably and unnecessarily finding that he contravened s. 55 of the Judges Act, the Council abused its process. To the extent the Council wanted to provide such guidance, it should have done so through means other than launching frivolous and unfounded misconduct proceedings against Justice Smith.

[169] Accordingly, I conclude that the initial referral to the Judicial Conduct Committee by the Executive Director failed to accord with the procedures established by the CJC. It was not a matter that warranted consideration, and the referral was done in a procedurally unfair manner as Justice Smith was not informed of the Executive Director's real concerns. I further find that the referral to the Review Panel failed to accord with the procedures established by the CJC in finding, based on an improper characterization of the Minister's consent, that "the matter may be serious enough to warrant removal of the judge." I further find that the review of Justice Smith's acceptance of the appointment was made, at least in part, for an improper purpose.

[170] I find that the CJC process involving Justice Smith was unfair to the point that it is contrary to the interests of justice. It was an abuse of process.

[171] Before concluding, I wish to address the submission made by The Canadian Superior Courts Judges Association that it was not proper for the Executive Director "to initiate a complaint." It points out that as the Executive Director has responsibility to conduct an initial screening that cannot occur in any meaningful fashion if he is also the person initiating the complaint. It submits that this circumstance results in the judge being denied "this essential procedural safeguard and, as in this case, be called to account for conduct that could not reasonably have led to removal."

[172] In Cosgrove v. Canadian Judicial Council, 2007 FCA 103, [2007] 4 F.C.R. 714, the Federal Court of Appeal, at paragraph 77 commented on the advantages of the screening procedure:

> In practical terms, the screening procedure followed for an ordinary complaint under subsection 63(2) of the Judges Act is advantageous from the point of view of the judge for three reasons. First, it permits the resolution of a complaint without publicity. Second, it permits the summary dismissal of an unmeritorious complaint. Third, it permits the early resolution of a complaint by remedial measures, without the establishment of an Inquiry Committee.

[173] Provided the Executive Director assiduously applies the same review procedure to a matter he raises on his own as he does to complaints made by others, this concern does not seem to arise.

[174] Nonetheless, the Court finds that in raising matters on his own in the absence of any complaint from the public, the Executive Director would be well advised seriously to consider whether to do so.

[175] It is not as if the public never complains about judicial conduct. Evidence in the record shows that prior to 2005–2006 more than 150 complaints were filed annually. This suggests that if the Executive Director is raising a matter that is not the subject of a complaint, it ought to be of sufficient gravity to warrant that action. In that regard the Executive Director ought to weigh the conduct against the test set by the Supreme Court of Canada for conduct worthy of removal from the bench. Although that ultimate decision is not his to make, he ought to be convinced that it could result in such a finding. Here, in light of the approval of the Minister of Justice, removal action by the Minister of Justice was inconceivable.

C. What is the Appropriate Remedy?

[176] Justice Smith seeks the following by way of remedy:

(a) A declaration that Justice Smith did not contravene section 55 of the Judges Act;

(b) An order quashing the Letter of Concern; and

(c) An order that the entry about the Council's actions in this matter on its website be changed to conform to this Court's decision and order.

[177] Typically, on a successful judicial review application, the decision under review is quashed and the matter referred back for a new decision. The remedy sought cannot be granted unless the Court finds that there is only one reasonable interpretation of the Judges Act and Justice Smith's actions do not breach it.

[178] The Supreme Court of Canada at paragraph 124 of Vavilov, recognized that a court might make a finding of statutory interpretation in a judicial review application, such as that here:

> Finally, even though the task of a court conducting a reasonableness review is not to perform a de novo analysis or to determine the "correct" interpretation of a disputed provision, it may sometimes become clear in the course of reviewing a decision that the interplay of text, context and purpose leaves room for a single reasonable interpretation of the statutory provision, or aspect of the statutory provision, that is at issue: Dunsmuir, at paras. 72-76. One case in which this conclusion was reached was Nova Tube Inc./Nova Steel Inc. v. Conares Metal Supply Ltd., 2019 FCA 52, in which Laskin J.A., after analyzing the reasoning of the administrative decision maker (at paras. 26-61 (CanLII)), held that the decision maker's interpretation had been unreasonable, and, furthermore, that the factors he had considered in his analysis weighed so overwhelmingly in favour of the opposite interpretation that that was the only reasonable interpretation of the provision: para. 61. As discussed below, it would serve no useful purpose in such a case to remit the interpretative question to the original decision maker. Even so, a court should generally pause before definitively pronouncing upon the interpretation of a provision entrusted to an administrative decision maker. [Emphasis in original.]

[179] In this case, taking into account all of the factors in reviewing the reasonableness of the interpretation the Review Panel gave to section 55 of the Judges Act, I see this to be one of those situations where the analysis weighs overwhelmingly in favour of a different interpretation. Moreover, using the modern principle of interpretation, it is the only reasonable interpretation of section 55 of the Judges Act.

[180] It was never the intention of Parliament in enacting section 55, to prohibit judges from all non-judicial activities, and a reasonable interpretation must accord with that intention. Moreover, it has always been the intention of Parliament that section 55 prohibits judges from taking on employment in a commercial, private or political capacity, i.e. in businesses or occupations, and that is so whether the judge is sitting or on leave. A sitting judge is permitted to engage in non-commercial activities that do not impair his or her ability to perform judicial duties. Where the non-commercial activities duties cannot be performed without impairing the judge's ability to sit, the judge must obtain a leave of absence from his chief justice or Minister of Justice under section 54.

[181] In my view, that is the only reasonable interpretation of sections 54 and 55, based on the text of those sections, their statutory context, and their legislative history. That does not mean that a judge can be authorized to engage in any non-judicial activity that falls outside the scope of section 55 with impunity. There may be circumstances where an otherwise permissible activity the judge wishes to do may raise ethical concerns. As an example, a judge accepting a teaching assignment or writing a legal text may run afoul of his or her ethical obligations if he or she expresses a legal opinion on matters or issues that may later come before the judge. For this reason, judges wishing to engage in such acceptable activities ought to have a full and frank discussion of the role with their chief justice, and be prepared to step out of the role should any conflict with ethical duties present themselves.

[182] In light of this interpretation, the declarations Justice Smith seeks are appropriate, as nothing will be gained by sending this matter back to the CJC for consideration.

[183] All parties agreed that there should be no order made as to costs.

[184] Before concluding, I wish to thank all counsel for their precise and thoughtful written and oral submissions. They have greatly assisted me in my deliberations. This has been a challenging application; it has occupied a very significant portion of my time. The conclusions reached and findings made are the only ones available to me based on the evidence and the law.

JUDGMENT IN T-1713-18 (T-2055-18)

THIS COURT ORDERS that:

1. These applications for judicial review are allowed;

2. The decision of the Judicial Conduct Review Panel dated November 5, 2018, is quashed;

3. The letter dated November 6, 2018, from Associate Chief Justice Pidgeon in his capacity as Vice-Chairperson of the Judicial Conduct Committee of the Canadian Judicial Council which relies on the decision of the Judicial Conduct Review Panel, is quashed;

4. Justice Patrick Smith was denied procedural fairness in the Canadian Judicial Council process considering his conduct in accepting the appointment as Interim Dean (Academic) at Bora Laskin Faculty of Law at Lakehead University, and it was an abuse of process;

5. The Court declares that Justice Patrick Smith in accepting the appointment of Interim Dean (Academic) at Bora Laskin Faculty of Law at Lakehead University did not breach section 55 of the Judges Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. J-1, nor did he breach his judicial ethics;

6. The Canadian Judicial Council, within 10 days of this decision, shall post a copy of this judgment and reasons on its website, and shall provide a reference to it on all of its descriptions, references, reports, and decisions relating to its review of the conduct of Justice Patrick Smith; and

7. There is no order as to costs.

In January 1995 the appellants received notices informing them that the respondent Minister intended to seek revocation of their Canadian citizenship on the ground that they had obtained it by failing to divulge to Canadian officials details of their involvement in atrocities committed during the Second World War. At the appellants' request, the cases were referred to the Federal Court -- Trial Division. Numerous procedural disputes then arose. On December 12, 1995 counsel for one of the appellants argued for the whole day on the preliminary motions before the Associate Chief Justice. In January 1996 the court advised the parties that May 15 and 16 had been set aside for the completion of the argument. Counsel for the respondent wrote a letter to the court administrator, a copy of which he sent to counsel for the appellants, complaining in strong terms about the slow progress of the cases. Following a teleconference with the parties, the Associate Chief Justice confirmed that oral argument on the preliminary issues would take place on May 15 and 16, 1996. On March 1, T, the Assistant Deputy Attorney General in charge of civil litigation at the federal Department of Justice, met with the Chief Justice of the Federal Court. The two men discussed the scheduling of the appellants' cases and later that day exchanged letters, neither of which was copied to any of the counsel for the appellants. In his letter to the Chief Justice, T referred to the fact that the Attorney General was being asked to consider taking a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to determine some preliminary points of law primarily because the Trial Division was unable or unwilling to proceed with the cases expeditiously. In his reply, the Chief Justice stated that he had discussed T's concerns with the Associate Chief Justice, and that both were prepared to take all reasonable steps to avoid such a reference. He added that the Associate Chief Justice said he had not fully appreciated "the urgency of dealing with these matters as expeditiously as the Government would like" until he had read T's letter. However, now that he was aware of the Government's concerns he would devote one week from May 15 to deal with the cases not only with respect to the preliminary points but also with respect to the merits. The respondent provided copies of these letters to the appellants. Counsel for the appellants advised the court that they would move for a stay of proceedings on the ground that T and the Chief Justice had interfered with the independence of the Associate Chief Justice. The Associate Chief Justice then recused himself. He directed that the appellants' cases should go forward under a new judge. The appellants' application for a stay of proceedings was granted. The Federal Court of Appeal, having decided that it had jurisdiction to consider the appeal, set aside the stay.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The Federal Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to hear the Crown's appeal in this case. The stay of proceedings ordered was not a decision made "under" s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act. Section 18(1) refers to a very particular kind of decision: a decision as to whether a person "has obtained, retained, renounced or resumed citizenship" by false pretences. Whether s. 18(1) is interpreted narrowly as encompassing only the ultimate decision as to whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences, or more broadly to include the interlocutory decisions made in the context of a s. 18(1) hearing which are related to this determination, it is apparent that it does not encompass an order granting or denying a stay of proceedings. Section 18(3) of the Citizenship

Act, which provides that no appeal lies from a decision of the Trial Division made under s. 18(1), thus does not apply. A decision allowing or denying a motion for a stay of proceedings is a decision made under s. 50 of the Federal Court Act and may be appealed according to the rules set out in s. 27 of that Act.

The appearance of judicial independence suffered significantly as a result of the meeting between T and the Chief Justice. The test for determining whether the appearance of judicial independence has been maintained is whether a reasonable observer would perceive that the court was able to conduct its business free from the interference of the government and of other judges. As a general rule of conduct, counsel for one party should not discuss a particular case with a judge except with the knowledge and preferably with the participation of counsel for the other parties to the case. The meeting between T and the Chief Justice, at which counsel for the appellants were not present, violated this rule and was clearly inappropriate, despite the fact that the occasion for the meeting was a highly legitimate concern about the exceedingly slow progress of the cases. Again as a general rule, a judge should not accede to the demands of one party without giving counsel for the other parties a chance to present their views. It was therefore clearly wrong, and seriously so, for the Chief Justice to speak to the Associate Chief Justice at the instance of T. While a chief justice is responsible for the expeditious progress of cases through his or her court and may under certain circumstances be obligated to take steps to correct tardiness, the actions of the Chief Justice here were in the nature of a response to a party rather than to a problem. Similarly, the Associate Chief Justice acted inappropriately by responding as he did to the Chief Justice's intervention without the participation of counsel for the appellants. A reasonable observer apprised of the workings of the Federal Court and of all the circumstances would perceive that the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice were improperly and unduly influenced by a senior officer of the Department of Justice. However, there is no persuasive evidence of bad faith on the part of any of those involved, nor is there any solid evidence that the independence of the judges in question was actually compromised.

An appellate court may not lightly interfere with a trial judge's decision to grant or not to grant a stay of proceedings, which is a discretionary remedy. While a stay is usually sought to remedy some unfairness to the individual that has resulted from state misconduct, there is also a "residual category" of cases in which a stay may be warranted. This residual category comprises cases in which a prosecution is conducted in such an unfair or vexatious manner that it contravenes notions of justice and thus undermines the integrity of the judicial process. For a stay of proceedings to be appropriate in a case falling into the residual category, it must appear that the state misconduct is likely to continue in the future or that the carrying forward of the prosecution will offend society's sense of justice. It must also be shown that no remedy other than a stay is reasonably capable of removing this misconduct. As well, it may be necessary in some cases to balance the interests that would be served by granting a stay of proceedings against the interest that society has in having a final decision on the merits. This balancing process would not be appropriate in the case of an ongoing affront to judicial independence or of a particularly egregious interference, either of which would outweigh any interest society might have in continuing the proceedings. Neither of these circumstances is present here.

A stay of proceedings is not the appropriate remedy in these cases. First, there is no likelihood that the carrying forward of the cases will manifest, perpetuate or aggravate any abuse. Second, the lesser remedy of ordering the cases to go forward under the supervision of a different judge of the Trial Division without any direction or intervention from the Chief Justice or the Associate Chief Justice will suffice. Third, Canada's interest in not giving shelter to those who concealed their wartime participation in acts of atrocities outweighs any foreseeable harm that might be done to the appellants or to the integrity of the system by proceeding with the cases. The appropriate remedy here is to have the cases against the appellants go forward under the supervision of a judge of the Trial Division who has had nothing to do with the affairs that form the subject matter of this appeal. The judge appointed will ignore all directions previously given by the Associate Chief Justice or the Chief Justice in these cases. The Chief Justice and Associate Chief Justice should not have anything further to do with these cases.

RE RAMSEY AND THE QUEEN

New Brunswick Supreme Court, Appeal Division, Hughes, C.J.N.B., Limerick and Bugold, JJ.A. June 21, 1972.

1972 CanLII 1409 (NB CA)

Robert L. Kenny, for accused, applicant.
Michael Landers, for the Crown, respondent.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

LIMERICK, J.A.:—John Ramsey, Joseph Butler and Wayde Clifford were charged before Kelley, Prov. Ct. J. (Deputy Judge), in three separate informations with having unlawfully caused bodily harm to one Leonard O'Donnell.

On February 28, 1972, Ramsey elected trial by a magistrate and the case was adjourned to March 14, 1972, at 1:30 p.m. The Crown closed its case against Clifford just prior to the noon recess on that day.

Following the recess, when the Court resumed, the cases against Ramsey and Butler were called and Crown counsel moved with the consent of the defence counsel that the evidence of certain witnesses who had testified that morning in the case against Clifford be admitted and read into the evidence in the trials of Ramsey and Butler. The motion was granted. The hearing of the cases against Ramsey and Butler were set over until after the conclusion of the Clifford case.

The Clifford case was resumed by the Court and after hearing evidence adduced by the defence, the Deputy Judge acquitted the accused Clifford stating he accepted the testimony of the defence witnesses and rejected that of the prosecution.

Crown counsel then requested the Deputy Judge to waive jurisdiction in the Ramsey and Butler cases to another Judge of the Provincial Court on the ground that as the evidence would be the same in all three cases the Deputy Judge might be unconsciously biased in the other two cases, he having in effect prejudged those cases.

The Deputy Judge adjourned the matter for consideration. He informed this Court he did not consider he was biased and that in his opinion there was no ground justifying his waiving jurisdiction. Having been requested in the interim by the Chief Judge of the Provincial Court [Harrigan, C.J. Prov.Ct.], who forwarded to the Deputy Judge a form for his signature waiving jurisdiction to the Chief Judge, Kelley, Prov.Ct.J., signed the form thereby waiving jurisdiction to Harrigan, C.J. Prov.Ct.

Ramsey now applies for an order of prohibition forbidding Harrigan, C.J. Prov.Ct., from hearing or proceeding with the trial of the charge against that accused.

Subsequent to the application for prohibition Harrigan, C.J. Prov.Ct., tried and convicted the accused Clifford for an assault on another person arising out of the same incident.

Section 499(1) of the Criminal Code is as follows:

> 499(1) Where an accused is being tried under this Part by a judge or magistrate, as the case may be, and the judge or magistrate before whom the accused is being tried dies or is for any reason unable to continue, the proceedings may, subject to this section, be continued before another judge or magistrate, as the case may be, who has jurisdiction to try the accused under this Part.

A magistrate before whom the trial of an accused, charged with an indictable offence, has commenced, must proceed with that trial to its conclusion including verdict and sentence (if applicable) unless jurisdiction is or may be transferred to another magistrate under the provisions of this section.

The Deputy Judge in whom was vested the jurisdiction of a magistrate for the purposes of the Criminal Code had commenced and entered on the trial of the accused Ramsey when he made an order that the evidence of witnesses who testified in the trial of the charge against Clifford be read into the evidence in the Ramsey case: jurisdiction could only be transferred thereafter to Harrigan, C.J. Prov.Ct., where authorized by the provisions of the above s. 499(1).

It would appear Crown counsel was dissatisfied with the decision of the Deputy Judge acquitting the accused Clifford and was desirous of having the other two cases tried before a different magistrate in the hope of obtaining a conviction therein. Such a procedure, if permitted, would result in great unfairness in the administration of justice. One person would be acquitted and another convicted on identical evidence. The Crown should have appealed from the acquittal, if grounds existed for such appeal, and if grounds did not exist the Crown should have withdrawn the two charges against Ramsey and Butler.

Section 499(1) provides for a transfer of jurisdiction where the magistrate "dies or is for any reason unable to continue". Such a reason could be illness, absence, disqualification or other justifiable cause. The order or request of the Chief Judge does not constitute such a reason. The Chief Judge, appointed by the Province, has administrative duties and functions. He should not and cannot interfere with the judicial discretion of a Provincial Judge acting as a magistrate under the Criminal Code.

As magistrate, the Deputy Judge may disqualify himself if he considers he may be prejudiced or biased in any case, or this Court may prohibit him from trying a case if it considers he is or may appear to be biased. The Chief Judge had no such authority. No other reason is suggested for the transfer of jurisdiction than bias on the part of the Deputy Judge. The desire for a conviction on the part of the Crown does not constitute a legitimate reason for the transfer of jurisdiction.

The Deputy Judge did not consider himself disqualified. It therefore only remains to consider whether this Court considers he would be biased or appear to be biased in the circumstances.

The Crown contends that the magistrate made a finding of credibility disbelieving the Crown witnesses and believing the defence witnesses and that, in as much as the evidence in the Ramsey and Butler cases would be identical with that in the Clifford case, he would be biased and that the trials of Ramsey and Butler were in effect prejudged.

The Crown misinterprets the meaning of bias. Bias is prejudice or predisposition to be unreasonably favourable to one party rather than the other. The anticipated consistency of the Court in making the same finding on the same evidence adduced by the same witnesses in two different trials is not bias but a finding which the Crown counsel should have accepted and should have been a ground for withdrawing the other two cases. Bias exists in seeking to transfer jurisdiction in order to obtain convictions not in making consistent decisions. The Crown should be impartial and question the finding of the Court only by appeal.

There is no suggestion made, that the Deputy Judge would be prejudiced if other or additional evidence which had not been offered in the Clifford case were offered in the subsequent trials, and that he would fail to give proper weight to such other evidence.

When this Court or any other Court makes a finding based on specific circumstances the decision should be considered as a precedent establishing the finding that Court would make in any future case based on identical circumstances. An informant or plaintiff, if that decision be unfavourable to him, would know it would be pointless to commence similar proceedings unless he is prepared to carry the proceedings to a higher Court by way of an appeal. Consistency is not bias.

There was therefore no reason for the proceedings being continued before the Chief Judge of the Provincial Court. The Deputy Judge having commenced the trial was obligated under the circumstances to continue the trial until its conclusion. He was without jurisdiction to transfer jurisdiction to another magistrate and the Chief Judge had no jurisdiction to direct him to transfer jurisdiction and had no right to assume jurisdiction over the trial of the accused Ramsey.

The application for prohibition is allowed. There will be an order prohibiting Harrigan, C.J. Prov.Ct., from proceeding with the trial of John Ramsey on the charge that he did on or about February 17, 1972, at Sussex Corner, in the County of King's, and Province of New Brunswick, unlawfully cause bodily harm to Leonard O'Donnell, and did thereby commit an assault contrary to s. 245(2) of the Criminal Code or any included offence for which he might have been convicted by Kelley, Prov.Ct.J.

The applicant to have his costs of the application before this Court to be paid by the Crown.

Application allowed.

UNDER THE PRESIDENCY THE HONORABLE RAYMOND W. PRONOVOST, JCS OF:

JEAN FABER

[111] In ruling on this article, Judge Dufour [22] wrote:

> "Note the difference in phraseology used in paragraphs 1, 3 and that in paragraph 2 of article 96 .
>
> In paragraph 2, and this is the only place where this is the case, the legislator stipulates that judges must submit to the orders and directives of the chief justice for the matter concerned.
>
> From this, I deduce that judges are not legally subject to any other directive issued by the chief judge of their court.
> The legislature undoubtedly intended this to protect judicial independence. The Chief Justice is "primus inter pares" [23] . It is only through his moral authority over the judges of his Court that he will impose his will on them regarding directives to which they are not legally subject.

[112] Therefore, the Chief Justice's sole power is limited to issuing summonses and setting court hearings. Neither the Chief Justice nor the coordinators may interfere in the work of the judge. The coordinators and assistant coordinators have only the power to issue summonses, which is delegated to them by the Chief Justice, as all judges are equal.

[113] At no time, as Justice Lemay wrote, can either the Chief Justice or the Coordinating Judge interfere in the work of the judge. The Assistant Coordinators have only the power to assign cases, which is delegated to them by the Chief Justice.

[114] As Justice Dufour pointed out, the Chief Justice has moral authority over the judges. But this moral authority cannot be delegated. The only power that Chief Justices can delegate is the administrative power to issue summonses. Without this, judicial independence, an essential principle in our system, could not be claimed.

[115] On this point, Judge Lemay [24] wrote:

> “(…) First parenthesis here. On two (2) occasions, during the hearing of this case, the accused’s prosecutor claimed that he had been obliged to proceed in this way following a directive from the then assistant coordinating judge.
>
> I must emphasize that this grants far too much power to the assistant coordinating judge, power he does not actually possess. The only thing I could be compelled to do on May 31, 2011, was to hear the accused's case, nothing else.
> Judicial independence would never allow me, any more than I would allow myself, to be the spokesperson for the assistant coordinating judge.

[116] The judge presiding over the hearing is the absolute authority and no directive can compel him to operate in any particular way. This is a fundamental principle of judicial independence.

Requests for discounts

[117] The appellants argue that they were forced to proceed in this manner because the judges systematically refused adjournments. However, during the hearing, the court emphasized to the prosecutors that this assertion was unsupported by any evidence. As with the other point, I have given the appellants until December 5, 2014, to produce any evidence to support this assertion.

[118] No evidence was submitted on this point. As mentioned previously, pleadings may only be based on proven facts. Since counsel for the appellants did not find that the directive existed, this point cannot be upheld.

[1] TWADDLE J.A. (HUBAND and PHILP JJ.A. concurring) (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Scott C.J.M.):—At issue in this appeal is the jurisdiction of the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench to make an order of general application authorizing the Sheriff to search persons seeking entrance to the Winnipeg Centre courthouse.

[2] Prior to August 1998, security at the Winnipeg courthouse was maintained, as it still is at all courthouses outside of Winnipeg, by the simple presence of the Sheriff and his officers. The officers were on duty during hours when members of the public had access to the building, whether to file or inspect documents, pay a fine, attend at one or other of the courts holding session or obtain access to the Great Library. Apart from fulfilling their duty of general surveillance, the Sheriff's officers were required:

(i) to ward off any threatened altercation;

(ii) to determine, in their professional judgment, where in the building the attendance of officers was specifically required; and

[137] In addition to Schachter, there are a number of other decisions of the Supreme Court in which a declaration of invalidity was temporarily suspended. In R. v. Swain, 1991 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 933, 63 C.C.C. (3d) 481, the majority of the Supreme Court provided for a six-month "period of temporary validity" after declaring the existing provisions of the Criminal Code requiring detention of a person acquitted on the ground of insanity to be unconstitutional. In R. v. Bain, 1992 CanLII 111 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 91, 87 D.L.R. (4th) 449, 69 C.C.C. (3d) 481, a declaration of invalidity pronounced with respect to the provisions of the Criminal Code that allowed the Crown but not the accused to "stand by prospective jurors" was suspended for six months to permit Parliament to remedy this situation if it chose to do so. See as well Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1993 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519, 107 D.L.R. (4th) 342, 85 C.C.C. (3d) 15.

[138] As an interesting aside, it should be noted that Iacobucci J., writing for himself and Cory J., for the minority, in RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, 127 D.L.R. (4th) 1, 100 C.C.C. (3d) 449, at para. 190, while agreeing with the majority that the government's products control legislation was unconstitutional, would have suspended the declaration of invalidity for a period of one year. To do otherwise, they reasoned (at para. 192):

> … would permit the tobacco companies the untrammelled ability to advertise until minimally impairing legislation is drafted; the suspensive veto would permit the government to design such legislation while the status quo remains in force. [Emphasis added.]

[139] Public interest is clearly a valid consideration when dealing with an application for an interlocutory stay. See *Manitoba (Attorney General) v. [140] All these factors militate in favour of granting the shortest possible stay to permit the appropriate legislative intervention.

[141] If necessary I would be prepared to grant a stay for a period of not more than two months or until the appropriate legislation is in place, whichever comes first.

Appeal allowed.

Date: 19990426
Action No. 9801-08707

IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH OF ALBERTA JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF CALGARY

BETWEEN:

THE HONOURABLE JOHN D. REILLY,
JUDGE OF THE PROVINCIAL COURT OF ALBERTA

Applicant

- and -

THE HONOURABLE EDWARD R. WACHOWICH, CHIEF JUDGE OF THE PROVINCIAL COURT OF ALBERTA

Respondent

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT of The Honourable Mr. Justice D.B. Mason

I. INTRODUCTION

[1] This is an extremely distressing application because it forces the Court to balance certain fundamental principles of judicial independence. It is an application by Judge John R. Reilly ("Judge Reilly"), a judge of the Provincial Court of Alberta, for judicial review of a decision by Chief Judge Edward R. Wachowich (the "Chief Judge"). The Chief Judge re-assigned Judge Reilly from Canmore to Calgary and directed that he change his residence from Canmore to Calgary. I will refer to this as the "impugned decision".

[2] While these changes were to be effective September 1, 1998, I granted a stay pending the outcome of this application. I previously decided ([1998] A.J. No. 975, supplementary reasons 1998 ABPC 78 (CanLII), [1998] A.J. No. 990) that this Court does have the authority to conduct a judicial review. The Court of Appeal upheld that decision ([1998] A.J. No. 1475). I ordered the Chief Judge to produce the return required by Rule 753.13 of the Rules of Court, which is the documentary "Record" upon which the decision was based. That Record and the parties' arguments before me, including pre-trial briefs, form the basis for the facts outlined in this judgment.

II. ISSUES

1. Can this Court judicially review the Chief Judge's decision? (While this was dealt with in my September 8, 1998 decision, the parties have argued some further points, which I address briefly).

2. What is the appropriate standard of judicial review in this situation?

3. Does a chief judge have the statutory or constitutional authority to re-assign a judge and order a judge to change his or her residence?

4. If a chief judge has such authority in general, was it properly exercised by the Chief Judge in this case?

5. If the Chief Judge here did have the authority to make such a decision, was he required to follow procedural fairness in making it? If so, did he meet the procedural fairness requirement?

III. SUMMARY

[3] The Chief Judge did not have the authority to make the impugned decision. Accordingly, Judge Reilly's re-assignment to Calgary and his change of residence to Calgary cannot be implemented. The concept of "judicial independence" is vital to this case. As stated by the late Sopinka J. in an October 2, 1997 speech to the Ukrainian-Canadian Conference on Judicial Independence and Accountability, judicial independence means that "even if the government doesn't like your decisions, you still have a job." I would broaden that statement to include others besides the traditional concept of "government".

[4] The character of the decision made by the Chief Judge in this case was disciplinary, not administrative, in spite of the collaboration between the Chief Judge and Assistant Chief Judge Brian C. Stevenson ("Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson") to tie it into a proposal made to the Deputy Minister of Justice to consider closing Canmore as a base point for the Provincial Court. The Record shows that although some preliminary administrative consideration had been given to this closure issue and preliminary costing had been done, such considerations were well short of any policy formulation. No consultation had taken place with Judge Reilly as promised. No consultation with other judges or any other participant in the system who might be affected is in evidence from the Record. No consultation is shown respecting the costing of the capital investment and costs and facility use in the event of closure.

[5] All this leads to the inescapable conclusion that tying the decision to transfer Judge Reilly and direct the movement of his residence from Canmore to Calgary with the closure of the Canmore Base Point was a mere subterfuge designed to cast the decision in an administrative context in an effort to disguise that disciplinary action was being meted out.

[6] Also, the Record is clear that the decision was effectively made at the time alleged by counsel for Judge Reilly, that is on or about April 3, 1998. It was put in place by the Chief Judge over the ensuing several weeks. No effective communication was made with Judge Reilly prior to the implementation of the decision as a fait accompli on May 26, 1998.

[7] The Chief Judge decided not to refer this matter to the Judicial Council. On my assessment of the law and the statutory authority under the Provincial Court Judges Act, R.S.A. 1998 c.P-20.1 ("PCJA") that was an incorrect decision. It is irrelevant whether that was motivated in part by concern for Judge Reilly, including a desire to spare him from being on report before the Judicial Council. The Chief Judge chose to deal with the problem privately. He obviously assumed he had the authority and that such corrective measures were within his jurisdiction. They were not.

[8] It is appreciated that the Chief Judge and Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson faced a dilemma. There were deep differences between the Chief Judge, Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson and Judge Reilly as to Judge Reilly's position respecting the treatment of aboriginals in criminal law matters and the interpretation of the new provisions of the Criminal Code respecting sentencing of aboriginal offenders. There was also conflict over the place of "restorative justice" in sentencing. Most of the matters at issue between the Chief Judge, Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson and Judge Reilly related to what Judge Reilly had stated in his judgments. Such statements were, therefore, protected by his adjudicative judicial independence. In Judicial Independence: The Contemporary Debate (Dordrecht: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, 1985), editors S. Shetreet and J. Deschênes discuss the concept of "substantive independence" (at 630), which encompasses "administrative, procedural and substantive aspects of adjudication". They state:

> Substantive independence means that in the discharge of his function a judge is subject to nothing but the law and the commands of his conscience. This aspect of the concept of judicial independence refers to the neutrality of mind of the judge, to his impartiality and his total freedom from irrelevant pressures.

I will elaborate on this concept later in these Reasons.

[9] In my assessment, the issue in the present case is not so much whether Judge Reilly had lost his objectivity. Rather, it is that the Chief Judge and Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson were divided from Judge Reilly and his jurisprudential perspective as to the proper objectives and application of the justice system in general, and sentencing principles in particular, with respect to aboriginal peoples in a criminal law setting.

[10] There is no doubt that Judge Reilly went outside of his jurisdiction in his demands for the investigation into the affairs of the Stoney Reserve under the guise of obtaining pre-sentencing material for the purposes of sentencing Hunter. This was cured by reading down the scope of the request by this Court on judicial review, through the judgment of LoVecchio J. of this Court. Judges must accept that the freedoms attached to their adjudicative independence impose concurrent responsibilities to address only those issues properly before them, along with a duty to make every effort to maintain impartiality and objectivity in dealing with the issues and parties before them.

[11] As will be explained later in these Reasons, I am unable to read into the PCJA, either prior to its amendments or subsequent thereto, any statutory authority which invests in the Chief Judge the administrative authority to re-designate unilaterally where a judge is to reside after the initial appointment.

[12] Counsel for the Chief Judge submits that such authority may be found in s. 2(5) and s.9 of the PCJA. The statute before its amendment treated the designation of the place where a judge shall have his residence by a separate section altogether - s. 13. That is the very section which the Supreme Court of Canada found unconstitutional in R. v. Campbell, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3, ruling that it violated s. 11(d) of the Charter by creating a reasonable apprehension that it could be used to punish judges whose decisions did not favour the government or, alternatively, to favour judges whose decisions did favour the government.

[13] Nothing in the s. 2(5) powers can, in any way, be extended to meet the proposition of counsel for the Chief Judge. Section 2(5) is a statutory attempt to cover the area of authority of a chief judge that has developed over time as necessary for the proper administrative direction of the Court. In turn, this facilitates the proper administration of justice. Again, I elaborate on this point later in these Reasons. Section 2(5)(d) raises concern in that it provides that the Chief Judge can also exercise powers and perform duties as may be prescribed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. Such a provision could quickly become unconstitutional; for example, if there were purported delegation of duties or powers to the Chief Judge which would encroach upon a judge's judicial independence.

[14] Section 9 of the PCJA purported to grant the Chief Judge a power to review the conduct of a judge, with authority to take no action, or to reprimand a judge, take corrective measures or refer the matter to the Judicial Council. It is to be noted that this section has now been repealed, although it was in force at the time that the Chief Judge decided to transfer Judge Reilly and re-designate his residence unilaterally. Based on the parallel reasoning in the Campbell case, the powers in s. 9 would be unconstitutional if these disciplinary powers were effected on the basis that the Chief Judge differed with the judge being disciplined in a matter relating to that judge's adjudicative judicial independence. Giving the Chief Judge any statutory or constitutional power to discipline a judge with whom the Chief Judge disagrees with respect to judgments rendered, would threaten the judge's impartiality, and create the apprehension of bias that such authority could be used to punish judges whose decisions do not conform with the personal jurisprudence of the Chief Judge or, for that matter, to reward those whose judgments do so.

[15] Therefore, nothing in s. 2(5) or in s. 9 gives the Chief Judge authority to transfer a judge from his designated circuit or residence. That power was treated by a separate section in the PCJA (s. 13), which section has now been ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Campbell case as invasive of judicial independence. Such an intrusion would violate the core characteristic of security of tenure and the dimension of individual independence. The historical core of judicial independence must remain inviolate and unassailable by any institutional or administrative independence. Restricting the exercise of the power to transfer to a chief judge alone does not cure the defect.

[16] The current amendment to s. 13 now in place provides that only the Judicial Council may make such a determination of re-designation. Such determination would be requested by the Chief Judge and would be approved and effected by the Judicial Council only if, in its opinion, it was necessary for the better administration of justice. This seems to be an effective standard for protecting judges from overzealous disciplinary action.

IV. FACTS

[17] The Record is in two thick volumes, plus a thin addendum volume. It details many events, which the parties went through in great detail. It also contains considerable correspondence. I also note that it contains many excerpts from newspapers, which is curious. I have not drawn these facts from such media excerpts, except to note that certain events caused specific reactions in the media.

[18] I have attempted to summarize the salient facts from the Record and the arguments. It would be impossible to touch on every factual point mentioned by each party. I have, however, taken all of the facts and arguments into consideration in reaching my decision. Throughout this judgment, unless otherwise indicated, references to "Tabs" refer to the documents in the Record.

A. The Hunter Pre-Sentencing Decision

[19] Judge Reilly's June 26, 1997 ruling in R. v. Hunter (1997), 1997 CanLII 24559 (AB CJ), 52 Alta. L.R. (3d) 359 (Prov. Ct.) (Tab 94) sparked considerable public controversy, media interest and political response. The accused, an aboriginal, had plead guilty to a serious spousal assault. The victim was kicked, suffering cuts and severe bruises. Her face was swollen beyond recognition. Both Hunter and the victim were considerably impaired by alcohol at the time. Hunter clearly had an alcohol abuse problem. Before he would consider a proper sentence, Judge Reilly ordered a comprehensive investigation and report by the Chief Crown Prosecutor into "social conditions, political corruption, and financial mismanagement on the Stoney Indian Reserve at Morley". He asked for answers to 17 specific questions, divided into those three categories. He said that this report was necessary for him to address the appropriate sentence, in light of s.718.2(e) of the Criminal Code, which requires the judge to consider all reasonable sanctions in the circumstances other than imprisonment, "with particular attention to the circumstances of aboriginal offenders".

[20] Justice LoVecchio of this Court judicially reviewed Judge Reilly's order, and narrowed its scope on September 26, 1997 ((1997), 1997 CanLII 14834 (AB KB), 53 Alta. L.R. (3d) 169 (Q.B.)) (Tab 64). While LoVecchio J. found that Judge Reilly had the jurisdiction to compel evidence for the sentencing hearing, such jurisdiction is not open-ended: "There must be some logical nexus or relevance between what is being ordered to be produced and the matter under consideration." (at 181).

[21] Justice LoVecchio also held that the sentencing judge's experience in the community will help him or her assess what evidence is required to meet the particular blend of sentencing goals appropriate for the community (at 182). Here, LoVecchio J. characterized parts of Judge Reilly's order as "patently unreasonable", because they lacked the necessary logical nexus (at 183).

[22] In the result, LoVecchio J. upheld asking some of the questions (sometimes in a different form), but disallowed others. His decision was not appealed. A report was prepared based on the narrowed order.

[23] The Record contains many newspaper articles and other materials regarding the public, media and political response to Judge Reilly's ruling (e.g., Tabs 65-93), including mention of a federal Indian Affairs probe into the allegations, triggered by Judge Reilly's ruling (e.g., Tab 83).

B. The Hunter Sentencing Decision

[24] Once LoVecchio J. narrowed the scope of the investigation ordered by Judge Reilly, the investigation and accompanying report were prepared and presented to Judge Reilly for his consideration. Judge Reilly then heard submissions as to the appropriate sentence. On November 28, 1997, he gave Hunter a two year suspended sentence, with two years' probation, on certain conditions ([1997] A.J. No. 1215 (Prov. Ct.)) (Tab 47). Judge Reilly specifically noted that he was not following the Court of Appeal's guidelines. He gave extensive reasons, including a large section on the circumstances of the aboriginal accused, including social, political and historical circumstances.

[25] The Court of Appeal substituted a sentence of 18 months' imprisonment, with the same probation order ([1998] A.J. No. 510 (C.A.)). This decision is not in the Record.

[26] Hunter's counsel admitted at the appeal that a suspended sentence was inappropriate, but argued for a conditional sentence. The Court of Appeal referred to other spousal assault cases, and addressed the interaction of those principles with the principles relating to conditional sentences and to aboriginal offenders. The Court held that s. 718.2(e) is only one factor to consider in imposing a fit sentence, but that Judge Reilly had over-emphasized that one factor. The Court of Appeal made no further comments on Judge Reilly's approach.

[27] Some of the correspondence leading up to the release of the Hunter sentencing decision is also important. Judge Reilly gave a copy of his draft sentencing reasons to Assistant Judge Stevenson. As the Record does not contain any letter doing this, I cannot be certain with whom the idea originated, but I will assume it originated with Judge Reilly. On October 17, 1997, Judge Reilly's draft reasons and Assistant Judge Stevenson's draft response to Judge Reilly were sent to Judge Cioni for his comments and suggestions (Tab 63). A handwritten addendum to Tab 63, that appears to be from Judge Cioni, indicates that he "concur[red] absolutely" with Assistant Judge Stevenson's draft comments.

[28] On October 21, 1997, Assistant Judge Stevenson wrote to Judge Reilly, commenting on the draft sentencing reasons (Tab 61). I note that Assistant Judge Stevenson offered his response solely as a colleague offering requested comments (which is perfectly proper), not as an Assistant Chief Judge exercising any sort of supervisory role. He then expressed concerns with "unnecessarily inflammatory and confrontational" language, questioned whether some assertions were supported by evidence, and made some other comments.

[29] The Chief Judge's response to this draft and to Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson's comments is at Tab 60. In a handwritten note dated October 28, 1997, he states that the letter is very good, and that if Judge Reilly were to release the judgment, "it could mean his job and definitely he would be before Judicial Council". Another handwritten note (dated October 29, 1997) says "Vijay [Bhardwaj, legal counsel, Provincial Court] read this and he says the bottom line is this judgment should not be delivered".

[30] A letter dated November 25, 1997 from Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson to the Chief Judge mentions a later draft of the sentencing judgment as "toned down", but still going "beyond the issue before him" (Tab 56). This letter also refers to other matters, and I discuss it again later.

[31] As discussed above, the sentencing decision in Hunter was released on November 28, 1997 (Tab 47), and the sentence was changed on appeal.

C. The Goodstoney Case

[32] In R. v. Goodstoney (24 November 1997), No. 71585673-P10101 (Alta. Prov. Ct.), Judge Reilly refused the Crown's application to revoke Goodstoney's bail for violating a condition of his recognizance (Tab 50). Goodstoney was charged with 11 counts relating to deaths and injuries that he caused driving while impaired (he later plead guilty to the charges - see Tab 34). One of the conditions he was under was to refrain completely from any alcohol use. However, approximately 17 months later, he was found to have alcohol in his system (60 milligrams) while a passenger in a car. Judge Reilly held that this was not a serious enough violation to warrant returning Goodstoney to custody, as he had successfully complied with all of his other conditions until that point.

Goodstoney had spent six days in custody pending this hearing, which Judge Reilly found more proportionate to his conduct than an additional several months before the trial. Judge Reilly also imposed a daily curfew of 9 p.m. to 6 a.m. I note that the Crown did not appeal this decision.

[33] The Chief Judge and Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson appear to have been upset by language Judge Reilly used in giving his decision. Judge Reilly said:

> . . . I think one of the most culpable elements of the original horrible accident in which these four people were killed is that an 18-year-old boy with Grade 8 education who is unemployed, never had any money, is all of a sudden given a cheque by Indian Affairs for $40,000. So he goes on a party. He gets 'roaring' drunk. He gets this new car and he drives it like an idiot and four people get killed. . . . I think the degree of responsibility is shared by society in general and the Department of Indian Affairs in particular when they irresponsibly give people a big chunk of money like that with no training, no help in how they might use it to their own benefit.

Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson's concern is reflected in the November 25, 1997 letter already mentioned (Tab 56), where he refers to "disturbing" comments by Judge Reilly. In my view, he must be referring to the above-cited passage. I note that Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson was careful not to criticize the decision itself, just the comments.

D. The Twoyoungmen Case

[34] On February 17, 1998, Judge Reilly released a ruling in R. v. Twoyoungmen (17 February 1998), No. 7001599-P10101 (Alta. Prov. Ct.) (see Tab 33). In those reasons, he refused the Crown's request for an adjournment. There was to have been a preliminary hearing on the charges of sexual assault, unlawful confinement, assault causing bodily harm, and pointing a firearm. The sole Crown witness was to be the victim, but she did not attend court that day, although she had been subpoenaed. The Crown counsel indicated that he had not met with the witness. The witness had not attended once before, although there was a consensual adjournment at that time.

[35] Judge Reilly was clearly upset with the Crown for not understanding the situation and not communicating with the witness. He stated that he refused the adjournment for two reasons - this was the witness's second failure to appear and, more importantly, there had been no communication between the witness and the Crown counsel. He found the second factor especially disturbing because the witness is aboriginal. Judge Reilly set out several facets of aboriginal culture, including references to The Report of the Task Force on the Criminal Justice System and Its Impact on the Indian and Metis People of Alberta - Justice on Trial (the Cawsey Report).

[36] According to the judgment, one significant deviation between the "white" justice system and the aboriginals it has been "imposed on" is that the aboriginal society never gave decision-making authority to figures such as judges. Moreover, the aboriginal culture does not pit witnesses, even if victims, against accused, but all work together to reach a solution. Judge Reilly pointed out nine factors which he feels contribute to aboriginal witness's difficulties coming before the courts, including fear of repercussions, cultural ethics, community pride, lack of confidence in the "white" justice system, and lack of relationship between the prosecutor and witness.

[37] Judge Reilly concluded by stating:

> It is a strange result that an alleged domestic abuser is set free because of concerns for the victim, but it is my view that unless some over-all program is established to deal with the widespread incidence of this problem in this community, the hit and miss prosecution of a few offenders will do more harm than > good. If offenders are unsuccessfully prosecuted they will get the message that they are above the law, and I believe that they will continue to be unsuccessfully prosecuted until something more is done for victims than just handing them a subpoena and leaving them to their own resources to deal with all of the fears and difficulties that they encounter in our justice system.

[38] On March 30, 1998, Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson sent a copy of the Twoyoungmen decision to the Chief Judge, along with a letter stating, in part (see Tab 25):

> I enclose a recent ruling by Judge Reilly. Its content continues an apparent obsession of Judge Reilly to subjugate the law to his perception of unjust social conditions on the Stoney First Nation Reserve at Morley.
> . . .
>
> The last paragraph of his ruling indicates a pre-judgment attitude that would clearly, in my view, support an application to disqualify him from presiding over any case on the basis of bias.
>
> For these reasons alone, it is my recommendation that Judge Reilly be re-assigned. . . .

The letter then addresses administrative details, as I discuss later in these Reasons. The letter was not copied to Judge Reilly.

E. The Corporal Young Complaint

[39] On February 11, 1998, Corporal W.F. Young of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police sent a letter to Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson making a complaint against Judge Reilly (see Tab 35). This stemmed from a sentencing of two individuals by Judge Reilly. In granting conditional sentences to both, Judge Reilly stated "I am somewhat of the view that, had the officer involved simply been more conciliatory, the difficulties may have been avoided with this man." (see Tab 36, R. v. Sigrist (5 February 1998) No. 71720668-P10101.02, App. No. 9801-0354-s5 (Alta. Prov. Ct.), p.6). I note that the Crown initially appealed the sentence, but abandoned the appeal on April 20, 1998.

[40] Corporal Young stated that he was more concerned over comments made by Judge Reilly at the conclusion of court in the presence of Corporal Young's subordinate and the Crown counsel. It appears that the comments were made after court had adjourned for the day. According to Corporal Young's letter, Judge Reilly stated the reason for lenient sentences "was due to the fact that I [Corporal Young] have had several cases before the courts recently in which the use of force played in the arrest of the individuals involved." Judge Reilly apparently stated that Corporal Young was "too aggressive", and that he was contemplating reporting the corporal to his supervisor. As of the date of Corporal Young's letter, no such report had been made.

[41] Corporal Young then outlined several concerns, foremost of which was his concern that Judge Reilly will not adjudicate fairly and impartially in cases where Corporal Young is involved.

[42] Assistant Judge Stevenson initiated an investigation by contacting Judge Reilly and the Crown counsel for their recollections. The Crown counsel's response (see Tab 29) confirms the information set out in Corporal Young's complaint letter. Judge Reilly's response (see Tab 28) seems to agree with the main facts, but also states that Corporal Young's complaint is an example of his confrontational attitude. Judge Reilly referred to another situation that caused him concern that Corporal Young used "excessive force" or "gratuitous violence".

[43] Judge Reilly stated that his negative view of Corporal Young was a mitigating factor in the sentencing. Finally, Judge Reilly stated that it is the accused who is entitled to an independent and impartial tribunal. Any problems Corporal Young encounters in Judge Reilly's court are due to Corporal Young's own behaviour.

[44] The Chief Judge responded to Corporal Young's complaint on May 21, 1998 (see Tab 12). He stated that the off-bench comments (after court had adjourned) were inappropriate, that he had advised Judge Reilly of that (see Tab 11), and that he hoped it would not be repeated. However, the on-bench comments (as quoted from the transcript) are appealable, and the appeal was abandoned. As to Corporal Young's concern that Judge Reilly has lost impartiality regarding the corporal, the Chief Judge stated that the allegation is too broad. Allegations of bias or lack of impartiality need to be raised with a judge on a case by case basis - "Blanket disqualification can not be imposed administratively." The drafts of Tabs 11 and 12 were earlier sent to Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson for comments (Tab 14), along with the drafts of what have become the three main letters (Tabs 8, 9 and 10).

F. The Tsuu T'ina Nation Public Inquiry

[45] On March 26, 1998, Judge Reilly wrote to Chief Judge Wachowich, asking to be considered as the Provincial Judge appointed to hear the above inquiry (see Tab 27). Judge Reilly stated that he would have the confidence of the Treaty 7 Nations as someone who would be fair and thorough. He went through some of his efforts to educate himself on aboriginal justice matters. He also acknowledged that some of his fellow judges have suggested that he has been "grandstanding". Finally, he said that he wished to hear the inquiry "in order to further contribute to my understanding of the Aboriginal situation and to write a report that will hopefully be a contribution to Aboriginal/main-stream-Canadian relations."

[46] The Chief Judge responded on March 27, 1998 (see Tab 26). He stated that he was surprised by the request and emphasized that the hearing is "limited to finding of facts, circumstances, cause, and manner of death of the fatality victims", not to edify a judge, nor to make any political statement. After some further comments on the perception of Judge Reilly by his fellow judges and others, he referred to the "apparent apprehension of bias" against Judge Reilly, and concluded that Judge Reilly's solicitation of the appointment was "almost conduct unbecoming of a judge".

[47] This exchange led to two more letters, which are important to this application. They are a letter from Judge Reilly to the Chief Judge, dated April 1, 1998 (see Tab 24), and the Chief Judge's reply of April 3, 1998 (Tab 22). I note that the Chief Judge sent copies of each to Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson (see Tab 23). Excerpts of both can be found in the Appendix. I discuss both in detail later in these Reasons.

G. Miscellaneous Incidents

[48] Judge Reilly attended, and was keynote speaker at, a November 25-27, 1997 seminar entitled "Building Aboriginal Community-Controlled Justice Systems". While Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson stated in a November 25, 1997 letter to the Chief Judge (Tab 56) that he was aware Judge Reilly was attending the seminar, Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson wrote that he was unaware of Judge Reilly's position as keynote speaker until November 24, 1997: "I am concerned that he was being less than forthright with me on the extent of his involvement with the seminar".

[49] Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson faxed a copy of Judge Reilly's speech to the Chief Judge on November 28, 1997 at 3:57 p.m. (Tab 54). This was a few hours before the speech was delivered, according to the seminar schedule at Tab 48 and attached to Tab 56.

[50] The last reference to this matter that I note in the Record is a December 1, 1997 memorandum from Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson to all Provincial Court Judges in Calgary Criminal Division (copied to the Chief Judge) (Tab 46). It attaches a copy of Judge Reilly's November 28 speech and states:

> I attach a copy of an address given by Judge Reilly on Friday, November 28, 1997 at the closing banquet of a week-long seminar entitled "Aboriginal Community-Controlled Justice Systems". It may be of interest to you and may give you some insight in relation to recen[sic] judicial and non-judicial pronouncements by our colleague.

This memo does not appear to have been sent to or copied to Judge Reilly.

[51] There are three letters in the Record dealing with the issue of sentencing circles and family group sentencing (restorative justice): (1) a February 5, 1998 letter from the Chief Judge to Judge Reilly (Tab 98); (2) a February 9, 1998 letter from Judge Reilly to the Chief Judge (Tab 97); and (3) a February 14, 1998 letter from the Chief Judge to Judge Reilly (Tab 96). All three were copied to Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson.

[52] In Tab 98, the Chief Judge responded to Judge Reilly's discussion of family group conferencing. While he applauded Judge Reilly's interest in the area, he stressed that it is not an area in which judges should organize seminars: ". . . that role belongs to community leaders, law reformers and other stake holders in the justice system like the crown (sic), corrections and police." Therefore, the Chief Judge did not approve Judge Reilly's participation in organizing a conference.

[53] According to Judge Reilly's Tab 97 letter, he had already taken organizational steps before receiving the Tab 98 letter. He asked the Chief Judge to consider several points, including the need to get the Stoneys involved in the justice system. He also mentioned that family group conferencing may be a good alternative to sentencing circles, which he stated some Stoneys are unwilling to use, for fear of repercussions. Finally, Judge Reilly noted that he hoped to use the method in an upcoming case, even though the private prosecutor was unwilling (whereupon Judge Reilly "indicated that if I found him to be acting unreasonably I would enter a Judicial Stay . . .").

[54] In reply, at Tab 96, the Chief Judge restated his opposition to judges participating in or organizing conferences in such matters: "Regrettably therefore, I reiterate that I cannot and do not approve of your participation in organizing any conference on this subject. I consider this matter now closed."

[55] I also note Tab 95, which contains a May 28, 1997 letter from Judge Reilly to the Chief Judge, along with Judge Reilly's reasons in R. v. McKay (27 May 1997) No. 61557104-P10101 (Alta. Prov. Ct.). In McKay, Judge Reilly used family group conferencing for the first time. The letter refers to this and states that Judge Reilly considers it a proper exercise of his sentencing discretion to use the method with non-aboriginals. He also stated that he had not ignored the Chief Judge's February 14 letter:

> . . . Pursuant to that letter I advised the R.C.M.P. that it was your direction that I not participate in the organizing a conference of this kind. They were already committed to present the program and did so. Further to your admonition that I 'can only participate as a spectator and applaud from the sidelines' I encouraged attendance and will continue to encourage its use.

I hope this meets with your approval.

[56] The Record does not appear to contain any further reference to this matter.

[57] There are also materials in the Record detailing Judge Reilly's withdrawal from a commitment to speak during the Calgary Chamber of Commerce, Aboriginal Awareness Week. On June 11, 1998, Judge Reilly sent some materials to the Chief Judge, including Judge Reilly's proposed speaking notes for the conference (Tab 4). After both the Chief Judge and Assistant Judge Stevenson provided negative comments, including statements that the comments contravened judicial ethics (Tabs 2 and 3), Judge Reilly withdrew (Tab 1). I have described these events only because they are part of the filed Record. However, I note that these particular events occurred after the impugned decision was made and communicated to Judge Reilly. They could have formed no part of the impugned decision and are not a factor in these Reasons.

H. Judge Reilly's Complaint to the Judicial Council

[58] The parties returned before me on January 14, 1999 to address a complaint sent by Judge Reilly to the Judicial Council following the close of submissions in this case on December 18, 1998. The December 21, 1998 complaint relates to matters that are also the subject of this judicial review application. The complaint is directed at both the Chief Judge and Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson.

[59] While this complaint letter does not affect the impugned decision, which is the issue before me, it does potentially affect counsel for the Chief Judge's argument that Judge Reilly's proper course of action was to go to the Judicial Council, not to file this application. I deal with that argument later in these Reasons.

I. Other Relevant Documents

[60] Certain other documents are particularly relevant to this application. I have reproduced portions or summaries of those documents, as well as some already referred to, in the Appendix attached to these Reasons, and will refer to them throughout the Reasons, as necessary.

V. ARGUMENTS

[61] Each party made lengthy and detailed submissions before me, in addition to their comprehensive pre-trial briefs. Each party also took a different approach and viewed the issues from different angles. I will attempt to summarize briefly the framework and position laid out by each before addressing the issues with my own framework.

[62] Counsel for Judge Reilly (Mr. Hunter) sees the impugned decision as an unconstitutional interference with Judge Reilly's adjudicative independence. Mr. Hunter also alleges that the decision to close the Canmore Base Point was merely a convenient excuse to justify Judge Reilly's transfer.

[63] Counsel for the Chief Judge (Mr. Tavender) argues that the Chief Judge was not attempting to, and did not, interfere with Judge Reilly's adjudicative independence. According to Mr. Tavender, Judge Reilly had to be dealt with (from both an administrative and disciplinary standpoint) because he had lost his objectivity and impartiality regarding aboriginal people. Finally, Mr. Tavender argues that the transfer decision was made in conjunction with a valid cost-saving administrative decision to close the Canmore Base Point.

[64] As I have already reviewed the basic chronology and the matters of Hunter, the Hunter sentencing, Goodstoney and Twoyoungmen above, I will not repeat all of those facts, but only deal with each party's interpretation of the incidents.

A. Counsel for Judge Reilly (Mr. Hunter)

[65] Mr. Hunter presented the oral argument on behalf of Judge Reilly. He divided his submissions into seven areas: (1) the impugned decision itself; (2) authority and constitutionality; (3) the role of the Judicial Council; (4) the availability of judicial review of the impugned decision; (5) Judge Reilly's off-bench conduct; (6) comments on the Return; and (7) this Court's discretion in the judicial review process. The written argument also addressed the issues of standard of judicial review and procedural fairness. I summarize these here as points 8 and 9, respectively.

1. The Impugned Decision

[66] Mr. Hunter characterizes the Chief Judge's decision as punitive and disciplinary, made because of Judge Reilly's on-bench conduct. That is, Mr. Hunter argues that the decision was made because the Chief Judge, and Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson, disagreed with Judge Reilly's decision-making. Mr. Hunter continually emphasizes that criticism as shown in the Record is for the appellate court - it is an affront to adjudicative judicial independence for anyone, including a chief judge or assistant chief judge, to attempt to influence the course of a judge's decision-making.

[67] Mr. Hunter further submits that the actual decision to transfer Judge Reilly was made on April 3, 1998, as indicated by the handwritten note of the Chief Judge (at Tab 25 - see Appendix). According to Mr. Hunter, all of the documents and correspondence after this point are merely to provide a cover story for the plan of moving Judge Reilly. That is, the actual decision was made on April 3, 1998, and it was made for the main purpose of moving Judge Reilly, not for any administrative or cost-saving reasons. Mr. Hunter calls the combined effect of this process the "chill effect", whereby Judge Reilly, and all other Provincial Court judges, are made aware that the Chief Judge will move or otherwise discipline them if he disagrees with the content of their decisions. Mr. Hunter also claims that Judge Reilly was entitled to notice of what was being planned, and that there was a deliberate effort made to keep him from getting such notice.

2. Authority and Constitutionality

[68] Mr. Hunter states that the Provincial Court is a statutory tribunal, with its jurisdiction limited by its enabling statute and by the Constitution. This appears to be common ground, although Mr. Tavender states that its jurisdiction is supplemented by common law principles. Mr. Hunter then argues that the powers of the Chief Judge, as a statutory delegate, are limited by the provisions in the statute, and that the Chief Judge here acted outside of his statutory authority in re-assigning Judge Reilly. As the decision was made outside the Chief Judge's administrative and disciplinary jurisdiction, it is unconstitutional. Alternatively, it is unsustainable as being made for an improper purpose, based on an improper consideration, made in breach of applicable rules of natural justice, or determined to be constitutionally impermissible.

[69] Regarding the constitutionality of the Chief Judge's decision, Mr. Hunter submits that the Chief Judge has no constitutional power to interfere with the judicial adjudicative independence of another judge, even if the Chief Judge does have the authority to re-assign a judge. Adjudicative independence is essential so that justice is done and is seen to be done. Mr. Hunter argues that the public must know that a judge is free to make a decision without fear of sanctions by the Chief Judge if the Chief Judge disapproves.

3. Role of the Judicial Council

[70] Mr. Hunter agrees with Mr. Tavender that judicial review is not available where there is an adequate alternative remedy. Here, however, Mr. Hunter submits that there is no adequate alternative remedy before the Judicial Council, as the Judicial Council does not have the power to grant the relief that Judge Reilly is seeking here.

4. The Availability of Judicial Review of the Impugned Decision

[71] As in the earlier arguments before me, Mr. Hunter again contends that judicial review is available in this situation.

[72] As he mentioned in the earlier hearing on this matter (on the jurisdictional issue), Mr. Hunter states that there is no privative clause and no immunity in these circumstances. Further, as already discussed, he argues that there is no adequate alternative remedy here.

5. Off-Bench Conduct and Notice

[73] Mr. Hunter submits that there was no adequate warning about Judge Reilly's off-bench conduct, such that he would be aware that the Chief Judge was setting himself up to conduct the investigation, prosecution, conviction, sanction, and punishment of Judge Reilly without a hearing.

6. Comments on the Return

[74] Mr. Hunter notes that Tabs 1 to 6 of the Return are documents dated after May 26, 1998. As such, he submits they could not have had any impact on the impugned decision. He also comments on the large number of newspaper clippings contained in the Return.

7. Court's Discretion in the Judicial Review Process

[75] Finally, Mr. Hunter submits that the Court should exercise its discretion in Judge Reilly's favour, as Judge Reilly was given no notice or hearing. That is, Mr. Hunter argues that the decision was not made with procedural fairness; thus, the decision should not enjoy any favourable exercise of discretion.

8. Standard of Judicial Review

[76] Mr. Hunter argues that the extent to which a decision such as this may be judicially reviewed depends, in part, on how the decision is characterized. However, he further submits that all decisions made pursuant to statutory authority are liable to review (regardless of characterization) unless such review has been clearly prohibited by the Legislature through a private clause.

9. Procedural Fairness

[77] Mr. Hunter argues that the Chief Judge did not accord Judge Reilly procedural fairness in reaching the decision to transfer Judge Reilly and order him to move his residence.

B. Counsel for the Chief Judge (Mr. Tavender)

1. General

[78] Mr. Tavender approaches the matter using a different framework. He first emphasizes that neither he nor the Chief Judge question Judge Reilly's sincerity in the views he has expressed, on and off the bench. Nor, he says, did the Chief Judge interfere with Judge Reilly's adjudicative independence. However, Mr. Tavender states that that is not the issue. In his submission, the real issue as "how and under what circumstances the applicant should be held accountable to his Chief Judge in respect of the perception that the applicant has lost his objectivity which gives rise to concerns of judicial conduct in a proper area of responsibility of a Chief Judge." (transcript, p.105, lines 2-7).

[79] Mr. Tavender argues that it is inappropriate for Mr. Hunter to draw certain conclusions from the Record, when there has been no sworn evidence, oral testimony, or cross-examination.

2. Reasons for the Move

[80] Mr. Tavender submits that there were clearly two reasons for the decision to move Judge Reilly. The primary reason was because of concerns over his loss of objectivity, and an appearance of bias and partiality, as demonstrated in the Record. The secondary reason was the administrative, cost-saving ground.

3. Role of the Chief Judge, Judicial Council and the Court of Appeal

[81] Mr. Tavender submits a different view of the roles of the Chief Judge, Judicial Council and the Court of Appeal than does Mr. Hunter. In Mr. Tavender's interpretation, Mr. Hunter claims that the contents of judgments are matters to be dealt with only by the Court of Appeal, with no jurisdiction for the Chief Judge to take any administrative or disciplinary measures. Mr. Tavender, however, submits that judges are responsible to their Chief Judge for judicial conduct both on and off the bench. Here, a loss of objectivity or impartiality, as shown in the decisions, is improper judicial conduct which is properly dealt with by the Chief Judge. Mr. Tavender states that the accounting for such improper judicial conduct, under the terms of the Provincial Court Judges' Act, is to the Chief Judge, the Judicial Council and, ultimately, the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

[82] Consequently, Mr. Tavender asks this Court to protect the institutional independence of the office of the Chief Judge. In his submission, this will internalize such disputes so that they are dealt with by chief judges and Judicial Councils, which is consistent with the legislative scheme of not airing such conflicts publicly.

[83] He states that the alternative approach, which he does not favour, is to enhance the individual independence of puisne judges, so that they can resist directions of a chief judge and allow them to challenge publicly the decisions of their chief judges. This would, in his view, indeed cause a "chilling effect", but it is chief judges who would be "chilled".

4. Specific Instances that Allegedly Demonstrate Bias or Loss of Impartiality

[84] Mr. Tavender submits that several of the specific instances discussed in the "Facts" sections demonstrate that Judge Reilly has bias or has lost his impartiality in dealing with aboriginal matters. He points to: (1) Judge Reilly's interest in sentencing circles and other restorative justice initiatives; (2) the Hunter pre-sentencing decision; (3) the Hunter sentencing decision; (4) Judge Reilly being keynote speaker at a seminar; (5) the Goodstoney decision; (6) Judge Reilly's concern over a potential Aboriginal Court for the Tsuu T'ina and Stoney Reserves; (7) the Twoyoungmen decision (which Mr. Tavender refers to as the "last straw"); (8) Judge Reilly's request to conduct the Tsuu T'ina inquiry; (9) reaction by the public and in the media, particularly to the controversial Hunter pre-sentencing decision; and (10) the complaint by Corporal Young.

5. Legal Issues

[85] Mr. Tavender submits that the PCJA, supplemented by common law principles, is a comprehensive scheme for the operation of the Provincial Court, including the appointment, powers, management, discipline and removal of provincial court judges. He argues that a chief judge has the power to order a puisne judge to move, as well as to take other disciplinary measures to enforce compliance with judicial ethics. He further argues that the Judicial Council provides an adequate alternative remedy, and that there are only natural justice or procedural fairness requirements at the Judicial Council stage. He also claims that the Chief Judge has immunity under s. 16 of the PCJA for this decision. Finally, he notes that the Court has discretion when ruling on a judicial review application, and urges me to use that discretion to disallow the relief sought by Judge Reilly.

VI. ANALYSIS

Issue 1: Can this Court judicially review the Chief Judge's decision?

Yes.

A. Summary

[86] Although I ruled earlier that judicial review of the decision of the Chief Judge was available in this case, arguments were presented by Mr. Tavender that referral to the Judicial Council was still an available course of action and that this availability augured for a renewed consideration of the discretion of this Court as to whether or not the relief requested by Judge Reilly should be granted. Mr. Tavender challenged my previous ruling before the Court of Appeal. That Court rejected his submissions and affirmed that this Court has jurisdiction to conduct the judicial review and further affirmed the direction that the Chief Judge return a record for the purposes of that review. I reiterate my earlier comments and note that nothing presented by Mr. Tavender in the current application has changed my view.

[87] My previous decision ruled that Judge Reilly's request for judicial review of the validity of the decision of the Chief Judge was not a matter for the Judicial Council for two reasons. First, it was not within the statutory mandate of the Judicial Council. Second, the request for a judicial review by Judge Reilly calls for a ruling as to the constitutionality of the Chief Judge's decision, whether under his statutory powers or pursuant to the precepts of judicial independence under the unwritten constitution as defined by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Campbell case.

[88] Had the Chief Judge referred the matter by way of complaint to the Judicial Council, as he should have, the Judicial Council under s. 11 would have had the jurisdiction and the authority to address such a complaint. By taking unto himself the process - "investigating" Judge Reilly, gathering evidence, making the decision and implementing it - the Chief Judge purported to give himself extensive disciplinary powers over individual judges of his court, and thus put into issue the disciplinary power of a chief judge with respect to any one or more of the members of his court.

[89] It is this unilateral action that is under attack. If it is beyond the statutory powers and finds no authority based on the common law powers under the Constitution, then the action is substantially ultra vires and must be quashed on judicial review. This is addressed further under the third issue.

[90] Defining the range of a chief judge's powers is beyond the scope of this judgment. While a chief judge may have the power to, for example, encourage a judge to release judgments more quickly, the disciplinary powers purportedly exercised by the Chief Judge in this case unquestionably fall outside any possible scope allowed for by the principles of judicial independence and the development of the position of chief judge as first among equals. If Judge Reilly's situation needs to be addressed, it must be done via powers exercised by the Judicial Council, not by the Chief Judge taking the powers for himself.

[91] There is an excellent passage from Rees v. Crane, [1994] 2 A.C. 173 (P.C.) at 187-88, which discusses and distinguishes the administrative and disciplinary powers of a chief judge:

> . . . the Chief Justice must have the power to organise the procedures and sitting of the courts in such way as is reasonably necessary for the due administration of justice. This may involve allocating a judge to do particular work, to take on administrative tasks, requiring him not to sit if it is necessary because of the backlog of reserved judgments in the particular judge's list, or because of such matters as illness, accident or family or public obligations. It is anticipated that these administrative arrangements will normally be made amicably and after discussion between the Chief Justice and the judge concerned. It may also be necessary, if allegations are made against the judge, that his work programme should be rearranged so that for example he only does a particular type of work for a period, or does not sit on a particular type of case or even temporarily he does not > sit at all. Again this kind of arrangement can be and should be capable of being made by agreement or at least after frank and open discussion between the Chief Justice and the judge concerned.

> The exercise of these powers, however, must be seen against the specific provisions of the Constitution [of the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago 1976] relating to the suspension of a judge's activities or the termination of his appointment. It is clear that section 137 of the Constitution provides a procedure and an exclusive procedure for such suspension and termination and, if judicial independence is to mean anything, a judge cannot be suspended nor can his appointment be terminated by others or in other ways. The issue in the present case is thus whether what Bernard C.J. did was merely within his competence as an administrative arrangement or whether it amounted to a purported suspension.
> Their Lordships agree with the majority in the Court of Appeal that what happened here went beyond mere administrative arrangement.

The Privy Council held there was effectively an indefinite suspension in that case. I will return to the facts of Rees later in these Reasons.

[92] I also ruled in my earlier decision that the impugned decision was not part of any adjudicative decision-making to which immunity would apply pursuant to s. 16 of the PCJA or at common law. The only redress available to Judge Reilly respecting these directives of his Chief Judge is the process of judicial review. Mr. Tavender's further arguments have not convinced me otherwise.

B. Jurisdiction and Discretion for Judicial Review

[93] As mentioned in the above summary, I addressed this matter in my original judgment. Mr. Hunter again argues before me that there should be judicial review in these circumstances, while Mr. Tavender again takes the opposite viewpoint. Mr. Tavender approaches the matter from a somewhat different angle this time. He contends that this Court should opt not to exercise its discretion to judicially review. His reasons for not exercising the discretion are substantially the same as his earlier arguments claiming that this Court does not have the jurisdiction for judicial review. Although none of Mr. Tavender's arguments were persuasive, I will address them briefly for the sake of completeness.

[94] Mr. Hunter states that superior courts have an inherent jurisdiction for judicial review in five situations: (1) substantive ultra vires; (2) exercising discretion improperly (malice, bad faith, irrelevant considerations); (3) not considering relevant matters; (4) serious procedural errors; and (5) errors of law. His written brief summarizes his submissions in this area (p. 12):

> a. The Decision is subject to judicial review for lack of or abuse of jurisdiction regardless of how it is characterized;
> b. There is no evidentiary basis on which to characterize the decision as administrative;
>
> c. Even if administrative, there is no apparent administrative authority in the Chief Judge to designate a judge's residence;
> d. There is no administrative or judicial authority in the Chief Judge to designate a judge's residence because of displeasure with the content of the judge's decisions in the cases before him;

e. Characterization of the Decision as disciplinary does not validate the Decision but does make it subject to rules of fairness which the Applicant will submit were not observed; and

f. On the evidence, there is no indication that in making the decision the Appellant [sic] acted pursuant to any authority he may have had while there is every indication that he acted wrongly, arbitrarily and without jurisdiction.

[95] Mr. Hunter also states that there is no adequate alternative remedy here. He claims that this matter does not fall within the wording of PCJA, s. 11(1)(b), as it is not a complaint "respecting the lack of competence of, conduct or misbehaviour of, or neglect of duty by, judges or the inability of judges to perform their duties.".

[96] Mr. Hunter disputes Mr. Tavender's argument (addressed later) that the fact that Judge Reilly filed the December 21, 1998 complaint with the Judicial Council means that the Judicial Council is an adequate alternative remedy to the relief sought from this Court. Mr. Hunter re-emphasizes that the relief available from the Judicial Council is not the same as that available from this Court. He also notes that Judge Reilly's complaint relates to the Chief Judge's "conduct", which is clearly within the Judicial Council's authority under s. 11(1)(b) of the PCJA.

[97] Mr. Hunter also points to Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance), 1998 CanLII 9800 (NB KB), [1998] N.B.J. No. 267 (Q.B.). The plaintiff there was Judge Mackin, a Provincial Court Judge. He brought an action for damages and declaratory relief, relating to the constitutional validity of provincial legislation that purported to repeal supernumerary provisions. The Court of Queen's Bench held that the repeal was unconstitutional.

[98] The relevant issue for the present case was Judge Mackin's dispute with his chief judge. Pending the outcome of the original court challenge, Judge Mackin stated that he felt it would be improper for him to hear cases. The chief judge directed him to hear cases. Judge Mackin unsuccessfully sought a court order prohibiting the chief judge from assigning him cases or requiring him to perform judicial duties. The chief judge later obtained an order of mandamus forbidding Judge Mackin from recusing or disqualifying himself. Judge Mackin continued to adjourn or stay cases, leading to a complaint filed against him by the Minister of Justice with the Judicial Council (for misconduct or neglect of duty).

[99] The Judicial Council dismissed the complaint, stating that it had no jurisdiction to resolve the important legal issues relating to the independence of the judiciary. Moreover, it could not deal with the complaint until the Court dealt with the legal issues in the original challenge. Therefore, the complaint was premature. Relying on this authority, Mr. Hunter submits that (apart from his argument that the Judicial Council has no authority to grant the remedy sought before this Court) the Judicial Council will not deal with Judge Reilly's complaint until the matters before this Court are resolved.

[100] Mr. Hunter also mentions that there have been some concerns raised over the existence (R. v. Campbell, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3 at 146-47) and constitutionality (R. v. Campbell (1994), 1994 CanLII 5258 (AB KB), 25 Alta. L.R. (3d) 158 (Q.B.) at 255-58) of the Provincial Judicial Council. I need not deal with those concerns in this case.

[101] Mr. Tavender emphasizes that the Judicial Council does have a broad enough jurisdiction to declare the Chief Judge's decision a nullity, to decide if his act was unconstitutional, and to determine if any procedural fairness requirements had been met (and if not, whether any defects could be cured). He also argues that the Judicial Council provides an adequate alternative remedy, so that this Court should not exercise its discretion in favour of granting a judicial review of the impugned decision. He cites several authorities (brief, para. 52) for the proposition that the Judicial Council has a broad enough jurisdiction to provide an adequate alternative remedy. However, those authorities do not, in my view, support that contention. First, I note that the authorities largely refer to the Canadian Judicial Council - a completely different entity. While I accept that the provincial Judicial Council has powers of inquiry (see PCJA, s. 11) and will "search for the truth", the issue here is not the Judicial Council's investigative powers, but its remedial authority. I cannot find that the Judicial Council has the jurisdiction to grant an adequate alternative remedy. I also cannot equate, as Mr. Tavender urges, the powers of the Judicial Council with the powers of a chief judge. The roles are not, and cannot be, interchangeable.

[102] Mr. Tavender cites C.U.P.E. v. Montreal, 1997 CanLII 386 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 793 and C.P. Ltd. v Matsqui Indian Band, 1995 CanLII 145 (SCC), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 3 as authorities for using the purposive and functional approach when interpreting the powers of the Judicial Council (C.P. Ltd. at 24-25). In C.P. Ltd., the appellant Indian bands each had the power to pass taxation by-laws. One by-law provided for a lengthy appeal process; the others for a shorter appeal process. Both processes ended in the Federal Court, Trial Division. When C.P. Ltd. received its assessments, it commenced a judicial review application in the Federal Court, Trial Division, claiming that its lands could not be so taxed, as they were not "in the reserve". The Federal Court of Appeal, in reversing the Trial Division, held that the right of appeal to the Trial Division was not an adequate alternative remedy. The majority of the Supreme Court of Canada dismissed the appeal, as the appeal tribunals were not an adequate alternative remedy (at 61).

[103] The majority discussed the importance of using a "purposive and functional" approach in these circumstances, because of Parliament's objective in creating the new Indian taxation powers (at 24). This focuses the inquiry on the legislature's intent (at 24-25). While I appreciate Mr. Tavender's argument on this point, I cannot agree that the Judicial Council provides Judge Reilly with an adequate alternative remedy in these circumstances, as it cannot grant the remedy he seeks.

[104] Mr. Tavender also refers to Ruffo v. Conseil de la Magistrature, 1995 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 267, emphasizing that the chief judge's complaint to the Judicial Council was upheld, and that any lingering problems of a Judicial Council decision can then be taken to the courts. As discussed elsewhere, Ruffo is a very different situation, precisely because the chief judge there did follow the proper course of action.

[105] Regarding Judge Reilly's December 21, 1998 complaint to the Judicial Council, Mr. Tavender submits that the existence of this complaint proves his argument that Judge Reilly has an adequate alternative remedy at the Judicial Council. Therefore, he argues that this Court should exercise its discretion to deny Judge Reilly a remedy in this judicial review application.

[106] In response to Mr. Hunter's submission on the Mackin case (where the Judicial Council stated it did not have authority to deal with the legal issues relating to judicial independence, and would not hear the Judicial Council complaint in the meantime), Mr. Tavender states that Mackin, Ruffo and Gratton v. Canadian Judicial Council, 1994 CanLII 3495 (FC), [1994] 2 F.C. 769 (T.D.) all dealt with a challenge to the constitutionality of legislation. That, says Mr. Tavender, is, of course, beyond the scope of a complaint to the Judicial Council. He would distinguish the present case. While the present case does not deal with the constitutionality of legislation, the legal issues (including constitutional issues) on judicial independence are, in my view, matters within the Court's jurisdiction. The Judicial Council has a much different mandate.

1. Adequate Alternative Remedy

[107] I have already decided that the Judicial Council does not provide an adequate alternative remedy in this situation. The Judicial Council cannot provide the remedy that Judge Reilly is seeking - namely, declaring the impugned decision to be a nullity and setting it aside. Nor is it appropriate for the Judicial Council to determine the constitutionality of the impugned decision and the balance among different aspects of judicial independence. I agree with the statement in Mackin that a complaint to the Judicial Council would be premature where there are "important issues of law respecting the independence of the judiciary" (at para.14 of the findings of fact). The other authorities cited by Mr. Tavender are not helpful on this point.

[108] Mr. Tavender presented several additional authorities on the question of an adequate alternative remedy. For example, the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada held in Harelkin v. University of Regina, 1979 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1979] 2 S.C.R. 561 that a student's right of appeal to the university's senate was an adequate alternative remedy to seeking certiorari from the court. The student had been required to discontinue his studies. The senate on appeal would have dealt with precisely the same matter, as it had the right to "hear and decide" the issue (at 588). That is not comparable to the present situation, where the Judicial Council could only have examined a complaint against the Chief Judge, not nullified the Chief Judge's decision.

[109] In my view, it is irrelevant that Judge Reilly filed a complaint with the Judicial Council on December 21, 1998 against the Chief Judge and Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson. Judge Reilly is entitled under s.11(1) of the PCJA to file such a complaint, respecting the ". . . conduct or misbehaviour of, or neglect of duty by" those parties. This is entirely separate from the judicial review proceeding. In my view, the mere filing of this complaint is not any sort of admission or acknowledgment by Judge Reilly that he has an adequate alternative remedy at the Judicial Council. He is, in fact, seeking an entirely different type of remedy from the Judicial Council.

[110] I do accept Mr. Tavender's contention that complaints should go to the Judicial Council, when within the scope of s.11 of the PCJA. Moreover, I agree that there is recourse to the courts after the Judicial Council makes a decision (as in Ruffo). The problem with Mr. Tavender's argument is that the complaint that should have gone to the Judicial Council was the Chief Judge's problems with Judge Reilly, rather that Judge Reilly's problems with the Chief Judge's impugned decision. Had the Chief Judge filed a complaint about Judge Reilly with the Judicial Council, this Court would not review matters relating to that complaint unless asked to after the Judicial Council made a ruling. Here, however, the Chief Judge decided, for whatever reason, not to use that available and acceptable process. Accordingly, it is the Chief Judge himself who opened up the availability of judicial review.

2. Discretion

[111] Mr. Hunter also argues that the Court should exercise its discretion in Judge Reilly's favour, as Judge Reilly was given no notice or hearing. That is, Mr. Hunter argues that the impugned decision should not enjoy any favourable exercise of discretion because it was not made with procedural fairness.

[112] In discussing discretion, Mr. Tavender emphasizes the discretionary nature of granting either certiorari or discretionary relief in a judicial review application, as indicated in Rule 753.04 of the Alberta Rules of Court. He submits that factors that courts consider in deciding whether to exercise that discretion include: (1) the subject matter; (2) the intent and framework of the legislation; (3) whether there has been a serious injustice; and (4) whether there is an adequate alternative remedy.

[113] Regarding the subject matter, Mr. Tavender notes the important public policy considerations that are at issue. For example, courts have been reluctant to interfere in internal disciplinary matters in the armed services, the police force and penitentiaries. Mr. Tavender argues that even more restraint should be shown when the judiciary is the subject matter. This should have remained, in his submission, a private and internal dispute within the administration of justice system, similar to the way a university was found to be the appropriate sphere for a matter of "substantial internal autonomy" (Harelkin at 594).

[114] I agree that it would be preferable if such a matter as this dispute did not have to come before a court. The problem here, as mentioned, is that the Chief Judge, by not following the proper and acceptable complaint procedure, invited this judicial review process.

[115] On the second point, Mr. Tavender states that the legislative intent, supplemented by principles of common law, is clear that natural justice does not have to be followed by a chief judge exercising administrative and disciplinary powers under ss. 2(5) and 9 respectively. I disagree, as discussed later.

[116] While Mr. Tavender does not seem to address specifically the issue of a serious injustice, he clearly believes there is neither a serious injustice, nor the perception of one. In my view, however, there will always be at least the perception of a serious injustice where a judge's adjudicative independence is at stake.

[117] On the fourth point, he again discusses the adequate alternative remedy issue. I have already outlined his arguments on this point and my disagreement with his submission.

C. Immunity

[119] Section 16 of the PCJA prevents an action against a Provincial Court judge when the judge acts within the performance of the judge's adjudicative role. This is an adjunct of the constitutional judicial independence of a judge.

[120] Mr. Hunter, as before, argues that this section is not a privative clause and does not grant immunity to the Chief Judge in these circumstances.

[121] Mr. Tavender argues there was immunity with respect to the administrative actions of a Chief Judge based on both s. 16 and on the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in MacKeigan v. Hickman, 1989 CanLII 40 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 796. Regarding s. 16, he argues that the Chief Judge should be protected, as he was exercising his administrative judicial independence in re-assigning Judge Reilly (with no malice or alleged malice).

[122] In MacKeigan, the Court dealt with judicial immunity, both of the adjudicative function and of the administrative function, with particular focus on a Chief Justice. There, the question was the make-up of an appeal panel which dealt with an appeal relating to the wrongful conviction of Mr. Marshall. The Royal Commission inquiring into the wrongful conviction wanted to know why the appellate court judge who had been Attorney General at the time of the prosecution of Marshall was chosen as a member of the Appeal Panel.

[123] In a very split decision, the members of the Court determined that the adjudicative privilege is, in the words of Cory J., "of fundamental importance and is absolute in nature", whereas the administrative privilege "is not of the same fundamental importance and is qualified in nature" (at 841). However, the qualified administrative privilege allows disclosure only in exceptional circumstances. In the opinion of Lamer J. (as he then was), at p. 807, the only situation where the privilege would not apply was when there was an investigation into the conduct of a chief justice or other justices. That is the very issue before me in this matter. Wilson J. phrased the principle as "where the administration of justice is itself under review" (at 807).

[124] The impugned decision is internal to the Court. It was not made in the performance by a judge of his adjudicative role. Moreover, a chief judge cannot be protected from the consequences of doing that which he was statutorily and constitutionally unauthorized to do. Finally, as I decided on the earlier application, s. 16 is not relevant.

Issue 2: What is the appropriate standard of judicial review in this situation?

[125] Neither party spent much time on this issue. It is well accepted that there is a wide range of standards for judicial review. The appropriate point in the range depends on the legislature's intentions regarding the powers and authority of the decision maker (here, the Chief Judge). As D.J.M. Brown and J.M. Evans state when discussing the development of this range (Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada (Toronto: Canvasback Publishing, 1998 looseleaf), Vol. 2, para. 13:1223): ". . . the overall thrust . . . has been to require legislatures to spell out unequivocally any powers they intend to confer on a public official or institution that limits or removes an individual's common law rights." Here, in my view, Judge Reilly's right at issue (adjudicative independence) is as significant as basic individual common law rights, because both types of rights are keystones to the rule of law in a democratic society, as reflected by the Charter. It is the constitutional guarantee of judicial independence upon which our entire judicial system rests.

[126] As discussed elsewhere in these Reasons, the legislature did not intend the Chief Judge to have the authority to make the impugned decision, nor can he claim such authority under the Constitution. Accordingly, I am entitled to review the impugned decision on a "correctness" standard; that is, whether the Chief Judge made a "correct" decision.

[127] Also, as noted elsewhere in these Reasons, there is no privative or immunity clause that affects the standard of review in these particular circumstances.

Issue 3: Does a chief judge have the statutory or constitutional authority to re-assign a judge and order a judge to change his or her residence?

[128] A chief judge may, in appropriate circumstances, have the statutory and constitutional authority to re-assign a judge. However, a chief judge in Alberta has neither statutory nor constitutional authority to order a judge to change his or her residence, either for administrative or disciplinary reasons.

A. General Comments on Judicial Independence of Provincial Court Judges and of the Provincial Court

[129] It is now settled that the Provincial Court and its judges are entitled to judicial independence (R. v. Campbell, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3 at 76). Chief Justice Lamer, for the majority, stated (at 77-78):

> Judicial independence is an unwritten norm, recognized and affirmed by the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867. In fact, it is in that preamble, which serves as the grand entrance hall to the castle of the Constitution, that the true source of our commitment to this foundational principle is located.

The Queen v. Beauregard, 1986 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 56 at 72 also refers to the constitutional underpinnings of judicial independence (at 72).

[130] The goal of judicial independence is to ensure justice is done in individual cases and to ensure public confidence in the justice system (Campbell at 79). Campbell continued by citing Le Dain J. from Valente v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 673 at 689:

> Without that confidence the system cannot command the respect and acceptance that are essential to its effective operation. It is, therefore, important that a tribunal should be perceived as independent, as well as impartial, and that the test for independence should include that perception.

I also note the following passage from Beauregard (at 70):

> The rationale for this two-pronged modern understanding of judicial independence [individual and institutional] is recognition that the courts are not charged solely with the adjudication of individual cases. That is, of course, one role. It is also the context for a second, different and equally important role, namely as protector of the Constitution and the fundamental values embodied in it - rule of law, fundamental justice, equality, preservation of the democratic process, to name perhaps the most important. In other words, judicial independence is essential for fair and just dispute-resolution in individual cases. It is also the lifeblood of constitutionalism in democratic societies.

[131] From my review of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada in cases such as Valente, Beauregard, R. v. Lippé, 1990 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 114, Campbell and MacKeigan, judicial independence has two dimensions: individual judicial independence and institutional judicial independence. The core principle of the individual judicial independence dimension is an individual judge's complete liberty to hear and decide cases. This is clearly stated by the majority in Lippé at 153, citing Beauregard at 69:

> Historically, the generally accepted core of the principle of judicial independence has been the complete liberty of individual judges to hear and decide the cases that come before them: no outsider – be it government, pressure group, individual or even another judge – should interfere in fact, or attempt to interfere, with the way in which a judge conducts his or her case and makes his or her decision.

At 153, the majority in Lippé continues by citing from Valente, at 685:

> As such, it [independence] connotes not merely a state of mind or attitude in the actual exercise of judicial functions, but a status or relationship to others, particularly to the executive branch of government, that rests on objective conditions or guarantees. [emphasis added by Lippé]

I also note Campbell at 87, which emphasizes that judicial independence insulates courts from interference. This basic theme is also present in the earlier cited passage from Shetreet and Deschênes on "substantive independence" - that a judge must be subject only to the law and his or her own conscience, not to irrelevant pressures.

[132] Also, in Lippé, Lamer C.J.C. (at 138, for the minority) would have limited the insulation from interference to independence from "government". However, he gave "government" in this sense a broad interpretation, even including the Chief Justice (at 138):

> I do not intend, however, to limit this concept of 'government' to simply the executive or legislative branches. By 'government', in this context, I am referring to any person or body, which can exert pressure on the judiciary through authority under the state. This expansive definition encompasses, for example, the Canadian Judicial Council or any Bar Society. I would also include any person or body within > the judiciary which has been granted some authority over other judges; for example, members of the Court must enjoy judicial independence and be able to exercise their judgment free from pressure or influence from the Chief Justice. [original emphasis]

[133] At present, this core principle of individual judicial independence has concomitant immunities from suit and prosecution, as well as from being required to testify about the how and why of a particular decision. As McLachlin, J. stated for the majority in MacKeigan (at 830):

> The judge's right to refuse to answer to the executive or legislative branches of government or their appointees as to how and why the judge arrived at a particular judicial conclusion is essential to the personal independence of the judge, one of the two main aspects of judicial independence . . . The judge must not fear that after issuance of his or her decision, he or she may be called upon to justify it to another branch of government. The analysis in Beauregard v. Canada supports the conclusion that judicial immunity is central to the concept of judicial independence.

[134] These immunities, while absolute, are not final because of the appeal process. It is that appeal process which corrects errors in a judge's reasons and properly applies established legal principles. To establish effectively individual judicial independence in a democratic federal state, present law has codified the two dimensions and three core characteristics as the elements of this independence (Campbell at 80-83, drawing on Valente). The core characteristics are: (1) security of tenure; (2) financial security; and (3) administrative independence. The dimensions are: (1) individual independence; and (2) institutional or collective independence of the court to which the judge belongs.

[135] The three core characteristics make up judicial independence, while the two dimensions indicate which entity (the judge or the court) is protected by a certain characteristic (Campbell at 82). A core characteristic may possibly have both an individual and an institutional dimension, although sometimes only one dimension is possible. As an example of the latter situation, Campbell stated at 83:

> To be sure, sometimes a core characteristic only attaches to a particular dimension of judicial independence; administrative independence, for example, only attaches to the court as an institution (although sometimes it may be exercised on behalf of a court by its chief judge or justice). [emphasis added]

[136] Valente discussed the core characteristics to a degree; Campbell elaborated upon them, particularly financial security. Two of the requirements for security of tenure for provincial court judges are that they can only be removed for cause "related to the capacity to perform judicial functions" and after a "judicial inquiry at which the judge affected is given a full opportunity to be heard" (Valente at 697, cited in Campbell at 80).

[137] Valente defined financial security (at 706, cited in Campbell at 81): "The essential point, in my opinion, is that the right to salary of a provincial court judge is established by law, and there is no way in which the Executive could interfere with that right in a manner to affect the independence of the individual judge." [emphasis added by Campbell]. Campbell extended this to encompass three principles designed to ensure that the relationship between the judiciary and other government branches be as depoliticized as possible (at 88). Those principles are not relevant in the present case.

[138] Valente (at 712) also defined the administrative independence of the court: control by the courts "over the administrative decisions that bear directly and immediately on the exercise of the judicial function". The court there earlier stated (at 709) that judicial control over such matters as:

> . . . assignment of judges, sittings of the court, and court lists – as well as the related matters of allocation of court rooms and direction of the administrative staff engaged in carrying out these functions, has generally been considered the essential or minimum requirement for institutional or 'collective' independence . . .

These statements were approved in Campbell at 81.

[139] In addition, Valente (at 687) discussed the two dimensions of judicial independence: a judge's individual independence and a court's institutional or collective independence:

> The relationship between these two aspects of judicial independence is that an individual judge may enjoy the essential conditions of judicial independence but if the court or tribunal over which he or she presides is not independent of the other branches of government, in what is essential to its function, he or she cannot be said to be an independent tribunal. [cited in Campbell at 82]

[140] The above passages also illustrate that the second dimension - institutional judicial independence - attaches to the Court as an institutional entity. In Campbell, Lamer, C.J. (at 81-82) stressed the importance of not confusing the concept of institutional independence (a dimension) with administrative independence (a core characteristic). Again, I note Lamer C.J.'s statement (Campbell at 83) that administrative independence only attaches to the court as an institution, but may be exercised by the chief judge on behalf of the court.

[141] The major factor determining whether institutional judicial independence must be present is the court's role "as resolver of disputes, interpreter of the law and defender of the Constitution". These qualities require the Courts to be separate in authority and function from all other branches of government or participants in the justice system. (MacKeigan at 827, citing Beauregard at 73). While there cannot be an absolute separation of the judiciary from the government, it is critical in achieving a proper balance that "the relations between the judiciary and other branches of government not impinge on the essential 'authority and function'" of the Court. (MacKeigan at 827-28).

B. Judicial Independence in the Present Case

[142] Within this framework, I must characterize the issue in this case. On Judge Reilly's part, this case raises the issue of his complete liberty to hear and decide cases without interference by his Chief Judge. I find that liberty is at risk here. There is a violation of Judge Reilly's immunity from having to justify the how and why of his decisions, together with an attack on his security of tenure. Accordingly, I characterize the present case as involving Judge Reilly's core characteristic of security of tenure and the individual judicial independence dimension.

[143] While security of tenure is typically used in the sense of outright dismissal or removal, it also must include the lesser, but no less real, threat of a move from the current place of appointment. Such a move, or threat, could seriously undermine a judge's economic, family and social status in the community in which he or she is currently appointed. This undermining could approach or achieve dismissal. For example in Rees, the Privy Council held that a judge was subject to "in effect an indefinite suspension" (at 188). There, the chief justice, after receiving complaints about the judge, did not include him on the sitting roster for the following term. An investigation commenced after that action was taken. The Privy Council agreed with the judge that this was not merely an administrative arrangement, but was an indefinite suspension, which the chief justice did not have the power to impose.

[144] On the Chief Judge's part, the present case involves the core characteristic of the administrative independence of the Provincial Court (exercised here by the Chief Judge), along with the institutional or collective dimension. Regrettably, the parties have raised the spectre of two core characteristics (security of tenure and administrative independence) of judicial independence being in conflict, thus putting the dimensions (individual and institutional) into conflict as well. I will address this later in these Reasons.

C. Statutory Authority

[145] Section 2(5) of the PCJA gives a chief judge certain administrative and supervisory powers:

> 2 (5) Subject to section 13, the chief judge has the power and duty to supervise the judges in the performance of their duties, including the power and duty to
>
> (a) designate a particular case or other matter or class of cases or matters in respect of which a particular judge shall act;
>
> (b) designate which court facilities shall be used by particular judges;
>
> (c) assign duties to judges;
> (d) exercise any other powers and perform any other duties prescribed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

[146] Part of s.13, referred to in s.2(5), was declared unconstitutional in Campbell. Section 13(1) provided:

> 13(1) The Minister of Justice and Attorney General or a person authorized by him may
>
> (a) designate the place at which a judge shall have his residence;
> (b) designate the day or days on which the Court shall hold sittings.

[147] In Campbell, the trial judge held that s.13(1)(a) and (b) were unconstitutional. The majority of the Supreme Court of Canada agreed, using its own reasons. Regarding s.13(1)(a), Lamer CJC stated (at 148):

> . . . as it is presently worded, s.13(1)(a) creates the reasonable apprehension that it could be used to punish judges whose decisions do not favour the government, or alternatively, to favour judges whose decisions benefit the government. Section 13(1)(a)'s constitutional defect lies in the fact that it is not limited to the initial appointment of judges. [original emphasis]

[148] The unconstitutionality of s.13(1) left a vacuum (which, subsequent to the impugned decision, has been filled with new legislation giving the power over residency to the Judicial Council, on request from the chief judge, and only if, in the Judicial Council's opinion, the residency change "is required for the better administration of the Court" (Bill 25, Judicial Statutes Amendment Act, 1998, 3rd sess., 24th Leg. Alta., s.4(7) , as amended)). Mr. Tavender suggests that vacuum should be filled by giving a chief judge the authority over the place of a judge's residence, as it is clearly an administrative concern. Moreover, he states that judges do not have "tenure" over an existing residence.

[149] Mr. Tavender cites the case of New Brunswick Provincial Court Judge Moreau-Bérubé, where her Chief Judge assigned her to sittings off of the Acadian Peninsula. Judge Moreau-Bérubé had made some comments during a sentencing regarding people on the Acadian Peninsula. Pending a Judicial Council hearing, the chief judge temporarily reassigned Judge Moreau-Bérubé.

[150] I note that this was a temporary reassignment, pending the outcome of the Judicial Council hearing. It was not, as in the present case, an attempt at a permanent re-assignment, in lieu of a Judicial Council hearing. The chief judge in the Judge Moreau-Bérubé case did not take it upon himself to discipline a judge for remarks over which he was concerned. He followed the proper route of allowing the Judicial Council to fulfil its role. I also note that in April 1999, the provincial cabinet removed Judge Moreau-Bérubé from the bench following a recommendation by the Judicial Council. Therefore, the issue of a possible permanent re-assignment never arose.

[151] Mr. Hunter disagrees that the vacuum left by s. 13 should be automatically filled by the chief judge; even if it were so filled, he argues that a chief judge could not exercise such a power for disciplinary reasons. I agree with Mr. Hunter that the vacuum should not be filled by giving the power to the chief judge, as further explained later in these Reasons.

[152] Mr. Tavender also points to the "disciplinary" section of the PCJA - s.9 (now repealed):

> 9 The chief judge shall review any matter regarding the conduct of a judge that comes to his attention, whether a complaint is made or not, and may do 1 or more of the following:
>
> (a) determine that no further action need be taken;
>
> (b) reprimand the judge;
>
> (c) take corrective measures;
> (d) refer the matter to the Judicial Council. [emphasis added]

Mr. Tavender argues throughout that the Chief Judge necessarily had to discipline Judge Reilly for improper judicial conduct - for losing his impartiality. This alleged disciplinary power presumably comes under the authority of s.9(c)'s "corrective measures". Mr. Hunter submits that the s.9 powers should not be allowed to interfere with adjudicative independence of Judge Reilly and, indeed, of all other Provincial Court judges who may feel a "chilling effect".

D. Constitutional Authority

[153] As discussed earlier in these Reasons, it is clear that judges of the Provincial Court have adjudicative independence. In the earlier-cited words of Beauregard, judges must be free from interference, even from other judges. It is also clear that the Provincial Court itself has administrative independence to deal with such matters as judges' assignments and court sittings (see Campbell and Valente, as cited above). The issue becomes balancing these two principles: adjudicative independence and administrative independence.

E. Conclusion

[154] Based on the foregoing, it is clear that a chief judge has certain statutory and constitutional powers. The issue is whether the Chief Judge here stayed within the bounds of the provisions of the PCJA and did not violate the constitutional principles outlined. In many instances, a chief judge's exercise of power is obviously valid and should not be questioned. For example, a decision to assign a judge to hear a particular case (in the absence of any conflict) would be both statutorily authorized and constitutional. Similarly, a decision to reprimand a judge for having reserve judgments outstanding for an excessive period of time would be both statutorily authorized and constitutional.

[155] The present circumstances are clearly more complicated, falling under neither extreme. The next section of these Reasons discusses the balance between administrative and adjudicative independence, in the context of a chief judge's statutory and constitutional powers. It then addresses the specific facts of this case.

Issue 4: If a chief judge has such authority in general, was it properly exercised by the Chief Judge in this case?
No.

A. Introduction

[156] I decided in the previous section that a chief judge has certain statutory and constitutional powers, as long as the exercise of such powers remains within the contemplated scope of the PCJA and does not infringe the constitutional principles discussed.

[157] In my view, the Chief Judge's decision here went beyond the scope of both his statutory authority under the PCJA and his constitutional authority. Moreover, the reasons for his decision, based on the Record before me, strike at, or could be perceived to strike, at Judge Reilly's fundamental entitlement to adjudicative independence. I note again that the right to adjudicative independence, while belonging to an individual judge, is for the benefit of the public and the judicial system as a whole. Because of its importance and history (elaborated on below), adjudicative independence must supercede administrative independence, where the two are at odds.

[158] I note that Mr. Tavender referred several times to the examples I gave in my earlier decision on judicial review ([1998] A.J. No. 975, para. 48a):

> To choose a clear example, for instance, if a Chief Judge were to say 'I think you should decide for Party X in the case you are hearing tomorrow,' that would be outside a Chief Judge's powers and would be judicially reviewed. Characterizing such a statement as administrative, supervisory or disciplinary could not save it, as it clearly interferes with adjudicative independence. Conversely, a statement by a Chief Judge that 'I am assigning you the case of X v. Y' is clearly within a Chief Judge's powers and ordinarily would not be reviewable.

Mr. Tavender correctly emphasizes that the Chief Judge did not tell Judge Reilly how to decide a specific case on a specific date. However, Mr. Tavender misses the point of these examples. There is a spectrum of behaviour by a chief judge - the examples I gave are clear examples from each end of that spectrum. There are, however, many possible situations between those two extremes. The present case highlights one of those interim situations.

B. Discussion

1. Conflicting Core Characteristics and Dimensions

[159] In most situations, it would not be necessary to balance the principles of judicial independence, nor to consider which is to be given more weight. In this situation, however, the parties have left me no choice but to address this question.

[160] As quoted above from Beauregard, the historical principal "core" of judicial independence is a judge's individual adjudicative independence (at 69), although an institutional aspect later developed (at 69-70). Campbell describes these as the individual dimension and the institutional dimension (at 81-82). The second dimension (institutional) has evolved as the judiciary itself "has developed from a dispute-resolution mechanism, to a significant social institution with an important constitutional role which participates along with other institutions in shaping the life of its community" (Beauregard at 69, citing S. Shetreet and J. Deschênes (eds.), Judicial Independence: The Contemporary Debate (1985), "The Emerging Transnational Jurisprudence on Judicial Independence: The IBA Standards and Montreal Declaration" at 393).

[161] Campbell also discusses the historical development of the two dimensions (at 84-85). It is the institutional independence which allows the courts to protect the Constitution and its values (at 84). Chief Justice Lamer continued by stating that provincial courts play a critical role in enforcing the Constitution and protecting its values:"Inasmuch as that role has grown over the last few years, it is clear therefore that provincial courts must be granted some institutional independence." (at 85).

[162] In my view, it is clear from that statement that institutional independence, while vital, developed in order to protect the central necessity for individual judicial independence. In particular, the necessity for institutional independence of the provincial courts has grown as the provincial courts' role has grown, particularly over the last few years.

[163] In a similar way, the role and authority of the chief judges and chief justices has developed over time. Again, in my view, this authority developed as another means to ensure and protect the individual adjudicative independence that is vital and central to our justice system.

[164] In Ruffo, the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada discussed the functions and powers of a chief judge at 301-08. One of the issues in that case was whether the chief judge appropriately made a complaint about a judge to the Judicial Council. The majority held that the power to make such a complaint was an intrinsic part of a chief judge's role (at 304).

[165] The majority in Ruffo noted that many of the provinces and territories give the chief judge a key role in ensuring compliance with judicial ethics. This was, of course, the situation in Alberta where, as mentioned, the chief judge had the explicit statutory authority to carry out certain administrative, supervisory and disciplinary functions. The disciplinary powers set out in PCJA, s. 9 have now been repealed. Justice Gonthier stated in Ruffo (at 303-04):

> It must therefore be thought that chief judges or justices, because of their role as co-ordinators, were able to have a certain influence on compliance with rules of conduct in the specific context of a disciplinary authority that was initially in the hands of the executive branch and then, starting in the 19th century after the principle of security of tenure for judges was established, belonged exclusively to the legislative branch.
> It must not be forgotten that a large part of the chief judge's role in maintaining high-quality justice was defined gradually over the years, in the same way as judicial precedents...[T]he supervisory powers conferred on the chief judge by the

> [legislation at issue]...must be seen as the expression of a reality that is consistent with the general practice and gradual developments over time. [emphasis added]

[166] In R. v. Doyle, 1992 CanLII 12827 (NWT CA), [1992] N.W.T.R. 81 (C.A.), the issue was the process for handling complaints about Territorial Court judges. There, the then Minister of Justice complained to the territorial council about certain sentences imposed by the judge, and certain "controversial social or criminological statements" made by the judge (during a private interview). The Minister also called a press conference denouncing the judge's attitudes. The council (half of whom were appointed by the Minister) recommended a formal hearing, which was conducted by a justice of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta. That report exonerated the judge and criticized the Minister in various respects.

[167] The court in Doyle emphasized several features relating to judicial independence, particularly the fact that the Minister's attack stemmed from a disagreement with the judge's perceived view. At no time was there a suggestion that the judge had acted unethically (at 86). The court continued (at 87-88):

> Judicial "discipline" statutes exist to deal with any judge who becomes too ill to function, refuses to work, or acts unethically. They do not exist, like some 16th century ecclesiastical body, to root out unorthodoxy, or even plain error. If a judge makes errors, appellate courts sit to undo them. A host of periodicals and books, learned and popular, criticize the errors after the individual cases are over. The penalties for judicial error are reversal on appeal, and bad reviews in legal journals. Neither removal nor threat of discipline lies for such matters.
> There are many reasons for that. One is that from time to time the multitude are wrong and the lone judge is right. . . .
> What the former minister did here was to try to use the power to remove judges either to influence public sentiment, or to influence the future results in future court cases. The latter would be a natural tendency of his acts. That is the gravest perversion of the system, . . . It is precisely what our whole system of judicial tenure is designed to prevent. [emphasis added]

[168] Mr. Tavender accepts these propositions, but argues that they are inapplicable because the Chief Judge was not dealing with the merits of Judge Reilly's decisions. I disagree - the Record clearly shows disagreement with Judge Reilly's views and decisions.

[169] In my view, therefore, the historical development and its underlying rationale lead to the inescapable conclusion that institutional independence and the powers of chief judges developed over time in order to protect and enhance the fundamental and central principle of individual adjudicative independence. Consequently, if, as here, one dimension has to be given preference over the others, individual adjudicative independence must receive that preference. Therefore, the security of tenure core characteristic must also supercede the administrative independence core characteristic.

2. Was Judge Reilly's Adjudicative Independence Threatened?

[170] I wish to address two preliminary points. First, I must deal with Mr. Tavender's argument that Mr. Hunter (and, by implication, this Court) should not draw conclusions based solely on the Record, when there is no testimony to explain or clarify items in the Record. This is impractical. There is often no live testimony or cross-examination during a judicial review. In my view, I am entitled to make reasonable findings of fact based on the information contained in the Record.

[171] Second, I note that some members of the judicial community have expressed concerns over a chief judge or chief justice's potential power. In A Place Apart: Judicial Independence and Accountability in Canada (Canadian Judicial Council, 1995), Martin L. Friedland reproduces several comments at 225-26:

> '. . . Will the new powers of the Chief Judges be confined to judicial administration? What of their power to control trips, travel and the education of judges – even the power to allocate desirable and undesirable cases to punish judges can represent a threat to judicial independence. Every increase in power to a Chief Judge over others might be seen as a threat to judicial independence.'
> 'The opportunities for interference exist because of the unique nature of the chief judge's administrative authority and investigative, disciplinary and supervisory duties.' [footnotes omitted]

While it is not for me to comment on this in the broader context, it is interesting that a definite concern exists on this issue.

[172] I agree with Mr. Hunter that the Record indicates that the Chief Judge made the decision on April 3, 1998 to move Judge Reilly from Canmore. This is shown by the letter at Tab 25 (see Appendix) from Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson to the Chief Judge dated March 30, 1998, stating:

> I enclose a recent ruling by Judge Reilly [the Twoyoungmen decision]. Its content continues an apparent obsession of Judge Reilly to subjugate the law to his perception of unjust social conditions on the Stoney First Nation Reserve at Morley.
> . . .
> I can only conclude from his comments . . . that when matters before him involve aboriginal persons, he does not intend to act objectively, judicially or in accordance with Canadian law. The last paragraph of his ruling indicates a pre-judgment attitude that would clearly, in my view, support an application to disqualify him from presiding over any case on the basis of bias.
> For these reasons alone, it is my recommendation that Judge Reilly be re-assigned to preside in a legal environment other than the circuit where he now presides.

The letter goes on to recommend that "consideration be given" to closing Canmore as a base point. In a handwritten note of April 3, 1998 (which was conceded to be written by the Chief Judge), the Chief Judge stated:

> 1. I agree with ACJ Stevenson [sic] request.
> 2. Vijay [Bhardwaj, Counsel to the Provincial Court] tell me what procedure we have to take to make Canmore from a base point to a circuit point.
>
> 3. Tell me the procedure to transfer Reilly from Canmore to Calgary.

[173] Therefore, the decision was made on April 3, 1998. This handwritten note does not, however, indicate on what grounds the Chief Judge made the decision to move Judge Reilly. While it could possibly be inferred that the Chief Judge agreed with Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson's comments regarding Judge Reilly's objectivity, I cannot infer that from this handwritten note. To me, the note only indicates that the timing of the decision, not the reason behind it. In my view, the April 21, 1998 letter from Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson to the Chief Judge formally recommending that the Canmore Base Point be closed and that Judge Reilly be transferred is merely part of the justification process for a decision that had already been made. I disagree with Mr. Tavender's attempted characterization of the Chief Judge's April 3 decision as a "preliminary decision", "tentative decision", "recommendation" or the "beginning of a process that may lead ultimately to a decision". To my mind, it was clearly a final and definite decision.

[174] Other documents in the Record do convey the Chief Judge's rationale and mechanics for moving Judge Reilly. For example, see the comments made by the Chief Judge in the April 3, 1998 letter to Judge Reilly (Tab 22 - see Appendix).

[175] In fact, Mr. Tavender admits that the impugned decision was made, at least in part, because the Chief Judge felt that Judge Reilly was biased or had lost his impartiality in dealing with aboriginal matters. Undoubtedly, judges must accept that the freedoms attached to their adjudicative independence impose concurrent responsibilities to address only those issues properly before them, along with a duty to make every effort to maintain impartiality and objectivity in dealing with the issues and parties before them. Because I find in these Reasons that the Chief Judge did not have the statutory or constitutional authority to make the impugned decision, I need not, and will not, address the question of bias and loss of impartiality. Judge Reilly's conduct is not part of this judicial review.

[176] In Mr. Tavender's submission, the issue is not whether the Chief Judge and Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson acted in a patently unreasonable manner in reaching their conclusions, nor whether their conclusions were correct. What happened here, Mr. Tavender states, is that the Chief Judge and Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson, in exercising their statutory and common law administrative, supervisory and disciplinary powers and obligations, concluded that Judge Reilly had violated his duty to be impartial and objective. They then took what they felt were appropriate and necessary measures.

[177] While they may have felt themselves entitled to take such measures, I reiterate that this was not the appropriate course of action. They did not have the statutory or constitutional authority to take these steps. If they felt strongly about these matters, the proper course was reference to the Judicial Council.

[178] As a final point regarding the mechanics of making and implementing the impugned decision, Judge Reilly's affidavit states, at para.4, that Judge Reilly asked Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson on May 14, 1998 about the purpose of the May 26 meeting. According to the affidavit, Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson denied any knowledge of the meeting's purpose. The affidavit continues by averring that Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson told Judge Reilly on May 25 that the purpose of the meeting was the future of the west circuit, but that he said nothing about Judge Reilly's re-assignment. Finally, Mr. Hunter notes a letter dated December 3, 1997 from Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson to Judge Reilly (Tab 51.1). Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson admitted there have been some discussions about the future of all circuits, on the sole basis of cost-effectiveness. However, he continued "...prior to any final recommendations concerning the future of Canmore as a base point, you will be consulted and asked for input, as will other 'players' in the system (Crown, defence, R.C.M.P., Probation, Corrections, etc.)." I note that the Record does not show any such consultation with any of these parties. To my mind, this strengthens the argument that cost-effectiveness was not the real reason for the impugned decision.

[179] I am particularly disturbed by the Chief Judge's frequent references to decisions he obviously had problems with, along with comments as to their partiality or bias. These decisions had proceeded through the court process in a normal fashion. Once the normal court process is over, the matter is closed.

[180] Regarding the power in s.13(1)(a) of the PCJA to set the residence of judges, I agree with Mr. Hunter that the vacuum created when it was declared unconstitutional is not automatically filled by giving the power to the chief judge. I reach this conclusion for three reasons. First, as a practical matter, I note that the legislature, when it finally filled the hole, did not give the power to the chief justice, but to the Judicial Council. Second, I know of no interpretive principle saying that a gap is to be filled in the manner urged by Mr. Tavender.

[181] Third, and most importantly, giving the power to the chief judge could potentially lead to the same problems that motivated the court to strike down s.13(1)(a) in the first place. Chief Justice Lamer stated that s.13(1)(a) "creates the reasonable apprehension that it could be used to punish judges..." (Campbell at 148). While he was referring to a punishment for not ruling in the government's favour (or, alternatively, a reward for ruling in the government's favour), the same caution applies when dealing with any person or body that has the right to affect such a basic requirement of a judge's function and career. Here, the Chief Judge attempted to exercise this power. I have found that he did so to discipline Judge Reilly for decisions and an overall approach with which the Chief Judge did not agree. The fact that this occurred gives even more weight to Lamer C.J.C's. concerns. The issue of the new provision which gives this power to the Judicial Council is not before me; therefore, I will not comment on whether it courts the same danger.

[182] Regarding the constitutional authority of a chief judge, it seems clear to me that it is not unlimited, even in the exercise of administrative functions. I find support for this in the section of the Campbell decision dealing with provincial court closures in Manitoba for "Filmon Fridays" as a cost saving measure. The government had argued that the chief judge made the actual decision to close the court on those days, so that there was no interference with the court's administrative independence. The majority of the Supreme Court of Canada disagreed. Moreover, the majority held that the chief judge, had she in fact made the decision, would have exceeded her constitutional authority (at 152):

> . . . administrative independence is a characteristic of judicial independence which normally has a collective or institutional dimension. It attaches to the court as a whole. Although certain decisions may be exercised on behalf of the judiciary by the Chief Judge, it is important to remember that the Chief Judge is no more than "primus inter pares": Ruffo v. Conseil de la magistrature, 1995 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 267, at para. 59. Important decisions regarding administrative independence cannot be made by the Chief Judge alone. In my opinion, the decision to close the Manitoba Provincial Court is precisely this kind of decision. [emphasis added]

[183] Therefore, while a chief judge can exercise his administrative independence (or exercise the Provincial Court's administrative independence) to a degree, a chief judge cannot interfere with a judge's individual adjudicative independence, or be perceived to interfere with that judge's individual adjudicative independence. I cannot emphasize enough that a judge's individual adjudicative independence must not be threatened or be perceived to be threatened. This is for the sake not only of the judge's independence, but for the integrity of the judicial system as a whole.

[184] In conclusion, I find that the actual decision to transfer Judge Reilly was made on April 3, 1998, and that it was made on improper grounds. The Record after April 3, 1998 shows an attempt to colour the decision as a cost-saving and administrative measure. Even if those were real factors in the decision, they were not the primary motivation. The primary motivation was the Chief Judge's disagreement with Judge Reilly's views and conduct, particularly as expressed in certain judgments.

[185] I am particularly dismayed by the three letters dated May 25, 1998 (Tabs 10, 9 and 8 - see Appendix). The Tab 10 letter from the Chief Judge to Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson portrays the decision to close the Canmore Base Point and to move Judge Reilly as a "pragmatic" way to "improve the efficiency" of the courts. The Tab 9 letter from the Chief Judge to the then Deputy Minister also refers to improving the "efficiency of the justice delivery system". (I note that it also refers to a report by Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson, which never made it into the Record). The letter also acknowledges that the decision to close Canmore as a Base Point is in the Deputy Minister's jurisdiction, despite the Chief Judge's attempt to use this closure as a reason to justify Judge Reilly's transfer.

[186] The Tab 8 letter from the Chief Judge to Judge Reilly clearly sets out the real reason for Judge Reilly's transfer - his "obsession" and "pre-judgment attitude", as perceived by the Chief Judge. In my view, the most telling passage in that letter is: "For purposes of the executive branch, however, I have justified this move on administrative grounds." To my mind, this underscores the real reason for the transfer.

Issue 5: If the Chief Judge here did have the authority to make such a decision, was he required to follow procedural fairness in making it? If so, did he meet the procedural fairness requirements?

[187] Had I found that the Chief Judge had the authority to make the impugned decision in these circumstances, I would have found that Judge Reilly was entitled to procedural fairness. I would also have found that Judge Reilly did not receive the required level of procedural fairness.

[188] On the Record and after weighing the submissions of Mr. Tavender and Mr. Hunter, I find that the Chief Judge failed to accord Judge Reilly procedural fairness by deciding himself to deal with the matter as Chief Judge alone and by instituting an ad hoc process which denied clear notice and any opportunity for Judge Reilly to be heard effectively on his own behalf. Judge Reilly's right of adjudicative independence was at issue. There are distinct parallels here to the case of Mr. Justice Crane in the Rees v. Crane case, supra. The Privy Council in that case examined a number of decisions dealing with fairness and natural justice in any process that may affect another person's interests, rights and duties - individual or professional.

[189] Their Lordships emphasized (at 190) what Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest stated in Furnell v. Whangarei High Schools Board, [1973] A.C. 660 at 679:

> Natural justice is but fairness writ large and juridically. It has been described as 'fair play in action.' Nor is it a leaven to be associated only with judicial or quasi-judicial occasions.

[190] There are no hard and fast rules. The learned Law Lords noted that depending upon the nature of the proceeding, type of investigation, the process involved, the nature and authority of the tribunal or decision maker, it is not required to provide notice and an opportunity to be heard at the preliminary stages of the inquiry. Such a situation is acceptable where, for example, it is a matter of urgency, or administrative necessity and no substantive rights are affected, and provided that notice of what is at issue and an opportunity to be heard in reply is part of the later process.

Nevertheless, their Lordships made it clear that natural justice may require otherwise. At 191-92, they state:

> It is clear from the English and Commonwealth decisions which have been cited that there are many situations in which natural justice does not require that a person must be told of the complaints made against him and given a chance to answer them at the particular stage in question. Essential features leading the courts to this conclusion have included the fact that the investigation is purely preliminary, that there will be a full chance adequately to deal with the complaints later, that the making of the inquiry without observing the audi alteram partem maxim is justified by urgency or administrative necessity, that no penalty or serious damage to reputation is inflicted by proceeding to the next stage without such preliminary notice, that the statutory scheme properly construed excludes such a right to know and to reply at the earlier stage.
> But in their Lordships' opinion there is no absolute rule to this effect even if there is to be, under the procedure, an opportunity to answer the charges later. As Professor de Smith puts it in de Smith's Judicial Review of Administrative Action, 4th ed. (1980), p. 199:
>
> > "Where an act or proposal is only the first step in a sequence of measures which may culminate in a decision detrimental to a person's interests, the courts will generally decline to accede to that person's submission that he is entitled to be heard in opposition to this initial act, particularly if he is entitled to be heard at a later stage." [emphasis added by Rees.]
> In considering whether this general practice should be followed the courts should not be bound by rigid rules. It is necessary, as was made clear by Tucker L.J. in Russell v. Duke of Norfolk [1949] 1 All E.R. 109, 118 (as approved by Lord Guest in Wiseman v. Borneman [1971] A.C. 297, 311, and by Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest in Furnell v. Whangarei High Schools Board [1973] A.C. 660, 679) to have regard to all the circumstances of the case . . .

[191] Judge Reilly never received notice that he was to be re-assigned and his residence moved. The real purpose of his meeting with the Chief Judge and Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson was not disclosed. There was no opportunity granted to him to prepare himself and no opportunity to respond.

[192] Mr. Tavender's assertion that nothing in the legislative scheme of the PCJA requires any "natural justice" when a Chief Judge exercises his administrative, supervisory and disciplinary powers (prior to s. 9 being repealed) is met by the principle that if a statute is silent upon the question the Courts will imply a rule that natural justice be applied where required. See Rees at 191, quoting Lord Guest in Wiseman v. Borneman, [1971] A.C. 297 at 310.

[193] On this ground alone I would quash the decision of the Chief Judge.

DISPOSITION

[194] The Chief Judge did not have the authority to make the impugned decision and did not follow procedural fairness in making it. Accordingly, Judge Reilly's re-assignment to Calgary and his change of residence to Calgary cannot be implemented.

[195] The impugned decision is quashed.

[196] The parties may, on proper notice, speak to costs.

DATED at Calgary, Alberta, this 26th day of April, 1999.

"RE: JUDGE REILLY/CANMORE - BANFF BASE POINT

I enclose a recent ruling by Judge Reilly [the Twoyoungmen decision]. Its content continues an apparent obsession of Judge Reilly to subjugate the law to his perception of unjust social conditions on the Stoney First Nation Reserve at Morley.

While his approach may be well-intentioned, it is not, in my view, in conformity with his obligations as a jurist which is to apply appropriate legal considerations to applications before him.

I can only conclude from his comments on pages 9-10 (Point 9) of his ruling that when matters before him involve aboriginal persons, he does not intend to act objectively, judicially or in accordance with Canadian law. The last paragraph of his ruling indicates a pre-judgment attitude that would clearly, in my view, support an application to disqualify him from presiding over any case on the basis of bias.

For these reasons alone, it is my recommendation that Judge Reilly be re-assigned to preside in a legal environment other than the circuit where he now presides.

Furthermore, for the past 18 months I have been monitoring the caseload on Judge Reilly's circuit. As you are aware, Judge Reilly sits four days per week. The average sitting times for each location over the past 18 months are (according to statistics supplied by his Court Clerk, which includes the time when the court is in recess) [original emphasis]:

Banff - 2:26
Canmore - 3:07
Cochrane - 2:51

Prosecution of cases on that circuit is all handled out of the Calgary Crown Office. Almost all defence counsel who appear in the courts on that circuit come from Calgary.

The Base Point in Canmore employs six persons. The budget request for 1998-1999 is $416,000. Following extensive discussions with Mr. Paul, our Court Manager, it is estimated that if the Canmore Base Point were to be closed, the circuit could be serviced just as efficiently out of Calgary by a combination of Judges and Commissioners with a cost saving of approximately $173,900.

A further consideration is the strong possibility that the initiation of an aboriginal justice component to deal with the Stoney Nation cases (plus Tsuu T'ina matters) would reduce the current combined Cochrane caseload by 80 percent.

For all of the above reasons, I recommend that consideration be given to closing the Canmore Base Point and transferring the court administration for that circuit to Calgary. That closure should coincide with Judge Reilly's re-assignment.

I appreciate that the changes I am recommending may be interpreted in some quarters as being directed in a punitive way against Judge Reilly for his actions in the Hunter case and other matters involving aboriginals. While it will be impossible to prevent such interpretations from arising, the simple fact is that the changes, if approved, will not occur as a result of any government initiative; it will occur as a result of a judicial initiative. Simply put, at the moment there is not enough work for a judge on that circuit, with the anticipated aboriginal justice initiative there will be even less.

I look forward to your reaction and further direction."

TAB 24 - Excerpts from April 1, 1998 letter from Judge Reilly to the Chief Judge

"I sincerely apologize for my clumsiness and the consternation which it has caused you.

I do ask you to consider this. The Poles, the Irish and the Aboriginal People of Canada have all suffered from the humiliation and limitations of being dominated and oppressed by foreign powers. You and I escaped the foreign domination because our ancestors were able to leave their countries of origin and come here to Canada where we have enjoyed freedom and opportunity. That freedom and opportunity was not accorded the Aboriginal People except at the cost of assimilation, which meant the renunciation of their culture, tradition, traditional religion, and community in order to enjoy the benefits of 'white' society. It is my view that the phrase '... with particular attention to the circumstances of aboriginal offenders' in section 718.2(e) [of the Criminal Code] means that to do justice to these people today we must be aware of the injustices of yesterday and their current effects, and compensate for them. In attempting to put this into practice I created far more of a stir than I ever intended. I am unaware of the extent of the difficulties this has created for you, but for all of it, I apologize.

. . ."

Tab 25 - April 3, 1998 handwritten note by the Chief Judge

"April 3/98 (1) I agree with ACJ Stevenson[sic] request [referring to the other Tab 25 document].

(2) Vijay tell me what procedure we have to take to make Canmore from a base point to a circuit point.

(3) Tell me the procedure to transfer Reilly from Canmore to Calgary."

[NOTE: It is impossible to tell from the Record which of the two "April 3, 1998" documents was prepared first.]

TAB 22 - Excerpts from April 3, 1998 letter from the Chief Judge to Judge Reilly

". . .

I applaud you for your conversion on the road to Damascus and the help you are prepared to accord the Aboriginal People but I strongly object to how you are improperly abusing your judicial position to achieve this end. Your judgments in Hunter and others recently are the most atrocious judgments that I have seen as Chief Judge of the Provincial Court. An example is making findings of fact when there is no evidence before you and there are many others. You want to justify your actions under 718.2(e) which is an interpretation of that section by yourself whereby you have greatly exceeded your jurisdiction. You should pay attention to what was said by Justice Levechio in the Hunter appeal. In short your recent handling of native matters before you is in my humble opinion an embarrassment to our court.

In view of information that I have received from other judges . . . I am not aware of any corrective measure that I can take that will get you on, what I think is, the right track."

TAB 20 - Excerpts from April 9, 1998 letter from the Chief Judge to Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson

"RE: Judge Reilly/Canmore - Banff Base Point

Thank you for your letter of March 30, 1998 on the above subject. I have given serious thought to this matter and I agree with you that the base point in Canmore be closed, Judge Reilly be moved to Calgary and the circuit be serviced from Calgary. This will be a cost saving measure which is further justified by our desire to preserve the good reputation of the Provincial judiciary.

I therefore suggest that you make a formal request to me to move Judge Reilly to Calgary, close to the Canmore base point and convert it into a circuit point, with your reasons showing how you arrive at cost-saving. I will order the closure of that base point, move Judge Reilly to Calgary and forward the matter to the Minister to take appropriate action regarding financial and administrative matters in accordance with their procedures."

TAB 18 - April 21, 1998 letter from Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson to the Chief Judge

This letter sets out administrative details in various circuits. It details projected cost savings from closing the Canmore Base Point. It recommends closure of the Canmore Base Point, plus the re-assignment of Judge Reilly.

TAB 16.1 - April 24, 1998 document from Dave Paul (Manager, Provincial Court) to Jim McLaughlin (Director, Court Services)

This is an administrative document discussing various aspects of closing the Canmore Base Point. It cites advantages (e.g., cost savings, centralization, consistency) and disadvantages (reduced service to the public). It also attaches statistics on caseload volume for the various circuit courts.

TAB 14 - May 13, 1998 letter from Vijay Bhardwaj (Legal Counsel, the Provincial Court of Alberta) to Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson (plus several draft letters)

This letter states that the Chief Judge would like Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson's comments on the attached draft letters (which were later finalized as Tabs 10, 9, 8, 12 and 11, respectively). The letter also sets up the May 26, 1998 meeting among the Chief Judge, Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson and Judge Reilly.

TAB 10 - May 25, 1998 letter from the Chief Judge to Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson

"RE: Canmore Base Point - Judge Reilly

Thank you for your letter of April 21, 1998 on the above subject. I support, whole heartedly, your commitment to improve the efficiency of the justice delivery system west of Calgary. I accept your well thought out and pragmatic proposal to convert Canmore into a circuit point and move Judge Reilly to Calgary.

While I will designate sitting days for Canmore, as per your letter of April 21, 1998, the decision to keep it as a base point or change it to a circuit point belongs in the jurisdiction of the Minister (including Deputy Minister). I am requesting the Deputy Minister to do whatever is necessary to accommodate these changes, namely, to provide the cost of the move of Judge Reilly's residence from Canmore to Calgary and provide facilities for new sitting days in Canmore. (See enclosed letter to Neil McCrank).

I have reassigned Judge Reilly to preside in Calgary effective 1st of September 1998. A copy of my letter to him is enclosed for your information and necessary action."

TAB 9 - May 25, 1998 letter from the Chief Judge to Neil McCrank (Deputy Minister of Justice and Deputy Attorney General) (copied to Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson and Judge Reilly)

"As part of our ongoing commitment to improve the efficiency of the justice delivery system, Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson has thoroughly reviewed the operations of the court circuit west of Calgary (Banff, Canmore and Cochrane). I enclose his report for your perusal. [such report was not included in the record]

I agree with Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson that the above noted circuit can be run more efficiently from Calgary. This can be done by adjusting our sitting schedule on that circuit and by moving Judge Reilly from Canmore to Calgary.

Pursuant to the authority that I have under the existing laws, I intend to designate the sitting days on that circuit as suggested by Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson and re-assign Judge Reilly from Canmore to Calgary: both decisions to be effective 1st of September 1998.

Whether Canmore should remain a base point or not is in your jurisdiction: my concern is the provision of facilities there to hold sittings of our court on designated days from 1st of September 1998.

This is to request you to do whatever is necessary to facilitate the changes that I am making, namely the change of residence of Judge Reilly from Canmore to Calgary and appropriate staffing and facilities at Canmore on the new sitting days there.

Thank you for your cooperation."

TAB 8 - May 25, 1998 letter from the Chief Judge to Judge Reilly (copied to Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson)

"As a result of continuing and mounting concerns about your obsession to subjugate the law to your perception of unjust social conditions of the aboriginal peoples as well as your pre-judgement attitude which can more frequently become grounds for application to disqualify yourself from presiding over a case on the basis of bias, Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson and I have decided to re-assign you to sit in Calgary from 1st of September 1998.

This entails a change of residence for you from Canmore to Calgary. Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson will assist you with the administrative details in this matter.

I may add that this move is the only honourable way of keeping you and the Provincial Judiciary out of harm's way. For purposes of the executive branch, however, I have justified this move on administrative grounds. (See copy of enclosed letter to the Deputy Minister).

I am sending a copy of this letter to Assistant Chief Judge Stevenson. Please contact him at your early convenience to make plans to sit in Calgary from 1st of September 1998."

Date: 19980521

Docket: 1997 St. J. No. 3103; 1998 St. J. No. 0337

Roberts, J.: While the applicants, the Judges of the Provincial Court of Newfoundland (the "Judges"), and their Association, the Newfoundland Association of Provincial Court Judges (the "Judges' Association") are seeking a number of remedies, by way of general description, they are contending that the respondent, which includes the Legislature and the Executive branches of the Government of Newfoundland (the "Government"), has failed to comply with the provisions of the Provincial Court Act, R.S.N. 1991, c. 15, relating to the setting of their salaries and benefits.

The Judges' claims can only be understood against the background of various actions by the Government since 1991. Accordingly, I will elaborate chronologically those actions and the various responses by the Judges thereto before being more specific about the corrective measures they are asking be ordered.

My analysis of the Judges' claims will also require a review of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference Re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court (P.E.I.), 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3; 217 N.R. 1; 206 A.R. 1; 156 W.A.C. 1; 121 Man.R.(2d) 1; 158 W.A.C. 1; 156 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 1; 483 A.P.R. 1 and 1998

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Provincial Court Judges Case was issued on September 18, 1997. At the request of several of the parties concerned with the repercussions of the judgment, a rehearing was held on January 19, 1998. The Court's judgment on the rehearing was issued on February 10, 1998.

The Chief Judge of the Provincial Court of Newfoundland (the "Chief Judge") was granted leave to intervene in support of the Judges and to present arguments concerning the import of various amendments to the Provincial Court Act, S.N. 1997, c. 19, brought into force on December 11, 1997.

Background

Prior to the Provincial Court Act, 1991, the salary of the Provincial Court Judges was established by regulation under its predecessor act, The Provincial Court Act, 1974. For example, by Newfoundland Regulation 161-87 filed on September 1, 1987 the salary of a Provincial Court Judge was, "effective from the 1st day of April, 1988, 85 percent of the salary of the Deputy Minister of Justice of the Province as it is from time to time". The same Regulation provided for an additional payment of $5,000.00 to the Chief Judge.

The last increase of the salary of a Provincial Court Judge prior to the one given in December 1997, which will be referred to later, was effective January 1, 1991, at which time the salary was set at $90,129.00 and the salary of the Chief Judge at $95,129.00. The salary scale of the Deputy Minister of Justice for the Province at the time was between $81,564.00 and $106,033.00. In April 1990, the salary of the Deputy Minister was $88,423.00. As of November 13, 1997, the pay scale of the Deputy Minister of Justice had not been changed. The salary for the position, nevertheless, had increased from $91,780.00 per annum for the fiscal year 1991-1992 to $106,033.00 per annum for the fiscal year 1995-1996.

For the Newfoundland Government and all governments in Canada, the first half of the 1990s demanded fiscal restraint. Thus, in early 1991, the Government introduced the Public Sector Restraint Act which was subsequently passed by the Legislature and assented to on April 18, 1991 (R.S.N. 1991, c. 3). Pursuant to s. 4(1) of the Act, Provincial Court Judges and the officers and employees of the Provincial Court of Newfoundland were deemed to be public sector employees. The Act prevented increases in pay scales during a restraint period identified in s. 2(e) as the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1991 and ending on March 31, 1992.

SCOLLIN, J.

I. INTRODUCTION

The main legal issue in this case is whether the provincial government has unconstitutionally infringed the independence of the judiciary by legislating a reduction in the amount of their remuneration. The first of two other issues, both said to involve infringements of the independence of the judiciary, relates to the closing of the Provincial Court on certain days. The second relates to alleged improper pressure by the Government in the course of discussions with the judges about judicial salaries. Both of these are secondary issues involving findings of fact, and I will deal with them after I have disposed of the principal constitutional issue.

After resorting to layoffs and wage freezes in its operations for two years, the Government of Manitoba was still faced in early 1993 with a mounting deficit of about $230 million more than it had budgeted. Instead of directly laying off employees or merely rolling back wages, it decided in February of 1993 to save money by reducing pay, capping or cutting back funding and generally eliminating some paid working-time in the public sector. On July 27, 1993 it therefore passed The Public Sector Reduced Work Week and Compensation Management Act, S.M. 1993, c. 21 ("Bill 22"), to be administered by the respondent Minister of Labour.

The members of an association of provincially-appointed judges ("the Association") contend that, as a matter of law, Bill 22 cannot constitutionally be applied to them as it unjustifiably interferes, in an arbitrary and discretionary manner, with their financial security, by overriding the statutory process in The Provincial Court Act, R.S.M. 1987, c. 275 by which alone, they say, their compensation is to be set.

The respondent ("the Government") contends that neither in law nor in fact has it interfered with the individual or collective independence of the provincially-appointed judges; and that Bill 22 is not inconsistent with The Provincial Court Act or, if it is found to be inconsistent, it prevails.

II. THE RELATIONSHIP OF THIS CASE TO THE CASES OF R. v. CAMPBELL, R. v. EKMECIC AND R. v. WICKMAN

The issues raised by the Association in the present case were argued before me on October 24, 1994. In the course of preparing these reasons, counsel drew to my attention the reasons for judgment of McDonald, J. of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta covering these cases referred in the heading. Argument ("the Alberta case") had been presented during the summer and the reasons were handed down on November 15. The Alberta case dealt with various issues arising from the particular legislation in force there that has an impact on the independence of the judges of the provincial court in that province, including security of tenure and the involvement of the attorney general regarding sittings. The judgment, however, dealt primarily and extensively with the aspect of financial security of the judges of the provincial court of Alberta whose compensation was reduced as a result of legislation similar to Bill 22. In regard to this issue, the reasons of McDonald, J. cover the cases, statutes and texts which were canvassed in argument before me. More than enough repetitive bodies of quotation already slumber under the covers of the law reports. It would be pedantic for me to repeat the extracts selected by McDonald, J. from British, Canadian and American sources; for the purposes of my decision in this case, I shall simply refer to the lettered portions of his reasons.

I am in general agreement with the detailed analysis of the cases and statutes by McDonald, J., and I agree with his reasoning on the issue of financial security. I also agree with the substance of his conclusion that a true reduction of indefinite duration in judicial compensation is not constitutionally permissible except as a non-selective and non-discriminatory part of an overall legislative economic measure, such as income tax and the like; that is, a measure which is not confined to expenditure on the services provided by or through government and affecting only those paid from the public purse such as politicians, civil servants, members of administrative tribunals and the like. Neither the legislation in Alberta (nor, in my view, that in issue here) constitutes such an overall economic measure. In the result, McDonald, J. concluded that the Alberta legislation was invalid.

On this issue of invalidity my reading of Bill 22, leads me to a different conclusion. For the reasons set out later, I have concluded that constitutional protection of the financial security inherent in judicial independence must in an economic emergency give way to a reasonable, proportionate and limited deferment only (by way of "reduction"); and that such deferment, not affecting or eroding the vested right to judicial compensation already fixed, is not and will not be perceived to be an infringement on judicial independence. Thus, I take the view that,. as a legislature is presumed to act within its constitutional limits, Bill 22 must be read down so as to provide only for a temporary suspension of the actual payment of full compensation, subject, on the expiry of the legislation, to full retroactive reinstatement of all compensation that was suspended.

III. THE MANITOBA LEGISLATION IN ISSUE

The Provincial Court Act. By s. 3, the Cabinet appoints judges in accordance with a statutory nomination and selection procedure. By s. 8, the Cabinet appoints a chief judge after a similar statutory nomination and selection process. By s. 3, the chief judge and the other full time judges hold office during good behaviour. By s. 8.1, the chief judge has general supervisory powers in respect of judges and "other staff" in matters that are assigned by law to the court and is also responsible for the judicial functions of the court, "including direction over sittings of the court and the assignment of judicial duties". Section 7 sets out the broad jurisdiction of the Provincial Court judges in Manitoba, including confirmation of the power conferred by federal legislation. Section 13 of Bill 22 establishes a criminal division of the court, and s. 16 establishes a family (including youth court) division. Section 10 prohibits any fill time judge carrying on any business, trade, profession or occupation. Section 11 provides for vacation pay, sick leave and other benefits "as if the judge were a Manitoba Government employee".

A significant provision for the purpose of the issues in this case is s. 11.1 which was added as a result of the recommendation of the Manitoba Law Reform Commission in 1989 that the Government should establish a different and more seemly relationship with the judiciary than that hitherto provided by provincial law, so that both the judiciary and the Government would be able to make recommendations to an "independent" compensation committee. The report of that committee, of course, would remain subject to the ultimate vote of the Legislature. The Association argues that this s. 11.1 "takes on quasi-constitutional status which renders it 'greater' than other provincial legislation and must be interpreted and applied in a manner which is consistent with the constitutional guarantee of judicial independence". I will consider later the present status of s. 11.1 which provides:

"Compensation committee established

11.1(1) The minister shall, once every two years, commencing in 1990, cause a compensation committee, to be known as the Judicial Compensation Committee, to be established to review, determine and report to the minister on, the salaries and benefits payable to judges, including pensions, vacations, sick leave, travel expenses and allowances.

Composition of compensation committee

11.1(2) A compensation committee established under subsection (1) shall be appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council and shall consist of a person designated by the judges of the court, and two persons, one of whom shall not be a civil servant, designated by the minister; and the Lieutenant Governor in Council shall designate one of the persons as chairperson of the compensation committee.

Powers of compensation committee

11.1(3) A compensation committee appointed under subsection (2) has such powers of commissioners appointed under Part V of The Manitoba Evidence Act as the Lieutenant Governor in Council may direct, and has the protection and privileges of commissioners so appointed.

Minister to table report

11.1(4) A report submitted under subsection (1) shall, within 30 days after it is submitted, be tabled by the minister in the Legislature if it is in session, and if the Legislature is not in session, not later than 30 days after the opening of the next session of the Legislature.

Referral of report to committee

11.1(5) A report that is tabled in the Legislature under subsection (4) shall be referred, within 30 days of being tabled, to a standing committee of the Legislature to report, within 60 days or such time as the Legislative Assembly may direct, on the recommendations of the compensation committee.

Implementation of report

11.1(6) Where the Legislative Assembly receives and votes on the report of a standing committee that is received under subsection (5), the government shall proceed to implement the report in accordance with the vote of the Legislative Assembly, and all Acts, regulations and administrative practices shall be deemed to be amended as necessary to implement the report."

Bill 22, which reduced the work week and compensation, provides by s. 3 that Part 1 of the Bill prevails over every other Act. Subsection 9(1) of Part 1 purports to "reduce" the remuneration of the provincially-appointed judges by 3.8% for the year from April 1, 1993 to March 31, 1994 and provides a formula for the reduction for the next fiscal year from April 1, 1994 to March 31, 1995. By ss. 9(2), the salary reduction "may be achieved where practicable" by the judge taking specific days of leave without pay. Part 2 of Bill 22 deals with the compensation of medical practitioners by limiting the total funding for the provision of insured medical services. Part 3 of the Bill, dealing with the reduction of the compensation for members of the Legislative Assembly, provides by subsections 24(1) and (2) and subsections 25(1) and (2) for reductions of indemnity and constituency allowance respectively, similar those in s. 9 for judges.

Section 3 of Bill 22 provides:

> "This Part prevails over every other Act and every regulation, collective agreement, employment contract or arrangement, arbitral or other award or decision and every obligation, right, claim,. agreement or arrangement of any kind."

Section 9 of Bill 22 provides:

> "Judges, boards, commissions and committees 9(1) The amount that would otherwise be paid to every person who receives remuneration as a judge of The Provincial Court or in respect of services performed as a member of a Crown agency or a board, commission or committee, to which he or she is appointed by a minister or by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, shall be reduced
>
> (a) for the period commencing on April 1, 1993 and ending on March 31, 1994, by 3.8%;
>
>
> (b) for the period commencing on April 1, 1994 and ending on March 31, 1995, by an amount that is generally equivalent to the amount by which the wages of employees under a collective agreement with Her Majesty in right of Manitoba are reduced in the same period as a result of a requirement to take days or portions of days of leave without pay in that period.
>
> Reduction achieved by leave days
> 9(2) The reduction mentioned in subsection (1) may be achieved, where practicable, by the person's taking specific approved days or portions of days as days of leave without pay."

As to s. 9, the Association takes the position that in enacting the provisions of Bill 22 the Government has improperly interfered with the financial security of judges and with the process of determining judicial compensation established by s. 11.1 of The Provincial Court Act. This issue of the relationship between the two pieces of legislation will be considered first.

IV. DOES THE NEW ACT OVERRIDE S. 11.1 OF THE PROVINCIAL COURT ACT?

The description by the Association of s. 11.1 as "quasi constitutional" is not a very helpful assessment of the nature of the legislation. "Quasi" means that something seemingly is, but really isn't. The words were used by Laskin, J. (as he then was) in Hogan v. The Queen, 1974 CanLII 185 (SCC), [1975] 2 S.C.R. 574 at 579 to describe the special respect and status accorded to the 1960 Bill of Rights. However, the description is hardly merited by a statutory process designed to assist in the setting of judges' salaries. A constitution can be amended only by the amending formula it prescribes. It is its own source. All other legislation may be amended or repealed by later legislation. Subject to my remarks about legislative efforts that impair already fixed and settled judicial compensation, whatever might be the political or social ramifications of removing laws from the statute book, there is no legal impediment to doing just that. This is the case even with legislation designed to secure the often diversely-perceived "human rights". If the Government has the temerity to repeal such legislation, the issue still remains whether existing laws meet the minimum requirements of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In any event, the independence of the judiciary is both implicit in the acknowledgment in the preamble to the Charter that Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the rule of law and express in ss. 11(d), although the precise parameters of judicial independence are not. fixed with precision by any law, even by sections 96 - 100 of the Constitution, which recognize the inherent authority and jurisdiction of judges of the superior courts. In these circumstances I cannot see that s. 11.1 of The Provincial Court Act and the process which it prescribes are immune from Bill 22. The section remains in force but its effective operation is suspended. There is nothing to prevent the continued appointment of compensation committees, but, without amending Bill 22, the Legislature has disentitled itself from voting to give immediate effect to any recommendations which it might endorse. In this respect, the position in the province is no different from that prevailing in regard to Superior Court judges. The statutory triennial commissions may make whatever recommendations they see fit for increase in salary but, unless the law is amended, the present federal statutory "freeze" prevents Parliament from giving effect, in the meantime, to any proposed increase.

Further, although Bill 22, .while it remains in force, renders the process under s. 11.1 of The Provincial Court Act ineffective, it does not repeal that process; and it does not prevent the continuing biennial appointment of compensation committees under ss. 11.1(1) to review and report on all aspects of salaries, benefits, pensions and the like. The Legislature is, for the present, effectively precluded from fully implementing a committee report by reason of Bill 22, but the future decisions in the Legislature may well be affected by the continued reasoned recommendations of the committee; and in view of my conclusion on the main constitutional issue, the continuation of the process may well prove useful.

V. DEVELOPMENT OF THE CONCEPT OF FINANCIAL SECURITY AS AN ESSENTIAL ELEMENT OF JUDICIAL INDEPENDENCE

At letter "E" of the judgment in the Alberta case, McDonald, J. quotes a number of recent judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada which discuss the historical foundations of the concept of judicial independence in Canada, leading to the conclusion expressed by Dickson, C.J.C. in Beauregard v. Canada, 1986 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 56 at p. 73:

> "In summary, Canadian constitutional history and current Canadian constitutional law establish clearly the deep roots and contemporary vitality and vibrancy of the principle of judicial independence in Canada. The role of the courts as resolver of disputes, interpreter of the law and defender of the Constitution requires that they be completely separate in authority and function from all other participants in the justice system."

It is important to note that in the same case, at p. 78, he observed that:

> "... salary and pension changes were intended to be complementary and, as a comprehensive package, did not diminish, reduce, or impair the financial position of federally-appointed judges." (emphasis supplied)

The underlined words show that the need to protect already-fixed judicial compensation from impairment by legislative action is an element that cannot be ignored in determining the validity of a purported diminution or reduction.

I also emphasize two observations made in Valente v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 673. The first is at p. 689:

> "... It is ... important that a tribunal should be perceived as independent, as well as impartial, and that the test for independence should include that perception. The perception must, however, as have suggested, be a perception of whether the tribunal enjoys the essential objective conditions or guarantees of judicial independence, and not a perception of how it will in fact act, regardless of whether it enjoys such conditions or guarantees."

The second at p. 704 relates to security of compensation:

> "The second essential condition of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter is, in my opinion, what may be referred to as financial security. That means security of salary or other remuneration, and, where appropriate, security of pension. The essence of such security is that the right to salary and pension should be established by law and not be subject to arbitrary interference by the Executive in a manner that could affect judicial independence. In the case of pension, the essential distinction is between a right to a pension and a pension that depends on the grace or favour of the Executive."

For the sake of brevity, I adopt the historical account given by McDonald, J. at the letter "F" in his reasons. The development of financial security as an element of judicial independence in England has culminated in legislative recognition there that, once fixed, the salaries paid to judges of the Supreme Court "may be increased, but not reduced".

The history of the financial security of the judiciary has, of course, been incremental and not unbroken. During the depression years in England the salaries of judges were reduced, but the government action was much criticized and recognized as constitutionally questionable at the very least. In Canada, in the same period, the Government declined to apply to judges the statutory salary reduction which it applied to the civil service. It accepted the view that "it would be a breach of the statutory rights of judges to undertake to make a curtailment of their salaries in this way". However, as a result of political pressure in the Cabinet, it went on to pass a special income tax act to levy the same reduction on judicial salaries. This somewhat devious and dubious device seems to offend the constitutional principle by doing indirectly what is impermissible directly.

Of course, claims to high principle may turn out to be self-seeking on stilts: and the judiciary has occasionally, in the name of principle, sought to avoid the burden of such general economic measures as income tax. For example, over 50 years ago, some federally-appointed judges tried unsuccessfully to immunize themselves from provincial income tax: see Judges v. A.G. of Saskatchewan, 1937 CanLII 368 (UK JCPC), [1937] 1 W.W.R. 508 at 512 where the Privy Council said:

> "... Neither the independence nor any other attribute of the judiciary can be affected by a general income tax which charges their official incomes on the same footing as the incomes of other citizens. ..." (emphasis supplied)

And, again, in the United States the federal judges unsuccessfully sought a similar exemption on the ground that their compensation was being unconstitutionally "diminished".

Subsection 11(d) of the Charter provides:

> "Any person charged with an offence has the right
>
> (d) to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal; ..."

Without repeating the reasoning of McDonald, J. on the issue of financial security and the effect of ss. 11(d) of the Charter, I adopt his conclusion that:

> " .. [O]nly a general reduction by a mechanism (like income tax), the burden of which is shared by the population at large is permissible, and the salary scale must be adjusted upward from time to > time to maintain the real value of the salaries. And these characteristics of the guarantee of financial security are applicable not only to federally-appointed judges but also to judges of the Provincial Courts who exercise jurisdiction over the trial of persons charged with an offence."

The reasons for the application of the same constitutional principle to provincially-appointed judges is obvious and I need not repeat the observations by McDonald, J. in the Alberta case at letter "D", in which he sets out the extensive jurisdiction and responsibilities of those judges. The substance of his remarks applies equally to the Provincial Court of Manitoba. On the issue of independence, the fact that the jurisdiction of the superior courts has an express constitutional base as compared with the purely statutory base of the Provincial Court is immaterial. The Provincial Court receives its jurisdiction both from federal statutes which confer it, such as the Criminal Code, and from provincial statutes such as The Highway Traffic Act, so that a person accused of an offence is entitled to a hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal whether his trial takes place before a Superior Court judge or before a judge of the Provincial Court.

In the result, I agree with the conclusions of McDonald, J. that the salaries of Provincial Court judges, once fixed, may not be eroded or impaired by the Legislature. I disagree with the contrary view of MacDonald, C.J.T.D., P.E.I.S.C. in R. v. Lowther, [1994] P.E.I.J. No. 98, delivered on September 21, 1994. The case concerned the application to the judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island of The Sector Pay. Reduction Act, S.P.E.I. 1994, Cap. 51. MacDonald, C.J.T.D. decided, in the result, that the manner in which the Act was applied to the judges of the Provincial Court created a reasonable perception that they lacked judicial independence or impartiality (paragraph 56). However, I am not persuaded by his classification of the legislation, which affects the public sector only, as a general overall economic measure. He said:

> "... Here, only a limited group of people have been involved in reductions of pay rates. Nevertheless, if the legislation is only making an equal reduction in pay rates to all those mentioned in the Act, then such would not derogate from a judge's judicial independence." (para. 35)

He consequently took the position that:

> "... If Provincial Court judges have been dealt with in a manner consistent with public sector employees, it cannot be said to be an arbitrary interference with the independence of the judges. ..." (para. 37)

In my view, the historical development of the concept of the independence of the judiciary leads to the conclusion arrived at in the Alberta case rather than that arrived at in the Prince Edward Island case.

It is simplistic to say that what has been fixed by legislation may also be unfixed or altered by legislation. That is generally true of ordinary legislation even if the change may have major social impact: see, for example, Re Canada Assistance Plan (B.C.), [1991) 1991 CanLII 74 (SCC), 2 S.C.R. 525. That case involved the application of the legislative power of repeal contained in ss. 42(1) of the federal Interpretation Act, R.S.C., c. I-21 which provides:

> "Every Act shall be so construed as to reserve to Parliament the power of repealing or amending it, and of revoking, restricting or modifying any power, privilege or advantage thereby vested in or granted to any person."

Subsection 23(1) of The Interpretation Act of Manitoba, R.S.M. 1987, c. 180 is in essentially the same terms. It does not, however, follow that legislation which is passed to comply with a constitutional imperative may be altered at will and with constitutional impunity. In this regard 1 disagree with the opinions of Thurlow, C.J. and Pratte, J. as recounted in Beauregard v. Canada, 1986 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 56 at 66. They held that as Parliament had power to fix the salaries of the judges of the superior courts, it had power to reduce them. As the Supreme Court of Canada took an entirely different view of the impact of the legislation in question, it did not have to address the issue of an actual reduction.

My conclusion that judicial salaries cannot generally be reduced is not inconsistent with accepting the constitutionality of a reasonable, temporary and proportionate suspension of payment in an economic emergency. Where, in the judgment of the Government, fiscal demands on the public treasury can be met only by immediate but determinate restraints on the Government's own spending, the constitutional entitlement of the judiciary to the compensation already fixed and vested can properly be accommodated by a deferment of payment, subject to full restoration when the legislated period terminates. I do not regard such a temporary reduction in disbursement of compensation as an infringement of the independence of the judiciary.

I consider that the situation here warrants "reading down" s. 9 of Bill 22. In its general application and in its application to the judges of the Provincial Court, the legislation is essentially valid. Understandably, it does not confirm that, when it expires on March 31, 1995, the amount of the deductions withheld from the already-fixed compensation of the judges will be restored in full. On the other hand, whatever effect the legislators thought they were bringing about, they enacted legislation which does not expressly preclude restoration and which should, if possible, be given a meaning consistent with the Constitution. That being so, and given that the fixed base of judicial compensation may not be impaired or eroded by legislation such as Bill 22, the terms, "reduced" and "reduction", in their application to amounts withheld from judges of the Provincial Court, may reasonably be and should be construed to mean only that payment is deferred for the limited period of the operation of the statute.

VI REASONS FOR NON-IMPAIRMENT OF FINANCIAL SECURITY

In letter "F(f)" and elsewhere in his reasons, McDonald, J. considers various practical arguments in favour of preserving the financial security of judges from legislative and economic in-roads. Judges obviously cannot and do not expect the self-bestowed largesse of senior corporate executives or money managers. They cannot and do not expect to be able to fix their own salaries and pensions as legislators do. And they do not seek the rewards of those who are endowed with transient talent in the firing of such commercial projectiles as pucks, baseballs, footballs and basketballs. Clearly, the salaries of judges must be set at a firm, fair and sensible level in the appreciation that the amounts must be found in either the Consolidated Fund or in the annual appropriations. The constitutional right in ss. 11(d) of the Charter is the right of the citizen, not of the judge, but the derivative right of the judge is to have the constitutional right protected. by due legislative action by the government.

In this regard a certain assurance exists in the common method of arriving at reasonable compensation by relating it in some way to the salaries of senior public servants. Some reasonable yardstick must be used, but the use of this particular yardstick is liable to lead to the common confusion, reinforced by attempts to reduce judicial salaries, that the judiciary is merely another group of employees. In law and in fact, the judiciary is in quite a different position from either ministers or senior civil servants, who hold their offices at pleasure and who may and frequently do move on to lucrative positions in the world of business, diplomacy or academe. The career of the judge is not generally taken up until the lawyer is well into mid-life and the office of judge is its own beginning and its own end. In the vast majority of cases there is neither ambition, opportunity nor energy left for late-life endeavour in another field. This is part of the real foundation that underlies the constitutional guarantee. Compensation by society of its judges must be sufficient and sufficiently stable to ensure as far as possible that good, experienced and competent practitioners are attracted to the bench. If the salaries of judges are to be subjected to political vagaries, then the standards of impartiality and independence are imperilled in the long term; the citizen is put at risk of widespread patronage and in eventual danger of being judged by inadequate appointees chosen from the denizens of the grubby netherworld of the law or from lawyers who have barely subsisted above the mental poverty line.

In concluding my remarks on financial security, I point out that various processes have been adopted by legislators to fix judicial salaries. In some cases the compensation is set by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, in others it is set directly by the Legislature itself. In some cases commissions or committees are appointed by Cabinet to make recommendations to the legislators; in other cases, not. Unfortunately, the recommendations of successive statutory commissions may end up effectively ignored and the reports may stand as derelict bridges between the legislators and the judiciary. It is clear, however, that, while legislators have the last word in voting, persistent refusal to pay more than lip-service to the independent, non-partisan committees or commissions appointed under purposive legislation endangers not only the institutional standing of the judiciary but also the very constitution itself.

VII PUBLIC RIGHT OF ACCESS TO COURTS

I propose to treat this allegation very briefly. The issue is one of fact. I am satisfied from the affidavit of Mr. Bruce, the Assistant Deputy Minister responsible, that successive Chief Judges of the Provincial Court were duly consulted and did indeed direct the closing of the courts over the summer and in the Christmas period. I accept the evidence that, one way or another, the necessary staff would have been provided to enable the courts to remain open. Equally, I am sure that if the chief judge had decided that there would be no closing of the sort envisaged by the Government's overall plan, sufficient court and other staff would have been made available to satisfy operational requirements.

In what was really the second year of legislated cut-backs, the people involved already had experience of the arrangements carried out in the first year. It was no doubt a reasonable expectation of repetition that led to early instructions being issued to crown attorneys, full-time legal aid lawyers and others about the days on which court would not be held. These instructions had been issued before Chief Judge Webster announced her decision, but I am satisfied that if she had decided that the Provincial Court would remain open on the "down" days selected, any conflicting instructions to staff and other involved would have been countermanded. I am also satisfied that the operational decision as to court sittings is a matter for the chief judge under ss. 8.1(1)(b) of The Provincial Court Act. No doubt the chief judge may consult the members of the court in arriving at a decision on sittings but the responsibility in law is that of the chief judge alone, not that of the collectivity. This is not inconsistent with there remaining in the hands of each individual judge the ultimate responsibility for control of the times and days on which the particular case before him will be heard or will continue. As well, there are sound practical reasons for the Crown playing a major role in organizing appearances and in getting cases to trial, but that arrangement is a matter of convenience, not of law.

In the circumstances, I conclude that the Government did not infringe judicial independence in regard to court sittings.

VIII ALLEGED IMPROPER PRESSURE BY THE GOVERNMENT ON JUDGES

Again, this is a matter of fact with which I propose to deal with only briefly. At one point counsel for the Government and counsel for the Association had reached agreement to present a joint recommendation to the compensation committee set up under s. 11.1 of The Provincial Court Act. Before the joint recommendation could be signed, counsel for the Government sought to have the Association state whether it intended to challenge the validity of Bill 22. The Association saw this as an attempt to tie in the issue of compensation with the issue of the Association's right to challenge the Bill and, therefore, declined to answer the request about the position it proposed to take. In the result, the joint submission was neither signed nor made.

The Association perceives the Government's conduct as a pressure tactic, an attempt to undermine the independence of the judiciary, and an attempt to circumvent the judicial compensation process.

Particularly in the light of my conclusion on the main issue, am satisfied that Bill 22 does not negate the continuation of the compensation committee process. The Association was then, and remains now, free to continue with its submissions to the committee.

The position taken by the government at the time the joint recommendation was about to be submitted to the committee was as indiscreet but, in the circumstances, immaterial.

IX SECTION 1 OF THE CHARTER

Both parties addressed as an alternative the possible application of s. 1 of the Charter which provides:

> "The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society."

The Association contends that, on the basis of R. v. Oakes (1986), 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), 26 D.L.R. (4th) 200 (S.C.C.), Bill 22 is an unjustified limit on judicial independence. The government argues that, as Bill 22 has no impact at all on ss. 11(d), s. 1 is not relevant; and that even if Bill 22 has an impact, the requirements of s. 1 have been met.

I see no need to invoke s. 1 otherwise than as a sensible general canon of construction in deciding on the rational, inherent boundaries of the particular right. In subsection 11(d) of the Charter individual rights and the rights of society coincide and produce the derivative rights of the judiciary. Flowing from the right to an independent and impartial tribunal is the assurance to the individual and to society that judges are financially secure. It is only if, either in fact or in the informed perception of society, the Legislature renders the judges less than financially secure that the coincident rights of the individual and society are infringed. If the actions of legislators do not cause judges to be financially insecure, neither the right of the individual nor the right of society is in jeopardy. The deferment of compensation for a limited time and as a result of pressing fiscal conditions (as is the case here) is not sufficient to place any rights in jeopardy. Therefore, as the right of the individual and the right of society to an independent and impartial tribunal have not been infringed, no Charter right has been limited and the almost inedible law-and-policy porridge of the Oakes case need not be served.

X SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS

1. Subsection 11(d) of the Charter expressly enunciates the overriding, established constitutional requirement for an independent and impartial tribunal. This requirement applies not only to Superior Court judges but also to judges of the Provincial Court. Once fixed, judicial salaries may not be reduced except as part of a general overall economic measure.

2. Bill 22 is not a general overall economic measure. It is a specific restraint measure applicable only to members of the Legislature, to civil servants and to various state supported operations. These subjects of Bill 22 are not protected by the constitutional imperative of an independent and impartial tribunal. The Bill, therefore, cannot operate to effect a reduction in judicial compensation already fixed.

3. However, read in a manner that is consistent with the Constitution, Bill 22 is effective to defer payment while the statute is in force. This determinate deferment is not a limitation of any rationally-defined constitutional right, provided that restoration is made following the expiry of the legislation.

In the circumstances, Bill 22 as I have construed it is not unconstitutional and the application of the Association is dismissed.

Trial Division, McGillis J."Ottawa, January 19, 20, 21 and March 23, 1998.

Human Rights — Human Rights Tribunal's institutional independence and impartiality — Statutory scheme failing to provide Tribunal members with sufficient guarantee of security of tenure, financial security — Therefore,

Tribunal lacking requisite level of institutional independence, giving rise to reasonable apprehension of bias — Presently binding guidelines which Commission may issue on Tribunal with respect to manner in which any provision of Act applies in particular case should be non-binding — Pay equity case cannot be decided by Tribunal until legislation amended.

Administrative law — Statutory scheme failing to provide Human Rights Tribunal members with sufficient guarantee of security of tenure, financial security — Reasonable apprehension of bias as Tribunal lacking requisite level of institutional independence — Presently binding guidelines which Commission may issue on Tribunal with respect to manner in which any provision of Act applies in particular case should be non-binding.

Pay equity complaints were filed with the Canadian Human Rights Commission against Bell Canada and a Human Rights Tribunal was appointed to hear the matter. Bell Canada then raised the question of whether the Tribunal was an institutionally independent and impartial quasi-judicial body. This was an application for judicial review of the Tribunal's decision concluding that it was an independent quasi-judicial body, institutionally capable of providing a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of natural justice and fundamental freedom.

Held, the application should be allowed.

The Human Rights Commission and Tribunal

Originally, the Human Rights Tribunals were, administratively, financially and statutorily extensively dependent on the Human Rights Commission. The Tribunal Panel was created in 1985 to improve the situation. However, the power of the Commission to make by-laws fixing the rates of remuneration for its part-time members, its experts and the members of a Tribunal, as well as their expenses, remained in effect. Similarly, the power of the Commission to issue guidelines binding on itself and any Tribunal was unaffected. Finally, the Commission, under the supervision and direction of the Chief Commissioner, retained its general responsibility for the administration of the Act, including Part III relating to all aspects of the Tribunal Panel and its activities. The Commission provided all administrative and corporate services, including financial and personnel services, to the Tribunal Panel. Fees or expenses of the members of a Tribunal would be submitted to the Commission's financial services for payment. Pay cheques for Tribunal members were requisitioned by the Commission and bore on their face the words "Canadian Human Rights Commission". Furthermore, the Tribunal Panel had no authority to submit its budget to Parliament; only the Commission could appropriate the necessary funding. Steps were gradually taken to increase the Tribunal's institutional independence.

Bills introduced to amend the Act for the purpose of ensuring institutional independence died on the order paper. Another bill, S-5, seeking to achieve that purpose was still, in March 1998, before the Justice and Human Rights Committee for study. Meanwhile, by orders in council adopted in 1996, the Commission ceased to have any operational or budgetary role in relation to the Tribunal Panel. Nevertheless, the Act still required the Commission to fix the remuneration, travel and living expenses of the members of a Tribunal. Furthermore, the Commission still had statutory power to issue guidelines binding on itself and any Tribunal with respect to the manner in which any provision of the Act would apply in a particular case or in a class of cases. The Commission's Equal Wages Guidelines, 1986, respecting the application of section 11 of the Act and prescribing factors justifying different wages between men and women performing work of equal value in the same establishment, was still in effect for the purposes of the present case.

Since 1985, all appointments (and reappointments) to the Tribunal Panel, including the President, were part-time appointments (generally for two, three or five years) made by the Governor in Council. The Minister of Justice had complete discretion to make a recommendation concerning the question of reappointment. In the present case, the terms of all three members appointed in 1996 to constitute the Tribunal were scheduled to expire in 1997, and it would be necessary to make an application to the Minister of Justice to extend their terms. When they were asked to hear the present case, the three members were told that the hearing would be a lengthy one. They were presumably interested in having their terms extended, or they would not have agreed to sit on the case.

Judicial independence

Judicial independence is part of the rules of natural justice, and as such applies to proceedings before administrative tribunals performing an adjudicative role. In determining the judicial independence of a tribunal, both its institutional independence and its institutional impartiality may be challenged. With respect to institutional independence, the classic test in Committee for Justice and Liberty et al. v. National Energy Board et al., 1976 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 369 (test for reasonable apprehension of bias) as approved in Valente v. The Queen et al., 1985 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 673, and virtually all of the other applicable Supreme Court of Canada cases, must be applied to an analysis of the three core characteristics of judicial independence: security of tenure, financial security and administrative independence. The test should be applied flexibly, having regard to the functions exercised by the tribunal. The level of institutional independence required will depend on the nature of the tribunal, the interests at stake and other indices of independence. Furthermore, in assessing the question of institutional independence, the practice of a tribunal is relevant. In relation to institutional impartiality, the two-pronged test outlined in R. v. Lippé, 1990 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 114 must be applied (1- will there be a reasonable apprehension of bias in the mind of the fully informed person in a substantial number of cases; 2- if the answer is no, allegations of an apprehension of bias cannot be brought on an institutional level, but must be dealt with on a case-by-case basis; if yes, one must consider what safeguards are in place to minimize the prejudicial effects and whether they are sufficient to meet the guarantee of institutional impartiality under paragraph 11(d) of the Charter).

Nature of a Tribunal appointed under the Act and its requisite level of independence

Given the purely adjudicative role and the functions performed by a Human Rights Tribunal in relation to rights and interests which are quasi-constitutional in nature, a high level of independence is required, and a relatively strict application of the principles in Valente v. The Queen et al., is warranted.

Institutional independence of a Tribunal appointed under the Act a- security of tenure. The facts of the present case illustrate the tenuous nature of the security of tenure afforded to a Tribunal member whose appointment expires during the course of a hearing. The Act contains no objective guarantee that the member's prospect of reappointment to complete a case would not be adversely affected by any decisions made by that member, whether in the context of the outstanding case or any other matter. In order to ensure a sufficient guarantee of the essential condition of security of tenure in the context of an administrative tribunal requiring a high level of independence, the statutory scheme must accord to the person performing the adjudicative role the right to complete that task without any intervention from the executive or legislative branches of the government. Therefore, the insufficient nature of the security of tenure, in this context, would raise a reasonable apprehension of bias in the mind of a fully informed and reasonable person.

b- financial security. In the present case, the legislative scheme in the Act does not respect the essence of the condition of financial security, in that the remuneration of the members of a Tribunal is controlled by the Commission, an interested party in all Tribunal proceedings. Furthermore, any increase in the remuneration prescribed in the Commission's by-law may be obtained only by virtue of negotiations between the Tribunal Panel and the Commission. Such negotiations would create a conflict of interest negatively impacting on the appearance of independence. Therefore, a fully informed and reasonable person, considering all the facts, would have a reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of the Tribunal.

c- administrative independence. A Tribunal appointed under the Act has enjoyed sufficient independence in relation to administrative matters bearing directly on the exercise of its judicial function.

Institutional impartiality

Although it was unnecessary to consider this question, it was suggested that, in order to preserve the institutional impartiality of a Tribunal appointed under the Act, the preferable and prudent course of action would be to make the guidelines, which the Commission may make with respect to the manner in which any provision of the Act applies in a particular case, non-binding on a Tribunal.

The proceedings before the Tribunal in the present case were therefore void. The fundamental rights at issue in the present case cannot be determined by a Tribunal appointed under the Act until legislative reform, which has been sought for so many years, has corrected the problems identified in relation to security of tenure and financial security.

The Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act (the "Act") authorizes an action by the government of British Columbia against a manufacturer of tobacco products for the recovery of health care expenditures incurred by the government in treating individuals exposed to those products. Liability hinges on those individuals having been exposed to tobacco products because of the manufacturer's breach of a duty owed to persons in British Columbia, and on the government having incurred health care expenditures in treating disease in those individuals caused by such exposure. The appellants, each of which was sued by the government pursuant to the Act, challenged its constitutional validity. The British Columbia Supreme Court dismissed the government's actions, concluding that the Act was unconstitutional because it failed to respect territorial limits on provincial legislative jurisdiction. The Court of Appeal set aside the decision, finding that the Act's pith and substance is "Property and Civil Rights in the Province" within the meaning of s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867, and that the extra-territorial aspects of the Act, if any, are incidental to it. The court also found that the Act does not offend judicial independence or the rule of law.

Held: The appeals should be dismissed. The Act is constitutionally valid.

The Act is not unconstitutional by reason of extra-territoriality. The cause of action that constitutes the pith and substance of the Act is properly described as located "in the Province" under s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The Act is meaningfully connected to the province as there are strong relationships among the enacting territory (British Columbia), the subject matter of the law (compensation for the government of British Columbia's tobacco-related health care costs) and the persons made subject to it (the tobacco manufacturers ultimately responsible for those costs). The Act also respects the legislative sovereignty of other jurisdictions. Though the cause of action may capture, to some extent, activities occurring outside of British Columbia, no territory could possibly assert a stronger relationship to that cause of action than British Columbia. The breaches of duty to which the Act refers are of subsidiary significance to the cause of action created by it, and thus the locations where those breaches might occur have little or no bearing on the strength of the relationship between the cause of action and British Columbia. [37-38] [40] [43]

The Act does not violate the independence of the judiciary. A court called upon to try an action brought pursuant to the Act retains at all times its adjudicative role, and the ability to exercise that role without interference. It must independently determine the applicability of the Act to the government's claim, independently assess the evidence led to support and defend that claim, independently assign that evidence weight, then independently determine whether its assessment of the evidence supports a finding of liability. The fact that the Act shifts onuses of proof in respect of some of the elements of an aggregate claim or limits the compellability of certain information does not in any way interfere, in either appearance or fact, with the court's adjudicative role or any of the essential conditions of judicial independence. Judicial independence can abide unconventional rules of civil procedure and evidence. [55-56]

The Act does not implicate the rule of law in the sense that the Constitution comprehends that term. Except in respect of criminal law, the retrospectivity and retroactivity of which is limited by s. 11(g) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, there is no requirement of legislative prospectivity embodied in the rule of law or in any provision of our Constitution. Nor does the Constitution, through the rule of law, require that legislation be general in character and devoid of special advantages for the government (except where necessary for effective governance), or that it ensure a fair civil trial. In any event, tobacco manufacturers sued pursuant to the Act will receive a fair civil trial: they are entitled to a public hearing, before an independent and impartial court, in which they may contest the claims of the plaintiff and adduce evidence in their defence. The court will determine their liability only following that hearing, based solely on its understanding of the law as applied to its findings of fact. That defendants might regard the Act as unjust, or the procedural rules it prescribes as unprecedented, does not render their trial unfair. [69] [73] [76-77]

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

MAJOR J. — The Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act, S.B.C. 2000, c. 30 (the "Act"), authorizes an action by the government of British Columbia against a manufacturer of tobacco products for the recovery of health care expenditures incurred by the government in treating individuals exposed to those products. Liability hinges on those individuals having been exposed to tobacco products because of the manufacturer's breach of a duty owed to persons in British Columbia, and on the government of British Columbia having incurred health care expenditures in treating disease in those individuals caused by such exposure.

These appeals question the constitutional validity of the Act. The appellants, each of which was sued by the government of British Columbia pursuant to the Act, challenge its constitutional validity on the basis that it violates: (1) territorial limits on provincial legislative jurisdiction; (2) the principle of judicial independence; and (3) the principle of the rule of law.

For the reasons that follow, the Act is constitutionally valid. The appeals are dismissed, with costs to the respondents throughout.

I. Background

A. The Legislation

The Act, in its entirety, is reproduced in the Appendix. Its essential aspects are summarized below.

Section 2(1) is the keystone of the Act. It reads:

> The government has a direct and distinct action against a manufacturer to recover the cost of health care benefits caused or contributed to by a tobacco related wrong.

The terms "manufacturer", "cost of health care benefits" and "tobacco related wrong" are defined in s. 1(1) of the Act. Their definitions in turn refer to other defined terms. Incorporating the definitions into s. 2, then paraphrasing to some degree, the section provides as follows:

> The government has a direct and distinct action against a manufacturer for the present value of existing and reasonably expected future expenditures by the government for
> (a) benefits as defined under the Hospital Insurance Act or the Medicare Protection Act;
>
> (b) payments under the Continuing Care Act; and
>
> (c) programs, services or benefits associated with disease,
>
> where
>
> (a) such expenditures result from disease or the risk of disease caused or contributed to by exposure to a tobacco product; and
>
> (b) such exposure was caused or contributed to by
>
> (i) a tort committed in British Columbia by the manufacturer; or
> (ii) a breach of a common law, equitable or statutory duty or obligation owed by the manufacturer to persons in British Columbia who have been or might have become exposed to a tobacco product.

Viewed in this light, s. 2(1) creates a cause of action by which the government of British Columbia may recover from a tobacco manufacturer money spent treating disease in British Columbians, where such disease was caused by exposure to a tobacco product (whether entirely in British Columbia or not), and such exposure was caused by that manufacturer's tort in British Columbia, or breach of a duty owed to persons in British Columbia.

The cause of action created by s. 2(1), besides being "direct and distinct", is not a subrogated claim: s. 2(2). Nor is it barred by the Limitation Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 266, s. 6(1). Crucially, it can be pursued on an aggregate basis — i.e., in respect of a population of persons for whom the government has made or can reasonably be expected to make expenditures: s. 2(4)(b).

Where the government's claim is made on an aggregate basis, it may use statistical, epidemiological and sociological evidence to prove its case: s. 5(b). It need not identify, prove the cause of disease or prove the expenditures made in respect of any individual member of the population on which it bases its claim: s. 2(5)(a). Furthermore, health care records and related information in respect of individual members of that population are not compellable, except if relied upon by an expert witness: s. 2(5)(b) and (c). However, the court is free to order the discovery of a "statistically meaningful sample" of the health care records of individual members of that population, stripped of personal identifiers: s. 2(5)(d) and (e).

Pursuant to s. 3(1) and (2), the government enjoys a reversed burden of proof in respect of certain elements of an aggregate claim. Where the aggregate claim is, like the one brought against each of the appellants, to recover expenditures in respect of disease caused by exposure to cigarettes, the reversed burden of proof operates as follows. Once the government proves that

(a)the defendant manufacturer breached a common law, equitable or statutory duty or obligation it owed to persons in British Columbia who have been or might become exposed to cigarettes;

(b)exposure to cigarettes can cause or contribute to disease; and

(c)during the manufacturer's breach, cigarettes manufactured or promoted by the manufacturer were offered for sale in British Columbia, the court will presume that

(a)the population that is the basis for the government's aggregate claim would not have been exposed to cigarettes but for the manufacturer's breach; and

(b)such exposure caused or contributed to disease in a portion of the population that is the basis for the government's aggregate claim.

In this way, it falls on a defendant manufacturer to show that its breach of duty did not give rise to exposure, or that exposure resulting from its breach of duty did not give rise to the disease in respect of which the government claims for its expenditures. The reversed burden of proof on the manufacturer is a balance of probabilities: s. 3(4).

Where the aforementioned presumptions apply, the court must determine the portion of the government's expenditures after the date of the manufacturer's breach that resulted from exposure to cigarettes: s. 3(3)(a). The manufacturer is liable for such expenditures in proportion to its share of the market for cigarettes in British Columbia, calculated over the period of time between its first breach of duty and trial: ss. 3(3)(b) and 1(6).

In an action by the government, a manufacturer will be jointly and severally liable for expenditures arising from a joint breach of duty (i.e., for expenditures caused by disease, which disease was caused by exposure, which exposure was caused by a joint breach of duty to which the manufacturer was a party): s. 4(1).

Pursuant to s. 10, all provisions of the Act operate retroactively.

The Act is the second British Columbia statute designed to enable the government to sue tobacco manufacturers for tobacco-related health care costs that has been challenged on the basis of its constitutionality. The Supreme Court of British Columbia struck down the earlier statute, the Tobacco Damages Recovery Act, S.B.C. 1997, c. 41, as being in pith and substance legislation in relation to extra-provincial civil rights and therefore ultra vires the Legislative Assembly of British Columbia: see JTI-Macdonald Corp. v. British Columbia (Attorney General) (2000), 184 D.L.R. (4th) 334, 2000 BCSC 312.

The legislative history of the Act confirms that it was drafted to address concerns about the extra-territorial aspects of the earlier statute and to avoid any further challenges with respect to extra-territoriality: see Debates of the Legislative Assembly, vol. 20, No. 6, 4th Sess., 36th Parl., June 7, 2000, at p. 16314.

B.Procedural History

On January 24, 2001, the Act came into force. On the same day, the government sued 14 entities in the tobacco industry in the Supreme Court of British Columbia, pursuant to s. 2 of the Act.

The appellants are among the 14 entities sued by the government. The appellants Imperial Tobacco Canada Limited, Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc., JTI-Macdonald Corp. and Canadian Tobacco Manufacturers' Council are Canadian corporations, and were served in British Columbia. The appellants Philip Morris Incorporated (now Philip Morris USA Inc.) and Philip Morris International Inc. are incorporated under the laws of Virginia and Delaware, respectively, and were served ex juris. The appellant British American Tobacco (Investments) Limited is incorporated under the laws of the United Kingdom, and was also served ex juris.

The Canadian appellants applied for a declaration that the Act is unconstitutional. The appellants served ex juris applied to set aside service on the basis that the Act is unconstitutional, and thus that the government's actions founded on it were bound to fail.

Throughout the proceedings, the appellants' constitutional attack has been essentially tripartite. They argue that the Act exceeds the territorial limits on provincial legislative jurisdiction, violates judicial independence and infringes the rule of law.

II.Judicial History

A.Supreme Court of British Columbia (2003), 227 D.L.R. (4th) 323, 2003 BCSC 877

Holmes J. rejected the appellants' submissions concerning judicial independence and the rule of law, but accepted their submissions concerning extra-territoriality. He concluded that the Act fails to respect territorial limits on provincial legislative jurisdiction because, in his view, the exposure to tobacco products giving rise to liability is territorially unconfined, and the aim of the Act is recovery of health care costs "from the tobacco industry nationally and internationally" (para. 222).

In the result, Holmes J. declared the Act invalid, dismissed the government's actions brought pursuant to the Act and set aside all ex juris service by the government.

B.Court of Appeal for British Columbia (2004), 239 D.L.R. (4th) 412, 2004 BCCA 269

The Court of Appeal for British Columbia allowed the respondents' appeals. Lambert, Rowles and Prowse JJ.A. each gave reasons concluding that the Act's pith and substance is "Property and Civil Rights in the Province" within the meaning of s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867; that the extra-territorial aspects of the Act, if any, are incidental to it; and therefore that the Act is not invalid by reason of extra-territoriality. All agreed that the Act does not offend judicial independence or the rule of law.

In the result, the court dismissed the appellants' applications for declarations that the Act is invalid, set aside Holmes J.'s orders dismissing the government's actions and remitted to the Supreme Court of British Columbia the applications of the appellants served ex juris to have service set aside, with such applications to be decided on the basis that the Act is constitutionally valid.

III.Issues

McLachlin C.J. stated the following constitutional questions:

1. Is the Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act, S.B.C. 2000, c. 30, ultra vires the provincial legislature by reason of extra-territoriality?

2. Is the Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act, S.B.C. 2000, c. 30, constitutionally invalid, in whole or in part, as being inconsistent with judicial independence?

3. Is the Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act, S.B.C. 2000, c. 30, constitutionally invalid, in whole or in part, as offending the rule of law?

IV. Analysis

A. Extra-territoriality

Section 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 is the primary source of provincial legislatures' authority to legislate. Provincial legislation must therefore respect the limitations, territorial and otherwise, on provincial legislative competence found in s. 92. The opening words of s. 92 — "In each Province" — represent a blanket territorial limitation on provincial powers. That limitation is echoed in a similar phrase that qualifies a number of the heads of power in s. 92: "in the Province".

The territorial limitations on provincial legislative competence reflect the requirements of order and fairness underlying Canadian federal arrangements and discussed by this Court in Morguard Investments Ltd. v. De Savoye, 1990 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1077, at pp. 1102-3, Hunt v. T&N plc, 1993 CanLII 43 (SCC), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 289, at pp. 324-25, and Unifund Assurance Co. v. Insurance Corp. of British Columbia, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 63, 2003 SCC 40, at para. 56. They serve to ensure that provincial legislation both has a meaningful connection to the province enacting it, and pays respect to "the sovereignty of the other provinces within their respective legislative spheres": Unifund, at para. 51. See also, generally, R. E. Sullivan, "Interpreting the Territorial Limitations on the Provinces" (1985), 7 Sup. Ct. L. Rev. 511.

Where the validity of provincial legislation is challenged on the basis that it violates territorial limitations on provincial legislative competence, the analysis centres on the pith and substance of the legislation. If its pith and substance is in relation to matters falling within the field of provincial legislative competence, the legislation is valid. Incidental or ancillary extra-provincial aspects of such legislation are irrelevant to its validity. See Reference re Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, 1984 CanLII 17 (SCC), [1984] 1 S.C.R. 297 ("Churchill Falls"), at p. 332, and Global Securities Corp. v. British Columbia (Securities Commission), [2000] 1 S.C.R. 494, 2000 SCC 21, at para. 24.

In determining the pith and substance of legislation, the court identifies its essential character or dominant feature: see Global Securities Corp., at para. 22, and Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), [2000] 1 S.C.R. 783, 2000 SCC 31, at para. 16. This may be done through reference to both the purpose and effect of the legislation: see Kitkatla Band v. British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture), [2002] 2 S.C.R. 146, 2002 SCC 31, at para. 53. See also Fédération des producteurs de volailles du Québec v. Pelland, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 292, 2005 SCC 20, at para. 20.

Where the pith and substance of legislation relates to a tangible matter — i.e., something with an intrinsic and observable physical presence — the question of whether it respects the territorial limitations in s. 92 is easy to answer. One need only look to the location of the matter. If it is in the province, the limitations have been respected, and the legislation is valid. If it is outside the province, the limitations have been violated, and the legislation is invalid.

Where legislation's pith and substance relates to an intangible matter, the characterization is more complicated. That is the case here.

The pith and substance of the Act is plainly the creation of a civil cause of action. More specifically, it is the creation of a civil cause of action by which the government of British Columbia may seek compensation for certain health care costs incurred by it. Civil causes of action are a matter within provincial legislative jurisdiction under s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867: "Property and Civil Rights in the Province". See General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing, 1989 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 641, at p. 672.

But s. 92(13) does not speak to "Property and Civil Rights" located anywhere. It speaks only to "Property and Civil Rights in the Province". And, to reiterate, it is, like all provincial heads of power, qualified by the opening words of s. 92: "In each Province". The issue thus becomes how to determine whether an intangible, such as the cause of action constituting the pith and substance of the Act, is "in the Province".

Churchill Falls dealt with a similar issue. In that case, McIntyre J. was confronted with a Newfoundland statute, the pith and substance of which was the modification of rights existing under a contract between Churchill Falls (Labrador) Corporation Limited and Quebec Hydro-Electric Commission. Since the entity possessing those rights (namely, the Commission) was constituted in Quebec, and the parties had agreed that the Quebec courts had exclusive jurisdiction to adjudicate disputes concerning their contract, McIntyre J. regarded the rights created by that contract as situated in Quebec. The Newfoundland law that purported to modify them was thus invalid. It related to civil rights, but not to civil rights "in the Province".

McIntyre J.'s approach to locating the civil rights constituting the pith and substance of the Newfoundland legislation illustrates the role, pointed out by Binnie J. in Unifund, at para. 63, that "the relationships among the enacting territory, the subject matter of the law, and the person[s] sought to be subjected to its regulation" play in determining the validity of legislation alleged to be impermissibly extra-territorial in scope. In Churchill Falls, an examination of those relationships indicated that the intangible civil rights constituting the pith and substance of the Newfoundland legislation at issue were not meaningfully connected to the legislating province, and could properly be the subject matter only of Quebec legislation. Put slightly differently, if the impugned Newfoundland legislation had been permitted to regulate those civil rights, neither of the purposes underlying s. 92's territorial limitations would be respected. It followed that those civil rights should be regarded as located beyond the territorial scope of Newfoundland's legislative competence under s. 92.

From the foregoing it can be seen that several analytical steps may be required to determine whether provincial legislation in pith and substance respects territorial limits on provincial legislative competence. The first step is to determine the pith and substance, or dominant feature, of the impugned legislation, and to identify a provincial head of power under which it might fall. Assuming a suitable head of power can be found, the second step is to determine whether the pith and substance respects the territorial limitations on that head of power — i.e., whether it is in the province. If the pith and substance is tangible, whether it is in the province is simply a question of its physical location. If the pith and substance is intangible, the court must look to the relationships among the enacting territory, the subject matter of the legislation and the persons made subject to it, in order to determine whether the legislation, if allowed to stand, would respect the dual purposes of the territorial limitations in s. 92 (namely, to ensure that provincial legislation has a meaningful connection to the enacting province and pays respect to the legislative sovereignty of other territories). If it would, the pith and substance of the legislation should be regarded as situated in the province.

Here, the cause of action that is the pith and substance of the Act serves exclusively to make the persons ultimately responsible for tobacco-related disease suffered by British Columbians — namely, the tobacco manufacturers who, through their wrongful acts, caused those British Columbians to be exposed to tobacco — liable for the costs incurred by the government of British Columbia in treating that disease. There are thus strong relationships among the enacting territory (British Columbia), the subject matter of the law (compensation for the government of British Columbia's tobacco-related health care costs) and the persons made subject to it (the tobacco manufacturers ultimately responsible for those costs), such that the Act can easily be said to be meaningfully connected to the province.

The Act respects the legislative sovereignty of other jurisdictions. Though the cause of action that is its pith and substance may capture, to some extent, activities occurring outside of British Columbia, no territory could possibly assert a stronger relationship to that cause of action than British Columbia. That is because there is at all times one critical connection to British Columbia exclusively: the recovery permitted by the action is in relation to expenditures by the government of British Columbia for the health care of British Columbians.

In assessing the Act's respect for the territorial limitations on British Columbia's legislative competence, the appellants and the Court of Appeal placed considerable emphasis on the question of whether, as a matter of statutory interpretation, the breach of duty by a manufacturer that is a necessary condition of its liability under the cause of action created by the Act must occur in British Columbia. That emphasis was undue, for two reasons.

First, the driving force of the Act's cause of action is compensation for the government of British Columbia's health care costs, not remediation of tobacco manufacturers' breaches of duty. While the Act makes the existence of a breach of duty one of several necessary conditions to a manufacturer's liability to the government, it is not the mischief at which the cause of action created by the Act is aimed. The Act leaves breaches of duty to be remedied by the law that gives rise to the duty. Thus, the breaches of duty to which the Act refers are of subsidiary significance to the cause of action created by it, and the locations where those breaches might occur have little or no bearing on the strength of the relationship between the cause of action and the enacting jurisdiction.

Second, and in any event, the only relevant breaches under the Act are breaches of duties (or obligations) owed "to persons in British Columbia" (s. 1(1) "tobacco related wrong" and s. 3(1)(a)) that give rise to health care expenditures by the government of British Columbia. Thus, even if the existence of a breach of duty were the central element of the Act's cause of action (it is not), the cause of action would remain strongly related to British Columbia.

The question of whether other matters, such as exposure and disease, to which the Act refers, must occur or arise in British Columbia is equally or more irrelevant to the Act's validity. Those matters too are conditions precedent to success in an action brought pursuant to the Act and of subsidiary significance to it.

It follows that the cause of action that constitutes the pith and substance of the Act is properly described as located "in the Province". The Act is not invalid by reason of extra-territoriality, being in pith and substance legislation in relation "Property and Civil Rights in the Province" under s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

B. Judicial Independence

Judicial independence is a "foundational principle" of the Constitution reflected in s. 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and in both ss. 96-100 and the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867: Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 109. It serves "to safeguard our constitutional order and to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice": Ell v. Alberta, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 857, 2003 SCC 35, at para. 29. See also Application under s. 83.28 of the Criminal Code (Re), [2004] 2 S.C.R. 248, 2004 SCC 42, at paras. 80-81.

Judicial independence consists essentially in the freedom "to render decisions based solely on the requirements of the law and justice": Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 405, 2002 SCC 13, at para. 37. It requires that the judiciary be left free to act without improper "interference from any other entity" (Ell, at para. 18) — i.e., that the executive and legislative branches of government not "impinge on the essential 'authority and function' . . . of the court" (MacKeigan v. Hickman, 1989 CanLII 40 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 796, at p. 828). See also Valente v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 673, at pp. 686-87; Beauregard v. Canada, 1986 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 56, at pp. 73 and 75; R. v. Lippé, 1990 CanLII

18 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 114, at pp. 152-54; Babcock v. Canada (Attorney General), [2002] 3 S.C.R. 3, 2002 SCC 57, at para. 57; and Application under s. 83.28 of the Criminal Code (Re), at para. 87.

Security of tenure, financial security and administrative independence are the three "core characteristics" or "essential conditions" of judicial independence: Valente, at pp. 694, 704 and 708, and Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, at para. 115. It is a precondition to judicial independence that they be maintained, and be seen by "a reasonable person who is fully informed of all the circumstances" to be maintained: Mackin, at paras. 38 and 40, and Provincial Court Judges' Assn. of New Brunswick v. New Brunswick (Minister of Justice), [2005] 2 S.C.R. 286, 2005 SCC 44, at para. 6.

However, even where the essential conditions of judicial independence exist, and are reasonably seen to exist, judicial independence itself is not necessarily ensured. The critical question is whether the court is free, and reasonably seen to be free, to perform its adjudicative role without interference, including interference from the executive and legislative branches of government. See, for example, Application under s. 83.28 of the Criminal Code (Re), at paras. 82-92.

The appellants submit that the Act violates judicial independence, both in reality and appearance, because it contains rules of civil procedure that fundamentally interfere with the adjudicative role of the court hearing an action brought pursuant to the Act. They point to s. 3(2), which they say forces the court to make irrational presumptions, and to ss. 2(5)(a), 2(5)(b) and 2(5)(c), which they say subvert the court's ability to discover relevant facts. They say that these rules impinge on the court's fact-finding function, and virtually guarantee the government's success in an action brought pursuant to the Act.

The rules in the Act with which the appellants take issue are not as unfair or illogical as the appellants submit. They appear to reflect legitimate policy concerns of the British Columbia legislature regarding the systemic advantages tobacco manufacturers enjoy when claims for tobacco-related harm are litigated through individualistic common law tort actions. That, however, is beside the point. The question is not whether the Act's rules are unfair or illogical, nor whether they differ from those governing common law tort actions, but whether they interfere with the courts' adjudicative role, and thus judicial independence.

The primary role of the judiciary is to interpret and apply the law, whether procedural or substantive, to the cases brought before it. It is to hear and weigh, in accordance with the law, evidence that is relevant to the legal issues confronted by it, and to award to the parties before it the available remedies.

The judiciary has some part in the development of the law that its role requires it to apply. Through, for example, its interpretation of legislation, review of administrative decisions and assessment of the constitutionality of legislation, it may develop the law significantly. It may also make incremental developments to its body of previous decisions — i.e., the common law — in order to bring the legal rules those decisions embody "into step with a changing society": R. v. Salituro, 1991 CanLII 17 (SCC), [1991] 3 S.C.R. 654, at p. 666. See also Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto, 1995 CanLII 59 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 1130, at paras. 91-92. But the judiciary's role in developing the law is a relatively limited one. "[I]n a constitutional democracy such as ours it is the legislature and not the courts which has the major responsibility for law reform": Salituro, at p. 670.

It follows that the judiciary's role is not, as the appellants seem to submit, to apply only the law of which it approves. Nor is it to decide cases with a view simply to what the judiciary (rather than the law) deems fair or pertinent. Nor is it to second-guess the law reform undertaken by legislators, whether that reform consists of a new cause of action or procedural rules to govern it. Within the boundaries of the Constitution, legislatures can set the law as they see fit. "The wisdom and value of legislative decisions are subject only to review by the electorate": Wells v. Newfoundland, 1999 CanLII 657 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 199, at para. 59.

In essence, the appellants' arguments misapprehend the nature and scope of the courts' adjudicative role protected from interference by the Constitution's guarantee of judicial independence. To accept their position on that adjudicative role would be to recognize a constitutional guarantee not of judicial independence, but of judicial governance.

None of this is to say that legislation, being law, can never unconstitutionally interfere with courts' adjudicative role. But more is required than an allegation that the content of the legislation required to be applied by that adjudicative role is irrational or unfair, or prescribes rules different from those developed at common law. The legislation must interfere, or be reasonably seen to interfere, with the courts' adjudicative role, or with the essential conditions of judicial independence. As McLachlin C.J. stated in Babcock, at para. 57:

> It is well within the power of the legislature to enact laws, even laws which some would consider draconian, as long as it does not fundamentally alter or interfere with the relationship between the courts and the other branches of government.

No such fundamental alteration or interference was brought about by the legislature's enactment of the Act. A court called upon to try an action brought pursuant to the Act retains at all times its adjudicative role and the ability to exercise that role without interference. It must independently determine the applicability of the Act to the government's claim, independently assess the evidence led to support and defend that claim, independently assign that evidence weight, and then independently determine whether its assessment of the evidence supports a finding of liability. The fact that the Act shifts certain onuses of proof or limits the compellability of information that the appellants assert is relevant does not in any way interfere, in either appearance or fact, with the court's adjudicative role or any of the essential conditions of judicial independence. Judicial independence can abide unconventional rules of civil procedure and evidence.

The appellants' submission that the Act violates the independence of the judiciary and is therefore unconstitutional fails for the reasons stated above.

C.Rule of Law

The rule of law is "a fundamental postulate of our constitutional structure" (Roncarelli v. Duplessis, 1959 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1959] S.C.R. 121, at p. 142) that lies "at the root of our system of government" (Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at para. 70). It is expressly acknowledged by the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1982, and implicitly recognized in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867: see Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1985 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721, at p. 750.

This Court has described the rule of law as embracing three principles. The first recognizes that "the law is supreme over officials of the government as well as private individuals, and thereby preclusive of the influence of arbitrary power": Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, at p. 748. The second "requires the creation and maintenance of an actual order of positive laws which preserves and embodies the more general principle of normative order": Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, at p. 749. The third requires that "the relationship between the state and the individual . . . be regulated by law": Reference re Secession of Quebec, at para. 71.

So understood, it is difficult to conceive of how the rule of law could be used as a basis for invalidating legislation such as the Act based on its content. That is because none of the principles that the rule of law embraces speak directly to the terms of legislation. The first principle requires that legislation be applied to all those, including government officials, to whom it, by its terms, applies. The second principle means that legislation must exist. And the third principle, which overlaps somewhat with the first and second, requires that state officials' actions be legally founded. See R. Elliot, "References, Structural Argumentation and the Organizing Principles of Canada's Constitution" (2001), 80 Can. Bar Rev. 67, at pp. 114-15.

This does not mean that the rule of law as described by this Court has no normative force. As McLachlin C.J. stated in Babcock, at para. 54, "unwritten constitutional principles", including the rule of law, "are capable of limiting government actions". See also Reference re Secession of Quebec, at para. 54. But the government action constrained by the rule of law as understood in Reference re Manitoba Language Rights and Reference re Secession of Quebec is, by definition, usually that of the executive and judicial branches. Actions of the legislative branch are constrained too, but only in the sense that they must comply with legislated requirements as to manner and form (i.e., the procedures by which legislation is to be enacted, amended and repealed).

Nonetheless, considerable debate surrounds the question of what additional principles, if any, the rule of law might embrace, and the extent to which they might mandate the invalidation of legislation based on its content. P. W. Hogg and C. F. Zwibel write in "The Rule of Law in the Supreme Court of Canada" (2005), 55 U.T.L.J. 715, at pp. 717-18:

> Many authors have tried to define the rule of law and to explain its significance, or lack thereof. Their views spread across a wide spectrum. . . . T.R.S. Allan, for example, claims that laws that fail to respect the equality and human dignity of individuals are contrary to the rule of law. Luc Tremblay asserts that the rule of law includes the liberal principle, the democratic principle, the constitutional principle, and the federal principle. For Allan and Tremblay, the rule of law demands not merely that positive law be obeyed but that it embody a particular vision of social justice. Another strong version comes from David Beatty, who argues that the 'ultimate rule of law' is a principle of 'proportionality' to which all laws must conform on pain of invalidity (enforced by judicial review). In the middle of the spectrum are those who, like Joseph Raz, accept that the rule of law is an ideal of constitutional legality, involving open, stable, clear, and general rules, even-handed enforcement of those laws, the independence of the judiciary, and judicial review of administrative action. Raz acknowledges that conformity to the rule of law is often a matter of degree, and that breaches of the rule of law do not lead to invalidity.

See also W. J. Newman, "The Principles of the Rule of Law and Parliamentary Sovereignty in Constitutional Theory and Litigation" (2005), 16 N.J.C.L. 175, at pp. 177-80.

This debate underlies Strayer J.A.'s apt observation in Singh v. Canada (Attorney General), 2000 CanLII 17100 (FCA), [2000] 3 F.C. 185 (C.A.), at para. 33, that "[a]dvocates tend to read into the principle of the rule of law anything which supports their particular view of what the law should be."

The appellants' conceptions of the rule of law can fairly be said to fall at one extreme of the spectrum of possible conceptions and to support Strayer J.A.'s thesis. They submit that the rule of law requires that legislation: (1) be prospective; (2) be general in character; (3) not confer special privileges on the government, except where necessary for effective governance; and (4) ensure a fair civil trial. And they argue that the Act breaches each of these requirements, rendering it invalid.

A brief review of this Court's jurisprudence will reveal that none of these requirements enjoy constitutional protection in Canada. But before embarking on that review, it should be said that acknowledging the constitutional force of anything resembling the appellants' conceptions of the rule of law would seriously undermine the legitimacy of judicial review of legislation for constitutionality. That is so for two separate but interrelated reasons.

First, many of the requirements of the rule of law proposed by the appellants are simply broader versions of rights contained in the Charter. For example, the appellants' proposed fair trial requirement is essentially a broader version of s. 11(d) of the Charter, which provides that "[a]ny person charged with an offence has the right . . . to . . . a fair and public hearing." But the framers of the Charter enshrined that fair trial right only for those "charged with an offence". If the rule of law constitutionally required that all legislation provide for a fair trial, s. 11(d) and its relatively limited scope (not to mention its qualification by s. 1) would be largely irrelevant because everyone would have the unwritten, but constitutional, right to a "fair . . . hearing". (Though, as explained in para. 76, the Act provides for a fair trial in any event.) Thus, the appellants' conception of the unwritten constitutional principle of the rule of law would render many of our written constitutional rights redundant and, in doing so, undermine the delimitation of those rights chosen by our constitutional framers. That is specifically what this Court cautioned against in Reference re Secession of Quebec, at para. 53:

> Given the existence of these underlying constitutional principles, what use may the Court make of them? In [Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island], at paras. 93 and 104, we cautioned that the recognition of these constitutional principles . . . could not be taken as an invitation to dispense with the written text of the Constitution. On the contrary, we confirmed that there are compelling reasons to insist upon the primacy of our written constitution. A written constitution promotes legal certainty and predictability, and it provides a foundation and a touchstone for the exercise of constitutional judicial review. [Emphasis added.]

Second, the appellants' arguments overlook the fact that several constitutional principles other than the rule of law that have been recognized by this Court — most notably democracy and constitutionalism — very strongly favour upholding the validity of legislation that conforms to the express terms of the Constitution (and to the requirements, such as judicial independence, that flow by necessary implication from those terms). Put differently, the appellants' arguments fail to recognize that in a constitutional democracy such as ours, protection from legislation that some might view as unjust or unfair properly lies not in the amorphous underlying principles of our Constitution, but in its text and the ballot box. See Bacon v. Saskatchewan Crop Insurance Corp. (1999), 1999 CanLII 12234 (SK CA), 180 Sask. R. 20 (C.A.), at para. 30; Elliot, at pp. 141-42; Hogg and Zwibel, at p. 718; and Newman, at p. 187.

The rule of law is not an invitation to trivialize or supplant the Constitution's written terms. Nor is it a tool by which to avoid legislative initiatives of which one is not in favour. On the contrary, it requires that courts give effect to the Constitution's text, and apply, by whatever its terms, legislation that conforms to that text.

A review of the cases showing that each of the appellants' proposed requirements of the rule of law has, as a matter of precedent and policy, no constitutional protection is conclusive of the appellants' rule of law arguments.

(1)Prospectivity in the Law

Except for criminal law, the retrospectivity and retroactivity of which is limited by s. 11(g) of the Charter, there is no requirement of legislative prospectivity embodied in the rule of law or in any provision of our Constitution. Professor P. W. Hogg sets out the state of the law accurately (in Constitutional Law of Canada (loose-leaf ed.), vol. 2, at p. 48-29):

> Apart from s. 11(g), Canadian constitutional law contains no prohibition of retroactive (or ex post facto) laws. There is a presumption of statutory interpretation that a statute should not be given retroactive effect, but, if the retroactive effect is clearly expressed, then there is no room for interpretation and the statute is effective according to its terms. Retroactive statutes are in fact common.

Hence, in Air Canada v. British Columbia, 1989 CanLII 95 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1161, at p. 1192, La Forest J., writing for a majority of this Court, characterized a retroactive tax as "not constitutionally barred". And in Cusson v. Robidoux, 1975 CanLII 199 (SCC), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 650, at p. 655, Pigeon J., for a unanimous Court, said that it would be "untenable" to suggest that legislation reviving actions earlier held by this Court (in Notre-Dame Hospital v. Patry, 1974 CanLII 174 (SCC), [1975] 2 S.C.R. 388) to be time-barred was unconstitutional.

The absence of a general requirement of legislative prospectivity exists despite the fact that retrospective and retroactive legislation can overturn settled expectations and is sometimes perceived as unjust: see E. Edinger, "Retrospectivity in Law" (1995), 29 U.B.C. L. Rev. 5, at p. 13. Those who perceive it as such can perhaps take comfort in the rules of statutory interpretation that require the legislature to indicate clearly any desired retroactive or retrospective effects. Such rules ensure that the legislature has turned its mind to such effects and "determined that the benefits of retroactivity [or retrospectivity] outweigh the potential for disruption or unfairness": Landgraf v. USI Film Products, 511 U.S. 244 (1994), at p. 268.

It might also be observed that developments in the common law have always had retroactive and retrospective effect. Lord Nicholls recently explained this point in In re Spectrum Plus Ltd., [2005] 3 W.L.R. 58, [2005] UKHL 41, at para. 7:

> A court ruling which changes the law from what it was previously thought to be operates retrospectively as well as prospectively. The ruling will have a retrospective effect so far as the parties to the particular dispute are concerned, as occurred with the manufacturer of the ginger beer in Donoghue v Stevenson 1932 CanLII 536 (FOREP), [1932] AC 562. When Mr Stevenson manufactured and bottled and sold his ginger beer the law on manufacturers' liability as generally understood may have been as stated by the majority of the Second Division of the Court of Session and the minority of their Lordships in that case. But in the claim Mrs Donoghue brought against Mr Stevenson his legal obligations fell to be decided in accordance with Lord Atkin's famous statements. Further, because of the doctrine of precedent the same would be true of everyone else whose case thereafter came before a court. Their rights and obligations would be decided according to the law as enunciated by the majority of the House of Lords in that case even though the relevant events occurred before that decision was given.

This observation adds further weight, if needed, to the view that retrospectivity and retroactivity do not generally engage constitutional concerns.

(2)Generality in the Law, Ordinary Law for the Government and Fair Civil Trials

Two decisions of this Court defeat the appellants' submission that the Constitution, through the rule of law, requires that legislation be general in character and devoid of special advantages for the government (except where necessary for effective governance), as well as that it ensure a fair civil trial.

The first is Air Canada. In it, a majority of this Court affirmed the constitutionality of 1981 amendments to the Gasoline Tax Act, 1948, R.S.B.C. 1960, c. 162, that retroactively taxed certain companies in the airline industry. The amendments were meant strictly to defeat three companies' claims, brought in 1980, for reimbursement of gasoline taxes paid between 1974 and 1976, the collection of which was ultra vires the legislature of British Columbia. The legislative amendments, in addition to being retroactive, were for the benefit of the Crown, aimed at a particular industry with readily identifiable members and totally destructive of that industry's ability to pursue successfully their claims filed a year earlier. Nonetheless, the constitutionality of those amendments was affirmed by a majority of this Court.

The second is Authorson v. Canada (Attorney General), [2003] 2 S.C.R. 40, 2003 SCC 39, in which this Court unanimously upheld a provision of the Department of Veterans Affairs Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. V-1, aimed specifically at defeating certain disabled veterans' claims, the merits of which were undisputed, against the federal government. The claims concerned interest owed by the government on the veterans' benefit accounts administered by it, which interest it had not properly credited for decades. Though the appeal was pursued on the basis of the Canadian Bill of Rights, S.C. 1960, c. 44, the decision confirmed that it was well within Parliament's power to enact the provision at issue — despite the fact that it was directed at a known class of vulnerable veterans, conferred benefits on the Crown for "undisclosed reasons" (para. 62) and routed those veterans' ability to have any trial — fair or unfair — of their claims. See para. 15:

> The Department of Veterans Affairs Act, s. 5.1(4) takes a property claim from a vulnerable group, in disregard of the Crown's fiduciary duty to disabled veterans. However, that taking is within the power of Parliament. The appeal has to be allowed.

Additionally, the appellants' conception of a "fair" civil trial seems in part to be of one governed by customary rules of civil procedure and evidence. As should be evident from the analysis concerning judicial independence, there is no constitutional right to have one's civil trial governed by such rules. Moreover, new rules are not necessarily unfair. Indeed, tobacco manufacturers sued pursuant to the Act will receive a fair civil trial, in the sense that the concept is traditionally understood: they are entitled to a public hearing, before an independent and impartial court, in which they may contest the claims of the plaintiff and adduce evidence in their defence. The court will determine their liability only following that hearing, based solely on its understanding of the law as applied to its findings of fact. The fact that defendants might regard that law (i.e., the Act) as unjust, or the procedural rules it prescribes as unprecedented, does not render their trial unfair.

The Act does not implicate the rule of law in the sense that the Constitution comprehends that term. It follows that the Act is not unconstitutional by reason of interference with it.

V. Conclusion

The Act is constitutionally valid. The appeals are dismissed, with costs to the respondents throughout. Each constitutional question is answered "no". The stay of proceedings granted by McLachlin C.J. on January 21, 2005 is vacated.

APPENDIX

Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act, S.B.C. 2000, c. 30, as am. S.B.C. 2003, c. 70, s. 297

HER MAJESTY, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of British Columbia, enacts as follows:

Definitions and interpretation

1 (1)In this Act:

"cost of health care benefits" means the sum of

(a)the present value of the total expenditure by the government for health care benefits provided for insured persons resulting from tobacco related disease or the risk of tobacco related disease, and

(b)the present value of the estimated total expenditure by the government for health care benefits that could reasonably be expected will be provided for those insured persons resulting from tobacco related disease or the risk of tobacco related disease;

"disease" includes general deterioration of health;

"exposure" means any contact with, or ingestion, inhalation or assimilation of, a tobacco product, including any smoke or other by-product of the use, consumption or combustion of a tobacco product;

"health care benefits" means

(a)benefits as defined under the Hospital Insurance Act,

(b)benefits as defined under the Medicare Protection Act,

(c)payments made by the government under the Continuing Care Act, and

(d)other expenditures, made directly or through one or more agents or other intermediate bodies, by the government for programs, services, benefits or similar matters associated with disease;

"insured person" means

(a)a person, including a deceased person, for whom health care benefits have been provided, or

(b)a person for whom health care benefits could reasonably be expected will be provided;

"joint venture" means an association of 2 or more persons, if

(a)the relationship among the persons does not constitute a corporation, a partnership or a trust, and

(b)the persons each have an undivided interest in assets of the association;

"manufacture" includes, for a tobacco product, the production, assembly or packaging of the tobacco product;

"manufacturer" means a person who manufactures or has manufactured a tobacco product and includes a person who currently or in the past

(a)causes, directly or indirectly, through arrangements with contractors, subcontractors, licensees, franchisees or others, the manufacture of a tobacco product,

(b)for any fiscal year of the person, derives at least 10% of revenues, determined on a consolidated basis in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles in Canada, from the manufacture or promotion of tobacco products by that person or by other persons,

(c)engages in, or causes, directly or indirectly, other persons to engage in the promotion of a tobacco product, or

(d)is a trade association primarily engaged in

(i)the advancement of the interests of manufacturers,

(ii)the promotion of a tobacco product, or

(iii)causing, directly or indirectly, other persons to engage in the promotion of a tobacco product;

"person" includes a trust, joint venture or trade association;

"promote" or "promotion" includes, for a tobacco product, the marketing, distribution or sale of the tobacco product and research with respect to the tobacco product;

"tobacco product" means tobacco and any product that includes tobacco;

"tobacco related disease" means disease caused or contributed to by exposure to a tobacco product;

"tobacco related wrong" means,

(a)a tort committed in British Columbia by a manufacturer which causes or contributes to tobacco related disease, or

(b)in an action under section 2 (1), a breach of a common law, equitable or statutory duty or obligation owed by a manufacturer to persons in British Columbia who have been exposed or might become exposed to a tobacco product;

"type of tobacco product" means one or a combination of the following tobacco products:

(a)cigarettes;

(b)loose tobacco intended for incorporation into cigarettes;

(c)cigars;

(d)cigarillos;

(e)pipe tobacco;

(f)chewing tobacco;

(g) nasal snuff;

(h)oral snuff;

(i)a prescribed form of tobacco.

(2)The definition of "manufacturer" in subsection (1) does not include

(a)an individual,

(b)a person who

(i)is a manufacturer only because they are a wholesaler or retailer of tobacco products, and

(ii)is not related to

(A)a person who manufactures a tobacco product, or

(B)a person described in paragraph (a) of the definition of "manufacturer", or

(c)a person who

(i)is a manufacturer only because paragraph (b) or (c) of the definition of "manufacturer" applies to the person, and

(ii)is not related to

(A)a person who manufactures a tobacco product, or

(B)a person described in paragraphs (a) or (d) of the definition of "manufacturer".

(3)For the purposes of subsection (2), a person is related to another person if, directly or indirectly, the person is

(a)an affiliate, as defined in section 1 of the Business Corporations Act, of the other person, or

(b)an affiliate of the other person or an affiliate of an affiliate of the other person.

(4)For the purposes of subsection (3) (b), a person is deemed to be an affiliate of another person if the person

(a)is a corporation and the other person, or a group of persons not dealing with each other at arm's length of which the other person is a member, owns a beneficial interest in shares of the corporation

(i)carrying at least 50% of the votes for the election of directors of the corporation and the votes carried by the shares are sufficient, if exercised, to elect a director of the corporation, or

(ii)having a fair market value, including a premium for control if applicable, of at least 50% of the fair market value of all the issued and outstanding shares of the corporation, or

(b)is a partnership, trust or joint venture and the other person, or a group of persons not dealing with each other at arm's length of which the other person is a member, has an ownership interest in the assets of that person that entitles the other person or group to receive at least 50% of the profits or at least 50% of the assets on dissolution, winding up or termination of the partnership, trust or joint venture.

(5)For the purposes of subsection (3) (b), a person is deemed to be an affiliate of another person if the other person, or a group of persons not dealing with each other at arm's length of which the other person is a member, has any direct or indirect influence that, if exercised, would result in control in fact of that person except if the other person deals at arm's length with that person and derives influence solely as a lender.

$$dms = \frac{dm}{MM} \times 100\%$$

dms =the defendant's market share for the type of tobacco product from the date of the earliest tobacco related wrong committed by that defendant to the date of trial;

dm =the quantity of the type of tobacco product manufactured or promoted by the defendant that is sold within British Columbia from the date of the earliest tobacco related wrong committed by that defendant to the date of trial;

MM =the quantity of the type of tobacco product manufactured or promoted by all manufacturers that is sold within British Columbia from the date of the earliest tobacco related wrong committed by the defendant to the date of trial.

Direct action by government

2 (1)The government has a direct and distinct action against a manufacturer to recover the cost of health care benefits caused or contributed to by a tobacco related wrong.

(2)An action under subsection (1) is brought by the government in its own right and not on the basis of a subrogated claim.

(3)In an action under subsection (1), the government may recover the cost of health care benefits whether or not there has been any recovery by other persons who have suffered damage caused or contributed to by the tobacco related wrong committed by the defendant.

(4)In an action under subsection (1), the government may recover the cost of health care benefits

(a)for particular individual insured persons, or

(b)on an aggregate basis, for a population of insured persons as a result of exposure to a type of tobacco product.

(5)If the government seeks in an action under subsection (1) to recover the cost of health care benefits on an aggregate basis,

(a)it is not necessary

(i)to identify particular individual insured persons,

(ii)to prove the cause of tobacco related disease in any particular individual insured person, or

(iii)to prove the cost of health care benefits for any particular individual insured person,

(b)the health care records and documents of particular individual insured persons or the documents relating to the provision of health care benefits for particular individual insured persons are not compellable except as provided under a rule of law, practice or procedure that requires the production of documents relied on by an expert witness,

(c)a person is not compellable to answer questions with respect to the health of, or the provision of health care benefits for, particular individual insured persons,

(d)despite paragraphs (b) and (c), on application by a defendant, the court may order discovery of a statistically meaningful sample of the documents referred to in paragraph (b) and the order must include directions concerning the nature, level of detail and type of information to be disclosed, and

(e)if an order is made under paragraph (d), the identity of particular individual insured persons must not be disclosed and all identifiers that disclose or may be used to trace the names or identities of any particular individual insured persons must be deleted from any documents before the documents are disclosed.

Recovery of cost of health care benefits on aggregate basis

3 (1)In an action under section 2 (1) for the recovery of the cost of health care benefits on an aggregate basis, subsection (2) applies if the government proves, on a balance of probabilities, that, in respect of a type of tobacco product,

(a)the defendant breached a common law, equitable or statutory duty or obligation owed to persons in British Columbia who have been exposed or might become exposed to the type of tobacco product,

(b)exposure to the type of tobacco product can cause or contribute to disease, and

(c)during all or part of the period of the breach referred to in paragraph (a), the type of tobacco product, manufactured or promoted by the defendant, was offered for sale in British Columbia.

(2)Subject to subsections (1) and (4), the court must presume that

(a)the population of insured persons who were exposed to the type of tobacco product, manufactured or promoted by the defendant, would not have been exposed to the product but for the breach referred to in subsection (1) (a), and

(b)the exposure described in paragraph (a) caused or contributed to disease or the risk of disease in a portion of the population described in paragraph (a).

(3)If the presumptions under subsection (2) (a) and (b) apply,

(a)the court must determine on an aggregate basis the cost of health care benefits provided after the date of the breach referred to in subsection (1) (a) resulting from exposure to the type of tobacco product, and

(b)each defendant to which the presumptions apply is liable for the proportion of the aggregate cost referred to in paragraph (a) equal to its market share in the type of tobacco product.

(4)The amount of a defendant's liability assessed under subsection (3) (b) may be reduced, or the proportions of liability assessed under subsection (3) (b) readjusted amongst the defendants, to the extent that a defendant proves, on a balance of probabilities, that the breach referred to in subsection (1) (a) did not cause or contribute to the exposure referred to in subsection (2) (a) or to the disease or risk of disease referred to in subsection (2) (b).

Joint and several liability in an action under section 2 (1)

4 (1)Two or more defendants in an action under section 2 (1) are jointly and severally liable for the cost of health care benefits if

(a)those defendants jointly breached a duty or obligation described in the definition of "tobacco related wrong" in section 1 (1), and

(b)as a consequence of the breach described in paragraph (a), at least one of those defendants is held liable in the action under section 2 (1) for the cost of those health care benefits.

(2)For purposes of an action under section 2 (1), 2 or more manufacturers, whether or not they are defendants in the action, are deemed to have jointly breached a duty or obligation described in the definition of "tobacco related wrong" in section 1 (1) if

(a)one or more of those manufacturers are held to have breached the duty or obligation, and

(b)at common law, in equity or under an enactment those manufacturers would be held

(i)to have conspired or acted in concert with respect to the breach,

(ii)to have acted in a principal and agent relationship with each other with respect to the breach, or

(iii)to be jointly or vicariously liable for the breach if damages would have been awarded to a person who suffered as a consequence of the breach.

Population based evidence to establish causation and quantify damages or cost

5Statistical information and information derived from epidemiological, sociological and other relevant studies, including information derived from sampling, is admissible as evidence for the purposes of establishing causation and quantifying damages or the cost of health care benefits respecting a tobacco related wrong in an action brought

(a)by or on behalf of a person in the person's own name or as a member of a class of persons under the Class Proceedings Act, or (b)by the government under section 2 (1).

Limitation periods

6 (1)No action that is commenced within 2 years after the coming into force of this section by

(a)the government,

(b)a person, on his or her own behalf or on behalf of a class of persons, or

(c)a personal representative of a deceased person on behalf of the spouse, parent or child, as defined in the Family Compensation Act, of the deceased person, for damages, or the cost of health care benefits, alleged to have been caused or contributed to by a tobacco related wrong is barred under the Limitation Act.

(2)Any action described in subsection (1) for damages alleged to have been caused or contributed to by a tobacco related wrong is revived if the action was dismissed before the coming into force of this section merely because it was held by a court to be barred or extinguished by the Limitation Act.

Liability based on risk contribution

7 (1)This section applies to an action for damages, or the cost of health care benefits, alleged to have been caused or contributed to by a tobacco related wrong other than an action for the recovery of the cost of health care benefits on an aggregate basis.

(2)If a plaintiff is unable to establish which defendant caused or contributed to the exposure described in paragraph (b) and, as a result of a breach of a common law, equitable or statutory duty or obligation,

(a)one or more defendants causes or contributes to a risk of disease by exposing persons to a type of tobacco product, and

(b)the plaintiff has been exposed to the type of tobacco product referred to in paragraph (a) and suffers disease as a result of the exposure, the court may find each defendant that caused or contributed to the risk of disease liable for a proportion of the damages or cost of health care benefits incurred equal to the proportion of its contribution to that risk of disease.

(3)The court may consider the following in apportioning liability under subsection (2):

(a)the length of time a defendant engaged in the conduct that caused or contributed to the risk of disease;

(b)the market share the defendant had in the type of tobacco product that caused or contributed to the risk of disease;

(c)the degree of toxicity of any toxic substance in the type of tobacco product manufactured or promoted by a defendant;

(d)the amount spent by a defendant on promoting the type of tobacco product that caused or contributed to the risk of disease;

(e)the degree to which a defendant collaborated or acted in concert with other manufacturers in any conduct that caused, contributed to or aggravated the risk of disease;

(f)the extent to which a defendant conducted tests and studies to determine the risk of disease resulting from exposure to the type of tobacco product;

(g)the extent to which a defendant assumed a leadership role in manufacturing the type of tobacco product;

(h)the efforts a defendant made to warn the public about the risk of disease resulting from exposure to the type of tobacco product;

(i)the extent to which a defendant continued manufacture or promotion of the type of tobacco product after it knew or ought to have known of the risk of disease resulting from exposure to the type of tobacco product;

(j)affirmative steps that a defendant took to reduce the risk of disease to the public;

(k)other considerations considered relevant by the court.

Apportionment of liability in tobacco related wrongs

8 (1)This section does not apply to a defendant in respect of whom the court has made a finding of liability under section 7.

(2)A defendant who is found liable for a tobacco related wrong may commence, against one or more of the defendants found liable for that wrong in the same action, an action or proceeding for contribution toward payment of the damages or the cost of health care benefits caused or contributed to by that wrong.

(3)Subsection (2) applies whether or not the defendant commencing an action or proceeding under that subsection has paid all or any of the damages or the cost of health care benefits caused or contributed to by the tobacco related wrong.

(4)In an action or proceeding described in subsection (2), the court may apportion liability and order contribution among each of the defendants in accordance with the considerations listed in section 7 (3) (a) to (k).

Regulations

9 (1)The Lieutenant Governor in Council may make regulations referred to in section 41 of the Interpretation Act.

(2)Without limiting subsection (1), the Lieutenant Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing a form of tobacco for the purposes of paragraph (i) of the definition of "type of tobacco product" in section 1 (1).

Retroactive effect

10When brought into force under section 12, a provision of this Act has the retroactive effect necessary to give the provision full effect for all purposes including allowing an action to be brought under section 2 (1) arising from a tobacco related wrong, whenever the tobacco related wrong occurred.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Freedom of expression —Municipal elections — Province enacting legislation redrawing municipality's electoral ward boundaries and reducing number of wards during election campaign — Whether legislation limits electoral participants' right to freedom of expression and, if so, whether limitation justified — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 1, 2(b) — Better Local Government Act, 2018, S.O. 2018, c. 11.

Constitutional law — Unwritten constitutional principles — Democracy — Province enacting legislation redrawing municipality's electoral ward boundaries and reducing number of wards during election campaign — Whether legislation unconstitutional for violating unwritten constitutional principle of democracy.

On May 1, 2018, the City of Toronto municipal election campaign commenced and nominations opened in preparation for an election day on October 22, 2018. On July 27, 2018, the closing day for nominations, Ontario announced its intention to introduce legislation reducing the size of Toronto City Council. On August 14, 2018, the Better Local Government Act, 2018, came into force, reducing the number of wards from 47 to 25.

The City and two groups of private individuals challenged the constitutionality of the Act and applied for orders restoring the 47-ward structure. The application judge found that the Act limited the municipal candidates' right to freedom of expression under s. 2(b) of the Charter and municipal voters' s. 2(b) right to effective representation. He held that these limits could not be justified under s. 1 of the Charter and set aside the impugned provisions of the Act. Ontario appealed and moved to stay the judgment pending appeal. The Court of Appeal granted the stay and, on October 22, 2018, the municipal election proceeded on the basis of the 25-ward structure created by the Act. The Court of Appeal later allowed the appeal, finding no limit on freedom of expression. The majority held that the City had advanced a positive rights claim, which was not properly grounded in s. 2(b) of the Charter, and concluded that the application judge had erred in finding that the Act substantially interfered with the candidates' freedom of expression and in finding that the right to effective representation applies to municipal elections and bears any influence over the s. 2(b) analysis. The majority also held that unwritten constitutional principles do not confer upon the judiciary power to invalidate legislation that does not otherwise infringe the Charter, nor do they limit provincial legislative authority over municipal institutions.

Held (Abella, Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Wagner C.J. and Moldaver, Côté, Brown and Rowe JJ.: Ontario acted constitutionally. The Act imposed no limit on freedom of expression. Further, unwritten constitutional principles cannot be used as bases for invalidating legislation, nor can the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy be used to narrow provincial authority under s. 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867, or to read municipalities into s. 3 of the Charter.

A purposive interpretation of Charter rights must begin with, and be rooted in, the text and not overshoot the purpose of the right but place it in its appropriate linguistic, philosophic and historical contexts. Section 2(b) of the Charter, which provides that everyone has the fundamental freedoms of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication, has been interpreted as generally imposing a negative obligation rather than a positive obligation of protection or assistance. A claim is properly characterized as negative where the claimant seeks freedom from government legislation or action suppressing an expressive activity in which people would otherwise be free to engage. Such claims of right under s. 2(b) are considered under the framework established in Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927.

However, as explained in Baier v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 31, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 673, s. 2(b) may, in certain circumstances, impose positive obligations on the government to facilitate expression. Many constitutional rights have both positive and negative dimensions and this is so for s. 2(b). Central to whether s. 2(b) has been limited is, therefore, the appropriate characterization of the claim as between a negative and positive claim of right.

In the context of positive claims under s. 2(b), where a claimant seeks to impose an obligation on the government (or legislature) to provide access to a particular statutory or regulatory platform for expression, the applicable framework is that of Baier. As held in Baier, to succeed, a positive claim must satisfy the following three factors first set forth in Dunmore v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2001 SCC 94, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 1016: (1) the claim should be grounded in freedom of expression, rather than in access to a particular statutory regime; (2) the claimant must demonstrate that lack of access to a statutory regime has the effect of a substantial interference with freedom of expression, or has the purpose of infringing freedom of expression; and (3) the government must be responsible for the inability to exercise the fundamental freedom. These factors set an elevated threshold for positive claims and can usefully be distilled to a single core question: is the claim grounded in the fundamental Charter freedom of expression, such that, by denying access to a statutory platform or by otherwise failing to act, the government has either substantially interfered with freedom of expression, or had the purpose of interfering with freedom of expression? This single question, a salutary clarification of the Baier test, emphasizes the elevated threshold in the second Dunmore factor while encompassing the considerations of the first and third factors. Substantial interference with freedom of expression occurs where lack of access to a statutory platform has the effect of radically frustrating expression to such an extent that meaningful expression is effectively precluded. While meaningful expression need not be rendered absolutely impossible, effective preclusion represents an exceedingly high bar that would be met only in extreme and rare cases.

In the present case, the City has not established a limit on s. 2(b). The City's claim is a claim for access to a particular statutory platform, and is thus, in substance, a positive claim. The Baier framework therefore applies, and the City had to show that the Act radically frustrated the expression of election participants such that meaningful expression was effectively precluded. The candidates and their supporters had 69 days to re-orient their messages and freely express themselves according to the new ward structure. The Act imposed no restrictions on the content or meaning of the messages that participants could convey. Many of the challengers who continued to campaign ultimately had successful campaigns, raising significant amounts of money and receiving significant numbers of votes. This would not have been possible had their s. 2(b) rights been so radically frustrated so as to effectively preclude meaningful expression. Some of the candidates' prior expression may have lost its relevance, but something more than diminished effectiveness is required under the Baier framework. In the context of a positive claim, only extreme government action that extinguishes the effectiveness of expression may rise to the level of a substantial interference with freedom of expression. Section 2(b) is not a guarantee of the effectiveness or continued relevance of a message, or that campaign materials otherwise retain their usefulness throughout the campaign.

Furthermore, the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy cannot be used as a device for invalidating otherwise valid provincial legislation such as the impugned provisions of the Act. Unwritten principles are part of the law of the Constitution, in the sense that they form part of the context and backdrop to the Constitution's written terms. Their legal force lies in their representation of general principles within which the constitutional order operates and, therefore, by which the Constitution's written terms — its provisions — are to be given effect. In practical terms, unwritten constitutional principles may assist courts in only two distinct but related ways.

First, they may be used in the interpretation of constitutional provisions. Where the constitutional text is not itself sufficiently definitive or comprehensive to furnish the answer to a constitutional question, a court may use unwritten constitutional principles as interpretive aids. When applied to Charter rights, unwritten principles assist with purposive interpretation, informing the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, and the historical origins of the concepts enshrined. Where unwritten constitutional principles are used as interpretive aids, their substantive legal force must arise by necessary implication from the Constitution's text. Secondly, and relatedly, unwritten principles can be used to develop structural doctrines unstated in the written Constitution per se, but necessary to the coherence of, and flowing by implication from, its architecture. Structural doctrines can fill gaps and address important questions on which the text of the Constitution is silent.

Neither of these functions support the application of unwritten constitutional principles as an independent basis for invalidating legislation. On the contrary, unwritten constitutional principles, such as democracy, a principle by which the Constitution is to be understood and interpreted, strongly favour upholding the validity of legislation that conforms to the text of the Constitution. Subject to the Charter, a province, under s. 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867, has absolute and unfettered legal power to legislate with respect to municipalities. This plenary jurisdiction is unrestricted by any constitutional principle.

As for s. 3 of the Charter, it guarantees citizens the right to vote and run for office in provincial and federal elections, and includes a right to effective representation. The text of s. 3 makes clear, however, that it does not extend to municipal elections. Effective representation is not a principle of s. 2(b) of the Charter, nor can the concept be imported wholesale into s. 2(b). Section 3 and its requirement of effective representation also cannot be made relevant to the current case by using the democratic principle. Section 3 democratic rights were not extended to candidates or electors to municipal councils. The absence of municipalities in the constitutional text is not a gap to be addressed judicially; rather, it is a deliberate omission. The text of the Constitution makes clear that municipal institutions lack constitutional status, leaving no open question of constitutional interpretation to be addressed and, accordingly, no role to be played by the unwritten principles.

Per Abella, Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ. (dissenting): The appeal should be allowed and the application judge's declaration that the timing of the Act unjustifiably infringed s. 2(b) of the Charter restored. Changing the municipal wards in the middle of an ongoing municipal election was unconstitutional.

When a democratic election takes place in Canada, including a municipal election, freedom of expression protects the rights of candidates and voters to meaningfully express their views and engage in reciprocal political discourse on the path to voting day. That is at the core of political expression, which in turn is at the core of what is protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter. The right to disseminate and receive information connected with elections has long been recognized as integral to the democratic principles underlying freedom of expression, and as a result, has attracted robust protection.

A stable election period is crucial to electoral fairness and meaningful political discourse. As such, state interference with individual and collective political expression in the context of an election strikes at the heart of the democratic values that freedom of expression seeks to protect, including participation in social and political decision-making.

A two-part test for adjudicating freedom of expression claims was established in Irwin Toy. The first asks whether the activity is within the sphere of conduct protected by freedom of expression. If the activity conveys or attempts to convey a meaning, it has expressive content and prima facie falls within the scope of the guarantee. The second asks whether the government action, in purpose or effect, interfered with freedom of expression.

The legal framework set out in Baier, which was designed to address under inclusive statutory regimes, only applies to claims placing an obligation on government to provide individuals with a particular platform for expression. Claims of government interference with expressive rights that attach to an electoral process are the kind of claims governed by the Irwin Toy framework.

The distinction between positive and negative rights is an unhelpful lens for adjudicating Charter claims. All rights have positive dimensions since they exist within, and are enforced by, a positive state apparatus. They also have negative dimensions because they sometimes require the state not to intervene. A unified purposive approach has been adopted to rights claims, whether the claim is about freedom from government interference in order to exercise a right, or the right to governmental action in order to get access to it. The threshold does not vary with the nature of the claim to a right. Each right has its own definitional scope and is subject to the proportionality analysis under s. 1 of the Charter. There is therefore no reason to superimpose onto the constitutional structure the additional hurdle of dividing rights into positive and negative ones for analytic purposes.

In the present case, the s. 2(b) claim is about government interference with the expressive rights that attach to the electoral process and it is precisely the kind of claim that is governed by the Irwin Toy framework. Applying that framework, it is clear that the timing of the legislation, by interfering with political discourse in the middle of an election, violated s. 2(b) of the Charter. By radically redrawing electoral boundaries during an active election that was almost two-thirds complete, the legislation interfered with the rights of all participants in the electoral process to engage in meaningful reciprocal political discourse. The Act eradicated nearly half of the active election campaigns, and required candidates to file a change of ward notification form to continue in the race. The redrawing of ward boundaries meant that candidates needed to reach new voters with new priorities. Voters who had received campaign information, learned about candidates' mandates and engaged with them based on the 47-ward structure had their democratic participation put into abeyance. The timing of the Act breathed instability into the election, undermining the ability of candidates and voters in their wards to meaningfully discuss and inform one another of their views on matters of local concern.

The limitation on s. 2(b) rights in this case was the timing of the legislative changes. Ontario offered no explanation, let alone a pressing and substantial one, for why the changes were made in the middle of an ongoing election. In the absence of any evidence or explanation for the timing of the Act, no pressing and substantial objective exists for this limitation and it cannot, therefore, be justified in a free and democratic society.

As for the role of unwritten constitutional principles, there is disagreement with the majority's observations circumscribing their scope and power in a way that reads down the Court's binding jurisprudence. Unwritten constitutional principles may be used to invalidate legislation. The precedential Constitution of the United Kingdom is not a written document, but is comprised of unwritten norms, Acts of Parliament, Crown prerogative, conventions, custom of Parliament, and judicial decisions, among other sources. Canada's Constitution, as a result, embraces unwritten as well as written rules. Unwritten constitutional principles have been held to be the lifeblood of the Constitution and the vital unstated assumptions upon which the text is based. They are not merely "context" or "backdrop" to the text. On the contrary, they are the Constitution's most basic normative commitments from which specific textual provisions derive. The specific written provisions are elaborations of the underlying, unwritten, and organizing principles found in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867. Constitutional text emanates from underlying principles, but it will not always be exhaustive of those principles.

Apart from written provisions of the Constitution, principles deriving from the Constitution's basic structure may constrain government action. Those principles exist independently of and, as in the case of implied fundamental rights before the promulgation of the Charter, prior to the enactment of express constitutional provisions. The legislative bodies in Canada must conform to these basic structural imperatives and can in no way override them. Accordingly, unwritten principles may be used to invalidate legislation if a case arises where legislation elides the reach of any express constitutional provision but is fundamentally at odds with the Constitution's internal architecture or basic constitutional structure. This would undoubtedly be a rare case; however, to foreclose the possibility that unwritten principles can be used to invalidate legislation in all circumstances is imprudent. It not only contradicts the Court's jurisprudence, it is fundamentally inconsistent with the case law confirming that unwritten constitutional principles can be used to review legislation for constitutional compliance. Reviewing legislation for constitutional compliance means upholding, revising or rejecting it.

Unwritten constitutional principles are the foundational organizing principles of the Constitution and have full legal force. They serve to give effect to the structure of the Constitution and function as independent bases upon which to attack the validity of legislation since they have the same legal status as the text. Unwritten constitutional principles not only give meaning and effect to constitutional text and inform the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, they assist in developing an evolutionary understanding of the rights and freedoms guaranteed in the Constitution, which have long been described as a living tree capable of growth and expansion. Unwritten constitutional principles are a key part of what makes the tree grow. They are also substantive legal rules in their own right. In appropriate cases, they may well continue to serve, as they have done in the past, as the basis for declaring legislation unconstitutional.

I. Introduction

[1] While cast as a claim of right under s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, this appeal, fundamentally, concerns the exercise of provincial legislative authority over municipalities. The issue, simply put, is whether and how the Constitution of Canada restrains a provincial legislature from changing the conditions by and under which campaigns for elected municipal councils are conducted.

[2] Section 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867 assigns to provinces exclusive legislative authority regarding "Municipal Institutions in the Province". Municipalities incorporated under this authority therefore hold delegated provincial powers; like school boards or other creatures of provincial statute, they do not have independent constitutional status (Public School Boards' Assn. of Alberta v. Alberta (Attorney General), 2000 SCC 45, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 409, at paras. 33-34). The province has "absolute and unfettered legal power to do with them as it wills" (Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Assn. v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2001 SCC 15, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 470, at para. 58, quoting with approval Campbell J. in Ontario Public School Boards' Assn. v. Ontario (Attorney General) (1997), 1997 CanLII 12352 (ON SC), 151 D.L.R. (4th) 346 (Ont. C.J. (Gen. Div.)), at p. 361). No constitutional norms or conventions prevent a province from making changes to municipal institutions without municipal consent (East York (Borough) v. Ontario (1997), 1997 CanLII 1316 (ON CA), 36 O.R. (3d) 733 (C.A.), at pp. 737-38, per Abella J.A.). And "it is not for this Court to create constitutional rights in respect of a third order of government where the words of the Constitution read in context do not do so" (Baier v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 31, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 673, at para. 39).

[3] Aside from one reference to s. 92(8) — and an acknowledgement that the Province of Ontario had constitutional authority to act as it did in this case — our colleague Abella J. all but ignores this decisive constitutional context (para. 112). And yet, these considerations loom large here. After the closing of a nomination period for elections to the Toronto City Council, the Province legislated a new, reduced ward structure for the City of Toronto and a correspondingly reduced Council. The City says that doing so was unconstitutional, because it limited the s. 2(b) Charter rights of electoral participants and violated the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy. It also, says the City, ran afoul of the constitutional requirements of effective representation, which it says flow from s. 2(b) of the Charter and s. 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867 by virtue of that same unwritten constitutional principle of democracy.

[4] None of these arguments have merit, and we would dismiss the City's appeal. In our view, the Province acted constitutionally. As to the s. 2(b) claim, the City seeks access to a statutory platform which must be considered under the framework stated in Baier. The change to the ward structure did not prevent electoral participants from engaging in further political expression on election issues under the new ward structure in the 69 days between the Act coming into force and the election day. There was no substantial interference with the claimants' freedom of expression and thus no limitation of s. 2(b).

[5] Nor did the Act otherwise violate the Constitution. Unwritten constitutional principles cannot in themselves ground a declaration of invalidity under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, and there is no freestanding right to effective representation outside s. 3 of the Charter. Further, the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy cannot be used to narrow provincial authority under s. 92(8), or to read municipalities into s. 3.

II. Background

[6] In 2013, the City of Toronto engaged consultants to conduct the Toronto Ward Boundary Review of Toronto's then 44-ward structure. They recommended an expanded 47-ward structure, which the City adopted in 2016.

[7] On May 1, 2018, the City of Toronto campaign commenced and nominations opened in preparation for an election day on October 22, 2018. By the close of nominations on July 27, 2018, just over 500 candidates had registered to run in the 47 wards. That same day, the Government of Ontario announced its intention to introduce legislation reducing the size of Toronto City Council to 25 wards. On August 14, 2018, the Better Local Government Act, 2018, S.O. 2018, c. 11 ("Act"), came into force, reducing the number of wards from 47 to 25 (based on the boundaries of the federal electoral districts), and extending the nomination period to September 14.

[8] The City and two groups of private individuals applied on an urgent basis to the Ontario Superior Court of Justice challenging the constitutionality of these measures and seeking orders restoring the 47-ward structure. They argued that the Act breached Charter guarantees of freedom of expression, freedom of association, and equality, and that it violated the unwritten constitutional principles of democracy and the rule of law.

[9] The application judge agreed, finding two limits on s. 2(b) of the Charter (2018 ONSC 5151, 142 O.R. (3d) 336). First, he found that the Act limited the municipal candidates' s. 2(b) right to freedom of expression, a conclusion largely tied to the timing of the Act, enacted as it was during the election campaign. Secondly, he found that the Act limited municipal voters' s. 2(b) right to effective representation — despite the fact that effective representation is a principle of s. 3 (and not s. 2(b)) of the Charter — due to his conclusion that the ward population sizes brought about by the Act were too large to allow councillors to effectively represent their constituents. Neither of these limits could, he further held, be justified under s. 1 and he set aside the impugned provisions of the Act. As a result, the election was to proceed on the basis of the 47-ward system.

[10] The Province appealed and moved to stay the judgment pending appeal. The Court of Appeal for Ontario granted the stay on September 19, 2018, concluding that there was a strong likelihood that the Province's appeal would be successful and, on October 22, 2018, the Toronto municipal election proceeded on the basis of the 25-ward structure created by the Act (2018 ONCA 761, 142 O.R. (3d) 481). No issue is taken with the integrity of the election or the results thereof.

[11] When the Court of Appeal decided the Province's appeal on its merits, it divided. While the dissenters would have invalidated the Act as unjustifiably limiting freedom of expression, the majority allowed the appeal, finding no such limit (2019 ONCA 732, 146 O.R. (3d) 705). The City had advanced a positive rights claim — that is, a claim for a particular platform and not protection from state interference with the conveyance of a message. Consistent with the Baier framework governing such claims, the majority applied the factors stated in Dunmore v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2001 SCC 94, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 1016, to conclude that the claim was not properly grounded in s. 2(b) of the Charter, and that the application judge had erred in finding that the Act substantially interfered with the candidates' freedom of expression. Further, he had erred in finding that the right to effective representation — guaranteed by s. 3 — applies to municipal elections and bears any influence over the s. 2(b) analysis. Finally, the majority held that unwritten constitutional principles do not confer upon the judiciary power to invalidate legislation that does not otherwise infringe the Charter; nor do they limit provincial legislative authority over municipal institutions. Though unwritten constitutional principles are sometimes used to fill gaps in the Constitution, no such gap exists here.

[12] The Court of Appeal appears to have granted the City public interest standing to argue the appeal (para. 28). The City's standing was not challenged before this Court.

III. Issues

[13] Two issues arise from the foregoing. First, did the Act limit (unjustifiably or at all) the freedom of expression of candidates and/or voters participating in the 2018 Toronto municipal election? And secondly, can the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy be applied, either to narrow provincial legislative authority over municipal institutions or to require effective representation in those institutions, so as to invalidate the Act?

IV. Analysis

A. Freedom of Expression

(1) Principles of Charter Interpretation in the Context of Section 2(b)

[14] This appeal hinges on the scope of s. 2(b) of the Charter, which provides that everyone has the fundamental freedoms "of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication". A purposive interpretation of Charter rights must begin with, and be rooted in, the text (Quebec (Attorney General) v. 9147-0732 Québec inc., 2020 SCC 32, [2020] 3 S.C.R. 426, at paras. 8-10) and not overshoot the purpose of the right but place it in its appropriate linguistic, philosophic and historical contexts (R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 344). Yet, it is undeniable that s. 2(b) has traditionally been interpreted expansively (Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927, at p. 976; Ford v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1988 CanLII 19 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 712, at pp. 765-67). Indeed, s. 2(b) has been interpreted so broadly that the framework has been criticized for setting too low a bar for establishing a s. 2(b) limitation, such that any consideration of its substantive reach and bounds is generally consigned to the limitations analysis under s. 1 (K. Chan, "Constitutionalizing the Registered Charity Regime: Reflections on Canada Without Poverty" (2020), 6 C.J.C.C.L. 151, at p. 174, citing M. Plaxton and C. Mathen, "Developments in Constitutional Law: The 2009-2010 Term" (2010), 52 S.C.L.R. (2d) 65). Following Irwin Toy, then, if an activity conveys or attempts to convey a meaning, it has expressive content and prima facie falls within the scope of "expression" (p. 969). Further, if the purpose or effect of the impugned governmental action is to control attempts to convey meaning through that activity, a limit on expressive freedom will be shown (p. 972).

[15] Freedom of expression is not, however, presently recognized as being without internal limits. Activities may fall outside the scope of s. 2(b) where the method of the activity itself — such as violence — or the location of that activity is not consonant with Charter protection (Montréal (City) v. 2952-1366 Québec Inc., 2005 SCC 62, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 141, at paras. 60 and 62).

[16] Further, and of particular significance to this appeal, s. 2(b) has been interpreted as "generally impos[ing] a negative obligation . . . rather than a positive obligation of protection or assistance" (Baier, at para. 20 (emphasis added), citing Haig v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 58 (SCC), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 995, at p. 1035). A claim is properly characterized as negative where the claimant seeks "freedom from government legislation or action suppressing an expressive activity in which people would otherwise be free to engage" (Baier, at para. 35 (emphasis added)). Such claims of right under s. 2(b) are considered under this Court's Irwin Toy framework.

[17] In Baier, however, this Court explained that s. 2(b) may, in certain circumstances, impose positive obligations on the government to facilitate expression. Put differently, while s. 2(b) typically "prohibits gags", it can also, in rare and narrowly circumscribed cases, "compel the distribution of megaphones" (para. 21, quoting Haig, at p. 1035). Hence the Court of Appeal's statement in this case that "[f]reedom of expression is respected, in the main, if governments simply refrain from actions that would be an unjustified interference with it", and that positive claims under s. 2(b) may be recognized in only "exceptional and narrow" circumstances (paras. 42 and 48 (emphasis in original)).

[18] Central to whether s. 2(b) was limited by the Province here is, therefore, the appropriate characterization of the claim as between a negative and positive claim of right. In Baier, this Court shielded positive claims from the Irwin Toy framework and subjected them to an elevated threshold. This is necessary, given the ease with which claimants can typically show a limit to free expression under the Irwin Toy test. An elevated threshold for positive claims narrows the circumstances in which a government or legislature must legislate or otherwise act to support freedom of expression. To consider positive claims under Irwin Toy would be to force the government to justify, under s. 1, any decisions not to provide particular statutory platforms for expression.

[19] The Baier framework is therefore not confined, as our colleague suggests, "to address[ing] underinclusive statutory regimes" (para. 148). This Court could not have been clearer in Baier that it applies "where a government defending a Charter challenge alleges, or the Charter claimant concedes, that a positive rights claim is being made under s. 2(b)" (para. 30). Were it otherwise — that is, were Baier's application limited to cases of underinclusion — claims seeking the creation or extension of a statutory platform for expression would be considered under Baier while claims seeking the preservation of that same platform would be considered under Irwin Toy. This is illogical. Baier's reach extends beyond cases of underinclusion or exclusion, and categorically limits the "obligation[s] on government to provide individuals with a particular platform for expression" (Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v. Canadian Federation of Students — British Columbia Component, 2009 SCC 31, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 295, at para. 35). This reflects the separation of powers; choices about whether and how to design a statutory or regulatory platform are best left to the elected orders of the state.

[20] We should not be taken as suggesting that s. 2(b) is to be understood as conferring a right that is wholly positive or wholly negative. Many constitutional rights have both positive and negative dimensions and the Baier framework explicitly recognizes that this is so for s. 2(b). But the distinction between those positive and negative dimensions remains important when considering the nature of the obligation that the claim seeks to impose upon the state: a "right's positive dimensions require government to act in certain ways, whereas its negative dimensions require government to refrain from acting in other ways" (P. Macklem, "Aboriginal Rights and State Obligations" (1997), 36 Alta. L. Rev. 97, at p. 101; see also A. Sen, The Idea of Justice (2009), at p. 282). For instance, would the claim, if accepted, require government action, or is the claim concerned with restrictions on the content or meaning of expression? And, were the claim rejected, would it deny the claimant access to a particular platform for expression on a subject, or would it preclude altogether the possibility of conveying expression on that subject? While in Haig, L'Heureux-Dubé J. correctly noted that the distinction between positive and negative entitlements is "not always clearly made, nor . . . always helpful", she nevertheless distinguished typical negative claims from those that might require "positive governmental action" (p. 1039). This is the distinction with which we concern ourselves here.

[21] This appeal therefore presents an opportunity to affirm and clarify the application of Baier to positive claims under s. 2(b). Baier remains good law in the context of s. 2(b). It adopts a framework for analysis first set forth in Dunmore, which itself decided a claim under s. 2(d) (freedom of association). We need not decide here whether Dunmore remains applicable to s. 2(d) claims (an open question, given the decisions of this Court in Ontario (Attorney General) v. Fraser, 2011 SCC 20, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 3, and Mounted Police Association of Ontario v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 1, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 3). It suffices here for us to affirm Baier as a useful and necessary framework in the context of positive s. 2(b) claims (although, as we will explain, we would simplify the framework).

(2) The Baier Framework

[22] The Baier framework applies if a claimant seeks to impose an obligation on the government (or legislature) to provide access to a particular statutory or regulatory platform for expression (para. 30; Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority, at para. 35). Here, therefore, if the City's claim would require the government or legislature to enact legislation or promulgate regulations, or otherwise act to provide a particular statutory or regulatory platform, it is advancing a positive claim (Baier, at para. 35).

[23] In Baier, this Court held that, to succeed, a positive claim must satisfy the three Dunmore factors: (1) Is the claim grounded in freedom of expression, rather than in access to a particular statutory regime? (2) Has the claimant demonstrated that lack of access to a statutory regime has the effect of a substantial interference with freedom of expression, or has the purpose of infringing freedom of expression? (3) Is the government responsible for the inability to exercise the fundamental freedom?

[24] These factors set an elevated threshold for positive claims. The first factor asks what the claimant is really seeking — in other words, whether the claim is grounded in freedom of expression or whether it merely seeks access to a statutory regime. Likewise, the second factor — which requires that the claimant establish a substantial interference with freedom of expression — sets a higher threshold than that stated in Irwin Toy, which asks only whether "the purpose or effect of the government action in question was to restrict freedom of expression" (p. 971; see also Baier, at paras. 27-28 and 45).

[25] So understood, these factors can usefully be distilled to a single core question: is the claim grounded in the fundamental Charter freedom of expression, such that, by denying access to a statutory platform or by otherwise failing to act, the government has either substantially interfered with freedom of expression, or had the purpose of interfering with freedom of expression? This is, to be clear, a single question which emphasizes the elevated threshold in the second Dunmore factor while encompassing the considerations of the first and third factors. Given what we see as the significant overlap among the factors — particularly between the first and second — this is, in our view, a salutary clarification of the Baier test, entirely consistent with this Court's approach in Baier and Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority. To be clear, s. 2(b) does not remove the authority that a legislature has to create or modify statutory platforms, because it does not include the right to access any statutory platform in particular. However, when a legislature chooses to provide such a platform, then it must comply with the Charter (Haig, at p. 1041).

[26] If, therefore, a claimant can demonstrate that, by denying access to a statutory platform, the government has substantially interfered with freedom of expression or acted with the purpose of doing so, the claim may proceed. Despite being a positive claim, the claimant has demonstrated a limit to its s. 2(b) right, and — subject to justification of such limit under s. 1 — government action or legislation may be required.

[27] There is no suggestion here that the Province acted with the purpose of interfering with freedom of expression, and we therefore confine our observations here to the claim presented — that is, a claim that a law has had the effect of substantially interfering with freedom of expression. In our view, a substantial interference with freedom of expression occurs where lack of access to a statutory platform has the effect of radically frustrating expression to such an extent that meaningful expression is "effectively preclude[d]" (Ontario (Public Safety and Security) v. Criminal Lawyers' Association, 2010 SCC 23, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 815, at para. 33). While meaningful expression need not be rendered absolutely impossible, we stress that effective preclusion represents an exceedingly high bar that would be met only in extreme and rare cases (Baier, at para. 27; Dunmore, at para. 25). For example, a statutory reduction of the length of an election campaign to two days may well, as a practical matter, be shown to have the effect of constituting a substantial interference with freedom of expression. In such a case, meaningful expression may very well be found to be effectively precluded.

[28] The height of this bar of effective preclusion is demonstrated by Baier. There, legislation was amended to prohibit school employees from running for election as school trustees, and the Court — applying the Dunmore factors — concluded that no substantial interference with freedom of expression was demonstrated. The claim was grounded merely in access to a particular statutory platform governing school trusteeship, rather than a substantial interference with freedom of expression. And, in any event, there was no interference, substantial or otherwise, with the appellants' ability to express views on matters relating to the education system. Their exclusion from the statutory scheme deprived them only of one particular means of such expression (paras. 44 and 48).

(3) Application

(a) Nature of the Claim

[29] The first question to answer in deciding this appeal is whether the City advances a positive claim. There are two ways in which the City's claim can be understood. Each leads to the conclusion that the claim is, in substance, a positive claim that must, therefore, show a substantial interference with freedom of expression.

[30] The first possible view of the City's claim is that of restoring an earlier statutory platform, specifically the 47-ward structure. That this is so is evident from the City's requested disposition, which asks that the next municipal election be conducted under the previous framework (A.F., at para. 152). The City, then, would have the Province act (either by enacting new legislation or repealing the impugned provisions of the Act) to restore the previous statutory platform. This reveals a straightforward positive claim. The fact that the City and the participants in the election had previously enjoyed access to the 47-ward structure is of no legal significance. In Baier, this Court viewed a claim for restoring the status quo as a positive claim, equating it with a demand to legislate a framework for the first time. Such an approach is necessary to prevent fettering; "[t]o hold otherwise would mean that once a government had created a statutory platform, it could never change or repeal it without infringing s. 2(b)" (para. 36).

[31] The second possible view of the City's claim is that of maintaining an existing statutory platform. The City frames its claim as asking the Province, once a municipal election period commences, to ensure access to whatever election platform existed at that time. In the City's view, what is otherwise political expression becomes what it calls "electoral expression" during an election period (A.F., at para. 54). Protection of this "electoral expression", it says, requires the maintenance of the particular electoral framework that was in place at the beginning of the electoral period. Framed thusly, the City's claim that the impugned provisions of the Act limited s. 2(b) turns squarely on the timing of the Act. Indeed, at the hearing of this appeal, the City conceded that barring any other potential issues, the Province was constitutionally permitted to enact this same legislation in the week following the election. Further, the City requested — in the event that this Court finds only that the timing of the Act was unconstitutional — a declaration to that effect, rather than a remedy that would restore the previous 47-ward structure.

[32] The City's focus on the timing of the Act cannot, however, convert its positive claim into a negative one. While its claim is couched in language of non-interference — something that superficially resembles a negative claim to be considered under the Irwin Toy framework — the City does not seek protection of electoral participants' expression from restrictions tied to content or meaning (as was the case, for example, in Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority); rather, it seeks a particular platform (being whatever council structure existed at the outset of the campaign) by which to channel, and around which to structure, that expression.

[33] So understood, the claim is akin to that rejected in Baier. The only point of distinction is that Baier involved a request for a specific type of legislative regime (i.e., one that permitted school employees to run for and serve as school board trustees), while the claim in this case is for temporary protection — that is, for the duration of the campaign — of whatever particular type of election structure existed at the outset of the election period. But, for the purposes of deciding constitutionality, there is no difference between the present case and a hypothetical scenario in which the Province were to scrap the ongoing election and replace it with a completely new platform with a different structure and a reasonable campaign period altogether. Here, the City is able to frame its claim only in terms of non-interference because the Act modified the existing structure without scrapping it. But the ultimate result is the same. The City's claim is still a claim for access to a particular statutory platform; the precise disposition requested simply depends on whatever electoral framework is in place at the outset of the election process. It is thus a positive claim. Because municipal elections are merely statutory platforms without a constitutional basis, provinces can — subject to the elevated threshold of a substantial interference — change the rules as they wish.

[34] To hold otherwise would be to contemplate an unprecedented statutory freeze on provincial jurisdiction under s. 92(8), temporarily constitutionalizing a particular statutory platform for the duration of an election. What would normally be considered a positive claim under s. 2(b) would effectively transform into a negative claim for that period of time. This is constitutionally dubious, nonsensical, and even futile since the duration of such a freeze would depend entirely on the length of the election, over which the Province itself has ultimate authority. With respect, our colleague Abella J. ignores these concerns in holding that Irwin Toy ought to apply to a claim such as this. Provincial authority to legislate a change to Toronto's ward structure is accepted, but on our colleague's understanding this authority is operative only some of the time (para. 112). Combined with her broad articulation of the Irwin Toy threshold in this context — whether legislation "destabiliz[es] the opportunity for meaningful reciprocal discourse" — such an understanding would effectively freeze legislative authority to even tangentially affect a municipal election for the duration of the campaign (para. 115). Such a freeze sits awkwardly with the plenary authority that provinces enjoy under s. 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[35] In sum, the City advances a positive claim and the Baier framework applies.

(b) Application of Baier

[36] As explained above, the Baier framework asks whether the claimant demonstrated that, by denying access to a statutory regime, the government has substantially interfered with freedom of expression. To repeat, this is a demanding threshold, requiring the City to show that the Act radically frustrated the expression of election participants such that meaningful expression was effectively precluded. In our view, the City cannot do so and therefore has not established a limit on s. 2(b).

[37] Here, the candidates and their supporters had 69 days — longer than most federal and provincial election campaigns — to re-orient their messages and freely express themselves according to the new ward structure. (Our colleague Abella J. is simply incorrect to suggest, at para. 104, that only one month of the campaign remained. It was twice that.) The Act did not prevent candidates from engaging in further political speech under the new structure. Candidates continued to campaign vigorously, canvassing and debating about issues unrelated to the impugned provisions, the size of council or the ward boundaries. And even had they not, nothing in the Act prevented them from doing so. It imposed no restrictions on the content or meaning of the messages that participants could convey. Many of the challengers who continued to campaign ultimately had, by any measure, successful campaigns, raising significant amounts of money and receiving significant numbers of votes. This would not have been possible had their s. 2(b) rights been so radically frustrated so as to effectively preclude meaningful expression.

[38] It is of course likely that some of the candidates' prior expression may have lost its relevance; pamphlets or other campaign paraphernalia with an old ward designation on them, for instance, had to be revised or discarded. But, with the new ward structure — and larger ward populations — came higher campaign expenditure limits, so candidates were able to raise more funds over the 69 days they had left in the campaign. This is, therefore, a complaint that the prior expression of the candidates was no longer meaningful or helpful in their project to secure election. It is, at its root, a complaint about diminished effectiveness.

[39] While diminished effectiveness might be enough to amount to a limit of s. 2(b) in its traditional negative orientation — see, for instance, Harper v. Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 33, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 827, at para. 15, per McLachlin C.J. and Major J., dissenting in part, but not on this point, and Libman v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 326 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 569 — more is required under the Baier framework. In the context of a positive claim, only extreme government action that extinguishes the effectiveness of expression — for instance, instituting a two-day electoral campaign — may rise to the level of a substantial interference with freedom of expression; such an act may effectively preclude meaningful expression in the context of the election. That is simply not what happened here. Section 2(b) is not a guarantee of the effectiveness or continued relevance of a message, or that campaign materials otherwise retain their usefulness throughout the campaign.

[40] Even accepting that the change in structure diminished the effectiveness of the electoral candidates' prior political speech by rendering some of their 47-ward campaign communications less relevant, this does not rise to the level of substantial interference. Again, the campaign that took place over 69 days following the imposition of the 25-ward system was vigorously contested by candidates whose freedom of expression was clearly not radically frustrated. We acknowledge that the application judge found a substantial interference with freedom of expression (para. 32). There are, however, three problems with his finding. First, this finding was made in the context of legal error, since he erroneously applied the Irwin Toy framework for a negative claim. Secondly, and relatedly, the reasons of the judge make clear that this finding was tied to the diminished effectiveness of the candidates' expression, something that, as explained, is simply insufficient to show a limit on freedom of expression under the Baier framework. Finally, given the truncated timelines of the matter at first instance, the judge was required to make this finding on a limited factual record. With the benefit of fresh evidence adduced by the Province and admitted at this Court, it is clear that the candidates were not effectively precluded from expressing themselves in the context of the campaign. They conducted vigorous, hard-fought campaigns about the issues that mattered to them.

[41] The City says that the expression at issue here — again, what it calls "electoral expression" — is uniquely connected to, and dependent on, the framework of the election itself. Therefore, it says, the scope of s. 2(b) encompasses not only the expression itself but also the structure of the election. Put thusly, however, the claim is not dissimilar to the "unique role" of school trusteeship claimed by the appellants, and rejected by the Court, in Baier. Claiming a unique role or dependence on a statutory platform is not the same as claiming a fundamental freedom (Baier, at para. 44). Doing so is simply to seek access to that statutory platform. That is what the City seeks here.

[42] In sum, the Baier threshold is not met here. The Act imposed no limit on freedom of expression.

[43] Having found no limit to s. 2(b), we need not consider s. 1. We note, however, that our colleague Abella J. decides s. 1 against the Province on the basis that it "offered no explanation, let alone a pressing and substantial one, for why the changes were made in the middle of an ongoing election" (para. 161). This ignores the Province's written and oral submissions that the newly elected government proceeded expeditiously so as to be able to implement these changes within the time constraints of its own elected mandate, rather than wait four years until the next municipal election (R.F., at para. 149; transcript, at pp. 111-12).

(c) Effective Representation

[44] The City also says that the impugned provisions of the Act infringe "effective representation", an incident of the guarantee contained in s. 3 of the Charter which, the City says, can be imported into s. 2(b).

[45] Section 3 guarantees citizens the right to vote and run for office in provincial and federal elections, and includes a right to effective representation. The text of s. 3 makes clear, however, that it guarantees "only the right to vote in elections of representatives of the federal and the provincial legislative assemblies" (Haig, at p. 1031 (emphasis added)) and "does not extend to municipal elections" (p. 1031 (emphasis added), citing P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd ed. 1992), vol. 2, at p. 42-2). Simply put, ss. 2(b) and 3 record distinct rights which must be given independent meaning (Thomson Newspapers Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1998 CanLII 829 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 877, at paras. 79-80; Harper, at para. 67). Effective representation is not a principle of s. 2(b), nor can the concept be imported wholesale from a different Charter right.

[46] In any event, effective representation connotes voter parity which, while not exhaustive of the requirements of effective representation, is the overarching concern and the condition of "prime importance" (Reference re Prov. Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), 1991 CanLII 61 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 158, at p. 184). What matters is the relative population of the wards, not their absolute size. To hold otherwise implies keeping the population of wards relatively constant by increasing the number of councillors to keep pace with population growth, a notion unknown to Canadian law (in s. 3 or elsewhere) and which would not be without its own difficulties, including potentially unwieldly growth in the size of Toronto City Council (M. Pal, "The Unwritten Principle of Democracy" (2019), 65 McGill L.J. 269, at pp. 298-99; J. C. Courtney, Commissioned Ridings: Designing Canada's Electoral Districts (2001), at pp. 15 and 19).

[47] And even were effective representation to apply as a consideration here, we would not find that the principle has been violated due only to the larger population sizes of the wards created by the Act. It is not disputed that the 25-ward structure of the Act enhanced voter parity, relative to the 47-ward structure preferred by the City (which was not even designed to achieve voter parity until 2026) (A.F., at para. 150; R.F., at paras. 35, 38, 133, 143 and 148). Indeed, the Toronto Ward Boundary Review's reasoning for having rejected the 25-ward structure was criticized on this very basis (R.R. (short), vol. II, at pp. 65, 69, 72-73 and 77-78). While the principle of effective representation encompasses more than simple voter parity, those who rely upon the principle of effective representation here fail to identify any other factors — geography, community history, community interests and minority representation — that could conceivably justify a departure from parity (see Reference re Prov. Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), at p. 184).

B. Democracy

[48] The second issue on appeal is whether the impugned provisions of the Act are unconstitutional for violating the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy. Specifically, the City argues that the change in ward structure violated the unwritten principle of democracy by denying voters effective representation and disrupting the election process (A.F., at para. 105). It therefore asks the Court to use the democratic principle as a basis for invalidating otherwise valid provincial legislation. It says this is made possible by drawing from this Court's s. 3 jurisprudence and from the concept of effective representation, and by viewing the principle as limiting provincial competence under s. 92(8). Conversely, and echoing the Court of Appeal on this point, the Attorney General of Ontario says that the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy cannot be used as a device for invalidating legislation, independently of written constitutional provisions and the law governing them. For the reasons that follow, the Attorney General is correct.

(1) Interpretive and Gap-Filling Roles of Unwritten Constitutional Principles

[49] The Constitution of Canada embodies written and unwritten norms. This Court has recognized that our Constitution describes an architecture of the institutions of state and of their relationship to citizens that connotes certain underlying principles (Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 93; Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at paras. 50-51). These principles, such as democracy and the rule of law, "infuse our Constitution" (Secession Reference, at para. 50). Although not recorded outside of "oblique reference[s]" in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867 and to the Constitution Act, 1982 (para. 51), these principles are "foundational" (para. 49), without which "it would be impossible to conceive of our constitutional structure" (para. 51). These principles have "full legal force" and may give rise to substantive legal obligations (para. 54, quoting Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, 1981 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1981] 1 S.C.R. 753, at p. 845). "[L]ike all principles of political morality, [they] can guide and constrain the decision-making of the executive and legislative branches" (C.A. reasons, at para. 84, citing British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 473, at para. 52).

[50] Unwritten principles are therefore part of the law of our Constitution, in the sense that they form part of the context and backdrop to the Constitution's written terms. Our colleague Abella J. seizes upon a statement from a dissenting opinion in Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution to support the proposition that "full legal force" necessarily includes the power to invalidate legislation. But the complete passage in Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, and the jurisprudence cited therein, demonstrates that Martland and Ritchie JJ. are discussing federalism —— and, while specific aspects of federalism may be unwritten and judicially developed, it is indisputable that federalism has a strong textual basis. Nor does our colleague's reliance upon MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, 1995 CanLII 57 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725 (at para. 176), support the capacity of unwritten constitutional principles to invalidate legislation, since the finding there was that granting exclusive jurisdiction to the youth court would infringe ss. 96 to 101 and 129 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Regardless, any uncertainty on the question of whether unwritten constitutional principles may invalidate legislation that may have remained after the Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution and the Secession Reference was, as we will explain, fully put to rest in Imperial Tobacco.

[51] Further, the authorities she cites as "recogniz[ing] that unwritten constitutional principles have full legal force and can serve as substantive limitations on all branches of government" (para. 166) do not support the proposition that unwritten constitutional principles can be applied to invalidate legislation. Indeed, it is quite the contrary — for example, in R. (on the application of Miller) v. Prime Minister, [2019] UKSC 41, [2020] A.C. 373, at para. 41, the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom stated that the constitutional principle of parliamentary sovereignty means that legislation itself ("laws enacted by the Crown in Parliament"), under the Constitution of the United Kingdom, remains "the supreme form of law". While courts in the United Kingdom may find primary legislation to be inconsistent with the European Convention on Human Rights, 213 U.N.T.S. 221, they may only issue a declaration of incompatibility (Human Rights Act 1998 (U.K.), 1998, c. 42, s. 4); they have not used unwritten constitutional principles to invalidate legislation.

[52] Our colleague is concerned about the "rare case" where "legislation [that] elides the reach of any express constitutional provision . . . is fundamentally at odds with our Constitution's 'internal architecture' or 'basic constitutional structure'" and recourse must be had to unwritten constitutional principles (para. 170, quoting Secession Reference, at para. 50, and OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), 1987 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 2, at p. 57). But it is inconceivable that legislation which is repugnant to our "basic constitutional structure" would not infringe the Constitution itself. And that structure, recorded in the Constitution's text (as we discuss below), is interpreted with the aid of unwritten constitutional principles. This is clear from the context of Martland and Ritchie JJ.'s statement that unwritten principles have "full legal force in the sense of being employed to strike down legislative enactments" (Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, at p. 845). As noted above, that case was about federalism, as was the jurisprudence cited in support of their statement; Martland and Ritchie JJ. were describing the "constitutional requirements that are derived from the federal character of Canada's Constitution" (pp. 844-45 (emphasis added)). And this is precisely the point —— while the specific aspects of federalism at issue there may not have been found in the express terms of the Constitution, federalism is.

[53] To explain, federalism is fully enshrined in the structure of our Constitution, because it is enshrined in the text that is constitutive thereof —— particularly, but not exclusively, in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Structures are not comprised of unattached externalities; they are embodiments of their constituent, conjoined parts. The structure of our Constitution is identified by way of its actual provisions, recorded in its text. This is why our colleague can offer no example of legislation that would undermine the structure of the Constitution that cannot be addressed as we propose, which is via purposive textual interpretation. It is also why, once "constitutional structure" is properly understood, it becomes clear that, when our colleague invokes "constitutional structure", she is in substance inviting judicial invalidation of legislation in a manner that is wholly untethered from that structure.

[54] Ultimately, what "full legal force" means is dependent on the particular context. Any legal instrument or device, such as a contract or a will or a rule, has "full legal force" within its proper ambit. Our colleague's position — that because unwritten constitutional principles have "full legal force", they must necessarily be capable of invalidating legislation — assumes the answer to the preliminary but essential question: what is the "full legal force" of unwritten constitutional principles? And in our view, because they are unwritten, their "full legal force" is realized not in supplementing the written text of our Constitution as "provisions of the Constitution" with which no law may be inconsistent and remain of "force or effect" under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Unwritten constitutional principles are not "provisions of the Constitution". Their legal force lies in their representation of general principles within which our constitutional order operates and, therefore, by which the Constitution's written terms — its provisions — are to be given effect. In practical terms, this means that unwritten constitutional principles may assist courts in only two distinct but related ways.

[55] First, they may be used in the interpretation of constitutional provisions. Indeed, that is the "full legal force" that this Court described in Secession Reference (para. 54). In this way, the unwritten constitutional principles of judicial independence and the rule of law have aided in the interpretation of ss. 96 to 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which have come to safeguard the core jurisdiction of the courts which fall within the scope of those provisions (Provincial Court Judges Reference, at paras. 88-89; MacMillan Bloedel, at paras. 10-11 and 27-28; Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 59, [2014] 3 S.C.R. 31, at paras. 29-33). When applied to Charter rights, unwritten principles assist with purposive interpretation, informing "the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, . . . the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, [and] the historical origins of the concepts enshrined" (Quebec (Attorney General), at para. 7, quoting Big M Drug Mart Ltd., at p. 344; see also R. v. Poulin, 2019 SCC 47, at para. 32).

[56] Secondly, and relatedly, unwritten principles can be used to develop structural doctrines unstated in the written Constitution per se, but necessary to the coherence of, and flowing by implication from, its architecture. In this way, structural doctrines can fill gaps and address important questions on which the text of the Constitution is silent, such as the doctrine of full faith and credit (Morguard Investments Ltd. v. De Savoye, 1990 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1077; Hunt v. T&N plc, 1993 CanLII 43 (SCC), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 289); the doctrine of paramountcy (Huson v. The Township of South Norwich (1895), 1895 CanLII 1 (SCC), 24 S.C.R. 145); the remedy of suspended declarations of invalidity (Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1985 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721); and the obligations to negotiate that would follow a declaration of secession by a province (Secession Reference).

[57] Neither of these functions support the proposition advanced by the City that the force of unwritten principles extends to invalidating legislation. Indeed, the truth of the matter is to the contrary. Attempts to apply unwritten constitutional principles in such a manner as an independent basis to invalidate legislation, whether alone or in combination, suffer from a normative and a practical deficiency, each related to the other, and each fatal on its own.

[58] First, such attempts trespass into legislative authority to amend the Constitution, thereby raising fundamental concerns about the legitimacy of judicial review and distorting the separation of powers (Imperial Tobacco, at paras. 53-54, 60 and 64-67; J. Leclair, "Canada's Unfathomable Unwritten Constitutional Principles" (2002), 27 Queen's L.J. 389, at pp. 427-32). Our colleague's approach, which invites the use of unwritten constitutional principles in a manner that is wholly untethered from the text, ignores this fundamental concern.

[59] Secondly, unwritten constitutional principles are "highly abstract" and "[u]nlike the rights enumerated in the Charter — rights whose textual formulations were debated, refined and ultimately resolved by the committees and legislative assemblies entrusted with constitution-making authority — the concep[t] of democracy . . . ha[s] no canonical formulatio[n]" (C.A. reasons, at para. 85). Unlike the written text of the Constitution, then, which "promotes legal certainty and predictability" in the exercise of judicial review (Secession Reference, at para. 53), the nebulous nature of the unwritten principles makes them susceptible to be interpreted so as to "render many of our written constitutional rights redundant and, in doing so, undermine the delimitation of those rights chosen by our constitutional framers" (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 65). Accordingly, there is good reason to insist that "protection from legislation that some might view as unjust or unfair properly lies not in the amorphous underlying principles of our Constitution, but in its text and the ballot box" (para. 66). In our view, this statement should be understood as covering all possible bases for claims of right (i.e., "unjust or unfair" or otherwise normatively deficient).

[60] We add this. Were a court to rely on unwritten constitutional principles, in whole or in part, to invalidate legislation, the consequences of this judicial error would be of particular significance given two provisions of our Charter. First, s. 33 preserves a limited right of legislative override. Where, therefore, a court invalidates legislation using s. 2(b) of the Charter, the legislature may give continued effect to its understanding of what the Constitution requires by invoking s. 33 and by meeting its stated conditions (D. Newman, "Canada's Notwithstanding Clause, Dialogue, and Constitutional Identities", in G. Sigalet, G. Webber and R. Dixon, eds., Constitutional Dialogue: Rights, Democracy, Institutions (2019), 209, at p. 232). Were, however, a court to rely not on s. 2(b) but instead upon an unwritten constitutional principle to invalidate legislation, this undeniable aspect of the constitutional bargain would effectively be undone, since s. 33 applies to permit legislation to operate "notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15" only. Secondly, s. 1 provides a basis for the state to justify limits on "the rights and freedoms set out" in the Charter. Unwritten constitutional principles, being unwritten, are not "set out" in the Charter. To find, therefore, that they can ground a constitutional violation would afford the state no corresponding justificatory mechanism.

[61] Our colleague says that the application of s. 33 "is not directly before us" (para. 182). As the City has advanced its claim on the basis of s. 2(b), coupled with the unwritten principle of democracy, the prospect of circumventing s. 33's application to the invalidation of legislation under s. 2(b) by recourse to unwritten constitutional principles is indeed squarely before us.

[62] We note an important caveat to the foregoing. The unwritten constitutional principle of the honour of the Crown is sui generis. As correctly noted in submissions of the interveners the Métis Nation of Ontario and the Métis Nation of Alberta, the honour of the Crown arises from the assertion of Crown sovereignty over pre-existing Aboriginal societies (Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 511, at para. 32), and from the unique relationship between the Crown and Indigenous peoples (Guerin v. The Queen, 1984 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 335, at p. 385). We need not decide here whether the principle is capable of grounding the constitutional invalidation of legislation, but if it is, it is unique in this regard.

[63] In sum, and contrary to the submissions of the City, unwritten constitutional principles cannot serve as bases for invalidating legislation. A careful review of the Court's jurisprudence supports this conclusion.

(a) The Provincial Court Judges Reference

[64] In the Provincial Court Judges Reference, this Court considered whether judicial independence, "an unwritten norm, recognized and affirmed by the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867" (para. 109), restricted the extent to which a provincial government could reduce the salaries of provincial court judges. That principle, the Court held, emerged from the reading together of s. 11(d) of the Charter, and the preamble and ss. 96 to 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (para. 124). For the majority, Lamer C.J. was explicit in emphasizing the merely interpretive role of the unwritten constitutional principle of judicial independence in supplementing the text of ss. 96 and 100:

> The point which emerges from this brief discussion is that the interpretation of ss. 96 and 100 has come a long way from what those provisions actually say. This jurisprudential evolution undermines the force of the argument that the written text of the Constitution is comprehensive and definitive in its protection of judicial independence. The only way to explain the interpretation of ss. 96 and 100, in fact, is by reference to a deeper set of unwritten understandings which are not found on the face of the document itself. [First and second emphasis added; third emphasis in original; para. 89.]

[65] In other words, where the constitutional text is not itself sufficiently definitive or comprehensive to furnish the answer to a constitutional question, a court may use unwritten constitutional principles as interpretive aids. This is an approach that resorts to unwritten constitutional principles where necessary in order to give meaning and effect to constitutional text. It is thus not dissimilar to this Court's approach to purposive constitutional interpretation, which begins with and is grounded in the text (Quebec (Attorney General), at paras. 8-10); unwritten constitutional principles inform the purpose of the provisions of the text, thus guiding the purposive definition (R. Elliot, "References, Structural Argumentation and the Organizing Principles of Canada's Constitution" (2001), 80 Can. Bar Rev. 67, at p. 84). To be clear, this must be a textually faithful exercise; the text remains of primordial significance to identifying the purpose of a right, being "the first indicator of purpose" (Quebec (Attorney General), at para. 11), and the application of constitutional principles to the interpretive exercise may not allow a court to overshoot that purpose (paras. 4 and 10-11). More particularly, and as the Court affirmed in Quebec (Attorney General), the Constitution "is not 'an empty vessel to be filled with whatever meaning we might wish from time to time'" (para. 9, quoting Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), 1987 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 313, at p. 394). Rather, constitutional interpretation "must first and foremost have reference to, and be constrained by, [its] text" (para. 9).

[66] Our colleague resists this, notwithstanding the clear direction in Quebec (Attorney General) regarding the centrality to the interpretational exercise of constitutional text. Indeed, her approach is completely the opposite: far from being the primary element of the Constitution whose interpretation can be informed by unwritten constitutional principles, the text itself "emanates" from those principles, and thus it is the principles which are paramount (para. 168). This is entirely inconsistent with the Provincial Court Judges Reference, upon which she relies. Lamer C.J. applied the unwritten constitutional principle of judicial independence to guide his interpretation of the scope of provincial authority under s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and to fill a gap where provincial courts dealing with non-criminal matters were concerned (paras. 107-8). None of this supports applying unwritten constitutional principles as bases for invalidating legislation.

(b) The Secession Reference

[67] In Secession Reference, this Court said:

> Underlying constitutional principles may in certain circumstances give rise to substantive legal obligations (have "full legal force", as we described it in [Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution], supra, at p. 845), which constitute substantive limitations upon government action. These principles may give rise to very abstract and general obligations, or they may be more specific and precise in nature. The principles are not merely descriptive, but are also invested with a powerful normative force, and are binding upon both courts and governments. [para. 54]

A faithful reading of this passage must acknowledge the force ascribed to unwritten constitutional principles. Of significance, however, is that such force was conditioned by the nature of the questions posed in the reference — the conditions for secession of a province from Confederation — which the Court was called upon to answer. The case combined "legal and constitutional questions of the utmost subtlety and complexity with political questions of great sensitivity" (para. 1, quoting Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, at p. 728) to which the Court proposed an answer (being an obligation to negotiate in some circumstances) which, while constituting a "legal framework" in the form of a set of rules to legitimize secession, was enforceable only politically as "it would be for the democratically elected leadership of the various participants to resolve their differences" (para. 101 (emphasis added); see also Elliot, at p. 97).

[68] Of course, the Court made clear that it had identified "binding obligations under the Constitution of Canada" (para. 153), and that a breach of those obligations would occasion "serious legal repercussions" (para. 102). But the Court also acknowledged the "non-justiciability of [the] political issues" involved (para. 102), which meant that the Court could have "no supervisory role" over the political negotiations (para. 100). Recognizing that the "reconciliation of the various legitimate constitutional interests is necessarily committed to the political rather than the judicial realm" (para. 153), the Court fashioned rules in the event of whose breach the "appropriate recourse" would lie in "the workings of the political process rather than the courts" (para. 102). This is another instance of the separation of powers: courts do not supervise the legislature or the executive as to political process.

[69] Nothing, therefore, in the Secession Reference supports the proposition that unwritten constitutional principles can serve as an independent basis to invalidate legislation. While the obligations for the respective parties in that case had legal force by way of a judicial declaration, how that declaration would be given effect — that is, enforced — was deemed a question of political process, not legal process. Here again, as in the case of constitutional interpretation, the structural gap-filling role of unwritten constitutional principles was not and, we say, could not, be applied to invalidate legislation in the sense of declaring it under s. 52 to be of no force or effect.

(c) Babcock and Imperial Tobacco

[70] At issue in Babcock v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 57, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 3, was the constitutionality of a provision of the Canada Evidence Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-5, that allowed for an exception to disclosure, in litigation, based on Cabinet confidence. The respondents argued that the provision was ultra vires Parliament due to its inconsistency with the unwritten constitutional principles of the rule of law, judicial independence, and the separation of powers (by allowing the executive to prevent disclosure of evidence of its own unconstitutional conduct). McLachlin C.J., writing for the majority, held that "[a]lthough the unwritten constitutional principles are capable of limiting government actions, . . . they do not do so in this case" (para. 54 (emphasis added)). She reached this conclusion on the basis that "unwritten principles must be balanced against the principle of Parliamentary sovereignty" (para. 55), concluding:

> It is well within the power of the legislature to enact laws, even laws which some would consider draconian, as long as it does not fundamentally alter or interfere with the relationship between the courts and the other branches of government. [para. 57]

[71] McLachlin C.J.'s statement that unwritten constitutional principles are "capable of limiting government actions" was later explained by this Court in Imperial Tobacco. There, legislation authorizing action by the Province of British Columbia against tobacco manufacturers was challenged on the basis that it was inconsistent with, inter alia, the unwritten constitutional principle of the rule of law. For the Court, Major J. unequivocally rejected the appellants' proposed use of the rule of law to invalidate legislation for two reasons, only one of which is of relevance here:

> . . . the appellants' arguments overlook the fact that several constitutional principles other than the rule of law that have been recognized by this Court — most notably democracy and constitutionalism — very strongly favour upholding the validity of legislation that conforms to the express terms of the Constitution (and to the requirements, such as judicial independence, that flow by necessary implication from those terms). Put differently, the appellants' arguments > fail to recognize that in a constitutional democracy such as ours, protection from legislation that some might view as unjust or unfair properly lies not in the amorphous underlying principles of our Constitution, but in its text and the ballot box. [Emphasis added; para. 66.]

[72] In other words, unwritten constitutional principles are indeterminate, such that they could be in theory deployed not only in service of invalidating legislation, but of upholding it. Major J. continued: the recognition of an unwritten constitutional principle such as the rule of law "is not an invitation to trivialize or supplant the Constitution's written terms", nor "is it a tool by which to avoid legislative initiatives of which one is not in favour. On the contrary, it requires that courts give effect to the Constitution's text, and apply, by whatever its terms, legislation that conforms to that text" (para. 67). From this, it follows that the statement in Babcock that unwritten constitutional principles are "capable of limiting government actions" is to be understood in a narrow and particular sense: legislative measures are restrained by the unwritten principle of the rule of law, "but only in the sense that they must comply with legislated requirements as to manner and form (i.e., the procedures by which legislation is to be enacted, amended and repealed)" (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 60). Again, this understanding of unwritten constitutional principles precludes entirely their application to invalidate legislation under s. 52.

[73] This, we would add, is a complete answer to our colleague Abella J.'s assertions that this Court has "never, to date, limited" the role of unwritten constitutional principles, and that their interpretive role is not "narrowly constrained by textualism" (paras. 171 and 179). Our colleague reads Imperial Tobacco as narrowing the use of one specific unwritten constitutional principle —— the rule of law —— and not unwritten constitutional principles generally. But the problem of indeterminacy would inevitably arise with the use of any unwritten constitutional principle to invalidate legislation. Imperial Tobacco thus unequivocally affirmed both a narrow interpretive role for unwritten principles, and the primacy of the text in constitutional adjudication.

(d) Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia

[74] In Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia, this Court was called upon to decide the constitutionality of court hearing fees imposed by British Columbia that denied some people access to the courts. For the majority, McLachlin C.J. held that those fees, enacted pursuant to s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867, violated s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 as they impermissibly infringed on the jurisdiction of superior courts by denying some people access to the courts (paras. 1-2). In obiter, she added that the connection between s. 96 and access to justice was "further supported by considerations relating to the rule of law" (para. 38), as "[t]here cannot be a rule of law without access, otherwise the rule of law is replaced by a rule of men and women who decide who shall and who shall not have access to justice" (para. 38, quoting B.C.G.E.U. v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1988 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 214, at p. 230). This was, she said, "consistent with the approach adopted by Major J. in Imperial Tobacco" (para. 37):

> The legislation here at issue — the imposition of hearing fees — must conform not only to the express terms of the Constitution, but to the "requirements . . . that flow by necessary implication from those terms" (para. 66). The right of Canadians to access the superior courts flows by necessary implication from the express terms of s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 as we have seen. It follows that the province does not have the power under s. 92(14) to enact legislation that prevents people from accessing the courts. [Emphasis added; para. 37.]

[75] In our view, McLachlin C.J.'s invocation of Major J.'s "necessary implication" threshold from Imperial Tobacco signifies that, where unwritten constitutional principles are used as interpretive aids, their substantive legal force must arise by necessary implication from the Constitution's text. We therefore see nothing in this that is inconsistent with the Provincial Court Judges Reference and, in particular, with the limited scope of application of unwritten constitutional principles. The rule of law was used in Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia as an interpretive aid to s. 96, which in turn was used to narrow provincial legislative authority under s. 92(14). The rule of law was not being used as an independent basis for invalidating the impugned court fees. In this way, McLachlin C.J.'s reasoning simply reflects a purposive interpretation of s. 96 informed by unwritten constitutional principles.

(2) Relevance of the Democratic Principle to Municipal Elections

[76] Democracy is, in light of the foregoing, a principle by which our Constitution is to be understood and interpreted. Though not explicitly identified in the text, the basic structure of our Constitution — including its establishment of the House of Commons and of provincial legislatures — connotes certain freely elected, representative, and democratic political institutions (Secession Reference, at para. 62).

[77] The democratic principle has both individual and institutional dimensions (para. 61). It embraces not only the process of representative and responsible government and the right of citizens to participate in that process at the provincial and federal levels, but also substantive goals including the promotion of self-government (paras. 64-65). So understood, the democratic principle sits alongside and indeed overlaps with other unwritten constitutional principles that this Court has recognized, including federalism and the rule of law (paras. 66-67).

[78] In this case, the democratic principle is relevant as a guide to the interpretation of the constitutional text. It supports an understanding of free expression as including political expression made in furtherance of a political campaign (Reference re Prov. Electoral Boundaries (Sask.); Reference re Alberta Statutes, 1938 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1938] S.C.R. 100; Switzman v. Elbling, 1957 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1957] S.C.R. 285; OPSEU). But it cannot be used in a manner that goes beyond this interpretive role. In particular, it cannot be used as an independent basis to invalidate legislation.

(a) Section 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867

[79] The structure of neither the Constitution Act, 1867 nor the Constitution Act, 1982 requires by necessary implication the circumscription of provincial lawmaking authority under s. 92(8) in the manner proposed. Subject to the Charter, the province has "absolute and unfettered legal power" to legislate with respect to municipalities (Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Assn., at para. 58). And this Court cannot grant constitutional status to a third order of government "where the words of the Constitution read in context do not do so" (Baier, at para. 39).

[80] Indeed, the City's submissions neglect the fact, recognized in the passage from Imperial Tobacco, at para. 66, cited above, that unwritten constitutional principles other than the rule of law that have been recognized by this Court, including democracy and constitutionalism, strongly favour upholding the validity of legislation that conforms to the text of the Constitution. It follows that the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy cannot be used to narrow legislative competence under s. 92(8); as this Court has recognized, the provinces have plenary jurisdiction under this head of power, unrestricted by any constitutional principle (Public School Boards' Assn. of Alberta).

(b) Section 3 of the Charter

[81] Nor can the democratic principle be used to make s. 3 of the Charter — including its requirement of effective representation — relevant to the current case. There is no open question of constitutional interpretation here. Section 3 democratic rights were not extended to candidates or electors to municipal councils. This is not a gap to be addressed judicially. The absence of municipalities in the constitutional text is, on the contrary, a deliberate omission (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 65). As the intervener the Federation of Canadian Municipalities argues, municipalities (or at least chartered towns) predate the Magna Carta (1215). Their existence and importance would have been known to the framers in 1867. The constitutional status of municipalities, and whether they ought to enjoy greater independence from the provinces, was a topic of debate during patriation (House of Commons Debates, vol. X, 1st Sess., 32nd Parl., June 15, 1981, at p. 10585). In the end, municipalities were not constitutionalized, either in amendments to the Constitution Act, 1867 or by reference in the democratic rights enshrined in the Charter.

[82] Unlike in the Provincial Court Judges Reference, therefore, there is no textual basis for an underlying constitutional principle that would confer constitutional status on municipalities, or municipal elections. The entitlement to vote in elections to bodies not mentioned in s. 3 is therefore a matter for Parliament and provincial legislatures (Haig, at p. 1033; Baier, at para. 39). Again, and like the school boards at issue in Baier, municipalities are mere creatures of statute who exercise whatever powers, through officers appointed by whatever process, that provincial legislatures consider fit. Were the unwritten democratic principle applied to require all elections to conform to the requirements of s. 3 (including municipal elections, and not just elections to the House of Commons or provincial legislatures), the text of s. 3 would be rendered substantially irrelevant and redundant (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 65). To repeat: the withholding of constitutional status for municipalities, and their absence from the text of s. 3, was the product of a deliberate omission, not a gap. The City's submissions ignore that application of the democratic principle is properly applied to interpreting constitutional text, and not amending it or subverting its limits by ignoring "the primordial significance assigned by this Court's jurisprudence to constitutional text in undertaking purposive interpretation" (Quebec (Attorney General), at para. 4). It is not for the Court to do by "interpretation" what the framers of our Constitution chose not to do by enshrinement, or their successors by amendment.

(3) Conclusion on the Democratic Principle

[83] Even had the City established that the Act was inconsistent with the principle of democracy, it follows from the foregoing discussion that a court could not rely on that inconsistency to find the Act unconstitutional. The Act was enacted pursuant to a valid legislative process and the Province had no obligation to consult with the City before it introduced the legislation, or to introduce the legislation at a particular time. (As the application judge correctly noted, the City of Toronto Act, 2006, S.O. 2006, c. 11, Sch. A, does not impose an immutable obligation to consult since the Province could enact the Act and overrule its previous enactment. Moreover, the related Toronto-Ontario Cooperation and Consultation Agreement did not bind the Province in law.)

[84] In short, and despite their value as interpretive aids, unwritten constitutional principles cannot be used as bases for invalidating legislation, nor can they be applied to support recognizing a right to democratic municipal elections by narrowing the grant to provinces of law-making power over municipal institutions in s. 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867. Nor can they be applied to judicially amend the text of s. 3 of the Charter to require municipal elections or particular forms thereof. The text of our Constitution makes clear that municipal institutions lack constitutional status, leaving no open question of constitutional interpretation to be addressed and, accordingly, no role to be played by the unwritten principles.

V. Conclusion

[85] We would dismiss the appeal.

The reasons of Abella, Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ. were delivered by

ABELLA J. —

[86] Elections are to democracy what breathing is to life, and fair elections are what breathe life into healthy democracies. They give the public a voice into the laws and policies they are governed by, and a chance to choose who will make those laws and policies. It is a process of reciprocal political discourse.

[87] The rules of an election, including the electoral boundaries and the timelines for campaigns, structure the process of reciprocal dialogue between candidates and voters in their electoral districts. The final act of voting, itself a form of political expression, is the culmination of the process of deliberative engagement throughout an election period. The stability of the electoral process is therefore crucial not only to political legitimacy, but also to the rights of candidates and voters to meaningfully engage in the political discourse necessary for voters to cast an informed vote, and for those elected to govern in response to the expressed views of the electorate.

[88] The 2018 Toronto municipal election had been underway for three and a half months when the Province of Ontario enacted legislation that radically redrew the City of Toronto's electoral ward boundaries by reducing the number of wards from 47 to 25. Nominations had closed, campaigns were in full swing, and voters had been notified of who wanted to represent them and why.

[89] The issue in this appeal is not whether the Province had the legal authority to change the municipal wards. It is whether the Province could do so in the middle of an ongoing municipal election, thereby destabilizing the foundations of the electoral process and interfering with the ability of candidates and voters to engage in meaningful political discourse during the period leading up to voting day.

[90] Completely revamping the electoral process in the middle of an election was unprecedented in Canadian history. The question is whether it was also unconstitutional. In my respectful view, it was.

Background

[91] In June 2013, City Council approved a Toronto Ward Boundary Review under its authority to establish, change or dissolve wards (City of Toronto Act, 2006, S.O. 2006, c. 11, Sch. A, s. 128(1)). The mandate of the Boundary Review was "to bring a recommendation to Toronto City Council on a ward boundary configuration that respects the principle of 'effective representation'" (Canadian Urban Institute, Draw the Line: Toronto Ward Boundary Review Project Work Plan, Civic Engagement & Public Consultation Strategy, April 28, 2014 (online), at p. 1). At the time, there were 44 wards in the City of Toronto.

[92] Over the next nearly four years, the Boundary Review conducted research, held public hearings, and consulted extensively. External consultants were hired who developed recommendations, organized extensive stakeholder consultations, held meetings with City Council and the Mayor's staff, and individually interviewed members of the 2010-2014 City Council and new 2014-2018 members. Altogether, they held over 100 face-to-face meetings with City Council, school boards and other stakeholders, as well as 24 public meetings and information sessions.

[93] The four year process resulted in seven reports. A draft of each report was reviewed by an outside five-person Advisory Panel. The Boundary Review's Options Report, in August 2015, analyzed eight options for drawing new ward boundaries, concluding that five options met the requirement of effective representation. Of particular significance to this appeal, one of the rejected options was redesigning the wards to mirror the 25 federal electoral districts.

[94] The Boundary Review's Final Report, in May 2016, recommended increasing the number of wards from 44 to 47.

[95] At the direction of the Executive Committee of City Council, two further reports were prepared by the Boundary Review in 2016, one in August and one in October. Among other options, the 25 federal electoral district proposal was again examined. Those reports again recommended the 47-ward structure, concluding that applying the boundaries of the 25 federal electoral districts would not achieve effective representation or resolve significant population imbalances, in part, since they were based on the 2011 census and were expected to be redrawn after the 2021 census. The Boundary Review, on the other hand, was based on population estimates for 2026 "to ensure that any new ward structure will last for several elections and constant ward boundary reviews are not required" (Additional Information Report, August 2016 (online), at p. 10).

[96] City Council adopted the 47-ward structure in November 2016, which was enacted through By-laws Nos. 267-2017 and 464-2017 in March and April 2017. The goal was to create a stable electoral framework for multiple elections. The By-laws were intended to govern the City of Toronto's municipal elections from 2018 to 2026, and, possibly, 2030.

[97] The 47-ward structure was appealed to the Ontario Municipal Board by various individuals, including those seeking to have the city divided into wards that mirrored the 25 federal electoral districts. After seven days of hearings, a majority of the Board rejected the appeals and approved the By-laws on December 15, 2017 (Di Ciano v. Toronto (City), 2017 CanLII 85757). In its decision, the Board explained why it found the By-laws to be reasonable:

> The Board finds that the work undertaken by the [Boundary Review] culminating in the By-laws setting out a 47-ward structure was comprehensive. The ward structure delineated in the By-laws provides for effective representation and corrects the current population imbalance amongst the existing 44 wards. The decision made by Council to adopt the By-laws was defensible, fair and reasonable. The decision by Council to implement a 47-ward structure does not diverge from the principles of voter equity and effective representation. In this regard, there is nothing unreasonable in the decision of Council. [para. 51]

[98] An application was made to the Divisional Court for leave to appeal the Board's decision by two individuals who had unsuccessfully argued before the Board that the 25 federal electoral districts should be implemented. On March 6, 2018, the motion was dismissed (Natale v. City of Toronto, 2018 ONSC 1475, 1 O.M.T.R. 349). Swinton J. concluded that the Board applied the correct governing principle, namely, "effective representation":

> Setting electoral boundaries is an exercise that requires a weighing of many policy considerations. The Board heard from a number of expert witnesses over the course of a seven day hearing. It considered relative voter parity as well as other factors. It concluded that communities of interest are best respected in a 47 ward structure. It also noted that a 25 ward structure could increase voter population in the wards "resulting in a significant impact on the capacity to represent". [Citations omitted; para. 10.]

[99] On May 1, 2018, nominations opened for candidates seeking election in Toronto's 47 wards.

[100] On June 7, 2018, a new provincial government was elected. On the day that nominations for City Council closed, July 27, 2018, the Premier, Doug Ford, announced that the government intended to introduce legislation that would reduce the size of Toronto's City Council from 47 to 25 councillors.

[101] The Boundary Review had researched the issue of effective representation for nearly 4 years, concluding that the 25 federal electoral districts would not achieve effective representation and would have an insignificant difference in terms of voter parity. Ontario did not conduct any redistricting studies or send the proposed legislation to Committee for consultation before it was enacted.

[102] The legislation was introduced for the first reading in the Legislative Assembly on July 30, 2018 and came into force on August 14, 2018, 69 days before the scheduled election date. The election had been underway for three and a half months. By then, thousands of candidates had signed up and 509 were certified and actively campaigning in Toronto's 47 wards.

[103] The nomination period was extended to September 14, 2018, but the election date remained the same — October 22, 2018. That gave candidates, all of whom would have to seek new nominations or notify the City Clerk of their intention to continue in the race by filing a change of ward notification form, just over one month to campaign in the new wards. Until nominations closed again on September 14, 2018, candidates and voters were in legal limbo awaiting the passage of regulations for the new electoral regime and the adjudication of a constitutional challenge to the mid-election changes that gave rise to this appeal. It was only after nominations closed that voters and candidates had a full picture of which candidates were running and in what wards.

[104] The new one-month campaign period was also characterized by the disruptive impact of abruptly changing the number, size and boundaries of the wards. Candidates who had been canvassing, responding to local issues, incurring expenses and developing community relationships were now faced with deciding whether and where to run. The old wards were eradicated, many of the new ones were almost twice as large, the populations were different, and there was only one month left to change wards, meet the new constituencies, learn what their concerns were, and engage with them on those issues.

[105] In the absence of any notice or additional time to fundraise, many previously certified candidates could no longer afford to run in these new and larger wards. Certified candidates had until September 14, 2018 to file a change of ward notification form or else their nominations would be deemed to be withdrawn (Better Local Government Act, 2018, S.O. 2018, c. 11 ("Act"), Sch. 3, s. 1; Municipal Elections Act, 1996, S.O. 1996, c. 32, Sch., s. 10.1(8)). When the present constitutional challenge was decided only days before that deadline, only 293 of the 509 previously certified candidates had taken the necessary steps to continue in the race. In the end, more than half of the previously certified candidates dropped out of the race before voting day.

[106] The City of Toronto and a number of candidates and electors applied to the Ontario Superior Court of Justice for an order declaring the legislation reducing the number of wards from 47 to 25 of no force or effect, pursuant to s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[107] On September 10, 2018, Belobaba J. held that the Act was unconstitutional, infringing the rights of both candidates and voters under s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2018 ONSC 5151, 142 O.R. (3d) 336). He held that the legislation violated the expressive rights of candidates by radically redrawing ward boundaries mid-election, and that it breached the rights of voters to cast a vote that could result in effective representation by doubling the population sizes of the wards.

[108] On September 19, 2018, the Ontario Court of Appeal ordered an interim stay of Belobaba J.'s order, meaning that the election would take place based on the new 25-ward structure (2018 ONCA 761, 142 O.R. (3d) 481). It took place on October 22, 2018.

[109] On September 19, 2019, the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal from Belobaba J.'s order (2019 ONCA 732, 146 O.R. (3d) 705). Writing for a 3-2 majority, Miller J.A. held that Belobaba J. "impermissibly extended the scope [of] s. 2(b)" to protect the effectiveness of efforts to convey political messages and to include a right to effective representation.

[110] In dissent at the Court of Appeal, MacPherson J.A. held that the timing of the Act infringed s. 2(b), concluding that "[b]y extinguishing almost half of the city's existing wards midway through an active election, Ontario blew up the efforts, aspirations and campaign materials of hundreds of aspiring candidates, and the reciprocal engagement of many informed voters".

[111] I agree with MacPherson J.A.

Analysis

[112] Under s. 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867, the provinces have exclusive jurisdiction over "Municipal Institutions in the Province". The question therefore of whether the Province has the authority to legislate a change in Toronto's ward structure is not the issue in this appeal. The issue is whether this timing mid-way through a municipal election was in violation of s. 2(b) of the Charter, which states:

> 2 Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:
> . . .
> (b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;

[113] The 2018 Toronto municipal election had already been underway for three and a half months when the number, size and boundaries of all the wards were changed.

[114] It is entirely beside the point to observe that elected municipal councils are creatures of statute. Section 2(b) of the Charter applies with equal vigour to protect political discourse during a municipal election as a federal or provincial one. When a province chooses to vest certain powers in a democratic municipality, municipal elections invariably become the locus of deliberative engagement on those delegated policy issues. It is incumbent on a provincial legislature to respect the rights of its citizens to engage in meaningful dialogue on municipal issues during an election period and, in particular, the rights of candidates and voters to engage in meaningful exchanges before voting day.

[115] When a democratic election takes place in Canada, including a municipal election, freedom of expression protects the rights of candidates and voters to meaningfully express their views and engage in reciprocal political discourse on the path to voting day. That is at the core of political expression, which in turn is at the core of what is protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter. When the state enacts legislation that has the effect of destabilizing the opportunity for meaningful reciprocal discourse, it is enacting legislation that interferes with the Constitution.

[116] Municipal elections have been a part of political life in Canada since before Confederation, and municipalities are a crucial level of government. The 1996 Greater Toronto Area Task Force explained their significance, emphasizing that "services should be delivered by local municipalities to ensure maximum efficiency and responsiveness to local needs and preferences" (Greater Toronto, at p. 174; see also D. Siegel, "Ontario", in A. Sancton and R. Young, eds., Foundations of Governance: Municipal Government in Canada's Provinces (2009), 20, at p. 22; A. Flynn, "Operative Subsidiarity and Municipal Authority: The > important democratic governments in their own right. The variations in multicultural policy making in Canadian cities are evidence that local choices, policies, and politics matter. Municipalities are important vehicles of the democratic will of local communities as well as important sites of multicultural democratic citizenship.

> (Municipalities and Multiculturalism: The Politics of Immigration in Toronto and Vancouver (2009), at p. 5)

[117] The democratically accountable character of municipalities is well established in our jurisprudence. In Godbout v. Longueuil (City), 1997 CanLII 335 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 844, La Forest J. wrote that "municipal councils are democratically elected by members of the general public and are accountable to their constituents in a manner analogous to that in which Parliament and the provincial legislatures are accountable to the electorates" (para. 51). Similarly, in Catalyst Paper Corp. v. North Cowichan (District), 2012 SCC 2 (CanLII), [2012] 1 S.C.R. 5, McLachlin C.J. recognized that municipal councillors "serve the people who elected them and to whom they are ultimately accountable" (para. 19).

[118] The increasing significance of municipal governance has been accompanied by an increasingly generous interpretation of municipal powers. Writing for a unanimous Court in United Taxi Drivers' Fellowship of Southern Alberta v. Calgary (City), 2004 SCC 19 (CanLII), [2004] 1 S.C.R. 485, Bastarache J. observed that "[t]he evolution of the modern municipality has produced a shift in the proper approach to the interpretation of statutes empowering municipalities" (para. 6). And in 114957 Canada Ltée (Spraytech, Société d'arrosage) v. Hudson (Town), 2001 SCC 40 (CanLII), [2001] 2 S.C.R. 241, L'Heureux-Dubé J. confirmed that "law-making and implementation are often best achieved at a level of government that is . . . closest to the citizens affected and thus most responsive to their needs, to local distinctiveness, and to population diversity" (para. 3; see also Nanaimo (City) v. Rascal Trucking Ltd., 2000 SCC 13 (CanLII), [2000] 1 S.C.R. 342).

[119] These cases built on McLachlin J.'s dissent in Shell Canada Products Ltd. v. Vancouver (City), 1994 CanLII 115 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 231, which stressed the "fundamental axiom" that > courts must accord proper respect to the democratic responsibilities of elected municipal officials and the rights of those who elect them. This is important to the continued healthy functioning of democracy at the municipal level. If municipalities are to be able to respond to the needs and wishes of their citizens, they must be given broad jurisdiction to make local decisions reflecting local values. [Emphasis added; p. 245.]

[120] The reciprocal relationship between the democratic responsibilities of elected municipal officials and the rights of those who elected them is crucial. It requires what Duff C.J. called "the free public discussion of affairs" so that two sets of duties can be discharged — the duties of elected members "to the electors", and of electors "in the election of their representatives" (Reference re Alberta Statutes, 1938 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1938] S.C.R. 100, at p. 133; see also Switzman v. Elbling, 1957 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1957] S.C.R. 285, at pp. 306 and 326-27; RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., 1986 CanLII 5 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 573, at p. 583).

[121] How then does all this relate to the rights in s. 2(b) of the Charter? Because in dealing with municipal elections, we are dealing with the political processes of democratic government and it is undeniable that s. 2(b) protects "the political discourse fundamental to democracy" (R. v. Sharpe, 2001 SCC 2 (CanLII), [2001] 1 S.C.R. 45, at para. 23; see also Ford v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1988 CanLII 19 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 712, at p. 765).

[122] In Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927, this Court held that one of the three underlying principles of the s. 2(b) right is that "participation in social and political decision-making is to be fostered and encouraged" (p. 976). Professors P. W. Hogg and W. K. Wright have referred to political expression as being "at the core of s. 2(b)", and curtailed under s. 1 "only in service of the most compelling governmental interest" (Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at p. 43-9).

[123] This brings us to the central issue in this appeal, namely, whether the timing of the legislation, in redrawing and reducing the number of wards from 47 to 25 in the middle of an election, infringed the expressive rights protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter.

[124] Irwin Toy established a two-part test for adjudicating freedom of expression claims. The first asks whether the activity is within the sphere of conduct protected by freedom of expression. If the activity conveys or attempts to convey a meaning, it has expressive content and prima facie falls within the scope of the guarantee. The second part asks whether the government action, in purpose or effect, interfered with freedom of expression.

[125] Dealing with the first part, the "activity" at the heart of this appeal is the expression of political views and the reciprocal political discourse among electoral participants during an election period, which engages the rights of both those seeking election and those deciding whom to elect. Political discourse undoubtedly has expressive content, and therefore, prima facie falls within the scope of the guarantee. Dickson C.J. in R. v. Keegstra, 1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697, noted that

> [t]he connection between freedom of expression and the political process is perhaps the linchpin of the s. 2(b) guarantee, and the nature of this connection is largely derived from the Canadian commitment to democracy. Freedom of expression is a crucial aspect of the democratic commitment, not merely because it permits the best policies to be chosen from among a wide array of proffered options, but additionally because it helps to ensure that participation in the political process is open to all persons. Such open participation must involve to a substantial degree the notion that all persons are equally deserving of respect and dignity. [Emphasis added; pp. 763-64.]

[126] The second part of the test, namely, whether the state action interfered with the right in purpose or effect, is not, with respect, particularly complicated either. This Court's jurisprudence under s. 2(b) of the Charter has usually arisen in circumstances where the purpose of the government action was to restrict expression by regulating who can speak, what they can say or how their messages can be heard.[1] The case before us, on the other hand, deals with whether the effect of the legislation — redrawing the ward boundaries and cutting the number of wards nearly in half mid-election — was to interfere with these expressive activities.

[127] Freedom of expression does not simply protect the right to speak; it also protects the right to communicate with one another (R. Moon, The Constitutional Protection of Freedom of Expression (2000), at pp. 3-4). The words of Marshall J., in dissent, resonate with the reciprocal nature of expression:

> . . . the right to speak and hear — including the right to inform others and to be informed about public issues — are inextricably part of [the First Amendment]. The freedom to speak and the freedom to hear are inseparable; they are two sides of the same coin. But the coin itself is the process of thought and discussion. The activity of speakers becoming listeners and listeners becoming speakers in the vital interchange of thought is the "means indispensable to the discovery and spread of political truth." [Citations omitted.]

[128] In the electoral context, freedom of expression involves the rights of both candidates and voters to reciprocal deliberative engagement. The right to disseminate and receive information connected with elections has long been recognized as integral to the democratic principles underlying freedom of expression, and as a result, has attracted robust protection (see e.g. Thomson Newspapers Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1998 CanLII 829 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 877; R. v. Bryan, 2007 SCC 12 (CanLII), [2007] 1 S.C.R. 527; Harper v. Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 33 (CanLII), [2004] 1 S.C.R. 827; B.C. Freedom of Information and Privacy Association v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2017 SCC 6 (CanLII), [2017] 1 S.C.R. 93; see also K. Roach and D. Schneiderman, "Freedom of Expression in Canada" (2013), 61 S.C.L.R. (2d) 429; J. Weinrib, "What is the Purpose of Freedom of Expression?" (2009), 67 U.T. Fac. L. Rev. 165).

[129] Political expression during an election period is always "taking place within and being constrained by the legal and institutional framework of an election" (Y. Dawood, "The Right to Vote and Freedom of Expression in Political Process Cases Under the Charter" (2021), 100 S.C.L.R. (2d) 105, at p. 131). In Libman v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 326 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 569, this Court explained that elections and referendums are "procedural structure[s] allowing for public discussion of political issues essential to governing", which serve to ensure "a reasonable opportunity to speak and be heard" and "the right of electors to be adequately informed of all the political positions advanced by the candidates and by the various political parties" (paras. 46-47).

[130] The Intervener, the David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights, cogently explained how there are different aspects of an election, each of which requires protection:

> Election campaigns provide a special forum for voters and candidates to interact with each other. Citizens engage in the democratic process when they identify issues, test policy positions, bring incumbents to account, and assess new candidates' skills, policies and positions. All exercises of expression, at each and every stage of the electoral process — not only the final act of voting — must receive consistent and robust Charter protection. [Footnotes omitted.]
> (I.F., at para. 8)

[131] The democratic dialogue that occurs throughout an election period is crucial to the formation of public opinion and the ability to cast an informed vote. The process of deliberative engagement during an election period was aptly described by Professor Saul Zipkin:

> . . . the electoral process is the primary site in which the representative relationship is constructed. Indeed, "[c]ampaigns . . . are a main point —perhaps the main point — of contact between officials and the populace over matters of public policy." The period in which the putative representative goes before the voters for their approval is a time of creating that relationship, calling for special attention to the proper functioning of the democratic process at that time. As the representative relationship is historically a matter of constitutional concern, and is shaped by political activity and speech in the electoral setting, we might broaden the narrow focus on ballot-casting in our assessment of the democratic process. Post, Citizens Divided: Campaign Finance Reform and the Constitution (2014), 125.)

[132] An election is a process of allowing candidates and voters, as both speakers and listeners, to participate in reciprocal discourse so that their respective views can be fully expressed and heard. It is only through this process of free public discussion and debate that an informed vote can be cast, and ultimately, those elected can be responsive to the views of the electorate.

[133] State interference with individual and collective political expression in the context of an election strikes at the heart of the democratic values that freedom of expression seeks to protect, including "participation in social and political decision-making" (Irwin Toy, at p. 976). The Irwin Toy test is, as a result and as discussed later in these reasons, the appropriate legal framework for adjudicating the present claim of state interference with political expression during an election period.

[134] A stable election period is crucial to electoral fairness and meaningful political discourse. Redrawing the number, size and boundaries of electoral wards during this period destabilizes the process by "[i]nterrupting an election mid-campaign to change the rules of the game, including the electoral districts upon which candidates have crafted their campaigns and voters will have their preferences channelled" (M. Pal, "The Unwritten Principle of Democracy" (2019), 65 McGill L.J. 269, at p. 302).

[135] For three and a half months, candidates and voters engaged in political dialogue within the legal and institutional structure created in advance of the 2018 municipal election after years of research, public engagement and, finally, endorsement from the Ontario Municipal Board.

[136] After the Act came into force, candidates and voters found themselves in a suddenly altered electoral landscape. The Act eradicated nearly half of the active election campaigns, requiring those candidates to file a change of ward notification form to continue in the race. The redrawing of ward boundaries meant that candidates needed to reach new voters with new priorities. Campaign materials such as lawn signs or advertisements for abolished wards "no longer play[ed] the function of electoral expression given the change to the underlying institutional context within which that expression [was] taking place" (Dawood, at p. 132). Voters who had received campaign information, learned about candidates' mandates and engaged with them based on the 47-ward structure had their democratic participation put into abeyance.

[137] The impact on some of the candidates and voters provides illuminating metaphors. One candidate, for example, Dyanoosh Youssefi, explained that she had been canvassing, e-mailing and organizing since the beginning of the campaign for 12-15 hours per day and all of her efforts had "focused on the concerns and the needs of the approximately 55,000 residents of Ward 14" (A.R., vol. XV, at p. 80). Ward 14 was abolished by the Act.

[138] Another candidate, Chiara Padovani, who had been campaigning in Ward 11, described the effect of combining Ward 11 and Ward 12 into a new Ward 5:

> Even before my registration as a candidate for the 2018 election, I engaged in substantial efforts to engage community members around important local issues in Ward 11 for over a one and a half year period such as flooding, road safety, and tenant rights. As a result, I . . . know where residents feel there should be additional speedbumps, crosswalks, and reduction in speed limits. I do not have this type of knowledge for any other ward, including Ward 12.
>
> If I had notice of the change in ward boundaries prior to the commencement of the campaign, I would have been able to plan my ground strategy, and I would have attempted to gain a deeper knowledge of the local issues affecting residents in Ward 12 by actively canvassing in that ward. At this point, it will be impossible for me to carry out double the amount of canvassing that I have completed with the limited time remaining.
> (A.R., vol. XI, at pp. 15-16)

[139] Ever since the 47-ward structure was enacted in 2017, Chris Moise, a Black and openly gay candidate, had been organizing a campaign in Ward 25. He had decided to run in Ward 25 because it encompassed the Gay Village and Yorkville. These were communities he felt he could meaningfully serve based on his experiences as a School Board Trustee for the area, an LGBTQ activist, a former police officer with an interest in police relations with the Black and LGBTQ communities in the Village, and a resident and property owner in Yorkville. When the legislation abolished Ward 25, he dropped out of the race because he could not pivot his campaign on such short notice to either the new Ward 13, which excluded Yorkville where he lived, or the new Ward 11, which had only a very small geographical overlap with the previous Ward 25 and excluded the Village where he had the most meaningful connections and policy goals.

[140] Another candidate, Jennifer Hollett, explained the effect of the two week "legal limbo" (A.R., vol. XI, at p. 144) before the legislation received Royal Assent:

> Even after [the legislation] passed, my campaign team was uncertain what was going to happen to our campaign funds, and whether those funds could be transferred to a new campaign, or whether those funds could be refunded. It was only when regulations made pursuant to the Minister's powers in [the legislation] were passed that we received any direction. The effect of that uncertainty is that my team did not make any campaign expenditures after July 27.
> The voters I speak with are confused. They understand that the rules have changed, but do not understand why those rules have changed and how. Instead of discussing municipal issues in the campaign, such as transit and safer streets, residents are asking about ward boundary changes and how they affect them. [pp. 145-46]

[141] Megann Wilson, another candidate and participant in the Women Win TO's training program, described the ensuing uncertainty vividly:

> Since . . . the imposition of a 25-ward model, I have struggled to engage with residents on my platform, or key issues and policies in the ward. Many residents are simply tired of the changing wards, and no longer know what ward they live in — and that is what I spend my time talking to residents about when I am canvassing. In my view, the level of confusion in my ward will make it more difficult for voters to make a good decision about what candidate to vote for since > electors are not even aware of what ward they now live in let alone who the candidates are, given the sudden changes. Further, as a result of lack of communication to residents about the new ward boundaries, I have found myself having to fill that gap while canvassing residents — a significant distraction from the municipal issues I am trying to engage residents about.

> As a result of [the legislation] I am hindered in getting to the root of municipal issues affecting electors while I am canvassing. I am now spending most of my time with voters explaining the changes to the ward boundaries, and discussing the provincial politics that led to these sudden changes. Time with prospective voters is precious for all candidates and [the legislation] has interrupted my ability to engage directly with voters about my platform and my ideas for the ward and its residents.

[142] Since the Act did not reset campaign finance limits, new candidates entered the race with untapped campaign spending limits, while candidates who had already been campaigning lost what they had invested in now-defunct districts and continued in the race on a reduced budget. Some previously certified candidates stopped producing campaign materials entirely due to the uncertainty surrounding the transfer of campaign funds and expenditures to a new campaign. Others could not afford to compete in the new and larger wards. As one campaign volunteer described:

> We do not know whether a donor who donated the maximum amount to a Ward 23 candidacy can now make a fresh donation to a Ward 13 candidacy. This is important because funds were spent on materials for the Ward 23 candidacy that are no longer useable. . . . It will likely not be possible to undertake sufficient fundraising to replace all of the items that are no longer usable, particularly given the limited amount of time in the campaign. Prior donors will likely not be able or willing to donate again, and it is unlikely we will be able to find enough new donors to produce sufficient new materials for a fresh campaign for a much larger ward area, particularly compared to more well-resourced incumbents.

[143] Voters, too, were affected. One voter, Ish Aderonmu, explained the consequence of candidates dropping out of the race as "deeply disappointing . . . as an elector who has been working to advance one of these campaigns, expressing myself politically for the first time" (A.R., vol. IX, at p. 124). Another voter, who had endorsed a candidate who dropped out of the race, conveyed that "his own political expression has been compromised" and that "candidates remaining in the race are dealing with making major changes to their campaigns, and are not available to discuss [important] issues with him" (A.R., vol. IX, at p. 104).

[144] It is important to remember the timeline. Nominations opened on May 1, 2018, and closed on July 27, 2018. On the same day that nominations closed, the government announced that it intended to introduce new legislation, cutting the wards nearly in half and radically redrawing ward boundaries mid-election. No one knew what the impact of the new boundaries would be. Candidates did not know how the new electoral wards would affect their campaigns, and voters had no idea who their new candidates would be. All this after being in an ongoing electoral process for almost three months.

[145] The new legislation came into force two weeks later on August 14, 2018. By then, candidates had been campaigning and engaging with voters for 105 days in the existing 47 wards. Candidates who had developed mandates to respond to the specific needs and interests of their wards had their campaign efforts eradicated, along with their opportunity to meaningfully engage with the right voters on those issues. Voters who had formed opinions, been persuaded on issues, refined their preferences and expressed their views to their preferred representatives had their political expression thwarted. Some candidates persevered; others dropped out of the race. Volunteers quit, campaign endorsements were rescinded and confusion ensued.

[146] Nominations were extended to September 14, leaving only five weeks — from the date that nominations closed, solidifying which candidates were running and in what wards — for an election that was supposed to last nearly six months. More importantly, those five weeks were marred by the destabilizing impact of the timing of the legislation in the middle of an election that was technically 60 percent complete. The additional month for new candidates to seek nomination could not undo the damage and uncertainty that the change had created for candidates who had already been certified and voters who had already participated in three and a half months of deliberative engagement.

[147] The timing of the Act, in the middle of an ongoing election, breathed instability into the 2018 municipal election, undermining the ability of candidates and voters in their wards to meaningfully discuss and inform one another of their views on matters of local concern. For the remaining campaign period, candidates spent more time on doorsteps discussing the confusing state of affairs with voters than the relevant political issues. The timing of the legislation, by interfering with political discourse in the middle of an election, was a clear breach of s. 2(b) of the Charter.

[148] With respect, this leaves no role for the legal framework set out in Baier v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 31 (CanLII), [2007] 2 S.C.R. 673. It was designed to address underinclusive statutory regimes. The line of authority preceding Baier involved claims by individuals or groups seeking inclusion in an existing statutory regime, alleging that the absence of government support for them constituted a substantial interference with their exercise of a fundamental freedom.[2] The Baier framework was originally developed for an underinclusive labour relations regime in Dunmore v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2001 SCC 94 (CanLII), [2001] 3 S.C.R. 1016, and then modified for an allegedly underinclusive school board trustee election regime in Baier. The framework specifically refers to "claims of underinclusion", "exclusion from a statutory regime" and "underinclusive state action" (Dunmore, at paras. 24-26; Baier, at paras. 27-30). It has no relevance to the legal or factual issues in this case.

[149] The Baier framework was, additionally, confined to its unique circumstances by this Court's subsequent decision in Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v. Canadian Federation of Students — British Columbia Component, 2009 SCC 31 (CanLII), [2009] 2 S.C.R. 295. Writing for a 7-1 majority, Deschamps J. explained that Baier "summarized the criteria for identifying the limited circumstances in which s. 2(b) requires the government to extend an underinclusive means of, or 'platform' for, expression to a particular group or individual" (para. 30). She also cautioned against extending Baier beyond these narrow confines:

> . . . taken out of context, [Baier] could be construed as transforming many freedom of expression cases into "positive rights claims". Expression in public places invariably involves some form of government support or enablement. Streets, parks and other public places are often created or maintained by government legislation or action. If government support or enablement were all that was required to trigger a "positive rights analysis", it could be argued that a claim brought by demonstrators seeking access to a public park should be dealt with under the Baier analysis because to give effect to such a claim would require the government to enable the expression by providing the necessary resource (i.e., the place). But to argue this would be to misconstrue Baier.

> When the reasons in Baier are read as a whole, it is clear that "support or enablement" must be tied to a claim requiring the government to provide a particular means of expression. In Baier, a distinction was drawn between placing an obligation on government to provide individuals with a particular platform for expression and protecting the underlying freedom of expression of those who are free to participate in expression on a platform (para. 42). [Emphasis added; paras. 34-35.]

[150] The Baier test has no application to this appeal. As Deschamps J.'s full quote shows, it is clear that Baier only applies to claims "placing an obligation on government to provide individuals with a particular platform for expression". Irwin Toy, on the other hand, applies to claims that are about "protecting the underlying freedom of expression of those who are free to participate in expression on a platform", like the case before us.

[151] None of the claimants involved in this case was excluded from participating in the 2018 Toronto municipal election, nor did they claim that s. 2(b) of the Charter requires the Province to provide them with a municipal election so that they can express themselves. The s. 2(b) claim in this case is about government interference with the expressive rights that attach to an electoral process. This is precisely the kind of claim that is governed by the Irwin Toy framework, not Baier (Baier, at para. 42; Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority, at para. 35; Ontario (Public Safety and Security) v. Criminal Lawyers' Association, 2010 SCC 23 (CanLII), [2010] 1 S.C.R. 815, at para. 31).

[152] In any event, the distinction between positive and negative rights is an unhelpful lens for adjudicating Charter claims. During nearly four decades of Charter litigation, this Court has recognized that rights and freedoms have both positive and negative dimensions. That recognition has led the Court to adopt a unified purposive approach to rights claims, whether the claim is about freedom from government interference in order to exercise a right, or the right to governmental action in order to get access to it.[3] To paraphrase Gertrude Stein, a right is a right is a right. The threshold does not vary with the nature of the claim to a right. Each right has its own definitional scope and is subject to the proportionality analysis under s. 1 of the Charter.

[153] All rights have positive dimensions since they exist within, and are enforced by, a positive state apparatus (S. Fredman, "Human Rights Transformed: Positive Duties and Positive Rights", [2006] P.L. 498, at p. 503; J. Rawls, Political Liberalism (exp. ed. 2005), at pp. 361-62; A. Sen, The Idea of Justice (2009), at p. 228). They also have negative dimensions because they sometimes require the state not to intervene. The distinction "is notoriously difficult to make . . . . Appropriate verbal manipulations can easily move most cases across the line" (S. F. Kreimer, "Allocational Sanctions: The Problem of Negative Rights in a Positive State" (1984), 132 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1293, at p. 1325).

[154] It is true that freedom of expression was once described by L'Heureux-Dubé J. in Haig v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 58 (SCC), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 995, as prohibiting "gags" but not compelling "the distribution of megaphones" (p. 1035; see also K. Chan, "Constitutionalizing the Registered Charity Regime: Reflections on Canada Without Poverty" (2020), 6 C.J.C.C.L. 151, at p. 173). But even in Haig — a precursor to Baier — L'Heureux-Dubé J. acknowledged that this was an artificial distinction that is "not always clearly made, nor . . . always helpful" (p. 1039; see also Native Women's Assn. of Canada v. Canada, 1994 CanLII 27 (SCC), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 627, at pp. 666-68, per L'Heureux-Dubé J., concurring).

[155] There is no reason to superimpose onto our constitutional structure the additional hurdle of dividing rights into positive and negative ones for analytic purposes. Dividing the rights "baby" in half is not Solomonic wisdom, it is a jurisprudential sleight-of-hand that promotes confusion rather than rights protection.

[156] The purpose of the s. 2(b) right is not merely to restrain the government from interfering with expression, but also to cultivate public discourse "as an instrument of democratic government" (Hogg and Wright, at p. 43-8; see also Weinrib). Political discourse is at the heart of s. 2(b). Protecting the integrity of reciprocal political discourse among candidates and voters during an election period is therefore integral to s. 2(b)'s purpose. Elevating the legal threshold, as the majority proposes to do by applying Baier, adds a gratuitous hurdle, making it harder to prove a breach of this core aspect of s. 2(b) than other expressive activities. What should be applied instead is the foundational framework in Irwin Toy, which simply asks whether the activity in question falls within the scope of s. 2(b) and whether the government action, in purpose or effect, interfered with that expressive activity.

[157] Applying that framework, it is clear that the timing of the legislation violated s. 2(b) of the Charter. By radically redrawing electoral boundaries during an active election that was almost two-thirds complete, the legislation interfered with the rights of all participants in the electoral process to engage in meaningful reciprocal political discourse.

[158] This brings us to s. 1 of the Charter. The purpose of the s. 1 analysis is to determine whether the state can justify the limitation as "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society" (Charter, s. 1; Fraser v. Canada (Attorney General), 2020 SCC 28, at para. 125). The limitation on s. 2(b) rights in this case was the timing of the legislative changes.

[159] But rather than explaining the purpose and justification for the timing of the changes, Ontario relied on the pressing and substantial objectives of the changes themselves as the basis for the s. 1 analysis, saying they were to achieve voter parity, improve efficiency and save costs. This was set out in the press release announcing the proposed legislation, which stated: "We ran on a commitment to restore accountability and trust, to reduce the size and cost of government, including an end to the culture of waste and mismanagement" (Office of the Premier, Ontario's Government for the People Announces Reforms to Deliver Better Local Government, July 27, 2018 (online)). And at the second reading of the legislation, the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing, the Hon. Steve Clark, declared:

> During the recent provincial election campaign, my caucus colleagues and I heard very strongly from Ontarians that they want us to respect those taxpayers' dollars. We heard very clearly from Ontarians that government is supposed to work for them. I think Ontario sent a very clear message on June 7 that they want a government that looks after those taxpayers' dollars, and that is exactly what we're doing with this bill.
> So, Speaker, I want to get into some of the details of the bill, and specifically I want to talk first about the city of Toronto. The bill, if passed, would reduce the size of Toronto city council to 25 councillors from the present 47 plus the mayor. This would give the taxpayers of Toronto a > streamlined, more effective council that is ready to work quickly and puts the needs of everyday people first.

> (Legislative Assembly of Ontario, Official Report of Debates (Hansard), No. 14, 1st Sess., 42nd Parl., August 2, 2018, at p. 605)

[160] Leaving aside that voter parity was hardly mentioned in the legislative debates, this Court has never found voter parity to be the electoral lodestar, asserting, on the contrary, that the values of a free and democratic society "are better met by an electoral system that focuses on effective representation than by one that focuses on mathematical parity" (Reference re Prov. Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), 1991 CanLII 61 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 158, at p. 188).

[161] But of overriding significance, the government offered no explanation, let alone a pressing and substantial one, for why the changes were made in the middle of an ongoing election. There was no hint of urgency, nor any overwhelming immediate policy need.

[162] In the absence of any evidence or explanation for the timing of the Act, no pressing and substantial objective exists for this limitation and it cannot, therefore, be justified in a free and democratic society. The legislation is, as a result, an unjustified breach of s. 2(b).

[163] While this dispenses with the merits of the appeal, the majority's observations circumscribing the scope and power of unwritten constitutional principles in a way that reads down this Court's binding jurisprudence warrants a response.

[164] In the Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217 ("Secession Reference"), the Court identified the unwritten constitutional principles of democracy, judicial independence, federalism, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and the protection of minorities. These principles are derived from the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, which describes our Constitution as "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom" (Secession Reference, at paras. 44-49; see also P. C. Oliver, "'A Constitution Similar in Principle to That of the United Kingdom': The Preamble, Constitutional Principles, and a Sustainable Jurisprudence" (2019), 65 McGill L.J. 207).

[165] The precedential Constitution of the United Kingdom is not a written document, but is comprised of unwritten norms, Acts of Parliament, Crown prerogative, conventions, custom of Parliament, and judicial decisions, among other sources (Oliver, at p. 216; M. Rowe and N. Déplanche, "Canada's Unwritten Constitutional Order: Conventions and Structural Analysis" (2020), 98 Can. Bar Rev. 430, at p. 438). Our Constitution, as a result, "embraces unwritte[n] as well as written rules" (Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3 ("Provincial Judges Reference"), at para. 92, per Lamer C.J.).

[166] It is notable that many Parliamentary systems, notwithstanding their different constitutional arrangements, have also recognized that unwritten constitutional principles have full legal force and can serve as substantive limitations on all branches of government.[4]

[167] Unwritten constitutional principles have been held to be the "lifeblood" of our Constitution (Secession Reference, at para. 51) and the "vital unstated assumptions upon which the text is based" (para. 49). They are so foundational that including them in the written text "might have appeared redundant, even silly, to the framers" (para. 62).

[168] Unwritten constitutional principles are not, as the majority suggests, merely "context" or "backdrop" to the text. On the contrary, unwritten principles are our Constitution's most basic normative commitments from which specific textual provisions derive. The specific written provisions are "elaborations of the underlying, unwritten, and organizing principles found in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867" (Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 107; see also Switzman, at p. 306, per Rand J.). Constitutional text emanates from underlying principles, but it will not always be exhaustive of those principles. In other words, the text is not exhaustive of our Constitution (New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v. Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), 1993 CanLII 153 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 319, at p. 378, per McLachlin J.).

[169] Apart from written provisions of the Constitution, principles deriving from the Constitution's basic structure may constrain government action. Those principles exist independently of and, as in the case of implied fundamental rights before the promulgation of the Charter, prior to the enactment of express constitutional provisions (see e.g. Reference re Alberta Statutes, per Duff C.J.; Switzman, at pp. 327-28, per Abbott J.; OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), 1987 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 2, at p. 57, per Beetz J.). As Beetz J. wrote for the majority in OPSEU, at p. 57, "quite apart from Charter considerations, the legislative bodies in this country must conform to these basic structural imperatives and can in no way override them":

> There is no doubt in my mind that the basic structure of our Constitution, as established by the Constitution Act, 1867, contemplates the existence of certain political institutions, including freely elected legislative bodies at the federal and provincial levels. In the words of Duff C.J. in Reference re Alberta Statutes, at p. 133, "such institutions derive their efficacy from the free public discussion of affairs . . . ." and, in those of Abbott J. in Switzman v. Elbling, at p. 328, neither a provincial legislature nor Parliament itself can "abrogate this right of discussion and debate". Speaking more generally, I hold that neither Parliament nor the provincial legislatures may enact legislation the effect of which would be to substantially interfere with the operation of this basic constitutional structure. [p. 57]

[170] This leads inescapably to the conclusion — supported by this Court's jurisprudence until today — that unwritten principles may be used to invalidate legislation if a case arises where legislation elides the reach of any express constitutional provision but is fundamentally at odds with our Constitution's "internal architecture" or "basic constitutional structure" (Secession Reference, at para. 50; OPSEU, at p. 57). This would undoubtedly be a rare case. But with respect, the majority's decision to foreclose the possibility that unwritten principles be used to invalidate legislation in all circumstances, when the issue on appeal does not require them to make such a sweeping statement, is imprudent. It not only contradicts our jurisprudence, it is fundamentally inconsistent with the case law confirming that unwritten constitutional principles can be used to review legislation for constitutional compliance. Reviewing legislation for constitutional compliance means upholding, revising or rejecting it. Otherwise, there is no point to reviewing it.

[171] In the Secession Reference, a unanimous Court confirmed that "[u]nderlying constitutional principles may in certain circumstances give rise to substantive legal obligations (have 'full legal force', as we described it in the Patriation Reference, supra, at p. 845), which constitute substantive limitations upon government action" (para. 54, quoting Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, 1981 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1981] 1 S.C.R. 753 ("Patriation Reference"); see also Babcock v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 57 (CanLII), [2002] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 54, per McLachlin C.J.). That means they can be used to assess state action for constitutional compliance, which in turn can lead to endorsing, rejecting, limiting or expanding the acts of the executive or legislative branches of government. Again, with respect, we have never, to date, limited their role in the manner the majority proposes.

[172] The Court's reference to Patriation Reference dispels any doubt as to what it meant when it said that these principles have "full legal force". In the passage cited approvingly from the Patriation Reference, Martland and Ritchie JJ., dissenting in part, explained that unwritten constitutional principles "have been accorded full legal force in the sense of being employed to strike down legislative enactments" (p. 845 (emphasis added)). While Martland and Ritchie JJ. dissented in the result in the Patriation Reference, they cited judgments in support of the principle of federalism that remain good law and were viewed as necessary to "preserving the integrity of the federal structure" (p. 821), notably Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, 1937 CanLII 362 (UK JCPC), [1937] A.C. 326 (P.C.), and Attorney General of Nova Scotia v. Attorney General of Canada, 1950 CanLII 26 (SCC), [1951] S.C.R. 31 (see also Secession Reference, at para. 81, citing Reference re Authority of Parliament in relation to the Upper House, 1979 CanLII 169 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 54, at p. 71). In other words, structural doctrine helps identify what the unwritten principles are, it does not limit their role.

[173] This Court expressly endorsed the unwritten principles of democracy as the "baseline against which the framers of our Constitution, and subsequently, our elected representatives under it, have always operated" (Secession Reference, at para. 62); the rule of law as "a fundamental postulate of our constitutional structure" (Roncarelli v. Duplessis, 1959 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1959] S.C.R. 121, at p. 142, per Rand J.), "the very foundation of the Charter" (B.C.G.E.U. v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1988 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 214, at p. 229, per Dickson C.J.), and the source of judicial authority to override legislative intent "where giving effect to that intent is precluded by the rule of law" (Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65, at para. 23); federalism as "a foundational principle of the Canadian Constitution" (References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, 2021 SCC 11 (CanLII), [2021] 1 S.C.R. 175, at para. 3, per Wagner C.J.); and judicial independence as a "constitutional imperative" in light of "the central place that courts hold within the Canadian system of government" (Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 108). And of course, the unwritten constitutional principle of the honour of the Crown has been affirmed by this Court and accorded full legal force (Beckman v. Little Salmon/Carmacks First Nation, 2010 SCC 53 (CanLII), [2010] 3 S.C.R. 103, at para. 42, per Binnie J.; Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73 (CanLII), [2004] 3 S.C.R. 511, at para. 16, per McLachlin C.J.).

[174] In the Provincial Judges Reference, this Court relied, in part, on the unwritten constitutional principle of judicial independence to strike down legislative provisions in various provincial statutes. The issue was whether the principle of judicial independence restricts the manner and extent to which provincial legislatures can reduce the salaries of provincial court judges. While the principle of judicial independence finds expression in s. 11(d) of the Charter, which guarantees the right of an accused to an independent tribunal, and ss. 96 to 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which govern superior courts in the province, the unwritten principle of judicial independence was used to fill a gap in the written text to cover provincial courts in circumstances not covered by the express provisions. Writing for the majority, Lamer C.J. held that

> [j]udicial independence is an unwritten norm, recognized and affirmed by the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867. In fact, it is in that preamble, which serves as the grand entrance hall to the castle of the Constitution, that the true source of our commitment to this foundational principle is located. [para. 109]

[175] In Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1985 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721, this Court invoked the unwritten principle of the rule of law to create a novel constitutional remedy — the suspended declaration of constitutional invalidity. The Court developed this remedy notwithstanding that the text of s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 states that unconstitutional laws are "of no force or effect" suggesting, when interpreted technically and in isolation from underlying constitutional principles, that declarations of invalidity can only be given immediate effect. As Karakatsanis J. wrote for the majority in Ontario (Attorney General) v. G, 2020 SCC 38, although s. 52(1) "does not explicitly provide the authority to suspend a declaration, in adjudicating constitutional issues, courts 'may have regard to unwritten postulates which form the very foundation of the Constitution of Canada'" (para. 120, quoting Manitoba Language Rights, at p. 752).

[176] Beyond the Reference context, in MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, 1995 CanLII 57 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725, this Court used the rule of law principle to read down s. 47(2) of the Young Offenders Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. Y-1, which granted youth courts exclusive jurisdiction over contempt of court by a young person, so as not to oust the jurisdiction of superior courts. Writing for the majority, Lamer C.J. held that Parliament cannot remove the contempt power from a superior court without infringing "the principle of the rule of law recognized both in the preamble and in all our conventions of governance" (para. 41).

[177] And in Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 59 (CanLII), [2014] 3 S.C.R. 31, this Court struck down a regulation imposing hearing fees that were found to deny people access to the courts based in part on the unwritten constitutional principle of the rule of law, and relatedly, access to justice.

[178] The majority's emphasis on the "primordial significance" of constitutional text is utterly inconsistent with this Court's repeated declarations that unwritten constitutional principles are the foundational organizing principles of our Constitution and have full legal force. Being unwritten means there is no text. They serve to give effect to the structure of our Constitution and "function as independent bases upon which to attack the validity of legislation . . . since they have the same legal status as the text" (R. Elliot, "References, Structural Argumentation and the Organizing Principles of Canada's Constitution" (2001), 80 Can. Bar Rev. 67, at p. 95; see also H.-R. Zhou, "Legal Principles, Constitutional Principles, and Judicial Review" (2019), 67 Am. J. Comp. L. 889, at p. 924). By definition, an emphasis on the words of the Constitution demotes unwritten principles to a diluted role. "Full legal force" means full legal force, independent of the written text.

[179] Unwritten constitutional principles do not only "give meaning and effect to constitutional text" and inform "the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom", they also assist in developing an evolutionary understanding of the rights and freedoms guaranteed in our Constitution, which this Court has long described as "a living tree capable of growth and expansion" (Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, at p. 156, quoting Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1929 CanLII 438 (UK JCPC), [1930] A.C. 124 (P.C.), at p. 136). Unwritten constitutional principles are a key part of what makes the tree grow (Secession Reference, at para. 52; Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 106). This Court has never held that the interpretive role of unwritten constitutional principles is narrowly constrained by textualism.

[180] Unwritten constitutional principles are, additionally, substantive legal rules in their own right. As Lamer C.J. wrote in the Provincial Judges Reference:

> [The preamble] recognizes and affirms the basic principles which are the very source of the substantive provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867. As I have said above, those provisions merely elaborate those organizing principles in the institutional apparatus they create or contemplate. As such, the preamble is not only a key to construing the express provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867, but also invites the use of those organizing principles to fill out gaps in the express terms of the constitutional scheme. It is the means by which the underlying logic of the Act can be given the force of law. [Emphasis added; para. 95.]

[181] Professor Mark D. Walters effectively explained why the role of unwritten constitutional principles has not been limited as the majority suggests:

> The relationship between unwritten and written constitutional law in Canada may be conceived in different ways. At one point, Chief Justice Antonio Lamer observed that the role of unwritten principles is "to fill out gaps in the express terms of the constitutional scheme." This statement might suggest that judges are just reading between the lines in order to make the text complete. Or, to use another metaphor, judges are constructing bridges over the waters that separate islands of constitutional text, creating a unified and useable surface.
> But the gap-filling and bridge metaphors do not capture fully the theory of unwritten constitutionalism as it has developed in the Canadian cases. . . . We must alter the bridge metaphor accordingly: The textual islands are merely the exposed parts of a vast seabed visible beneath the surrounding waters, and the bridges constructed by judges between these islands are actually causeways moulded from natural materials brought to the surface from this single underlying foundation. The constitutional text is not just supplemented by unwritten principles; it rests upon them. [Emphasis added; footnote omitted.]
> ("Written Constitutions and Unwritten Constitutionalism", in G. Huscroft, ed., Expounding the Constitution: Essays in Constitutional Theory (2008 (reprinted 2010)), 245, at pp. 264-65)

[182] It is also difficult to understand the need for the majority's conclusion that using unwritten constitutional principles to strike down legislation would circumvent the legislative override power in s. 33 of the Charter. This question is not directly before us.

[183] Finally, I see no merit to the majority's argument that courts cannot declare legislation invalid on the basis of unwritten constitutional principles because s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 only applies to written text. This argument extinguishes the entire jurisprudence establishing that unwritten principles have full legal force. Section 52(1) provides that "any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is . . . of no force or effect". The majority's reading of s. 52(1), like much of the rest of its analysis, is a highly technical exegetical exercise designed to overturn our binding authority establishing that unwritten constitutional principles are a full constitutional partner with the text, including for the purposes of s. 52 (New Brunswick Broadcasting Co., at pp. 375-78; Manitoba Language Rights, at p. 752; Ontario (Attorney General) v. G, at para. 120).

[184] It is true that in British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49 (CanLII), [2005] 2 S.C.R. 473, the Court questioned whether the rule of law could be used to invalidate legislation based on its content, but this was based on the specific contours of one unwritten principle, not unwritten principles in general. The Court did not constrain the reach of judicial independence, the other unwritten constitutional principle raised in that case. As Major J. explained in describing the limits of the content of the rule of law:

> . . . it is difficult to conceive of how the rule of law could be used as a basis for invalidating legislation such as the Act based on its content. That is because none of the principles that the rule of law embraces speak directly to the terms of legislation. The first principle requires that legislation be applied to all those, including government officials, to whom it, by its terms, applies. The second principle means that legislation must exist. And the third principle, which overlaps somewhat with the first and second, requires that state officials' actions be legally founded. See R. Elliot, "References, Structural Argumentation and the Organizing Principles of Canada's Constitution" (2001), 80 Can. Bar Rev. 67, at pp. 114-15. [para. 59]

Never, however, has this Court, until now, foreclosed the possibility of all unwritten constitutional principles ever invalidating legislation.

[185] The inevitable consequence of this Court's decades-long recognition that unwritten constitutional principles have "full legal force" and "constitute substantive limitations" on all branches of government is that, in an appropriate case, they may well continue to serve, as they have done in the past, as the basis for declaring legislation unconstitutional (Secession Reference, at para. 54; see also Elliot, at p. 95; (A.) J. Johnson, "The Judges Reference and the Secession Reference at Twenty: Reassessing the Supreme Court of Canada's Unfinished Unwritten Constitutional Principles Project" (2019), 56 Alta. L. Rev. 1077, at p. 1082; P. Bobbitt, Constitutional Fate: Theory of the Constitution (1982)). There is no need, as a result, to constrain the role of unwritten constitutional principles and newly declare that their full legal force does not include the ability, in appropriate circumstances, to declare legislation to be constitutionally invalid.

[186] I would allow the appeal and restore Belobaba J.'s declaration that the timing of the Act unjustifiably infringed s. 2(b) of the Charter.

Kevin D. Sherkin, for the plaintiffs/responding parties

HEARD: December 23, 2013

ENDORSEMENT

[1] The Piersantis move to quash the attempt of the plaintiffs to bring on for hearing a motion made to the trial judge, Justice Ellen Macdonald, in June 2009 towards the end of the trial. Part of the relief sought by the plaintiffs at that time was dismissed. Later, the trial judge released her reasons for judgment in the action in which she held for the plaintiffs in a number of respects. An appeal by the defendants to the Court of Appeal was partially successful. Leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was denied.

[2] In their motion to the trial judge, the plaintiffs asked for an order that a number of documents be produced, and an order that a number of the defendants pay $4.8 million into court pending the release of the trial reasons for judgment on the basis that those defendants had paid that amount to various parties out of the ordinary course of business and therefore contrary to a Mareva injunction granted by Malloy J. in 2002 several years before the trial. That injunction had enjoined the defendants from dissipating their assets or dealing with their assets other than in the ordinary course of business. The plaintiffs also asked for a declaratory order that those defendants had breached the Mareva injunction.

[3] In her reasons for decision released on June 22, 2009, the trial judge declined the request to order that the $4.8 million be paid into court, holding that the plaintiffs were protected by the Mareva injunction registered on title to three plaza properties. She did not make any decision on the request for a declaration that the defendants had breached the Mareva injunction and said she would make findings on this matter in her reasons for judgment. More particularly, she said:

> [8]... With respect to the payment into court of the $4,800,000, I decline to grant such relief. I do so even in the face of the very broad discretion that I have under Rule 60.02…
> [9] The attitude of the Defendants towards their obligation to make full and timely production of all relevant documents was appalling, if not defiant. Collectively or individually, they held back many documents from the very early stages of these proceedings. They picked or chose the documents that they would produce. For example, there has been almost no production of the documents listed in paras. 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the notice of motion. Mr. Diamond conceded that it is too late to order this production. Except for closing submissions, scheduled to begin tomorrow, this case is closed. The Defendants justified their actions with respect to the three plazas to which the Alfanos claim an interest on a very fluid concept of > what is in the ordinary course of business. It will be for me to make findings on this matter and on the credibility of the parties and their witnesses when I am considering the totality of the evidence when writing my reasons for judgment. It must be kept in mind that I ordered the re-registration of the Mareva on title to the three plaza properties very recently. Bearing in mind that I have carefully listened to the Piersanti and Gold defendants, there are matters that I cannot decide until I hear and consider closing submissions. The plaintiffs are sufficiently protected with the existence of the Mareva injunction on title to the three plaza properties. The request for payment into court of the $4,800,000 or such lesser sum as I might arbitrarily fix is therefore dismissed. Costs of this motion are reserved to be dealt with at the time of the ultimate disposition of costs in this action.

[4] In her reasons for judgment dated September 3, 2010 the trial judge appeared to make a finding, or come close to making a finding, that the Mareva injunction had been breached, and she ordered that 1281632 Ontario Limited, a Piersanti company, pay $2.5 million into court. She stated:

> 103 The evidence is that they have conducted the operation of 1281632 Ontario Limited (the mall properties) without regard to the injunction. Ms. Piersanti was cross-examined extensively on payments made that appear to contravene the terms of the injunction. Ms. Piersanti justified these payments on the basis that it was necessary to do so because they were in the ordinary course of business. Her interpretation of what was in the ordinary course of business was a very fluid one. Mr. Diamond prepared a chart revealing a total of $2,465,436.46 in payments that he submitted were not in the ordinary course of business.
> 104 There was brief reply evidence on June 5, 2009, followed by the renewal of a motion by the Plaintiffs to compel the Gold Defendants to pay into court $2,465,436.43. The Plaintiffs alleged that these monies were used by Mr. and Ms. Piersanti in contravention of the injunction imposed by Molloy J. in September 2002. I declined to order the payment into court stating that I would deal with these issues in these reasons. The following is the chart prepared by Mr. Diamond setting out the details of payments made from the proceeds of mortgages on the Mall properties.
>
>
> TOTAL $2,465,436.46
> 105 I have concluded that $2,500,000 shall be paid into court to the credit of the Plaintiffs within 30 days of the release of these reasons. This will not cause any hardship to the Piersanti Defendants and will be some security for the Plaintiffs who will most likely encounter great difficulty in enforcing any judgment granted by this court in respect of their damages for losses in Osler.

[5] In the Court of Appeal, this part of the judgment was set aside. It was held that the trial judge had made no finding of a breach of the Mareva injunction but that that issue had not finally been disposed of. O'Connor A.C.J.O stated:

> [165] The appellants argue that the trial judge erred in ordering 128 (a Piersanti related company) to pay $2.5 million into court.

> [166] The respondents sought the payment into court on the basis that Ms. Piersanti had caused 128 to pay out approximately $2.5 million in breach of the Mareva injunction granted on June 18, 2002.
> [167] I would set aside this order.
>
>
> [171] In para. 105, the trial judge did not link the award to the breach of the Mareva injunction. Notably, she did not make any finding of contempt, nor give any indication that the $2.5 million award was being ordered for punitive or denunciatory purposes. On the contrary, she appears to have considered the payment of $2.5 million as a down payment against her damage award.
>
> [172] 128, the party ordered to pay the $2.5 million, was not a defendant in the claim for fraud related to the Osler bankruptcy that gave rise to the judgment against Mr. Piersanti. The trial judge did not make any findings that would render 128 liable to pay the damage award for the fraud claim.
> [173] In the result, I would set aside this order. To be clear, I do not conclude that there was no basis for a finding that the Piersantis breached the Mareva injunction. Rather, I am not satisfied that the trial judge, in her reasons, made that finding. That being the case, the trial judge's reasons and these reasons should not be read as finally disposing of that issue. (underlining added).

[6] Mr. Morrison for the Piersantis contends that by deciding in her reasons on the motion dated June 22, 2009 to refuse to order $4.8 million be paid into court, the trial judge effectively dismissed the application for a declaration that the Mareva injunction had been breached. I do not read her decision that way. I read her decision to have put off any decision on the request for declaratory relief until her reasons for judgment would be prepared and released. To repeat, in her reasons on the motion she stated:

> The Defendants justified their actions with respect to the three plazas to which the Alfanos claim an interest on a very fluid concept of what is in the ordinary course of business. It will be for me to make findings on this matter and on the credibility of the parties and their witnesses when I am considering the totality of the evidence when writing my reasons for judgment.

[7] The trial judge confirmed in paragraph 104 of her reasons for judgment of September 3, 2010 that in her reasons on the motion, she had put off the issue so it could be dealt with in her reasons for judgment.

[8] While it appeared in her reasons for judgment in paragraph 103 that the trial judge found that there had been a breach of the Mareva injunction, the Court of Appeal though otherwise, as set out in paragraph 173 of its reasons. The plaintiffs point to the underlined passages of that paragraph to assert that it cannot be said that the trial judge found there to have been no breach of the Mareva injunction. Rather, the plaintiffs say, it is clear from that passage of the Court of Appeal's reasons that the issue has been left open.

[9] I agree with the plaintiffs. The decision of the Court of Appeal, binding on the parties and on me, means that the issue of whether there was a breach of the Mareva injunction was not finally disposed of and it cannot be said that there was no basis for a conclusion that the Piersantis breached the injunction.

[10] However, it is necessary to consider what happened after the decision of the Court of Appeal.

[11] On January 3, 2013, counsel for the plaintiffs provided written submission to Macdonald J. asking her to dispose of their motion that there had been a breach of the Mareva injunction and asked that it be dealt with at an appointment on February 8, 2013 that had been scheduled to deal with other issues. It was contended that rule 59.06 (1) provided her with the necessary jurisdiction. That rule provides that an order that requires amendment in any particular on which the Court did not adjudicate may be amended on a motion in the proceeding. Reliance was placed on the decision of the Court of Appeal that said the issue was still open.

[12] Counsel for the Piersantis filed written submissions opposing the request, essentially arguing that Macdonald J. had decided the issue in her reasons on the motion of June 22, 2009 in declining to order payment into court and therefore there was no issue that had not been adjudicated upon. This submission appears to have disregarded paragraph 173 of the reasons of the Court of Appeal.

[13] Due to health issues, the trial judge adjourned the appointment on several occasions. The appointment eventually took place on April 26, 2013. Oral submissions were made on the request of the plaintiffs that day to decide whether there had been a breach of the Mareva injunction. Near the end of that appointment, counsel for the Mrs. Piersanti provided a draft order to the trial judge that there be an inquiry into damages sustained by the Gold Defendants (some of the defendants, including Mrs. Piersanti) as a result of the Mareva injunction. This was caused by the action being dismissed against the Gold Defendants in the Court of Appeal. Macdonald J. signed the order that day.

[14] On June 13, 2013, the parties received an e-mail from Theresa Finelli, the administrative assistant to Macdonald J. The e-mail was as follows:

> After hearing submissions on April 26, 2013, I have concluded that I am not prepared to amend my judgment.
>
> Madam Justice Ellen Macdonald

[15] On the same day, June 13, 2013, Mr. Sherkin for the plaintiffs sent an e-mail back to Theresa Finelli and stated:

[16] Your Honour

> With great respect, our clients did not ask that you amend your judgment. Our clients asked for a disposition on their motion which pursuant to your Endorsement on the motion was to form part of the Trial Endorsement. The Court of Appeal left that issue open for determination by stating that neither your Trial Endorsement nor the Court of Appeal's decision foreclosed that open motion and it was not disposed of.
>
> We would graciously appreciate knowing the following:
>
> 1. Is your email to be codified in an Endorsement?
>
> 2. Will there be further reasons?
>
> 3. If not your Honour, is your email directing our clients to seek a disposition of that motion from another judge?
> Thank you for your continued assistance and clarification in that regard.

[17] On the following day, June 14, 2013, Mr. Diamond on behalf of the plaintiffs emailed Mr. Morrison and other defence counsel and stated that depending on the response of Macdonald J. to Mr. Sherkin's email of the previous day, in the event that the email from Macdonald J. is the "Endorsement", he wished to place Mr. Morrison on the earliest possible notice that it was his clients' intention to appeal the ruling.

[18] On June 17, 2013 Mr. Diamond sent a further email to Mr. Morrison and other defence counsel and asked them if they required the plaintiffs to serve a formal notice of appeal from the email of Macdonald J. He said he was not sure how to proceed without an actual endorsement and was hopeful that Macdonald J. would provide a further response. He asked for a response a.s.a.p. if they needed a formal notice of appeal. No substantive response was received to this email.

[19] A further attendance before Macdonald J. was scheduled to deal with outstanding costs of the proceedings. Unfortunately, that attendance was also cancelled, again due to her health issues.

[20] On August 27, 2013, Mr. Sherkin wrote to Macdonald J. and asked that an appointment be scheduled to deal with his email to her of June 13, 2013. No response was received. Unbeknownst to the parties, on August 30, 2013 Justice Macdonald retired from the bench for health reasons. On October 10, 2013, and not knowing of her retirement, Mr. Sherkin emailed Ms. Finelli and asked Justice Macdonald to deal with the issues raised in his email of June 13, 2013.

[21] Mr. Morrison takes the position that by her email of June 13, 2013, Macdonald J. disposed of the request by the plaintiffs to have her rule on whether there had been a breach of the Mareva injunction. He says the only route open to the plaintiffs was to appeal that decision to the Court of Appeal, which did not occur. Mr. Sherkin says that the email was not an endorsement.

[22] This is an unfortunate situation. Madam Justice Macdonald was not well in the spring of 2013 and eventually retired from the court at the end of August. What is most concerning is that no reasons whatsoever were given by her for the statement that she was not prepared to amend her judgment. Requests of her for clarification of the e-mail went unanswered. If the e-mail could be considered to be a final decision dismissing the motion, it would not be possible for an appellate court to make any meaningful review of it in accordance with the principles of R. v. Sheppard, 2002 SCC 26 (CanLII), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 869 and the matter would have to be sent back for a rehearing.

[23] I disagree with the plaintiffs that they did not request the judgment to be amended. They justified their renewal of the motion on the basis that the judgment could be amended to deal with something not dealt with by the judge. To this extend the e-mail dealt with their request.

[24] The e-mail was not an order. Nor was it an endorsement as required by rule 59.02(1). That rule requires it to be "made" by a judge on the motion record. No such endorsement was made by Macdonald J. I would not treat the endorsement as a valid endorsement. Thus there has been no final decision on the motion.

[25] It seems to me that even if it could be said that the e-mail passed procedural muster, no order has been taken out and Macdonald J. was not functus. As I am the judge directed to hear the remaining issues in the action, it follows that I am not functus. This is not a rule 59.06(1) situation in which an order taken out is sought to be amended because of some accidental slip or omission or requires amendment in any particular on which the court did not adjudicate. There has been no order.

[26] There is authority, mainly in cases involving attempts to re-open matters because of alleged new evidence, that a court has a wide discretion to re-open a matter where the integrity of the process is at risk or a principle of justice is at stake that requires the reconsideration of the matter, and while a court should re-open a motion or other matter sparingly and with the greatest of care, it may re-open it when it is just to do so in exceptional circumstances. See Strugarova v. Kissiov (2009), 2009 CanLII 40552 (ON SC), 82 C.P.C. (6th) 298 at para. 7 per Roberts J. See also Degroote v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, [1998] O.J. No. 1696 at para. 6, per Lax J.; aff'd 1999 CanLII 4115 (ON CA), [1999] O.J. No. 2313 (C.A.).

[27] In these circumstances, even if the endorsement could be said to be a real or proper endorsement, which in my view it was not, the circumstances here, in which no reasons were provided by Macdonald J. who before her retirement failed to respond to requests for clarification of the e-mail, are exceptional and the integrity of the process is at stake. Moreover, any appeal would inevitably result in the matter being sent back to me for decision on the basis of R. v. Sheppard. I would exercise my discretion and re-hear the matter.

[28] In the circumstances, I am of the view that the matter of whether the Mareva injunction was breached is an open question and that I have jurisdiction to deal with the matter. Counsel may arrange a 9:30 a.m. appointment to discuss scheduling of the motion.

[29] The motion of the Piersantis is dismissed. The plaintiffs are entitled to their costs. If costs are not agreed, the plaintiffs may make brief written submissions no longer than three pages in length along with a proper cost outline within 10 days and the Piersantis may make brief written reply submissions no longer than three pages in length within a further 10 days.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL OF MANITOBA

Courts — Jurisdiction — Publication bans — Variation — Criminal proceedings — Court of Appeal ordering indefinite publication ban on affidavit filed in criminal proceedings before it — Motion brought by media representative after judgment on merits of proceedings rendered asking Court of Appeal to set aside publication ban — Court of Appeal declining to hear motion on basis that jurisdiction exhausted — Whether court retains jurisdiction to reconsider publication ban orders and other such ancillary orders after merits of criminal proceedings decided.

An affidavit filed in a criminal matter before the Court of Appeal had been subject to a publication ban pending a decision as to its admissibility as new evidence. In its November 2018 reasons allowing the appeal on the merits, the Court of Appeal dismissed the motion for new evidence but ordered that the publication ban remain in effect indefinitely. In May 2019, the CBC brought a motion before the Court of Appeal to have the publication ban set aside, arguing that having access to the affidavit would shed light on the criminal matter before the Court of Appeal and the court's conclusion on the merits that a miscarriage of justice had occurred at trial.

The Court of Appeal declined to consider the CBC's motion, citing its rule of practice against rehearings and the doctrine of functus officio. The court reasoned that its jurisdiction was exhausted once it had decided the merits of the case and entered its formal judgment disposing of the appeal. It concluded that it had no authority to hear the motion. The CBC applied for and was granted leave to appeal to the Court from both the Court of Appeal's 2019 decision refusing to reconsider the publication ban ("2019 Jurisdiction Judgment") and the Court of Appeal's 2018 decision ordering the indefinite publication ban ("2018 Publication Ban Judgment").

Held (Abella J. dissenting): The appeal from the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment should be allowed and the matter remanded to the Court of Appeal. The appeal from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment should be adjourned sine die.

Per Wagner C.J. and Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Côté, Brown, Rowe, Martin and Kasirer JJ.: The Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to consider the CBC's motion to set aside the publication ban. While the court could not rehear the appeal on the merits and while the doctrine of functus officio precluded it from reconsidering the substance of the appeal, the court retained the authority to supervise access to the record of its own proceeding, which allowed it to ensure compliance with the constitutionally-protected open court principle and the protection of other important public interests against which it must be weighed. The matter should be remanded to the Court of Appeal, as it is best placed to decide the CBC's motion and the discretionary and fact-specific issues raised. It would be inappropriate for the Court to decide the CBC's appeal from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment before the Court of Appeal has had a chance to consider the CBC's motion to have the publication ban set aside.

According to the rule of functus officio, a final decision of a court that is susceptible of appeal cannot, as a general rule, be reconsidered by the court that rendered that decision. A court loses jurisdiction once the formal judgment has been entered. This rule serves goals of finality and of an orderly appellate procedure. If lower courts could continuously reconsider their own decisions, litigants would be denied a reliable basis from which to launch an appeal to a higher court.

That said, it is important to distinguish between jurisdiction over the merits lost by operation of the doctrine of functus officio and jurisdiction that exists to supervise the court record. Even when a court has lost jurisdiction over the merits of a matter as a result of having entered its formal judgment, it retains jurisdiction to control its court record with respect to proceedings generally understood to be an ancillary but independent matter. This power is part of a court's authority to control its own process and arises by necessary implication from the legislative grant of a court's adjudicative authority. It is anchored in the vital public policy favouring public access to the workings of the courts. Important decisions about the openness of the court record, such as rendering, varying or vacating publication bans and sealing orders, may need to be taken after the proceeding on the merits is over. Recognizing that a court's jurisdiction to control its record survives the end of the underlying proceeding is not inconsistent with the purposes of finality and stability of judgments as the doctrine of functus officio was never intended to restrict the ability of lower courts to control their own files.

That courts retain supervisory jurisdiction over their court records is not to say that once decisions concerning court openness have been made they are open to reconsideration at any time or for any reason. A publication ban or sealing order is susceptible of reconsideration by the issuing court on two narrow grounds and regardless of whether formalized in an order or not.

First, a court may vary or set aside a publication ban or sealing order it has made on timely motion by an affected person, such as the media, who was not given notice of the making of that order and to whom it is appropriate to grant standing for this purpose. Regarding publication bans in criminal matters, standing should be thought of as a matter of a court's discretion. The media should generally have standing to challenge an order that threatens the open court principle where they are able to show they will make submissions that were not considered and that could have affected the result. A court does retain residual discretion to deny standing where hearing the motion would not be in the interests of justice, such as where it would unduly harm the parties or duplicate argument already before the court. As to delay, a moving party is expected to take prompt action to challenge such an order once it has become aware it exists. In the absence of legislative direction, a court must be guided by the purpose of the rule and the circumstances of each case. The task is a contextual balancing of finality and timely justice against the importance of the matter being heard on the merits. This determination is inherently tied to the facts of each particular case and the nature of the issue raised.

Second, a court may vary or set aside a publication ban or sealing order where the circumstances relating to the making of the order have materially changed. The moving party must establish both that a change of circumstances has occurred and that the change, if known at the time of the initial order, would likely have resulted in an order on different terms. The correctness of the initial order is presumed and is not relevant to the existence of a material change of circumstances.

Instances in which a court may reconsider a publication ban or sealing order are distinct from an appeal or application for certiorari made to a higher court from such decisions, as the original court is not being asked to reconsider its decision because it is wrongly decided. Finally, the general principles underlying the two grounds for reconsideration can be displaced by legislation, such as applicable rules of court.

In the present case, the Court of Appeal erred in concluding that applicable legislation, such as its rules of court procedure, or the doctrine of functus officio deprived it of jurisdiction to consider the CBC's motion to set aside the publication ban. The Court of Appeal retained jurisdiction to oversee its record even after the certificate of decision in the underlying proceeding on the merits was entered. That the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to consider the CBC's motion does not mean, however, that the CBC is entitled to the relief it sought. The availability of relief turns on the proper application of the law to the facts, a determination that should be made by the Court of Appeal. Since the CBC has not established a material change of circumstances, it will therefore have to rely on the Court of Appeal's power to reconsider an order on the basis that it was made without notice to an affected party. The impugned order was made of the Court of Appeal's own accord at the oral hearing and then continued indefinitely. The court heard no submissions on point and provided no prior notice to anyone, including the media, notably the CBC who learned of the impugned ban shortly after the reasons were released. The Court of Appeal will have to determine whether the CBC has standing to challenge the relevant order and whether CBC's motion was timely. Furthermore, any discretionary limits on access to and publication of the contents of the court record must be understood in reference to the test for discretionary limits on court openness: a court can order discretionary limits on openness only where (1) openness poses a serious risk to an important public interest, (2) the order sought is necessary to prevent that risk and (3) the benefits of the order outweigh its negative effects.

Per Abella J. (dissenting): The appeals should be dismissed. The CBC is not entitled to reconsideration of the publication ban as a result of its undue and unjustified delay.

The media is a crucial voice in protecting and promoting the openness of courts, and their right to challenge publication bans is undisputed. But once the underlying proceedings are over, the doctrine of functus officio means as a general rule that a final decision cannot be reconsidered by the court that rendered the decision. Although the application of functus officio is less formalistic and more flexible in respect of ancillary orders and publication bans, and circumscribed avenues must be maintained through which the media can ask a court to reconsider a publication ban after the underlying proceedings are over, the rationales underlying this doctrine show that it has a role to play in respect of publication ban orders.

Finality matters. The parties are entitled to move on with their lives and to be protected from the psychological and financial costs of being dragged back into the justice system when a case is over. A reconsideration of a publication ban must therefore be sought in a timely manner, and a publication ban should not generally be reconsidered after the main proceedings have ended unless there is a sound basis for believing the media's application is in the public interest and could reasonably lead to a different result. It is a balancing exercise, not a hierarchical grid, between the interests of finality and the interests in support of the open court principle.

Courts issuing publication bans are expected to consider the importance of the open court principle, even in the absence of a media representative making submissions, and there is no reason to assume that did not happen in this case.

In the present case, the CBC is unable to establish a material change in circumstances. The only bases under which it could move for reconsideration of the publication ban are by showing that the ban was issued without notice, that its submissions could make a material difference to the outcome, and that it moved for reconsideration in a timely manner. None of these conditions has been met.

First, the publication ban was not issued without notice. If the media is present in the courtroom when a publication ban is issued, as was the CBC, it follows that it knows of its existence. Second, the CBC has not discharged its burden of showing that its proposed submissions could make a material, or even any difference in the outcome.

Third, and more significantly, the CBC's failure to act in a timely manner is determinative. An unexplained six-month delay for filing a motion to have a publication ban reconsidered is inordinately long. Under no definition of "due dispatch" can this delay be justified, particularly since the CBC was fully aware of the ban from the outset of the proceedings. The delay in this case causes acute harm to the parties, who reasonably expected that their privacy and dignity interests were protected by the finality of the proceedings.

reconsideration, and from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment, which made the indefinite publication ban at issue in this case.

[27] In these two appeals, the CBC seeks three orders from this Court. First, the CBC asks for an order setting aside the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment. It argues the Court of Appeal erred in concluding it had no jurisdiction to hear its motion and should have addressed the issues of whether to reconsider the publication ban and of whether the public and the press have the right to access the Posner affidavit. Notably, the CBC argues that neither the rule against rehearings in the Court of Appeal Rules nor the doctrine of functus officio deprived the Court of Appeal of jurisdiction to consider the motion based in constitutional principles of court openness. It says that the publication ban could be reconsidered on the basis of a change in circumstances or because, as an affected party, it did not have notice of the making of this order.

[28] The CBC also asks this Court for a second order setting aside the continuing publication ban in the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment and a third giving it access to the Posner affidavit as part of the court record. It argues the open court principle applies to material that is tendered as new evidence even if, at the end of the day, it is not admitted. In this instance, it says the publication ban fails the test for discretionary limits on this principle set forth in Dagenais v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp., 1994 CanLII 39 (SCC), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 835, and R. v. Mentuck, 2001 SCC 76, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 442. It contends further that the public is legally entitled to access the Posner affidavit because the applicable rules do not provide for continued sealing of this material. Mr. Ostrowski adopts the CBC's position and adds that the orders of the Court of Appeal preclude the proper accountability of public officials whose actions he alleges contributed to his wrongful conviction.

[29] The Crown takes the position that the Court of Appeal was right to conclude that it had no jurisdiction to consider the CBC's motion. The Crown says, however, that if the Court of Appeal had authority to consider these issues, this Court does not have jurisdiction with respect to the publication ban and, if it does, it should decline to exercise its authority. Should this Court proceed to consider the merits, the Crown's position is that the Court of Appeal's decision to impose a continuing publication ban was correct, even if it might have given more fulsome reasons. The material in the Posner affidavit is deeply personal and speaks to intimate details about M.D. that would re-traumatize the family, such that a discretionary limit on court openness was justified here. Similarly, the interested parties argue that the limits on court openness are necessary to protect the privacy of M.D.'s family and that the limit is justified given the inadmissible, irrelevant and unreliable nature of the proposed new evidence.

[30] The parties raise a broad series of questions before this Court bearing on jurisdiction over and the appropriateness of a publication ban or sealing order in the circumstances. It is sufficient to answer the following questions to dispose of this matter:

1. Did the Court of Appeal err in concluding it had no jurisdiction to consider the CBC's motion to reconsider the publication ban and gain access to the Posner affidavit?

2. Should the matter be remanded to the Court of Appeal to hear the merits of that motion?

[31] For the reasons that follow I am respectfully of the view, in the first appeal from the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment, that the Court of Appeal did err on the issue of jurisdiction and that as a result the matter should be remanded to that court. This ends the analysis. The second appeal from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment would best not proceed until the Court of Appeal decides the CBC's motion.

IV. Analysis

A. Jurisdiction to Make, Vary and Set Aside Orders Concerning Court Openness

(1) Supervisory Jurisdiction Over the Court Record Survives Entering a Judgment on the Merits

[32] In concluding that it lacked jurisdiction to vary or set aside the relevant orders concerning court openness, the Court of Appeal relied, in part, on the doctrine of functus officio. The term functus officio — often rendered as "having performed his or her office" — has traditionally been understood to mean that once a judge decided a matter, they had discharged their office and did not have the ability to return to and correct their decision (A. S. P. Wong, "Doctrine of Functus Officio: The Changing Face of Finality's Old Guard" (2020), 98 Can. Bar Rev. 543, at pp. 546-47; see A. Mayrand, Dictionnaire de maximes et locutions latines utilisées en droit (4th ed. 2007), at p. 193, who also uses the term functa officio).

[33] In its contemporary guise, functus officio indicates that a final decision of a court that is susceptible of appeal cannot, as a general rule, be reconsidered by the court that rendered that decision (see Chandler v. Alberta Association of Architects, 1989 CanLII 41 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 848, at p. 860; Reekie v. Messervey, 1990 CanLII 158 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 219, at pp. 222-23; Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3, at paras. 77-79). A court loses jurisdiction, and is thus said to be functus officio, once the formal judgment has been entered (R. v. Adams, 1995 CanLII 56 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 707, at para. 29; R. v. Smithen-Davis, 2020 ONCA 759, 68 C.R. (7th) 75, at paras. 33-34). After this point, the court is understood only to have the power to amend the judgment in very limited circumstances, such as where there is a statutory basis to do so, where necessary to correct an error in expressing its manifest intention, or where the matter has not been heard on its merits (Chandler, at p. 861, citing Paper Machinery Ltd. v. J.O. Ross Engineering Corp., 1934 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1934] S.C.R. 186; R. v. H. (E.) (1997), 1997 CanLII 418 (ON CA), 33 O.R. (3d) 202 (C.A.), at pp. 214-15, citing The Queen v. Jacobs, 1970 CanLII 143 (SCC), [1971] S.C.R. 92; see also R. v. Burke, 2002 SCC 55, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 857, at para. 54).

[34] This rule serves goals of finality and, by stabilizing judgments subject to review, of an orderly appellate procedure (Chandler, at p. 861; H. (E.), at p. 214). As Doherty J.A. wrote in Tsaoussis (Litigation Guardian of) v. Baetz (1998), 1998 CanLII 5454 (ON CA), 41 O.R. (3d) 257 (C.A.), for the parties to litigation, finality meets both an economic and psychological need as well as serving as a practical necessity for the system of justice as a whole (pp. 264-65). DECISION ON APPEAL

Justice M.G. Emery

[1] This is an appeal of the order made by Master Wiebe on February 1, 2016, dismissing the motion of the Minister of Finance to strike a jury notice served by the plaintiff. The Minister brought that motion on the basis that the jury notice was served after the close of pleadings, without leave, and therefore outside the time permitted under Rule 47.01.

[2] For the reasons that follow, the appeal is allowed and the order of Master Wiebe is set aside.

Background

[3] The plaintiff Michael Leadbetter was injured as a pedestrian in a parking lot when he was struck by a motor vehicle on the night of March 15, 2011. No one has been able to identify the driver of that motor vehicle.

[4] Shortly after the accident, the police recovered the motor vehicle that had struck Mr. Leadbetter. The driver had abandoned that motor vehicle where it had found. The registered owner of the motor vehicle was determined to be the defendant, Abdirissaq Nor.

[5] Mr. Nor denied that he was involved in the accident, or in the brawl in which both he and Mr. Leadbetter had been involved that evening prior to the accident. Mr. Nor was charged with dangerous driving causing bodily harm and with failure to remain at the scene of an accident. He did not appear to face these charges in court, and was convicted in absentia on March 6, 2013.

[6] Mr. Leadbetter named Mr. Nor as the sole defendant in the Statement of Claim issued on January 18, 2013 to commence the action. In that Statement of Claim, Mr. Leadbetter claimed $1,000,000 in damages. Mr. Leadbetter alleges in the Statement of Claim that “at all times [Nor] was the owner and operator of” the motor vehicle that had struck him.

[7] Mr. Nor did not defend the action. In due course, Mr. Leadbetter's lawyer served the Minister of Finance with a Notice of Default under the Motor Vehicles Accident Claims Act, (the "MVAC Act").

[8] The Minister investigated the allegations of material fact made in the Statement of Claim and attempted to locate Mr. Nor. The Minister ultimately concluded that Mr. Nor had left Canada, and could not be found. The Minister notified Mr. Leadbetter of this conclusion on June 24, 2014 and delivered a Statement of Defence on behalf of Mr. Nor on August 29, 2014. In the Statement of Defence, the Minister denies that Mr. Nor was the driver and operator of the motor vehicle that had struck Mr. Leadbetter on the evening in question.

[9] On September 18, 2014, the pleadings were considered closed pursuant to the Rules of Civil Procedure.

[10] Mr. Leadbetter was examined for discovery on January 28, 2015.

[11] On April 6, 2015, the lawyer at Sokoloff Lawyers having carriage of Mr. Leadbetter's file left the firm and was replaced by Savannah Chorney, another lawyer at the firm.

[12] On April 27, 2015, the parties engaged in mediation. That mediation was not successful.

[13] On April 29, 2015, Ms. Chorney served a jury notice on the Minister. Counsel for the Minister responded in writing on May 1, 2015 to object to the service of the jury notice as it had been served after the close of pleadings, and no leave had been obtained from the court. According to the Minister's motion materials, Ms. Chorney did not respond to this letter, and instead served and filed a trial record containing the jury notice on May 14, 2015.

The Decision Below

[14] The Master correctly identified the requirement for leave if one party intends to serve a jury notice on another party in a civil action after the close of pleadings. In paragraph 11 of his Reasons for Decision, he stated that:

> [11] It is well settled law that a party who does not serve a jury notice in accordance with Rule 47.01 of the Rules, must seek leave of the court to do so; see Proper v. Nikore 2010 ONSC 2307 (CanLII), 2010 ONSC 2307 (Div. Ct.) at paragraph 9. Mr. Moras pointed out that there was no rule that required such leave. That may be so, but Rule 47.01 implicitly requires such leave and, in any event, the Proper decision makes the obligation explicit.

[15] The Minister's motion to the Master was brought under Rule 47 of the Rules of Civil Procedure. That rule sets out the time one party is permitted to serve a jury notice as of right on another party, and various requirements for a motion any party may bring to strike a jury notice. Rule 47 reads in totality as follows:

> ACTIONS TO BE TRIED WITH A JURY
> 47.01 A party to an action may require that the issues of fact be tried or the damages be assessed, or both, by a jury, by delivering a jury notice (Form 47A) at any time before the close of pleadings, unless section 108 of the Courts of Justice Act or another statute requires that the action be tried without a jury. R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, r. 47.01
>
> STRIKING OUT JURY NOTICE
> Where Jury Notice not in Accordance with Statute or Rules
> 47.02 (1) A motion may be made to the court to strike out a jury notice on the ground that,
> (a) a statute requires a trial without a jury; or > (b) the jury notice was not delivered in accordance with rule 47.01. R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, r. 47.02 (1).
> Where Jury Trial Inappropriate
> (2) A motion to strike out a jury notice on the ground that the action ought to be tried without a jury shall be made to a judge. R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, r. 47.02 (2).
>
> Discretion of Trial Judge
> (3) Where an order striking out a jury notice is refused, the refusal does not affect the discretion of the trial judge, in a proper case, to try the action without a jury. R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, r. 47.02 (3).

[16] The Master determined that the plaintiff had not brought a motion for leave, or a motion for an order extending time to serve and file a jury notice outside the time prescribed by Rule 47.01. The Master found the explanation for the decision given by counsel not to bring a motion for leave to be inadequate, having regard to the gravity of the matter. He professed an attraction to the argument of counsel for the Minister that the conduct of the plaintiff made a travesty out of Rule 47.01. The Master made the observation that the plaintiff could have brought a motion for leave and instead chose to serve and file a trial record containing the jury notice and in doing so, represented to the court that the trial record was proper.

[17] Master Wiebe then stated as follows:

> [13] Reluctantly, however, I have decided not to strike the jury notice for this reason. Pursuant to Rule 2.01, non-compliance with the Rules does not render a proceeding or a step a nullity. The same rule obligates the court to grant > amendments or relief to secure a just determination of the real matters in dispute, and to set aside a proceeding or a step only where the "interest of just" require that it do so. I must, therefore, go on to the other aspects of the analysis to determine whether it is in the "interest of justice" to strike the jury notice.

> [14] Furthermore, Rule 1.04(1) requires the court to construe the rules in such a way as to secure the most expeditious and least expensive determination of a proceeding. Striking the jury notice due to the absence of a leave motion would only invite another proceeding, namely a leave motion, when the issues can be resolved here.
>
> [15] I will, though, take the plaintiff's conduct into account in awarding costs.

[18] The Master embarked on an analysis to determine the issues as he found them in the following way:

1. Was there unconscionable delay in serving the jury notice? The Master concluded that he was not satisfied there had been unconscionable delay per se.

2. Was the delay in service due to inadvertence? The Master concluded that there was no evidence of inadvertence on the part of the plaintiff. He reached that conclusion because Ms. Chorney had stated in her affidavit that Mr. Leadbetter had told her that the prospect of a jury notice had not been discussed with him by her predecessor on the file, and that she "assumed that this was inadvertence on his part". The Master found that this was nothing but speculation as there was no evidence from the previous lawyer himself.

3. Is there prejudice to the Minister due to the late service? The Master considered prejudice to be the more critical issue. After a review of the evidence and upon considering the decision of Master Brott in Crummey v. Andrade, 2003 CarswellOnt. 4144 (Ont. Master), he concluded that the Minister will not be prejudiced by the late service of the jury notice in the action.

4. Is this a case that cannot or should not be tried by a jury? On this issue, the Master examined what he considered to be the "pith and substance" of the action. Counsel for the Minister had argued that the "pith and substance" was essentially a claim against the Superintendent of Financial Services under Sections 12 and 15 of the MVAC Act. Those sections apply to situations where the identities of the owner or driver of a motor vehicle involved in an accident "cannot be established". In those situations, the plaintiff may sue the Superintendent of Financial Services if the plaintiff seeks to recover > from the motor vehicle fund for the liability of the unidentified driver or owner. The Master explained that these provisions are there to provide relief to a plaintiff who is injured by an uninsured vehicle, and where the plaintiff has no applicable insurance or coverage under an available policy for protection when injured by an unidentified owner or driver of a motor vehicle. The significance of this provision for the purpose of the motion is found in Section 14 of the MVAC Act that provides that "the action shall be tried by a judge without a jury." The Master gave no merit to this argument, finding that the action does not involve the Superintendent.

[19] The learned Master therefore determined, after reaching his conclusions about delay and prejudice, and upon finding that the Superintendent was not a party to give effect to Section 14 of the MVAC Act, that there was no impediment to the trial of this action by a jury. After reaching this conclusion, the Master dismissed the Minister's motion.

[20] The parties agree that the question of whether the Master erred when he dismissed the Minister's motion to strike the jury notice is a question of law. Accordingly, the parties agree that the standard of appellate review on this appeal is one of correctness. This agreement is consistent with the law summarized by the Court of Appeal in Wellwood v. Ontario Provincial Police, 2010 ONCA 386, at paragraph 28:

> [28] Based on this court's recent decision in Zeitoun v. Economical Insurance Group (2009), 96 O.R. (3d) 639, [2009] O.J. No. 2003, 2009 ONCA 415 (CanLII), it is now settled law in Ontario that [page 563] an appeal from a master's decision is not a rehearing. Rather, on questions of fact and mixed fact and law, deference applies and the role of the reviewing court is limited. An appellate court cannot substitute its interpretation of the facts or reweigh the evidence simply because it takes a different view of the evidence from that of the master. On questions of law, the correctness standard applies: see Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33 (CanLII), [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235,[2002] S.C.J. No. 31; L. (H.) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 25 (CanLII), [2005] 1 S.C.R. 401, [2005] S.C.J. No. 24. (2) Divisional Court judge's application of standard of review

[21] There is no dispute that the plaintiff had not served a jury notice by the time pleadings were considered closed on September 18, 2014. Nor does counsel for the plaintiff contest the Minister's evidence that the plaintiff has never obtained leave to deliver the jury notice in this case. The Divisional Court in Nikore v. Proper recognized that a jury notice may be served and filed after the time for doing so under Rule 47.01, but only with leave.

[22] The Minister's motion was not a leave motion. It was a motion to strike a jury notice under Rule 47.02. My reading of Rule 47.02 provides the court with the power to strike out a jury notice for one of three reasons:

a.) Where a statute requires a trial without a jury: Rule 47.02 (1) (a); b.) Where the jury notice was not delivered in accordance with Rule 47.01: rule 47.02 (1) (b); or c.) Under Rule 47.02(2), on the grounds that the action ought to be tried without a jury.

[23] In this case, the Master was hearing a motion brought on behalf of a defendant to strike a jury notice because the plaintiff had served and filed a jury notice that had not been served within the time prescribed by Rule 47.01. The Master appears to have converted that motion into a motion resembling a motion for leave.

[24] The Master notes in his reasons that Rule 1.04 requires the court to construe the rules in such a way as to secure the most expeditious and least expensive determination of a proceeding. He went on to conclude that striking the jury notice due to the absence of a leave motion would only invite another proceeding in the form of a motion for leave, when he could resolve the issue then and there.

[25] With great respect, I disagree. Without a motion for leave before him, the Minister had no motion framing the issues to which evidence could be given or submissions made. More to the point, the Master did not appear to consider the all-important qualifier at the end of Rule 1. 04(1): to secure the just, most expedient and least expensive determination of a civil proceeding on its merits. The application of this general principle to interpret Rule 47.01 required a proper consideration whether a motion was required under the circumstances.

[26] The Master likely believed he was interpreting the powers available for the court to exercise under Rule 2.01 to treat the plaintiff's non-compliance as an irregularity, and to make a corrective order in a manner consistent with Rule 1.04. Rule 2.01 provides the court with the following powers where a failure to comply with the rules amounts to an irregularity:

> 2.01 (1) A failure to comply with these rules is an irregularity and does not render a proceeding or a step, document or order in a proceeding a nullity, and the court,
>
> (a) may grant all necessary amendments or other relief, on such terms as are just, to secure the just determination of the real matters in dispute; or
> (b) only where and as necessary in the interest of justice, may set aside the proceeding or a step, document or order in the proceeding in whole or in part. R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, r. 2.01 (1).

[27] The appellant argues that the Master exceeded his authority under the Rules of Civil Procedure to grant leave on this basis, and that he erred by exercising his discretion under Rule 2.01 in the absence of a motion brought by the plaintiff for leave. The respondent takes the view that the Master exercised his discretion given by Rule 2.01 properly on the evidence before him, and that he is entitled to deference.

[28] The powers under Rule 2.01 permit the court to grant all necessary amendments or other relief as are just, or to set aside the proceeding or a step, document or order only where and as necessary in the interests of justice. Those are not the powers that the Master exercised when he in essence granted leave. Instead, the Master exercised a discretionary power granted by Rule 2.03 to relieve compliance entirely. Justice Cronk describes the purpose and effect of Rule 2.03 in Wellwood as follows:

> [33] Rule 2.03 is clear and unambiguous. To repeat, it states: "The court may, only where and as necessary in the interest of justice, dispense with compliance with any rule at any time" (emphasis added).
> [34] This rule provides the court with a general discretion to relieve against the time requirements of any of the Rules, at any stage of a proceeding, if one essential precondition is satisfied: the court must first conclude that such relief is necessary in the interest of justice. Nothing in the language of rule 37.14(1) exempts it from what the Divisional Court judge aptly described [at para. 49] as "the overarching discretion afforded to the court by rule 2.03".

[29] Rule 2.01 is curative in nature, designed to repair the irregularity created by the failure of one or more parties to comply with the rules. Rule 2.03 gives power to the court to forgive noncompliance by relieving a party from strict compliance with a rule in appropriate situations after first concluding that granting such relief would be necessary in the interest of justice. The power under either

Rule 2.01 or 2.03 permits the party to seek forgiveness from the court after the fact.

[30] Leave, on the other hand, is a judicial act; it is the granting of permission to take a step or course of conduct that could not be taken under the rules but for obtaining leave. Despite the best of intentions, the Master exercised a power not available under those subrules to grant judicial permission for the plaintiff to deliver a jury notice where no jury notice had been delivered before.

[31] The Master did not set aside any step, document or order under Rule 2.01 upon finding it necessary in the interests of justice to make his order. He did not dispense with compliance under Rule 2.03 upon making his finding that it was necessary in the interest of justice to make an order under Rule 2.03. The order he made was not within the powers given to him under either Rule 2.01 or Rule 2.03 to make.

[32] Factors a court may consider on a motion for leave include whether there has been unconscionable delay in seeking leave, solicitor inadvertence, prejudice to the other party and whether the action in which leave is sought is the type of case to be heard by a jury: see Jackson v. Hautala (1983), 1983 CanLII 1974 (ON SC), 42 O.R.(2d) 153 and Jane Doe v. Bragg, 2005 CarswellOnt 4403. Justice Molloy, when speaking for the Divisional Court in Nikore v. Proper, identified the two key factors to be taken account when deciding whether to permit the service of a jury notice after the closing pleadings to be (1) the circumstances of the delay, and (2) whether there is prejudice to the other side. The Master considered these factors under the auspices of deciding whether it would be in the interests of justice to grant relief under rule 2.01. With respect, the Master did not have the appropriate motion before him to consider those factors or the power to make the order under appeal.

[33] It is my view that the Master should have considered that as the jury notice had not been delivered before the close of pleadings under Rule 47.01, no jury notice had been delivered at all. It was therefore incumbent upon the plaintiff to either bring a motion for leave under Nikore v. Proper, or a motion to extend time to serve and file a jury notice. The plaintiff in this action has done neither. Without a motion, the Master erred at law when he made the order.

[34] The appeal is therefore allowed and the order of Master Wiebe dismissing the Minister's motion to strike the jury notice is hereby set aside.

[35] If the Minister seeks costs, written submissions may be submitted by September 2, 2016. The plaintiff shall then have until September 16, 2016 to file written submissions to respond. All written submissions shall consist of no more than two type-written pages, not including a costs outline, bill of costs or dockets. All written submissions may be made by fax to my judicial assistant, Mr. Christopher Charles, at 905-456-4834 in Brampton.

Case Summary

Civil procedure — Costs — Offer to settle — "No near miss" policy applying to mandatory timing requirement under rule 49.03 of Rules of Civil Procedure — Trial judge erring in treating offer to settle which was served within seven days of commencement of trial as valid Rule 49 offer — Trial judge nevertheless entitled to take offer into account pursuant to rule 49.13 — Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, rules 49.03, 49.13.

The ultimately unsuccessful defendants in an oppression action served an offer to settle nine calendar days before the trial. Having regard to the way in which rule 3.01 of the Rules of Civil Procedure mandates the calculation of time, the offer was technically served fewer than seven days before trial. Despite that fact, the trial judge treated the offer as a valid Rule 49 offer which attracted the costs consequences of rule 49.10. He awarded the plaintiff his costs on a substantial indemnity scale up to the date of the offer and the defendants their costs on a partial indemnity scale afterwards. The plaintiff appealed.

Held, the appeal should be dismissed.

The "no near miss" policy applies to the timing requirement under s. 49.03 of the Rules as well as to the amount of the judgment. The trial judge erred in treating the offer as a valid Rule 49 offer. However, the trial judge was entitled to take the offer into account pursuant to rule 49.13 despite the fact that it did not attract rule 49.10 consequences. While the trial judge did not specifically refer to rule 49.13, he employed a holistic approach and took all the applicable relevant factors, including the offer, into account. The award fell squarely within the trial judge's discretionary authority to fashion a costs award that was appropriate and proportionate in all the circumstances. [page58]

The judgment of the court was delivered by
G.J. EPSTEIN J.A.: —

A. Overview

[1] At the core of this appeal is a judge's discretion to award costs under rule 49.13 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194. However, this decision also clarifies that an offer to settle must strictly comply with the seven-day timing requirement set out in rule. 49.03 before the mandatory cost consequences of rule 49.10 apply.

[2] The appellant was successful in an oppression action against the respondents: König v. Hobza, [2013] O.J. No. 2121, 2013 ONSC 1060, 31 B.L.R. (5th) 248 (S.C.J.).

[3] The trial judge awarded the appellant his costs on a substantial indemnity basis. He considered an offer by the [page59]respondents served four days before the commencement of trial to be a valid Rule 49 offer (the "offer"), but held that rule 49.10 was not engaged because the trial judgment was more favourable than the offer: König v. Hobza, [2013] O.J. No. 5279, 2013 ONSC 5531, 31 B.L.R. (5th) 301 (S.C.J.), at paras. 21-23.

[4] The respondents appealed. This court upheld the finding of oppression but reduced the damages award and remitted the matter back to the trial judge to consider the costs award in the light of the reduction in damages: König v. Hobza, [2014] O.J. No. 4791, 2014 ONCA 691, 326 O.A.C. 213.

[5] In reconsidering costs, the trial judge found that the offer was more favourable than the revised judgment. Against that background, he awarded the appellant his costs up to the date of the offer on a substantial indemnity scale, and the respondents their costs thereafter, on a partial indemnity scale.

[6] The appellant sought leave to appeal this second discretionary costs award pursuant to s. 133(b) of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43. This court granted leave by order dated April 21, 2015.

[7] The appellant's main submission on appeal is that the trial judge erred in treating the offer as a valid Rule 49 offer given that it did not meet the rule 49.03 seven-day timing requirement. He requests that the previous costs decision be reinstated.

[8] For the following reasons, I would dismiss the appeal.

B. Applicable Rules

[9] The relevant portions of Rule 49 of the Rules are as follows:

> 49.03 An offer to settle may be made at any time, but where the offer to settle is made less than seven days before the hearing commences, the costs consequences referred to in rule 49.10 do not apply.
>
> . . . . .
>
> 49.10(2) Where an offer to settle,
>
> (a) is made by a defendant at least seven days before the commencement of the hearing;
>
> (b) is not withdrawn and does not expire before the commencement of the hearing; and
>
> (c) is not accepted by the plaintiff,
> and the plaintiff obtains a judgment as favourable as or less favourable than the terms of the offer to settle, the plaintiff is entitled to partial indemnity costs to the date the offer was served and the defendant is entitled to partial indemnity costs from that date, unless the court orders otherwise.
> 49.10(3) The burden of proving that the judgment is as favourable as the terms of the offer to settle, or more or less favourable, as the case may be, is on the party who claims the benefit of subrule (1) or (2). [page60]
> . . . . .

49.13 Despite rules 49.03, 49.10 and 49.11, the court, in exercising its discretion with respect to costs, may take into account any offer to settle made in writing, the date the offer was made and the terms of the offer.

C. Background Facts

[10] The appellant was a silent investor in the respondent company 1669051 Nova Scotia Limited, formerly East West Plastics & Electric Products Limited. He was the only shareholder not involved in its management.

[11] He brought an action against the respondents, as officers and directors of East West, alleging that they had awarded themselves excessive compensation over a period of 22 years -- conduct that the appellant maintained called for a damages award under the oppression remedy.

D. Procedural History

(a) The trial judge's decision

[12] The trial judge found that the respondents' oppressive conduct justified a damages award in the amount of $250,000, plus prejudgment interest of $49,793.83.

(b) The first costs decision

[13] The trial judge concluded, at para. 38, that the respondents' actions justified awarding substantial indemnity costs in the amount of $413,000, inclusive of disbursements and taxes.

[14] Before trial, the parties had exchanged several offers and counter-offers. Nine calendar days before trial, the respondents served the offer. It provided for a payment to the appellant of $300,000, inclusive of interest, plus partial indemnity costs and disbursements to be agreed upon or assessed. The appellant rejected the offer.

[15] The parties disputed whether the offer was a valid Rule 49 offer given that it was not served within seven days prior to the commencement of trial having regard to the way in which rule 3.01 mandates how time is calculated.

[16] In addressing this issue, the trial judge reasoned that the purpose of the seven-day requirement under rule 49.03 was to ensure that the party receiving the offer had sufficient time to properly consider it. The trial judge held that the appellant had enough time to do this in the light of the earlier offers and the nine calendar days between service of the offer and the commencement of trial. The trial judge therefore held that the offer was a valid Rule 49 offer. [page61]

[17] However, the mandatory cost consequences of rule 49.10 were not engaged because, after factoring in the substantial indemnity costs, to which the appellant was entitled, the judgment was more favourable than the offer.

(c) The Court of Appeal's decision

[18] On appeal, this court upheld the trial judge's finding of oppression but held that the trial judge erred in not considering the respondents' under-compensation during East West's early years. This court therefore reduced the damages to $187,453.51, plus prejudgment interest of $37,336.12.

[19] This court found no reason to interfere with the trial judge's finding that the respondents' conduct called for a costs award on a substantial indemnity basis but sent the matter back to the trial judge to reconsider the quantum of costs and the consequences of rule 49.10, in the light of the reduced damages award.

(d) The second costs decision

[20] In revisiting the issue of costs, the appellant argued that the trial judge erred in treating the offer as a valid Rule 49 offer as it did not comply with the rule 49.03 seven-day service requirement. He relied on Elbakhiet v. Palmer (2014), 121 O.R. (3d) 616, [2014] O.J. No. 3302, 2014 ONCA 544, leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused [2014] S.C.C.A. No. 427, a decision of this court released after the first costs decision.

[21] In Elbakhiet, Rosenberg J.A. considered whether the offer at issue in that case was more favourable than the judgment. At para. 31, he articulated what is known as the no "near miss" policy: "A party that comes close to meeting the judgment is not thereby entitled to an award of costs as if they did provide a successful offer."

[22] The trial judge rejected the appellant's argument that the no "near miss" policy established in Elbakhiet should be found to apply not only to quantum but also to timing. At para. 8, he concluded that the policy concerned only the former.

[23] He went on to find that because, under the revised judgment, the appellant was entitled to an award of damages and interest that was $9,235.32 less than the offer, the cost consequences of rule 49.10 applied.

[24] Having regard to his finding that the respondents' conduct justified substantial indemnity costs, the trial judge relied on the overriding discretion afforded in rule 49.10 to award substantial indemnity costs to the appellant to the date of the offer in the amount of $270,925.15. He concluded that the [page62]respondents were entitled to partial indemnity costs thereafter, in the amount of $127,616.56, both amounts inclusive of disbursements and taxes.

[25] The appellant appeals this order.

Issues

[26] The issues raised are the following:

(1) whether the trial judge was permitted to give effect to an offer to settle under rule 49.10 even if it was served fewer than seven days before trial; and

(2) if not, whether the trial judge was nonetheless entitled to exercise his discretion to fix costs the way he did in this case.

Analysis

1. Was the trial judge permitted to give effect to an offer to settle under rule 49.10 even if it was served fewer than seven days before trial?

[27] The respondents' position is that the trial judge was within his discretion to decide that the offer was a valid rule 49.10 settlement offer. Effectively, interpreting the rule in a purposive fashion was in keeping with this court's decisions in Igbokwe v. HB Group Insurance Management Ltd. (2001), 2001 CanLII 3804 (ON CA), 55 O.R. (3d) 313, [2001] O.J. No. 3018 (C.A.), leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused [2001] S.C.C.A. No. 470, 166 O.A.C. 200 and Matthew Brady Self Storage Corp. v. InStorage Limited Partnership (2014), 125 O.R. (3d) 121, [2014] O.J. No. 5783, 2014 ONCA 858, cases in which this court held that technical deficiencies should not invalidate settlement offers.

[28] For the following reasons, I do not agree.

[29] First, the requirement that, in order to attract the mandatory cost consequences of rule 49.10, an offer to settle must be served at least seven days before the commencement of the hearing, is contained within Rule 49 itself. The wording of the provision makes clear that the timing requirement is just that -- a requirement. It is mandatory.

[30] Second, although Rosenberg J.A.'s comment about there being no "near misses" in Elbakhiet referred to quantum, in my view, the decision supports the conclusion that the no "near miss" policy should also apply to timing. His detailed examination of the timing requirement under rule 49.03, including a review of a number of appellate decisions, indicates that he viewed the two requirements for a valid Rule 49 offer as being equally important. [page63]

[31] Rosenberg J.A. noted, at para. 20, that the "consensus [that a trial commences on the first day of evidence] has provided certainty to parties making Rule 49 offers, and such certainty furthers the purposes of Rule 49". It goes without saying that certainty as to whether an offer meets the seven-day timing requirement also furthers the purposes of Rule 49 by affording parties two important pieces of information.

[32] The first is whether the time has passed during which to expect an offer to settle that will attract the mandatory cost consequences under rule 49.10. The second is whether an offer will be treated as a valid Rule 49 offer. Both are necessary for a party to be fully equipped to assess the risk of proceeding to trial.

[33] I conclude that the no "near miss" policy applies to meeting the timing requirement under rule 49.03 as well as to the amount of the judgment. It follows that, in my view, the trial judge erred in treating the offer as a valid Rule 49 offer.

2. If the offer was not a valid Rule 49 offer, was the trial judge nonetheless entitled to exercise his discretion to fix costs the way he did in this case?

[34] Given my conclusion that the offer was not a valid Rule 49 offer, on a plain reading of Rule 49, the mandatory cost implications found in rule 49.10 are not applicable. This takes me to the trial judge's residual discretion to make an appropriate costs determination under rule 49.13.

[35] Rule 49.13 calls for a holistic approach to the determination of costs having regard to factors including any offers to settle -- regardless of whether they meet the requirements of Rule 49 -- where appropriate to do justice between the parties. Rosenberg J.A. addressed the role of rule 49.13 in Elbakhiet, at para. 33:

> As this court pointed out in Lawson v. Viersen (2012), 108 O.R. (3d) 771, [2012] O.J. No. 109, 2012 ONCA 25, at para. 46, rule 49.13 is not concerned with technical compliance with the requirements of rule 49.10. Rather, it "calls on the judge to take a more holistic approach." The appellants complied with the spirit of Rule 49 even if they failed for technical reasons to provide an offer that exceeded the Judgment. As held in Lawson, at para. 49, this was the type of offer that ought to have been given "considerable weight in arriving at a costs award."

[36] This approach was endorsed by Gillese J.A. in Wilson v. Cranley, [2014] O.J. No. 5680, 2014 ONCA 844, 325 O.A.C. 396, at para. 26, where she said "even where an offer does not attract rule 49.10 consequences, pursuant to rule 49.13 the court should consider such offers when exercising its discretion with respect to costs". [page64]

[37] Here, although I have concluded that the trial judge should not have treated the offer as a valid rule 49.10 offer, he was entitled to take it into account pursuant to rule 49.13, and pursuant to rule 57.01(1), which sets out the general principles a court considers when exercising its discretion to award costs.

[38] I appreciate that the trial judge did not specifically refer to rule 49.13 in his reasons but I do not see this as a basis to interfere with his exercise of discretion in awarding costs. In Cranley, at para. 28, this court held that a trial judge can employ his or her discretion under rule 49.13 without explicitly referring to it.

[39] The question is whether the trial judge took the required holistic approach in awarding costs as he did in the second costs endorsement. In my view, he did.

[40] The only difference between the trial judge's first and second costs endorsements is this court's intervening judgment. The judgment reduced the damages award but did not alter the circumstances surrounding the offer. Significantly, as previously noted, this court expressly supported the trial judge's conclusion that the respondents' conduct called for costs on a substantial indemnity scale.

[41] In determining whether the trial judge employed a holistic approach to rule 49.13, it is therefore appropriate to consider the second costs endorsement in the light of its precursor.

[42] As previously mentioned, this court upheld the key factor considered by the trial judge, namely, the appropriateness of substantial indemnity costs. In his second costs endorsement, the trial judge considered this fact in addition to the fact that the offer was more favourable than the judgment received by the appellant. In his first costs endorsement, at para. 21, the trial judge found that the offer complied with the spirit of Rule 49 since "[the appellant] had more than enough time to properly consider the offer before the trial started".

[43] After considering the trial judge's approach to costs in both of his costs endorsements, I am satisfied that in arriving at the award he did, the trial judge took into account the applicable relevant factors, including the offer. He employed a holistic approach.

[44] Finally, I note that the Supreme Court of Canada has made it clear that a costs award should be set aside on appeal only if the trial judge erred in principle or if the award was plainly wrong: Hamilton v. Open Window Bakery Ltd., [2004] 1 S.C.R. 303, [2003] S.C.J. No. 72, 2004 SCC 9, at para. 27.

[45] Although, in the context of the history of this matter and the ultimate outcome, the trial judge's revised costs decision may appear unfair to the appellant, I find no error in principle. [page65]And I do not view the award as plainly wrong. The award fell squarely within the trial judge's discretionary authority to fashion a costs award that was appropriate and proportionate in all the circumstances. This was his call to make.

E. Disposition

[46] For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal. The respondents are entitled to their costs of the appeal, fixed at $6,500, inclusive of disbursements and applicable taxes.

Appeal dismissed.

The respondent made an application to the Nova Scotia Supreme Court, Trial Division for an order allowing it "to film the proceedings of the House of Assembly with its own cameras". The application was based on s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which guarantees freedom of expression, including freedom of the press. The media have regular access to the public gallery in the House where they may witness the proceedings and they also have access to Hansard, but the House of Assembly, in the exercise of its parliamentary privileges, has prohibited the use of television cameras in the House, except on special occasions. The respondent claimed that it was possible to film the proceedings from the public gallery with modern hand-held cameras which were both silent and required no special lighting or electrical equipment. In his evidence, the Speaker indicated that the respondent's proposal would interfere with the decorum and orderly proceedings of the House. Apart from controlling decorum, the House would have no control over the production and use of the film. The trial judge granted the respondent's claim and the Appeal Division confirmed its right of access, pursuant to s. 2(b) of the Charter, to televise the proceedings of the House from the gallery with its own unobtrusive cameras. The question as to whether any limits could be placed on this right of access was left open.

Since the judgment of the Appeal Division, the House of Assembly's proceedings have been televised through a system approved and controlled by the House. The cameras of the "electronic Hansard" record only the member recognized by the Speaker as having the floor. A direct feed of the "electronic Hansard" is available to the media who are able to broadcast the proceedings live or tape them.

The constitutional questions stated here queried (1) whether the Charter applies to the members of the House of Assembly when exercising their privileges as members; (2) if so, whether exercising a privilege so as to refuse access to the media to the public gallery to record and relay to the public proceedings of the House of Assembly by means of their cameras contravenes s. 2(b) of the Charter; and (3) if so, whether such refusal is justifiable under s. 1 of the Charter.

Held (Cory J. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed.

Per La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, McLachlin and Iacobucci JJ.: The Charter does not apply to the members of the Nova Scotia House of Assembly when they exercise their inherent privileges, since the inherent privileges of a legislative body such as the Nova Scotia House of Assembly enjoy constitutional status.

Per L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, McLachlin and Iacobucci JJ.: A textual and purposive approach to s. 32(1) of the Charter does not support the conclusion that a legislative assembly can never be subject to the Charter. By the terms of the Charter itself, the word "legislature" in s. 32(1) cannot conclusively be narrowly defined to cover only those actions for which the legislative body and the Queen's representative are jointly responsible. Further, the tradition of curial deference does not extend to everything a legislative assembly might do, but is firmly attached to certain specific activities -- the privileges -- of legislative assemblies. Without deciding that the legislative assembly is a government actor for all purposes, as a public body it might be capable of impinging on individual freedoms in areas not protected by privilege. The legislative assembly could, therefore, fall within the rationale for regarding such bodies as government actors subject to the Charter. Absent specific Charter language to the contrary, however, the long history of curial deference to the independence of the legislative body, and to the rights necessary to the functioning of that body, cannot be lightly set aside, even conceding that our notions of what is permitted to government actors have been significantly altered by the enactment and entrenchment of the Charter.

The Charter does not apply to the House of Assembly's action at issue in this appeal. The privilege of the legislative assembly to exclude strangers enjoys constitutional status as part of the Constitution of Canada, and hence cannot be abrogated by another part of the Constitution. The House of Assembly has the constitutional power to exclude strangers from its chamber by virtue of the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, which proclaims an intention to establish "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom". This preamble constitutionally guarantees the continuance of Parliamentary governance and, given Canadian federalism, this guarantee extends to the provincial legislatures in the same manner as to the federal Parliament. The Constitution of the United Kingdom recognized certain privileges in the British Parliament. Since the Canadian legislative bodies were modelled on the Parliamentary system of the United Kingdom, they possess similar, although not necessarily identical, powers. Given the clear and stated intention of the founders of our country that Canada retain the fundamental constitutional tenets upon which British parliamentary democracy rested, it seems indisputable that the inherent privileges of Canada's legislative bodies, historically recognized as necessary to their proper functioning, fall within the group of principles constitutionalized by virtue of the preamble. This is not a case of importing an unexpressed concept into our constitutional regime, but rather of recognizing a legal power fundamental to the constitutional regime which Canada has adopted. The definition of "Constitution of Canada" in s. 52(2) of the Constitution Act, 1982 is not clearly meant to be exhaustive and the interpretation of that section should not be restricted in such a way as to preclude giving effect to the intention behind the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, thereby denying recognition to the minimal, but long recognized and essential, inherent privileges of Canadian legislative bodies.

From an historical perspective, Canadian legislative bodies had, from their inception, those privileges which were necessary for the maintenance of order and discipline during the performance of their duties. These privileges are part of the fundamental law of our land, and hence are constitutional. While courts may determine if the privilege claimed is necessary to the capacity of the legislature to function, they have no power to review the rightness or wrongness of a particular decision made pursuant to the privilege.

Finally, from a practical point of view, a legislative body must possess such constitutional powers as are necessary for its proper functioning. An absolute right to exclude strangers from its chamber, when it deems them to be disruptive of its efficacious operation, is a valid category of privilege founded on necessity. This privilege is as necessary to modern Canadian democracy as it has been to democracies here and elsewhere in past centuries.

The Speaker of the House of Assembly ruled against the media's demands because he was of the view that they would interfere with the decorum and efficacious proceedings of the House. In doing so, he acted within the ambit of his constitutional power to control attendance in the House. It follows that this constitutional power cannot be abrogated by the Charter. At issue is a valid constitutional power. To subject this power to the Charter would be to negate this power. Were the issue here an action taken pursuant to a valid power, that action might be subject to Charter scrutiny.

La Forest J.'s reasons were also agreed with.

Per La Forest J.: The reasons of McLachlin J. were generally agreed with, subject to the following comments. When the British government granted a legislative assembly to a colony, the grant carried with it, as an adjunct, the powers (or parliamentary privileges) necessary for that body to carry out its functions, in particular the power to regulate its internal processes, but not the broader parliamentary privileges of the British Parliament. The legislative assembly, with its concomitant privileges, was part of the colony's constitution, and in the case of the pre-existing provinces, like Nova Scotia, was continued by the Constitution Act, 1867. Parliamentary legislative privileges in Nova Scotia are, therefore, ultimately anchored in the grant of a legislative assembly and incorporated into the Constitution Act, 1867. The new legislative bodies created by that Act and subsequent constitutional instruments are governed by the same principle. The preambular statement in the Constitution Act, 1867, that what was desired was "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom", among other things, gives expression to the nature of the legislative bodies that were continued or established by it. The privileges of these bodies are similar in principle, though not identical, to those of the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

Per Lamer C.J.: The Houses of Parliament and the provincial legislative assemblies, and their members, hold and exercise parliamentary privileges which are necessary to the discharge of their legislative function. These privileges are held as against the Crown and the judiciary. Courts can inquire into the existence and extent of privilege, but not its exercise. Since general categories of privilege are deemed necessary to the discharge of the Assembly's function, each specific instance of the exercise of a privilege need not be shown to be necessary. In the United Kingdom, privilege evolved from a history of conflict between the Houses of Parliament, the Crown and the courts. Given its historical development, the source of those privileges is constitutional in the most fundamental sense in that it has everything to do with the relationships between the different branches of government. In Canada, however, the colonial legislative assemblies were held to have certain inherent powers simply by virtue of their creation. The inherent powers of the Canadian assemblies are not as broad as those of the Houses of Parliament of the United Kingdom. Powers beyond the inherent privileges of the Canadian legislatures can be granted to them by statute.

While the Constitution of Canada is undoubtedly founded upon many of the same broad principles as is the Constitution of the United Kingdom, the wording of the preamble of the Constitution Act, 1867 -- "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom" -- cannot, without specific reference, be taken to transplant directly art. 9 of the English Bill of Rights of 1689 into our Constitution, and thereby incorporate the privileges of legislative bodies. History makes clear that the different paths of evolution of government in the two jurisdictions led to significant differences in the branches of government themselves from the very beginning. Canada has diverged further in recent years with the patriation of its Constitution in 1982. Similar in principle does not mean identical in the powers granted.

In light of the conclusion below concerning s. 32 of the Charter, it is unnecessary to determine whether the privileges of provincial legislative assemblies have a constitutional status which would make them immune to Charter review.

Section 32, as it relates to the application of s. 2(b) of the Charter, does not encompass the members of the House of Assembly when exercising their inherent privileges. The House of Assembly does not fall within the words "legislature" or "government" in s. 32 since the term "government" refers to the executive or administrative branch of government and the term "legislature" refers to the body capable of enacting legislation, and not to its component parts taken individually. The House of Assembly is a component of the legislature but only together with the Lieutenant Governor does it comprise the legislature. The language, structure and history of the constitutional text support that conclusion. Section 32 specifically refers to "all matters within the authority of the legislature". This is the language of legislation and is a clear reference to legislative authority. Section 33 of the Charter strengthens this interpretation. Further, the distinction between the federal or provincial legislatures and their component parts is observed with reasonable consistency in the Constitution Act, 1867 and in the language employed in the amending provisions set out in Part V of Schedule B of the Constitution Act, 1982. There are certain provisions in the Charter, notably ss. 5, 17 and 18, in relation to which the specific context requires a different meaning. While these sections show that usage is not completely consistent, they by no means take away from the general rule that "legislature" in s. 32 means the body that enacts legislation. The place and importance of legislative privileges in our political life and the long-standing practice of judicial non-interference resolve any residual ambiguity concerning the interpretation of s. 32 as it relates to the application to the House of the rights guaranteed under s. 2(b) of the Charter.

Privileges are clearly "matters within the authority of the legislatures of each province" in the sense that the provincial legislatures have the power to legislate in relation to privileges. The legislation that the provinces have enacted with respect to privileges will be reviewable under the Charter as is all other legislation. It does not follow, however, that the exercise by members of the House of Assembly of their inherent privileges (which are not dependent on statute for their existence) is subject to Charter review. Here, given the long-standing acceptance of the power to exclude strangers and to control the internal proceedings of the House as valid categories of privilege founded on necessity, in this country as well as in the United Kingdom, the ban by the members of the House of Assembly on the use of independent video cameras in the House fell within their inherent privileges.

Per Sopinka J.: The impugned rule or practice of the legislative assembly is not immune from Charter scrutiny. The privileges of the members of the legislative assembly are subject to legislation by the province as part of the constitution of the province. The exercise of those privileges, whether by legislation or by rules or practices of the legislative assembly, are matters "within the authority of the legislature" and therefore subject to s. 32 of the Charter. One implication of treating those privileges as part of the Constitution of Canada is that they would arguably not be subject to provincial legislation and any change would require an amendment pursuant to s. 43 or s. 38 of the Constitution Act, 1982. One would expect something more than a general reference to "a Constitution similar in Principle" in a preamble in order to have this effect.

With the system currently used to broadcast the proceedings of the House of Assembly, the media are not allowed to have their hand-held cameras in the public gallery. The effect on the publication of news is that they are prevented from obtaining the reaction of the members who are not speaking. The inability to gather news can occasion a restriction on freedom of the press if it interferes with disseminating the news, but this Court has not yet determined whether the protection of s. 2(b) of the Charter extends to the means by which the gathering and dissemination of news is done. In any event, assuming that the restriction complained of constitutes a violation of s. 2(b), it is justifiable under s. 1 of the Charter. The exercise of the historic privilege in issue in this appeal is a pressing and substantial objective. That objective is to maintain order and decorum and ensure the smooth functioning of the legislative assembly. The present restriction on the number and location of cameras is rationally connected with the objective. While some other method might have been equally effective, the procedure which has been adopted appears eminently sensible and the Court should not second guess the legislative assembly who studied the matter and adopted a method which ensures that in essence the proceedings of the Assembly are made available to the television viewing audience. Finally, given the importance of preserving the decorum of the House of Assembly, the alleged intrusion on the freedom of the press is not out of proportion to this objective.

Per Cory J. (dissenting): Given a broad and liberal interpretation, the words "legislature" and "government" in s. 32(1) of the Charter include the House of Assembly. The underlying purpose of s. 32(1) is to restrict the application of the Charter to public actors. The legislative assembly is an institution that is not only essential to the operation of democracy but is also an integral part of democratic government. It is a public actor. It follows that the Charter should apply to the actions of the House of Assembly, which include not only the legislation passed by the Assembly but also its own rules and regulations. The rules and regulations, if they are found to violate the Charter, can, like the Acts passed by the Assembly, be saved under s. 1. Such a procedure would ensure that the courts never unduly interfere with the inherent and enacted rights and privileges possessed by a legislature which enable it to effectively carry out its role.

The ban on television cameras is an exercise of privilege by the legislative assembly subject to the Charter scrutiny. While the legislatures of this country possess such constitutional privileges as are necessary for their operation, courts may, when properly called upon, enquire as to whether a particular exercise of parliamentary privilege falls within the privileged jurisdiction of the legislature. The exercise of the constitutional power of privilege is not entrenched in the Constitution of Canada and the Charter must apply to the exercise of that parliamentary privilege. Here, the privilege of the House of Assembly represents an exercise of legislative authority over itself and members of the media and is reviewable. The test for review is one of necessity. A complete prohibition on cameras is not essentially necessary to the operation of the House, nor would the presence of cameras automatically constitute an immediate obstruction. Such a rule falls outside the constitutional scope of parliamentary privilege. The House of Assembly, when it banned all cameras, exceeded the jurisdiction inherent in parliamentary privilege.

There is an infringement of s. 2(b) of the Charter when a legislative assembly denies any media, or one form of media, access to its public debates. The protection of news gathering does not constitute a preferential treatment of an elite or entrenched group -- the media -- but rather constitutes an ancillary right essential for the meaningful exercise of the Charter. Since the television media constitute an integral part of the press, a prohibition on television cameras is by definition a restriction on freedom of the press. So long as the camera is neither too pervasive nor too obtrusive, there can be no good reason for excluding it. The legislative assembly does have a right, in appropriate circumstances, to exclude or remove visitors including members of the press. It may also, with regard to the attendance of television media, limit the number of cameras and their location and regulate their manner of operation. What the Assembly cannot do is to exclude television entirely by means of regulation without infringing s. 2(b). A balance must be kept between efficient and dignified operation of the legislative assembly and the right of freedom of expression. The system currently used in the House of Assembly is eminently fair and suitable and would be justifiable under s. 1 of the Charter. The refusal to permit any television cameras, however, contravenes s. 2(b) of the Charter and cannot be justified under s. 1.

Barristers and solicitors -- Professional conduct -- Duty to court -- Solicitor instructed by client not to approve draft order -- Solicitor obliged to approve order in absence of legitimate objection -- Refusal to approve amounting to contravention of Rules of Law Society of Upper Canada -- Obligation not dispensed with by fact that solicitor no longer acting for client.

Judgments and orders -- Settlement of order -- Client instructing solicitor not to approve draft order -- Solicitor obliged to approve order where there are no proper grounds upon which to withhold approval -- Fact that solicitor no longer acting for client not relieving solicitor of obligation.

Where a client has given instructions to a solicitor not to approve a draft order and there are no proper grounds upon which to withhold such approval, the refusal of the solicitor to approve the order contravenes the Rules of the Law Society of Upper Canada. The fact that the solicitor has ceased to act for the client does not relieve the solicitor of his obligation to the court and other solicitors.

RULING concerning the approval of a draft order.

J.P. Willson, for plaintiff.

Helder M. Travassos, for defendants.

MASTER PEPPIATT:-- On July 29, 1991 a motion in this action seeking interim possession of a Mercedes-Benz motor vehicle pursuant to Rule 45 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, O. Reg. 560/84, came before me. Ms. Willson appeared for the plaintiff, moving party, and Mr. Charles Gastle appeared for the defendants. Also present was Mr. Paul Theodore, a personal defendant and the president of the corporate defendant.

When the motion was called for hearing Mr. Gastle requested an adjournment. He informed me that there had been a loss of confidence between his firm and the defendants and that a motion would shortly be brought for an order removing his firm as solicitors of record for the defendants. His clients did not wish him to argue the motion, but intended to retain new solicitors. This was confirmed by Mr. Theodore.

After hearing their submissions and the submissions of Ms. Willson, who opposed the granting of an adjournment, I made an order adjourning the motion for two weeks subject to certain terms, and I endorsed the record accordingly. I am now informed that an appeal from my order has been launched. The matter now before me does not relate to the merits of my order.

Ms. Willson prepared a draft of my order and sent it to Mr. Gastle for approval. He has refused to approve the order and accordingly, at Ms. Willson's request, I granted an appointment for Friday, August 2, 1991, to settle the order. At that time Ms. Willson and Mr. Travassos attended before me in my chambers.

Mr. Travassos informed me, as Mr. Gastle had previously informed Ms. Willson, that he had no fault to find with the order as drafted by her. The refusal to approve it was based upon two factors, first, that although they were still solicitors of record for the defendants they were not in fact acting for them and secondly, that they had received Mr. Theodore's specific instructions not to approve the order. I was not told why these instructions had been given but it was confirmed to me that Mr. Theodore had been informed of what was involved in the approval of an order and that he understood that such approval did not prejudice any rights of appeal or the right to contend in any appropriate forum that the order was wrong. Nevertheless, he issued emphatic instructions which the solicitors felt bound to follow.

This raises two issues, the first being what is involved in the approval of an order and secondly, the rights and obligations of solicitors in a situation such as this.

There appears to be no authority directly on point and there is no consensus of opinion among those whom I have consulted. It is in the hopes of providing some authority which may be approved or disapproved in due course that I am writing these reasons setting out my views.

In certain circumstances the answer to the questions set out above will have cost consequences for parties and for solicitors.

The settling and signing of orders is governed by Rule 59 and I set out the relevant parts of that rule:

59.01 An order is effective from the date on which it is made, unless it provides otherwise.

59.02(1) An endorsement of every order shall be made on the appeal book, record, notice of motion or notice of application by the court, judge or officer making it, unless the circumstances make it impractical to do so.

(2) Where written reasons are delivered,

(a) in an appellate court, an endorsement is not required;

(b) in any other court, the endorsement may consist of a reference to the reasons, and a copy of the reasons shall be filed in the court file.

59.03(1) Any party affected by an order may prepare a draft of the formal order and send it to all other parties represented at the hearing for approval of its form.

(2) Approval of the form of an order that merely dismisses a motion, proceeding or appeal, with or without costs, is not required.

(3) An order shall be in Form 59A (order), 59B (judgment) or 59C (order or certificate on appeal) and shall contain,

(a) the name of the judge or officer who made it;

(b) the date on which it was made; and

(c) a recital of the particulars necessary to understand the order, including the date of the hearing, the parties who were present or represented by counsel and those who were not, and any undertaking made by a party as a condition of the order. [am. O. Reg. 366/87, s. 12]

59.04(1) Every order shall be submitted in accordance with subrules (4) and (8) for the signature of, ...

. . . . .

(4) Where all the parties represented at the hearing have approved the form of the order, the party who prepared the draft order shall,

(a) file the approval of all the parties represented at the hearing, together with a copy of the order; and

(b) leave the order with the registrar for signing.

(5) Where approval of the form of an order is not required under subrule 59.03(2), the party who prepared the draft order shall leave it with the registrar for signing.

. . . . .

(6) Where the registrar is satisfied that the order is in proper form, he or she shall sign the order and return it to the party who left it to be signed.

(7) Where the registrar is not satisfied that the order is in proper form, he or she shall return the order unsigned to the party who left it to be signed and the party may,

(a) submit the order in proper form and, if required by the registrar, file the approval of the parties to the order in that form, together with a copy of the order; or

(b) obtain an appointment to have the order settled by the court, judge or officer that made it and serve notice of the appointment on all other parties who were represented at the hearing.

(8) Where approval is not received within a reasonable time, a party may obtain an appointment to have the order settled by the registrar or, where the registrar considers it necessary, by the court, judge or officer that made it, and notice of the appointment shall be served on all other parties who were represented at the hearing.

(9) In a case of urgency, the order may be settled and signed by the court, judge or officer that made it without the approval of any of the parties who were represented at the hearing.

(10) Where an objection is taken to the proposed form of the order in the course of its settlement before a registrar, the registrar shall settle the order in the form he or she considers proper and the objecting party may obtain an appointment with the court, judge or officer that made the order to settle the part of the order to which objection has been taken and serve notice of the appointment on all other parties who were represented at the hearing.

(13) Where an appointment is not obtained under subrule
(10) or (11) within seven days after the registrar settles the order, a party may require the registrar to sign the order as settled by him or her.

(14) After an order has been settled under subrule (10) by the judge or officer who made it, or under subrule (11) and (12), the registrar shall sign it unless it was signed by a judge or officer at the time it was settled.

The purpose of this procedure is to ensure, so far as humanly possible, that the formal order upon which an appellate court, and other members of the same court, sheriff, accountant, etc., will act accurately sets out the intention of the court which pronounced the order as reflected in the endorsement or the reasons. It is important that this should be done so that all concerned may know their rights, obligations and duties. It is far more than a mere formality.

It will be seen that raising an objection to a draft order or refusing to approve it involves the person seeking to take out the order in additional time and cost. In addition, since courts and officers will not and should not, usually, act upon an endorsement but only upon a formal order signed, issued and entered, delay may nullify the effect of rule 59.01.

The approval of orders is, therefore, one of the things which is necessary in order to permit the court to function. It is akin to being on time for a hearing. It is perhaps unnecessary to say that if there is legitimate objection to the form of the draft order it is quite proper to pursue the objection through the process laid out by the rules. However, to refuse approval, or to raise specious or frivolous objections in order to gain a collateral advantage, such as delay, or simply to cause additional trouble and expense to the other side is an abuse of process.

I should make it clear that, as I have mentioned above, approval of a draft order is only an agreement that that is what the court ordered. It is not, in the slightest degree, a concession that the order was right, or that the court had jurisdiction, or an agreement not to appeal. It is purely an administrative act for the purpose of permitting the court system to function.

In what I have said above I have drawn no distinction between the counsel and the client. However, in the circumstances which obtain here, the issue is the duty of counsel where the client has given instructions not to approve the order, and there are no proper grounds upon which to withhold such approval and it is to that issue which I now turn.

It is well to start with the general well settled proposition that a solicitor is the agent of his/her client and must, like any other agent, follow the principal's instructions. This is, however, subject to the exception that those instructions must be lawful. It is no defence for an agent who has committed a tort or criminal offence to say that it was committed upon the instructions of the principal.

Members of the bar are subject to particular constraints arising from their position as officers of the court. The Rules of Professional Conduct of the Law Society of Upper Canada are of great assistance, and shed light upon the matter before me. There are two specific rules to which I refer.

Rule 10

> When acting as an advocate the lawyer, while treating the tribunal with courtesy and respect, must represent the client resolutely and honourably within the limits of the law.

Commentary

> 2. The lawyer has a duty to the client to raise fearlessly every issue, advance every argument, and ask every question, however distasteful, which the lawyer thinks will help the client's case and to endeavour to obtain for the client the benefit of every remedy and defence authorized by law. The lawyer must discharge this duty by fair and honourable means, without illegality and in a manner consistent with the lawyer's duty to treat the tribunal with candour, fairness, courtesy and respect.

The lawyer must not, for example:

> (a) abuse the process of the tribunal by instituting or prosecuting proceedings which, although legal in themselves, are clearly motivated by malice on the part of the client and are brought solely for the purpose of injuring the other party;
>
> (b) knowingly assist or permit the client to do anything which the lawyer considers to be dishonest or dishonourable;

Rule 14

> The lawyer's conduct towards other lawyers should be characterized by courtesy and good faith.

Commentary

> 1. Public interest demands that matters entrusted to a lawyer be dealt with effectively and expeditiously, and fair and courteous dealing on the part of each lawyer engaged in a matter will contribute materially to this end. The lawyer who behaves otherwise does a disservice to the client, and neglect of the Rule will impair the ability of lawyers to perform their function properly.

2. Any ill feeling which may exist or be engendered between clients, particularly during litigation, should never be allowed to influence lawyers in their conduct and demeanour toward each other or the parties. The presence of personal animosity between lawyers involved in a matter may cause their judgment to be clouded by emotional factors and hinder the proper resolution of the matter. Personal remarks or personally abusive tactics interfere with the orderly administration of justice and have no place in our legal system.

4. The lawyer should avoid sharp practice, and should not take advantage of or act without fair warning upon slips, irregularities or mistakes on the part of other lawyers not going to the merits or involving the sacrifice of the client's rights.

[Footnotes omitted]

In my view, the refusal to approve a draft order to which there is no genuine objection contravenes those rules.

Does the fact that a solicitor has ceased to act for the client alter these obligations? In my opinion, it does not.

The obligation to approve an order, to which there is no legitimate objection, is owed to the court and to the other solicitors as well as to the client. Ceasing to act for the client does not relieve the solicitor of the obligations to the court and other solicitors. It may not release the obligations owed to the client in this respect. If the order is not approved by the solicitor who appeared on the motion, a succeeding solicitor may well say that he cannot give approval as he was not present on the motion or there may be no succeeding solicitor. There is, therefore, a breakdown in the court process resulting in unnecessary delay and expense. It is the duty of solicitors to avoid this if possible, and it can hardly be said that the brief amount of time and effort required to consider a draft order, endorse the approval upon it and return it to the solicitor who has drafted it is an unreasonable burden upon a solicitor.

It should hardly be necessary to add that at a time when the court system is under attack from many quarters, including those who should know better, it is short-sighted for members of the legal profession to provide ammunition for their enemies.

In dealing with the costs consequences of such conduct the applicable rule of civil procedure is rule 57.07:

57.07(1) Where a solicitor for a party has caused costs to be incurred without reasonable cause or to be wasted by undue delay, negligence or other default, the court may make an order,

(a) disallowing costs between the solicitor and client or directing the solicitor to repay to the client money paid on account of costs;

(b) directing the solicitor to reimburse the client for any costs that the client had been ordered to pay to any other party; and

(c) requiring the solicitor personally to pay the costs of any party.

(2) An order under subrule (1) may be made by the court on its own initiative or on the motion of any party to the proceeding, but no such order shall be made unless the solicitor is given a reasonable opportunity to make representations to the court.

(3) The court may direct that notice of an order against a solicitor under subrule (1) be given to the client in the manner specified in the order.

I have reviewed the cases decided under that rule and under s. 141 [am. 1984, c. 64, s. 9] of the Courts of Justice Act, 1984, S.O. 1984, c. 11, and those relating to the inherent jurisdiction of the court to control its own officers through an award of costs against them. It appears to me that an important factor in those cases is the good faith of the solicitors in question and whether their actions were reasonable. I have no doubt that the solicitors for the defendants have acted entirely in good faith. I am satisfied that they did their best to have their client act reasonably and that, after careful consideration, they came to the conclusion that they were bound to follow his instructions.

In that latter respect, I think that they were wrong but that is not nearly enough to justify an order for costs against them personally. Before a solicitor, acting in good faith, can be ordered to pay costs personally, he or she must be guilty of outrageous conduct or incompetence amounting to outrageous conduct. That is far from the case here, particularly in view of the fact that, as I have mentioned earlier, there is no authority on the point and opinion is divided. It may be that if this judgment comes to the attention of the bar it will no longer be possible to say that there was an honest belief that the client's instructions must be followed in these circumstances.

I therefore award costs of the settlement of the order against the defendants but not against their solicitors.

Order accordingly.

ENDORSEMENT

[1] A case conference was held this morning by telephone. The purpose of the case conference was to settle the terms of the court's order dated November 24, 2017 and to schedule competing motions for costs.

[2] All counsel who wished to do so have previously made written submissions on the form of the order in issue. They were content that the form of the order be settled during the call today. In accepting the form of order proposed by the estate trustee, I was accepting the form of schedule "A" to which the parties had consented in open court.

[3] Settling an order is an administrative act that counsel is required to conduct in good faith. The order is to be drafted simply. It records, in the appropriate format, the operative terms of the tribunal's endorsement. Settling an order is not an opportunity for clients to negotiate or for counsel to regret a consent given. Rather, settling an order is a professional matter that counsel is required to perform regardless of the positions or preferences of the client. Chrysler Credit Canada Ltd. v. 734925 Ontario Ltd. (1991), 1991 CanLII 7311 (ON SC), 5 OR (3d) 65 (MC).

[4] The applicant seeks costs against Ms. Hammer, Ms. Werner, and their lawyer Henry Juroviesky personally for time and cost she says was wasted in the order settlement process. Ms. Hammer and Ms. Werner wish to bring a motion for costs as well although I am unsure of the subject matter of that proposed motion. I have already received written costs submissions concerning the November 24, 2017 hearing. No further costs motion for that hearing is required.

[5] I have advised the parties previously that I am no longer case managing this matter generally. I do not recall reserving costs other than with respect to the November 24, 2017 order. Costs of the order settlement process remain an open topic. If any party believes that there is another proceeding that I heard for which costs remain a live issue, then he, she, or they may serve a motion record on the other parties and have it delivered to my attention before the end of March. A case conference will then be held to schedule submissions and to consider whether the costs sought on any motion that I heard remain available. Otherwise, if the parties have motions to bring, they may do so on the Estates List in the ordinary course.

[6] The applicant's motion record under rule 57.07 was delivered to the court on February 21, 2018. Mr. Juroviesky advised this morning that he has yet to put LawPro on notice of the motion for costs against him personally. He undertook to do so forthwith.

[7] The costs of the order settlement process are very modest. Although costs are sought personally against a lawyer and therefore it is necessary and appropriate that a full opportunity to respond be provided, the process must still be proportionate. Ms. Hammer and Ms. Warner may need independent counsel to respond as Mr. Juroviesky and they are potentially adverse in interest. It may be that they will resolve matters among themselves to remove the potential for adversity.

[8] Although some time has passed already, some further time is required due to Mr. Juroviesky not taking steps to see to his own and his clients' representation. Accordingly, Ms. Hammer, Ms. Warner, and Mr. Juroviesky shall respond to the outstanding motion by serving the other parties and delivering to my attention any evidence upon which they rely by April 6, 2018. Counsel are to schedule a case conference by telephone for the following week at which further procedural steps, if any, will be discussed under Rule 50.13 (6).

[9] The parties are on notice that during that case conference, in accordance with rule 57.01 (7) the court will devise and adopt the simplest, least expensive, and most expeditious process that appears fitting at that time.

[10] It is perfectly obvious that the current motions are uneconomical and are designed to make tactical points among counsel. This litigation has been extremely hard fought and expensive already. There is a very substantial amount of money at stake. The principal parties are siblings. The allegations among them have been exceptionally nasty and betray an underlying personal bitterness that perhaps only family members can hold toward one another. The siblings are now engulfed in a sea of professionals poised to engage on a very extensive and expensive voyage through years and years of legal and accounting documentation to re-package history to best suit their own current positions. The costs and distress of the process seem to be more attractive to the parties than sitting down, splitting a difference, and salvaging whatever is left of their family ties while their mother remains alive. There is enough money available that none of them will notice the difference in the long run. Instead, they choose to play out their damaged family dynamics in a public forum at great expense and with immense personal emotional cost.

[11] I decided to stop case managing this case because it became a tool to help the parties bludgeon each other rather than to resolve their issues. This has become one of a small number of unfortunate cases in which case management seems to encourage the parties to disagree.

[12] Normally, parties recognize that case management should encourage reasonable compromise and cooperation. Most parties do not want to show themselves to be taking unreasonable positions in front of a judge whom they know will be seeing them over and over again. Moreover, most reasonable parties recognize that with some cooperation on procedural matters such as scheduling, there are great advantages available in case management like streamlining the issues and reducing delay in the proceedings. Parties usually realize a case management premium by cooperating.

[13] But sometimes, the low cost of case management leads parties to an erroneous conclusion that they should harden their positions and decline even the slightest cooperation because the process of seeking resolution is so quick and cheap. The judge is just a phone call away. In these cases, the judge becomes the parties' private referee. The parties get repeated, privileged access to a judge. They are prepared to abuse the judge's commitment of non-sitting time to their case in hopes of achieving minor tactical gains and showing a resoluteness to oppose even the most trivial concession. In those circumstances, case management does not move the case forward or lessen expense.

[14] Case management only works where counsel are able to cooperate and to obtain instructions to do so from their clients. Case management can fail as well where counsel focus on their obligation to be zealous and fearless advocates while ignoring the concomitant obligation to do so "in a way that promotes the parties' right to a fair hearing in which justice can be done." The quoted words are found right after the obligation to be fearless in Commentary [1] to Rule 5.1-1 of the Rules of Professional Conduct. The overriding commitment to fairness and justice is part and parcel of the obligation to be zealous and fearless advocates. Otherwise, we revert to trial by battle in which parties pay champions to assault each other. That is not justice as we know it.

[15] In Hryniak v Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7, at para. 28, the Supreme Court of Canada reminded us that the principal goal of the civil justice system is a "fair process that results in a just adjudication of disputes."

[16] Now counsel are swinging at each other personally because they cannot even get orders settled without judicial intervention. Whether issues are born of bilateral, proper, hard fought negotiating, or unilateral, improper conduct remains to be determined if necessary. Another front is opened in the unrelenting distress of this family's war. How much preferable might it be for the parties to take a step back and choose to resolve their difficulties another way? Perhaps, for example, a judge with background in their issues might agree to help them discuss a negotiated outcome.

BETWEEN

Meridian Credit Union Limited

Plaintiff (Respondent)

and

Ahmed Baig

Defendant (Appellant)

Milton A. Davis and John Adair, for the appellant

vicarious liability or his counsel's concession. Therefore, it is not necessary to address this ground of appeal.

II. The interveners' arguments

[41] During the motion, counsel for the appellant invited the motion judge to render a "decision on the merits in favour of either party". The motion judge found that the appellant was liable to Meridian on the basis of fraudulent misrepresentations, including misrepresentations made by the interveners.

[42] The interveners' position is that, by making adverse findings against them in their absence, the motion judge breached the rules of natural justice and procedural fairness. They rely on the principle of audi alteram partem, or the right to be heard.

(a) Fresh evidence

[43] The interveners also seek to introduce as fresh evidence affidavits sworn by a lawyer with Miller Thomson and by Kiborn. The affidavits provide evidence concerning what the interveners knew of the summary judgment motion and why they were not present at it. They are the same affidavits sworn for the intervention motions, and were the subject of cross-examination by Meridian.

[44] The interveners first contend that the fresh evidence should be admitted pursuant to this court's decision in R. v. Poulos, 2015 ONCA 182, 124 O.R. (3d) 675, at paras. 13-14. They argue that because the affidavits concern the validity of the motion process and comply with the normal rules of evidence, they should be admitted.

[45] In any case, the interveners say the criteria in R. v. Palmer 1979 CanLII 8 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 759, at p. 775, are satisfied. That is, the evidence: (i) could not, through the exercise of due diligence, have been adduced at the summary judgment motion; (ii) is relevant in that it bears on a decisive or potentially decisive issue; (iii) is reasonably capable of belief; and (iv) if believed, could reasonably be expected to have affected the result at the motion being appealed.

[46] The fresh evidence application should be denied. Poulos does not assist the interveners because their honest, though mistaken, belief about the outcomes possible does not affect what rights they were entitled to. In other words, the fresh evidence is irrelevant to the validity of the process followed by the motion judge.

[47] The fresh evidence application also fails if considered under the Palmer criteria, for similar reasons. Because the interveners' belief is irrelevant to the issues raised, the fresh evidence could not have affected the results of the motion below.

(b) The interveners' right to be heard

[48] The interveners were witnesses in the summary judgment motion. No relief was sought from them and none was granted. Although they were not present at the motion, the motion judge released a decision which, they say, seriously affects them. The motion judge found that they had prepared documents which contained fraudulent misrepresentations and held that they had "actively hid" Yellowstone's ownership through those misrepresentations.

[49] As noted in Ontario (Provincial Police) v. Mosher, 2015 ONCA 722, 340 O.A.C. 311, at paras. 60-63, the principle of audi alteram partem, which the interveners rely on heavily, is composed of two elements: a right to be heard by a decision-maker, and a right to notice of a hearing sufficient in time and substance to enable a party to present their case. In my opinion, the interveners did not have a right to be heard or to receive notice in this case.

[50] Audi alteram partem applies whenever a person's rights, interests, or privileges are affected by a decision. As non-parties to this action, the interveners are not directly impacted by the order. They are not bound by the motion judge's

1 The question of law to be decided on this small claim appeal is whether the judge's conclusion, that the vendors of residential property made a fraudulent defect, no matter how plain, should be considered to be latent simply because its cause was not visible or known.

17 In response, the purchasers' counsel simply argued that the trial judge was correct.

Analysis

18 There can be no doubt that caveat emptor is alive and well in Manitoba despite its well-publicized deficiencies. In Stotts v. McArthur (1991), 1991 CanLII 12042 (MB CA), 75 Man.R. (2d) 212 at para. 18, this court considered with approval the following statement from V. DiCastri, Q.C., Law of Vendor and Purchaser, 3rd ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1988), vol. 1 (at para. 239):

> It is reasonably clear that a vendor is not obliged to disclose all known facts affecting the value of the land which may be material to the purchaser's judgment. The purchaser must form his own judgment: caveat emptor. This principle, though much criticized, continues to demonstrate a disconcerting durability.

19 Thus mere silence without more on the part of the vendor with respect to a defect subsequently discovered by a purchaser will not normally found a cause of action against the vendor by the purchaser for misrepresentation or for fraud. But there are exceptions as we shall see, if a vendor is found to have been deceitful.

20 A convenient summary of the general principles relating to falsity by omission, silence or inaction is found in Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed. reissue (London: Butterworths, 1998), vol. 31 (at para. 748):

> When silence constitutes falsity. There are two main classes of case in which reticence may contribute to establish a misrepresentation: (1) where known material qualifications of an absolute statement are omitted; and (2) where the circumstances raise a duty on the representor to state certain matters, if they exist, and where, therefore, the representee is entitled as against the representor to infer their non-existence from the representor's silence as to them.

21 By way of elaboration, Halsbury's notes (at paras. 749-50):

> The representor must not merely abstain from positive falsehood; he must not knowingly or willingly omit anything which is required to render completely true that which without it is not completely true. … mere incompleteness is not a factor in misrepresentation; it must always be proved clearly that it rendered what was stated fallacious and false.
>
> Where a person has said something to another, a duty may at once arise to say more, and if he fails to discharge this duty his reticence from that point becomes an implied misrepresentation, although complete silence throughout the transaction would not have amounted to, or have afforded any evidence of, misrepresentation, or even of actionable non-disclosure.

22 The point is neatly summarized in Fridman's Law of Contract, ibid. (at p. 324):

> A distinction must be made between a failure to disclose which in effect renders what has been stated a misrepresentation, and a failure to disclose which leaves anything said or written as true, but results in some misconceptions since the whole truth has not been told. The former kind of non-disclosure if fraudulent is fraudulent misrepresentation. For this to occur there must be what Lord Cairns in Peek v. Gurney [(1873), L.R. 6 H.L. 377 at 403] described as "some active misstatement of fact, or at all events, such a partial and fragmentary statement of fact as that the withholding of that which is not stated makes that which is stated absolutely false."

23 Many authorities illustrate this latter point. In Peek, Lord Chelmsford also noted (at p. 392):

> … half a truth will sometimes amount to a real falsehood; and I go farther and say, that to my mind it contains a positive misrepresentation. The language of the prospectus must be read in the sense in which the Respondents must have known it would be understood.

24 It is clear therefore that silence and half-truths can amount to a fraudulent misrepresentation. As explained in Tapp and Another v. Lee (1803), 3 Bos. & Pul. 367, 127 E.R. 200 at 203: "Fraud may consist as well in the suppression of what is true, as in the representation of what is false," and see Curtis v.

Chemical Cleaning and Dyeing Co., Ltd., [1951] 1 All E.R. 631 (C.A.) (at p. 634):

> … a representation might be literally true but practically false, not because of what it said, but because of what it left unsaid. In short, because of what it implied. This is as true of an innocent misrepresentation as it is of a fraudulent misrepresentation.

See as well C.R.F. Holdings Ltd. et al. v. Fundy Chemical International Ltd. et al. (1980), 1980 CanLII 586 (BC SC), 14 C.C.L.T. 87 (B.C.S.C.), aff'd on issue of liability at 1981 CanLII 488 (BC CA), [1982] 2 W.W.R. 385 (C.A.), Ontex Resources Ltd. v. Metalore Resources Ltd. (1990), 1990 CanLII 6952 (ON SC), 75 O.R. (2d) 513 (Gen.Div.), appeal allowed in part at (1993), 1993 CanLII 8673 (ON CA), 13 O.R. (3d) 229 (C.A.), and many other cases to like effect.

25 In sum, as stated in G. Spencer Bower, K.C., & The Hon. Sir A. K. Turner, The Law of Actionable Misrepresentations, 3rd ed. (London: Butterworths, 1974) (at p. 94):

> To state a thing which is true only with qualifications or additions known to, but studiously withheld by, the representor, is to say the thing which is not. Such a statement is a "lie", and one of the most dangerous and insidious forms of lie. "If a man", says Chambre J. [in Tapp v. Lee at p. 372] "professing to answer a question, select those facts only which are likely to give a credit to the person of whom he speaks, and keep back the rest, he is a more artful knave than he who tells a direct falsehood."

26 In addition to silence and half-truths that mislead or imply something other than the truth, active concealment of a defect that would otherwise be patent is treated as fraudulent. While active concealment is most often encountered as a physical cover-up, that is to say an action to hide a visible defect, its application is much broader in scope. See Halsbury's, ibid. at vol. 42 (at para. 46):

> … any active concealment by the vendor of defects which otherwise would be patent is treated as fraudulent, and the contract is voidable by the purchaser if he has been deceived by it. Any conduct calculated to mislead a purchaser or lull his suspicions with regard to a defect known to the vendor has the same effect.

27 As noted by Masten J. in Leeson v. Darlow et al., 1926 CanLII 407 (ON CA), [1926] 4 D.L.R. 415 (Ont.S.C., App. Div.) (at p. 432):

> Active concealment of a fact is equivalent to a positive statement that the fact does not exist. By active concealment is meant any act done with intent to prevent a fact from being discovered ….

28 The purpose of active concealment, of course, is to make latent that which would otherwise be patent. Gronau v. Schlamp Investments Ltd.; Canada Trust Co. (1974), 1974 CanLII 1295 (MB QB), 52 D.L.R. (3d) 631 (Man. Q.B.). Kenny J., in Belzil v. Bain (2001), 45 R.P.R. (3d) 233, 2001 ABQB 890, put the point this way: "Where there is an active concealment of an otherwise patent defect, the general rule of caveat emptor will not apply" (at para. 63). Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed. (London: Butterworths, 1980), vol. 42, explains (at p. 48), therefore, where work is done on a house which results in concealment of a patent defect, an action for recovery of damages arises as if it was a fraudulent misrepresentation. See, for example, Unrau et al. v. Gay (1983), 30 R.P.R. 198 (N.S.S.C.).

29 I note in passing that there are a number of court decisions such as McGrath v. MacLean (1979), 1979 CanLII 1691 (ON CA), 22 O.R. (2d) 784 (C.A.), Gumbmann et al. v. Cornwall et al. (1986), 44 R.P.R. 114 (Ont.S.C.), and Allen et al. v. McCutcheon et al. (1979), 1979 CanLII 280 (BC SC), 9 R.P.R. 191 (B.C.S.C.), which in my view incorrectly explain the principle by stating that it applies when latent defects are actively concealed; this is not right – it is rather the concealing of a patent defect to make it latent that makes the activity fraudulent.

30 In this instance, it can certainly be said that the PCS, which states that the only "flooding or leakage" was due to frozen pipes and omits all reference to other leakage, constitutes an "act done with intent to prevent a fact from being discovered" (Leeson, at p. 432), or to put it another way, the purchasers were "induced to withhold inquiry." See Rasch v. Horne, 1930 CanLII 275 (MB CA), [1930] 3 D.L.R. 647 at 651 (Man.C.A.). This is sometimes referred to as

Case Summary

Professions — Barristers and solicitors — Negligence — Municipality building road on farm property and entering into agreement with owner that it would recover portion of its construction costs from subsequent owner — Deferred payment mechanism implemented by creation of 0.3 metre reserve abutting farm property which was owned by municipality and which would be released upon payment by subsequent owner — Cost recovery agreement not registered on title but title search revealing existence of reserve and of restrictive covenant that referred to cost recovery — Plaintiff purchasing property for development without being aware of cost recovery agreement — Trial judge not erring in finding that plaintiff's solicitor was negligent in failing to thoroughly investigate access issues raised by existence of reserve.

Real property — Registration — Municipality building road on farm property and entering into agreement with owner that it would recover portion of its construction costs from Keenan testified that it was his intention to provide notice that there would be charges against the reserve. Apart from anything else, the existence of the amendment at least underscores the obligation of the purchaser under the agreement of purchase and sale to satisfy itself regarding what the cost recoveries related to the reserve entailed.

[74] Finally, in a handwritten addition to Sch. "A", the vendor represented to the purchaser "that the Vendor has never conducted or caused to be conducted any environmental tests, studies or investigations whatsoever on the Property". Whether that representation was untrue was the subject of much attention at trial, but the trial judge found that the Keenans had not conducted or caused any environmental tests to be conducted, although others had. For present purposes, the representation extracted by the purchaser underscores the fact, in my view, that [page760] where the purchaser wished to protect itself from the rigours of the doctrine of caveat emptor, it did so expressly.

[75] Given this context, I turn now to the trial judge's conclusions and the appellant's arguments concerning fraudulent misrepresentation.

Fraudulent misrepresentation

[76] The trial judge found, at paras. 106-107, that the cost recovery clause could be said to be a defect relating to the quality of the lands to be conveyed and a defect relating to title -- the two types of title defect to which caveat emptor relates.[2] He noted that, aside from prohibiting active concealment or a failure to disclose a latent defect rendering premises dangerous, a vendor is under no duty to disparage his property and may remain silent. This is because, in Ontario, as a general proposition, a vendor is, apart from express contract, under no general duty to disclose defects relating to title or to quality: see Bora Laskin, Q.C. (as he then was), "Defects of Title and Quality: Caveat Emptor and the Vendor's Duty of Disclosure", in Special Lectures of the Law Society of Upper Canada 1960: Contracts for the Sale of Land (Toronto: Richard De Boo Ltd., 1960), at p. 401; McCamus, at p. 102.

[77] This court and the Manitoba Court of Appeal have both confirmed that silence and half-truths can amount to fraudulent misrepresentation and that, where a vendor, who has no duty to speak, decides to break that silence, the doctrine of caveat emptor falls away as a defence mechanism and the vendor must speak truthfully and completely about the matters raised: see Krawchuk v. Scherbak (2011), 106 O.R. (3d) 598, [2011] O.J. No. 2064, 2011 ONCA 352, at para. 77, citing Kaufmann v. Gibson, [2007] O.J. No. 2711, 59 R.P.R. (4th) 293 (S.C.J.); Alevizos v. Nirula, [2003] M.J. No. 433, 2003 MBCA 148, 180 Man. R. (2d) 186, at paras. 18-25. These cases involved situations where vendors completed voluntary vendor disclosure statements in residential real estate transactions.

[78] The appellant contends that when a vendor discloses information in an agreement of purchase and sale that he may not have been required to disclose, the doctrine of caveat emptor [page761] similarly falls away as a defence mechanism and the vendor must speak truthfully and completely about the matters raised. In Peek v. Gurney (1873), L.R. 6 H.L. 377, [1861-73] All E.R. Rep. 116 (H.L.), at p. 403 H.L., Lord Cairns long ago described falsity by half-truth as "a partial and fragmentary statement of fact, as that the withholding of that which is not stated makes that which is stated absolutely false".

[79] The appellant contends that if Harold Keenan intended the amendment to disclose the existence of the cost recovery associated with lifting the 0.3 metre reserve -- as he said he did -- the disclosure had to be forthright. Instead, the amendment was couched in "half-truths", deceptively leading the purchaser and Saikaley to believe the amendment referred only to municipal development charges (which the purchaser was prepared to absorb, thinking they were minor), when he knew the cost recovery agreement related to the costs of the road project and gave rise to a much more significant financial obligation on the part of the purchaser.

[80] The appellant rests this submission on the trial judge's comment, at para. 41, that the amendment "standing on its own did little to give meaningful notice of the nature of the obligation awaiting anyone who intended to purchase and develop the Keenan land". Having so concluded, the appellant contends, the trial judge erred in failing to consider the legal effect of that conclusion.

[81] In my opinion, the amendment in clause 7 of Sch. "A" is not a misstatement of the nature described in Peek, if it is a misstatement at all.

The context of the amendment

[82] As described above, the amendment did not stand alone, an important qualification to the trial judge's observation that it did little to give meaningful notice of the nature of the obligation contained in the cost recovery clause. Context is important. Here, the context includes the fact noted by the trial judge that the means by which the cost recovery clause "derives its force, the .3 metre reserve, appears in the records of the land registry office as depicted on Plan 4R-14871" and "the presence of the reserve is sufficient to put a purchaser on notice that inquiries need[ed] to be made" (at para. 99).

[83] The context also includes the restrictive covenant registered against the reserve lands, which was in Saikaley's search file. This covenant states: "no part of the [0.3 metre reserves] shall be dedicated as a public road until such time as the [municipality] has collected from the owners of the lands [page762] adjacent to such part a proportionate share of [the municipality's] costs incurred in connection with [the road project]". Other relevant aspects of the context are that the agreement of purchase and sale placed the onus on the purchaser to satisfy itself on matters relating to access and the purchaser's solicitors were specifically advised to satisfy themselves in response to the requisition concerning unregistered easements, restrictions or encumbrances affecting the property.

Interpreting the amendment in context

[84] When the amendment is read in this context, its reference to "all costs recovered to the City of Ottawa to its .3 metre reserve" is not, as explained in Peek, such a fragmentary statement of fact as to make the statement false, in my opinion.

[85] The amendment specifically requires the purchaser to satisfy "all costs recovered to the City of Ottawa to its .3 metre reserve". While this obligation was expressed as an inclusion in "municipal development charges for the property", the wording clearly signals an obligation for "costs recovered" to the city -- that is, an obligation referencing something that has happened in the past -- as opposed to a fee or something to defray costs incurred by the municipality in the future.

[86] It seems to me that all of the foregoing was sufficient to put the purchaser on notice to clarify exactly what those "costs recovered to the City of Ottawa to its .3 metre reserve" entailed. It may be that the language of the amendment was not as clear as it might have been. However, Saikaley had the proposed amendment in advance of the agreement of purchase and sale being signed, and could have asked for clarification, but did not.

[87] Given the foregoing context, and what was known or ought to have been known by the purchaser or its solicitors, I do not see how it could be said -- even if one accepts that the language in the amendment was ambiguous -- that it constituted "some active misstatement of fact, or at all events, such a partial and fragmentary statement of fact as that the withholding of that which is not stated makes that which is stated absolutely false" (Peek, at p. 403 H.L.).

[88] For these reasons, I would not give effect to the argument that Harold Keenan, having decided to break silence and give notice of the cost recovery clause -- if that is what he did -- was in violation of an obligation to disclose it in a more forthright fashion. While he may have been nibbling at the edges of the "honest fair-dealing" concept referred to by the trial judge, Keenan's conduct -- having regard to all of the circumstances outlined above -- did not rise to the level where it would be [page763] "unconscientious for [him] to avail himself of the advantage obtained": Performance Industries Ltd. v. Sylvan Lake Golf & Tennis Club Ltd., [2002] 1 S.C.R. 678, [2002] S.C.J. No. 20, 2002 SCC 19, at para. 39, citing McMaster University v. Wilchar Construction Ltd., 1971 CanLII 594 (ON SC), [1971] 3 O.R. 801, [1971] O.J. No. 1717, 22 D.L.R. (3d) 9 (H.C.J.), at p. 811 O.R., p. 19 D.L.R.

Equitable fraud/bad faith

[89] The appellant points to the principle established in Dynamic Transport Ltd. v. O.K. Detailing Ltd., 1978 CanLII 215 (SCC), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 1072, [1978] S.C.J. No. 52, at p. 1084 S.C.R., that a vendor is under a duty to act in good faith and to take all reasonable steps required of the vendor to complete the sale. It contends that the cost recovery clause in the 1999 agreement could have been disclosed to the purchaser at any time prior to the sale, and should have been disclosed in response to the purchaser's requisition concerning unregistered restrictions or other encumbrances.

[90] According to the appellant, Harold Keenan breached the duty of good faith in failing to disclose the cost recovery clause in the 1999 agreement and his conduct "reaches the unconscionable conduct threshold for equitable fraud". It contends that, as a person experienced in real estate and development matters -- having been a councillor for the City of Gloucester and a member of its planning committee for ten years -- Keenan knew that the 1999 agreement was unregistered and effectively undetectable because of that, and he could not have failed to appreciate the practical effect of the agreement was to reduce the value of the land (as the trial judge subsequently observed in his costs reasons).

[91] It seems to me that the appellant's interrelated equitable fraud and bad faith argument is misconceived for several reasons. First, the appellant did not plead equitable fraud, which may well explain why the trial judge did not refer to this doctrine.

[92] Moreover, the appellant offers no authority for the view that the concept of equitable fraud is applicable in the present circumstances. The leading authority on equitable fraud is the English Court of Appeal's decision in Kitchen v. Royal Air Force Assn., [1958] 2 All E.R. 241, [1958] 1 W.L.R. 563 (C.A.), where Lord Evershed M.R. defined equitable fraud as "conduct which, having regard to some special relationship between the two parties concerned, is an unconscionable thing for the one to do towards the other" (at p. 249 All E.R.).

[93] Although not necessarily an exclusive list, there appear to be certain recognized circumstances where the concept of equitable fraud is engaged. First, conduct amounting to equitable [page764] fraud or fraudulent concealment may prevent a party from relying on a limitation period or other statutory provision that would otherwise exonerate the party from liability: see Guerin v. Canada, 1984 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 335, [1984] S.C.J. No. 45, at p. 356 S.C.R. (per Wilson J.), and at p. 390 S.C.R. (per Estey J.); First City Capital Ltd. v. British Columbia Building Corp., 1989 CanLII 2868 (BC SC), [1989] B.C.J. No. 130, 43 B.L.R. 29 (S.C.); Sun-Rype Products Ltd. v. Archer Daniels Midland Co., [2008] B.C.J. No. 1298, 2008 BCCA 278, 81 B.C.L.R. (4th) 199, leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused [2008] S.C.C.A. No. 416. Second, conduct amounting to equitable fraud is one of the preconditions to the availability of the remedy of rectification of a contract on the grounds of unilateral mistake: see Sylvan Lake, at paras. 38-39. Finally, equitable fraud has been used to describe conduct that gives rise to a breach of a fiduciary duty or other equitable obligation: see Canson Enterprises Ltd. v. Boughton & Co., 1991 CanLII 52 (SCC), [1991] 3 S.C.R. 534, [1991] S.C.J. No. 91, at p. 571 S.C.R.

[94] None of the recognized circumstances for considering whether a party has engaged in conduct amounting to equitable fraud exist in the present case. Harold Keenan is not seeking to rely on any limitation period or other statutory provision to escape liability. Outaouais did not seek a remedy of rectification of the agreement of purchase and sale. Finally, Keenan did not owe any fiduciary duty to Outaouais in the circumstances of this commercial transaction where both parties were represented by counsel.

[95] Nor is there any other basis on which to find equitable fraud or to find that Harold Keenan acted in bad faith. There is nothing in the agreement of purchase and sale, or, as mentioned, in the context of the transaction, that placed any onus on the vendor to carry out the purchaser's obligation to make inquiries on the purchaser's behalf. This is not a case like Dynamic Transport, where the vendor failed to discharge an implied obligation to apply for subdivision approval when obtaining such approval was the only way that business efficacy could be given to the sale agreement.

[96] While the vendors clearly knew of the cost recovery clause and its materiality, it was reasonably discoverable by the purchasers. Had the purchaser's lawyer made the necessary inquiries, which it was incumbent upon him to do, the payment requirement would have been revealed. He failed to do so, however, and in the circumstances that failure should not be visited upon the vendors. Within the boundaries of law and equity, and in the absence of any representation and warranty requiring otherwise, commercial real estate vendors such as the respondents, [page765] who are parties to a caveat emptor type of agreement of purchase and sale, are entitled to conduct themselves as the respondents did.

Disposition

[97] I would accordingly dismiss the appeal.

[98] The respondents Douglas Keenan and Outaouais are entitled to their costs, fixed in the amount of $25,000 each, inclusive of disbursements and GST. In the circumstances, we make no order as to costs with respect to the respondent Harold Keenan.

Appeal dismissed.

Notes

1 The project was described as "the Algoma Road Extension Kenaston Street Re-Alignment" and involved the construction of a municipal road, sanitary sewer, storm sewer and water services on the lands conveyed by the Keenans to the city.

2 Briefly, the distinction between defects in title and defects in quality is this: a defect in title relates to deficiencies that impair the quality of ownership of the lands; a defect in quality relates to deficiencies in the quality of the property to be conveyed that affect the use to which the land may be put and the physical condition of the lands or structures or improvements made to them: see McCamus, at p. 115.

reasoning in these cases supported the City's position, these cases are not nearly as on point and persuasive as Central Trust and Nykredit.

(6) Extent of the damage

Damage and damages are different concepts

[54] The City's position that damage occurred when the Devonshire notes matured also fails to appreciate the distinction between damage and damages. Damage is the loss needed to make out the cause of action. Insofar as it relates to a transaction induced by wrongful conduct, as I have explained, damage is the condition of being worse off than before entering into the transaction. Damages, on the other hand, is the monetary measure of the extent of that loss. All that the City had to discover to start the limitation period was damage.

[55] The Nova Scotia Court of Appeal in Smith v. Union of Icelandic Fish Producers Ltd., 2005 NSCA 145, 238 N.S.R. (2d) 145, approved a description of the distinction by A.I. Ogus in The Law of Damages (London, Butterworths, 1973), at p. 2:

> The terms "damage" and "damages" have suffered from loose usage. Some writers and judges have used them as if they were synonymous. But "damages" should connote the sum of money payable by way of compensation..., while the use of "damage" is best confined to instances where it refers to the injury inflicted by the tort or breach of contract...

[56] In Smith, at para. 122, the court held that damage (or injury) occurred when the plaintiff entered into a non-competition agreement based on a misrepresentation by the defendant employer because: (1) he was at the very least deprived of the opportunity to negotiate, or attempt to negotiate, a better deal or seek out alternatives; and (2) he was induced to comply with the non-competition agreement without receiving the corresponding benefit that the employer misrepresented it would provide him.

[57] Similarly in the City's case, damage occurred when the City purchased the Devonshire notes as: (1) the City could have negotiated, or at least tried to negotiate, a lower purchase price for the notes had it known their true nature; and (2) the City became subject to a purchase agreement without the corresponding benefit of obtaining the safe, liquid investment that the City had been allegedly assured by the respondents.

[58] While the City may not have known the monetary measure of its loss until the Devonshire notes matured and it was not repaid, the City incurred loss sufficient to give rise to its cause of action when it entered into the transaction to purchase the Devonshire notes.

(7) Some damage is required, not the full extent

[59] The City's position that damage did not occur until the Devonshire notes matured is grounded in the damage element of negligent misrepresentation as it is phrased in Queen v. Cognos Inc., 1993 CanLII 146 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 87, at p. 110: "the reliance must have been detrimental to the representee in the sense that damages resulted" (emphasis added).

[60] A plain reading of this phrase might suggest that one ought to analyze when the City incurred damages (the monetary measure of its detrimental reliance) to determine when its cause of action arose. However, doing so would, in my view, fundamentally alter the discoverability principle, which is well-settled in law.

[61] The authorities make it very clear that "some damage" is sufficient for the cause of action to accrue and to start the limitation period. The Supreme Court of Canada set out the discoverability principle in Peixeiro v. Haberman, 1997 CanLII 325 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 549, at para. 18:

> Once the plaintiff knows that some damage has occurred and has identified the tortfeasor (see Cartledge v. E. Jopling & Sons Ltd., [1963] A.C. 758 (H.L.), at p. 772 per

[1963]2 O.R. 404-411

ONTARIO
[COURT OF APPEAL]
LAIDLAW, SCHROEDER and McGILLIVRAY, JJ.A.
21st MAY 1963.

Statutes -- Legislation retroactively affecting prior decision of Court -- Special levy in rating by-law declared invalid by Courts for want of required approval -- Retroaxtive corrective legislation after appeal orally dismissed -- Judgment reversed on rehearing -- Policy of legislation no concern of Courts.

The principle that an order can always be withdrawn or modified by a Judge Suo motu or on application of a party until such time as it is drawn up, passed and entered applies to an order of the Court of Appeal given orally at the conclusion of the hearing where, before being drawn up and entered, retroactive legislation became effective requiring reversal of the order. The Courts have no concern with the policy of ex post facto legislation once it is determined that the legislation is within the competence of the enacting Legislature.

A municipality was held to have no power to include a levy for sewer charges in a relating by-law where it had not received Municipal Board approval, under s. 64(1) of the Ontario Municipal Board Act, R.S.O. 1960, c. 274, of the by-law raising funds to pay for the sewer works, although approval had been obtained for the works themselves. After an appeal had been heard and orally dismissed legislation was enacted with retroactive effect declaring that notwithstanding the decision of any Court, the Board approval in s. 64(1) was the approval of the works or project only. On rehearing held the legislation was valid and retroactively validated the impugned rating by-law. The additional objection raised on rehearing that a money by-law was required to authorize imposition of the sewer rate was untenable; this was so only where debentures were to be issued. The municipality had passed all necessary by-laws.

Costs -- Successful action against municipality -- Rehearing of appeal because of retroactive legislation enacted after appeal orally dismissed -- Municipality successful -- Disposition of costs.

Where plaintiffs succeeded in actions against a municipality challenging the validity of a by-law in so far as it included a levy for sewer charges, and the judgment was affirmed orally on appeal at the conclusion of the hearing but before entry and issue of the order of the appellate Court a retroactive legislative enactment undercut plaintiffs' position and on motion by appellant municipality the appeal was allowed, held, by a majority, plaintiffs were justified by the state of the law at the time of the actions and appeals in taking the proceedings and they should have their costs of the actions and of the appeals down to the time of the motion for rehearing. Per Laidlaw, J.A., dissenting; the change in the judgment of the Court, necessitated by the legislation, cannot be attributed to either party and there should be no costs either of the actions or of the appeals.

APPEALS by a municipality from judgments of Gale, J., invalidating a certain by-law levying sates for sewer works. Reversed on a motion for rehearing in consequence of retroactive intermediate legislation which became effective after oral judgment dismissing the appeal.

H.E. Manning, Q.C., for appellant, defendant.

D. Park Jamieson, Q.C., and K.G. Stoner, for respondent, plaintiff.

LAIDLAW, J.A. (dissenting as to costs):-- The appellant is an incorporated village in the County of Lambton, Province of Ontario. respondents are companies duly incorporated and carry on business in the appellant municipality. Each of the respondents commenced an action on May 4, 1962 and claimed inter alia "a declaration that the defendant (appellant) municipality wrongfully and without authority levied part of the cost of the sewage works constructed by the defendant municipality against the property of the plaintiff in the Village of Point Edward by including in By-law number 1371 for 1961 of the defendant municipality (which by-law fixed the rates to be levied against the full assessed value of all the property within the limits of the defendant municipality a sewage rate of 9.05 mills, without passing and obtaining the requisite approval, of a by-law to provide for and authorize the imposition of a sewer rate against the property of the plaintiff and others in the municipality". Both actions came on for trial together before Gale, J., and in written reasons for judgment given by him he expressed the opinion "that Section 64 of The Ontario Municipal Board Act applies in the circumstances, and the result is, that before the Village here could effectively collect moneys to pay for any part of the sewer charges for 1961, it had to pass not only a by-law with respect to the levying of such charges but that by-law had to have the prior approval of the Ontario Municipal Board". Accordingly it was held that although the municipality had received the approval of the Municipal Board under s. 64 of the Ontario Municipal Board Act, R.S.O. 1960, c. 274 to the sewer project it also required the approval of the Board to the by- law providing for the raising of funds to pay for the project.

The municipality corporation appealed to this Court from the judgment delivered by Gale, J., and at the conclusion of the hearing of the appeal it was the unanimous opinion of the Court that the judgment in appeal should be affirmed and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs. The opinion of the Court and the reasons for judgment were stated orally. The order of the Court has not been perfected by the entry and issue thereof. In the meantime the Legislature of the Province of Ontario passed an Act cited as the Ontario Municipal Board Amendment Act, 1962-63, c. 97, s. 1(1). That Act was assented to by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Ontario on April 26, 1963 and came into force on the day it received Royal assent. I now reproduce s. 1 of the Act.

> 1(1) Section 64 of The Ontario Municipal Board Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

1a) The approval of the Board mentioned in subsection 1 means and, notwithstanding the decision of any court, shall be deemed always to have meant the approval of the undertaking, work, project, scheme, act, matter or thing mentioned in subsection 1.

Counsel for the appellant moves this Court "for leave to present argument that the appeal should be allowed, having regard to the provisions of The Ontario Municipal Board Amendment Act, 1962-63 (No. 2) [now c. 97]".

It is well settled in law that an order can always be withdrawn, altered or modified by a Judge either on his own initiative or on the application of a party until such time as the order has been drawn up, passed and entered. I refer to Re Harrison's Share under a Settlement, Harrison v. Harrison, [1955] 1 Ch. 260 at p. 275, [1955] 1 All E.R. 185.

Counsel for the respondents does not challenge the right of this Court in the circumstances of the instant case to withdraw its oral judgment and to alter or modify that oral judgment in such manner as may be proper. He argued, however, that the Court ought not exercise that right to alter the oral judgment for these reasons

(1) The Ontario Municipal Board Amendment Act was passed without any opportunity being afforded to the respondents to make any submissions as to their rights in law.

(2) That Act was an unwarranted and unjustifiable intervention in proceedings pending in the Courts and the judgments of the Courts of this Province including the Court of Appeal for Ontario and in part constituted a judicial declaration that those Courts erred in the interpretation and the meaning and effect given by them to s. 64 of the Ontario Municipal Board Act.

(3) The Ontario Municipal Board Amendment Act was a wrongful exercise of judicial powers of a Court of last resort.

(4) In any event and apart altogether from the meaning and effect of s. 64 of the Ontario Municipal Board Act and the amendment thereto it was necessary in law for the municipality to pass a special money by-law to provide for annual payments on account of their debt to the Ontario Water Resources Commission and in the absence of such special money by-law the councol of the Village of Point Edward could not lawfully include in By-law 1371 for 1961 the rate to be levied against the full assessed value of all the properties within the limits of the municipality to pay the sum due and payable in that year to the Ontario Water Resources Commission.

The Ontario Municipal Board Amendment Act is twofold in character. First, it contains a definition of the words "approval of the Board mentioned in subsection 1" of s. 64. In that respect counsel for the respondents takes no exception. Secondly, it contains a judicial declaration of law that overrules and countermands judgments of the Courts of the Province in pending proceedings and thus is an exercise of judicial functions of a Court of last resort. During the course of argument members of the Court expressed views of disapproval and criticism of that kind of legislation and counsel for all parties notwithstanding their great experience and learning stated that they had been unable to find any precedent for legislation of that character. However, since the hearing I have found the law stated clearly and with ample authority in Clement's Canadian Constitution, 3rd ed., pp. 357-8. I quote as follows:

> When once it is determined that an Act passed by any Canadian legislature, federal or provincial, is within the power conferred by the British North America Act it is not for any Court of justice to enquire further.
> .....
>
> "It can not be too strongly put that with the wisdom or expediency or policy of an Act, lawfully passed, no Court has a word to say."
> Courts of law are interpreters merely in such case and have no right to enquire whether the jurisdiction has been exercised wisely or unwisely, justly or unjustly. Magna Charta may be interfered with; taxation imposed without regard to uniformity or equality; class legislation and laws discriminating against race may be enacted; one man's property may be taken from him and given to another without compensation; ex post facto legislation passed; in short, the power may be abused but "the only remedy is an appeal to those by whom the legislature is elected."

Counsel for the respondent argued that the Legislature did not have power to pass that part of the Ontario Municipal Board Amendment Act now the subject of controversy. I reject that argument; it is my opinion that the Legislature did have that power. Unquestionably the Legislature had power at the time s. 64(1) was enacted to define the meaning of the words "approval of the Board" as mentioned therein. Likewise it possessed that power at the time the Ontario Municipal Board Amendment Act was passed and in my opinion it had power to make that definition retroactive in force and effect. In Phillips v. Eyre (1870), 40 L.J.Q.B. 28, Willes, J., said at p. 37:

> Retrospective laws are no doubt prima facie of questionable policy, and contrary to the general principle that legislation by which the conduct of mankind is to be regulated ought, when introduced for the first time, to deal with future acts, and ought not to change the character of past transactions carried on upon the faith of the then existing law. ... Accordingly the Courts will not ascribe retrospective force to new lwas affecting rights unless by express words or necessary implication it appears that such was the intention of the legislature. But to affirm that it is naturally or necessarily unjust to take away a vested right of action by Act subsequent is inconsistent both with the common law of England and the constant practice of legislation.

At p. 38 he referred to Calder v. Bull (1798), 3 Dallas Rep. 386, in which the Supreme Court of the United States "held that an Act of the State of Connecticut passed to set aside a decree of a Court of Probate, and grant a new hearing was valid, though the effect was ultimately to deprive the party in whose favour the first decision was made of the benefit of the decree". After quoting from the decision in that case the learned Justice proceeded to say at p. 39:

> In fine, allowing the general inexpediency of retrospective legislation, it cannot be pronounced naturally or necessarily unjust. ... Whether the circumstances of the particular case are such as to call for special and exceptionable remedy, is a question which must in each case involve matter of policy and discretion fit for debate and decision in the Parliament which would have had jurisdiction to deal with the subject- matter by preliminary legislation, and as to which a court of ordinary municipal law is not commissioned to inquire or adjudicate.

I refer also to A.-G. Can. v. Foster (1892), 1892 CanLII 202 (NB KB), 31 N.B.R. 153. Having reached the conclusion that the Ontario Municipal Board Amendment Act was wholly within the jurisdiction and power of the Legislature of Ontario I follow the authorities quoted, supra, and make no further inquiry and now deliberately refrain from expressing any views as to whether the jurisdiction has been exercised "wisely or unwisely, justly or unjustly".

The point that By-law 1371 was invalid in so far as it included the sewer rate to be levied against the full assessed value of all the properties within the limits of the municipality because there is no money by-law approved by the Ontario Municipal Board to provide for and authorize the imposition of such sewer rate was not the subject of argument at the time this appeal first came on for hearing because counsel for the respondents was content to rest his case in this Court or the interpretation and the meaning and effect of s. 64 of the Ontario Municipal Board Act. However, he did not waive or abandon his right to support the judgment at trial on the ground now relied on by him and accordingly, this Court heard argument on the point at length. It is my opinion that the objection taken by counsel for the respondent is not sound in law and cannot be given effect. He contended that this case is not distinguishable from one in which the cost of the project is to be paid by the issue of debentures. I cannot agree. I cannot find in s. 282 of the Municipal Act, R.S.O. 1960, c. 249, any obligation on the part of a municipality to pass a money by-law for raising in each year by special rate on all the rateable property in the municipality the sum due and payable by the municipality as a contract debt in such year except in the case of a money by-law for the issuing of debentures. But, be that as it may, the Ontario Municipal Board authorized the municipal corporation to enter into an agreement with the Ontario Water Resources Commission for the construction of the sewers and for that purpose the municipal corporation was authorized to "exercise all its powers and pass all requisite by-laws". In pursuance of that authority the council of the municipal corporation passed a by-law authorizing the reeve and clerk of the municipality to enter into an agreement with the Ontario Water Resources Commission for the completion of each phase of the sewage work. Each agreement was made a schedule to a by-law covering each phase. In each agreement the municipality agrees in accordance with s. 40 of the Ontario Water Resources Commission Act, R.S.O. 1960, c. 281, to pay to the commission certain sums in each calendar year for a period of 30 years. I conclude that all requisite by-laws were passed by the council of the municipality and that no other special money by-law was requisite to give validity to that part of By-law 1371 now in question.

I have given much thought to the matter of costs of the proceedings between the parties at trial and in this Court and have concluded that I must dissent from the opinion of my learned brethren. I can find no reason to believe or even suspect that the Ontario Municipal Board Amendment Act was passed at the instigation or upon the request or other action of the appellant. It is said by counsel to have been deemed necessary and expedient by advisors of the government by reason of other similar cases in which large sums of money are owing by various municipalities to the Ontario Water Resources Commission. Thus, whatever may have been the reason for passing the Act I could not justify an order that the appellant pay the costs of the proceedings because of any advantage or benefit obtained by the appellant under the Act or any hardship or prejudice occasioned thereby to the respondents. If the law as declared in the Ontario Municipal Board Amendment Act must be deemed to have had force and effect at the time of the commencement of the action, then in my opinion the action would have been properly dismissed with costs to be paid by the plaintiff's to the defendant. Likewise, an appeal, if any, from such a judgment would have been dismissed with costs. I think that in the circumstances of this case the alteration of the opinion of this Court as delivered orally and an order that the judgement at trial be set aside and the action dismissed cannot be attributed directly or indirectly, either wholly or in part, to either party. It is simply the result of a change in the law as made by the Ontario Municipal Board Amendment Act. In the circumstances I would not order the payment of costs by either of the parties at trial or in this court.

My conclusion is that the judgement of this Court delivered orally should be withdrawn forthwith; that it should be set aside and in place thereof an order should be made that the appeal to this Court be allowed; that the judgement at trial should be set aside and in place thereof, that the action should be dismissed; and there should be no order as to costs of the action or in this Court.

SCHROEDER, J.A.:-- I agree with the disposition of this appeal as proposed by the Honourable Mr. Justice Laidlaw for the reasons expressed by him, except as to the disposition of costs. In the state of the law as it was at the time of the institution of these actions, and the appeal from the judgement at trial, the plaintiffs were fully warranted in taking the proceedings brought and continued by them. I therefore deem it proper to exercise my discretion with respect to costs in favour of the plaintiffs and accorkingly I would direct that they should have the costs of the actions and of the appeals down to the defendant's motion to this Court for a rehearing, as to the costs of which latter proceeding I would make no order. Save as aforesaid, I concur in the judgement of my brother Laidlaw.

McGILLIVRAY, J.A.:-- Other than as to costs I concur with the disposition of this action by Laidlaw, J.A.; and I concur with Schroeder, J.A., as to costs.

Civil procedure -- Trial -- Re-opening of trial -- Trial judge who has not been rendered functus by taking out of formal order having untrammelled discretion to re-open trial to hear new evidence -- Fundamental consideration being avoidance of miscarriage of justice -- Proof not required that evidence could not have been obtained for trial with exercise of reasonable diligence.

In an action for recovery of rent, the landlord and the tenant adduced conflicting evidence as to the landlord's mitigation of damages, the tenant claiming that the premises were re-leased before the end of the term of the lease and the landlord denying this. The trial judge accepted the landlord's evidence. After reasons for judgment were delivered but before the formal judgment had been taken out, the tenant moved to re- open the trial on the grounds of the discovery of new evidence (two unsworn statements which supported the tenant's allegation that the premises were re-leased before the end of the term) and a new legal argument on the issue of interest. While the new evidence would have affected the outcome of the trial, it could have been obtained before trial by the exercise of reasonable diligence. The question was whether there was any requirement that the evidence could not have been available for introduction at trial with the exercise of reasonable diligence where the application to introduce new evidence is made to the trial judge before he has been rendered functus by the taking out of a formal order.

Held, the application should be allowed.

A trial judge who has not yet been rendered functus has untrammelled discretion in determining whether to re-open a trial so as to ensure that a miscarriage of justice does not occur. There is no basis for fettering a trial judge who has not become functus with the same rules which apply to courts of appeal. In particular, there is no basis for a requirement of proof that the evidence could not have been obtained for the trial with the exercise of reasonable diligence. This was an appropriate case for the re-opening of the trial to permit the hearing of the proposed evidence.

Since the tenant failed to show that the point of law which he wished to argue was prima facie meritorious, that aspect of the trial should not be re-opened.

APPLICATION to re-open a trial before the formal judgment was taken out.

A. Irvin Schein and Ian J. Cantor, for plaintiff.

Adrian Hill, for defendants.

DENNIS LANE J.:-- This is a motion to re-open a trial which I heard on November 21, 1990 and in which I delivered reasons for judgment on November 30, 1990. The formal judgment has not been taken out. The grounds argued by the defendants to re-open the case are the discovery of new evidence and a new legal argument on the matter of interest.

The action was on a lease dated November 15, 1979 between Regency Investments Limited as landlord (subsequently succeeded by the plaintiff) and "Hubert Lam of Scarborough, Ontario, carrying on business as Lam Skin Care Products Ltd." as tenant. The term of the lease expired December 27, 1989. The tenant moved out in late 1988 and the suit essentially was to recover the rent for the year 1989. The major issue in the case was the identity of the tenant, the corporate entity or the individual defendant. I found the individual defendant to be the tenant. The only other defence pleaded was that the plaintiff interfered with the efforts of the defendant to sublet the property. This defence was not pursued at trial.

At trial counsel for the tenant contended that the tenant's obligation to pay rent should cease at August 31, 1989 because there was evidence that the premises were occupied by a real estate company, Century 21, as tenant by that date. The evidence relied on was that of Mr. and Mrs. Lam, each of whom testified to having passed the building in about September 1989 and going up to look at the premises. Mrs. Lam said she saw people and office furniture and a Century 21 sign. Mr. Lam said he saw a reception, desks all set up as a business office and people working. The plaintiff's evidence, from its president Mr. Fishman, was that no new tenant was obtained in 1989 and that while Century 21 occupied other space in 1989, it had people in the Lam space only from January 1990. Mr. Reoch, the plaintiff's real estate agent, said he did everything he could to lease the space but got no new tenant in 1989. In September 1989, he was still advertising the Lam space for lease.

There was thus a conflict of credibility. In the reasons I delivered on November 30, 1990, I preferred the evidence of Mr. Fishman and Mr. Reoch to the evidence of the Lams on the point. It was also the case that there had been no pleading of any occupation by the landlord in breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment.

It was common ground between the parties that the Lam premises were renovated by the landlord in the summer of 1989. Counsel for the defendant took no point as a result of this renovation because he recognized that it was a necessary step to render the premises suitable for leasing to a new occupant.

The new evidence which is offered on the issue of the occupation of the leased premises by Century 21 is outlined in two unsworn statements dated in January 1991. Domenico Colapietro says that he is the janitor in the building in question and that the Lam premises were occupied in September or at the latest October 1989 by Beverly Hills Realty Corporation (Beverly Hills), a Century 21 real estate office. Rosanna Rocci says that she is a part time sales representative of Beverly Hills working in the subject building. She says that in the summer of 1989 Beverly Hills, which had occupied the third floor of the building, moved to the second floor space formerly occupied by the defendants. She says that by October 1989 the entire Lam Skin Care premises were occupied by Beverly Hills.

If the evidence of Colapietro and Rocci had been presented to me at trial and had survived cross-examination, it seems probable to me that I would have preferred the sum total of the evidence of the Lams, Colapietro and Rocci to the evidence of Fishman and Reoch. Since I have not seen either Colapietro or Rocci in order to assess their credibility, I cannot be certain of this. Further, if counsel for the defendant had been armed with the statements which he now has from these witnesses for the purpose of cross-examining Fishman and Reoch, he might have succeeded in shaking their evidence. In presenting his argument to me on this motion, counsel for the defendant, who was the trial counsel, quite candidly stated that he could not say that the evidence was not available to him prior to the trial in November 1990. He said he made a judgment that the evidence of Mr. and Mrs. Lam would be believed. Accordingly, he did not seek out people such as Colapietro and Rocci to bolster the Lams' evidence.

On these facts, the proffered evidence meets the first test employed in the cases to be cited below; that it would probably have affected the outcome of the trial. However, if the test for admission of new evidence includes a requirement that the evidence could not have been available for introduction to the trial with the exercise of reasonable diligence, the applicant cannot meet it. Is there any such requirement where the application to introduce new evidence is made to the trial judge before he has been rendered functus by the taking out of the formal order embodying his judgment?

An extensive discussion of the legal principles involved in an application such as this can be found in Clayton v. British American Securities Ltd. (1934), 1934 CanLII 229 (BC CA), 49 B.C.R. 28, [1935] 1 D.L.R. 432, [1934] 3 W.W.R. 257 (C.A.). After written judgment had been handed down but before entry of the judgment, the defendant moved the trial judge for an order to permit further evidence on the main issue in the case. It was held that it was open to the trial judge, prior to entry of judgment to re-open. At pp. 440-41 D.L.R., Macdonald J.A. said:

> My view has always been that the trial Judge might resume the hearing of an action apart from rules until entry of judgment but as it was vigorously combatted I have given it careful consideration. The point, as far as I know, has not been squarely decided; at least by any cases binding upon us. It is, I think, a salutary rule to leave unfettered discretion to the trial Judge. He would of course discourage unwarranted attempts to bring forward new evidence available at the trial to disturb the basis of a judgment delivered or to permit a litigant after discovering the effect of a judgment to re-establish a broken-down case with the aid of further proof. If the power is not exercised sparingly and with the greatest care fraud and abuse of the Court's processes would likely result. Without that power however injustice might occur. If, e.g., a document should be discovered after pronouncement of judgment -- but before entry showing that the judgment was wrong and the trial Judge was convinced of its authenticity no lack of diligence by solicitor in producing it earlier should serve to perpetuate an injustice. The prudent course is to permit the trial Judge to exercise untrammelled discretion relying upon trained experience to prevent abuse, the fundamental consideration being that a miscarriage of justice does not occur.
> There are reasons for rules governing the admission of evidence by an Appellate Court, not applicable to a trial Judge. Hearing new evidence is a departure from its usual procedure and it is fitting that departures in ordinary practice should be limited by rules to prevent abuse. Entry of judgment may be merely a formality but it is necessary that at some arbitrary point the jurisdiction of the trial Judge should end. A vested right to a judgment is then obtained subject to a right to appeal and should not be lightly jeopardized. Before the gate is closed by entry a trial Judge is in a better position to exercise discretion apart from rules than an Appellate Court. He knows the factors in the case that influenced his decision and can more readily determine the weight that should be given to new evidence offered. I may add that he might well be guided, although not bound by the rules referred to.

In the following pages Macdonald J.A. extensively reviewed the authorities in England on the re-opening of trials after decision but before entry of judgment. He concluded that there was no basis in the English authorities for fettering a trial judge who has not yet become functus with the same rules which applied to courts of appeal. In particular, there was no basis for a requirement of proof that the evidence could not have been obtained for the trial with the exercise of reasonable diligence. He acknowledged that a trial judge should proceed with caution and should inquire into the circumstances of the discovery of the evidence, but that, having done so, his discretion was untrammelled by the rules that applied to courts of appeal.

The reasoning of the British Columbia Court of Appeal is persuasive. It is argued, however, that there is Ontario authority to the contrary. My attention is drawn to Bauz v. Registrar of Motor Vehicles, [1950] O.W.N. 386 (H.C.J.); Scott v. Cook, 1970 CanLII 331 (ON SC), [1970] 2 O.R. 769, 12 D.L.R. (3d) 113 (H.C.J.); Whitehall Development Corp. v. Walker (1977), 1977 CanLII 1249 (ON CA), 17 O.R. (2d) 241, 4 C.P.C. 97 (C.A.) and 394363 Ontario Ltd. v. Fuda (1983), 1984 CanLII 1994 (ON SC), 42 O.R. (2d) 779 (Master) [revd (1984), 44 O.R. (2d) 698 (Div. Ct.)].

In Bauz, Wells J. decided the case primarily on the character of the evidence test and only secondarily referred to diligence. He found the evidence would not have substantially altered his view of the matter in issue. He noted that the proposed witnesses -- a doctor and his patient the plaintiff -- had both given evidence at trial but neither had mentioned the matter now sought to be introduced. He declined to exercise his discretion. The Clayton case was not drawn to his attention. The only authority referred to was Hosking v. Terry (1862), 15 Moo. P.C.C. 493, 15 E.R. 581, 10 W.R. 884 (P.C.), at pp. 503-04 Moo. P.C.C., which was a case in which the new evidence was not proffered until the case had already been appealed to the Supreme Court of New South Wales and thence to the Privy Council. For these reasons, I do not view Bauz as a definitive decision on the point before me.

Whitehall was a case where the Senior Master had given summary judgment. The order was taken out. An appeal to the Divisional Court was dismissed as was an application to the Court of Appeal for leave to appeal. Only at this stage was the new evidence brought forward in a motion before Van Camp J. to set aside the senior master's order. Her refusal to do so was upheld in the Court of Appeal in part because the evidence could have been ascertained by the exercise of reasonable diligence in time for the trial. This is clearly not a case like the one before me, where the motion is made to me as trial judge while I am still seized of the case.

Fuda is a decision of Master Peppiatt on an application to re-open a summary judgment which had not been taken out, in order to admit new evidence and argue a new point of law. Much of the case was concerned with whether the master, as opposed to a judge, could make such an order. Dealing with the issue of the circumstances under which such an order might be made, the master adopted the test set out in Whitehall and then referred to the decision of Master Sandler in Saginur v. Sbrocchi (1979), 12 C.P.C. 21 (Ont. Master) at p. 23 where that learned master set out a test similar to that in Whitehall and including a reasonable diligence requirement.

In Saginur after summary judgment had been granted but before the judgment was taken out, the defendant applied to file a new affidavit of merits disclosing new facts. The learned master applied a reasonable diligence test. In doing so, he reasoned by analogy to then Rule 529 of the Rules of Practice, R.R.O. 1970, Reg. 545, which he recognized applied to judgments that had already been issued and entered. Although a number of cases were reviewed by the master, primarily relating to motions to replace one affidavit of merits by another, none of the cases relating to re-opening a trial -- Bauz, Clayton or Scott -- were drawn to his attention.

The principal case relied on before me by the respondents was Scott v. Cook, supra, where Grant J. heard and decided a motor vehicle case. Before the judgment was taken out, the plaintiff applied to him as trial judge to re-open the trial and admit further evidence. He heard the proposed evidence and concluded that it would have been of little help at the trial and would not have altered the decision already given. He then reviewed the law, beginning at p. 773 O.R., p. 117 D.L.R., with the statement:

> On an application to the trial Judge to receive further evidence after reasons for judgment have been delivered but before entry of judgment, he is not restrained by the strict rule that prevails on an application to the Court of Appeal for a new trial.

He continued by citing from Bauz, supra, Wells J.'s reference to the test relating to the character of the evidence but not the reference to reasonable diligence. Next he referred to Marchyshyn v. Fane Auto Works Ltd., 1932 CanLII 281 (AB CA), [1932] 4 D.L.R. 618, [1932] 3 W.W.R. 232 (Alta. C.A.), from which he cited the passage (at p. 620 D.L.R.) relating to the character of the evidence, but not the immediately preceding passage relating to reasonable diligence. Marchyshyn was an application to the Court of Appeal and the standard of reasonable diligence clearly applied.

Grant J. then quoted from Clayton the two passages quoted by me earlier in these reasons. He concluded that all these cases showed that the test as to the character of the evidence was more stringent in an application to the Court of Appeal than in one made to the trial judge. An applicant to the trial judge must show that the new evidence, if presented at trial, would probably have changed the result, whereas on an appeal the applicant must show the evidence to be conclusive or practically so and not merely corroborative. He then said [p. 774 O.R.], in the passage primarily relied on by the respondent before me:

> In both instances the party must also prove that such evidence could not have been obtained by reasonable diligence before the trial.

He concluded his reasons with a summary of the position as he drew it from the authorities (pp. 774-75 O.R., pp. 118-19 D.L.R.):

> (1) The trial Judge should have unfettered discretion in this matter so as to ensure that a miscarriage of justice does not occur;
>
> (2) before entry of a judgment, the trial Judge is in a better position to exercise that discretion than is an appellate Court. The trial Judge knows the factors in the case that influenced his decision and can more readily determine the weight that should be given to the new evidence offered;
>
> (3) the authorities indicate that a trial Judge can always reconsider his decision until the judgment is drawn up and entered;
>
> (4) the trial Judge is the one in the best position to judge the bearing of the new or further evidence upon the case in light of the evidence already heard;
> (5) once a litigant has obtained a judgment, he is entitled not to be deprived of it without very solid grounds.

Grant J. in Scott was clearly focusing on the test relating to the character of the evidence. That was the basis on which he decided the case; indeed, at p. 770 O.R., p. 114 D.L.R., he records that counsel for the respondents did not challenge the evidence as to diligence and expressly asked that the case be decided on the basis that the evidence was not of such a character that it should be admitted in the circumstances. No doubt this explains why the passages as to reasonable diligence from Bauz and Marchyshyn were not quoted by him and why there is no analysis of that requirement but merely the flat statement that reasonable diligence is required. That statement is not easy to reconcile with the subsequent five-point summary. In these circumstances I think I do nothing disrespectful of that learned judge when I say that that particular passage appears to me to be both obiter and not the considered result of analysis of the authorities.

Accordingly, no Ontario authority has been put before me by counsel which prevents me from adopting the view of the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Clayton as the law of Ontario in the narrow set of circumstances here presented.

I am conscious that a diligence requirement is a salutary one and in most cases I would expect trial judges would scrutinize the circumstances of the discovery of the evidence with care being, as Macdonald J.A. suggests, guided but not bound by the rules applicable to appellate courts. But in the final analysis, it appears to me that the Clayton rule is appropriate [p. 441 D.L.R.]:

> The prudent course is to permit the trial Judge to exercise untrammelled discretion relying upon trained experience to prevent abuse, the fundamental consideration being that a miscarriage of justice does not occur.

Applying my discretion to the case at bar I note that:

1. The proposed evidence, while corroborative of the evidence of the Lams, is not simply further one-time observations of other people in the Lam space, but evidence of actual occupation for business purposes, in one case from an employee of the new tenant;

2. If accepted by me, such proposed evidence would probably have led to the conclusion that the plaintiff was in breach of the lease and may well not be entitled to rent for October- December, an amount of some $20,000;

3. The alleged occupation began, if at all, after examination for discovery had taken place. It is said that at the discovery questions were objected to on the subject of the occupation of the premises and no motion was brought to require answers. While, for this reason, there may, strictly speaking, have been no obligation under the rules to disclose the alleged changes in the facts, the court should not encourage any such practice of non-disclosure of material facts;

4. It is admitted that the evidence could have been brought to court for the trial had counsel thought it necessary;

5. If the proposed evidence is ultimately accepted, the court has been misled -- perhaps deliberately -- by the evidence of the plaintiff's witnesses;

6. To the extent that there has been expense which would not have been incurred if the evidence had been brought at trial, a remedy in costs is at hand.

Weighing up these factors, and bearing in mind that the primary objective is to avoid a miscarriage of justice, I direct that the trial be re-opened to permit the hearing of the proposed evidence and any reply evidence the plaintiff may wish to call upon the issue of the use and occupation of the premises in September, October, November and December 1989. If necessary, the pleadings may be amended to raise this issue.

There is a further issue. The defence wishes to present argument that the lease interest rate of 2 per cent per month is contrary to the Interest Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-15, and the plaintiff is thereby restricted to 5 per cent per annum. The applicant cited only ss. 4 and 5 of the Interest Act. The respondent plaintiff cited a number of cases to support the view that the Interest Act applies only to interest arising out of an agreement to extend time for payment of a loan or purchase price in return for payment of interest and not to interest paid, in effect as damages, for a wrongful withholding of money which ought to have been paid: see Mitsui & Co. v. Ocelot Industries Ltd. (1986), 1986 ABCA 39 (CanLII), 43 Alta. L.R. (2d) 189, 68 A.R. 120, [1986] 3 W.W.R. 337 (C.A.); Urichuk v. Code Hunter (1986), 1986 ABCA 65 (CanLII), 68 A.R. 128 (C.A.). There is no allegation here that there was any agreement to extend the time for payment of rent in return for interest; the claim is clearly for interest in consequence of failure to pay rent on time.

There was no plea of this point in the statement of defence and no explanation has been suggested for the failure to raise it earlier. Unlike the occupation issue, nothing has changed since the action began. An applicant for such relief must be prepared to show that the point of law is at least prima facie meritorious. This has not been shown; indeed, the cases cited show the contrary. I decline to re-open this aspect of the trial.

The parties should speak to the trial co-ordinator to have the action placed upon my list at the earliest possible date. Costs are reserved for disposition at the end of the re-opened trial.

Application allowed.

Ontario High Court of Justice
Sutherland J.
December 30, 1987.

[QL Ed. note: In the paper version, the oral decision of Rosenberg J. in this matter, rendered July 30, 1987, was incorporated within the judgment of Sutherland J., beginning at 1987 CanLII 4189 (ON SC), 61 O.R. (2d) 690. The two decisions have been separated in the online version to enable linking to citators. The following headnote was published on the combined case and applies to both decisions.]

Civil procedure -- Costs -- Security -- Insufficient assets in province -- Burden on plaintiff to show undisclosed assets or impecuniosity -- Showing of impecuniosity requiring examination of merits -- Merits not determined from pleadings alone -- Where evidence of impecuniosity insufficient no need to examine merits -- Rule 56.01(d).

Courts -- Jurisdiction -- Provincial superior court -- High Court judge sitting in weekly court lacking jurisdiction to set aside order of other High Court judges.

The plaintiff appealed an order for security for costs and the appeal was allowed on the grounds of plaintiff's impecuniosity. The judge hearing the appeal, having learned before the order was taken out that, from the point of view of one of the parties, the argument had not been completed when he adjourned, quashed his decision and referred the matter for rehearing. The judge rehearing the matter dismissed the appeal. In his reasons he held: (1) security for costs are awarded where the plaintiff has insufficient assets within the province to pay the costs; (2) the burden then shifts to the plaintiff to show either undisclosed assets or impecuniosity; (3) since impecuniosity would halt the action, the merits should be looked at to see if this would be just; (4) where the evidence of impecuniosity is insufficient to permit the master to determine whether or not the plaintiff is able to obtain the money to post security, the need to consider the merits does not arise; (5) nor can the merits be assessed on the basis of the pleadings alone.

The plaintiff moved in weekly court to quash the last decision as well as the decision to refer the matter for rehearing, and to restore the original decision allowing the appeal from the master. In the alternative the plaintiff asked for leave to appeal to the Divisional Court.

Held, the motion should be dismissed.

A judge in weekly court lacks jurisdiction to set aside an order of another High Court judge, at least where the order was not made ex parte and there is no allegation of fraud upon the other judges, nor any allegation of an error in calculation on the face of an order. Nor were there grounds for granting leave to appeal. The first judge had jurisdiction to vary or withdraw his order and refer the matter for rehearing. There was no reason to believe the decision of the second judge was wrong nor were there conflicting decisions.

MOTION (1) to quash an order of Rosenberg J., dismissing, after a rehearing, an appeal of an order for security for costs; (2) to quash an order of Hollingworth J. setting aside his own order, 1987 CanLII 4401 (ON SC), 60 O.R. (2d) 185, and referring to the matter for rehearing; (3) to reinstate Hollingworth J.'s first order allowing the appeal; (4) in the alternative for leave to appeal to the Divisional Court.

SUTHERLAND J.:-- This motion is brought with respect to an appeal from the April 3, 1987 order of Master Peterson made under rule 56.01 and requiring the plaintiff corporation to provide security for the costs of the defendant. Under the order of the learned master the plaintiff was required to post security of $25,000 of which $8,000 was to be posted within 60 days of the order, and a further $17,000 within 30 days of the action being set down for trial. That order further provided that until security was posted the plaintiff was not to take any further step in the proceeding except for examinations of the defendant for discovery and except for an appeal of the order itself.

The plaintiff's appeal of the order came on on June 12, 1987, before the Honourable Mr. Justice Hollingworth who, on June 25th, released written reasons for an order allowing the appeal. After the release of those reasons counsel for the defendant wrote to Hollingworth J. expressing the view that the hearing had not been completed on June 12th but was to have been adjourned to a date in July, to allow for further submissions and argument, especially by the defendant. After receipt of that letter Hollingworth J. informed counsel that he would allow them an opportunity to make further submissions, and he instructed that in the interim no order was to be taken out on the basis of his reasons released on June 25th.

By a further letter counsel for the defendant suggested that it would be preferable to have the appeal heard by another weekly court judge. On July 23rd there was a further hearing before Hollingworth J., at which submissions were made as to the latter suggestion. After that hearing Hollingworth J. decided to withdraw his decision of June 25th and he endorsed the record on July 23rd to the effect that there would be a rehearing of the appeal, de novo, before the Honourable Mr. Justice Rosenberg on the following day, July 24th.

When the matter was called by Rosenberg J. an objection as to jurisdiction was brought by the plaintiff, by way of a notice of motion dated July 24, 1987. Rosenberg J. reserved his decision on the motion and adjourned the appeal until the afternoon. On his return after lunch Rosenberg J. informed counsel that Hollingworth J. had made an addition to his July 23rd endorsement, the addition stating as follows: "A.H.H. I have decided to quash my decision." Rosenberg J. proceeded to hear the appeal de novo and on July 30th issued reasons dismissing the appeal and reinstating the master's order requiring the plaintiff to post security, with the variation that the first $8,000 was to be paid by September 22, 1987.

Time estimated for the hearing of this motion

The defendant, in order to protect its position, had served and filed within the prescribed time-limit a notice of application for leave to appeal from the June 25, 1987 decision of Hollingworth J. allowing the appeal from the master. That application was scheduled to come on for hearing on September 2, 1987, and it was estimated that it would have taken one and a half hours. When the defendant later abandoned that appeal (of a decision the defendant believed had been effectively withdrawn), the plaintiff was able to obtain the same date for the hearing of this motion. Notwithstanding that this motion covers a great deal more ground, the estimated time for the hearing of it was increased by a mere half-hour, making the total estimated time for the hearing two hours, i.e., the maximum estimated time for a regular weekly court motion or application. Matters estimated to take longer than two hours are classified, as is well known, as long motions and go on a different, and often slower, list or are made the subject of special arrangements. The court records show that this matter was heard on parts of three days -- and the total time of hearing was several times the estimated two hours. I tried to minimize the resulting inconvenience to counsel scheduled to appear on other matters in that court -- by commencing early on the second day and by adjourning this matter to the end of the list for that day, by the time we had reached the normal time of commencement, and by sitting later that day, and by commencing the hearing of the next matter as soon as the hearing of this one was completed on the third day. Despite those efforts it is clear that not only the court but several counsel on other matters were significantly inconvenienced by the gross and colourably self-serving under-estimate of the time required for this motion.

Order sought by moving party

As stated in the notice of motion dated July 29, 1987, the moving party (plaintiff) seeks:

> (a) an Order quashing the decision of Mr. Justice Rosenberg, dated July 24, 1987 and quashing the decisions of Justice Hollingworth dated July 23, 1987 and July 24, 1987;
> (b) an Order reinstating the decision of Mr. Justice Hollingworth, dated June 25, 1987;

(c) an Order requiring the Defendant to attend on Discovery regardless of the proceedings herein, and pursuant to the Order of Master Peterson dated April 3, 1987;

(d) in the alternative, leave to appeal to the Divisional Court from the Judgment of Mr. Justice Rosenberg dated July 24, 1987;

(e) in the further alternative, an Order to receive further evidence by Affidavit of Don McGinnis; and

(f) such further and other relief as this Court may deem just.

The application for relief made in para. (e) above was abandoned at the hearing, on the basis that it is properly brought to the court appealed to, if leave to appeal is granted, and so I have nothing more to say about it.

Requested order re attendance on discovery

Before I turn to a consideration of my jurisdiction to set aside orders of fellow judges of this court (and I believe that if there is such a jurisdiction the term "to set aside" would be appropriate and the term "to quash" inappropriate), I wish to deal with para. (c) set forth above, i.e., the request for an order that the defendant attend on discovery regardless of the other proceedings herein.

The master had permitted examinations for discovery to be proceeded with before any security for costs was posted. Hollingworth J. first issued reasons that would have allowed the appeal from the master's order as to security for costs, and subsequently he withdrew or purported to withdraw his order. The motion brought by the plaintiff before Rosenberg J. on July 24th included a motion for an order requiring the defendants to attend on discovery. The reasons of Rosenberg J. make no reference to the discovery question and the record does not show whether it was expressly dealt with by him elsewhere. Rosenberg J. dismissed, or purported to dismiss, the appeal from the order of the master, and the plaintiff contends that that means, either under the order of the master or under the first decision of Hollingworth J. herein allowing the appeal from the master there is no reason for not proceeding with the discoveries.

Counsel for the respondent bank points out that this part of the motion could be brought before a master, and that is acknowledged by counsel for the moving party. Moreover, there was no disputing of the assertion by counsel for the respondent that no proper material has been served on the respondent in respect of the alleged failure by the defendant to comply with a proper notice of appointment, in the sense that no affidavit (upon which there could be cross-examination seeking to show the impropriety of the notice of appointment) has ever been served. Counsel for the respondent asserts that the appointment was served for the wrong city and that if proper material were served she would be able to cross-examine with a view to establishing that.

Even if the time estimate for this motion had been much more accurate I would have dismissed this aspect of the motion without prejudice to the applicant's right to bring such a motion before the master on proper material. The woefully inaccurate time estimate might itself have been a reason for refusing to deal with this aspect of the motion even if proper material had been served and filed and an opportunity afforded for cross-examination thereon. Counsel for the moving party acknowledged that he found it more convenient to bring forward all matters in the same proceeding. Given that he was squeezing (if that is the appropriate term when the container bursts) this matter into a slight expansion of a time slot reserved for an obviously briefer matter, his blithe preference for his own convenience has little to commend it.

This aspect of the motion is dismissed without prejudice to the right, if any, of the applicant to bring such a motion before the master on proper notice and material.

Jurisdiction to hear and deal with this motion

It is clear, and not disputed, that under rule 62.02(1) the alternative relief, on application for leave to appeal the interlocutory order of Rosenberg J. to the Divisional Court, is properly brought before another High Court judge. With respect to the main relief sought by the moving party, that of setting aside orders of Hollingworth J. and Rosenberg J., I questioned whether one High Court judge sitting in weekly court had jurisdiction to set aside an order of another High Court judge, at least where, as here, the order in question was not made ex parte and there is no allegation of fraud upon the other judges, nor any allegation of an error in calculation apparent on the face of an order.

Counsel for both parties expressed the view that I had jurisdiction, except as stated above with respect to para. (e) of the notice of motion. Their reasons are, however, quite divergent.

Ms. Grossman, for the respondent, expressed with admirable clarity and economy, the view that, properly considered, the aspect of the motion as to which I found jurisdiction troubling, was not really a motion to set aside orders of my fellow judges of this court but an application for leave to appeal to those orders. Counsel points out that none of the orders have been entered. In her submission the reasons pronounced by Hollingworth J. have been withdrawn by him as he, acting judicially, had the right and power to do, and so exist no more. In the alternative, it is submitted that the decision of Hollingworth J. to withdraw his decision and to refer the matter to Rosenberg J. to be dealt with, de novo, is itself an interlocutory order of a High Court judge and so not appealable except by leave of another High Court judge, under Rule 62, the appeal, if such leave be granted, being to the Divisional Court. The order of Rosenberg J. is submitted to be another interlocutory order and subject to the same rule. At one level these submissions appear to pose the difficulty that they would make jurisdiction to enter upon the inquiry depend upon the (confidently predicted) result of the inquiry. It may be questioned whether the court could thus be said to be giving itself jurisdiction by, to use an old expression, hoisting itself by its own bootstraps. However, I do not believe that does justice to Ms. Grossman's argument. Her submissions as to jurisdiction do not depend on which way the court answers what she regards as the only proper question, i.e., whether or not to grant leave to appeal. Her submissions focus on what is the proper question and amount to an assertion that, because the applicant is wrong in its contention that Hollingworth J. lacked jurisdiction to withdraw his reasons of June 25th, and in its contention that Rosenberg J. either did not have jurisdiction to embark upon the hearing of the motion or lost jurisdiction by seeking a further endorsement by Hollingworth J., none of the July orders are nullities and therefore as interlocutory orders they can be attacked only by way of an application for leave to appeal. Those submissions would alone have been enough to cause me to embark upon the inquiry, reserving decision on the question of jurisdiction until the other submissions were made.

On behalf of the moving party Mr. Vandor made two main submissions in support of the position that I had jurisdiction to set aside the July orders referred to above. The first submission or group of submissions sought to establish that a single judge of the High Court sitting in weekly court had jurisdiction to set aside or declare null the impugned orders, on the basis of the interaction of a number of rules none of which, taken singly, would, or was asserted to, confer jurisdiction for such purposes. This submission involved quick oral references to a number of rules and was presented without the assistance of any written outline, in a factum or elsewhere, that could have been reviewed by me beforehand, or used as an aide memoire after or during the hearing. I am not able from my notes as supplemented from memory soon after the hearing to reconstruct the argument, but I do recall clearly that my conclusion at the time was that it was complex and unconvincing. I was reminded of the observation of the great French mathematician, Poincare, to the effect that if a mathematical equation looks elegant it is probably correct.

One of the provisions relied on by counsel for the moving party on the question of my jurisdiction is subrule 59.06(2), which states, as follows:

59.06(2) A party who seeks to,

(a) have an order set aside or varied on the ground of fraud or of facts arising or discovered after it was made;

(b) suspend the operation of an order;

(c) carry an order into operation; or

(d) obtain other relief than that originally awarded,

may make a motion in the proceeding for the relief claimed.

It was acknowledged on behalf of the moving party that in this case there was not at any stage evidence of fraud relating to the order for security for costs, nor any evidence of facts arising or discovered after the decision of the master dealt with by Rosenberg J. or subsequent to the decision of Rosenberg J. The conditions precedent to an order under cl. (a) of subrule 59.06(2)(are thus not met and in my opinion this motion cannot be brought within that paragraph. Nor in my opinion does cl. (d) authorize a motion for the relief sought.

On behalf of the moving party reference was also made on the question of my jurisdiction, to the provisions of rule 37.14 and especially to subrule (4) thereof. For convenience of reference that subrule and subrule 37.14(1) are set out below:

37.14(1) A person who,

(a) is affected by an order obtained on motion without notice;

(b) fails to appear on a motion through accident, mistake or insufficient notice; or

(c) is affected by an order of a registrar, may move to set aside or vary the order, by a notice of motion that is served forthwith after the order comes to the person's attention and names the first available hearing date that is at least three days after service of the notice of motion.

. . . . .

(4) A motion under subrule (1) or any other rule to set aside, vary or amend an order of a judge, local judge or master in a proceeding in the High Court or District Court may be made,

(a) to the judge or master who made it, at any place; or

(b) where the order was made by,

(i) a High Court judge, to any other High Court judge,

(ii) a local judge, to any other local judge or a High Court judge,

(iii) a District Court judge, to any other District Court judge, or

(iv) a master, to any other master or a local judge, at any place in accordance with rule 37.03 (place of hearing of motions).

I cannot agree that subrule 37.14(4) is a free-standing grant of jurisdiction; it supplements subrule 37.14(1), "or any other rule to set aside, vary or amend an order of a judge, local judge or master in a proceeding in the High Court or District Court", by stating to what court a motion otherwise authorized may be made, but it is not of itself a provision sufficient to confer jurisdiction. Here the moving party has not brought itself within subrule 37.14(1) nor within any of the other rules referred to in subrule 37.14(4), and so that subrule does not help it. Two of the links in Mr. Vandor's chain being not applicable, this branch of the argument fails.

In the second branch of his submission as to my jurisdiction, Mr. Vandor pointed out that although sitting in weekly court I was also designated as a judge of the Divisional Court and so had jurisdiction to deal with this motion if it was directed to me after it was declared by the Chief Justice or Associate Chief Justice of the High Court, acting pursuant to cl. 16(2) (c) of the Courts of Justice Act, 1984 (Ont.), c. 11, to be a matter that can and ought to be heard and determined by one judge. I have two difficulties with that submission. The first is that I have seen nothing to indicate that such a declaration was made with respect to this motion. If that were the only difficulty I would be prepared to assume that the matter would not have come before me without such a declaration having been made. However, the second difficulty is more formidable. It is that Mr. Vandor has not directed my attention to anything that would lead me to believe that this motion, in so far as it is a motion to set aside interlocutory orders by judges of the High Court, can properly be regarded as "a proceeding in the Divisional Court" within the meaning of cl. 16(2)(c), and so eligible under that clause to be directed by the Chief Justice or the Associate Chief Justice to a single judge of the Divisional Court. It has not been established how the matter gets to be a Divisional Court proceeding in the first place. The Divisional Court is a statutory court and its jurisdiction, except for that conferred by other statutes, is that conferred by s. 15 of the Courts of Justice Act, 1984. As I read that section there is nothing in it that confers upon the Divisional Court a jurisdiction to entertain directly, i.e., without a prior application for leave, a motion to set aside an interlocutory order of a High Court judge. With regard to such orders it appears that the only jurisdiction of the Divisional Court is that conferred by cl. 15(1)(b) of the Courts of Justice Act, 1984, in the following terms:

> 15(1) Subject to the Divorce Act (Canada), an appeal lies to the Divisional Court from,
> . . . . .
> (b) an interlocutory order of a judge of the High Court, with leave as provided in the Rules of Civil Procedure, other than an order made on an appeal from the District Court;

Accordingly, I conclude that this matter cannot be a proceeding in the Divisional Court and so cannot be directed to a single judge of that court under cl. 16(2)(c) of the Courts of Justice Act, 1984. It follows that this motion comes before me only in my capacity as a High Court judge. Thus, with respect to the remaining parts of this motion, the only question properly before me is whether or not to grant leave to appeal one or more of the July orders of Hollingworth J. and Rosenberg J.

I dispense with any requirement that the orders be settled and entered before the question of leave is considered.

The moving party has submitted that Hollingworth J. and Rosenberg J. did not have jurisdiction to make the above- mentioned orders purported to have been made by them in July. Before moving on to the leave to appeal application, I shall comment briefly on those jurisdiction questions.

Jurisdiction of Hollingworth J. and Rosenberg J. to make their orders herein

It is not disputed that Hollingworth J. had jurisdiction to enter upon and to dispose of the appeal from the master. As stated above, the moving party challenges the legal capacity of Hollingworth J. to withdraw his June 25, 1987 reasons as he purported to do on July 23, 1987. Prior to July 23rd, Hollingworth J. had directed that, until further order, no order was to be entered in respect of his June 25th reasons for allowing the appeal from the master.

It is the submission of the moving party that Hollingworth J. was functus officio before he purported, on July 23rd, to withdraw his "order" of June 25th, and accordingly that the July 23rd order is a nullity. Two main arguments are put forth in favour of that proposition. The first is based upon subrule 59.06(2), which states as follows:

59.06(2) A party who seeks to,

> (a) have an order set aside or varied on the ground of fraud or of facts arising or discovered after it was made;
>
> (b) suspend the operation of an order;
>
> (c) carry an order into operation; or
>
> (d) obtain other relief than that originally awarded, may make a motion in the proceeding for the relief claimed.

The focus of Mr. Vandor is upon cl. (a) above. It is asserted that there was no evidence of either fraud or further facts arising or discovered after the June 25th order was made, and before that the respondent had not met the tests in Re Cook and Morley [1950] O.W.N. 739, with the result that the defendants' "motion" to set aside or vary should have failed. The submission is that the proceeding was reopened merely to allow further argument, and that that is not a proper ground under the subrule. I am not at all persuaded by this argument. It appears to be based upon a confusion of the limited circumstances in which a party may apply, by motion, to reopen an order, even after the order is entered with, on the other hand, the right of a judge of this court to vary or withdraw his order on his own motion before the order is entered. Explicit in Mr. Vandor's submissions is the proposition that it was improper for the respondent to be in communication with Hollingworth J. after his reasons of June 25th were released, except by a motion under subrule 59.06(2). There is no foundation for that proposition either on the authorities or in common sense. There is evidence in the record, in August 25, 1987, of Jasper Meyers, who appeared for the defendant bank not only before Master Peterson but also before Hollingworth J. on June 12, 1987. From that affidavit it appears that the appeal from the master was scheduled to come on in weekly court before one judge but, because that judge's list was very long, it was transferred that day to the list of another judge who at approximately 3:25 p.m. informed counsel that as he would not reach it that day the matter was being transferred to Hollingworth J. The court records show that counsel actually began making submissions at 3:50 p.m. and that at 4:10 p.m. His Lordship informed counsel that he had a previously scheduled appointment at 4:15 p.m. It is not disputed that Hollingworth J. had little or no opportunity to review the papers before the hearing began. According to the affidavit of Mr. Meyers, Mr. Vandor was called upon and made opening remarks and was asked to sit down, whereupon Mr. Meyers was allowed to outline his position before he, in turn, was asked to sit down without finishing. According to that affidavit Mr. Vandor was given an opportunity to make a few more remarks, before Hollingworth J. stated that the argument would have to be completed at a later date, after he had had an opportunity to read the material filed on the appeal. Reportedly, Hollingworth J. stated that he would be in Ottawa for a couple of weeks at the end of June but could be available in the first week in July, and when both counsel indicated their availability they were told that they would hear from His Lordship's secretary about a specific date. The next thing Mr. Meyers heard on the matter was that the weekly court office had called to say that written reasons dated June 25, 1987, were ready to be picked up.

Mr. Meyer's first action on learning of the issue of the written reasons was to call Mr. Vandor by telephone. After Mr. Meyers and Mr. Vandor had exchanged correspondence, in which the former took the position that Hollingworth J. had stated clearly that the hearing of the appeal would be resumed, and the latter took the position that His Lordship had merely reserved the right to call counsel back if required, Mr. Meyers wrote to Hollingworth J., with copy to Mr. Vandor. There is no suggestion whatever of unethical conduct by Mr. Meyers. He obviously kept Mr. Vandor fully informed of his intention to contact Hollingworth J. Before he wrote to His Lordship, Mr. Meyers had received a letter from Mr. Vandor to the effect that the latter would not consent to a rehearing before Hollingworth J. or before another judge. Mr. Meyers' letter to His Lordship resulted in an invitation to counsel to appear before him on July 23rd. Mr. Vandor had previously expressed his willingness to attend and he did attend, I would think with full knowledge of what would be submitted by Mr. Meyers.

At the rehearing Hollingworth J. was faced with submissions by Mr. Meyers that he had not been given an opportunity to make his submissions at the previous hearing and that he had then been promised an opportunity to make submissions at a later date. Those submissions raised in clear form an issue of natural justice in that they amounted to an assertion that the fundamental tenet audi alteram partem, had not been adhered to.

I do not agree with the submission that this was a situation governed by subrule 59.06(2) or that in these circumstances Mr. Meyers' only proper recourse was to proceed by way of a formal notice of motion. The order not having been entered and there being a serious issue of want of material justice, it was quite proper in my opinion for Mr. Meyers to have brought the issue to the attention of His Lordship in the way that he did, by letter and after full notice to Mr. Vandor.

In my opinion subrule 59.06(2) was not intended to restrict the course of action of either counsel or judge in a case like this, and the submissions based on that subrule must be rejected.

That brings me to the question of whether Hollingworth J. was functus officio in the sense that he lacked jurisdiction to vary or withdraw his reasons or "order" of June 25th even though no order had been entered. Although he raised the issue not even Mr. Vandor asserted flatly that Hollingworth J. was functus officio. Instead, Mr. Vandor conceded, citing Billinkoff's Ltd. v. Mid West Construction (1969) Ltd., [1973] 5 W.W.R. 26 (Man. Co. Ct.), that until a judgment has been perfected by formal entry, a judge is not functus officio. However, citing Williams v. Adie (1966), 1966 CanLII 615 (BC CA), 57 W.W.R. 221 (B.C.C.A.), and Tozer v. New Brunswick (1985), 4 C.P.C. (2d) 164 (N.B.Q.B.) (the latter being a case in which the order had been entered), that such jurisdiction to vary is exercisable only in exceptional circumstances.

On this branch of his argument the moving party seeks to gain support from the fact that under the Rules of Civil Procedure (rules 1.03 and 59.01) an order is effective from the date on which it is made, unless it provides otherwise, whereas under the (former) Rules of Practice a judgment had effect from when it was made or pronounced and an order had effect only from when it was entered. As with so many of Mr. Vandor's submissions on this motion, this one does not stand up to scrutiny. The new rules treat judgments and orders in the same way. It follows logically that the jurisprudence developed earlier with respect to what, if anything, an issuing judge or court could do, of its own motion, about varying or withdrawing its judgment before entry thereof would now apply equally to orders. As Ms. Grossman observed, this is not an uncharted sea.

I am satisfied that Hollingworth J. had jurisdiction to vary or withdraw his "order" of June 25th, and that when he withdrew it on July 23rd he was acting judicially, to avoid any suggestion or appearance that because he had already expressed views in his written reasons he might not be disinterested if he reopened the matter and heard further submissions on behalf of the parties. I am also of the opinion that he was acting judicially in concluding that additional submissions should be heard.

There is abundant authority, including many decisions reviewed in Billinkoff's Ltd., supra, cited by the moving party for the proposition that a judgment can be reconsidered and varied or withdrawn before it is entered. In Tozer, also cited by the moving party, the jurisdiction to amend before entry was not questioned. Such a jurisdiction is quite independent of the rules, and of the fact that once entered an order takes effect from the time of its pronouncement. See in this regard Canadian Land & Emigration Co. v. Municipality of Dysart (1885), 9 O.R. 495, where, at p. 512, Ferguson J. stated as follows:

> We were all then of the opinion that, at any time before formal judgment issued by the Court, the judgment, or part of it, might be recalled and a term imposed, or a change made. It is, of course, not a desirable thing to do, but circumstances may well justify its being done.

See also Craig v. Kanseen, [1943] 1 All E.R. 108, where the Court of Appeal stated that a court has an inherent jurisdiction to set aside its own order and that where it moves to do so an appeal from the order is not necessary.

In my opinion Hollingworth J. was not functus officio when he withdrew his reasons, but had jurisdiction to do so and to refer the matter to Rosenberg J. for a hearing de novo. Those reasons being withdrawn there was no reason for Rosenberg J. not to embark upon the hearing of the appeal. When Rosenberg J. called the matter he was confronted with a motion by Mr. Vandor challenging his jurisdiction. He reserved his decision on that motion and recessed for lunch before embarking upon the hearing of the actual appeal. As stated, before returning after lunch, Rosenberg J. obtained a further endorsement of Hollingworth J. in the terms set forth above. Mr. Vandor contends that if Rosenberg J. had jurisdiction to hear the appeal he lost it when he obtained that further endorsement -- because by so doing he reinvolved Hollingworth J. and two judges cannot be seized of the same matter at the same time. I do not agree. I have two reasons, either of which is sufficient. The first is that Rosenberg J. had not, in fact, entered upon the hearing of the appeal until after the second, i.e., the July 24th endorsement by Hollingworth J., and so he was free to embark upon the hearing of the appeal when he did. The second is that even if Rosenberg J. had embarked upon the appeal before Hollingworth J. made his clarifying endorsement he would not have lost jurisdiction by seeking and obtaining such clarification. To hold otherwise would be carrying formalism to ridiculous lengths. It would also be contrary to precedent. See in this regard Canadian Land Co., supra, where, at p. 504, Ferguson J. made it clear that he had spoken to the judge who granted an interim injunction to obtain clarification of the meaning of his endorsement. Moreover, in Re Constantineau and Jones (1912), 26 O.L.R. 160, it is clear from p. 162 that Middleton J. (as he then was) on hearing an appeal from a taxing officer's certificate consulted the trial judge in order to obtain an explanation of his endorsement.

The endorsement made by Hollingworth J. does no more, in my opinion, than was implicit in his endorsement of July 23rd. After all, it would be pretty difficult, impossible in my view, to interpret the July 23rd endorsement, in which it was stated that the appeal would be heard de novo on July 24th by Rosenberg J. as anything other than a withdrawal by Hollingworth J. of his June 25th reasons, and as his complete withdrawal from the appeal itself. In my opinion, it is clear that Rosenberg J. had jurisdiction to hear and deal with the appeal.

I have dealt with the moving party's submission as to the jurisdiction to make the July orders herein, notwithstanding my opinion, as expressed above, that the only motion properly before me is a motion for leave to appeal the July orders. I did that for two reasons. The first is that in case I am wrong about my lack of jurisdiction to entertain a motion to set aside an interlocutory order of a fellow judge of the High Court, it will be clear that, in my opinion, the orders in question were properly made by judges having jurisdiction to make them. I will so declare.

My second reason is that a great deal of time was spent on the jurisdiction question, and the moving party's arguments were in my opinion so devoid of merit as to raise a question as to costs regardless of whether leave to appeal were granted.

I turn, at long last, to the issue of leave to appeal.

Leave to appeal

In my opinion, there is no basis upon which to grant leave to appeal the July 23rd order of Hollingworth J. As stated above, it is my opinion that His Lordship had jurisdiction to withdraw his order before it was entered, and he was acting judicially when he did so. The July 23rd endorsement by Hollingworth J. was, at most, a clarification and in my view not even a necessary one. There is nothing about either of those orders that meets either of the double-barrelled tests in subrule 62.02(5).

Leave to appeal the "order" of Rosenberg J. herein is refused, for the reason that neither of the tests in subrule 62.02(5) have been met. To deal first with the test in cl. (b) of the subrule, there does not appear to me to be good reason to believe the decision of Rosenberg J. to be wrong. On the contrary, I find myself in complete agreement with all of his reasons that are relevant to this motion, including his statement that the relevant tests are those set forth by Trainor J. in Warren Industrial Feldspar Co. Ltd. v. Union Carbide Canada Ltd. (1986), 1986 CanLII 2683 (ON SC), 54 O.R. (2d) 213, 8 C.P.C. (2d) 1.

Under rule 56.01(d) a defendant seeking an order for security for costs where the plaintiff is a corporation must show that there is good reason to believe that the plaintiff corporation has insufficient assets in Ontario to pay the defendant's costs if the plaintiff is unsuccessful in the litigation. The master found that on the evidence the defendant met that test and there has been no successful attack on that finding, nor in my opinion could there be on the evidence.

The obligation on the defendant is not to prove that the plaintiff corporation has insufficient assets; to do so would require the defendant to do something that is uniquely within the plaintiff's knowledge: see Warren Industrial Feldspar and Smallwood v. Sparling (1983), 1983 CanLII 1930 (ON SC), 42 O.R. (2d) 53, 34 C.P.C. 24.

When the defendant has shown that there is good reason to believe that the plaintiff has insufficient assets in Ontario the defendant has met its onus and is prima facie entitled to an order for security for costs, and the onus shifts to the plaintiff to introduce evidence to show either:

(a) that it has sufficient assets in Ontario, or

(b) that (i) it is impecunious and (ii) an injustice would result if it were not allowed to proceed with its action.

Here the plaintiff did not introduce evidence to show that it had sufficient assets in Ontario, nor did it introduce evidence to show that it was "impecunious". There was simply no evidence on the question from the plaintiff. Accordingly, on that basis alone, there is nothing to displace the prima facie entitlement of the defendant for an order for security. Pleadings which are contradictory are not evidence. Impecuniosity has to be established by evidence.

The term "impecuniosity" does not appear in the rule; it is a term introduced as part of the judicial gloss upon the rule in response to the words "as is just" in the part of the rule stating that (upon satisfaction of the stated conditions precedent) "the court ... may make such order as is just". The corporate plaintiff wishing to be allowed to proceed with its action, without either showing sufficient assets or putting up security, must first show "impecuniosity" meaning not only that it does not have sufficient assets itself but also that it cannot raise the security for costs from its shareholders and associates, partly because the courts do not want a successful defendant to be effectively deprived of costs where, for example, wealthy shareholders have decided to carry on business and litigation through a shell corporation. To go the impecuniosity route the plaintiff must establish by evidence that it cannot raise security for costs because, if a private company, its shareholders have not sufficient assets. As expressed by Reid J. in John Wink Ltd. v. Sico Inc. (1987), 1987 CanLII 4299 (ON SC), 57 O.R. (2d) 705 at p. 709, 15 C.P.C. (2d) 187: "If an order for security stops a plaintiff in its tracks it has disposed of the suit." To raise impecuniosity there must be evidence that if security is required the suit will be stopped -- because the amount of the security is not only not possessed by the plaintiff but is not available to it. Here there is simply no evidence to that effect.

The moving party (plaintiff) has also sought to base its application for leave to appeal upon cl. (a) of subrule 62.02(5), i.e., on the basis that there is a conflicting decision by another judge or court in Ontario or elsewhere, and it is desirable that leave to appeal be granted. One of the conflicting decisions cited on behalf of the plaintiff is the June 25, 1987 decision of Hollingworth J., but in my opinion it cannot count because, as stated above, it has been properly withdrawn and is no more. There is no decision of which I am aware where a plaintiff was allowed to proceed where it had produced no evidence of either sufficient assets in Ontario or, on the other hand, impecuniosity, and so I am not persuaded that there are any conflicting decisions within the meaning of the subrule.

The moving party has submitted that there is a conflict between the decision in Warren Industrial Feldspar and that in John Wink v. Sico. I agree that there does appear to be a conflict between those decisions, but it relates only to the last of the criteria to be met by a plaintiff that has already established its impecuniosity, that is, to the degree of merit that there must be to the case of an impecunious plaintiff an order to induce a court to refrain from making an order for security for costs. As I read the decision of Reid J. in Wink he accepts the reasoning of Trainor J. in Warren except as to the strength of the plaintiff's case. In my opinion there is no conflict between Warren and Wink on the question of the need for the corporate plaintiff to establish its impecuniosity by evidence before the court goes on to consider the merits of the plaintiff's case. When leave to appeal Wink was granted by Austin J., by an endorsement dated March 9, 1987, it was on the basis of a difference between Wink on the one hand and Warren and other decisions on the other, as to the required degree of merit of the plaintiff's case. (It is noted that the case was settled before the appeal was heard.) That difference is not relevant to this appeal; this case does not get to that question, because there is no evidence of impecuniosity. The decision of Rosenberg J. is not in conflict with either Warren or Wink or with any other decision to which I have been referred or of which I am aware.

Accordingly, the motion for leave to appeal the order of Rosenberg J. is also dismissed.

Costs to the respondent.

Motion dismissed.

Heard: September 4, 2015

On appeal from the order of Justice Kevin Whitaker of the Superior Court of Justice, dated November 21, 2014.

Lauwers J.A.:

[1] The motion judge refused an order under rule 59.06 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O., 1990, Reg. 194 permitting the appellant to lead new evidence after the dismissal of his claim by the trial judge. The evidence, if accepted, could cast doubt on the veracity of the testimony of the respondents on which the trial judge relied. The circumstances are most unusual. For the reasons set out below, I would allow the appeal.

The Trial Decision

[2] According to the appellant, the respondents, operating as "Job Success", promised to find him a job paying $70,000 per year within two months; he paid them a fee of about $3,700. He sued when they were unable to find him the job.

[3] The trial judge dismissed the case for oral reasons given on June 23, 2011. He accepted the trial testimony of the respondents Hameed and Lacombe, whom he found to be credible witnesses. He stated: "On the evidence before me, there is no basis for a finding that Job Success or any of the defendants made any promises or commitments to Mr. Mehedi that they did not fulfill."

[4] The trial judge added:

> Mr. Mehedi's understanding of the commitment he claims they made to him is not supported by any independent evidence and, in my view, it is unrealistic and unreasonable under the circumstances. Although Mr. Mehedi may honestly believe he was given the commitment he testified he had received, there is no reasonable basis for his belief and it is not supported by either the viva voce or documentary evidence.

[5] The trial judge specifically found “there was never a promise to find the plaintiff a job within any specified time frame or at any specified salary range.”

[6] This court dismissed the appellant’s appeal from the trial judgment by way of endorsement on January 23, 2012: Mehedi v. 2052761 Ontario Inc., 2012 ONCA 46.

The Proposed New Evidence

[7] Shortly after this court’s decision, the CBC broadcast an episode of the television program Marketplace, which put into question the evidence given by the respondents at the trial. The appellant moved before this court for directions on the procedure for introducing fresh evidence, since the trial decision had been upheld on appeal. In his ruling on the motion, Juriansz J.A., sitting in chambers, explained the situation, at paras. 5-6:

> On February 17, 2012, the CBC broadcast an episode of Marketplace titled "Recruitment Rip-off". Marketplace, using hidden cameras, purports to expose how a recruitment agency, carrying on business as "Toronto Pathways", exploits vulnerable unemployed persons by promising to find them good jobs in exchange for fees. The clients shown in the program are mainly unemployed immigrants newly arrived in Canada. The program shows Dale Smith acknowledging that "Toronto Pathways" and "Job Success" are the same business. Mr. Smith, the owner, states, "It is the same corporation. Same address. Brand marketing is the only reason for the change.... Brand marketing just allows a fresh market approach." The program states that the company has changed business names five times in seven years.
> The program purports to show company officials unequivocally promising prospective clients that they will be provided good jobs to induce them to enter contracts. The defendant Mr. Lacombe is shown being asked by a Marketplace staffer, "So you're basically guaranteeing me that I'm going to get a job?", and responding, "Absolutely. And we are very good at it." The witness Mr. MacKay is also shown in the program. The program also shows > numerous other individuals who make essentially the same allegations as Mr. Mehedi.

See Mehedi v. 2057161 Ontario Inc. (c.o.b. Job Success), 2014 ONCA 604.

[8] Justice Juriansz directed the appellant to bring a motion to adduce fresh evidence and re-open the trial. Since the trial judge had declined to hear the motion because he had been assigned to criminal court, Juriansz J.A. directed that the motion be brought before a motion judge of the Superior Court in the ordinary way. The appellant then brought a motion to introduce as new evidence the Marketplace report, as well as an article in the Metro newspaper recounting similar statements apparently made by the respondent Dale Smith, to a reporter who was posing as a Job Success customer.

The Motion Judge's Decision

[9] On November 20, 2014, the motion judge dismissed the appellant's motion. His reasons, in their entirety, read:

> On July 30, 2014, Juriansz J.A. in chambers directed the plaintiff to bring a motion in the normal course regarding the admission of new evidence and a new trial as a result. I am not persuaded that this is an appropriate case to exercise my discretion to reopen this matter that had already been tried by Justice Himel [Hainey]. Even if the new evidence was allowed, I do not believe that that would reasonably affect the outcome. The action [sic] is dismissed. Costs to the defendant of $500.00 payable forthwith. Order as appropriate.

[10] The appellant appeals the motion judge's dismissal of his motion, and invokes both rule 59.06 of the Rules of Civil Procedure and the court's inherent jurisdiction.

[11] Rule 59.06(2)(a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure provides:

> A party who seeks to, (a) have an order set aside or varied on the ground of fraud or of facts arising or discovered after it was made; … may make a motion in the proceeding for the relief claimed.

The Standard of Review

[12] A motion judge's decision under rule 59.06(2)(a) is discretionary and attracts considerable deference from a reviewing court, unless the motion judge errs in principle, misapprehends or fails to take account of material evidence, reaches an unreasonable decision (Young v. Tyco International of Canada Ltd., 2008 ONCA 709), or if the reasons do not set out the judge's reasoning process and reflect consideration of the main relevant factors: R. v. Sheppard, 2002 SCC 26; Diamond Auto Collision Inc. v. Economical Insurance Group, 2007 ONCA 487, at paras. 11-12; Barbieri v. Mastronardi, 2014 ONCA 416, at paras. 22-23.

Analysis

[13] The test under rule 59.06(2)(a) to re-open a trial that applies after the judgment or other order has been issued and entered was set out by Doherty J.A., speaking for the court, in Tsaoussis (Litigation Guardian of) v. Baetz (1998), 1998 CanLII 5454 (ON CA), 41 O.R. (3d) 257, [1998] O.J. No. 3516, at paras. 41 and 44. As he noted, the onus is on the moving party to show that all the circumstances "justify making an exception to the fundamental rule that final judgments are exactly that, final." In particular, the moving party must show that the new evidence could not have been put forward by the exercise of reasonable diligence at the original proceedings. The court will go on to evaluate "other factors such as the cogency of the new evidence, any delay in moving to set aside the previous judgment, any difficulty in re-litigating the issues and any prejudice to other parties or persons who may have acted in reliance on the judgment."

[14] In this case, the motion judge's reasons for refusing to re-open the trial are inadequate. While he briefly states what he views as the appropriate test, the motion judge does not describe the proposed new evidence or relate the test to it. He does not explain why the new evidence fails to meet the test, or why it would not, in his words, "reasonably affect the outcome", given the critical importance of the trial testimony of the respondents, Hameed and Lacombe, to the trial judge's decision. In the result, this court is unable to meaningfully review the basis for his dismissal of the appellant's motion.

[15] In my view, the appellant has met the test under rule 59.06(2)(a) as articulated in Baetz. It is plain that the proposed new evidence was not available at the time of the first trial or the first appeal. The appellant did not delay in seeking relief. The new evidence is cogent, in that it is apparently credible and, if accepted, would probably have affected the result at trial; the new evidence could serve to undermine the evidence given by the respondents and bolster that of the appellant. That is because the video shows representatives of Job Success apparently making the same or similar promises to others that the trial judge found to be "unrealistic and unreasonable" with respect to the appellant. Finally, I see no prejudice to the respondents if the trial were re-opened.

[16] Amicus submits that the motion judge erred in applying the test for re-opening a trial described by the Supreme Court of Canada in 671122 Ontario Ltd. v. Sagaz Industries Canada Inc., 2001 SCC 59, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 983. The Sagaz test was articulated in a case in which the judgment at issue had not yet been issued and entered. In the present case, while no formal judgment was taken out, the trial decision had been appealed. Amicus asserts that the motion judge ought to have applied the Baetz test, which includes the consideration of a number of different factors, including balancing fairness against the interest in finality.

[17] In Sagaz, the Supreme Court accepted, at paras. 20 and 64, the motion judge's application of the two-part test for re-opening a trial described by the High Court in Scott v. Cook, 1970 CanLII 331 (ON SC), [1970] 2 O.R. 769:

> First, would the evidence, if presented at trial, probably have changed the result? Second, could the evidence > have been obtained before trial by the exercise of reasonable diligence?

[18] Courts citing Sagaz often seem to boil the test down to these two questions (see, for example, 1057854 Ontario Inc. v. Kara Holdings Inc., [2005] O.J. No. 1144, at para. 40; Wesbell Networks Inc. (Receiver of) v. Bell Canada, 2013 ONSC 7814; Irving Shipbuilding Inc. v. Schmidt, 2014 ONSC 5089, at para. 57; Madock v. Grauer, 2010 BCSC 1709). However, the Supreme Court, at para. 60, added this important direction: "Appellate courts should defer to the trial judge who is in the best position to decide whether, at the expense of finality, fairness dictates that the trial be reopened." Plainly then, fairness is also an important factor, including prejudice to others who have acted in reliance on the judgment, as Baetz notes.

[19] I further note that in Sagaz, the Supreme Court, at para. 63, approved the following comments by Lord Denning in Ladd v. Marshall, [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1489 (C.A.), at p. 1491:

> It is very rare that application is made to this court for a new trial on the ground that a witness has told a lie. The principles to be applied are the same as those always applied when fresh evidence is sought to be introduced. To justify the reception of fresh evidence or a new trial, three conditions must be fulfilled: first, it must be shown that the evidence could not have been obtained with reasonable diligence for use at the trial; secondly, the evidence must be such that, if given, it would probably have an important influence on the result of the case, though it need not be decisive; thirdly, the evidence must be such as is presumably to be believed, or in other words, it must be apparently credible, though it need not be incontrovertible. [Emphasis added.]

[20] In my view, properly understood, the test in Sagaz goes beyond the two questions of whether the new evidence, if presented at trial, would probably have changed the result, and whether the evidence could have been obtained before trial by the exercise of reasonable diligence. It includes considerations of finality, the apparent cogency of the evidence, delay, fairness and prejudice, factors that were articulated by this court in its decision in Baetz. The error in this case was not in the motion judge's decision to apply Sagaz rather than Baetz, but in his application of the test, as I have already described. In this case, the new evidence meets both the Baetz and the Sagaz tests for re-opening a trial assuming there is any real distinction between the two.

Disposition

[21] Because of the nature of the inquiry, a motion under rule 59.06(2)(a) to reopen a trial decision based on fresh evidence should be brought before the trial judge, who is in the best position to contextualize the fresh evidence and to direct the trial of an issue if appropriate: Janjua v. Khan, 2014 ONCA 5 at para. 11. See Sagaz, at para.60. This is the practice that should be followed unless there is some real impediment to the trial judge dealing with the motion.

[22] I would allow the appeal, re-open the trial and remit the matter to the trial judge for reconsideration in light of the fresh evidence. It will be for the trial judge to determine the admissibility of the new evidence and its effects, if any, on the merits of the case.

[23] In the circumstances, I would set aside all previous cost orders against the appellant in this matter, including the costs of the first trial, the appeal to this court from the first trial judgment and the costs of the motion before the motion judge. It will be for the trial judge to determine appropriate costs dispositions, based on his reconsideration of the case.

[24] I would also award the appellant $2,000 for the costs of this appeal, inclusive of disbursements and all applicable taxes.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Administrative law — Judicial review — Limited statutory right of appeal on questions of law — Tribunal finding insured's application contesting denial of statutory accident benefits by insurer time-barred — Provincial legislation limiting right of appeal from tribunal's decision to questions of law — Insured appealing decision on questions of law and seeking judicial review on questions of fact and mixed fact and law — Appeal and application for judicial review dismissed — Whether courts should have exercised discretion to undertake judicial review on merits in light of limited statutory right of appeal on questions of law — Proper approach to judicial review where limited statutory right of appeal.

Insurance — Automobile insurance — Statutory accident benefits — Denial — Limitation period — Insured injured in automobile accident — Insurer denying statutory accident benefits — Tribunal finding insured's application contesting denial of benefits time-barred — Whether Tribunal's decision was reasonable.

Y was injured in an automobile accident in 2010. Her insurer initially paid her accident benefits. However, in January 2011, the insurer informed Y by letter that payment of all benefits had been stopped in the absence of a completed disability certificate. A dispute resolution form was attached to the letter. Then, in February 2011, the insurer informed Y that following a medical assessment her income replacement benefits were reinstated but her claim to the other two benefits — housekeeping and home maintenance — was denied. Finally, in September 2011, the insurer informed Y that her income replacement benefits were denied and payments would be stopped. No dispute resolutions forms were attached to either of the last two letters.

Y applied for mediation, which was mandatory at the time, to dispute the denial of her benefits. The mediation process came to an end in January 2014 and the mediator released his report. At the time of Y's accident, Ontario's Insurance Act provided for a two-year limitation period after the insurer's refusal to pay the benefits to commence a proceeding to contest the denial. It also provided that the limitation period was extended by a period of 90 days after the mediator provided their report. Y commenced a proceeding before the Licence Appeal Tribunal ("LAT") in March 2018. Her application was dismissed as being time-barred and her request for reconsideration was dismissed.

Pursuant to Ontario's Licence Appeal Tribunal Act, 1999, Y's right of appeal from the LAT adjudicator's reconsideration decision was restricted to questions of law. Y pursued an appeal on questions of law, and also sought judicial review regarding questions of fact or mixed fact and law. The Divisional Court dismissed the appeal, holding that Y showed no errors of law made by the LAT adjudicator. It also dismissed Y's application for judicial review, on the basis that there were no exceptional circumstances that would justify judicial review. The Court of Appeal dismissed Y's appeal, holding that it would only be in rare cases that the remedy of judicial review would be exercised given the legislated scheme for the resolution of such disputes, and that Y had an appropriate alternative remedy. It also concluded that even if the judicial review application ought to have been considered, it would have been denied as the LAT adjudicator's decision was reasonable.

Held: The appeal should be allowed and the matter remitted to the LAT adjudicator.

It was an error for the courts below to hold that, where there is a limited right of appeal, judicial review should only be exercised in exceptional or rare cases. The limited right of appeal from LAT decisions to pure questions of law does not reflect an intention by the legislature to restrict recourse to the courts on other questions arising from the LAT's administrative decision. The legislative decision to provide for a right of appeal on questions of law only denotes an intention to subject LAT decisions on questions of law to correctness review, and proceeding with judicial review on questions of fact or mixed fact and law is fully respectful of the legislature's institutional design choices. Furthermore, the LAT adjudicator's reconsideration decision was unreasonable, as he failed to take into account relevant legal constraints. The matter should be referred back to the LAT adjudicator for reconsideration.

As held by the Court in Vavilov, a right of appeal does not preclude an individual from seeking judicial review for questions not dealt with in the appeal. Where there is a statutory right of appeal limited to questions of law, judicial review is available for questions of fact or mixed fact and law. However, while there is a right to seek judicial review, it is open to the judge before whom judicial review is sought to decide whether to exercise his or her discretion to grant relief — although this discretion does not extend to decline to consider the application for judicial review. The discretion whether to undertake judicial review should be exercised by the judge having regard to the framework set out in Strickland v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 37. At a minimum, the judge must determine whether judicial review is appropriate. If, in considering the application, the judge determines that one of the discretionary bases for refusing a remedy is present, they may decline to consider the merits of the judicial review application. The judge also has the discretion to refuse to grant a remedy even if they find that the decision under review is unreasonable.

In exercising its discretion, in addition to the suitability and appropriateness of judicial review in the circumstances, the court should consider the available alternatives. This balancing exercise should take account of the purposes and policy considerations underpinning the legislative scheme in issue. Alternative remedies exist where internal review processes have not been exhausted or where there is a statutory right of appeal that is not restricted, such that questions of law, fact and mixed fact and law could be considered on appeal. It would be ignoring Strickland to conclude that only in exceptional circumstances would judicial review be available where there is a limited right of appeal. It would also be an error to hold that judicial review should only be exercised in rare cases.

In the instant case, the Divisional Court should have exercised its discretion to undertake judicial review for issues not dealt with under the statutory right of appeal. The statutory right to appeal and the LAT adjudicator's reconsideration decision do not constitute adequate alternative remedies. Y raises errors of fact or mixed fact and law which are not reviewable under the statutory right of appeal, and access to internal reconsiderations cannot be an adequate alternative remedy, as the reconsideration decision itself is the subject of the review.

Furthermore, the LAT adjudicator's reconsideration decision is unreasonable, as he failed to have regard to the effect of the reinstatement of the income replacement benefits between February and September 2011 on the validity of the initial denial. In addition, he did not consider earlier tribunal decisions, some of which had held that when an applicant's benefits are reinstated, the limitation period can only be triggered when they are validly terminated again. It is arguable that there needed to be a valid denial of the income replacement benefits to start the clock running on the limitation period, and this question is one to be properly decided by the LAT.

I. Overview

[1] This case deals with a court's exercise of discretion as to whether to undertake judicial review on the merits in light of a limited statutory right of appeal.

[2] Ummugulsum Yatar is contesting the denial of her insurance benefits, following an accident in 2010. After having her application dismissed by the Licence Appeal Tribunal ("LAT") in 2019, due to the matter being time-barred, Ms. Yatar requested reconsideration of this decision, which was dismissed. Then, she simultaneously appealed the decision before the Divisional Court of Ontario, and applied for judicial review. Section 11(6) of the Licence Appeal Tribunal Act, 1999, S.O. 1999, c. 12, Sch. G ("LAT Act"), provides that an appeal from a decision of the LAT relating to a matter under the Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.8, may be made on a question of law only.

[3] As per Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65, [2019] 4 S.C.R. 653, a right of appeal does not preclude an individual from seeking judicial review for questions not dealt with in the appeal. In this case, despite the statutory right of appeal limited to questions of law, judicial review is available for questions of fact or mixed fact and law. It is then a matter of discretion whether to undertake judicial review, having regard to the framework for analysis set out in Strickland v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 37, [2015] 2 S.C.R. 713.

[4] The Divisional Court erred when it concluded that only in "exceptional circumstances" would judicial review be available where there is a limited right of appeal (2021 ONSC 2507, 157 O.R. (3d) 337, at para. 4); this ignored Strickland. The Court of Appeal for Ontario also erred when it held that only in "rare cases" judicial review would be exercised (2022 ONCA 446, 25 C.C.L.I. (6th) 1, at para. 42), and that in this case, Ms. Yatar had an appropriate alternative remedy. Both courts sought to apply Strickland, but erred in principle in doing so. They did so by relying on a statutory right of appeal for questions of law as indicative of legislative intent to restrict access to judicial review for questions of fact and mixed fact and law. No such inference is warranted. Properly applying Strickland, the Divisional Court should have exercised its discretion to undertake judicial review for issues not dealt with under the statutory right of appeal.

[5] As to the LAT adjudicator's reconsideration decision (2020 CanLII 34442 ("reconsideration decision")), it is unreasonable, as he failed to consider the effects of the reinstatement of benefits on the limitation period, and he did not have regard to jurisprudence relevant to the matter. Accordingly, the appeal is allowed and the matter is referred back to the LAT adjudicator for reconsideration.

II. Factual Context

A. The Underlying Insurance Claim

[6] Ms. Yatar "was injured in an automobile accident in February 2010 and sought benefits under the Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule — Accidents on or After November 1, 1996, O. Reg. 403/96 ('SABS')" (Divisional Court decision, at para. 5). One of the two respondents, TD Insurance Meloche Monnex, was her insurer at the time, and received Ms. Yatar's application for accident benefits on February 22, 2010, as well as her employer's confirmation form on March 13, 2010. Ms. Yatar's claim also included income replacement benefits ("IRBs") as well as housekeeping and home maintenance benefits.

B. Denial of Requested Benefits and Subsequent Proceedings

[7] Ms. Yatar's request for benefits was initially considered valid by TD Insurance, which paid benefits to Ms. Yatar. In the months that followed, however, TD Insurance denied the benefits in three letters:

(a) The January Letter: On January 7, 2011, TD Insurance informed Ms. Yatar that payment of IRBs, as well as housekeeping and home maintenance benefits, had been stopped in the absence of a completed disability certificate. The letter contained directions for a medical examination, which Ms. Yatar attended on January 17 and January 27. A dispute resolution form was attached to that letter.

(b) The February Letter: On February 16, 2011, Ms. Yatar was informed by TD Insurance that following the medical assessment, her claim to housekeeping and home maintenance benefits was denied. However, her IRBs were reinstated. No dispute resolution form was attached to that letter.

(c) The September Letter: On September 19, 2011, Ms. Yatar was advised that her IRBs were denied by TD Insurance, and that the payments would be stopped on September 28, 2011. No dispute resolution form was attached to that letter.

[8] There have been significant legislative amendments since Ms. Yatar commenced her procedures. At the time of the accident, in 2010, the Insurance Act provided for a two-year limitation period after the insurer's refusal to pay the benefits to commence a proceeding (s. 281.1(1)), as well as mediation as a mandatory first step to resolve a dispute (s. 281(2)), which extended the limitation period to 90 days after the mediator provided their report (s. 281.1(2)(b)).

Ms. Yatar applied for mediation on September 13, 2012, to dispute the denial of her benefits. The mediation process came to an end on January 14, 2014.

[9] However, what is most relevant in this case is that when Ms. Yatar commenced her proceeding before the LAT in March 2018, both the Insurance Act and the SABS had been redesigned. Under the amended Insurance Act, the LAT was given exclusive jurisdiction at first instance over the resolution of SABS disputes. As well, mandatory mediation was eliminated. The LAT Act was also amended to provide for an appeal from a decision of the LAT on a question of law only (s. 11(6)).

[10] On March 31, 2016, Ms. Yatar commenced an action in the Superior Court of Justice. The action was dismissed through a consent order on March 27, 2017, and the application underlying this appeal was brought to the LAT in March 2018.

III. Judicial History

A. Licence Appeal Tribunal

[11] In the LAT adjudicator's first decision in April 2019 (2019 CanLII 43918 ("preliminary decision")), the LAT adjudicator considered Ms. Yatar's claim for IRBs, housekeeping benefits and home maintenance benefits and dismissed it, concluding that the claim was time-barred since April 2014. When Ms. Yatar proceeded with mediation in early 2011, both s. 281.1(2)(b) of the Insurance Act and s. 51(2) of the SABS provided for a limitation period that expired 90 days after the mediator's report was released.

[12] The LAT adjudicator found that TD Insurance denied the IRBs, home maintenance and housekeeping benefits in a letter dated January 7, 2011. Given that "[Ms. Yatar] filed this Application before the [LAT] on March 16, 2018, more than seven years after these benefits were denied on January 7, 2011" (para. 19), and even taking into account the extensions of the limitation period due to the evaluation and mediation, the LAT adjudicator found that the claims were time-barred since April 2014.

[13] The LAT adjudicator noted that "[f]rom counsel's evidence, it is clear that lawyers at her firm should have been aware of the applicable two-year limitation period. It is also clear that [Ms. Yatar] relied on the expertise of her counsel, to her detriment, in the face of the statutory limitation period" (preliminary decision, at para. 25).

[14] In the reconsideration decision, the LAT adjudicator reviewed his earlier reasons as well as the evidence. A factual error was corrected at para. 12 of the decision, but the LAT adjudicator re-affirmed the original decision.

[15] The LAT adjudicator relied on Smith v. Co-operators General Insurance Co., 2002 SCC 30, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 129. He concluded that the dispute resolution form, attached to the January 2011 letter, "clearly sets out three steps in the dispute process and warns in clear straightforward language of the two-year limitation period" (para. 13). The LAT adjudicator stated that, in Smith v. Co-operators, the Supreme Court of Canada sought to ensure that the applicant is aware of the dispute resolution process. He noted that there was an "implicit acceptance of the denials effective January 4, 2011" and affirmed his previous finding that the January 7, 2011 letter constituted a valid denial of benefits (reconsideration decision, at para. 15; see also para. 16).

[16] The limitation period was extended into April 2014 following the mediation. However, Ms. Yatar made the application to the LAT for benefits on March 16, 2018. Thus, the request was time-barred. The application was dismissed.

B. Ontario Superior Court of Justice (Divisional Court), 2021 ONSC 2507, 157 O.R. (3d) 337 (Swinton, Penny and Kristjanson JJ.)

[17] Ms. Yatar's right of appeal from the LAT adjudicator's reconsideration decision was restricted to questions of law, per s. 11(6) of the LAT Act. In light of this, Ms. Yatar pursued an appeal on questions of law, and also sought judicial review regarding questions of fact or mixed fact and law.

[18] The Divisional Court held that its authority to hear the judicial review application stemmed from s. 280(3) of the Insurance Act and s. 2(1) of the Judicial Review Procedure Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. J.1; this authority was not precluded by the limited right of appeal on questions of law provided by s. 11(6) of the LAT Act.

[19] The appeal was dismissed, as Ms. Yatar showed no errors of law made by the LAT adjudicator and, instead, recited "findings of fact made by the [LAT] adjudicator and then baldly assert[ed] that the [LAT] adjudicator erred in law, without identifying the legal error or any extricable legal principle" (Divisional Court decision, at para. 27).

[20] On judicial review with respect to the questions of fact and mixed fact and law, the Divisional Court concluded that, per Vavilov, the limited right of appeal in the LAT Act did not "deprive this court of jurisdiction to consider other aspects of a decision in judicial review proceedings" (para. 36). The court added that judicial review is a discretionary remedy, and should thus be declined when alternative remedies are adequate (see Strickland, at paras. 37 and 40).

[21] As to whether to exercise its discretion to undertake judicial review in this case, the Divisional Court considered four factors: (i) the legislative intent to limit judicial review of LAT decisions on statutory accident benefits to questions of law only, (ii) the breadth of the LAT's reconsideration power, (iii) the nature of the alleged errors, and (iv) the systemic difficulties associated with dealing with judicial review and an appeal (paras. 41-45).

[22] The Divisional Court concluded that there were "no exceptional circumstances" in this case that would justify judicial review (para. 46). On this basis, the Divisional Court declined to grant the application for judicial review.

C. Court of Appeal for Ontario, 2022 ONCA 446, 25 C.C.L.I. (6th) 1 (Lauwers, Nordheimer and Zarnett JJ.A.)

[23] Two issues were appealed to the Court of Appeal: (i) whether "the Divisional Court err[ed] in limiting judicial review, in cases where there has been a statutory appeal . . . to 'exceptional circumstances'" and (ii) whether "the [LAT]'s reconsideration decision [was] reasonable" (para. 27).

[24] The Court of Appeal observed that when the Divisional Court referred to the availability of judicial review, "the use of the language 'exceptional circumstances' was an unfortunate one" and led to potential confusion (para. 35). The Court of Appeal held that what the Divisional Court "was attempting to communicate is that it would only be in rare cases that the remedy of judicial review would be exercised, given the legislated scheme for the resolution of disputes over SABS" (para. 42).

[25] The Court of Appeal held that a limited statutory right of appeal does not preclude judicial review. The right to seek judicial review is always available, but this does not "change the fact that judicial review is a discretionary remedy" (para. 41). The Court of Appeal also stated that "[t]he court's discretion with respect to judicial review applies both to its decision to undertake review and to grant relief", relying on Strickland (para. 44).

[26] The Court of Appeal held that the Divisional Court correctly considered the factors in Strickland as to whether there are alternative remedies to judicial review. There is "legislative intent to limit access to the courts regarding these disputes" (para. 43).

[27] The Court of Appeal concluded that even if "the judicial review application ought to have been considered", Ms. Yatar had failed to show that the LAT adjudicator's reconsideration decision was unreasonable: ". . . that application would have failed on the presumptive standard of review of reasonableness . . ." (para. 52).

[28] The Court of Appeal held that the LAT adjudicator's underlying finding, that the valid denial of benefits triggered the beginning of the limitation period, was also reasonable:

> . . . the limitation period would have expired in 2013, but for the . . . mediation process that extended that limitation period to April 2014. In either event, the fact that [Ms. Yatar] had not launched her application to the [LAT] until March 16, 2018 meant that it was outside of the limitation period. [para. 51]

[29] Thus, while the Court of Appeal concluded that judicial review of the LAT adjudicator's decision ought not to have been considered, the application for judicial review would have been denied as the LAT adjudicator's decision on the reconsideration was reasonable.

IV. Issues on Appeal

[30] Ms. Yatar raises two questions on appeal: first, whether the Court of Appeal erred when it concluded that the legislature's decision to limit the right of appeal from LAT decisions to "pure" questions of law restricted the availability of judicial review of LAT decisions for errors of fact or mixed fact and law to "rare" or "unusual" cases; and second, whether the Court of Appeal erred in concluding that the LAT adjudicator's reconsideration decision was reasonable (A.F., at para. 28).

V. Submissions of the Parties

A. Ms. Yatar

[31] Ms. Yatar submits that the Court of Appeal erred in finding that the existence of a limited statutory right of appeal can be a basis to decline to undertake judicial review regarding issues outside the scope of the statutory appeal. Vavilov confirms that "a right to appeal on a question of law is not an adequate remedy if a litigant seeks judicial review of a question of fact, or a question of mixed fact and law, . . . the two remedies are compl[e]mentary" (A.F., at para. 52).

[32] Regarding judicial review in this case, Ms. Yatar argues that since no dispute resolution form accompanied the letters in February and September 2011, the latter cannot be considered valid denials of benefits. The LAT adjudicator erred in considering that the letter from January 2011 was a valid denial, as it was a temporary suspension of benefits and "did not constitute notice in 'straightforward and clear language, directed towards an unsophisticated person' that benefits would not be provided" (A.F., at para. 79). Thus, the letter from January 2011 cannot be the starting point for the limitation period.

[33] The fact that the LAT adjudicator did not address the issue of "ambiguities" in the January 2011 letter, Ms. Yatar submits, is a central flaw in the analysis and, therefore, the decision is unreasonable.

B. TD Insurance and Licence Appeal Tribunal

[34] TD Insurance submits that the Divisional Court did not err in exercising its discretion to decline to undertake judicial review of the LAT adjudicator's reconsideration decision. The Ontario legislature chose to limit the courts' involvement in appeals on questions of law.

[35] Judicial review is discretionary and the Divisional Court's exercise of this discretion is entitled to deference. As this Court recognized in Canadian Pacific Ltd. v. Matsqui Indian Band, 1995 CanLII 145 (SCC), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 3, prerogative writs are an "extraordinary remedy". The right to seek judicial review does not entail "a right to require the court to undertake judicial review" regardless of the nature of the question (para. 30; Canada (Auditor General) v. Canada (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources), 1989 CanLII 73 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 49, at p. 93).

[36] TD Insurance submits that the Strickland factors provide a sufficient basis on which to dismiss this appeal. If the alternatives to judicial review are adequate, as they are here, then it is "appropriate" to give effect to the legislature's intent and to decline to undertake judicial review. Other factors from the jurisprudence confirm that judicial review was not appropriate here, including: the nature of the statutory scheme, the nature of the decision and the process followed in making it, the importance of the decision to the individual or individuals affected, and whether the case is of public interest.

[37] In the alternative, TD Insurance submits, if the LAT adjudicator's reconsideration decision is to be judicially reviewed, the LAT adjudicator reasonably determined that the application was statute-barred.

[38] The LAT submits that the Court of Appeal correctly held that the discretion to entertain judicial review on questions of fact and mixed fact and law should be exercised "only . . . in rare cases" (C.A. reasons, at para. 42). Otherwise, the legislative intent in enacting the restrictive appeal clause would be undermined.

[39] The LAT submits this is consistent with Strickland's holding on the exercise of discretion on judicial review. Vavilov did not change the law on the discretion to decline to undertake judicial review where there is an alternative remedy; Vavilov did not overrule Strickland.

[40] In the LAT's view, reading Vavilov and Strickland together leads to the conclusion that the exercise of discretion on judicial review must consider the adequacy of the restrictive appeal as an alternative remedy while also being respectful of the legislature's choice to create a right of appeal limited to questions of law only. The LAT takes no position on the reasonableness of its decision.

VI. Analysis

A. Standard of Review

[41] The main issue in this appeal relates to the decision by the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal not to undertake judicial review. As this is a discretionary decision, deference is to be shown (see Strickland, at para. 39). However, the exercise of discretion can be set aside when a judge "considered irrelevant factors, failed to consider relevant factors, or reached an unreasonable conclusion" (Matsqui Indian Band, at para. 39). As I will explain, the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal erred in their application of Strickland in that they acted on the basis of a "wrong principle" (Matsqui Indian Band, at para. 112, per Sopinka J.).

[42] Once it is determined that it is appropriate to undertake judicial review in this case, the issue arises whether the LAT adjudicator's reconsideration decision was reasonable. Per Vavilov, there is "a presumption that reasonableness is the applicable standard whenever a court reviews administrative decisions" (para. 16). That presumption is not rebutted here.

B. The Existence of a Circumscribed Right of Appeal Does Not, on Its Own, Preclude Applications for Judicial Review

[43] When the dispute arose in early 2011, mediation was a mandatory first step to challenge an insurer's denial of benefits. Both s. 281.1(2)(b) of the Insurance Act and s. 51(2) of the SABS provided for a 90-day extension of the limitation period after the mediator's report is released. Ms. Yatar undertook mediation in September 2012. When Ms. Yatar commenced her proceeding before the LAT in March 2018, the statutory scheme had been amended and provision was made for an appeal from a decision of the LAT on a matter under the Insurance Act on questions of law only.

[44] In the case at bar, the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal held that a party can both exercise a statutory right of appeal and seek judicial review for questions outside the scope of the statutory right of appeal. Other courts have also determined that a statutory right of appeal does not alter the availability of judicial review (see Smith v. The Appeal Commission, 2023 MBCA 23, 479 D.L.R. (4th) 121; Wongkingsri v. Alberta (Appeals Commission for Alberta Workers' Compensation), 2022 ABQB 545, 61 Alta. L.R. (7th) 170; Zarooben v. Workers' Compensation Board, 2021 ABQB 232, 84 Admin. L.R. (6th) 96, aff'd 2022 ABCA 50, 95 Admin. L.R. (6th) 163).

[45] The question remains: what role does the right of appeal play in the exercise of discretion to undertake judicial review? In settling this question, it is important to have regard to first principles. In Immeubles Port Louis Ltée v. Lafontaine (Village), 1991 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 326, this Court held that "[t]he principle that public authorities are subordinate to the supervisory power of the superior courts is the cornerstone of the Canadian and Quebec system of administrative law. Such judicial review is a necessary consequence of the rule of law" (p. 360).

[46] The importance of judicial review was affirmed by this Court in Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190, at para. 27:

> As a matter of constitutional law, judicial review is intimately connected with the preservation of the rule of law. It is essentially that constitutional foundation which explains the purpose of judicial review and guides its function and operation. Judicial review seeks to address an underlying tension between the rule of law and the foundational democratic principle, which finds an expression in the initiatives of Parliament and legislatures to create various administrative bodies and endow them with broad powers.

[47] This Court held in Vavilov, at para. 52, that the legislative intent to restrict statutory rights of appeal does not, on its own, affect the availability of judicial review:

> . . . the existence of a circumscribed right of appeal in a statutory scheme does not on its own preclude applications for judicial review of decisions, or of aspects of decisions, to which the appeal mechanism does not apply, or by individuals who have no right of appeal.

[48] This Court's precedent contemplates a person pursuing both a statutory appeal on questions of law and judicial review on questions of fact and mixed fact and law. In such an instance, as set out in Vavilov, at para. 37, the questions of law being appealed would be subject to review on a standard of correctness (see also Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235), and questions of fact and mixed fact and law would be subject to review on a standard of reasonableness on judicial review (see Vavilov).

[49] A person has a right to seek judicial review, and "[t]o give courts a discretion not to hear judicial review applications because of their perception of the quality and quantity of internal reconsiderations would allow judicial discretion to trump [a] constitutional principle" (P. Daly, A Culture of Justification: Vavilov and the Future of Administrative Law (2023), at p. 226, note 94).

While there is discretion to hear the application on the merits and deny relief, this discretion does not extend to decline to consider the application for judicial review, as will be explained below.

[50] I would note recent jurisprudence from the Federal Court of Appeal as to the availability of judicial review where there is a privative clause, i.e. a clause that seeks to bar or restrict judicial review (see, e.g., Canada (Attorney General) v. Pier 1 Imports (U.S.), Inc., 2023 FCA 209; Canada (Attorney General) v. Best Buy Canada Ltd., 2021 FCA 161; Democracy Watch v. Canada (Attorney General), 2023 FCA 39, 14 Admin. L.R. (7th) 42; Democracy Watch v. Canada (Attorney General), 2022 FCA 208). But that is not the question at issue in this case. Accordingly, I leave that question for another day.

C. The Exercise of Discretion To Grant Relief on Judicial Review

[51] While there is a right to seek judicial review, it is open to the judge before whom judicial review is sought to decide whether to exercise his or her discretion to grant relief. This Court stated in Strickland, at para. 37, quoting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, at p. 90:

> Judicial review by way of the old prerogative writs has always been understood to be discretionary. This means that even if the applicant makes out a case for review on the merits, the reviewing court has an overriding discretion to refuse relief . . . . Declarations of right, whether sought in judicial review proceedings or in actions, are similarly a discretionary remedy: ". . . the broadest judicial discretion may be exercised in determining whether a case is one in which declaratory relief ought to be awarded" . . . . [Emphasis added.]

[52] In Canada (Citizenship and Immigration) v. Khosa, 2009 SCC 12, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 339, at para. 135, Rothstein J. stated:

> The traditional common law discretion to refuse relief on judicial review concerns the parties' conduct, any undue delay and the existence of alternative remedies: Immeubles Port Louis Ltée v. Lafontaine (Village), 1991 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 326, at p. 364. As Harelkin [v. University of Regina, 1979 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1979] 2 S.C.R. 561,] affirmed, at p. 575, courts may exercise their discretion to refuse relief to applicants "if they have been guilty of unreasonable delay or misconduct or if an adequate alternative remedy exists, notwithstanding that they have proved a usurpation of jurisdiction by the inferior tribunal or an omission to perform a public duty". As in the case of interlocutory injunctions, courts exercising discretion to grant relief on > judicial review will take into account the public interest, any disproportionate impact on the parties and the interests of third parties. [Emphasis added.]

[53] In the case at bar, the Court of Appeal stated that "[t]he court's discretion with respect to judicial review applies both to its decision to undertake review and to grant relief" (para. 44). This wording is unclear; thus, there is need for clarification.

[54] When an applicant brings an application for judicial review, a judge must consider the application: that is, at a minimum, the judge must determine whether judicial review is appropriate. If, in considering the application, the judge determines that one of the discretionary bases for refusing a remedy is present, they may decline to consider the merits of the judicial review application (Strickland, at paras. 1, 38 and 40; Matsqui, at para. 31). The judge also has the discretion to refuse to grant a remedy, even if they find that the decision under review is unreasonable (Khosa, at para. 135; Strickland, at para. 37, quoting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, at p. 90).

[55] The Court of Appeal initially found no reversible error in the Divisional Court's decision to refuse to hear the judicial review application and agreed with the Divisional Court that: (i) there were alternative remedies, and (ii) the legislative scheme demonstrates "the legislative intent to limit access to the courts regarding these disputes" (para. 43). The Court of Appeal then went on to conduct a judicial review, as had the Divisional Court.

[56] Per Strickland, the exercise of discretion requires the court to determine the appropriateness of judicial review: "The court should consider not only the available alternative, but also the suitability and appropriateness of judicial review in the circumstances. In short, the question is not simply whether some other remedy is adequate, but also whether judicial review is appropriate. . . . This balancing exercise should take account of the purposes and policy considerations underpinning the legislative scheme in issue . . ." (paras. 43-44).

[57] Respectfully, the Court of Appeal erred in its application of the Strickland factors. As I will explain, there is no proper basis to infer legislative intent to eliminate judicial review for issues (of fact and mixed fact and law) outside the scope of a statutory appeal. Furthermore, there was no adequate alternative remedy for Ms. Yatar on questions of fact and mixed fact and law.

[58] The Court of Appeal erred by holding that the limited right of appeal reflected an intention to restrict recourse to the courts on other questions arising from the administrative decision, and that judicial review should thus be rare. The legislative decision to provide for a right of appeal on questions of law only denotes an intention to subject LAT decisions on questions of law to correctness review. The idea that the LAT should not be subject to judicial review as to questions of facts and mixed facts and law cannot be inferred from this.

[59] The respondent TD Insurance argues that the legislative scheme and its amendments in 2016 reflects a policy choice by the legislature to severely limit the courts' involvement in accident benefits disputes: "Section 11(6) of the LAT Act restricts appeals to questions of law. . . . For LAT decisions made under nearly twenty other statutes, the legislature has made appeals available on all questions" (R.F., at paras. 62-63). TD Insurance further submits that "applying a deferential standard of review (reasonableness) to factual and mixed questions arising out of LAT decisions concerning SABS would not be appropriately respectful of the legislature's institutional design choices" (para. 84).

[60] With respect, I do not agree. The legislature could have decided to encompass all types of errors in the right to appeal, but it did not. Moreover, s. 2(1) of the Judicial Review Procedure Act preserves the right of litigants to seek a judicial review "despite any right of appeal". Errors of fact or mixed fact and law, thus, are not subject to a correctness standard of review. With that in mind, proceeding with judicial review of questions of fact or mixed fact and law is fully respectful of the legislature's institutional design choices.

[61] In Vavilov, this Court held that "because judicial review is protected by s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867, legislatures cannot shield administrative decision making from curial scrutiny entirely" (para. 24). Professor Paul Daly argues that "[w]here the judicial review jurisdiction of the courts has been successfully ousted by statute . . . the legislature has provided a particular channel for oversight of the legality, rationality and procedural fairness of administrative action" (Understanding Administrative Law in the Common Law World (2021), at p. 188 (emphasis in original)). In other words, there was an appropriate alternative forum or remedy.

[62] The statutory right to appeal and the LAT adjudicator's reconsideration decision do not constitute adequate alternative remedies. The right to appeal under s. 11(6) of the LAT Act is restricted to errors of law only. Ms. Yatar raises errors of fact or mixed fact and law. Review of these questions is not available under the statutory right of appeal.

[63] The access to internal reconsideration cannot be an adequate alternative remedy, as the reconsideration decision itself is the subject of the review. Alternatives do exist where internal review processes have not been exhausted or where there is a statutory right to appeal that is not restricted, such that questions of law, fact, and mixed fact and law could be considered on appeal. But, that is not so here.

[64] This Court in Strickland, at para. 43, also emphasizes the appropriateness of judicial review in the circumstances, referring to a "balancing exercise":

> The categories of relevant factors are not closed, as it is for courts to identify and balance the relevant factors in the context of a particular case: Matsqui, at paras. 36-37, citing [Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources], at p. 96. Assessing whether there is an adequate alternative remedy, therefore, is not a matter of following a checklist focused on the similarities and differences between the potentially available remedies. The inquiry is broader than that. The court should consider not only the available alternative, but also the suitability and appropriateness of judicial review in the circumstances. In short, the question is not simply whether some other remedy is adequate, but also whether judicial review is appropriate. Ultimately, this calls for a type of balance of convenience analysis: Khosa, at para. 36; TeleZone, at para. 56. As Dickson C.J. put it on behalf of the Court: "Inquiring into the adequacy of the alternative remedy is at one and the same time an inquiry into whether discretion to grant the judicial review remedy should be exercised. It is for the courts to isolate and balance the factors which are relevant . . ." [Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources], at p. 96). [Emphasis added.]

[65] It has been argued by both respondents that judicial review was not appropriate in the circumstances, as the legislative intent was to "streamline dispute resolution and reduce costs" (R.F., TD Insurance, at para. 61). Respectfully, I do not agree. Judicial economy is a legitimate concern. However, the countervailing consideration is to ensure that those whose interests are being decided by a statutory delegate have a meaningful and adequate means to challenge decisions that they consider to be unreasonable having regard to their substance and justification, or were taken in a way that was procedurally unfair.

[66] Thus, in this case, the elements of the reconsideration decision that are not covered by the limited right of appeal should be judicially reviewed.

[67] I turn now to whether the LAT adjudicator's decision was reasonable.

D. The LAT Adjudicator's Decision Was Unreasonable

[68] Ms. Yatar received a letter from the insurer in January 2011 advising her that she would not receive further IRBs, housekeeping and home maintenance benefits, as she had not submitted a disability certificate. Attached to the letter was a dispute resolution form.

[69] Ms. Yatar provided the disability certificate and per the letter she received from the insurer in February 2011, her IRBs were reinstated, but her housekeeping and home maintenance benefits were denied. Following another medical examination, the insurer denied further IRBs as set out in the letter of September 2011.

[70] Ms. Yatar argues that the letters of February and September 2011 are not valid denials as no dispute resolution form was attached. While the LAT adjudicator also arrived at that conclusion, Ms. Yatar submits that the LAT adjudicator erred in finding that the letter from January was a valid denial.

[71] Per Vavilov, two types of flaws can render a decision unreasonable: first, a "failure of rationality internal to the reasoning process", and second, "when a decision is in some respect untenable in light of the relevant factual and legal constraints that bear on it" (para. 101). The LAT adjudicator's reconsideration decision should be "approached as an organic whole, without a line-by-line treasure hunt for error" (Communications, Energy and Paperworkers Union of Canada, Local 30 v. Irving Pulp & Paper, Ltd., 2013 SCC 34, [2013] 2 S.C.R. 458, at para. 54).

[72] The LAT adjudicator relied on Smith v. Co-operators and concluded from the affidavit adduced by Ms. Yatar that there was an "implicit acceptance of the denials effective January 4, 2011" (reconsideration decision, at para. 15) and that her counsel should have been aware of the two-year limitation period, but that nothing was done to protect her rights.

[73] At the time, both s. 281.1(2)(b) of the Insurance Act and s. 51(2) of the SABS provided for a 90-day extension of the limitation period after the mediator's report was released. The LAT adjudicator took into account the fact that Ms. Yatar commenced the mediation process after receiving the September letter. The LAT adjudicator had regard to the letters as well as the mediation process, and concluded that "[t]he limitation period lapsed April 14, 2014, [at the end of] the statutory ninety-day extension following the report of the mediator" (preliminary decision, at para. 26, aff'd in reconsideration decision, at para. 17).

[74] However, the LAT adjudicator failed to have regard to the effect of the reinstatement of the IRBs between February and September. The LAT adjudicator did not consider earlier tribunal decisions, some of which had held that when an applicant's benefits are reinstated, the limitation period can only be triggered when they are validly terminated again (see Veldhuizen v. Coseco Insurance Co., 1995 ONICDRG 144 (CanLII); Rudnicki v. Certas Direct Insurance Co., 2001 ONFSCDRS 60 (CanLII)).

[75] It is not in question that Ms. Yatar initiated mediation in September 2012. The mediation took place between June 18, 2013 and January 14, 2014. On January 14, 2014, the mediator released his report. However, s. 281.1(2)(b) of the Insurance Act and s. 51(2) of the SABS

(as they existed at the time) do not trigger a 90-day limitation period from the release of the mediator's report. Rather, they provide for an extension of the two-year limitation period from the mediator's report. In other words, it is arguable that there still needed to be a valid denial of the IRBs to start the clock running. I do not purport to decide this question; it is one properly to be decided by the LAT.

[76] The LAT adjudicator failed to take into account relevant legal constraints. In light of this, his decision is unreasonable.

VII. Conclusion

[77] The appeal is allowed. Having concluded that the reconsideration decision is unreasonable, I send the matter back to the LAT adjudicator to consider the issue of the effects of the reinstatement of benefits on the validity of the initial denial and, thus, on the limitation period.

[78] As Ms. Yatar succeeded on the jurisprudential question relating to the exercise of discretion to undertake judicial review when there is a limited statutory right of appeal, and in the judicial review, she is awarded her costs in this Court and the courts below payable by TD Insurance.

ONTARIO
COURT OF APPEAL
HOULDEN, WEATHERSTON AND GOODMAN JJ.A.
6TH FEBRUARY 1984.

* On appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, notice of discontinuance filed, February 28, 1985. S.C.C. File No. 18620.

Contracts -- Misrepresentation -- Liability for negligent misrepresentation inducing contract -- Effect of clause excluding all representations not contained in written agreement.

The vendor of a farm informed the purchaser that the farm contained 65 workable acres honestly believing this to be true. The sale agreement provided that "there is no representation, warranty, collateral agreement or condition affecting this agreement or the Real Property or supported hereby, other than as expressed herein in writing". A few months after completion the purchaser discovered that the farm included only 51.7 workable acres. An action for damages succeeded at trial, the judge holding that the parties' true bargain was for the sale of 65 workable acres, and that the disclaimer clause did not prevail against breach of a fundamental term.

On appeal to the Ontario Court of Appeal, held, allowing the appeal, the statement as to acreage was a representation and not a warranty. It would have been actionable as a negligent misrepresentation, except for the clause in the contract which had the effect of excluding liability for all misrepresentations, including liability in tort for negligent misrepresentation.

Per Houlden J.A. dissenting: The disclaimer clause was not sufficiently clear to exclude liability for negligence.

APPEAL from a judgment of Reid J., 23 R.P.R. 265, in favour of the plaintiff in an action for damages for misrepresentation nand breach of contract.

Robert M. Thompson, for appellants.

Karlheinz K. Beyer, for respondents.

WEATHERSTON J.A.:-- This action arose out of the purchase and sale of a farm on the Nith River near Paris. During negotiation leading up to the sale, Kenneth Hayward, one of the purchasers, plaintiffs in this action, was informed by the real estate agent, and by Bruce Mellick who with his wife was the owner of the farm, that the farm contained 65 workable acres. "Workable" in this context means "under cultivation". That was the meaning agreed to by both Hayward and Mellick. Hayward relied on this information in his mind it was one of the factors that went to determine the purchase price. Mellick believed the information to be true. He had been told by his father and grandfather before him that the area of land under cultivation was 65 acres. The evidence is clear that he authorized the real estate agent to describe the farm as containing 65 workable acres.

The plaintiffs submitted an offer to purchase prepared by the vendors' agent in which the farm was described as "land size -- 94 acres". There was no term as to the acreage of workable land. The offer also contained the following term:

> It is agreed that there is no representation, warranty, collateral agreement or condition affecting this agreement or the Real Property or supported hereby, other than as expressed herein in writing.

After further negotiations Hayward submitted a second offer in the same form, except for agreed-to amendments which are not now material, and this offer was accepted. The transaction was completed in due course and a deed of conveyance was delivered. Several months later the plaintiffs discovered that the amount of workable land was only 51.7 acres.

The trial judge held that despite the parol evidence rule, "evidence was admissible to show that the bargain was not merely the purchase and sale of a 95 acre farm, but such a farm with 65 workable acres on it" [23 R.P.R. 265 at p. 269]. He found that the accepted offer to purchase was an incomplete statement of the parties' real intention. He said:

> Vendors agree that "the offer does not reflect the bargain":
> the bargain was to convey 65 workable acres. The written contract rested on the acceptance by both sides that the purchase and sale of 65 workable acres was what both sides intended to accomplish.

In the result, he found breach of a collateral contract, and negligent misrepresentation. He gave no effect to the disclaimer clause. He awarded the plaintiffs damages of $12,300.

In the passage from his reasons for judgment that I have quoted, the judge attributed to the vendors the words "the offer does not reflect the bargain". Those words do not appear in the transcript of the evidence. Mellick agreed that he thought the farm had 65 workable acres. I think the proper characterization of the agreement is that it was for the purchase and sale of a 94-acre farm containing two fields under cultivation which were thought by all parties to have areas of 60 and 5 acres respectively.

There can be no question on the facts found by the judge but that the plaintiffs were influenced by the erroneous statement by the defendants' agent, confirmed by the defendant Mellick, that it contained 65 workable acres. The only question is whether that statement can survive the accepted offer to purchase and the conveyance of the land as an actionable statement.

In Redican et al. v. Nesbitt, 1923 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1924] S.C.R. 135 at p. 146, [1924] 1 D.L.R. 536 at p. 543, [1924] 1 W.W.R. 305, Duff J. said:

> The vendee may rely after completion upon warranty, contractual condition, error in substantialibus, or fraud. Once the conveyance is settled and the estate has passed, it seems a reasonable application of the rule to hold that as to warranty or contractual condition resort must be had to the deed unless there has been a stipulation at an earlier stage which was not to be superseded by the deed, as in the case of a contract for compensation.

That passage governed real estate practice in this province for many years. But in Fraser-Reid et al. v. Droumtsekas et al., 1979 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 720 at p. 738, 103 D.L.R. (3d) 385 at p. 397, 9 R.P.R. 121, Dickson J. said:

> There is no presumption of merger. The proper inquiry should be to determine whether the facts disclose a common intention to merge the warranties in the deed; absent proof of such intention, there is no merger.

The vendor's statement that the farm contained 65 workable acres was not part of the accepted offer to purchase. It was either an innocent misrepresentation made without fault, but which, before completion, might have given rise to the remedy of rescission, or an innocent, but negligent misrepresentation, or a collateral warranty, either of which would give rise to the remedy of damages after completion.

In my opinion, the statement was not a collateral warranty. I quote again from the judgment of Dickson J. in Fraser-Reid, supra, at pp. 731-2 S.C.R., p. 392 D.L.R.:

An affirmation at the time of sale is a warranty provided it appears on the evidence to have been so intended: per Buller J. in Pasley v. Freeman (1789), 3 T.R. 51 [100 E.R. 450] (K.B.D.). No special form of words is necessary. In De Lassalle v. Guildford, [1901] 2 K.B. 215 (C.A.) at p. 221, A. L. Smith, M.R., said:

"It must be a collateral undertaking forming part of the contract by agreement of the parties express or implied, and must be given during the course of the dealing which leads to the bargain, and should then enter into the bargain as part of it."

The real estate agent was undoubtedly authorized to inform potential purchasers that the farm contained 65 workable acres, but he had no authority to enter into contractual obligations on the vendors' behalf: see Hill v. Harris, [1965] 2 All E.R. 358 at p. 362, per Diplock L.J. As to Mellick himself, the plaintiff Hayward, whose evidence the trial judge accepted, testified:

Q. All right now, what happened after you had completed the inspection of the house, did you have any conversation with anybody at that time?

A. The only conversation I had with Mr. and Mrs. Mellick was upon leaving their house with Mr. Etherington we were putting on our coats and hats and I just wanted to confirm with Mr. Mellick on the workable land and I asked him if the cultivated land that he was farming was the 65 workable acres.

Q. And what did he reply?

A. He agreed with Mr. Etherington that he was working 65 acres.

. . . . .

Q. And you looked over the barn and you went over on to the hill overlooking the property with Mr. Etherington?

A. That is right.

Q. Mr. Mellick was not present?

A. That is right.

Q. And you could see the land from there?

A. You could see -- we looked at it from two different angles, one being the east side of the barn and the other being the west side.

Q. And it was fully visible to you, you could see?

A. You could see the outline of the farm.

Q. All right, and what was the conversation that took place while you were standing on the hill overlooking the farm between yourself and Mr. Etherington?

A. Mr. Etherington pointed out the bush, the western boundary of the property, in the large area -- may I?

Q. Certainly.

A. On this angle here pointed out this large field, having 60 acres in it and the bottom field, small field between the bush and the river flats having 5 acres in it. Standing on the east side of the barn you can see most of the river flats to the bridge, this area right in here is obstructed by these trees.

. . . . .

Q. All right, and then after that conversation which took about, and the inspection which took about 15 to 20 minutes, I understand you went up to the house and you did not speak to either Mr. or Mrs. Mellick in the house; is that correct?

A. We were introduced and they gave Larry permission for us to go through it.

Q. But there was no discussion concerning with either Mr. or Mrs. Mellick in the house?

A. Until we were about to leave.

Q. Until we were about to leave?

A. Yes.

Q. And it's my understanding that you did not have any conversation with Mrs. Mellick but rather it was Mr. Mellick you had the conversation with?

A. That is right.

Q. And that conversation was as you put it confirming --

A. The 65 workable.

Q. All right, I take it there wasn't a long conversation?

A. No.

Q. And it was commenced by you asking a question of Mr. Mellick?

A. Yes, it was.

Q. And what exactly was that question?

A. The question was the land that he had cultivated and he had in crops was the 65 acres of workable land, was it 65 acres?

Q. That was the question that you put to him?

A. That was.

Q. He was able to answer it?

A. I went away from there confirming what Larry had showed me.

Q. What did he say?

A. He told me that the land that he had under cultivation was 65 acres.

. . . . .

Q. The only thing Mr. Mellick said to you is I have 65 acres under cultivation?

A. Yes.

Q. That is all he said in this entire transaction?

A. Yes.

Q. Concerning acreage?

A. Yes.

Q. And do I take it that you assumed that he knew what you were talking about?

A. Yes.

HIS LORDSHIP: You assumed what?

A. That there were 65 acres of workable land that was stated on the listing, that was shown to me by Mr. Etherington. There were no statements of approximately 60 acres or 65 or this might be five or this might be four acres, this might be 64 acres or this parcel or anything, it was 60 in this parcel, five in the other.

Q. And you assumed that he knew what you were talking about?

A. That is correct.

In light of the circumstances and the informal manner in which this response from Mellick was obtained, I think it is impossible to infer that he intended it to be a matter of contract between him and Hayward. It was merely an affirmation of what the real estate agent had already said. As such, it was a representation. That representation was only his own information and belief, but it was, nevertheless, a representation because it was stated as a matter of fact. It was a negligent misrepresentation because it was made without personal knowledge of the fact or even information that the fields had been carefully measured. He must have known that the acreage was important to Hayward, and he said nothing to qualify his statement, or to tell Hayward to satisfy himself. The fields were irregular in shape, it was winter-time, and he must or should have known that Hayward would rely on him.

Since Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd., [1964] A.C. 465, it has been clear that a negligent misrepresentation, if made to a person to whom the representor owed a duty of care, will give rise to a cause of action for damages. Lord Reid said at p. 483:

> So it seems to me that there is good sense behind our present law that in general an innocent but negligent misrepresentation gives no cause of action. There must be something more than the mere misstatement. I therefore turn to the authorities to see what more is required. The most natural requirement would be that expressly or by implication from the circumstances the speaker or writer has undertaken some responsibility, and that appears to me not to conflict with any authority which is binding on this House. Where there is a contract there is no difficulty as regards the contracting parties: the question is whether there is a warranty.

This sounds as if there is no cause of action for a negligent misstatement made in pre-contract negotiations, unless it amounted to a warranty. But Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd. v. Mardon, [1976] 2 All E.R. 5, decided otherwise. Lord Denning said [at p. 16]:

> It seems to me that Hedley Byrne, properly understood, covers this particular proposition: if a man, who has or professes to have special knowledge or skill, makes a representation by virtue thereof to another--be it advice, information or opinion--with the intention of inducing > him to enter into a contract with him, he is under a duty to use reasonable care to see that the representation is correct, and that the advice, information or opinion is reliable. If he negligently gives unsound advice or misleading information or expresses an erroneous opinion, and thereby induces the other side into a contract with him, he is liable in damages.

Esso Petroleum was followed in this Court in Sodd Corp. Inc. v. Tessis (1977), 1977 CanLII 1415 (ON CA), 17 O.R. (2d) 158, 79 D.L.R. (3d) 632, 25 C.B.R. (N.S.) 16, and by Rutherford J. in Ronald Elwyn Lister Ltd. v. Dunlop Canada Ltd. (1978), 1978 CanLII 2165 (ON SC), 19 O.R. (2d) 380 and 25 O.R. (2d) 155n, 85 D.L.R. (3d) 321 and 1980 CanLII 2740 (ON SC), 104 D.L.R. (3d) 702n, 41 C.P.R. (2d) 196. The Lister case went on to the Supreme Court of Canada, 1982 CanLII 19 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 726, 135 D.L.R. (3d) 1, 65 C.P.R. (2d) 1], but there was no cross-appeal on this point.

In the present case Mellick professed to have special knowledge of the number of workable acres. He knew that there was no easy way for Hayward to satisfy himself. The question then becomes whether the accepted offer to purchase contained all the agreed terms and conditions of the contract, or whether the representation continued as an underlying basis of the contract, giving rise to an action in tort in addition to the contractual rights.

In Case Threshing Machine Co. v. Mitten et al. (1919), 1919 CanLII 527 (SCC), 59 S.C.R. 118, 49 D.L.R. 30, [1919] 3 W.W.R. 601, the respondents had purchased a farm tractor. The agreement provided that "no representations, warranty or conditions, expressed or implied, other than those herein contained nor ... any agreement collateral hereto be binding upon the vendor unless it is in writing" [p. 123 S.C.R., p. 34 D.L.R.]. The engine had two tanks, one labelled "kerosene" and one "gasoline". The agent of the appellant vendor represented to the respondents that the engine would also operate on kerosene, but it stopped whenever so operated.

> The written contract declares in explicit words that the terms of the agreement between the parties are to be found in the writing and in the writing exclusively. In face of this provision it is not, in my opinion, competent for a court of law to resort to contemporary conversations or prior conversations or even to the legend on the article for the purpose of discovering a contract differing in its terms from that expressed in the unambiguous language of the instrument.

Hill v. Harris, supra, was a case where a sublease was being negotiated to a person who intended to use the premises for a confectionery and tobacco business. The lessee's agents said that would be all right. Correspondence was exchanged between the respective solicitors and a sublease was entered into. Later, under a clause in the head lease, the landlord refused to consent to the intended use of the premises. There was no term in the sublease by which the sublessor warranted that the sublessee could carry on his intended business. It was held that there was no collateral warranty. Diplock L.J. said [at p. 363] that the "letters, statements and discussions were made in the course of negotiations. They were superseded by the terms of the lease entered into between the parties. The only rights which the sub-lessee has are the rights conferred on him by the lease".

That case was decided after Hedley Byrne but before Esso Petroleum, but I think the result would have been the same if the lessees' agent's words "that would be all right" had been regarded as a misrepresentation. In either case one starts with the assumption that if a contract has been put in writing, all terms material to the contract will be embodied in the writing. Otherwise it would be a meaningless exercise to create the written document.

There are cases of a negligent misrepresentation inducing the misrepresentee to enter into an improvident contract, where the representation is as to some overriding or collateral matter. Esso Petroleum was such a case. Then the representation is entirely outside the terms of the contract, and a disclaimer clause does not affect liability for the misrepresentation unless it is effective as a disclaimer of responsibility. But there are other cases where the representation is as to the quality or fitness of the subject-matter of the contract, as in Case Threshing Machine Co. In such a case the rights of the parties must be governed by all the terms of the contract, including a disclaimer clause if there is one.

Here, the representation that the farm contained 65 workable acres was descriptive of the subject-matter of the contract, and so the rights of the parties are to be governed by the terms of the contract.

The trial judge dismissed the disclaimer clause on the ground that there was no evidence that either side paid any attention to it at the time. Further, he said it was wholly at odds with their common intention in respect of a matter fundamental to the contract [p. 270]: "A disclaimer clause will not prevail against breach of a fundamental term."

Hayward did pay attention to the clause. He said that he had read it, and that it meant "that there was 94 acres". In my opinion, this answer is consistent with the view that the plaintiffs did not rely on any representation as to acreage other than that which was stated in the offer to purchase.

The doctrine that a fundamental breach of contract deprived the party in breach of the benefit of clauses in the contract excluding or limiting his liability was laid to rest by the House of Lords in Photo Production Ltd. v. Securicor Transport Ltd., [1980] 1 All E.R. 556. The headnote sums up the effect of the decision as follows:

> There was no rule of law by which an exception clause in a contract could be eliminated from a consideration of the parties' position when there was a breach of contract (whether fundamental or not) or by which an exception clause could be deprived of effect regardless of the terms of the contract, because the parties were free to agree to whatever exclusion or modification of their obligations they chose and therefore the question whether an exception clause applied when there was a fundamental breach, breach of a fundamental term or any other breach, turned on the construction of the whole of the contract, including any exception clauses, and because (per Lord Diplock) the parties were free to reject or modify by express words both their primary obligations to do that which they had promised and also any secondary obligations to pay damages arising on breach of a primary obligation.

The courts of this province have followed the Court of Appeal of England in holding that a fundamental breach of contract relieves the innocent party of a disclaimer clause. I so held in Cain et al. v. Bird Chevrolet-Oldsmobile Ltd. et al. (1976), 1976 CanLII 615 (ON SC), 12 O.R. (2d) 532, 69 D.L.R. (3d) 484; affirmed on this point 1977 CanLII 1283 (ON CA), 20 O.R. (2d) 569n, 88 D.L.R. (3d) 607n. Since the courts of this province adopted the doctrine from the English courts, I think we should now follow their lead in rejecting it as a rule of law. Nevertheless, there are many cases in our courts decided before the doctrine was invented, which held that where there was a significant failure by one party to perform his contractual obligations, he was not insulated against liability by an exemption clause. I gave some examples in Cain, supra. Those cases are still good law. They are not relevant to this case.

A disclaimer clause (sometimes called exemption, or exceptions or exclusion clauses) is to be strictly construed, and will not protect the party relying on it from his negligence if "the head of damage may be based on some ground other than that of negligence": see Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry, Ltd., [1945] 1 All E.R. 244; Canada Steamship Lines, Ltd. v. The King, 1952 CanLII 260 (UK JCPC), [1952] 2 D.L.R. 786 at p. 794, [1952] A.C. 192, [1952] 1 All E.R. 305 at p. 310 (P.C.) Those cases dealt with negligent performance of contracts.

The case against the defendants is one of negligent misrepresentation, but I think it would be too strained a construction of the disclaimer clause to say that it applies only to representations that are not negligent. I think that effect must be given to it, and that it should be held that the representation that the farm had 65 workable acres was excluded by the disclaimer clause, and did not create a liability of the defendants to the plaintiffs outside the contract.

Accordingly, the appeal must be allowed with costs and the action dismissed with costs.

GOODMAN J.A. concurs with WEATHERSTON J.A.

The plaintiffs were induced to enter into the agreement to purchase the defendants' farm by the representation of the defendants' agent, confirmed by the defendant Bruce Corless Mellick, that the farm contained 65 workable acres. The amount of workable land was only 51.7 acres.

I agree with Weatherston J.A. that, on the facts of this case, the representation did not amount to a collateral warranty. The trial judge found, however, that the representation was made negligently. If it were not for the disclaimer clause in the agreement of purchase and sale, the plaintiffs would clearly be entitled to damages: Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd. v. Mardon, [1976] 2 All E.R. 5; Sodd Corp. Inc. v. Tessis (1977), 1977 CanLII 1415 (ON CA), 17 O.R. (2d) 158, 79 D.L.R. (3d) 632, 25 C.B.R. (N.S.) 16.

The disclaimer clause reads as follows:

> It is agreed that there is no representation, warranty, collateral agreement or condition affecting this agreement or the Real Property or supported hereby other than as expressed herein in writing.

The crucial issue in this appeal is: What is the effect of the clause? Does it include a negligent misrepresentation that has induced the making of the contract? With the greatest deference, I cannot accept Weatherston J.A.'s view that there are two kinds of negligent misrepresentation, one of which relates to a collateral matter, and one of which relates to quality or fitness of the subject-matter of the contract. In my opinion, the appeal turns on the construction of the disclaimer clause. If the clause is wide enough to include a negligent misrepresentation that induces a purchaser to enter into the agreement of purchase and sale, the appeal should be allowed; if it is not, the appeal should be dismissed.

The clause, as I read it, provides that the written agreement contains all the terms of the bargain between the parties and that all antecedent representations, warranties, collateral agreements and conditions are of no effect. The clause is, in my judgment, simply a restatement of the parol evidence rule. The classic statement of that rule is contained in Goss v. Lord Nugent (1833), 5 B. & Ad. 57, 110 E.R. 713, where Lord Denman C.J. said (at pp. 64-5 B. & Ad., p. 716 E.R.):

> By the general rules of the common law, if there be a contract which has been reduced into writing, verbal evidence is not allowed to be given of what passed between the parties, either before the written instrument was made, or during the time that it was in a state of preparation, so as to add to or subtract from, or in any manner to vary or qualify the written contract ...

Would the parol evidence rule prevent the giving of evidence of a negligent misrepresentation which induced the making of a contract? In my opinion, the answer is no. In De Lassalle v. Guildford, [1901] 2 K.B. 215, the plaintiff and the defendant entered into negotiations for a lease of the defendant's house. The terms were arranged, and the counterpart of a lease was signed by the plaintiff. The plaintiff refused to hand over the counterpart until he received an assurance from the defendant that the drains were in good order. The defendant orally represented that they were in this condition, and upon receiving this assurance, the plaintiff delivered the counterpart to the defendant. The lease contained no reference to the drains. It subsequently turned out that the drains were not in good order, and the plaintiff incurred expense in altering the sanitary arrangements. The jury found that there was a representation by the defendant that the drains were in good order; they negatived fraudulent misrepresentation; and they assessed the damages sustained by the plaintiff as a result of the defendant's misrepresentation. The trial judge, however, dismissed the action. The plaintiff appealed and the appeal was allowed.

At the time of the De Lasalle case there was no cause of action for damages for negligent misrepresentation. The Court of Appeal, in reversing the trial judge, found that the defendant's representation amounted to a collateral warranty. Since a negligent misrepresentation now gives a cause of action for damages, the distinction between collateral warranty and negligent misrepresentation is no longer of importance where the court finds that the representation amounts to a negligent misrepresentation.

It was contended by counsel for the defendant that the lease being in writing, it must be taken that the writing was intended to be the whole contract. The Court of Appeal, in a unanimous judgment, rejected this submission. The court held that, notwithstanding the fact that the lease made no mention of the drains, the defendant's statement as to the condition of the drains having induced the plaintiff to enter into the lease, it was admissible in evidence and effect could be given to it. As A. L. Smith M.R. said (at p. 222):

> The warranty in no way contradicts the lease, and without the warranty the lease never would have been executed.

Similarly, here, the representation as to the number of workable acres in no way contradicts the terms of the agreement of purchase and sale, and without the representation the plaintiffs would never have entered into the agreement.

The importance of the representation being the thing which induces the making of the contract is noted in Mendelssohn v. Normand Ltd., [1970] 1 Q.B. 177. In that case, the plaintiff parked a car in the defendants' parking garage. He was told by the attendant that he should leave his car unlocked. The plaintiff told the attendant that he had valuable luggage in the back seat. The plaintiff, however, as requested, gave his car keys to the attendant who agreed to lock the car as soon as he had moved it. The attendant gave the plaintiff a ticket which contained a clause relieving the defendant of "responsibility for any loss or damage sustained by the vehicle its accessories or contents however caused". The attendant failed to lock the car and the plaintiff 's luggage was stolen. The county court judge held the defendants liable for the loss. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal and held that the defendants could not shelter behind the exemption clause. Lord Denning M.R. said (at pp. 183-4):

> There are many cases in the books when a man has made, by word of mouth, a promise or a representation of fact, on which the other party acts by entering into the contract. In all such cases the man is not allowed to repudiate his representation by reference to a printed condition, see Couchman v. Hill [1947] K.B. 554; Curtis v. Chemical Cleaning and Dyeing Co. [1951] 1 K.B. 805; and Harling v. Eddy [1951] 2 K.B. 739; nor is he allowed to go back on his promise by reliance on a written clause, see City and Westminster Properties (1934) Ltd. v. Mudd [1959] Ch. 129, 145 by Harman J. The reason is because the oral promise or representation has a decisive influence on the transaction--it is the very thing which induces the other to contract--and it would be most unjust to allow the maker to go back on it. The printed condition is rejected because it is repugnant to the express oral promise or representation. As Devlin J. said in Firestone Tyre and Rubber Co. Ltd. v. Vokins & Co. Ltd. [1951] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 32, 39: "It is illusory to say: 'We promise to do a thing, but we are not liable if we do not do it'." To avoid this illusion, the law gives the oral promise priority over the printed clause.

and to the same effect Phillimore L.J. said (at pp. 185-6):

> The submission which Mr. Yorke made is that but for the conversations which Mr. Mendelssohn had with the employee of the defendants it is obvious that he would have made other arrangements or perhaps he would not have left the car there at all. He was clearly concerned about his luggage, and it seems to me that he was induced to leave the car there by a firm promise that it would be locked. Whether you regard that promise as a representation or whether you regard it as a collateral term of the contract, or whether you regard the contract as being partly oral and partly in writing in the shape of the ticket, it seems to me it can make no real difference. It is quite clear that if it was really a representation, then, on the authority of Curtis v. Chemical Cleaning and Dyeing Co. [1951] 1 K.B. 805, the defendants could not in such circumstances, namely, the representation being made and believed, rely upon their exemption clauses. In the words of Denning L.J. in that case at p. 808:

> "In my opinion any behaviour, by words or conduct, is sufficient to be a misrepresentation if it is such as to mislead the other party about the existence or extent of the exemption. If it conveys a false impression, that is enough. If the false impression is created knowingly, it is a fraudulent misrepresentation; if it is created unwittingly, it is an innocent misrepresentation; but either is sufficient to disentitle the creator of it to the benefit of the exemption."

I would refer also to J. Evans & Son (Portsmouth) Ltd. v. Andrea Merzario Ltd., [1976] 2 All E.R. 930, and Brikom Investments Ltd. v. Carr et al., [1979] Q.B. 467.

In Carman Construction Ltd. v. Canadian Pacific R. Co. et al. (1980), 1980 CanLII 1721 (ON SC), 28 O.R. (2d) 232, 109 D.L.R. (3d) 288; affirmed by the Court of Appeal, 1981 CanLII 69 (ON CA), 33 O.R. (2d) 472, 124 D.L.R. (3d) 680; affirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada, 1982 CanLII 52 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 958, 136 D.L.R. (3d) 193, 18 B.L.R. 65, the plaintiff was invited by the defendant to tender for a contract for the excavation and removal of a section of earth and rock. The plaintiff received from the defendant a tender package which contained, among other things, a specimen form of the contract to be entered into. Before submitting its tender, the vice-president of the plaintiff discussed with an employee of the defendant the quantity of rock to be excavated and was informed that it would be 7,000 to 7,500 cu. yd. On the basis of this representation, the plaintiff tendered for the work and was awarded the contract. The contract contained the following clause [p. 238 O.R., p. 294 D.L.R.]:

> "3.1 It is hereby declared and agreed by the Contractor that this Agreement has been entered into by him on his own knowledge respecting the nature and conformation of the ground upon which the work is to be done, the location, character, quality and quantities of the material to be removed, the character of the equipment and facilities needed, the general and local conditions and all other matters which can in any way affect the work under this Agreement, and the Contractor does not rely upon any information given or statement made to him in relation to the work by the Company."

The vice-president of the plaintiff admitted that he had read the provisions of cl. 3.1 in the draft contract before submitting the plaintiff 's tender. The amount of rock to be excavated turned out to be some 11,000 cu. yd., and the plaintiff sued the defendant for the extra expense that it had incurred in performing the contract.

Griffiths J., the trial judge, held that the defendant could rely on the exemption clause in the contract and dismissed the action. His judgment was affirmed by a majority of the Court of Appeal (Brooke J.A. dissenting). Wilson J.A., who delivered the judgment of the majority, said (at p. 473 O.R., p. 681 D.L.R.):

> This is not, in the view of the majority, a case in which, after making a negligent misrepresentation to the plaintiff in order to induce it to enter into a contract, the terms of which were at the time of the misrepresentation unknown, the defendant thereafter inserts into the contract an exculpatory clause in order to insulate itself against antecedent tort liability. This is a case in which the plaintiff tendered knowing that in the very contract on which it was tendering it had agreed to assume the risk of using any information obtained by it from the defendant's > employees. There is no basis in these circumstances for the exercise of the Court's equitable jurisdiction.

(Emphasis is mine.)

The Supreme Court of Canada, in a unanimous judgment, affirmed the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal. Martland J., speaking for the court, agreed with the Court of Appeal that the plaintiff had relied on the information furnished to it by the defendant at its own risk. Following Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd., [1964] A.C. 465, he held that cl. 3.1 of the contract had the effect of excluding the assumption of a duty of care by the defendant. He drew a distinction between the traditional exemption clause and a clause such as cl. 3.1 (at p. 972 S.C.R., p. 203 D.L.R.):

> The judgment at trial dealt with the situation on the basis that negligent misrepresentation had been established, but that clause 3.1 was an exemption clause which exempted C.P.R. from liability. In the circumstances of this case, I would prefer to regard the clause as establishing that C.P.R. did not assume any duty of care, and a claim in negligence will not arise in the absence of a duty of care.

and at p. 973 S.C.R., p. 204 D.L.R., he said:

> [Clause 3.1] is what the Court of Appeal described as a non- reliance provision, the effect of which was to prevent liability arising on the part of C.P.R. in respect of statements made or information given by its employees.

Clause 3.1 in the Carman case is, of course, different in wording from the disclaimer clause in the present case. In my opinion, however, the case falls squarely within the example given by Wilson J.A. that I have italicized. Here, the defendants made a negligent misrepresentation to the plaintiffs in order to induce them to enter into the agreement of purchase and sale, the terms of the agreement being unknown at the time that the misrepresentation was made, and the defendants are now attempting to rely on the disclaimer clause to insulate themselves against the antecedent tort liability arising from the misrepresentation.

A disclaimer clause could, of course, be drawn that would include antecedent negligent misrepresentations that induce the making of a contract. But if the clause is to have this effect, I believe that it must expressly so provide; otherwise it will not be given that coverage: see Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry, Ltd., [1945] 1 K.B. 189; Canada Steamship Lines, Ltd. v. The King, 1952 CanLII 260 (UK JCPC), [1952] 2 D.L.R. 786, [1952] A.C. 192, 5 W.W.R. (N.S.) 609; Chitty on Contracts, 25th ed. (1978), para. 879.

I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal allowed.

Civil procedure -- Judgments and orders -- Motion to set aside judgment on grounds of fraud -- Fraudulent evidence given at trial -- Fraudulent evidence not relating to material issue -- Issue not material if it is clear that different resolution of issue could not have affected result of trial --

Motion to set aside judgment dismissed -- Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, rule 59.06.

Judgments and orders -- Motion to set aside judgment on grounds of fraud -- Fraudulent evidence given at trial -- Fraudulent evidence not relating to material issue -- Issue not material if it is clear that different resolution of issue could not have affected result of trial -- Motion to set aside judgment dismissed -- Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, rule 59.06.

In three separate actions, the plaintiffs had sought to establish that JV had a right pursuant to s. 10(1) of the Interest Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-15, and s. 18(1) of the Mortgages Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.40, to prepay long-term mortgages granted by corporate mortgagors to the defendant Sun Life. JV had signed each mortgage as an additional covenantor, and in those proceedings, JV had testified that, to the knowledge of Sun Life, the mortgages had been placed by corporate mortgagors holding as a bare trustee as a matter of convenience for him, and he testified that there was a common intention that he should have a right to redeem the mortgages after five years notwithstanding the absence of any right of prepayment in the mortgages. JV testified that he had been assured by a representative of Sun Life that he would be able to prepay the mortgages. The trial judge, however, held that JV was mistaken in his evidence about Sun Life's knowledge and about the assurances of a right of repayment. Further, the trial judge held that had the assurances been given, they had been made by a person without authority to bind Sun Life. In each action, Sun Life relied on ss. 10(2) of the Interest Act and s. 18(2) of the Mortgages Act, respectively, which exempt the statutory right of prepayment when the mortgagor is a corporation. In each action, Sun Life called evidence from RS, who was then its vice-president of investments. RS testified that only long-term mortgage investments were matched with Sun Life's long-term fixed income obligations. In judgments affirmed by the Court of Appeal, the trial judge held that JV had no statutory right of prepayment. The Court of Appeal held that the result would not have been different even if Sun Life had been aware of the bare trust relationship.

After the Supreme Court of Canada had refused to grant leave to appeal the judgment of the Court of Appeal, JV discovered that RS's evidence was false. Contrary to his evidence, Sun Life matched substantial amounts of short-term mortgages with Sun Life's long-term fixed income obligations. The plaintiffs moved pursuant to rule 59.06(2)(a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure for orders setting aside the three judgments on the ground of fraud.

Held, the motion should be dismissed.

Under rule 59.06 of the Rules of Civil Procedure and as a part of its equitable jurisdiction, the court has the jurisdiction to set aside a judgment on the grounds of fraud. Fraud in this context is sometimes described as "common-law fraud" and is an essential element of the tort of deceit, where fraud is proved when it is shown that a misrepresentation has been made knowingly or without belief in its truth or recklessly whether it be true or false. Proof of the absence of a belief in the truth of the misrepresentation is sufficient to make the misstatement fraudulent. RS's evidence with respect to the allocation of mortgage investments by Standard Life was fraudulent. His statements were untrue and he had no honest belief in their truth. However, a judgment will not be set aside on the basis of perjury or other fraudulent conduct unless it relates to a material issue at the trial, although not necessarily a decisive issue. Materiality is a matter of degree, and whether an issue is material should be determined first by an examination of the pleadings, but the evidence at trial should also be considered. An issue will not be material if it is clear that a different resolution of the issue could not have affected the result of the trial. For this purpose, a review of the reasons of the trial judge is necessary, but it is not the role of the reviewing court to analyze the reasons to determine whether the trial judge would have regarded the fraud as related to a material issue. An issue may not be material if a party does not rely on it at trial, although there may be circumstances where it would still be material because the fraud affected decisions about the conduct of a party's case. While the outcome of, and the reasons given on, an appeal may need to be considered on the question of materiality, the weight, if any, to be given these matters will depend upon how the grounds of appeal were or may have been affected by findings on factual issues that were tainted by the fraudulent evidence at the trial.

In the immediate case, the alleged statutory rights of JV provided the main focus of the plaintiffs' case at trial and RS's untruthful evidence did not relate to this issue. The plaintiffs argued, however, that the issue of a common intention that JV should have a right of prepayment was a material issue. But this would not be the case unless the issue of common intention was fairly raised by the pleadings and, on the assumption that JV's evidence had been believed and RS's evidence had been untruthful, it could have provided a possible basis or step in the reasoning for a decision that JV was entitled to rights of prepayment. Further, there would also need to be evidence that the issue was relied upon at trial or at least evidence that makes it reasonable to conclude that, but for the fraud, it might have been relied upon. These factors had not been established. There was no allegation of a common intention in the plaintiffs' pleadings and JV's evidence at trial did not provide any significant support for the submission that the existence of a common intention was a material issue in the actions. The finding that there could not have been an assurance binding on Sun Life precluded JV's allegations of a common intention from being a material issue as, even if RS had testified truthfully, there would have been no evidence that Sun Life had the alleged common intention. On the basis of the pleadings, the evidence at trial, and the findings with respect to the alleged assurances, RS's evidence was not related to a material issue and the motions to set aside the judgments should be dismissed.

CULLITY J.: -- This motion was brought by the plaintiffs in three actions against the defendant, Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada ("Sun Life"). In each of the actions the plaintiffs were unsuccessful in establishing that Mr. Joel Vale had a right to prepay an otherwise long-term mortgage in which the corporate plaintiff was the mortgagor, Mr. Vale was an additional covenantor and Sun Life was the mortgagee. Appeals to the Court of Appeal were subsequently dismissed and leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was refused. The plaintiffs now seek an order pursuant to rule 59.06(2)(a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure setting aside the judgment in each of the actions on the ground of fraud, or of facts arising or discovered after the judgments were delivered. The allegation of fraud arises out of evidence given at trial by an employee of Sun Life, Mr. Robert Sharkey.

Background

The relevant aspects of the facts will be described in more detail later in these reasons. The following general summary is intended merely to provide the context in which the issues in this motion arose.

The mortgages in question were on properties in Toronto located at 77 Spencer Avenue, 470 Roncesvalles Avenue, and 829 Birchmount Road. Title to the properties in Spencer Avenue and Birchmount Road was registered in the name of H.L.V. Trading Limited, while that to the property in Roncesvalles Avenue was in the name of J.V. Trading Limited. Mr. Vale's evidence was that, in each case, title had been placed in the name of the corporation for his convenience and was held by the particular corporation as a nominee or bare trustee for him. Although the mortgage documents did not disclose the existence of this relationship, Mr. Vale alleged that it was known to Sun Life. As already mentioned, Mr. Vale executed each mortgage as an additional covenantor.

Each of the actions involved a claim by Mr. Vale that he was entitled to exercise the rights of a mortgagor under s. 10(1) of the Interest Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-15, and s. 18(1) of the Mortgages Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. M.40, to prepay, after five years, the amount advanced under the particular mortgage (respectively the "Spencer mortgage", "Birchmount mortgage", and the "Roncesvalles mortgage"). None of the mortgage documents contained a right of prepayment and Mr. Vale was advised of this by his solicitors for two of the transactions.

Sun Life, the mortgagee under the mortgages, denied that any such statutory right existed on the ground that the mortgagor in each case was the corporate plaintiff from whom the right to prepay conferred upon individuals was withheld by virtue of s. 10(2) of the Interest Act and s. 18(2) of the Mortgages Act.

The actions were tried together in May and June 1995. Mr. Robert Sharkey was called as a witness for Sun Life. Mr. Sharkey has degrees in mathematics, and philosophy from McGill University. He is a Fellow of the Society of Actuaries and a Fellow of the Canadian Institute of Actuaries. At the time he gave evidence on May 30, 1995, he was vice-president of investments in the corporate office of Sun Life and had been employed by Sun Life for 17 years. Mr. Sharkey testified that Sun Life had allocated the mortgages to various accounts or funds (the "Funds") where they were, in effect, matched with obligations of Sun Life. The thrust of part of his evidence was that each of the funds to which the mortgages were allocated contained long-term fixed income obligations. In his affidavits filed in this motion, he testified that the purpose of his evidence was to demonstrate that Sun Life treated the mortgages from Mr. Vale's corporations as long-term mortgages and, in consequence, allocated them to long-term obligations of Sun Life.

The transcript of Mr. Sharkey's evidence-in-chief and cross- examination includes the following questions and answers (the italics are mine):

> (evidence in chief)
>
> Q. Mr. Sharkey, can you tell from looking at that document then to what allocation was the Spencer mortgage made?
>
> A. Yes, Spencer Mortgage was made to Fund 223, which is an individual retirement annuity fund, which our monthly pay level amount annuities for the life an individual typically.

Q. Right.

A. And very long-term is a consequence, and we would only allocate long-term fixed income investment in this type of fund . . .

Q. Okay. Stop there for a second. And the next one, which one have you got next, is that Birchmount?

A. Birchmount is allocated to Fund 270, which is a long-term disability fund, and basically it's also long-term because you need to keep making medical -- or payment for support disability until the person recovers, which is, on average, a fairly long period of time. So, once again, you would only allocate longer term investments to this type of fund . . .

Q. And the last document?

A. Roncesvalles. It's allocated to Fund 241, which is a pension retirement annuities. So when people working for a company retire, typically age 65, they would begin to receive a monthly level payment for the balance of their life, and, once again, we would never allocate a short term investment to this fund. We would only allocate longer term fixed income investments.

(cross-examination)

Q. . . . and I take it that there are several mortgages that are allocated against each of these funds?

A. Yeah, there's a few hundred million mortgages in each of these funds, each one being long term of course.

Q. Oh, I understand. And when you talk about long term, what you do is look at the term of the mortgage, whether it's 15 years, whether its 20 years, where do you draw the line about long term? What's a long term mortgage, anything longer than a year?

A. No, long term in segments 240 -- the two retirement annuities funds would be 15 and 20 year mortgages and in the long term disability, they would be 10 year or longer terms, so it would be an error to allocate mortgages to either -- any of these three segments that had a term of less than 10 years.

Q. And you don't -- what you look at is the term of the mortgage?

A. No, in fact, we examine the entire document looking for special conditions, and I must say the top priority special condition is pre-payment privileges, and that sets off alarm bells, and if there were prepayment conditions, then we would not allocate the mortgage to either of these three segments.

The decision at trial was released on July 5, 1995 [see 1995 CanLII 7087 (ON SC), 24 O.R. (3d) 619, 47 R.P.R. (2d) 1]. The court accepted Sun Life's position that neither the bare trust relationship nor Mr. Vale's status as an additional covenantor was sufficient to give him the statutory rights of prepayment. In reaching the first of these conclusions, the trial judge attributed some significance to his finding of fact that Sun Life was not aware that the mortgages were being entered into by the corporations as bare trustees. On this point he found that Mr. Vale was mistaken. He also found that Mr. Vale was mistaken in testifying that he had been assured by an employee of Sun Life, with whom the mortgages had been negotiated, that he would be able to pay off the mortgages after five years on payment of a penalty. The evidence of the employee, Mr. Watson, was not available as he had died prior to the hearing. The learned judge also held that Mr. Watson had no authority to bind Sun Life to terms that were not contained in the mortgage documentation. As will be mentioned in more detail below, it is Mr. Vale's position on this motion that some, or all, of these findings may have been influenced by what he characterizes as the fraudulent evidence of Mr. Sharkey, and may have led the court to conclude that there was no common intention of the parties that Mr. Vale should be able to redeem the mortgages after five years. The thrust of Mr. Vale's submissions on this motion was directed at the possible existence and potential significance of such a common intention.

Mr. Vale's appeal to the Court of Appeal was heard on June 10 to 12, 1996, and the court's judgment dismissing the appeal was released on October 31, 1996 [see 1996 CanLII 2462 (ON CA), 30 O.R. (3d) 579, 5 R.P.R. (3d) 161]. It was held that, for the purposes of the Interest Act and the Mortgages Act, the mortgages were to be regarded as given by the corporations and not by Mr. Vale. While declining to disturb the findings of fact of the trial judge -- which the court found to have more than ample support in the evidence as a whole -- the Court of Appeal held that the result would have been no different even if Sun Life had been aware of the bare trust, or nominee, relationship between the corporations and Mr. Vale. Leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was refused on April 17, 1997.

In his affidavit sworn for the purposes of this motion, Mr. Vale has testified that he first began to investigate the truth of Mr. Sharkey's evidence with respect to Sun Life's matching of the mortgages with long-term obligations in the summer of 1997 after reading accounts of litigation involving Sun Life and so-called vanishing premiums. Between then and December 4, 1997, when the motion record in these proceedings was served, Mr. Vale made repeated representations to Sun Life's solicitors and others expressing his concerns about the veracity of Mr. Sharkey's evidence. In November 1997 he obtained a copy of a Sun Life mortgage that was allocated to one of the Funds and ascertained that it was not a long-term mortgage. In September and October he attempted unsuccessfully to obtain further information. He then commenced these proceedings and on December 9, 1997, he obtained an order for cross-examination and production of documents. Upon viewing the documentation produced with respect to the Funds, Mr. Vale discovered that, contrary to Mr. Sharkey's testimony, a substantial number of the mortgages allocated to them were not long-term and that the Funds included mortgages with prepayment conditions as well as long-term mortgages given by individuals who, presumably, would have the statutory rights to prepay. In the Fund to which the Birchmount mortgage was allocated, mortgages representing more than 50 per cent of the value of all of the mortgages in the Fund were for terms of less than ten years. These conclusions of Mr. Vale were subsequently confirmed by an experienced actuary, Mr. Ian E. Baker who, in an affidavit, summarized the results of his review of the documentation as follows:

> In summary, my review of the documentation provided to me indicates that 354 mortgages with a December 31, 1995, book value of $672,869,215 have conditions which are different from Robert Sharkey's testimony. The total number of mortgages in the three Funds was 695 with a December 31, 1995, book value of $1,283,992,945.

Mr. Baker was severely critical of Mr. Sharkey's testimony and his attempts to explain it in the first affidavit he filed in this motion:

> Robert Sharkey's trial evidence is clear, unambiguous and precise regarding whether the three funds have short term mortgages as defined or whether there are any mortgages with prepayment conditions. Robert Sharkey's testimony is clear that mortgages with terms longer than ten years given by an individual would be placed in a fund other than the Funds 270, 223 or 241. I have found discrepancies to Robert Sharkey's testimony in excess of $600,000,000. In my opinion, these discrepancies cannot be explained as an acceptable margin of error.

Mr. Vale's affidavit evidence on these matters was not, in my view, significantly weakened by his cross-examination in these proceedings. Mr. Baker was not cross-examined.

The Issues

The motions to set aside simply on the ground of facts arising after the judgments were not pressed at the hearing. On such a motion it is necessary to establish that the new facts may reasonably be considered to have affected the decision at trial. The evidence of the inaccuracies in Mr. Sharkey's testimony falls short of doing this. Even if Mr. Sharkey had testified truthfully with respect to the composition of the Funds, his evidence would have been neutral on the question of common intention. I am not able to hold that the trial judge's findings, that Mr. Watson did not make the representations attributed to him and that, in any event, he had no power to bind Sun Life, would have been different. Nor am I able to hold that, if proven, the alleged common intention would reasonably have affected the decision. However, different principles apply to a motion to set aside on the ground of fraud. After reviewing the previous authorities in this province and elsewhere, Estey J.A. in 100 Main Street East Ltd. v. Sakas (1975), 1975 CanLII 381 (ON CA), 8 O.R. (2d) 385 at p. 389, 58 D.L.R. (3d) 161 (C.A.), concluded:

> These authorities make it clear that the new evidence of fraud . . . need not necessarily amount to a "determining factor in the result".

The issues to be determined on this motion are:

(1) Was evidence given by Mr. Sharkey tainted by fraud?

(2) If so, was the fraud related to a material issue in the proceedings?

(3) Should Mr. Vale be considered to have had knowledge of the alleged fraud at the time of the trial?

(4) Did Mr. Vale act with due diligence and without undue delay in bringing these proceedings?

(1) Fraud

Rule 59.06(2)(a) provides a procedure by which orders may be set aside in summary proceedings. It does not alter the principles that formerly applied, and would still apply, in an action brought to accomplish the same end. Despite statements made in earlier cases in this jurisdiction, the Privy Council and English courts with respect to the relative merits of proceeding by action and by motion, the use of the summary procedure is now well established in this jurisdiction. In cases where the facts that are alleged to have constituted fraud are in dispute, a trial of an issue might well be ordered. Here, although Mr. Sharkey has attempted in affidavits sworn for the purposes of this motion to minimize the effect of the inaccuracies in his testimony at the trial, the existence of the inaccuracies is not substantially in dispute. Neither party asked for a trial of an issue and I see no reason why this matter should not be dealt with on a motion under rule 59.06(2).

Independently of the Rules of Civil Procedure, the jurisdiction to set aside judgments on the ground of fraud is part of the equitable jurisdiction of this court. The development of the principles that governed the exercise of that jurisdiction both before and after the Judicature Acts is dealt with in an article by D. M. Gordon, Q.C., in (1961), 77 L.Q.R. 358 at p. 533. There appears to have been very little academic or professional writing on the subject before that time and that which existed generally supported quite restrictive views of the circumstances in which the jurisdiction should be exercised. These views echoed the statements made by English judges in the 19th century of which a celebrated example was the passage in the reasons of James L.J. in Flower v. Lloyd (1878), 10 Ch. D. 327 at pp. 333-34, 39 L.T. 613 (C.A.), that was quoted by Estey J.A. in 100 Main Street East Ltd., at p. 389. Although Mr. Gordon cited a number of Canadian decisions in his article, he also appears to have been influenced by the English decisions in his conclusion that different principles apply in proceedings to set aside judgments on the ground of perjury than when other types of fraud are alleged. The subsequent cases in this court are inconsistent with this conclusion: as will be seen, in all cases the question is whether the fraud should be considered to relate to a "material issue" in the earlier proceedings.

None of the authorities under rule 59.06(2)(a), or its predecessors, that were cited to me contain any extensive consideration of the constituent elements of fraud for the purposes of this motion. It was accepted by the counsel for the moving parties that the relevant concept is that which is sometimes described as "common-law fraud" and which is an essential element of the tort of deceit. Counsel referred me to dicta in the report of the influential decision of the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek (1889), 14 App. Cas. 337, [1886-90] All E.R. Rep. 1, to Canadian cases in which the analysis of the House of Lords was adopted and applied and to passages in various treatises dealing with fraudulent representation and deceit. No attempt was made to rely upon broader concepts of equitable, or constructive, fraud. This restraint by counsel was, I believe, justified in that it appears to be consistent with the principles applied by the Court of Chancery in earlier cases involving actions to set aside judgments on the ground of fraud: Patch v. Ward (1867), 3 Ch. App. 203 at pp. 207 and 212-213, 18 L.T. 134 (L.JJ.).

In Derry v. Peek, at p. 22 All E.R., Lord Herschell summarized the effect of the authorities as follows:

> First, in order to sustain an action of deceit, there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Secondly, fraud is proved when it is shewn that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. Although I have treated the second and third as distinct cases, I think the third is but an instance of the second, for one who makes a statement under such circumstances can have no real belief in the truth of what he states. To prevent a false statement being fraudulent, there must, I think, always be an honest belief in its truth. And this probably covers the whole ground, for one who knowingly alleges that which is false, has obviously no such honest belief. Thirdly, if fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. It matters not that there was no intention to cheat or injure the person to whom the statement was made.

The above passage cited from the reasons of Lord Herschell is consistent with that of the other members of the House of Lords who were parties to the decision. In emphasizing the requisite mental element in this variety of fraud, the House of Lords rejected statements made in the court below to the effect that a statement made without any reasonable grounds for believing it to be true would necessarily be fraudulent. Lord Herschell stated (at p. 361 App. Cas.):

> To make a statement careless whether it be true or false, and therefore without any real belief in its truth, appears to me to be an essentially different thing from making, through want of care, a false statement, which is nevertheless honestly believed to be true.

At the same time, Lord Herschell recognized that, although the absence of reasonable grounds for believing in the truth of a statement would not in itself be sufficient to indicate the existence of a fraudulent intention, it may legitimately have an influence on a trier of fact endeavouring to ascertain whether the statement was honestly believed to be true (pp. 375-76 App. Cas.):

> At the same time I desire to say distinctly that when a false statement has been made the questions whether there were reasonable grounds for believing it, and what were the means of knowledge in the possession of the person making it, are most weighty matters for consideration. The ground upon which an alleged belief was founded is a most important test of its reality. I can concede many cases where the fact that an alleged belief was destitute of all reasonable foundation would suffice of itself to convince the court that it was not really entertained, and that the representation was a fraudulent one.

Just as proof of an honest belief in the truth of the statements will be a defence to an allegation of fraud, proof of the absence of such a belief in the truth of an untrue statement will be sufficient to make the statement fraudulent:

> By the mid nineteenth century it had been established that not only a misrepresentation known or believed by the representor to be false when made was fraudulent, but that mere non-belief in the truth was also indicative of fraud. Thus, whenever a person makes a false statement which he does not actually and honestly believe to be true, for purposes of civil liability, that statement is as fraudulent as if he had stated that which he did not know to be true, or knew or believed to be false. Proof of absence of actual and honest belief is all that is necessary to satisfy the requirements of the law, whether the representation has been made recklessly or deliberately; indifference or recklessness on the part of the representor as to the truth or falsity of the representation affords merely an instance of absence of such a belief.

(Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed., vol. 31, at para. 1059)

On the basis of the evidence before me I have no hesitation in finding that Mr. Sharkey's evidence with respect to the composition of the Funds was fraudulent in the relevant sense. It was conceded at the hearing of the motion that his evidence contained "inaccuracies". In my view, this was a considerable understatement. The affidavit evidence filed by Mr. Vale, and confirmed by Mr. Baker, with respect to the composition of the Funds was only faintly challenged in Mr. Sharkey's affidavits filed on the motion and I accept it as being substantially accurate. On this footing Mr. Sharkey's emphatic and unequivocal evidence at trial with respect to the allocation of mortgages to the Funds was simply untrue. Whether they were fraudulent depends upon whether he honestly believed them to be true.

In his affidavits Mr. Sharkey swore that he had such an honest belief:

> I did not commit perjury. To the contrary, I gave my evidence honestly and truthfully.
>
> . . . . .
> The evidence I gave at trial was given in good faith with my full belief in its truth.

I find it impossible to accept these statements. Mr. Sharkey deposed that, in preparing to give evidence at trial, he had his staff retrieve documentation to show to which funds the mortgages had been allocated. He did not claim that he was unaware of the composition of the Funds. Instead, he claimed that the statements he made at the trial were intended as "a general description of the nature of the mortgage investments in the funds" and that he had not dealt with "the particulars of the contents of the assets in the funds" as he had not been questioned on this point. Even more remarkably, he stated that it was evident "from even a cursory review" of an exhibit that he had provided to Sun Life's counsel and on which he was questioned at trial that one of the Funds contained mortgages from individuals for terms of five years.

Accordingly, it is quite clear that Mr. Sharkey's position is not that he was unaware of the inclusion of short-term mortgages in the Funds but rather that he was not intending to address that question and did not choose his words with sufficient care:

> In retrospect, the language of some of my responses may not have been as precise as it could have been, however, the responses are accurate in terms of the general concepts they were intended to address and the level of detail that seemed appropriate given the issues with respect to which I was testifying.
> When these statements in his affidavits are read in conjunction with his testimony at the trial, I find them quite unconvincing. His evidence at trial was general not in the sense that it was vague or imprecise but rather because it contained unequivocal statements that excluded the existence of any exceptions. These statements were untrue and I find that he either knew this to be the case or that he was recklessly indifferent to their truth or falsity. In that sense they were fraudulent for the purposes of rule 59.06(2)(a).

As is apparent in the passage quoted from the reasons of Lord Herschell in Derry v. Peek, Mr. Sharkey's motive in giving the evidence I have found to be fraudulent is immaterial. It does not matter whether he was carried away by feelings of partisanship, whether he lacked an appreciation of his duty to the court, or whether he had some other motive. His unequivocal statements with respect to the composition of the Funds were, in view of his knowledge, unacceptable, inexcusable and, for the present purposes, fraudulent.

(2) Materiality

A judgment will not be set aside on the basis of perjury or other fraudulent conduct unless it relates to a material issue at the trial. This requirement has been affirmed in a number of reported decisions with inevitable variations in the language used. It was discussed at some length in 100 Main Sweet East Ltd. where Estey J.A. referred, at pp. 388-89, to the following statements of the principle:

(a) "[the fraud] should have undoubtedly been at the foundation of the decision which has been attacked": Johnston v. Barkley (1905), 10 O.L.R. 724 (Div. Ct.), at pp. 728-29, per Street J.

(b) "before a judgment will be set aside [the perjured evidence] must have been material to the Court's decision":
Cook v. Forster, [1950] O.W.N. 739 (H.C.J.), at p. 741.

(c) "the perjury must be in a material matter": MacDonald v. Pier, 1922 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1923] S.C.R. 107, at pp. 120-21, [1923] 1 D.L.R. 670, per Duff J.

Estey J.A. concluded:

> These authorities make it clear that the new evidence of fraud must relate to the "foundation" of the decision or be "material" to the claim or defence, but need not necessarily amount to a "determining factor in the result".

Later in his reasons Estey J.A. emphasized again that it was not necessary for the moving party to establish that the fraud probably, or may reasonably be considered to have, "tipped the scale" in favour of the respondent at trial. In applying the requirement of materiality he stated at p. 395:

> . . . the principle of law preserving the sanctity of the principle of res judicata must give way to the principle recognizing the right and duty of the Court to protect its own processes so as to ensure that litigants do not profit from their improper conduct. This conclusion flows inexorably from the evidence and is reached reluctantly in view of the serious difficulties facing the respondent in seeking to achieve a different outcome on a second trial.

> In my view, it is not necessary to determine at this stage of the process that the disclosure of this additional evidence will affect the result or "may reasonably have affected the result", as [the trial judge] put it. It is only sufficient to conclude that the evidence withheld relates to the material issues arising from the appellant's failure to perform the 1968 contract and the damages, if any, flowing therefrom.

The reasoning of Estey J.A. was considered and applied in International Corona Resources Ltd. v. Lac Minerals Ltd. (1988), 1988 CanLII 4534 (ON SC), 66 O.R. (2d) 610 at p. 621, 54 D.L.R. (4th) 647 (H.C.J.) where Osborne J. commented:

> It seems to me the word "material" means that which goes to the foundation of the decision or which goes to the crux of a central issue before the court. "Material" obviously means something different from and, in this context, more than "relevant"; it means more than evidence which would be an appropriate topic for cross-examination on credibility, but collateral in the sense of being divorced from any of the main issues in the case in a trial.

As, in my judgment, the requirement of materiality will determine the disposition of the motion in this court, and as in a number of respects its application will raise issues that have not been expressly addressed in the earlier decisions, I should make explicit my acceptance of the following principles which I believe to be consistent with the analysis in those decisions:

(1) Although, as Justice Estey indicated in his concluding comments, the test is not stringent, there may, in particular circumstances, be questions of degree involved in determining whether evidence is sufficiently related to a material issue or even whether an issue is sufficiently material.

(2) It is not the role of the court hearing the motion to interpret and analyze the reasoning of the trial judge in order to penetrate his mind and determine whether he would have regarded the fraud as related to a material issue. That is not to say that no weight at all should be given to the trial judge's identification of material issues as long as it is kept firmly in mind that this, like the rest of the reasons for decision, may have been affected by the fraud. The court hearing the motion should similarly be wary of attempting to estimate precisely the extent the fraudulent evidence influenced the findings of fact made at the trial. This would often be a dangerous, and in some cases a hopeless, exercise.

(3) Whether an issue is material should be determined, first, by an examination of the pleadings. If an issue to which the fraud relates is not raised by the pleadings, I do not believe it could properly be treated as material. If such an issue is raised sufficiently by the pleadings, it will usually be material unless, of course, it has subsequently been abandoned for reasons unaffected by the fraud. This might not always be the case. If, for example, relief is sought on alternative unrelated grounds, fraud sufficient to vitiate success on one ground only should not be sufficiently relevant to a material issue if the court at trial found for the plaintiff on the other ground or on each ground. Similarly, an issue raised by a party who is unsuccessful at trial should not be material if the fraud that relates to it has no bearing on a separate issue that had to be -- but was not -- decided in favour of that party in order to be successful in the action. In short, while it is established by the authorities that it is not necessary to show that the fraud was a determining factor in the result at trial, an issue will not be material if it is clear that a different resolution of the issue could not have affected the result of the trial. For this purpose, a consideration of the reasons of the trial judge would usually be necessary. I do not think this inquiry is precluded by statements in the cases that fraud vitiates, or taints, the whole proceedings.

(4) Again, even though an issue raised by the pleadings could have a direct bearing on a party's entitlement to relief, I believe it may not be material if that party does not seek to rely on the issue at trial. I say "may" and not "will" because there could be circumstances in which the fraud should properly be regarded as possibly having affected decisions about the conduct of the party's case. In the absence of any such circumstances, the question of materiality should be determined by an examination not merely of the pleadings but also of the evidence given at trial. Whether this point is properly to be regarded as going to the materiality of an issue or as a separate legitimate consideration affecting the discretion of the court under rule 59.06(2)(a), it follows, I believe, from the caution given by Middleton J.A. in Glatt v. Glatt, 1935 CanLII 16 (ON CA), [1936] O.R. 75 at p. 79, [1936] 1 D.L.R. 387 (C.A.), to the effect that jurisdiction to set aside a judgment on the ground of fraud should not be exercised so as to permit an unsuccessful litigant to reopen and reargue the case on some new and, hopefully, better basis than that relied upon at the trial.

(5) While the outcome of, and the reasons given on, an appeal may need to be considered for the purpose of determining whether an issue is material in accordance with (3) above, the weight, if any, to be given to these matters may depend upon whether the grounds on which the appeal was taken were, or may have been, affected by findings on factual issues at the trial that were tainted by the fraudulent evidence.

Each of the above propositions is, I believe, relevant to the disposition of this motion.

As I have already mentioned, Mr. Vale's position at the trial was that he was entitled to rights to prepay the funds advanced under the mortgages after the expiration of five years. For the purposes of this motion, his counsel did not contend that Mr. Sharkey's evidence was relevant to the existence of rights of prepayment directly pursuant to the statutes. Mr. Vale's argument is essentially that one material issue was whether he was entitled to those rights because there was a common intention or understanding with Sun Life that he would be able to exercise them. In short, he now asserts that, irrespective of the question whether the statutes conferred such rights on him, it was understood and intended that he would have such rights. Whether this common intention existed and whether Sun Life was bound by it were, in his counsel's submission, crucial issues in the action. In the factum filed on his behalf it was stated at para. 14:

> The key issue at trial was whether the parties in the circumstances intended that Joel Vale, as an individual mortgagor (along with the corporate plaintiffs) on the mortgages could avail himself of the statutory rights of prepayment available to an individual as a statutory mortgagor (but not available to corporations) under the Mortgages Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. M.40, s. 18, and the Interest Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I.15, s. 10. The issue of the parties' common intention with respect to Mr. Vale's right to rely on statutory prepayment rights was intimately linked to this determination.

It was submitted further that the trial judge considered the intention of the parties -- Mr. Vale and Sun Life -- to be a fundamental issue and that, in view of the disparity in the evidence given by them or on their behalf, findings of credibility were required. It was submitted that these findings were "integral to the outcome of the case" (applicants' factum para. 16).

The precise legal significance of the alleged common intention was not explored to any great extent at the hearing of the motion. My understanding is that, if a new trial is ordered, Mr. Vale would wish to rely on a collateral agreement, equitable estoppel, or some other equitable ground arising from the common intention of the parties that would be enforceable notwithstanding the Statute of Frauds, R.S.O. 1990, c. S.19. Without expressing any view on the likelihood of such an argument's success, I would be prepared to exercise my discretion and set aside the judgment at trial if this question is properly to be regarded as one of the material issues in those proceedings.

Sun Life submits that neither the existence nor the effect of the common intention now asserted by Mr. Vale were material issues at the trial. Sun Life's position is that the material issues raised by the plaintiffs and dealt with at trial were concerned exclusively with the alleged statutory rights of Mr. Vale as a beneficiary of bare trusts or as an additional covenantor under each of the mortgages. Both the trial judge and the Court of Appeal held that, for the purposes of the Mortgages Act and the Interest Act, the mortgages were given by the corporations and not by Mr. Vale and that, in consequence, he did not have the right to prepay conferred by the statutes upon a mortgagor who is an individual. Counsel for Sun Life submitted that Mr. Sharkey's evidence as to the composition of the Funds had no bearing on the resolution of these issues which were essentially questions of statutory interpretation. It followed, in his submission, that, as the evidence did not relate to the material issues in the proceedings at trial, the motion should be dismissed.

I am satisfied that the alleged statutory rights of Mr. Vale provided the main focus of the plaintiffs' case at trial. This is evident both from the statements of claim and the testimony of Mr. Vale. It also appears sufficiently from the reasons delivered by the trial judge who defined the issues as follows:

> The case, therefore, raises a narrow but interesting point. Are there circumstances in which a mortgage given by a corporation is not a mortgage "given by a corporation", either because the corporation is a mere shell or bare trustee for the true owner of the property, or because the mortgage is, in effect, granted by both an individual and a corporation thus affording to the individual the protection granted by the pre-payment privileges of s. 10(1) of the Interest Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-15 and s. 18(1) of the Mortgages Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. M.40? If so, is Mr. Vale entitled to succeed on one or another of those grounds in the circumstances of this case?

As I have indicated above, I believe the trial judge's identification of the issues should be given some weight although it must be approached with a degree of caution. During the course of a trial issues may, in effect, be abandoned as counsel weigh the effect of the evidence given. In view of the death of Mr. Watson, the only evidence that had any direct bearing on Sun Life's intention -- other than that of Mr. Vale -- was the manner in which Sun Life treated the mortgages. The clear effect of Mr. Sharkey's impugned evidence was that this treatment was inconsistent with the common intention now relied upon by Mr. Vale.

For the same reason it would be dangerous for me to rely on the written submissions provided to the court by Mr. Vale's counsel at the conclusion of the trial even though these submissions appear to have been directed exclusively at Mr. Vale's alleged rights under the statutes. Thus, although in a memorandum entitled "Reply Argument", which I am informed was presented to the court, it was submitted that Mr. Vale's discussions with Mr. Watson raised an equity sufficient to exclude an application of the Statute of Frauds, this was quite clearly directed at Sun Life's knowledge of the bare trust relationship and not at any agreement or common intention that Mr. Vale should have the statutory rights of prepayment. The argument was that Mr. Vale was entitled to the statutory rights as a beneficiary of the trust and that Sun Life's alleged knowledge of the trust relationship precluded it from relying on the Statute of Frauds. As I have indicated above, this argument is now moot as the Court of Appeal held that Mr. Vale would not have been entitled under the statutes even if Sun Life had been aware that the corporations were bare trustees for Mr. Vale. In Litowitz v. Standard Life Assurance Co. (1996), 1996 CanLII 2462 (ON CA), 30 O.R. (3d) 579, 5 R.P.R. (3d) 161 (C.A.) -- a decision delivered contemporaneously with those in Mr. Vale's appeals -- it was held that a beneficiary of a bare trust did not have the statutory rights of prepayment conferred on individuals even where the existence of the trust was disclosed in the mortgage documents.

Similarly, although counsel for Sun Life, in his written submissions to the trial judge, stated that:

> Sun Life relied on the fact that these were closed long-term mortgages. The mortgages were allocated towards long-term financial obligations of Sun Life this argument has also become moot as the effect of the decisions of the Court of Appeal is that such reliance was irrelevant.

The decision of the Court of Appeal and the submissions made on behalf of Mr. Vale on the application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada have even less persuasive force for the purpose of determining the material issues at trial. The grounds upon which the appeals were taken may have been influenced significantly by the findings of fact at the trial -- findings that, in turn, may have been influenced by Mr. Sharkey's evidence.

The existence of Mr. Vale's rights under the statutes as the beneficiary of bare trusts, or as an additional covenantor, were clearly material issues. I accept the submission of Sun Life's counsel that Mr. Sharkey's untruthful evidence did not relate to them. The more difficult question is whether these are to be considered as the only material issues or whether the alleged common intention of the parties should be considered to have been material independently of them. As I have indicated, this would not, in my view, be the case unless the issue was fairly raised by the pleadings and, on the assumption that Mr. Vale's evidence had been believed and Mr. Sharkey's evidence had been truthful, if it could have provided a possible basis, or step in the reasoning, for a decision that Mr. Vale was entitled to the same rights of prepayment that he would have had if he had been the mortgagor. As I have also indicated, I do not believe that, by itself, this would be sufficient. There must also be evidence that the issue was relied upon at trial or at least evidence that makes it reasonable to conclude that, but for the fraud, it might have been relied upon.

Viewed in its strongest and most favourable light for Mr. Vale, Mr. Sharkey's evidence gave rise to an inference that the alleged common intention never existed: that Sun Life never had any intention or understanding, and did not agree, that Mr. Vale would have the rights of prepayment provided by statute for mortgagors who were individuals. This conclusion was undoubtedly accepted by the trial judge and it seems very likely that it was influenced by Mr. Sharkey's evidence. I will say more on this matter later but, as I have indicated, I do not believe that the effect of the fraud on the trial judge's findings of fact is the precise question I am required to determine. The question is whether, on the basis of the pleadings, the evidence and the other factors I have mentioned, the existence and effect of the supposed common intention of the parties should be considered to have been a material issue in the action. There is not a great deal in the motion records and the other material before me that would support an affirmative answer.

In each of the statements of claim in the actions the relief sought is a declaration that Mr. Vale was entitled to the rights of prepayment under the two statutes. In none of them is there any allegation, suggestion or even implication that, in entering into the mortgage transactions, Mr. Vale relied upon representations or statements by anyone from Sun Life. There is no allegation that there was any agreement or common intention between the parties. The only reference to a representation is the following statement that appears in each of the statements of claim:

A representative of the Defendant, Mr. Richard Watson, advised Vale that pursuant to his rights at law he would be entitled after a period of five years to prepay the mortgage in its entirety upon the payment of a 3-month interest bonus. Vale was aware of this statutory right. The Defendant's representative indicated that given the interest rate and the expensive cost of a three months penalty, it was unlikely as a pragmatic business matter that Vale would wish to avail himself of that right.

Each of the statements of claim alleges that Mr. Vale, as a "covenantor, or additional covenantor" was entitled to the benefit of the legislation. Each of the statements of claim alleges, in the alternative, that Sun Life at all times knew that the corporate mortgagor was only a bare trustee for Mr. Vale. On each of these points it is claimed that Sun Life "cannot seek to avoid or contract out of the legislation in a effort to deprive Vale of his statutory rights". In none of the statements of claim is it alleged that Sun Life was estopped or, in some other way bound, by Mr. Watson's alleged statements. Nor is it alleged that Mr. Vale relied upon them.

Nor does Mr. Vale's evidence at the trial provide any significant support for his counsel's submission that the existence of a common intention was a material issue in the proceedings. In his evidence-in-chief with respect to the Spencer mortgage, Mr. Vale testified that the issue of his right to prepay after five years arose in his discussions with Sun Life's representative, Mr. Watson, in the context of the possibility that Mr. Vale might sell the property:

> . . . I asked Richard: What happens if I sell the property and the new purchaser doesn't want the mortgage or if you don't approve of him? How does that work?
> I didn't have experience in this regard, so Richard told me that they wouldn't unreasonably withhold a sale to a purchaser, and he said: In any event, "no prepayment privileges" meant no free prepayment privileges. I could prepay after five years with a 3-month penalty. But, at the time, that would be $50,000.00 which was more than the whole year profit of what the building was throwing off, and it was discussed that it would be unlikely that I would ever want to pay that type of bonus. But that was basically the only discussion with respect to it.

In cross-examination Mr. Vale testified that there were a number of provisions in the mortgage documents that were not acceptable to him, but that he was told by Mr. Watson that Sun Life would not insist on them if, as they did insist, he signed the documents in the form in which they were presented to him. It is implicit in his testimony that he executed the documents based on the advice of Mr. Watson and of the solicitor acting for both parties that Sun Life would not insist on strict performance of a number of conditions in the mortgages. As indicated above, one of these alleged representations was that, in the event of a sale, Sun Life would not unreasonably withhold its consent. Further, he alleged that Mr. Watson told him that, "in any event" he could prepay after five years with a three-month penalty. There is, however, nothing in the evidence to suggest that this particular representation was material, or influential, in his decision to execute the mortgage documents or that he relied on it to any extent. On the contrary, in both the reference to it in the statements of claim and in his evidence at trial, it appears that the representation was immediately dismissed as having no practical importance.

Mr. Vale's testimony-in-chief was also consistent with the allegation in the statement of claim in that, apart from the situation where he might wish to sell the property, this alleged representation related to his statutory rights. Apart from the case of a possible sale of the property Mr. Watson was not alleged to have expressly represented that Sun Life would permit Mr. Vale to prepay as if he had rights under the statute. This is also the thrust of Mr. Vale's answers in cross-examination:

> Q. And you were asking His Honour to believe that you really believed you had any right to prepay this mortgage?

A. Not under the mortgage, but under the statute . . .

> Q. Is it your understanding that a corporation has no right to pay off closed mortgages?
>
> A. My understanding is if the individual owned, was the beneficial owner, that was an exception to the rule, and the individual could -- owner could enjoy the benefit of the statute.

However, a representation as to the legal position can carry with it an implied representation that the party making it will act in accordance with that position. This appears to have been the interpretation of Mr. Vale's evidence accepted by the trial judge [pp. 628-29]:

> Mr. Vale also testified that Mr. Watson had assured him that he would be able to pay off the mortgages after five years, upon the payment of a penalty, but that they both felt it was an academic issue because the amount required -- around $50,000 -- was felt to be unacceptably high. Mr. Watson has died and I do not have the advantage of his testimony. However, I am not satisfied, on the evidence, that he made the remarks attributed to him by Mr. Vale. I think, again, that Mr. Vale is mistaken. It may be that he is simply telescoping a series of discussions over the years, about the advancing of funds, generally, to his business operation, and that he is endeavouring to extract something specific for the specific transactions which did not occur. I find that what Mr. Watson said was that "an individual can pay off the mortgage after five years". In his testimony, Mr. Vale stated this is what Mr. Watson said. He went on to explain that the comment was made in the context of Mr. Vale being able to pay off the mortgage because Mr. Watson viewed him as the borrower. I had the clear sense, at this point in Mr. Vale's testimony, however, that he recognized his reference to an "individual" having the ability to prepay the mortgage was not helpful to his case, and that he was struggling to reposition the case in the best light he could. I am satisfied that Mr. Watson did not give any undertaking, binding upon Sun Life, that Mr. Vale would be entitled to prepay the mortgages after five years had expired on their terms.

> Even if he had, I do not think that Sun Life would be bound by such a statement unless there was something to the same effect in the loan package put forward to the mortgage approval committee which authorized the mortgages. I have already indicated, there was not. Mr. Watson was a senior mortgage investigator. His job was to bring in and present mortgage funding opportunities for approval. He did not have the authority to bind Sun Life to an approval which is quite contradictory to what is contained in all of the signed documentation pertaining to the mortgages, and to the related documentation accompanying it.

Immediately after the passage quoted, the trial judge went on to consider the evidence of Mr. Sharkey with respect to Sun Life's treatment of the mortgages. It is this evidence that I have found to be tainted by fraud. On the basis of that evidence, the trial judge concluded that "the mortgages were all treated and dealt with in the fashion of long-term mortgages".

If this court were bound to accept the trial judge's findings of fact in the passage quoted, it would follow that Mr. Sharkey's evidence had no significant bearing on any issue of the common intention of the parties as the court did not accept that the alleged representations of Mr. Watson -- the only evidence of Sun Life's intentions -- had been made. As I have indicated, however, I do not believe that this would be a correct approach for me to adopt. It is impossible to know if, and if so to what extent, the court's finding on this question was affected by Mr. Sharkey's evidence with respect to Sun Life's treatment of the mortgages.

The court's finding that Mr. Watson had no authority to bind Sun Life is a different matter if -- as I believe it to be -- it is tantamount to a decision that no representation by Mr. Watson could properly be treated as a representation of Sun Life. The finding was made on the basis of the evidence before the court with respect to Mr. Watson's responsibilities and authority and it could not have been affected by Mr. Sharkey's impugned testimony. If it is to be understood as excluding Mr. Watson's ability to make representations on behalf of Sun Life, I do not believe the allegations that Mr. Vale now makes could properly be considered to relate to a material issue as, even if Mr. Sharkey had testified truthfully as to the content of the Funds, there would have been no evidence that Sun Life had the alleged common intention.

I find it difficult to see how any more limited meaning can be given to the finding with respect to Mr. Watson's lack of authority to bind Sun Life. If, contrary to my view, a more limited interpretation should be attributed to the finding -- on the basis, perhaps, that the trial judge may not have turned his mind to, and did not intend to deal with, equitable remedies that might be available to Mr. Vale if he relied on Mr. Watson's statements and believed them to bind Sun Life -- this would give rise to a strong inference that, as far as the trial judge was concerned, the availability of such remedies was not an issue raised in the proceedings. This should not be decisive but, as I have indicated, neither in the pleadings nor in his testimony at trial did Mr. Vale suggest that Mr. Watson's statements with respect to the existence of a right to prepay significantly affected Mr. Vale's decision to enter into the mortgage transactions with Sun Life. The point was dismissed as academic on the only occasion it was discussed with Mr. Watson. Even more to the point, if the emphasis were placed not on Sun Life's actual intention but on what Mr. Vale was induced to believe it to be, I do not see how Mr. Sharkey's evidence could be said to relate to that issue.

It is established that, on a motion such as this, the court is engaged in a balancing process. It must weigh:

> . . . the need for the Courts to protect the integrity of their process against fraudulent practices before the Court, on the one hand, against the practical requirement of certainty and finality in litigation on the other.

Similarly, in International Corona Resources Ltd., Osborne J. stated, at p. 622 O.R., p. 658 D.L.R.:

> Balanced against the court's right and duty to remedy abuses in appropriate circumstances, is the public and the private interest in there being certainty and finality in litigation. Each case must be assessed on its own merits, particularly having in mind the nature of the fraud proved, its perpetrator, the evidence in each case, and the judgment sought to be set aside.

As I have mentioned above, the procedure under rule 59.06(2)(a) is not available to permit a party who has been unsuccessful at trial to relitigate the action on grounds that might possibly, or conceivably, have been, but were not, raised in the earlier proceedings.

On the basis of the pleadings, the evidence at trial, and the findings with respect to the authority of Mr. Watson, I conclude that Mr. Sharkey's evidence was not related to a material issue in the proceedings. Neither the pleadings nor the evidence of Mr. Vale reveal or suggest that the alleged common intention of the parties and Mr. Vale's reliance on it were, in any sense or to any extent, at, or part of, the foundation of his case. There is nothing before me that suggests that the significance Mr. Vale now seeks to attribute to this intention was relied upon or even mentioned at the trial or that Mr. Sharkey's evidence had an inhibiting effect in this regard. The discussions with Mr. Watson were undoubtedly relied upon in an attempt to establish that Sun Life was aware of the bare trust relationship. Mr. Sharkey's evidence might -- at a stretch and with some risk of circularity -- be regarded as related to this issue but, for the reasons given above, it is one that cannot now be regarded as material. Moreover, even if the issue now relied upon had been raised squarely by Mr. Vale, the finding at trial with respect to Mr. Watson's ability to bind Sun Life excludes any reasonable possibility that Mr. Vale could have proven the existence of any such common intention. There would simply have been no evidence that Sun Life had the intention that Mr. Vale now seeks to attribute to it. An issue that would not be triable on the basis of the evidence before the court, even if Mr. Sharkey had testified truthfully with respect to the composition of the Funds, cannot, in my view, be considered to be a material issue for the purposes of rule 59.06(2)(a) unless, which is not the case here, there is some reason to conclude that truthful testimony might have led to the production of other evidence relating to the issue.

Accordingly, it is my view that, having been unsuccessful on the material issues raised in the proceedings, Mr. Vale is now seeking to have the fraudulent evidence of Mr. Sharkey treated as a basis for relitigating the case on another ground and one that could not have been successful if it had been raised at the trial. I do not believe the principles governing the jurisdiction to set aside judgments on the ground of fraud permit this to be done.

The above finding is sufficient to dispose of the motion. However, in case this matter goes further, I should deal briefly with two other questions that arose on the motion.

Knowledge and Due Diligence

It is established that an action, or motion, to set aside a judgment on the ground of fraud will fail if the fraud was known to the plaintiff, or moving party, at the time of the trial: MacDonald v. Pier, supra, at p. 121; 100 Main Street East Ltd., supra, at p. 388.

I accept Mr. Vale's testimony that the first time he began to investigate the truth of Mr. Sharkey's evidence was in the summer of 1997. Mr. Sharkey has, however, sworn that the inclusion of short-term mortgages in the Funds was clearly evident from documents he produced at the trial. These documents were computer print-outs that included references to a number of the mortgages in one of the Funds.

At the trial, counsel for Sun Life explained the failure to produce the documentation earlier on the ground that he could not "figure it out". Under cross-examination, another employee of Sun Life's mortgage department, who swore an affidavit for the purposes of the motion, stated that he could not readily have interpreted the documentation or have "figured it out". The information in the print-outs is cryptically stated to say the least. Its lack of explicitness was referred to by Mr. Baker. In view of the obscurity of the documentation and its late production, I am not prepared to hold that its meaning and significance were so apparent at the trial that knowledge of the fraud should be attributed to Mr. Vale. Nor am I prepared to find that Mr. Vale should have subsequently discovered the significance of the documentation that was apparently evident to Mr. Sharkey. Given the mass of documentation exhibited at the trial, the obscure manner in which the information in the print-outs was presented, the fact that it was produced in apparent support of Mr. Sharkey's false testimony and the fact that no further attention appears to have been given to it at the trial, I do not think it would be reasonable to find that Mr. Vale should subsequently have given it the attention required to appreciate its alleged significance. I find Sun Life's position that this obscure documentation produced by Mr. Sharkey should have alerted Mr. Vale to the inconsistency between Mr. Sharkey's evidence and the truth to be unconvincing. Indeed, I find it incongruous that Sun Life and Mr. Sharkey would seek to rely on the documentation for this purpose while Mr. Sharkey continued to assert his belief in the truthfulness of his testimony that the documentation contradicts if his interpretation of it is correct.

My conclusion with respect to Mr. Vale's failure to appreciate the alleged significance of the computer print-outs is relevant to the question whether the delay between the conclusion of the trial in June 1995 and the commencement of these proceedings in December 1997 indicates a want of due diligence by Mr. Vale in raising the question of fraud.

In International Corona Resources Ltd., supra, Osborne J. summarized the requirements of due diligence as follows, at pp. 622-23 O.R., p. 659 D.L.R.:

> The unsuccessful trial party is exposed to a test of due or reasonable diligence . . . In my view, the onus is on the moving party to establish due diligence. Evidence cannot be stockpiled during the litigation process to be taken from inventory after an unsuccessful trial or appeal . . . The test imposed upon the unsuccessful trial party to obtain relevant evidence -- that is, evidence going to establish fraud -- with due diligence, is objective. The questions to be asked are: what did the moving party know, and what ought the moving party to have known? Delay will defeat a motion to set aside a trial judgment under rule 59.06. I refer in this regard to cases where the evidentiary burden has been met and the due diligence test passed, but where there is unreasonable delay in bringing or pursuing the motion to set aside.

Having declined to attribute significance to the computer print-outs provided by Mr. Sharkey at trial, I do not believe there is any other basis on which Mr. Vale could be held to have acted with less than due diligence. I see no reason to reject or question his evidence of the circumstances that, in the summer of 1997, caused him to begin to investigate the truth of Mr. Sharkey's testimony. Nor, apart from the computer print-outs, has any reason been suggested why he should have had any earlier suspicions. Once he had reason to pursue the question there was no undue delay. He acted responsibly in seeking to obtain satisfactory responses from Sun Life and its solicitors and, when these were not forthcoming, he brought this motion.

In making the above findings of fact I have accepted the sworn evidence of Mr. Vale with respect to the circumstances in which he discovered the fraud. Neither that evidence nor Mr. Vale's credibility has been seriously challenged on these matters by Sun Life. Although the trial judge found that Mr. Vale had probably been mistaken in some aspects of his recollections of his discussions with Mr. Watson, there is no suggestion in his reasons that he considered Mr. Vale to be an untruthful witness. There is nothing in the material before me that would support any other conclusion. I do not think the credibility of Mr. Vale in this sense was an issue at the trial or on this motion.

Finally, in its counsel's factum Sun Life submitted that, even if Mr. Vale were successful on all of the other issues raised in this motion, I should, in the exercise of my discretion, refuse to set aside the judgment at trial because of certain other alleged aspects of Mr. Vale's conduct. This submission was not addressed at the hearing and I make no comment on it.

Accordingly, the motion is dismissed. Counsel may speak to me on the question of costs or, if they so agree, they may make written submissions within 30 days of the release of these reasons.

Motion dismissed.

[1] This is a motion to strike certain paragraphs of a Statement of Defence.

Introduction

[2] Typically, one would expect that such a motion would be brought pursuant to Rule 25.11 of the Rules of Civil of Procedure and heard by a Master. Under this rule, pleadings that (a) are prejudicial or will delay a fair trial; (b) are scandalous, frivolous or vexatious; or, (c) are an abuse of process, may be struck. This rule runs to the specifics of the pleading. Are the facts referred to irrelevant or immaterial? Are they argumentative and inserted for colour that is prejudicial? The rule is relied on for this motion, but counsel for the plaintiffs (the moving parties) made it clear that the core of his argument is founded on Rule 21.01(1)(b). It addresses the broader and purely legal question of whether the pleading accomplishes its purpose. If it is a Statement of Claim, does it disclose a reasonable cause of action? If it is a Statement of Defence, does it disclose a reasonable defence? A motion brought pursuant to this rule must be heard by a judge. The Court of Appeal has directed that, on motions made under Rule 21, only part of a pleading be struck (see: Dynasty Furniture Manufacturing Ltd. v. Toronto-Dominion Bank 2010 ONCA 514 at paras. 4, 5 and 10; and Heaslip Estate v. Ontario, 2009 ONCA 594 at para. 35).

Background

[3] In this case, the plaintiffs allege that they were defamed. They were, and in the case of Derrick V. Burgess, remain senior members of the government of Bermuda. At the material time, Ewart F. Brown was Premier and Derrick V. Burgess was Minister of Works and Engineering. At present, Derrick V. Burgess is Deputy Premier and Minister of Public Works. The defendant, Sam Spagnuolo, was a Project Architect and Senior Associate with the architecture firm of Carruthers, Shaw and Partners ("CS&P"). Sam Spagnuolo resides, and CS&P is located, in Toronto. In 2007, tenders were called for the construction of a new courthouse and police headquarters to be located in Hamilton, Bermuda. CS&P was the original architect. The contract to construct the building was awarded to Landmark Lisgar Construction, a Bermudian-Canadian joint venture, and, after the Canadian partner withdrew, was taken over by LLC Bermuda Ltd. (referred to collectively as "Landmark Lisgar"). As the administrator of the contract, CS&P was responsible for overseeing and approving payments to be made to Landmark Lisgar. Sam Spagnuolo was the architect most involved in the project. The approvals for payment relied on packages of documentation, referred to as draw-downs. The draw-downs supported the payments, made by Landmark Lisgar, that were being submitted for reimbursement. They included copies of the cheques that had been paid by Landmark Lisgar to its sub-contractors. In late 2008, CS&P began to refuse to approve payments submitted by Landmark Lisgar. On December 2, 2008, CS&P was terminated and removed from the project.

[4] In late 2008 and early 2009, copies of two "purported cheques" relating to the project were discovered in the files of the responsible Ministry. These "purported cheques" were altered copies of legitimate cheques drawn on the bank account of Landmark Lisgar and paid to suppliers and vendors to the project. The altered copies of the cheques had been falsely manipulated so as to appear to be payable to "Dr. E. Brown" and "D. Burgess". In this action, the plaintiffs allege that Sam Spagnuolo created the false cheques, was part of a conspiracy to plant the cheques in the files of the Ministry and to ensure they would come to public attention. It is said that the cheques defamed the plaintiffs.

[5] Counsel advised the court that it is generally accepted and acknowledged that the cheques are false.

[6] In the Statement of Defence, Sam Spagnuolo pleads that he did not falsify or disseminate the cheques.

The impugned paragraphs

[7] By this motion, the plaintiffs seek to strike out two separate groups of paragraphs (paragraphs 13 to 16 and paragraphs 22 to 37) found in the Statement of Defence that they say disclose no reasonable defence to this action, contain no material facts, are irrelevant and likely to prejudice and delay the fair trial of this action, are scandalous, frivolous and/or vexatious, and an abuse of the court process. In so doing, the plaintiffs encompass the considerations raised by both Rule 21.01(1)(b) and Rule 25.11.

[8] The first group, paragraphs 13 to 16, generally refer to allegations concerning what transpired during the course of the tender process that led to the selection of Landmark Lisgar. These paragraphs suggest Landmark Lisgar was:

- selected despite its bid being incomplete;
- had performed poorly in the past; and,
- had limited experience.

[9] The paragraphs allege that based, among other factors, on Landmark Lisgar's lack of prior experience and poor performance history, CS&P recommended that the contract should be awarded to another bidder. Contrary to the recommendation of CS&P, the contract was awarded to Landmark Lisgar.

[10] The second group, paragraphs 22 to 37, generally refer to allegations of problems on the job and with the processing of requests for payments made by Landmark Lisgar. The Statement of Defence pleads that these problems began even before the contract was finalized. Landmark Lisgar complained that it was being required to follow what the pleading refers to as "ususal and customary administrative processes…, such as providing the schedules required in the Project specifications and following shop drawing review procedures". In November 2007, it is alleged that Landmark Lisgar requested an advance of approximately $3,000,000 to $4,000,000 for mobilization. CS&P, with the defendant, Lawrence Brady, declined the request subject to reconsideration after Landmark Lisgar provided a list itemizing what would be ordered with these funds. The Statement of Defence says that the list was never provided.

[11] In this group of paragraphs, it is alleged that there were serious concerns with the work of Landmark Lisgar in that:

- it did not obtain a performance bond in Bermuda, as the contract required;
- it entered into a contract for excavation where the price was well beyond the appropriate market costs for the services of the subcontractor;
- during the early phase of excavation, it was unable to handle soft soil conditions which had been identified in the tender documents;
- with a local engineering firm, it eliminated some of the piling required to support the project, contrary to the views of CS&P and the subcontractor who had developed the structural design;
- it constructed an elevator core for the project, then one-storey high, which was not properly founded and had to be removed;
- it approached Derrick V. Burgess directly to request that the requirement to waterproof the outside of the tank be deleted from the project specifications and to request that funds be released to it despite little progress and a scaling back of specifications; and,
- it submitted inappropriate expenses and charges for reimbursement throughout the project. Its draw-downs frequently contain copies of documents that had been submitted in previous requests for payment.

[12] In the Statement of Defence, it is said that Landmark Lisgar blamed CS&P and its subcontractors for its problems on the project. In the Statement of Defence, it is alleged that Sam Spagnuolo would not certify amounts he found to be inappropriate for reimbursement and would often confirm lesser amounts than were sought by Landmark Lisgar. The engineer of record identified numerous issues with the work that had been done. It determined that Landmark Lismark had not performed in accordance with the contract and directed that work be removed. It is said that this essentially required Landmark Lisgar to re-start the project at its own cost. According to the defendant, in response to some of these problems, Landmark Lisgar went directly to the government. Often throughout the project, Certificates of Payment issued by CS&P were overruled by the Ministry and payments made to Landmark Lisgar for an amount above that which was certified. Landmark Lisgar approached the plaintiff, Derrick V. Burgess, directly with payment and other requests. This was done without consulting CS&P or otherwise following the approved and required processes. Recommendations made by CS&P to refuse the release of funds to Landmark Lisgar and to refuse amendments to the specifications sought by Landmark Lisgar were overruled. The money was paid and changes made as requested by Landmark Lisgar.

[13] In short, the counsel for the plaintiffs submitted that none of this can reflect on whether or not Sam Spagnuolo altered the cheques, disseminated them or ensured that they came to public attention. The manner of selection and the competence of the company chosen to complete the project are not material to those issues. Counsel says the allegations contained in these paragraphs are intended to create a false context and colour, disclose no reasonable defence and, on this basis, should be struck.

Analysis

[14] Counsel for the plaintiffs readily conceded the test is a high one. It must be plain and obvious that the pleading does not disclose a reasonable defence. A Statement of Defence will be subject to a motion to strike if the defendant is unable to establish a defence disentitling the plaintiff from the relief sought, assuming the facts alleged in the defence are true. A pleading that: "demonstrates a complete absence of material facts will be declared to be frivolous and vexatious. Similarly, portions of pleadings that are irrelevant, argumentative or inserted for color, or that constitute bare allegations should be struck out as scandalous. The same applies to a document that contains only argument and includes unfounded and inflammatory attacks on the integrity of a party…" (see: George v. Harris (2000), 97 A.C.W.S. (3d) 225, 2000 CarswellOnt 1714 (S.C.) at para. 20).

[15] In Quizno's Canada Restaurant v. Kileel Developments Ltd. (2008), 2008 ONCA 644 (CanLII), 92 O.R. (3d) 347, the Court of appeal has provided guidance as to the parameters to be applied on these motions. The case was part of a larger battle between a franchisor and a number of its franchisees. The decision is driven by the determination of a motions judge that certain paragraphs of a Statement of Defence should be struck out, not because they were irrelevant, but because, as she saw it, the prejudice associated with them outweighed their probative value. The Court of Appeal observed:

> Pleadings are not the appropriate stage in an action to engage at large in what is essentially a trial judge's exercise for determining the admissibility of evidence at trial – i.e., weighing the probative value versus prejudice of facts. That exercise is not particularly well-suited to defining issues for trial, something which is for the parties to decide. … A fair trial requires that the defendant be able to put forward a 'full' defence, not – as the motion judge erroneously concluded – a 'reasonable' defence defined in advance by the plaintiff and the court.

> A defendant is entitled to plead whatever material facts it chooses to in response to a plaintiff's allegations, provided the allegations are relevant and of at least marginal probative value and their probative value is not outweighed by their prejudicial effect. While the court will look at '[the extent to which] the particulars attacked are necessary to enable the defendant to prove its case,' it is not for the court to prove the case at this stage and limit the allegations to what it considers a 'reasonable defence'.
>
>
> A plaintiff cannot claim to be prejudiced when the defendant's allegations are directly responsive to allegations made in its statement of claim.
>
> (Quizno's Canada Restaurant v. Kileel Developments Ltd., supra, at paras. 16, 23 and 29)

[16] A key element in the case pleaded against Sam Spagnuolo is fraud:

> …fraud is proved when it is shewn that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. ...
>
> (Derry v. Peek, [1886-1890] All E.R. Rep. 1 (H.L.); adopted in Vale v. Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada, 1998 CanLII 14823 (ON SC), [1998] O.J. No. 6465 (Gen. Div.) at para. 18 (Q.L.); and, Gregory v. Jolley, 2001 CanLII 4324 (ON CA), [2001] O.J. No. 2313 (C.A.), at para. 15 and quoted in Canada v. Granitile Inc., 2008 CanLII 63568 (ON SC), at para. 286)

[17] In this case, it is alleged that Sam Spagnuolo knowingly falsified the cheques, arranged for them to be placed in the files of the government and to be discovered.

[18] Whatever information is forthcoming at trial, it is unlikely that anyone will appear and testify that they were present when the false cheques were created or placed in the draw-down files. Fraud is not, as a rule, implemented in the presence of bystanders. It may be that there will be forensic evidence that will point to the person responsible for the false cheques. Be that as it may, the courts allow that fraud can be found based on circumstantial or inferential evidence:

> The respondents would thus seem to contend, indirectly or at least, that the courts cannot find fraud unless it be directly proved. But, for obvious reasons, this proposition is untenable.
>
> There would be very little protection against fraud if such was the law. Those who intend to defraud do all in their power to conceal their intent.
>
> Their acts could not defraud if they were not clothed with the garb of honesty. A maxim of the criminal law, based on the same principle, is that the guilt of the accused is never to be presumed. But that does not mean that a criminal shall not be convicted if he has not taken a witness for his crime.
>
> It is likewise, as a general rule, only by presumptions and circumstantial or inferential evidence that dishonesty can be proved.
> (North British & Mercantile Insurance Co. v. Tourville (1895), 1895 CanLII 68 (SCC), 25 S.C.R. 177, at paras. 7-9 and quoted in Canada v. Granitile Inc., at para. 291

[19] In their factum, counsel for the plaintiffs note that "rather than asserting any of the usual defences to a claim of defamation, such as justification or fair comment, Spagnuolo pleads only that he did not falsify and disseminate the cheques." This is hardly surprising. Practically speaking, there can be no other defence. It is not possible to "justify" fraud or to suggest that a fraud resulted in "fair comment". Just as fraud can be proven through circumstantial or inferential evidence, so it must be that it can be defended on the same basis.

[20] The Statement of Claim alleges that: "Spagnuolo created and disseminated the false cheques." From what is this drawn? It relies on allegations that, if proven, would serve to demonstrate that the file, in which the cheques were discovered, had been in the possession of Sam Spagnuolo and was received, from him, by officials of the government. It relies on allegations that, if proven, would serve to suggest that Sam Spagnuolo sought to create an aura of scandal and controversy involving the plaintiffs. It relies on allegations that, if proven, would suggest Sam Spagnuolo sought retribution as a result of the termination that occurred.

[21] The plaintiffs seek to have these things contribute to an inference that the cheques were prepared and disseminated by or under the direction of Sam Spagnuolo in order to demonstrate that the plaintiffs are dishonest and received "kickbacks" from Landmark Lisgar.

[22] In my view, the impugned paragraphs are responsive to inferences and conclusions raised in the Statement of Claim. Sam Spagnuolo seeks to defend the action by reviewing the conduct of CS&P and its relationship with Landmark Lisgar and the Government of Bermuda. This may suggest that there are other inferences to be drawn leading to a submission that the plaintiffs have failed, on a balance of probabilities, to prove that it was Sam Spagnuolo who created the false cheques. The impugned paragraphs, if proven, would suggest that the difficulties with the project, including the selection of Landmark Lisgar, and the work it carried out or was responsible for, were caused by Landmark Lisgar. This could lead to an inference that the government, by overruling recommendations of its architect, was a source of problems with the project. These paragraphs, if proven, could demonstrate that this difficult situation was dealt with by Sam Spagnuolo in a professional and responsible manner. It may be that this will lead to an understanding that, even as it was decided that CS&P's role in the project was to be terminated, the parties each understood what had occurred and that there was no reason for CS&P to seek retribution and that, whoever caused the false cheques to be created, it was not established to be Sam Spagnuolo.

[23] The Statement of Defence pleads facts that demonstrate how CS&P came to be terminated from the project. It was as a result of long-standing difficulties with the project among CS&P, Landmark Lisgar and the government of Bermuda. The Statement of Defence says that, in the end, it was a termination that was agreeable to both CS&P and the government.

[24] The first of the two groups of paragraphs that the plaintiffs seek to have struck out (paragraphs 13 to 16) set out how the construction contract was awarded to Landmark Lisgar, contrary to the recommendations of CS&P. The second group of paragraphs the plaintiffs seek to strike out (paragraphs 22 to 37) deal with issues concerning the draw-down of payments that persisted throughout the project. They indicate that CS&P was often overruled by the government of Bermuda on its decisions with respect to payment. These paragraphs provide particulars of the issues which formed the conflict between CS&P and Landmark Lisgar and led to the termination.

[25] I should point out that there are two places within these paragraphs which counsel for the defendant concedes should be struck. This refers to paragraph 16 and the second sentence of paragraph 35. These refer to the appointment of two people related to the plaintiffs as silent, non-voting partners of Landmark Lisgar and to the appointment, as construction consultant, of a person who had been the best man at the wedding of one of the two plaintiffs.

[26] Finally, it was submitted that, failing to strike out the paragraphs to which the plaintiffs object, would unduly complicate the action as a whole. This is not a reason to strike relevant portions of a Statement of Defence:

> While it will be more than likely that the inclusion of the impugned pleadings will increase the scope of discovery and result in a more complex, lengthy and costly trial, that alone is not a reason to strike a pleading that contains facts that are otherwise relevant and of potential probative value.
> (National Public Relations Inc. v. Hill & Knowlton Canada Ltd. 2010 CarswellOnt 9570 (S.C.J.) at para. 20)

[27] To my mind, the paragraphs in question are relevant and have potential probative value. Counsel for the plaintiffs expressed the concern that this will lead to a full inquiry into each of the issues raised within these paragraphs. This ought not to be so. These matters are pertinent only insofar as they can contribute to the issues raised in this proceeding. It may be that the appropriate parameters can be found through the cooperation of counsel but, if not, the question of what part of this history is probative to the issues in this action may be raised in the course of any examination-for-discovery and, again, at trial.

[28] To be the victim of fraud, particularly in a public context, is a difficult and sensitive matter. To be accused of being the perpetrator is no less serious. The parties should be permitted the full breadth of pleading allowed by the Rules of Civil Procedure even if it causes some hardship in the course of the proceeding.

Conclusion

[29] Paragraph 16 and the second sentence of paragraph 35 of the Statement of Defence are struck. The remainder of the motion is dismissed.

Costs

[30] No submissions were made as to costs. If the parties are unable to agree, I will consider written submissions on the following terms:

1) On behalf of the defendant, Sam Spagnuolo, no later than fifteen days after the release of these reasons. Such submissions are to be no longer than four pages, double-spaced, exclusive of any Bill of Costs, Costs Outline or case law that may be filed;

2) On behalf of the plaintiff, no later than ten days thereafter. Such submissions are to be no longer than four pages, double-spaced, exclusive of any Bill of Costs, Costs Outline or case law that may be filed; and,

3) On behalf of the defendant, Sam Spagnuolo, in reply, no later than five days thereafter. Such submissions are to be no longer than two pages, double-spaced.

Torts -- Deceit -- Receiver-manager acting as bank's agent making innocent misrepresentation -- Employees of bank, knowing representation to be false, remaining silent -- Bank guilty of fraud.

In August of 1983, a bank, which had lent money to a company, learned through two of its inspectors that the amount of the accounts receivable was overstated in the company's records. In September the bank appointed a receiver-manager. S., relying on the company's records, invested money in the purchase of the company from the receiver-manager by a new company in which S. had part ownership. S. was advised to verify the statements but did not do so. There was no evidence that the receiver-manager knew of the false statement of accounts receivable. The new company failed, and S.'s investment was lost. In October, 1984, S. learned of the bank's inspection of August, 1983, and brought an action against the receiver-manager and the bank.

Held, the bank was guilty of fraud in remaining silent and permitting S. to rely on the statements of the receiver-manager acting as the bank's agent, when employees of the bank knew the statements to be false.

S.'s negligence in failing to verify the statements was no defence; nor was her delay, since she did not learn of the bank's knowledge until October, 1984. S. was entitled to recover the full amount of her investment before that date.

ACTION for damages for deceit.

J.B. Berkow and R.L. Youd, for plaintiffs.

J.D. Crane, Q.C., and J.P. Hoffman, for defendants.

SOUTHEY J.:-- The plaintiffs sue to recover an investment of about $250,000 in a business that failed. Their investment was in Dimension Furniture Ltd. ("Newco"), a corporation which purchased the assets of Dimension Furniture Design Canada Ltd. ("Oldco") in September, 1983, from the defendant Peat Marwick Limited ("Peats") as receiver and manager and trustee in bankruptcy of Oldco. The defendant bank had appointed Peats as receiver and manager and was the petitioning creditor in the bankruptcy. Newco continued the furniture manufacturing business of Oldco for about 18 months, but without success. Newco went into bankruptcy in June, 1985, again on a petition of the bank. The plaintiffs lost all the money they had invested in Newco.

The plaintiffs claim that the bank had knowledge at the time of the sale to Newco of a substantial falsification of the books and records of Oldco pertaining to the accounts receivable of the company. It is common ground that the bank gave no warning of any such falsification to Stanley Sugar ("Sugar"). Sugar is the husband of the plaintiff, Sandra Sugar, and he had acted on behalf of his wife in investigating Oldco and in negotiating the purchase of its assets. Newco was a company incorporated for the purpose of purchasing the assets of Oldco and continuing its business. Sandra Sugar invested money in Newco. The corporate plaintiff, 582087 Ontario Limited, was incorporated after the purchase. It is wholly owned by Sandra Sugar and assumed her investment in Newco. The plaintiffs claim that they would not have invested in Newco, if the bank had disclosed to Sugar its knowledge of the falsifications.

The falsifications resulted in a gross overstatement of the accounts receivable of Oldco in statements and reports prepared by or for Jacqueline and Thomas Klein, the principal shareholders and operators of Oldco. These statements were subsequently used by Peats in its reports and statements at the time of the sale of assets.

The issues

Among the grounds on which the plaintiffs' claim is based is the allegation that the conduct of the bank and Peats amounted to a fraudulent or negligent misrepresentation as to the state of the accounts receivable. Alternatively, even if there was no misrepresentation, the plaintiffs claim that the bank was guilty of a breach of a fiduciary duty owed by it to the plaintiffs as valued customers. It is further submitted that the bank is liable simply because it remained silent at the time of the purchase without disclosing facts which would have led the Sugars to refrain from becoming involved in the purchase.

The issues are complicated by the fact that the Kleins, who were responsible for the falsifications, continued in the business until August, 1984, as owners of 50% of the shares of Newco and managers of its operations. In addition, and perhaps of greater significance, Sugar admittedly became aware of the falsifications in January, 1984, yet continued to cause the plaintiffs to increase their investment in Newco, and the bank to increase its loans to Newco, without making the claims now asserted in this action. These claims were not made until this action was commenced in May, 1985.

Sugar did not inform the bank of his discovery of the falsifications until a meeting on October 18, 1984. It was at that meeting, according to Sugar, that a statement was made by Peter De Guerre, an employee of the bank, which revealed to Sugar for the first time that the bank had been aware all along of the falsifications. Only then, Sugar says, did Sugar become aware of the actionable conduct of the bank. The claim made at that time was for an adjustment of the purchase price. That was a contractual claim and could be asserted only by Newco. Newco is now bankrupt, and the claims in the action are on behalf of the investors in Newco, and are founded primarily in tort or breach of fiduciary duty.

The bank denies having knowledge of the falsifications at the time of the purchase. The bank also denies that any representation as to the validity of the accounts receivable of Oldco was made by Peats or the bank, or was relied upon by Sugar, or that there was any special relationship between the bank and the Sugars which gave rise to a fiduciary duty by the bank to the plaintiffs. The bank further relies on an "As is, Where is" clause in the agreement of purchase and sale, which confirmed that Peats gave no warranty or condition with respect to the assets sold. Finally, the bank asserts that the Sugars' delay in informing the bank of the falsifications gives rise to an estoppel.

What knowledge and belief as to the falsifications did the bank have at the time of the purchase by Newco?

The bank became concerned in August, 1983, about the safety of its loan to Oldco, which then exceeded $600,000. An important part of the bank's security was the accounts receivable of Oldco, which had been reported by the Kleins as having a face value of $592,119. On August 18, 1983, De Guerre and Klaus Spies, another inspector in the special loans department of the bank, attended at the premises of Oldco. They examined the files of the company relating to accounts receivable and discovered, from spot checks made within a period of several hours, that there was a substantial number of cases in which the price of goods ordered had been entered in the accounts receivable, when the goods had not yet been manufactured, let alone delivered. These entries reflected situations in which the customers could not have been under any legal obligation to pay for the goods, so that the accounts receivable had not yet come into existence. The practice was described as "pre-billing". Its effect was to overstate the amount of the accounts receivable, and De Guerre considered it to be fraudulent.

Because he had made only a cursory examination, De Guerre could not have known with any certainty the extent of the falsifications due to pre-billing. The evidence is conflicting as to what he suspected or believed the extent to be. Sugar's evidence is that De Guerre said at the meeting on October 18, 1984, that he could find valid accounts receivable in August, 1983, of only $150,000 or so. De Guerre's evidence was that Sugar's recollection and notes of what he said at the meeting were inaccurate, and that what he, De Guerre, had said was that the bank inspectors thought the accounts receivable were overstated by $100,000 to $150,000. As accounts receivable of almost $600,000 had been reported to the bank by the Kleins, this would have left valid accounts receivable of $450,000 to $500,000.

The evidence of Spies, the other bank inspector who accompanied De Guerre on the visit to Oldco on August 18, 1983, confirmed that they had found a number of instances of pre- billing. In a memorandum written in April, 1985, he said they had estimated that receivables were overstated by about $150,000. On the other hand, he acknowledged that he had made no effort to correct a report dated August 25, 1983, written by the acting manager of the Alness & Supertest branch at which the Oldco account was located, that some $200,000 of the listed receivables were suspected to be merely orders in hand, and that the real value of the receivables "on a stress collection basis" was estimated at some $150,000. Spies accepted that this report was probably based on information received from him. I assume that the valuation of the accounts receivable on a "stress collection basis" would be considerably lower than that at which they would be included in a sale of the assets of the company as a going concern.

I find as a fact on the foregoing evidence that Spies and De Guerre believed, as a result of their investigations at Oldco on August 18, 1983, that the accounts receivable reports and records of Oldco had been falsely inflated by as much as $200,000.

It is undisputed that Sugar was given no warning by the bank of any suspected falsification in the accounts receivable records of Oldco before he arranged for the purchase of the assets of Oldco. The purchase by Newco, which involved the investment of funds by Sandra Sugar, avoided for the time being a loss to the bank in the bankruptcy of Oldco, which Spies estimated might have been as much as $200,000.

The difficult legal issue in the case is whether the silence of the bank regarding its knowledge and belief as to the falsifications constituted in the circumstances a misrepresentation to Sugar, on which he relied, respecting the validity of the accounts receivable entries. The determination of this question requires an examination of the roles played by Sugar and Peats.

Sugar's conduct and capabilities and his reliance on Peats

Sugar was a chartered accountant and a sophisticated businessman. He had been considering the purchase of another company in August, 1983, when his brother Harvey, who was engaged in a branch of the furniture business, suggested he get in touch with the Kleins. The Kleins told Sugar that they had a very viable business, but they needed someone to act as financial controller and to provide them with additional working capital of $200,000 or more. One of the bank's documents contained the statement that Sugar and his brother Harvey had reportedly had previous success in restoring the health of ailing businesses.

Sugar was provided with the financial statements of Oldco for the past few years, and he prepared an analysis of them. He said he did not go behind the statements and look at the company's books. His analysis showed a company that was recovering from a disastrous loss, and appeared to have "turned the corner". He decided against investing in Oldco in August, however, because its debt load was too great. The investigations of Oldco by Sugar and the discussions with the Kleins in August, 1983, took place over 10 to 12 days.

Sugar was approached again by the Kleins in mid-September. They told him their relationship with the bank was deteriorating, and that the bank had threatened to call their loan and appoint a receiver. Sugar told them he would be interested in making a deal to purchase the assets, if a receiver was appointed. Peats was appointed receiver and manager on September 14th, and on September 15th, Sugar, accompanied by his lawyer and a business advisor, met with the Kleins to discuss the purchase of the assets of Oldco. The meeting took place at the Toronto General Hospital, where Mrs. Klein was receiving treatment. The discussions contemplated the formation of a new company, in which the Kleins would have a 50% interest, after repayment of the investment to be made by the Sugars. The Kleins would continue to direct the sales and manufacturing aspects of the business. The Kleins told Sugar that they thought a price of $450,000 would be required for acquisition of the assets.

On September 20th, Sugar met with Joseph Atkins, the officer of Peats in charge of the receivership of Oldco, at the offices of the bank's solicitors, Strathy, Archibald and Seagram. Sugar and Atkins reached a firm agreement as to the basis of a purchase of the assets of Oldco. The total price would be $450,000, of which $65,000 would be paid in cash on closing, with the balance to be financed by loans from the bank. The portion of the purchase price allocated to accounts receivable was $330,000, with that amount to be adjusted up or down on closing in accordance with any variation in the book value of the accounts receivable from a total of $400,000. Atkins insisted that there be no delay in concluding an agreement. He said that he must have an agreement in writing by the end of the week, Friday, September 23rd, or he would close the business and liquidate the assets on Monday, September 26th.

A written agreement was prepared by Andrew Brands of the Strathy firm for the sale of the assets by Peats as receiver and manager and trustee in bankruptcy of Oldco to Newco, a company to be incorporated. The agreement was made as of September 23, 1983, and was signed on that day on behalf of Newco by Jacqueline Klein, as president, and Sugar as general manager. Jacqueline Klein and Thomas Klein consented in writing to the terms of the agreement. The purchase was completed in escrow on September 26, 1983. The bank entered into a loan agreement with Newco on that date, to which the Kleins and Stanley, Harvey and Sandra Sugar consented. The Kleins executed a formal acknowledgment under seal acknowledging that Newco was purchasing the accounts receivable of Oldco based on the representations and warranties of the Kleins, that the collectable portion of such accounts receivable would be not less than $300,000, and that the Sugars were loaning money to and investing money in the capital of Newco based on such representations and warranties. The Kleins agreed to indemnify Newco for any amount by which the collectable portion of the accounts receivable was less than $300,000, or, alternatively, to indemnify Stanley and Sandra Sugar for 50% of such deficiency.

It was emphasized in the evidence that there was no suggestion, prior to closing, of any problem with the accounts receivable, or of any pre-billing or fraud. Sugar spent several days at the Oldco premises prior to closing, but said he was unable to examine the accounts receivable ledger because it was in the possession of the receiver and manager or of Mrs. Klein in the hospital. All witnesses agreed that the books and records were in bad shape. The ledgers were written up only to July 31st. The bookkeeper was on holidays. Sugar telephoned some of the Oldco customers to determine the outstanding balances of their accounts, but many would give him no information.

Sugar received from John Riviere of Peats a series of type- written documents marked exs. A to F, prepared by Peats as part of their assessment of the affairs of Oldco done by Peats for the bank. Exhibit A showed accounts receivable (unaudited) at July 31, 1983, in an estimated amount of $592,000. The accounts receivable values at August 19, 1983, were estimated in ex. B at $505,000 for book value and $300,000 for realizable value. In the cash flow projections for the period ending February 28, 1984, cash receipts from accounts receivable were shown at $475,000, which allows a loss of $30,000 for doubtful accounts. Sugar testified that he relied on these documents as showing what Peats had learned about Oldco. I accept that evidence as meaning that he relied on the statements as showing what Peats had found in the books and records of Oldco.

Sugar also received from Peats on September 23rd, the day the agreement was signed, two untyped lists of the outstanding balances for all customers to September 14, 1983. These were prepared by the Kleins or employees of Oldco. They showed total balances ranging from $400,000 to $410,000. I am satisfied that Sugar relied on these statements as well as accurately reflecting the books and records of Oldco.

All of the statements provided to Sugar by Peats were based on the accounting records of Oldco which De Guerre and Spies knew had been falsified.

The accounts receivable were adjusted at closing to $405,955 in a statement prepared by Peats for the purpose of determining the adjusted purchase price. The escrow was lifted on September 28th, notwithstanding a disagreement as to the manner of adjusting the accounts receivable. By letter of that date, Sugar's solicitors proposed that the matter be settled in one of two ways:

> (i) adjustments be made from an opening book value of accounts receivable of $402,883.00 which is the assumption that the Purchaser made at the time of entering into the agreement of purchase and sale; or
> (ii) an accurate determination be made of the accounts receivable by way of circulating such accounts receivable, verifying accounts receivable with the Purchaser accepting all risks of collectability being the rationale for the discrepancy between the $400,000.00 book value and the $330,000.00 allocation to accounts receivable.

The letter concluded with these prophetic words:

> If neither of the above alternatives are acceptable to the Vendor we once again stress to you difficulties will arise when the adjustments are to be finalized.

It is clear that Atkins was pressing Sugar to proceed with extraordinary haste to make the purchase, and that Sugar did so against the specific advice of his accountant that he carefully check the accounts receivable. Sugar was keen to complete the deal and get on with the business of Newco. Any break in the continuity of operations would probably have caused costly problems with customers, suppliers and employees. Any delay in the sale would have resulted in a rapid decline in the value of the assets. It was in the interests of both sides to avoid delay.

The role of Peats

There were no significant direct communications between the bank and Sugar prior to the purchase. Sugar was dealing with Peats, and their solicitors (who were the bank's solicitors) and with the Kleins. The role of Peats' employees requires careful consideration, not only because they were the persons communicating with Sugar, but also because they made reports to the bank, which both De Guerre and Spies say they relied upon as satisfying their concerns about the accounts receivable, and provide the reason why they gave no warning to Sugar of the falsifications.

Peats had been instructed on the day after the visit by De Guerre and Spies to make a viability study of Oldco. The representatives of Peats were told that the bank's inspectors had been unable to find some of the supporting documentation for the accounts receivable and Peats was asked, while its representatives were there, to check for missing documents, with particular attention being paid to two large accounts, De Boers and the Art Shoppe. On the basis of a random check one afternoon of De Boers and Art Shoppe files, and those of 10 to 20 other customers by Riviere, it was reported by Peats to the bank that there were no documents missing in connection with the accounts receivable. The significance of this report is greatly reduced by the fact that no one at the bank had told any employee of Peats that the bank had found the falsification of records by pre-billing. Peats was told only that documents appeared to be missing. All Riviere did was to check that the normal supporting documents were present. If he had been told of the discovery by De Guerre and Spies of the falsification records, he would no doubt have scrutinized the dates in the documents.

I cannot believe, in these circumstances, that the report by Riviere of Peats that there were no documents missing could have led De Guerre and Spies to believe that they had been mistaken in thinking that they had discovered fraudulent entries, or otherwise affects the legal significance of their failure to warn Sugar of the falsifications.

Did the bank make a misrepresentation?

The result of my findings is this: that the bank stood by and let the Sugars invest in Newco without warning them of the bank's discovery that the books of Oldco had been falsified. Statements containing the false total of accounts receivable were furnished by Peats to Sugar, and were relied on him in proceeding with the investment. There is no evidence that Peats knew them to be false. If Peats had known them to be false, the use of those statements would have constituted a fraudulent misrepresentation by Peats.

Peats was initially appointed by the bank to make investigations of Oldco, and then to monitor its affairs. Later, it was appointed by the bank as receiver and manager of the undertaking, property and assets of Oldco under the security held by the bank. Peats was being paid by the bank, and the bank's solicitors acted for Peats in connection with the sale of assets. There is evidence that Peats acted on the instructions of the bank, and no evidence of Peats receiving instructions from any other creditor. Although Peats was not an agent of the bank in its capacity as trustee in bankruptcy, I am satisfied that one of the capacities in which Peats was acting in dealing with Sugar was as agent of the bank. De Guerre and Spies must have known that Peats was providing Sugar with the statements which the bank knew was false. In the circumstances, in my judgment, the bank was guilty of fraud.

The relevant law is stated as follows in Chitty on Contracts, 25th ed. (1983), vol. I, p. 228:

> Again, if one agent makes a statement honestly believing it to be true, but another agent or the principal himself knows that it is not true, knows that the statement will be or has been made, and deliberately abstains from intervening, the principal will be liable. In these circumstances the party with the guilty knowledge can himself be treated as being guilty of fraud.

Sugar's knowledge and lack of care

I accept the evidence of Sugar that he was unaware of the falsification of the accounts receivable records at the time the purchase of assets was completed, and that he did not find out about it until late December, 1983.

On the other hand, it is clear that Sugar was being advised to check the accounts receivable before completing the transaction. According to L.S. Rosen, a chartered accountant called to give evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs, it would have been an obvious thing to do in the circumstances. But Sugar did not do it. As Mr. Crane pointed out, Sugar deliberately took a chance on the validity of the accounts receivable. He may have been negligent in so doing, but it is no defence to the claim for fraud against the bank that he might have discovered the falsity by the exercise of reasonable care (Chitty on Contracts, p. 223).

The materiality of the inducement

The evidence as to the extent of the falsifications is conflicting. Sugar calculated them to be $289,464, leaving a balance of genuine accounts receivable at closing of only $116,491. These figures are quite inconsistent with a letter written by Sugar's solicitor, dated December 16, 1983, informing the bank's solicitors that:

> ... it appears that the accurate calculation of the accounts receivable that were acquired by Dimension Furniture Ltd. ... was $333,313.00. As of November 30, 1983, $189,944.00 of the said amount was collected and the balance is still outstanding.

It would appear from that letter that the falsifications would not have totalled more than about $200,000. The expert witnesses who testified on this subject -- L.S. Rosen for the plaintiffs and Michael Beber for the defendants -- gave totals in the range of $200,000 to $290,000.

It is unnecessary to determine the extent of the falsifications, provided it was such that Sugar, if he had known of it, would not have caused his family to invest in Newco. I am satisfied from the evidence that the falsification totalled at least $150,000, and that Sugar would not have proceeded with the investment if he had known of them. As was explained by L.S. Rosen, if Sugar had known of the true state of the accounts receivable, it would have appeared to him not that Oldco had "turned the corner", but that Oldco remained a very sick company that would not have been a reasonable investment.

Sugar's delay in reporting the fraud to the bank

After the purchase by Newco was completed, and Sugar had taken over control of the accounting of the business, he instructed that a new list of accounts receivable be prepared in which each invoice number was listed. When this was completed in late October or early November, 1983, it showed a total at September 30, 1983, of $349,072, which was more than $50,000 less than the figure used at the closing on September 28, 1983. This total was further reduced later by Mrs. Klein to $335,935. Sugar accepted Mrs. Klein's explanation that the books had not been kept up to date, and that the figure used on closing was simply inaccurate. Sugar informed the bank of the discrepancy in the accounts receivable total, and arranged for the bank to change the margin requirements for the Newco loan, because the accounts receivable were less than what they were believed to have been at the time of closing.

Sugar's evidence is that he did not discover the existence of the falsification of the accounts receivable until the latter part of December, 1983, when the Kleins were away on vacation. Sugar did some "digging" at that time, and found from a partial analysis that there was pre-billing to the extent of $100,000 to $150,000. He did not confront the Kleins with his discovery immediately upon their return, because he needed their help in operating the enterprise which he was struggling to keep alive. He finally confronted them with the pre-billing at a meeting on January 30, 1984, in the presence of lawyers for both Sugar and the Kleins, and Mrs. Klein's father, who had invested in the business. There was no denial by the Kleins of the falsification of accounts receivable records. Mrs. Klein's father left the meeting in tears.

Despite the discovery of what is now regarded as massive fraud, Sugar felt it was necessary for him to live with the Kleins, because he had no one to take over the production and sales aspects of the business. Instead of demanding their withdrawal from Newco, he told them they must somehow get the money back into the business. He gave them two to three months to come up with a viable solution. Sugar thought that Mrs. Klein might be able to "pull a rabbit out of a hat".

The contributions of the Kleins to the business went from bad to worse in the following months, and, by May, Sugar was negotiating with them to withdraw from the business. These negotiations finally resulted in an agreement made as of August 3, 1984, between the Kleins, Sugar, Newco and Harvey Sugar, a brother of Stanley, who had invested money in Newco. The agreement contained the immediate resignation of the Kleins as officers, directors and employees of Newco, and a non-competition agreement by the Kleins. The Kleins agreed to pay $50,000 to Harvey Sugar, whereupon they would be released from their indemnity agreement regarding the accounts receivable. They also agreed not to withdraw their guarantee of the indebtedness of Newco to the bank until they paid the $50,000 to Harvey Sugar.

The Kleins ceased to be involved in the operation of Newco after August 3, 1984, and a person knowledgeable about the furniture manufacturing business was brought in as general manager. The Kleins never paid to Harvey Sugar any part of the $50,000 provided for in the agreement of August 3, 1984, so that the release of the Kleins from the claims under the indemnification agreement respecting accounts receivable was never effective. No money was ever recovered from the Kleins under that agreement, because they became bankrupt.

During all this time, however, the bank had not been informed of the discovery by Sugar of extensive pre-billing. Sugar said he did not do so, because this would have revealed to the bank that the financial condition of Newco was much worse than had been indicated by the statements produced at the time of closing, and might have resulted in the bank's calling the loan to Newco and putting Newco out of business. What Sugar did not know until the meeting on October 18, 1984, was that the bank had been aware of the pre-billing since De Guerre and Spies visited Oldco on August 18, 1983.

The bank called the Newco loan on November 5, 1984, shortly after Sugar told it of the falsifications. The bank instructed Ernst & Whinney Inc. to conduct an investigation of Newco's financial position, including a review of the accounts receivable purchased by Newco from Peats, to determine, if possible, whether certain accounts receivable were inaccurately stated, as alleged by Sugar. Meanwhile the bank's solicitors continued to deny all allegations made against the bank.

The Ernst & Whinney report, dated December 17, 1984, concluded from a "cursory review" that the receivables as of June 30, 1983, might have been overstated, and suggested that further evidence might be obtained. Mr. W.C. Simpson, superintendent, special loans department of the bank interpreted this somewhat cautious report as saying that there had been fraud perpetrated by the principals of Oldco relating to the receivables, and that Sugar's claims were basically correct.

The bank did not follow up the suggestion of Ernst & Whinney to obtain further evidence, because, according to the evidence of Mr. Cameron of the special loans department, it would serve no good purpose to do so. He said that knowledge as to the exact amount of the discrepancy did not matter, if there was a problem.

The bank did not respond to Sugar's claim for an adjustment in the price paid for the assets of Oldco, but did increase its advances to Newco by $250,000. As a condition of this increase, the Sugars were required to invest an additional $30,000 in Newco. This brought their total investment to $245,000, which is the principal amount claimed in this action.

The action was commenced by statement of claim dated May 23, 1985. The bank responded with a demand for payment, dated June 12, 1985. Ernst & Whinney were appointed as receiver and manager of the undertaking of Newco on June 26, 1985. A petition for a receiving order was filed on June 25, 1985.

The essential element in the claim against the bank for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation is the bank's knowledge, through De Guerre and Spies, of the fraudulent conduct of the Kleins. I accept the evidence of Sugar that he was unaware of the bank's knowledge of the fraud by the Kleins until October 18, 1984. It was, of course, unnecessary for Sugar then to confront the bank with his discovery of its complicity in the fraud, because he had learned of the bank's knowledge from De Guerre, an employee of the bank. I accept the evidence of Sugar that De Guerre was incredulous that Sugar had not known all along of the fraudulent conduct of the Kleins in inflating the accounts receivable, as had been discovered by De Guerre and Spies in short order on August 18, 1983.

In my opinion, the delay of the Sugars after October 18, 1984, in commencing this action does not give rise to any bar to the action by way of estoppel or otherwise. The claim made initially by the Sugars was for an adjustment in the purchase price paid by Newco for the assets of Oldco. The bank made no response to this claim, but co-operated by extending further credit to Newco in hopes that the ill-starred venture could be nursed back to success. Nor does the delay cast doubt on the factual basis of Sugar's claim that he relied on a representation by the bank as to the validity of the accounts receivable. Until Sugar became aware of the bank's knowledge of the inflation of the accounts receivable by the Kleins, Sugar had no reason to suppose that the misrepresentation by the bank was other than innocent.

Different considerations apply in respect of Sugar's knowledge of the fraud by the Kleins. Sugar was aware of pre- billing by the Kleins in January, 1984, but did not inform the bank of the pre-billing until October, 1984. It may be that the bank and the Kleins were joint tortfeasors. In that event, if the Sugars had released the Kleins from liability under the agreement of August 3, 1984, the bank might also have been released. No release of the Kleins occurred, however, because the Kleins never paid to Harvey Sugar any part of the sum of $50,000 specified in the agreement of August 3, 1984.

Breaches by Newco of its loan agreement

Mr. Crane submitted that the bank had a good defence to the plaintiffs' claim, because of breaches by Newco of its loan agreement with the bank. This agreement is contained in a letter dated September 26, 1983, and was one of the related agreements made at the time the assets of Oldco were purchased. Mr. Crane referred specifically to cls. 6(e) (warranty that statements furnished to the bank should be accurate and complete), 7.1(g) (notice of adverse changes), and 7.2 (covenant against corporate reorganization).

The loan agreement was one of the related transactions which the Sugars were induced by the fraudulent misrepresentation of the bank to enter into, and which caused the loss and damages which the plaintiffs seek to recover. If the bank caused damage to the plaintiffs by fraudulently inducing the Sugars to cause this agreement to be made as part of the venture, it would be a travesty if the bank could rely on a provision of the agreement as providing a defence to the claim against the bank for fraud. If the fraud had not occurred, there would have been no loan agreement and no provisions to rely on.

In any event, I am not satisfied that any breaches of the covenants in question (or, at least those to which the Sugars were privy) had any material effect on the financial condition of Newco, or the extent of the loan to it from the bank.

"As is, Where is" clause

The "As is, Where is" clause would probably have provided a complete answer to a claim in contract by Newco against Peats. It might also have been relevant to a claim for negligent misrepresentation against Peats or the bank, because it could be taken as a disclaimer of responsibility. But, the "As is, Where is" clause has no application, in my opinion, to a claim in fraud by the Sugars against the bank. It is a provision in the agreement of purchase and sale which would not have been entered into if the fraudulent misrepresentation had not been made. Its only possible relevance to that claim might be to make more doubly certain the loss by the Sugars at being induced to make the investment, if it prevented any claim under the agreement of purchase and sale.

Liability for fraud

In my judgment, the bank is liable to the plaintiffs, or one of them, for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation. Before considering the amount of those damages, I shall deal with the claim advanced by the plaintiffs at trial that the bank was guilty of a breach of fiduciary duty to the plaintiffs.

Claim of breach of fiduciary relationship

The allegation of breach of fiduciary duty was made by amendment to the statement of claim at trial. The amendment was as follows:

> 15.(a) The Plaintiffs allege that the Defendant C.I.B.C. was in a special relationship with the Plaintiffs as valued customers of the C.I.B.C. As a result, the Plaintiffs allege that the Defendant CIBC owed them a fiduciary duty which the Defendant C.I.B.C. breached by its failure to reveal to the Plaintiffs its knowledge of the discrepancy in the accounts receivable as aforesaid.

Spies stated in a report dated September 30, 1983, that "the Sugar family are valued customers of our St. Clair & Dufferin Branch". Oldco and Newco dealt at another branch of the bank, namely, Alness & Supertest. There was no other evidence as to the nature of the dealings between the Sugar family and the bank at the St. Clair & Dufferin branch. The mere fact that the Sugars were customers of the bank is not enough to establish a fiduciary relationship.

Sugar accepted at trial the description of himself as a knowledgeable trouble-shooter. He was an experienced businessman. He was introduced to the Oldco situation by his brother, Harvey, not by the bank. There is no evidence that either the bank or Peats offered any advice to Sugar regarding the soundness of an investment in Oldco or Newco. Sugar had his own legal and accounting advisors and was not relying on the bank for advice as to what he should do. Although he was required by Atkins to act quickly to enter into and complete the agreement for the purchase of the assets of Oldco, the health of the business as a going concern required prompt action. There was no evidence of anything that would suggest duress or undue influence in law.

Mr. Youd relied on Lloyd's Bank Ltd. v. Bundy, [1975] 1 Q.B. 326; Woods v. Martin's Bank Ltd., [1959] 1 Q.B. 55, and Standard Investments Ltd. v. C.I.B.C. (1985), 1985 CanLII 164 (ON CA), 52 O.R. (2d) 473, 22 D.L.R. (4th) 410, 30 B.L.R. 193 (C.A.). In my judgment, none of these decisions is applicable to the case at bar, because of the facts I have mentioned in the preceding paragraph. The plaintiffs dealt with the bank through Sugar. In my opinion, there was no fiduciary relationship between the plaintiffs and the bank in connection with the sale of assets to Newco.

The claim against Peats

As stated above, the evidence is that the bank did not inform Peats of the discovery of pre-billing by De Guerre and Spies. The employees of Peats did not themselves discover the falsification of records by the Kleins. There is no factual basis for a claim of fraud against Peats.

Nor can there be a valid claim for negligent misrepresentation as against Peats. The employees of Peats did a viability study of Oldco, during the course of which they prepared statements of the assets of Oldco based on existing accounting records. They did not purport to verify those records. The only entries for which Peats was responsible were those which adjusted the Oldco records for transactions occurring after Peats had arrived at the Oldco premises. There was no evidence of any errors in those adjusting entries. There was no evidence that Peats did not accurately represent to Sugar and the bank the contents of the accounting records prepared by Oldco. There was, therefore, no misrepresentation by Peats.

Furthermore, the "As is, Where is" clause in the agreement of sale from Peats to Newco constitutes a valid disclaimer of responsibility by Peats for the accuracy of any statements as to the assets being sold.

Peats was a proper defendant to the action under rule 5.02(2) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, because of doubt as to the person from whom the plaintiff was entitled to relief. Peats was defended by the same solicitors and counsel as the bank, and the presence of Peats as a party defendant did not add to the length or expense of the trial. The action is dismissed as against Peats, but without costs.

Damages

The proper measure of damages for fraudulent misrepresentation is that which will put the innocent party in the position he would have been in if the representation had not been made: see

Doyle v. Olby (Ironmongers) Ltd., [1969] 2 Q.B. 158. In this case, if the fraudulent representation had not been made, the plaintiffs would not have invested money in Newco. In my opinion, they are entitled to recover the full amount of that investment up to the time at which they became aware of the bank's knowledge of the falsification.

The evidence is that Sandra Sugar had invested $175,000 in Newco prior to April 30, 1984. On April 30, 1984, the investment by Sandra Sugar in Newco was assumed by her wholly owned company, the corporate plaintiff. Although the evidence was presented in a very confusing way, I understand the facts to be that the indebtedness of Newco to Sandra Sugar was satisfied by payment of $175,000 to 582087 Ontario Limited, but that an equal amount was repaid on the same day from the corporate plaintiff to Newco. The Sugars were aware at the time of these transactions of the falsifications by the Kleins, but not of the complicity of the bank in the fraud. No new money was invested. In my judgment, the effect of the transaction was to place the numbered company in a position where it was entitled to recover from the bank the damages for fraud that were initially sustained by Sandra Sugar.

Further payments of $40,000 were made by the corporate plaintiff to or on behalf of Newco during August and September, 1984. These sums were invested in a futile effort to keep Newco afloat. They were the result of the initial investment caused by the fraudulent misrepresentation, and were made without knowledge of the facts giving rise to a claim for fraud against the bank. I find that the corporate plaintiff is entitled to recover these additional investments of $40,000.

The final investment by the corporate plaintiff was of the sum of $30,000 on February 4, 1985. At the time of this investment, the Sugars were fully aware of the bank's knowledge of the fraudulent conduct of the Kleins. The investment was made, as noted above, as a condition of the further extension of credit by the bank to Newco. In my opinion, the corporate plaintiff cannot recover this last investment of $30,000 that was made with full knowledge of the fraudulent misrepresentation for which the bank was responsible.

For the foregoing reasons, there will be judgment for 582087 Ontario Limited against the bank for $215,000, together with interest at 12% per annum from May 23, 1985, the date of the statement of claim. Counsel may speak to me on the question of costs. This should be done before the end of term.

Judgment for plaintiffs.

PRESENT :—Sir Henry Strong C. J., and Taschereau, Gwynne, Sedge wick, King and Girouard JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH FOR LOWER CANADA (APPEAL SIDE).

Insurance against fire—Condition of policy—Fraudulent statement— Proof of fraud—Presumption —Assignment of policy—Fraud by assignor—Appeal—Questions of fact—Reversal on.

Where an insurance policy is to be forfeited if the claim is in any respect fraudulent it is not essential that the fraud should be directly proved; it is sufficient if a clear case is established by presumption, or inference, or by circumstantial evidence.

The assignee of the policy cannot recover on it if fraud is established against his assignor.

If a sufficiently clear case is made out the court will allow an appeal on mere questions of fact against the concurrent findings of two courts. Arpin v. The Queen (14 Can. S.C.R. 736); Schwersenski v. Vineberg (1891 CanLII 41 (SCC), 19 Can. S.C.R. 243); and City of Montreal v. Lemoine (1894 CanLII 60 (SCC), 23 Can. S.C.R. 390) distinguished.

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada (appeal side) affirming the judgment of the Superior Court in favour of the plaintiffs.

The action was upon a policy of insurance against fire issued by the defendant company to one Duval on a quantity of lumber in his yard on the river Nicolet and assigned by Duval to the plaintiffs. One of the conditions of the policy was that it should be forfeited if the claim was in any respect fraudulent and the defence of the company to the action was that

Duval in his application for insurance had materially [exaggerated the quantity and value of the lumber and obtained thereby insurance above its value and that he had fraudulently exaggerated the amount of his loss. The contention of the plaintiffs on this appeal was that the fraud charged had not been directly proved, but had to be presumed from the evidence which was not sufficient, and also that Duval's fraud could not deprive them of the benefit of the policy. The courts below held that the charge of fraud had not been made out and gave judgment against the company.

The material facts of the case with the pleadings and substance of the evidence are set out in the judgment of the court.

Trenholme Q.C. and Lafleur for the appellants. Á clear case of fraud has been made out and the evidence can be dealt with by this court as well as the court of first instance. Bland v. Ross ([1]).

Duval's fraud forfeited the policy and the assignees are in no better position than he would be.

Beique Q.C. and Geoffrion Q.C. for the respondents. There is no direct evidence of fraud and it cannot be presumed If it could Duval's fraud cannot affect the innocent assignees.

Two courts have found that no fraud was committed and this court will not interfere with those findings. Arpin v. Tue Queen ([2]); Schwersenki v. Vineberg ([3]); City of Montreal v. Lemoine ([4]).

The judgment of the court was delivered by :

Duval, claim from the company appellant the sum of $5,000, being the amount of an insurance policy issued' on the 7th September 1883, by the appellant to the said Duval, concurrently with other policies in various other companies, amounting altogether to $17,000, on a quantity of lumber then piled in a yard on the river Nicolet, which lumber was but two weeks afterwards destroyed by fire.

The appellants pleaded in answer :

1 That the policy was obtained by the false and fraudulent representations of Duval that the lumler insured was worth $30,000 whereas at no time during the existence of the policy was it worth half that sum :

2. That Duval, in the application, materially exaggerated the quantity and value of the lumber mentioned therein, and thereby obtained from the appellants and other companies, represented by the same agent simultaneous insurances to the amount of $17,000 over and above $12,000 prior insurance —thus making

[1] Piro and Montaldi appeal the summary judgment granted to Enbridge.

[2] Piro was a labourer. Montaldi was an accountant. The primary defendant, Marinaccio, was an operations supervisor for Enbridge. Enbridge, a regulated utility, frequently had to repair property it had damaged during its regular maintenance. In 2001, Marinaccio, Piro and Montaldi devised a scheme to do this repair work.

[3] According to the appellants, the scheme was to operate as follows. Piro alone would register business entities to do the work. Marinaccio's involvement would be concealed from his employer, Enbridge. However, Marinaccio would hire contractors to do the work. Montaldi would prepare the invoices to be given to Enbridge. Marinaccio would approve the invoices. Marinaccio, Piro and Montaldi would share the payments from Enbridge in predetermined percentages.

[4] The appellants and Marinaccio carried out the venture for over six years. Enbridge paid out over $6.5 million. Marinaccio has now admitted that the entire scheme was a fraud. No work was ever done. All the invoices were phoney. Marinaccio also claims that Piro and Montaldi were aware of the fraud. After the lawsuit began, Marinaccio settled Enbridge's claim against him for $1.9 million.

[5] Enbridge then moved for summary judgment against Piro and Montaldi. The motion judge, Newbould J., found that Marinaccio owed a fiduciary duty to Enbridge and that he breached his fiduciary duty by secretly profiting at the expense of his employer. The motion judge granted summary judgment against Piro and Montaldi on three separate bases: knowing assistance to Marinaccio in breaching his fiduciary duty; bribery; and unjust enrichment.

[6] On Enbridge's main claim for knowing assistance, the motion judge found Piro and Montaldi jointly and severally liable for $5,723,339.60, which was the entire amount received from Enbridge less the net settlement amount paid by Marinaccio (after deducting the costs of collection).

[7] On their appeal, Piro and Montaldi make four main arguments:

(1) Piro alone argues that the motion judge erred in finding that Marinaccio owed a fiduciary duty to Enbridge.

(2) Even if Marinaccio owed a fiduciary duty to Enbridge and he breached that duty, the motion judge erred in finding Piro and Montaldi liable for knowing assistance. They submit that to be liable for knowing assistance, they had to know that the scheme was a fraud. They contend that whether they knew at the time it was a fraud raises a genuine issue for trial.

(3) The motion judge erred in finding them liable for the tort of bribery because Enbridge did not plead bribery and did not prove the payment of a secret commission.

(4) The motion judge erred in finding them liable for unjust enrichment. They submit that as they did some work and did not know the scheme was a fraud they are entitled to keep their share of the profits.

[8] Montaldi argues two additional grounds of appeal:

(5) The motion judge erred in his calculation of the amount of the judgment.

(6) The motion judge erred in awarding compound interest.

[9] For the reasons that follow, I would dismiss both appeals in their entirety.

B. RELEVANT FACTUAL BACKGROUND

[10] Although the record before the motion judge was lengthy, the material facts are largely not disputed. Piro's and Montaldi's discovery evidence was filed, but neither filed an affidavit in response to Enbridge's motion. I am satisfied that the motion judge was entitled to dispose of this case by a summary judgment.

[11] The motion judge concisely summarized the factual background of this litigation. His summary is sufficient to put the issues on appeal in context. I therefore simply reproduce his summary taken from paras. 2, 3 and 5-10 of his endorsement:

> [2] This action arises from a business arrangement made by Piro and Montaldi with the defendant Michael Marinaccio who at the time was an employee of Enbridge. … Marinaccio was an operations supervisor with Enbridge with authority to retain third party contractors on behalf of Enbridge and to approve payment of invoices. Piro was a labourer who worked for various companies that did business with Enbridge and he got to know Marinaccio. Montaldi is an accountant and financial planner and sole shareholder and principal of the defendant Maverick.
> [3] Enbridge often required repair work to be done on properties where Enbridge technicians had done the maintenance work such as repairing damaged landscaping. The business engaged in by Marinaccio, Piro and Montaldi that has given rise to this action was a venture under which Enbridge paid approximately $6.7 million from 2001 to 2007 for work and equipment allegedly supplied to Enbridge by four entities set up by Piro. Marinaccio and Piro each received at least 31.5% or 32.5% of this money, depending upon the year. Maverick received either 5% or 7% of the money, depending upon the year. There is a difference between the parties as to what happened to the remaining 30%. Piro and Montaldi say that it was given in cash to Marinaccio to be used to pay subcontractors and suppliers who were to do the work for the four entities set up by Piro. Marinaccio denies ever receiving the cash.

[5] The four entities set up by Piro were unincorporated. The first was Tarrco, followed by Tek-Con, Tekka-Ent and Provac. Invoices were sent out by each entity at different times. Tarrco invoices were submitted to Enbridge for a period of about 18 months from July, 2001 to January, 2003. Tek-Con submitted invoices from June, 2003 to January, 2004. Tekka-Ent submitted invoices from February to December, 2004. Provac submitted invoices from February, 2005 to October, 2007.

[6] Piro and Montaldi were aware that Marinaccio worked at Enbridge. Piro's evidence is that the businesses were registered in his name alone without Marinaccio's name appearing because he knew that Marinaccio had a conflict of interest because of his involvement with Enbridge and that Marinaccio's name was not to appear anywhere on the record. Montaldi's evidence was that the business was to be in Piro's and Marinaccio's name but that Marinaccio told him that his name could not appear on the ownership of the company because it would be a conflict of interest with Enbridge. Marinaccio made clear that he would ensure that Enbridge did not learn about his involvement in the venture.

[7] Montaldi was the accountant for the Piro entities. He also prepared all of the invoices to Enbridge from information supplied by Piro or Marinaccio. The invoices gave Maverick as the address for the entity supplying the invoice. These invoices were not sent to Enbridge. Rather they were hand delivered to Marinaccio by either Montaldi or Piro. Both Piro and Montaldi knew that it was Marinaccio who approved these invoices on behalf of Enbridge.

[8] The total paid by Enbridge was $6,665,853.51. Montaldi received the Enbridge checks for the invoices either at the Maverick office or at a post box controlled by Montaldi, and these checks were deposited into the bank account for the entity that had invoiced Enbridge. The bank accounts for the four Piro entities were controlled by Piro and Montaldi who had the signing authority for the accounts.

[9] From these bank accounts, 5% and later 7% of the Enbridge payments were paid to Montaldi. His evidence is that these payments were for his fees for providing accounting services. That amounted to approximately $408,000. 30% of the Enbridge payments was taken out in cash and according to Piro and Montaldi was paid to Marinaccio for the purpose of paying the sub-contractors who allegedly did the work. Their evidence is that the cash was put in brown envelopes and given to Marinaccio from time to time along with the invoices. Marinaccio denies ever receiving this cash. The balance, being 63%, and later 61% after Montaldi's percentage was increased from 5 to 7%, was paid out equally to Marinaccio and Piro.

[10] Marinaccio's evidence was that no work was done by the Piro entities that had invoiced Enbridge and that the work had been done by other contractors to Enbridge. His evidence is that the invoices were phony to the knowledge of both Piro and Montaldi. Piro and Montaldi both assert that they were told by Marinaccio that the work was being done by subcontractors arranged by Marinaccio and that the 30% of the Enbridge payments made in cash to Marinaccio was for the purpose of paying those subcontractors. Their evidence is that they do not know who those subcontractors or persons were and it is admitted that Montaldi, purportedly the accountant for the Piro entities, kept no record of any of such subcontractors or persons or of amounts allegedly paid to them.

C. ANALYSIS

(1) Did the motion judge err in finding that Marinaccio owed a fiduciary duty to Enbridge?

[12] Marinaccio began working for Enbridge in 1979. He was promoted over the years. By 2001 he was an operations supervisor. He had authority to hire outside contractors to do work for Enbridge and to approve payment of their invoices. At first, he could only approve invoices of up to $2,000, but by late 2003 he could approve invoices of up to $5,000. The motion judge found at para. 20, "in this case there can be no question but that Marinaccio owed a fiduciary duty to Enbridge."

[13] Montaldi does not challenge the motion judge's finding. However, Piro does. He argues that Marinaccio was not a key Enbridge employee, but merely a mid-level manager with limited authority. Like any employee, Marinaccio owed a duty of loyalty to his employer. However, his role within Enbridge did not make him a fiduciary. At the very least, whether he owed a fiduciary duty is an issue that requires a trial. Piro attempts to buttress his argument by pointing out that the motion judge's finding of a fiduciary duty is unsupported by any analysis.

[14] I would not give effect to Piro's argument. As a starting point, the motion judge cannot be faulted for his brief treatment of the question whether Marinaccio owed a fiduciary duty to Enbridge because that question did not appear to have been a live issue before him. As the motion judge noted, Montaldi implicitly conceded that Marinaccio owed a fiduciary duty. And Piro, who now alone challenges the motion judge's finding, expressly conceded that Marinaccio owed a fiduciary duty. That express concession is evident from para. 19 of Piro's factum on the motion for summary judgment where he accepted that "it is established that Marinaccio owed a fiduciary duty to Enbridge and that his action amounted to a breach of fiduciary duty vis-à-vis Enbridge."

[15] Although we no doubt have authority to revisit an issue that was conceded before a motion judge, we should be reluctant to do so. Moreover, even if we do revisit this issue, the question whether a person owes a fiduciary duty is largely a factual inquiry. Accordingly, a trial judge's or a motion judge's finding of a fiduciary duty is entitled to significant deference from an appellate court: see Hodgkinson v. Simms, 1994 CanLII 70 (SCC), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 377, at pp. 425-426; Shafron v. KRG Insurance Brokers (Western) Inc., 2009 SCC 6, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 157, at para. 13; GasTOPS Ltd. v. Forsyth, 2012 ONCA 134, at para. 81.

[16] In this case, the motion judge's finding of a fiduciary duty deserves deference because there is evidence to support it. A fiduciary relationship may exist where the fiduciary undertakes to act in the best interests of the beneficiary, the fiduciary has the power to affect the legal or substantial interests of the beneficiary, and, as a result, the beneficiary is vulnerable to the fiduciary: see Galambos v. Perez, 2009 SCC 48, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 247 at paras. 68-70; Alberta v. Elder Advocates of Alberta Society, 2011 SCC 24, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 261 at paras. 30-34. In the employment context, an employee may therefore be said to owe a fiduciary duty to his or her employer where the employee has discretionary power to affect adversely the employer's interests and the employer is vulnerable to the exercise of that power.

[17] Here, Marinaccio had discretionary power both to hire outside contractors for Enbridge and to approve the payment of invoices they submitted. Enbridge was undoubtedly vulnerable to the exercise of that power because Marinaccio used his power to defraud his employer of over $6.5 million over the course of six and a half years.

[18] I recognize the admonition of my colleague Gillese J.A. in Hunt v. TD Securities Inc. (2003), 2003 CanLII 3649 (ON CA), 66 O.R. (3d) 481, leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused, [2003] S.C.C.A. No. 473, at para. 46:

> [O]ne cannot reason backwards from the fact that an individual is harmed by the unauthorized act of their broker, to the conclusion that they are vulnerable. Rather, the individuals and the nature of the relationship must be examined.

[19] Nonetheless, that Marinaccio had the authority, opportunity and ability to perpetrate such a large-scale fraud on his employer over such a prolonged period of time is some evidence that he possessed the hallmarks of a fiduciary duty: discretionary power over a correspondently vulnerable employer.

[20] For these reasons, I would not interfere with the motion judge's finding that during the period of the fraud, Marinaccio owed a fiduciary duty to Enbridge. In upholding this finding I should not be taken to signify that many mid-level employees of large corporations will owe a fiduciary duty to their employer. The finding in this case not only rests on its particulars facts but was largely uncontested. If the question whether Marinaccio owed a fiduciary duty to Enbridge had been more vigorously challenged, the motion judge may have taken a different view.

(2) Did the motion judge err in finding that Piro and Montaldi knowingly assisted Marinaccio in breaching his fiduciary duty?

[21] If Marinaccio had a fiduciary duty to Enbridge, unquestionably he breached that duty. He participated in an undisclosed scheme by which he induced Enbridge to unknowingly make payments to business entities in which he had an interest. He personally profited from those payments. These were acts of dishonesty, inconsistent with Marinaccio's fiduciary duty.

[22] If Marinaccio owed a fiduciary duty to Enbridge, neither Piro nor Montaldi contest that he breached this duty. However, both dispute their liability for knowingly assisting in the breach.

[23] In the recent case of Harris v. Leikin Group Inc., 2011 ONCA 790, at para. 8, this court set out the components of a claim for knowingly assisting in a breach of a fiduciary duty:

> There is no dispute concerning the constituent elements of the tort of knowing assistance in breach of fiduciary duty: (1) there must be a fiduciary duty; (2) the fiduciary must have breached that duty fraudulently and dishonestly; (3) the stranger to the fiduciary relationship must have had actual knowledge of both the fiduciary relationship and the fiduciary's fraudulent and dishonest conduct; and (4) the stranger must have participated in or assisted the fiduciary's fraudulent and dishonest conduct. The knowledge requirement for liability based on this tort is actual knowledge, which, as the Supreme Court confirmed in Air Canada [Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd., 1993 CanLII 33 (SCC), 1993] 3 S.C.R. 787], at para. 38, includes recklessness and wilful blindness. As this court observed in Keeton v. The Bank of Nova Scotia, 2009 ONCA 662, 254 O.A.C. 251, at para. 82, "to found liability [on knowing assistance in a breach of fiduciary duty], the stranger to the trust must have actual (as opposed to constructive) knowledge of the misconduct, or be wilfully blind to the breach or reckless in his failure to realize that there was a breach." [Emphasis added; internal citations omitted.]

[24] This ground of appeal turns on the third component, the knowledge requirement. Piro and Montaldi submit that to be liable for knowing assistance they had to know both that Marinaccio's conduct was dishonest and that the scheme was a fraud. And although the motion judge found that they both knew Marinaccio acted dishonestly, and indeed they participated in that dishonesty, they did not know at the time that the entire scheme was a fraud. They claim they believed work was being done, and that Marinaccio was hiring and paying sub-contractors out of the money received from Enbridge.

[25] And yet Marinaccio says that they knew. And by the time of discovery, Piro acknowledged that the scheme was fraudulent. However, he says that he did not know that it was fraudulent at the time. Montaldi says that he never knew that the scheme was fraudulent. In the face of this conflicting evidence I accept, and Enbridge has accepted, that whether Piro or Montaldi knew at the time that the scheme was a fraud raises a genuine issue requiring a trial. Thus, if Enbridge were required to show the appellants' knowledge of the fraud, it would not be entitled to summary judgment on the basis of knowing assistance.

[26] Enbridge, however, submits that it is required to show only that Piro and Montaldi had knowledge of Marinaccio's dishonesty. It is not necessary to prove they knew that a fraud was committed, Enbridge argues, so long as they were aware that Marinaccio was dishonestly breaching his fiduciary duty by participating in the scheme. The motion judge agreed with Enbridge's position. He wrote at paras. 24-25 of his endorsement:

> [24] In this case both Piro and Montaldi knowingly assisted in the breach of Marinaccio's fiduciary obligations to Enbridge. They were aware that Marinaccio had a conflict and assisted him in taking steps to hide Marinaccio's role in the venture. They knew as well that Marinaccio was making sure that Enbridge was not aware of the venture. Montaldi was far more than an accountant for the Piro entities. He prepared the invoices, which he and Piro hand delivered to Marinaccio rather than sending them to Enbridge. The invoices directed payment to a Maverick address. He along with Piro opened bank accounts in which the Enbridge money was deposited and he arranged for wire transfers to Marinaccio as well, on his evidence, of taking cash and giving it to Marinaccio.
> [25] The fact that Piro and Montaldi assert that they were not aware that work was not being done for which invoices were sent does not assist them. It was a breach > of Marinaccio's fiduciary obligations to Enbridge to be involved in a venture that resulted in him being the recipient of money, regardless of whether the work was done. Piro and Montaldi were quite aware of that breach and took steps in furtherance of it.

[27] I agree with the motion judge. In the context of a claim for knowing assistance in the breach of a fiduciary duty, dishonest and fraudulent conduct signify a level of misconduct or impropriety that is morally reprehensible but does not necessarily amount to criminal behaviour. The term fraudulent does not signify that an additional degree of corruption is necessary to make out the tort; it simply emphasizes the required dishonest quality of the fiduciary's act. As Buckley L.J. stated in Belmont Finance Corp. v. Williams Furniture Ltd. (No. 1), [1979] 1 All E.R. 118, at p.130, cited with approval in Air Canada, at p. 815:

> …I do not myself see that any distinction is to be drawn between the words 'fraudulent' and 'dishonest'; I think they mean the same thing, and to use the two of them together does not add to the extent of dishonesty required.

In Air Canada, at p. 826, Iacobucci J. described the type of conduct captured by the two terms used together as "the taking of a knowingly wrongful risk resulting in prejudice to the beneficiary." By extension, liability for knowing assistance requires only that the assister knew of the dishonest nature of the fiduciary's conduct.

[28] Here, both Piro and Montaldi knew that Marinaccio took a wrongful risk that prejudiced Enbridge. They knew that Marinaccio worked for Enbridge. Piro knew and the motion judge found that Montaldi knew that Marinaccio had authority to retain outside contractors and to approve invoices for payment by Enbridge. Piro and Montaldi also knew that Marinaccio had a conflict of interest by participating in the scheme. They knew that he wanted to conceal his involvement in the scheme from Enbridge and they assisted him in doing so. And they knew that he secretly profited from the scheme at the expense of Enbridge.

[29] In short, Piro and Montaldi knew that Marinaccio's conduct was dishonest, and indeed morally reprehensible, and that his conduct harmed Enbridge. They cannot escape liability by their assertion that they did not know at the time that they were participating in a fraud.

[30] I would not give effect to this ground of appeal.

[31] Piro and Montaldi accept that if they are liable for knowing assistance then the motion judge was correct to hold them jointly and severally responsible for the full amount advanced by Enbridge. As I would uphold the motion judge's finding of liability for knowing assistance, strictly speaking, it is not necessary to deal with the two other bases of the appellants' liability. For completeness, however, I will address them briefly.

(3) Did the motion judge err in finding Piro and Montaldi liable for bribery?

[32] The motion judge found Piro and Montaldi liable for bribery because of the payments they made to Marinaccio out of the money received from Enbridge.

[33] The civil tort of bribery is the payment of a secret commission. In Ruiter Engineering & Construction Ltd. v. 430216 Ontario Ltd. (1989), 1989 CanLII 4257 (ON CA), 67 O.R. (2d) 587 (C.A.), at p. 591, Morden J.A. set out the three elements of a cause of action in bribery:

> The term "bribe" has, for the purposes of the civil law, received a wide interpretation. In Industries & General Mortgage Co. v. Lewis, [1949] 2 All E.R. 573 (K.B.D.), Slade J. said at p. 575:
>
> > For the purposes of the civil law a bribe means the payment of a secret commission, which only means (i) that the person making the payment makes it to the agent of the other person with whom he is dealing; (ii) that he makes it to that person knowing that that person is acting as the agent of the other person with whom he is dealing; and (iii) that > he fails to disclose to the other person with whom he is dealing that he has made that payment to the person whom he knows to be the other person's agent. Those three are the only elements necessary to constitute the payment of a secret commission or bribe for civil purposes.

[34] Once all the elements of bribery are established, the court will presume in favour of the principal and against the briber and the agent bribed, that the agent was influenced by the bribe. The presumption is irrebuttable: see Optech Inc. v. Sharma, 2011 ONSC 680, at para. 23. Moreover, the motive of the person making the bribe is irrelevant: see Ruiter Engineering, at p. 591-592; Barry v. Stoney Point Canning Co., 1917 CanLII 620 (SCC), [1917] 55 S.C.R. 51, at p. 74.

[35] The motion judge found that Enbridge had established the three elements of bribery:

> [31] The three elements cited by Morden J.A. as constituting the only elements necessary to constitute the payment of a secret commission or bribe clearly are applicable to this case. The dealings were clearly surreptitious and in the language of James L.J. constituted a fraud on Enbridge entitling Enbridge to adequate relief as the court may think right to give.
>
> [32] Piro and Montaldi controlled the bank accounts and they together arranged for payment to Marinaccio of approximately $2.086 million pursuant to his 32.5% interest in two of the entities and his 31.5% interest in the other two entities. They also say they acted in paying approximate $2 million in cash to Marinaccio, representing 30% of the proceeds received from Enbridge, although Marinaccio denies receiving this money or telling them that he was paying any subcontractors. If in fact they paid this cash to Marinaccio, I find that none of this was paid by Marinaccio to any subcontractors. That was Marinaccio's evidence and neither Piro nor Montaldi have provided any evidence of any payments to any subcontractors or indeed of the existence of any subcontractors. If they did > not pay the cash to Marinaccio, they have retained it for their own purposes.

> [33] In the circumstances, the appropriate remedy under the claim for bribery is to require Piro and Montaldi to pay Enbridge the $2.086 million paid to Marinaccio and a further $2 million either paid to Marinaccio or kept by them. Thus under this heading Piro and Montaldi are jointly and severally responsible to pay Enbridge $4.086 million.

[36] Piro and Montaldi challenge the motion judge's finding on three grounds. First, they say that Enbridge did not plead a cause of action in bribery. The motion judge, therefore, was wrong to grant judgment on a claim that was not pleaded. Second, they say that bribery was not made out because the payments to Marinaccio were not made to him as an agent of Enbridge, but as a principal of the Piro entities. Third, Piro says that the motion judge ought to have limited his damages award to $2 million, which was the amount of Piro's profit. I do not agree with any of these grounds advanced by the appellants.

[37] On the first ground, although Enbridge did not use the word "bribery" in its amended claim, it did plead all of the material facts required to establish a cause of action in bribery. More important, in its notice of motion, Enbridge expressly moved for summary judgment for bribery. Its motion was served on the appellants 14 months before it was heard, and the issue of bribery was fully argued before the motion judge. Therefore, neither Piro nor Montaldi can seriously claim that he was prejudiced by the omission of the word bribery from Enbridge's pleading.

[38] On the second ground, Piro and Montaldi admitted that they acted in concert to make secret payments to Marinaccio of approximately $2.086 million, which represented his percentage interest in the Piro entities. They have also asserted that they acted in concert in paying Marinaccio in cash a further $2 million, representing 30 per cent of the total proceeds of the fraud.

[39] Accepting their admission and their assertion, Piro and Montaldi secretly paid to Marinaccio approximately $4.086 million from the amounts invoiced to Enbridge and paid by Enbridge to the Piro entities. In other words, they paid bribes to Marinaccio amounting to $4.086 million and they kept these payments secret from Enbridge. Their motive in making these payments is irrelevant. Thus, Piro cannot escape liability by claiming that the payments were made to Marinaccio as a principal of the Piro entities and not as an agent of Enbridge.

[40] And Montaldi cannot escape liability by claiming that he did not know of the fraud or deal directly with Enbridge. Neither his reasons for transferring funds to Marinaccio nor his awareness of the fraudulent nature of the scheme has any bearing on his liability. His knowledge that Marinaccio was acting as an employee of Enbridge and his failure to disclose the payments to Enbridge are sufficient. Further, he dealt with Enbridge extensively: he prepared all of the invoices addressed to Enbridge on behalf of the Piro entities; he received Enbridge's checks at either the Maverick office or a post box he controlled; he deposited Enbridge's checks into bank accounts he controlled. The tort of bribery does not require that dealing be "direct."

[41] In his article "Remedies for the Victims of a Bribe" (1999-2000) 22 Advoc. Q. 198, at para. 198, Paul M. Perell describes the expansive nature of liability for bribery:

> The payment may be made to induce the recipient to exercise his influence in a way that favours the briber, but the motive is not determinative and the essential factor is the secrecy; if the payment is secret then a corrupt motive and the success of the inducement will be assumed. The secret payment is a bribe even if the person making the payment did not intend a bribe and believed or expected that the recipient would properly disclose the payment. [Emphasis added; footnotes omitted.]

[42] In my view, this passage is a complete response to Montaldi's claim.

[43] On the third ground, the measure of damages for bribery is generally the amount of the bribe or secret commission paid to the agent – in this case Marinaccio. Both Piro and Montaldi said that they made secret payments to Marinaccio of $4.086 million. Therefore, the motion judge did not err in awarding damages for this amount. I would not give effect to this ground of appeal.

(4) Did the motion judge err in finding Piro and Montaldi liable for unjust enrichment?

[44] Liability for unjust enrichment has three components:

- The defendant obtains an enrichment.
- The plaintiff incurs a corresponding deprivation.
- There is no juristic reason for the defendant's enrichment: Garland v. Consumers' Gas Co., 2004 SCC 25, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 629, at para. 30.

[45] The motion judge held that Enbridge had established these three components:

> [35] This cause of action has undoubtedly been established. Piro and Montaldi were enriched by the amounts received by them and Enbridge is out the money. Piro admits that there was a fraud. Montaldi can point to no evidence that any work was done or equipment supplied by the four Piro entities. In the circumstances I find that no work was done and that there was no juristic reason whatsoever for the payments made by Enbridge.

[46] Piro and Montaldi submit that the motion judge erred in holding that the third component had been established because the Piro entities did some work and neither appellant knew at the time that the scheme was a fraud. Retaining the money paid by Enbridge was, therefore, not unjust. I do not accept this submission.

[47] On the first branch of the argument, Piro essentially conceded when he acknowledged the scheme was a fraud that the four entities registered in his name never provided anything of value to Enbridge. Therefore, all of the payments Enbridge made to the Piro entities represented a loss. Although Montaldi claims that the Piro entities did some work, he has no direct evidence that they did. He also failed to make any further inquiries into which sub-contractors were doing the work he alleges was done, and whether they were in fact paid by Marinaccio out of the funds allegedly earmarked for that purpose. The motion judge, thus, reasonably held that the appellants could not credibly claim a juristic reason for their enrichment on the basis some work had been done.

[48] On the second branch of the argument, the appellants contend that because they did not have knowledge of the fraud at the time, or at the very least whether they had knowledge raises a genuine issue for trial, they cannot by a summary judgment be required to disgorge the money they received from Enbridge. I do not agree with this contention.

[49] The entire scheme was a fraud, as Marinaccio claimed and Piro later admitted. That neither Piro nor Montaldi may have known it rose to the level of fraud at the time does not make out a juristic reason for their enrichment at the expense of Enbridge. Had either Piro or Montaldi been an innocent stranger to the scheme who could claim to have received the money from Enbridge lawfully, his position may have been different: see Citadel General Assurance Co. v. Lloyds Bank Canada, 1997 CanLII 334 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 805, at para. 51. But neither Piro nor Montaldi was an innocent stranger to the scheme. Both fully participated and assisted Marinaccio in arranging what was shown to be a fraud on Enbridge. In these circumstances, Piro and Montaldi can have no juristic reason to retain Enbridge's money. I would not give effect to this ground of appeal.

(5) Did the motion judge err in calculating the amount of the judgment?

[50] As I have said, each appellant acknowledges that if he is liable for knowingly assisting in Marinaccio's breach of fiduciary duty then he is liable to account for the full amount paid by Enbridge and not just his share of the profit. Montaldi, however, submits that the motion judge erred in calculating the amount of the judgment for knowing assistance.

[51] In assessing Piro's and Montaldi's liability, the motion judge properly reduced the total loss incurred by Enbridge by the sum from the Marinaccio settlement. Instead of deducting the gross amount of the settlement, however, the motion judge took account of the fees and disbursements Enbridge incurred in collecting the settlement funds. Therefore, in fixing the amount of the judgment against Piro and Montaldi, he reduced the appellants' liability by the amount of Enbridge's net recovery from Marinaccio after legal costs. Montaldi contends that the motion judge should have instead deducted the gross amount of the settlement.

[52] Enbridge paid the four Piro entities $6,542,928.63. The Marinaccio settlement amounted to $1,948,727. The cost of collecting the settlement amounted to $1,129,138. Thus, the net recovery on the settlement was $819,589 ($1,948,727 minus $1,129,138). The motion judge granted judgment for $5,723,339.60 ($6,542,928.63 minus $819,589). Montaldi submits that he ought to have granted judgment for $4,594,201.63 ($6,542,928.63 minus $1,948,727).

[53] I do not agree with this submission. The motion judge addressed this submission at para. 19 of his supplementary endorsement. He held that Enbridge was entitled to be compensated for its loss. Its loss had to take account of the costs of recovery on the settlement. The motion judge wrote:

> In my reasons for judgment I held that the plaintiff was entitled to its loss, being the amount paid by it to the four Piro entities, less the net recovery after the costs of collecting resulting from the Marinaccio settlement. The > loss was $6,542,928.63. The gross amount collected under the Marinaccio settlement was $1,948,727. The total fees and disbursements incurred by the plaintiff in collecting that amount was $1,129,138, leaving a net recovery under the settlement of $819,589. Mr. Morrison contends that the gross amount recovered from the Marinaccio settlement should be deducted from the loss rather than the net amount after costs as there is no breakdown or calculation of this amount in the evidence. I think if Mr. Morrison seriously contended that the amounts were not spent, he could have asked for more particulars, assuming they are not contained in the two inch thick bundle of invoices provided by the plaintiff. I am prepared to accept that the amount was spent. I ordered that the net recovery after costs under the Marinaccio settlement should be deducted from the plaintiff's loss in order that there not be double recovery. To deprive the plaintiff of the cost of the recovery under the Marinaccio settlement would deprive it of a portion of its loss. The net recovery of $819,589 is to be used with the result that the loss to be paid by Piro and Montaldi is $5,723,339.60. [Footnote omitted.]

[54] I agree. I would not give effect to this ground of appeal.

(6) Did the motion judge err in awarding Enbridge compound interest?

[55] For pre-judgment interest, the motion judge awarded Enbridge compound interest (at 4.3 per cent) compounded monthly. Montaldi does not dispute the rate but submits that the motion judge erred in ordering compound interest. He relies on s. 128(4)(b) of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990 c. C-43, which provides that pre-judgment interest shall not be awarded on interest accruing under this section. He also submits that unlike in Bank of America v. Mutual Trust Co., 2002 SCC 43, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 601, a case the motion judge referenced in support of his discretion to award compound interest, there was no loan agreement specifically providing for compound interest between the parties.

[56] At para. 17 of his supplementary endorsement, the motion judge explained why he awarded compound interest:

> Courts of equity have always exercised the power to award compound interest whenever a wrongdoer deprives a company of money which it uses in its business. On general principles it should be presumed that had the business not been deprived of the money, it would have made the most beneficial use of it available to it. Alternatively, it should be presumed that the wrongdoer made the most beneficial use of it. [Internal citations omitted.]

[57] I agree. I would simply add that this court has consistently approved of the trial court's exercise of discretion to award compound interest for breach of fiduciary duty or breach of trust: see Kooner v. Kooner, 2006 CarswellOnt 5884 (C.A.), at para. 2; Waxman v. Waxman, 2008 ONCA 426, at para. 5; and Brock v. Cole (1983), 1983 CanLII 1952 (ON CA), 40 O.R. (2d) 97 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 103.

[58] I would not give effect to this ground of appeal.

D. CONCLUSION

[59] I would dismiss both Piro's appeal and Montaldi's appeal. Enbridge is entitled to the costs of the appeal, which I would fix in the amount of $40,000, inclusive of disbursements and applicable taxes.

2010 ONSC 2095

Ontario Superior Court of Justice,
Moore J.

Evidence -- Expert evidence -- Defendant in action arising out of motor vehicle accident not permitted to call experts who examined plaintiff seven years earlier on behalf of his insurer in connection with his claim for accident benefits -- Experts' reports not complying with rule 53.03 of Rules of Civil Procedure -- Experts not retained by defendant -- Purpose of rule 53.03 to rein in use of and reliance upon expert evidence at trial -- Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, rule 53.03. [page453]

In a tort action arising out of a motor vehicle accident, the defendant applied for leave to call three expert witnesses at trial and to elicit their opinions regarding their physical examinations of the plaintiff, their diagnoses and their prognoses. The experts had examined the plaintiff seven years previously on behalf of his insurer in connection with his claim for accident benefits. The defendant argued that the experts' opinions were highly probative and went to the core of the issues regarding damages and that their evidence should not be rejected on an overly technical interpretation of rule 53.03 of the Rules of Civil Procedure.

Held, the application should be dismissed.

The experts' reports did not comply with rule 53.03. The purpose of rule 53.03 is not, as the defendant asserted, to promote and facilitate the leading of expert evidence at trial in order to allow the parties to establish opinion evidence generated for the parties during the course of the litigation. Rather, the rule advances the law that has been developing in recent years toward reining in the growing use of and reliance upon the evidence of experts at trial. The three experts were retained by the plaintiffs' insurer (who was not before the court), not by the defendant. Their opinions addressed instructions that were not well described in the evidence. The interests of trial fairness would not be well served by allowing the three experts to testify.

Doug Wright and Sharon Ramsden, for plaintiffs.

Martin Forget and Stephen Kennedy, for defendant. [page454]

[1] MOORE J.: -- This action arises from a motor vehicle accident that occurred on September 16, 2002, when the plaintiff, Gordon Beasley (the "plaintiff"), was the operator of a motorcycle involved in a collision with a car that was owned and operated by the defendants. The plaintiff's claim is for damages for injuries suffered in the accident.

[2] Before the jury was selected, defence counsel applied for a ruling on the matter of whether certain expert witnesses could be called to provide opinion evidence at trial. Background

[3] The plaintiff was examined by a series of assessors in December of 2002 and early in 2003. The defendants filed a brief containing the reports authored by three medical doctors. Apparently, the reports at issue have been in the possession of the plaintiff since at least 2006, and the plaintiff has known since 2008 that the defendants propose to rely upon these reports at trial.

[4] The defendants seek to elicit the opinions of these three experts regarding their physical examinations of the plaintiff, their diagnoses and their prognoses. The Positions of the Parties

[5] The defendants submit that this evidence is clearly relevant and probative of issues between the parties at this trial.

[6] The defendants concede that the reports authored by these three medical specialists do not comply with the provisions of rule 53.03 [of the Rules of civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194];

however, the defendants submit that there is sufficient compliance with the provisions of that rule that the evidence should be received.

[7] The defendants also request leave to speak to the three experts to prepare them to give evidence at this trial. In this respect, the defendants can point to no authority or procedural rule to support this request, one made over the stated objection of the plaintiff.

[8] The plaintiff objects to the use of the reports of the three experts, Drs. Soric, Moddel and Weinberg.

[9] The plaintiff points out that these three doctors saw the plaintiff in connection with a claim that the plaintiff had made to his own insurer, a claim for accident benefits. The applicable legislation and the insuring agreement required the plaintiff to attend upon such examinations in order to satisfy the insurer that an appropriate claim for benefits existed.

[10] The experts have not seen the plaintiff since they authored their respective reports over seven years ago. [page455]

[11] The plaintiff points out that the reports of these experts cannot possibly be read to comply with the provisions of rule 53.03. The plaintiff adds that Wilkins J. ordered that the evidence of these three experts could not be received at trial unless their reports were brought into compliance with rule 53.03.

[12] It appears that the defendants made efforts to bring the three doctors before the court in substantial compliance with rule 53.03. Each of the three doctors has now signed forms entitled: Acknowledgment of Expert's Duty (Form 53). Indeed, in the interval between the dates on which this application was argued, Drs. Soric and Moddel signed new and slightly different forms, about which I will have more to say later.

[13] The plaintiff observes that the forms provided by the experts are flawed. The form requires the expert to name the party by whom they were engaged to provide evidence in "the above-noted court proceeding" and to enumerate the instructions provided to the expert in relation to "this proceeding" (emphasis added). In this case, the doctors were not retained by a party to this proceeding, nor were their reports prepared in the context of the current dispute. In addition, the form signed by Dr. Weinberg states that he has "been engaged by or on behalf of the Lawyers for the Defendants to provide evidence in relation to the above-noted court proceeding". Dr. Weinberg has not been retained by defence counsel. His report was written to an insurance adjuster for the benefit of the accident benefits insurer.

[14] The original forms signed by Drs. Soric and Moddel confirm that they had been "engaged by or on behalf of" the insurance adjusters. The forms these doctors signed more recently state that they have been "engaged by or on behalf of the defendant . . . in relation to [this] court proceeding". There is no contest that none of the three doctors had been retained by or on behalf of the defendants. These reports were not commissioned by any party to this action for the purposes of this action.

[15] The plaintiff insists that any steps taken by the defendants to bring the evidence of the three doctors into compliance with rule 53.03 and/or the order made by Wilkins J. are inadequate.

[16] Further, the plaintiff submits that the practical implication of allowing the three doctors to provide opinion evidence at trial will be to lengthen the trial and to focus the jury on the matter of whether the evidence of these doctors is accurate and complete. In this regard, the plaintiff asserts that these doctors gave their opinions before January of 2003. They apparently concluded at that time, for example, that the plaintiff could return to work. Among other things, Dr. Moddel wrote that [page456] "from a neurological point of view I feel this gentleman is able to do his normal daily activities including housekeeping and home maintenance duties". Dr. Weinberg voiced the opinion that the plaintiff's psychological impairments were "of moderate severity and are not of a magnitude that would substantially preclude him from performing the essential tasks of his pre-accident employment position". Dr. Soric wrote that, in her opinion, the plaintiff "does not suffer substantial inability to perform ess ential tasks of his employment, housekeeping, home maintenance duties and personal care as long as these activities do not require full grip strength of the right hand".

[17] So, it seems that the defendants wish to put forward the expert opinions of the three doctors as a shield to the assertion that the plaintiff's ongoing impairments were disabling; however, the plaintiff points out that he did not return to work for three and one-half years thereafter, and even then it was on a supervised basis and on modified duties. In that interval, the plaintiff received income replacement benefits from his insurer as well as long-term disability benefits and Canada Pension Plan disability benefits. The plaintiff was seen by a host of doctors. These are matters that post-dated the involvement of the three doctors in question.

[18] The defence may also seek to call evidence at trial from two further experts that had been retained to assist the accidents benefits insurer. Ms. Desai, an occupational therapist, and Mr. Lin, a kinesiologist, are identified in the Statement of Law filed on this application; however, in oral argument, counsel allowed that these two experts have not yet been found. Therefore, this portion of the application is moot. The Reports at Issue

[19] For purposes of this application, it is agreed that the evidence to be given in chief by each of the three doctors is as stated in their respective reports.

[20] The reports of Drs. Soric, Moddel and Weinberg followed upon an assignment issued by Sobel, Adamsons, Clements, insurance adjusters for Kingsway General Insurance Company, by way of a letter dated October 31, 2002, addressed to Seiden Health Management Inc. asking:

> . . . that you please accept this as our formal request for Seiden Health Management Inc. to conduct an In Home Assessment of Mr. Beasley and advise us as to whether or not he suffers a substantial inability to perform the essential tasks of his pre-accident employment duties, housekeeping and home maintenance duties and activities of daily living including personal care. [Emphasis added] [page457]

[21] The assignment letter described an interview that the adjuster completed with the plaintiff, indicating, in part, that:

> . . . at the time of our interview with the insured, he continues to experience fatigue and mild headaches. He advised that he still has pain and muscle spasm in his upper back and lower back, pain in the inside of his right knee, pain in his ankles and in his right hand. He also has pain in the back of his leg.
>
> The insured advised that he worked for Seaton House Hostel for Men at 339 George St. in Toronto. He is the supervisor [shift leader]. He has been with this organization for about 10 years. His duties include scheduling, staff supervision, physical intervention leading to physical restraints, [See Note 1 below] performing CPR, etc. It is a full-time job.
>
> Your insured advised that since the accident he has not been able to return to work . . .

[22] Dealing with the three reports in chronological order, I begin with the report of Dr. Moddel, a report dated December 10, 2002. It describes the reason for assessment to be "an independent neurological assessment for injuries sustained in a motor vehicle accident that occurred on September 16, 2002". The doctor does not specifically reference his instructions but does note that he received and reviewed certain documentation, including a "statement of fact" which may well have been the adjuster's letter described above.

[23] After describing the plaintiff's stated concerns and noting that he "has not been able to return to work because of the continuing back discomfort and difficulties with his right hand", Dr. Moddel went on to discuss information he received by way of social and past health history. He described his neurological examination findings and concluded that:

> . . . at this point in time I find that this gentleman has no neurological sequelae as far as the motor vehicle is concerned . . . from a neurological point of view I feel this gentleman is quite able to return to his usual occupation. From a neurological point of view I feel this gentleman is able to do his normal daily activities including housekeeping and home maintenance duties. From a neurological point of view I do not think he needs any further treatment at this time.

[24] In his report of December 19, 2002 addressed to the adjuster, Dr. Weinberg confirmed that he saw the plaintiff "for the sole purpose of conducting an impartial psychological examination". He went on to describe the history given by the patient, the documents he reviewed, the testing performed and behavioural observations made during the plaintiff's clinical interview. [page458]

[25] Dr. Weinberg concluded that "the results of the clinical interview and psychometric testing indicate that Mr. Beasley is experiencing mild to moderate levels of anxiety and depression respectively that appear to be secondary to his accident related physical injuries, pain and compromised activity levels". He added that:

> It is evident that Mr. Beasley exhibits psychological impairments [i.e. depression, anxiety, sleep disturbance, reported somatic distress], which, in my opinion, are directly attributable to the subject motor vehicle accident . . . .
>
> In my opinion, Mr. Beasley's psychological symptoms may serve to lower his pain threshold and may exacerbate his subjective experience of pain. In view of this, his psychological and physical symptoms may act in a mutually reinforcing manner.
>
> Given this, I believe that Mr. Beasley would certainly benefit from a course of psychological intervention . . . . Further, in order to ensure a smooth transition to the work force, I believe that psychological treatment should also be in concert with any physically-based care deemed appropriate by medical personnel.

[26] Dr. Weinberg did not enumerate any questions having been put to him for answer as part of his "his impartial psychological examination" but stated:

In response to your questions:

> although Mr. Beasley exhibits accident-related psychological impairments, it is my opinion based on the current evaluation, that they are of moderate severity and are not of a magnitude that would substantially preclude him from performing the essential tasks of his preaccident employment position . . .

[27] Dr. Weinberg did not attempt to correlate the plaintiff's work related abilities and/or limitations to the psychological impairments and symptoms that he described in his report.

[28] Dr. Soric wrote her report to the adjuster and dated it January 15, 2003. She listed the referral letter dated October 31, 2002, among the documentation that she referred to in connection with her physiatric evaluation. At the outset, she reported that:

> The purpose of this assessment is to obtain detailed history from client, to examine him and to determine the nature of underlying pathology and the degree of resulting impairment and disability. I was also asked to determine if there is a need for further diagnostic and/or therapeutic interventions.

[29] The source of the request for information regarding further diagnostic and/or therapeutic interventions is not clear; I see no reference to that request in the adjuster's instructing letter.

[30] Dr. Soric concluded that:

> Mr. Beasley sustained multiple contusions as a result of the accident and likely survival and thoracic strain. At the present time the most significant [page459] impairment relates to his right hand . . . . I do believe that he would benefit from modified treatments . . . there is no indication to restrict his level of function in any manner. The only exception to this are activities that require full strength of his right hand. At the present time I don't think he would be able to manage such activities.

[31] She went on to state an opinion that the plaintiff did "not suffer substantial inability to perform the essential tasks of his employment, housekeeping, home maintenance duties and personal care as long as these activities do not require full grip strength of the right hand". Analysis

[32] Clearly, none of the three doctors attempted or managed to author reports containing the requirements listed in subrule (2.1) of rule 53.03. Drs. Moddel, Weinberg and Soric did not state in their reports whether they were qualified to opine, on the basis of the information and documentation available to them, that the plaintiff was physically or psychologically capable of returning to all and every aspect of his activities of daily living, including his pre-accident employment. Nor did they describe on what basis Mr. Beasley might (as the adjuster's instructing letter asked) undertake the essential duties of his occupation (including, for example, physical intervention leading to physical restraints). In any event, the basis for their optimism that Mr. Beasley would be able to meet the demands of the job is simply not addressed.

[33] In the result, if these reports are received into evidence, the plaintiff will surely need to undertake a laborious, time-consuming and unnecessarily complicated description, for the benefit of the jury, of the statutory accident benefits system in place in this province at the time of the accident and at the time of the assessments undertaken by these three doctors. The plaintiff will have to lead evidence to explain the role and function of medical examiners retained by insurance adjusters for accident benefits insurers in connection with claims for benefits of the kind that the plaintiff apparently asserted under his automobile insurance contract with Kingsway. The plaintiff will need to contrast that with the roles of doctors retained by the parties to provide fair objective and non-partisan opinions upon issues joined by the pleadings between the parties in this litigation. To do less than that would risk misleading the jury into the belief that all doctors giving evidence would be opining from an equal footing and according to the same rules (in this case, Rule 53) when, in fact, they are not. [page460]

[34] The relationship between an insured and an insurer in accident benefits matters involves a duty of good faith, a fiduciary obligation; the relationship between plaintiff and defendant in a tort action does not. The obligation, if any, to pay accident benefits is very different from the exposure, if any, that a defendant faces in a tort action.

[35] Further, on the facts of this case, the three medical assessments, even if proven to contain expert opinions related only to matters within the expertise of their authors and even if they are correct, fair, objective and impartial, notwithstanding that they were written for purposes largely, perhaps entirely, unrelated to the issues between the parties to this action, are snapshots of the plaintiff's situation taken at a point more than seven years ago. These assessments can be of little, if any, help to the jury in assessing the plaintiff's medical and vocational progress (and the defendant's exposure potentially arising) over the past seven years. There is no contest that these doctors did not see the plaintiff after January of 2003 and that several doctors engaged for the purposes of this litigation did. The latter have prepared reports and executed proper Form 53 documents in preparation for attending to give opinion evidence at trial.

[36] The fact that Kingsway paid accident benefits to the plaintiff, including income replacement benefits, over the course of more than three years following the date of these three reports is not disputed. I am not persuaded that the interests of trial fairness could be well served by allowing the three experts to testify; the additional time, complexity and expense necessarily involved, when weighed against the prejudice to the plaintiff, prejudice that I find cannot be compensated for by costs or an adjournment (especially as I have granted an adjournment of over two weeks to provide time to defence counsel to consider his alternatives) cannot be justified.

[37] While this motion stood adjourned, the defendant wrote to the three doctors and sent fresh forms for their consideration and execution. The letter referenced each doctor's involvement on behalf of the accident benefits insurer and stated that defence counsel intended to "call you to give evidence . . . as set out in your report".

[38] The letter quoted from rule 53.03 and added:

> We believe your report . . . . complies with the requirements of subsections 1, 2, 4, 5 and 6 of Rule 53.03. For the purposes of subsection 3 this letter constitutes the instructions provided to you in relation to this proceeding.
>
> . . . While we have not engaged to you but are merely calling it was a witness to give opinion evidence, we have indicated for the purpose of completing the form that you have been engaged by Patrick Barrand. [page461]

[39] The forms attached to each doctor's letter stated that the doctor had been retained to provide evidence in relation to this proceeding. The forms did not state that the doctors had not been retained by the defendants, nor that they had been engaged by the defendants merely for the purposes of completing the form. Drs. Soric and Moddel, nevertheless, signed and returned the fresh forms to counsel and they were filed on the resumption of the motion. The Law

[40] Before turning to an analysis of the impact of rule 53.03 upon this application, I pause to address two matters raised in argument: the matter of defendants meeting with a plaintiff's physician before trial and my ruling regarding the evidence to be heard from an occupational therapist in the Song [See Note 2 below] case.

[41] First, I reject the submission that there is no impropriety in defence counsel meeting with the plaintiff's physician before trial, without the consent of the plaintiff, regarding evidence from the physician's clinical records that were provided by the plaintiff to the defendants. The MacEachern [See Note 3 below] case does not answer the question of whether this proposition is still sound law in British Columbia (paras. 25-28); rather, it frames the issue for determination to be:

> . . . not whether the CN Defendants may interview Dr. Dowey in the absence of plaintiff's counsel, as that has already occurred. The issue before me is quite different: should Dr. Dowey be prohibited from testifying as an expert witness for the defence. [See Note 4 below]

[42] For reasons unrelated to the facts in this case, Dr. Dowey was allowed to testify but that outcome does not assist the defendants here.

[43] Counsel conceded that for purposes of this matter, the defendants cannot contact and they have not contacted the three doctors to discuss their medical opinions relating to their assessments of the plaintiff.

[44] Nor do I accept the proposition that my ruling in the Song case assists the defendants in this matter. It must be remembered that the Song case settled before the defendant called the witness in question to give evidence and that the evidence she [page462] may have given would have been based upon reports which plaintiff's counsel took no objection to, provided the evidence was otherwise properly received in the trial. [See Note 5 below] Even with the benefit of hindsight, we cannot now predict whether the witness would have provided evidence about her retainer in that matter from the accident benefits insurer. Further, and importantly, that ruling issued well before rule 53.03 was amended. Rule 53.03

[45] As of January 1, 2010, amendments to rule 53.03 came into force, with the result that any party who intends to call an expert witness at trial must, according to a specific timeline, serve every other party to the action with a report, signed by the expert and containing the information listed in subrule (2.1).

> [46] The following information is now required:
> 1. The expert's name, address and area of expertise. 2. The expert's qualifications and employment and educational experiences in his or her area of expertise. 3. The instructions provided to the expert in relation to the proceeding. 4. The nature of the opinion being sought and each issue in the proceeding to which the opinion relates. 5. The expert's opinion respecting each issue and, where there is a range of opinions given, a summary of the range and the reasons for the expert's own opinion within that range. 6. The expert's reasons for his or her opinion, including, i. a description of the factual assumptions on which the opinion is based, ii. a description of any research conducted by the expert that led him or her to form the opinion, and iii. a list of every document, if any, relied on by the expert in forming the opinion. 7. An acknowledgment of expert's duty (Form 53) signed by the expert.

[47] The rule goes on to provide that an expert witness may not testify with respect to an issue, except with leave of the trial judge, unless the substance of his or her testimony with respect to that issue is set out in a report under the rule or a supplementary report served on every other party to the action not less than 30 days before the commencement of the trial. [page463]

[48] The time provided for service of a report or supplementary report under the rule may be extended or abridged.

[49] The defendants assert that the three medical experts hold expert opinions that are highly probative as to the plaintiff's health status in late 2002 and early 2003, and go to the core of the issues regarding damages and that their evidence should not be rejected on an overly technical interpretation of rule 53.03.

[50] There is no provision in rule 53.03, or elsewhere in the Rules of Civil Procedure, addressing relief to be considered or granted where, as here, substantially all of the preconditions to admission of the evidence of an expert have been breached by the party seeking to adduce the evidence of the expert(s). This is not a matter of technically interpreting the provisions of the rule, but rather one of whether to ignore the rule altogether. The Purpose of Rule 53.03

[51] Counsel for the defendant asserts that the purpose of rule 53.03 is to promote and facilitate the leading of expert evidence at trial in order to allow the parties to establish opinion evidence generated for the parties during the course of the litigation. I disagree.

[52] In my view, the rule advances the law that has been developing in recent years toward reining in the growing use of and reliance upon the evidence of experts at trial.

[53] I have addressed this issue repeatedly in the course of determining whether expert witnesses could give evidence at trial and in deciding whether the evidence given by expert witnesses was of assistance to the court.

[54] In Frazer, [See Note 6 below] I said:

> Whatever role the expert may have undertaken during the course of the litigation in assisting counsel to a fuller appreciation of the facts in dispute and the inferences that might be drawn from them, the expert must set aside that role upon entering the witness box at trial. From the witness box the expert speaks only to assist the court.
>
> At trial the expert must be and appear to be independent of the party or counsel who retained the services of the expert and must demonstrate objectivity and impartiality in the analyses and opinions that she or he is allowed to give. Because the opinions stated by an expert are predicated upon expertise that the court does not possess, the court must be confident in relying upon the expert to provide a thorough, balanced and technically sound analysis. Independence and impartiality; the court expects nothing more and it will accept nothing less. [page464]
>
> The court endeavors to adjudicate each matter coming before it fairly and free from bias. To the extent that the court must receive and rely upon the expert opinions of others and to the extent that those opinions are tainted, the administration of justice is imperiled. [See Note 7 below]
>
> > [55] In England [See Note 8 below] and also in Canada, [See Note 9 below] courts have identified and applied several factors relevant to the receipt of expert evidence, including: 1. Expert evidence presented to the Court should be and should be seen to be the independent product of the expert uninfluenced as to form or content by the exigencies of litigation[.] 2. An expert witness should provide independent assistance to the Court by way of objective unbiased opinion in relation to matters within his [or her] expertise . . . . An expert witness . . . should never assume the role of advocate. 3. An expert witness should state the facts or assumptions on which his [or her] opinion is based. He [or she] should not omit to consider material facts which detract from his [or her] concluded opinion[.] 4. An expert witness should make it clear when a particular question or issue falls outside his [or her] expertise. 5. If an expert's opinion is not properly researched because he [or she] considers [there to be] . . . insufficient data . . . available, then this must be stated with an indication that the opinion is no more than a provisional one. In cases where an expert witness who has prepared a report could not assert that the report contained the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth without some qualification, that qualification should be stated in the report[.][page465]

[56] The point is that even before rule 53.03 was amended, I was concerned about the use and effect of expert evidence in cases coming before our court for trial. I was not alone. [See Note 10 below]

[57] In June of 2006, the Honourable Coulter Osborne was charged with the task of leading a review of civil justice reform in the Province of Ontario. Having considered his terms of reference, which states that he consulted widely with members of the judiciary, the bar and the public, he reviewed potential areas of reform and made recommendations aimed at making the civil justice system more accessible and affordable, in the hope and expectation that access to justice would be enhanced for Ontarians.

[58] Mr. Osborne authored a report [See Note 11 below] to which I will make selective reference, especially to portions of interest on the subject of expert evidence. [See Note 12 below] I endorse the views he expressed, views that I conclude inform any reasonable understanding of the purpose underlying rule 53.03. He found that:

> There is general agreement that the increased use of experts is a factor that increases the cost of litigation and causes delay through trial adjournments. There is very little agreement on what to do about it . . . .
>
> Consistent with the views of the CBA Task Force on Systems of Civil Justice, the Discovery Task Force and the Advocates' Society Policy Forum, the vast majority of those consulted in the course of this Review identified the proliferation of experts as a significant problem that often leads to a battle of competing experts. Some observed that as soon as one party retains an expert, an opposing party is forced to retain an expert. The expert witness merry-go-round bears with it an advantage to a litigant who has significant financial resources.
>
> There is also the issue of partiality. A common complaint was that too many experts are no more than hired guns who tailor their reports and evidence to suit the client's needs. I know that this problem exists, but I hasten to add that not all experts should be tarred with the same brush . . . .
>
> The issue of "hired guns" and "opinions for sale" was repeatedly identified as a problem during consultations. To help curb expert bias, there does not appear to be any sound policy reason why the Rules of Civil Procedure should not expressly impose on experts an overriding duty to the court, rather than to [page466] the parties who pay or instruct them. The primary criticism of such an approach is that, without a clear enforcement mechanism, it may have no significant impact on experts unduly swayed by the parties who retain them.
>
> An expressly prescribed overriding duty to provide the court with a true and complete professional opinion will, at minimum, cause experts to pause and consider the content of their reports and the extent to which their opinions may have been subjected to subtle or overt pressures. Matched with a certification requirement in the expert's report, it will reinforce the fact that expert evidence is intended to assist the court with its neutral evaluation of issues. At the end of the day, such a reform cannot hurt the process and will hopefully help limit the extent of expert bias . . . .
>
> . . . the most relevant organizations on this issue, including the medical experts and actuaries who participated in this Review, endorsed imposing an overriding duty to the court on experts, along with a certification that they understand that duty . . . .
> Currently, rule 53.03 requires the expert only to set out his/her opinion, name, address, qualifications and the substance of his or her proposed testimony. It is silent about the degree of information to be provided in the report. [See Note 13 below]

[59] For purposes of this application, it should be noted that, conspicuous by its absence from the list of considerations enumerated by Mr. Osborne in support of the recommendations for reform of rule 53.03 is any reference to the need to encourage placing expert opinion evidence found or developed by parties during the course of litigation into the trial record.

[60] Mr. Osborne recommended the adoption of:

> . . . a new provision (in the Rules of Civil Procedure or Evidence Act) to establish that it is the duty of an expert to assist the court on matters within his or her expertise and that this duty overrides any obligation to the person from whom he or she has received instructions or payment. Require the expert, in an expert report, to certify that he or she is aware and understands this duty . . . .
>
> Amend rule 53.03 to require all expert reports include the following information:

-- Expert's name, address and current curriculum vitae;

-- A detailed description of the expert's qualifications and area of expertise;

-- A description of the instructions provided to the expert;

-- The nature of the opinion being sought and the specific issues to which the opinion relates;

-- A description of research conducted by the expert to be able to reach his/her opinion;

-- A description of the factual assumptions on which the opinion is based; [page467]

-- The list of any documents relied upon in formulating the opinion; and

-- The opinion and the basis for the opinion. Where there is a range of opinion on the matters dealt with in the report, summarize the range of opinion and give reasons for his/her own opinion. [See Note 14 below]

[61] In my view, there can be no doubt but that rule 53.03 was amended to reflect the concerns and recommendations raised by Mr. Osborne and the many people he consulted in the course of his review of the civil justice system in this province. I propose to give effect to the rule and the underlying rationale for its creation.

[62] Surely, one of the important reasons for the rule change was to eliminate the practice of tendering opinion evidence of questionable value in a trial, particularly where, as is the case here, the evidence was created in another proceeding, at the instance of a party who is not before this court and to address matters that are beyond the scope of this trial.

[63] I am aware that the court has allowed experts retained outside of the scope of the four corners of the litigation to attend and give opinion evidence at trial. The cases cited to me all predate the amendments to Rule 53 and they involve very different considerations.

[64] We are not dealing here with the treatment related opinions formed in the course of providing primary care to a plaintiff [See Note 15 below] and nor is the opinion of any of the three experts here so central to the outcome of the litigation as might be the opinion of an origin and cause expert, an assistant fire chief in a case where negligence causing a building fire is alleged. [See Note 16 below]

[65] In my view, having considered all of the circumstances of this case, I think that the application of rule 53.03 to the proposed evidence of the three experts is necessary. I am troubled by the fact that these experts were retained in fact by an insurer that is not before this court. They were not treating physicians. Their opinions addressed instructions that are not well described in the evidence before me.

[66] I can conceive of circumstances where an expert who is retained by a person outside of the litigation may be uncooperative or be professionally unable to communicate with one or [page468] more of the parties at trial but, in this case, the defendants have simply not made reasonable efforts to assist the three doctors to an understanding of the requirements of rule 53.03 and to enlist their help to assist the court by properly reporting on their opinion evidence in advance of the trial.

[67] As noted above, defence counsels' letters and the forms sent are inaccurate and confusing. More troubling is the fact that the doctors appear to have signed the forms without reading or understanding their content.

[68] I suggested that the defendants could invite the doctors, at the defendants' expense, to write meaningful, rule 53.03 compliant, reports to plaintiff's counsel which, if relevant and producible, could help me to understand any opinions they might be able to express on issues between the parties before this court. That was not attempted. No request has been made for more time to redress the current situation.

[69] I see no reason to require a high standard be met by consulting medical experts retained by the parties and a different, lower standard from consulting medical experts who just happened to have been retained by a non-party but whose opinions might be read to assist one of the parties at this trial.

[70] I am not to be heard to state that experts retained by accident benefits insurers cannot give opinion evidence in a tort action; rather, I say that such experts should first comply with rule 53.03. I say "should" for there may be cases where that is not possible and then the court might consider relieving against non-compliance to ensure a fair adjudication of the issues upon their merits but this is not one of those cases. Disposition

[71] The three medical reports at issue here were authored for the purpose of assisting an insurance company to process an accident benefits claim brought forward by its insured. That claim triggered contract and statutory provisions of an automobile insurance policy, matters very different from the rights and obligations of the litigants before this court.

[72] The purpose of the three reports is not a purpose within the meaning of rule 53.03(2.1) and, in any event, in their present form and content, the three reports cannot be read to comply with the requirements enumerated in the rule and the circumstances here do not support a claim for relief from the requirements of the rule.

[73] Further, I find that the Acknowledgment of Expert's Duty forms are seriously flawed; it appears clear to me that the [page469] doctors did not take time to read and reflect upon the content of the form before signing it and that affords me no comfort to believe that these experts understand their duty to assist the court with opinion evidence that is fair, objective, non-partisan and within the area of expertise of each doctor.

[74] The defendants' application to call expert, oral evidence from and/or to file the medical expert reports of Drs. Weinberg, Moddel and Soric is therefore denied.

[75] If the parties cannot resolve the issues of costs of this application, I may be spoken to.

Application dismissed.

Court of Appeal for Ontario,
Winkler C.J.O., Sharpe J.A. and Cunningham
A.C.J. (ad hoc)
January 18, 2012

Torts -- Invasion of privacy -- Intrusion upon seclusion -- Right of action for intrusion upon seclusion existing in Ontario -- Range of damages for intrusion upon seclusion being up to $20,000 -- Defendant committing tort of intrusion upon seclusion when she used her position as bank employee to repeatedly examine private banking records of her spouse's ex- wife -- Damages in amount of $10,000 awarded.

The plaintiff and the defendant did not know each other, but they worked for different branches of the same bank and the defendant had formed a common law relationship with the plaintiff's ex-husband. For about four years, the defendant used her workplace computer to access the plaintiff's personal bank accounts at least 174 times. She did not publish, distribute or record the information in any way. When she discovered the conduct, the plaintiff brought an action for damages for invasion of privacy and moved for summary judgment. The defendant brought a cross-motion for summary judgment dismissing the action. The motion judge found that the tort of invasion of privacy does not exist at common law in Ontario. He dismissed the plaintiff's motion and granted the defendant's motion. The plaintiff appealed.

Held, the appeal should be allowed.

A right of action for intrusion upon seclusion should be recognized in Ontario. The case law supports the existence of such a cause of action. Privacy has long been recognized as an important underlying and animating value of various traditional causes of action to protect personal and territorial privacy. Charter jurisprudence recognizes privacy as a fundamental value in our law and specifically identifies, as worthy of protection, a right to informational privacy that is distinct from personal and territorial privacy. The right to informational privacy closely tracks the same interest that would be protected by a cause of action for intrusion upon seclusion. It is within the capacity of the common law to evolve to respond to the problem posed by the routine collection and aggregation of highly personal information that is readily accessible in electronic form. Technological change poses a novel threat to a right of privacy that has been protected for hundreds of years by the common law under various guises and that, since 1982 and the Charter, has been recognized as a right that is integral to our social and political order. Finally, the facts of this case cried out for a remedy.

The key features of the cause of action of intrusion upon seclusion are, first, that the defendant's conduct must be intentional (which includes recklessness); second, that the defendant must have invaded, without lawful justification, the plaintiff's private affairs or concerns; and third, that a reasonable person would regard the invasion as highly offensive, causing distress, humiliation or anguish. Proof of harm to a recognized economic interest is not an element of the cause of action.

Given the intangible nature of the interest protected, damages for intrusion upon seclusion will ordinarily be measured by a modest conventional sum. The appropriate range is up to $20,000. Awards of aggravated and punitive damages may be appropriate in exceptional cases, but are not to be encouraged, as predictability and consistency are paramount values in an area where symbolic or moral damages are awarded. [page242]

The defendant committed the tort of intrusion upon seclusion when she repeatedly examined the plaintiff's private bank records. The intrusion was intentional, it amounted to an unlawful invasion of the plaintiff's private affairs, it would be viewed as highly offensive to the reasonable person and it caused distress, humiliation or anguish. The plaintiff was awarded damages in the amount of $10,000. The intrusion upon her seclusion did not exhibit any exceptional quality calling for an award of aggravated or punitive damages.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from the summary judgment of Whitaker J., [2011] O.J. No. 1273, 2011 ONSC 1475 (S.C.J.) dismissing an action for damages for breach of privacy.

M. EDWARDS J.:

Overview

[1] This appeal raises the issue of whether an insurer, which has issued a policy of insurance covering third party liability for the defendant's motor vehicle, may retain the same defence counsel in both the tort action and in the plaintiff's claim for accident benefits.

[2] The Insurance Bureau of Canada ("IBC"), in its Internal Bulletin 184 dated July 22, 1997 ("the Bulletin"), provides the following advice to its members:

> …Where the same insurer insures both the tortfeaser for liability coverage and the victim for accident benefits, they should set-up 'Chinese walls' so that information gathered by it regarding the accident benefits claim does not become available to the tort adjuster, unless the insured so authorizes. The tort adjuster must rely solely on the Rules of Civil Procedure to obtain the information on the plaintiff's medical condition or on amounts she/he has received as accident benefits.

The Bulletin has been the subject-matter of some judicial comment, and while not binding on this court, it appears to have been accepted within the insurance industry as the standard by which an insurance company should govern itself when it finds itself in the position of defending both the tort and accident benefit claim of the plaintiff. While the Bulletin refers to a "Chinese wall", I will use the more neutral terminology of a "firewall".

The Facts

[3] The plaintiff, Mirjeta Dervisholli ("the plaintiff"), alleges that she was involved in a motor vehicle collision which occurred on October 29, 2007 ("the Accident"). The plaintiff claims that she suffered injuries in the collision with the defendant, Roman Cervenak ("Cervenak"). By pure coincidence, State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company ("State Farm") insured both the plaintiff's vehicle and the Cervenak vehicle pursuant to separate and distinct automobile policies.

[4] In addition to her tort claim, the plaintiff applied to State Farm for statutory accident benefits under her own policy of insurance. State Farm investigated the claim and retained the law firm of Reisler Franklin ("Reisler") to examine the plaintiff under oath pursuant to the Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule. State Farm also obtained accident reconstruction reports with respect to the accident itself. These reconstruction reports were presumably obtained given the allegation by State Farm that the accident was staged. State Farm has not to date produced any experts report that supports the allegation of a staged accident.

[5] As a result of its investigation State Farm has taken the position that the plaintiff and the defendant, Cervenak, planned and staged the collision and/or that the collision did not occur as alleged by the plaintiff. As a result of this investigation State Farm denied coverage to the plaintiff under her policy and also denied coverage to the defendant, Cervenak, under his policy.

[6] At the time that State Farm initially retained Reisler on July 21, 2008, State Farm, without the consent of the plaintiff, provided Reisler with the plaintiff's complete accident benefits file ("AB"). State Farm paid accident benefits to the plaintiff until February 16, 2009 when benefits were terminated.

[7] A tort action was commenced by the plaintiff against the defendant, and also against State Farm pursuant to section 265 of the Insurance Act which provides both uninsured and underinsured coverage to the plaintiff pursuant to her own policy of insurance. The statement of claim was issued on October 15, 2009.

[8] With the denial of her ongoing claim for accident benefits, the plaintiff disputed the denial and commenced arbitration proceedings before the Financial Services Commission of Ontario ("FSCO") on October 29, 2010. State Farm retained Reisler on January 6, 2011 to defend it in the arbitration proceedings at FSCO.

[9] Reisler wrote to counsel for the plaintiff on October 13, 2010, advising that they had been retained in the tort action to represent "the interests of the defendants regarding the above-noted matter". At the time of this representation to plaintiff's counsel, there was no indication from State Farm that it would be taking an off-coverage position.

[10] On February 22, 2011, State Farm was added to this action as a statutory third party pursuant to the order of Carpenter-Gunn J. dated February 22, 2011.

[11] On February 24, 2011 and again on June 10, 2011, plaintiff's counsel received correspondence from Reisler indicating that they represented State Farm not only in its capacity as the statutory third party, but also as the underinsurer pursuant to the plaintiff's policy of insurance with State Farm. A Statement of Defence was sent to plaintiff's counsel in which Reisler purported to defend both Cervenak and State Farm. This defence was not filed with the court and as such Reisler never formally was "on the record" for both State Farm and Cervenak.

[12] On June 23, 2011, plaintiff's counsel received a Notice of Intent to Defend from a different law firm; Pavoni, Patton, DiVincenzo ("Pavoni"), which confirmed that Pavoni had been retained to represent State Farm in its capacity as the plaintiff's underinsurer.

[13] On November 17, 2011, plaintiff's counsel received a defence from Reisler, confirming that Reisler was only representing State Farm in its capacity as the statutory third party.

[14] On July 25, 2012, State Farm delivered its sworn affidavit of documents in its capacity as the statutory third party. The affidavit of documents listed documents in relation to the plaintiff's accident benefit file, as well as transcripts from the examinations under oath of not only the plaintiff, but other claimants from the same accident including passengers who had been in the Cervenak vehicle. There is no evidence before this court that confirms these other claimants gave State Farm their consent to the release of this information from their accident benefits file.

Decision of the Motion Judge

[15] The plaintiff's motion to remove Reisler as solicitor of record for the defendant, Cervenak, came before Hambly J. on December 10, 2012. After a thorough review of the facts Hambly J.

began his analysis of the law by reference to a decision of Lederer J., Ernst and Young v. Chartis Insurance Co. of Canada, 2012 ONSC 5020 (CanLII), [2012] O.J. No. 4399, dealing with the relationship between an insured and an insurer as one where an insurer owes a duty of good faith to its insured. Such a relationship is in contrast to the relationship between an insurer and a claimant against its insured where no such duty exists. This is because the claimant is a stranger to the relationship between the insurer and the insured and there is no privity of contract.

[16] Having dealt with the relationship between an insured and an insurer, Hambly J. then dealt with the Divisional Court decision of Klingbeil (Litigation Guardian of) v. Worthington Trucking Inc., 1999 CanLII 19927 (ON SC), [1999] O.J. No. 867. Hambly J. distinguished the facts in Klingbeil by noting that in Klingbeil the plaintiff was an infant and, as such, did not have a policy of motor vehicle insurance. The plaintiff was struck by a motor vehicle when she was a pedestrian, and claimed accident benefits from the insurer of the owner of the vehicle which had struck her. The plaintiff then commenced a tort action against the owner of the motor vehicle. The action was defended by the same insurer. The same law firm represented the insurer in both the accident benefits claim and the tort action. The plaintiff brought a motion to remove the law firm and solicitors of record in the tort action. The matter came before Ferrier J., who referred to the Bulletin and removed the law firm on the basis of a conflict of interest.

[17] When the matter came before the Divisional Court, the decision of Ferrier J. was reversed on the basis of the very brief two paragraph decision of Matlow J. in Stratton v. Senger, [1996] O.J. No. 4774, where Matlow J. held:

> With respect, I see no "appearance of impropriety" or "possibility of unfairness" in permitting Fireman Regan to continue to act for the defendant. The plaintiffs chose to rely on the statutory scheme set out in the Insurance Act to claim accident benefits from the defendant's insurer. The insurer was not, as a result, obliged to segregate or isolate the information provided by the plaintiff in pursuit of his claim when it came to conduct the defendant's defence. It follows, as a matter of logic, that it could obtain the services of the same firm of solicitors for matters pertaining to the accident benefits claim and for the defence of this action. There would be no point in requiring the insurer to retain separate solicitors for each purpose…

[18] In coming to the decision that it did, in reliance on the aforementioned decision of Matlow J., the Divisional Court held:

> The court agrees with the disposition of this issue by Matlow J. Where the defendants rely on the statutory scheme set out in the Insurance Act to claim no-fault benefits from the defendant's insurer, the insurer ought not, as a matter of course in a subsequent tort action by the plaintiffs, be required to retain separate solicitors for the no-fault claim and the defence of the tort action.

[19] Having reviewed the decision of Ferrier J. in Klingbeil and the decision of the Divisional Court in Klingbeil which reversed the decision of Ferrier J., Hambly J. came to the following conclusion:

> What distinguishes this case from Kingbeil (sic) is that the plaintiff in this case has a policy of insurance with State Farm in which she claims accident benefits. Reisler Franklin represents State Farm in Hamid's claim for accident benefits against State Farm under her policy of insurance with State Farm. It also represents State Farm in Hamid's tort action against its insured, Cervenak, under his policy of insurance with State Farm. Notwithstanding that a different lawyer in the law firm acts in each matter Reisler Franklin makes no pretense of erecting a "Chinese wall" or maintaining a "code of silence" between its files in the accident benefits claim and in defending the tort action. It is openly using documents and information obtained > from Hamid in the accident benefits claim in defending the tort action. In doing so it is acting contrary to its privacy notice on its public website. Reisler Franklin in ensuring that State Farm acts in good faith towards Hamid in her claim for accident benefits under her policy of insurance with State Farm conflicts with it (sic) duty to Cervenak in defending Hamid's claim against him. State Farm and hence its solicitors owes no duty to Hamid in the tort action brought by her against its insured. By acting for State Farm in both matters Reisler Franklin is acting in contravention of the principles cited in MacDonald Estates. It is in a clear position of conflict of interest.

The Decision of the Leave to Appeal Justice

[20] Leave to appeal was sought from the decision of Hambly J. before Arrell J., who granted State Farm leave to appeal largely because the decision of Hambly J. was in conflict with Klingbeil. Arrell J. came to the conclusion, based on section 270 of the Insurance Act, that the plaintiff in Klingbeil was "a named insured under the defendant's policy with the same rights and obligations as the plaintiff in the case at bar, as a named insured under her policy with State Farm". Arrell J. came to the conclusion that:

> From a fact perspective between the case at bar and Klingbeil, little turns on whether the plaintiff is suing her own insurer or the defendants insurer, as the claim for AB benefits is a statutory claim and identical coverage is provided in either scenario under section 270 of the Insurance Act.

Standard of Review

[21] Both parties agree that the issue of whether Reisler is in a conflict of interest position involves the application of legal standards to a set of facts which are not in dispute. The standard of review is correctness.

[22] In their factums both parties agree that the issues in this appeal have significant precedential value, as it relates to matters important not only to the parties themselves, but which will also have a significant impact on the rights of motor vehicle accident claimants, insurance industry practices and are also a matter of public interest. In his judgment granting leave to appeal, Arrell J. also noted that the outcome of the appeal was of some significance to the personal injury bar and the insurance industry.

Position of the Plaintiff

[23] Counsel for the plaintiff notes that since the Klingbeil decision much has changed and, in particular, emphasis is placed on the fact that section 258.3 of the Insurance Act now requires a plaintiff to apply for statutory accident benefits before commencing a tort claim. Section 258.3 of the Insurance Act was introduced as part of the Bill 59 amendments effective November 1, 1996 and, as such, came into force and applies to motor vehicle accidents after November 1, 1996. The motor vehicle accident which was the subject matter of Klingbeil occurred on February 3, 1995. The plaintiff in Klingbeil was not required as a matter of law to apply for statutory accident benefits prior to the commencement of her tort claim.

[24] Counsel for the plaintiff emphasizes that because of the mandatory nature of section 258.3 of the Insurance Act, the plaintiff being obliged to apply for statutory accident benefits must, if requested, submit to independent medical examinations at the behest of her statutory accident benefits insurer, State Farm. She is also required to disclose all of her relevant health information to State Farm. This is a contractual obligation that the plaintiff has with State Farm.

[25] In addition to her obligation to submit to an independent medical examination and provide relevant health information, the plaintiff has an obligation within the context of her accident benefit claim to speak directly to the accident benefit carrier, State Farm, something which State Farm in its capacity as the insurer of Cervenak in tort action does not have the right to do.

[26] While there is no dispute that the plaintiff, in her tort action, would be obliged to produce much of what is contained in the file contents of State Farm in its capacity as accident benefit carrier, counsel for the plaintiff emphasizes that the prejudice in the production of this information flows from the fact that the documentation and information given to State Farm, in its capacity as the accident benefit carrier, were given by the plaintiff in a situation where the plaintiff had a reasonable expectation of privacy.

[27] Counsel for the plaintiff argues that merely because State Farm has added itself as a statutory third party cannot mean that State Farm can breach the privacy rights of its insured. Just because the plaintiff will have to produce the documentation contained in her accident benefit file, cannot mean that the plaintiff has waived her rights to privacy or waived her rights not to disclose to State Farm these documents in its capacity as the insurer of the tortfeasor. The obligation on the part of the plaintiff to disclose the contents of the accident benefit file is triggered by the plaintiff's obligation to produce relevant documents in accordance with the provisions of the Rules of Civil Procedure ("the Rules").

[28] Counsel for the plaintiff argues that the information which State Farm receives from its insured, in its capacity as the accident benefit carrier, clearly establishes that the information was provided in a situation where the plaintiff expected that the documentation and information provided was in a situation of confidence. As such, counsel for the plaintiff argues in reliance on the decision of Sopinka J. in MacDonald Estate v. Martins, [1993] S.C.R. 1235, having provided her medical and other private information to State Farm in a situation of confidence that an inference of prejudice should be inferred.

[29] Counsel for the plaintiff notes that not only did State Farm produce in its affidavit of documents relevant information from the plaintiff's accident benefit file, but also relevant information from the accident benefit files of other parties who have their own distinct accident benefit claims. Specifically, reference is made to the fact that State Farm disclosed the transcripts of the examinations under oath of the other parties involved in the alleged motor vehicle accident. Counsel for the plaintiff argues that this is a clear breach of the privacy of those other claimants.

[30] As to the application of the Klingbeil decision, counsel for the plaintiff argues that Klingbeil should, in essence, be restricted to the specific facts that were before the Divisional Court in 1999. It is suggested that both Klingbeil and Stratton carve out a distinction between the specific scenario where an applicant makes a claim for accident benefits to the tort defendants insurer from the more typical situation where an applicant claims from her own insurer, thereby allowing for an exception to the firewall principle and thus finding there was no conflict of interest in those cases. In the case at bar, the plaintiff did not apply for accident benefits from the defendant's insurer, but rather made the application to her own insurance company pursuant to her own policy of insurance.

[31] While counsel for the plaintiff argues that Klingbeil can be distinguished on its facts, given that the plaintiff's claim in Klingbeil for accident benefits was against the defendant's insurer, nonetheless, counsel for the plaintiff argues that to maintain the distinction carved out in Klingbeil and Stratton would result in the creation of two tiers of accident benefit claimants. The first tier would be one which is afforded no privacy protection where the plaintiff applies for accident benefits under the defendant's policy. The second tier would be the tier presently before this court, where the claim for accident benefits is made by the plaintiff pursuant to her own policy and, as such, would be afforded privacy protection.

Position of State Farm

[32] The position of State Farm is relatively simple. In essence, counsel for State Farm argues that the motions judge, Hambly J., did not have a proper basis to distinguish Klingbeil, i.e. a distinguishing factor between an accident benefit claim by a named insured versus a deemed insured.

[33] As well, counsel for State Farm argues that there is no prejudice in Reisler continuing to act for State Farm in its capacity as both the insurer of the tortfeasor as well as providing accident benefits to the plaintiff. In that regard, it is argued that anything that is contained in the plaintiff's accident benefit file, to which State Farm would have access, would be producible by the plaintiff in the tort action. As such, there is no risk of any prejudice in allowing Reisler to continue to act, as Reisler would not be giving State Farm anything that State Farm did not already have.

[34] It is conceded in the factum filed by counsel for State Farm on this appeal that the direction to the insurance industry, which is clearly spelled out in the Bulletin, is respected by insurers in terms of how an insurer manages the conflict between its role as accident benefit carrier and its duty to defend a tortfeasor. It is worth setting forth State Farm's position, as set forth in paragraph 52 of its factum which reads as follows:

> Typically, insurers maintain a "firewall" between the evidence obtained from a plaintiff's accident benefits claim and evidence obtained in the course of defending a tortfeasor in a civil action. When an insurer retains counsel to defend a tortfeasor, the insurer does not provide defence counsel with the evidence from the plaintiff's accident benefits file. There is a very good reason for that: the tortfeasor does not have the right to obtain evidence directly from the plaintiff's accident benefits insurer. Rather, the tortfeasor must use the mechanisms in the Rules to obtain the evidence in the possession of a non-party, including the plaintiff's insurer(s). If the tortfeasor did obtain the documents directly from the plaintiff's accident benefits insurer, the tortfeasor would be in breach of the Rules of Civil Procedure, and the insurance company would be in breach of the plaintiff's privacy rights.

[35] Having recognized its obligation to comply with the direction set forth in the Bulletin, State Farm then suggests that it has no obligation to maintain a firewall where defence counsel acts for the insurer and not the tortfeasor. This is because State Farm argues there is no risk that evidence from the plaintiff's accident benefit claim will be provided to the tort defendant, except as required by the Rules of Civil Procedure. State Farm argues that its obligation to comply with the Rules ensures respect for the plaintiff's privacy rights.

[36] Finally, State Farm argues there is no reason why State Farm, in its capacity as a statutory third party, should be required to maintain a firewall with State Farm acting in its capacity as the accident benefit insurer. This is because State Farm is one company defending itself against claims both in tort and accident benefits made by the plaintiff. By analogy, State Farm suggests that if the situation was different and State Farm was an individual being sued by the plaintiff in two different proceedings, it would be absurd to suggest that State Farm would have to retain different counsel in each context.

Analysis

[37] What is lost in State Farm's argument before this court is that State Farm is not any ordinary individual. It is an insurance company, which in the context of this litigation occupies two unique roles with distinct duties. The first is its obligation to defend the defendant, Cervenak, in the tort action. State Farm has taken an off-coverage position, as is its right, and added itself as a statutory third party utilizing the services of Reisler to defend it in that capacity. Its other role is that of the accident benefit insurer of the plaintiff. In its capacity as the accident benefit insurer,

State Farm owes the plaintiff a duty of good faith arising out of its fiduciary obligations, see Beasley and Scott v. Barrand, 2010 ONSC 2095 (CanLII), [2010] O.J. No. 1466 at paragraph 34.

[38] When the plaintiff submitted to an examination under oath and complied with her obligations to make disclosure of all relevant health information to State Farm, she did so pursuant to her obligation under section 33 (1 and 1.1) of the Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule – Accidents on or After November 1, 1996 O. Reg. 403/96 s.33 ("the Regulation").

[39] In the context of her claim for accident benefits, when the plaintiff attended an independent medical examination at the request of State Farm she did so pursuant to her obligation under section 42(1) of the Regulation, which allows an insurer like State Farm to require its insured (the plaintiff) to be examined by a health professional "as often as is reasonably necessary".

[40] The implication of section 258.3 of the Insurance Act, which requires a tort plaintiff to apply for statutory accident benefits before initiating a tort claim, are far-reaching. By the time the tort action has been initiated the plaintiff will have been obliged to apply for statutory accident benefits, and with that application the plaintiff may also have been obliged to submit to an examination under oath, attend various independent medical examinations and disclose all relevant health information.

[41] Apart from its fiduciary obligation, the statutory accident benefit insurer also has an obligation to ensure that the information supplied by its insured is kept private. While decided in the context of a claim arising out of the unauthorized access by a bank employee to the banking records of a customer, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Jones v. Tsige, 2012 ONCA 32 (CanLII), [2012] O.J. No. 148, is a significant advancement in the law insofar as whether this court should follow the decision of the Divisional Court in Klingbeil.

[42] In Jones, the plaintiff discovered that the defendant had been surreptitiously looking at her banking records and had done so without her authorization more than 174 times over four years. After a thorough review of the jurisprudence and statute law across the country, Sharpe J.A. accepted that the court should recognize the existence of a right of action for intrusion upon seclusion, or what has often been described as the tort of breach of privacy.

[43] In recognizing the tort of breach of privacy, Sharpe J.A. stated at paragraph 66:

> The case law, while certainly far from conclusive, supports the existence of such a cause of action. Privacy has long been recognized as an important underlying and animating value of various traditional causes of action to protect personal and territorial privacy. Charter jurisprudence recognizes privacy as a fundamental value in our law and specifically identifies, as worthy of protection, a right to informational privacy that is distinct from personal and territorial privacy. The right to informational privacy closely tracks the same interest that would be protected by a cause of action for intrusion upon seclusion.

[44] As well, the comments of Sharpe J.A. at paragraph 72 are worthy of repetition in the context of the motion before this court:

> These elements make it clear that recognizing this cause of action will not open the floodgates. A claim for intrusion upon seclusion will arise only for deliberate and significant invasions of personal privacy. Claims from individuals who are sensitive or unusually concerned about their privacy are excluded; it is only intrusions into matters such as one's financial or health records, sexual practices and orientation, employment, diary or private correspondence that, viewed objectively on the reasonable person standard, can be described as highly offensive.

[45] The plaintiff in the action before this court was mandated by section 258.3 to apply for statutory accident benefits before she could commence her tort action. The plaintiff in Klingbeil had no such obligation under the provisions of the Insurance Act then in force ("Bill 164"). The plaintiff was contractually obliged as part of her application for statutory accident benefits to submit to an examination under oath, disclose her relevant medical history and submit to an independent medical examination as often as reasonably required by State Farm. Before the plaintiff even commenced her tort action, State Farm would therefore have been in possession of a significant body of highly confidential information to which the plaintiff had a privacy interest, and which State Farm was obliged as a fiduciary to maintain confidential.

[46] The duty of an insurer acting in a dual capacity as both the accident benefit insurer and the tort insurer has been the subject of some judicial comment besides what is found in the decision of the Divisional Court in Klingbeil.

[47] In Anand v. Belanger, 2010 ONSC 1635, Stinson J. was dealing with a motion by the plaintiff who had settled her claim for statutory accident benefits with State Farm prior to the trial of the tort claim. The plaintiff sought a ruling that State Farm could not dispute the plaintiff's injuries and disabilities had been caused by the subject motor vehicle accident. State Farm in Anand was not only the accident benefit insurer but also the uninsured carrier in the tort action.

[48] While the issue before Stinson J. was not the same issue that is before this court, his comments at paragraphs 32 and 33 are important to note:

> I am also mindful of the potential impact on the practices in the insurance industry that would result from acceding to the plaintiff's submissions. At present, the practice in the industry is to maintain a so-called "firewall" between the SABs department and the tort liability department of an insurance company, where that insurer has provided coverage to both an injured party and an at-fault driver. The file contents, negotiations and settlement strategy relating to the SABs claim by the injured party are not disclosed to those who are defending the tort claim, save in accordance with the usual practice by way of discovery in the tort proceeding. This is so notwithstanding the same corporate entity or "legal person" is in possession of both files. Quite apart from privacy concerns, this is a recognition of the differing responsibilities and obligations of the insurer providing SABs coverage to its customers on a no fault basis, and its rights and obligations when providing a defence to its customers on a no fault basis, and its rights and obligations when providing a defence to its customers in a tort proceeding where the normal adversarial rule is applied.
> The evidence before me establishes that State Farm adheres to the foregoing firewall principle in cases such as the present one, where it finds itself involved not just as SABs provider, but also in a tort proceeding as a party defendant pursuant to the uninsured motorist coverage. The plaintiffs' submission that a concession for SABs purposes equates to a concession for tort purposes would lead to the erosion of this firewall, to the detriment of the integrity of the overall system.

[49] A more recent decision touching on the firewall principle is a decision of Master Muir, De Sousa v. Aviva Insurance Co. of Canada, 2013 ONSC 185, where Master Muir dealt with a motion brought by an insurer to set aside the plaintiff's notice of examination because the notice sought to produce the adjustor from the insurance company who had adjusted the plaintiff's accident benefit claim. The tortfeasor pled a limitation defence, to which the plaintiff argued that the insurer was well aware of the plaintiff's medical condition because the same insurer was adjusting the plaintiff's accident benefit claim. The plaintiff's argument essentially amounted to the same argument made before this court, i.e. State Farm is one company and therefore must know what it has in its possession regardless of whether the claimant is the plaintiff in the tort action or the claimant for statutory accident benefits. Master Muir rejected this type of argument and held that the firewall could only be breached with the plaintiff's consent. In coming to this conclusion, Master Muir stated at paragraph nine:

> In my view, it would not be appropriate, in the circumstances of this action, to deny the plaintiff his right to examine a representative of his choosing. Bulletin 184 of the Insurance Bureau of Canada sets out the requirement for the firewall described above. However, Bulletin 184 states that the firewall should be set up so that "information gathered by [the insurer] regarding the accident benefits claim does not become available to the tort adjuster, unless the insured so authorizes" [emphasis added]. It is also clear from the decisions in Klingbeil at paragraph 30 and McLennon at paragraph 31. The purpose of the firewall is so that an insurer is not advantaged by the fact that it is responding to both claims. See McLennon at paragraph 35. The consent of the insured obviates this concern.

[50] Another decision dealing in part with the possible conflict of interest of an accident benefit adjuster allowing information to find its way into the hands of the tort adjuster is that of J.P. Moore J. in Song v. Hong, [2008] O.J. No. 772, where at paragraphs 64 and 65 Moore J. stated:

> There are good reasons for this distinction. To begin with, an accident benefits claimant is an insured person under the coverage bound by the insurer and, as such, the claimant is owed a duty of good faith in the handling of the claim. As well, the insurer comes into possession of personal, medical and other information during the claim handling process and it is obliged to keep that information private and confidential.
> On behalf of vehicle owners and drivers named as defendants in a tort case, such as this one, the insurer's contractual obligation is to provide defence and indemnity in accordance with the policy provisions. Those defendants do not owe a duty of good faith to the plaintiff; in fact those defendants may (and have here) set their position in litigation adverse to the claims made by the plaintiff. In the context of the tort claim, there is no direct, contractual or other dealing between the plaintiff and the insurer. A conflict of interest situation could well arise for an insurer that allows information from an accident benefits file to bleed through to a tort file, and visa (sic) versa.

[51] The issue argued before this court was also addressed at FSCO in the context of the plaintiff's accident benefit claim with State Farm. The arbitrator was required to answer the question of whether State Farm could retain the same law firm, i.e. Reisler, to defend it in both the tort proceedings and the arbitration proceedings for statutory accident benefits.

[52] Where the applicant for statutory accident benefits and the plaintiff in the tort action are one and the same person, i.e. Ms. Dervisholli, the arbitrator ruled in favour of State Farm. In doing so, the arbitrator relied on Klingbeil and Stratton, both of which had been followed at the FSCO appeal level, see Ramrattan and Motor Vehicle Accident Claim Fund FSCO P12-00003 April 27, 2012.

[53] Arbitrator Susan Sapin concluded that Klingbeil was the most relevant case – a decision that she correctly found was binding on her. In following the Klingbeil decision, Arbitrator Sapin noted at page five of her reasons that:

> Insurance companies segregate their accident benefits and indemnity files, as a matter of corporate policy and industry practice, to comply with the obligation of utmost good faith enforced by the courts, and to protect the privacy of their insureds. This is the origin of the so-called "Chinese Wall" between the two types of files, so that information (usually medical) obtained in the accident benefits claim is not made available to the tort adjuster, unless the insured person authorizes it or the law requires it.

[54] Arbitrator Sapin rejected the plaintiff's arguments that Klingbeil should be distinguished on its facts, because the plaintiff in Klingbeil was uninsured and had applied to the defendant's insurer, Lincoln, for statutory accident benefits, whereas Ms. Dervisholli had applied for SABs under her own policy of insurance with State Farm. Arbitrator Sapin also followed the reasoning in Stratton.

[55] It is important to note that the report of Stratton makes reference to a Court File – 95-CU-87367. This court file makes clear that the underlying claim in that action was in relation to a motor vehicle accident which occurred prior to November 1, 1996. As such, as in Klingbeil, Stratton involved a plaintiff who did not have to comply with the obligations the plaintiff before this court did have to comply with, i.e. to apply for statutory accident benefits prior to the commencement of the tort action.

[56] This court has the opportunity to clarify the duties of an insurer like State Farm, which has the dual responsibility to provide both third party liability tort coverage as well as pay statutory accident benefits to a plaintiff. Whether or not an insurer is named as a defendant, or has itself added as a statutory third party where that insurer also has the contractual obligation to pay statutory accident benefits, such a situation triggers privacy concerns on the part of the claimant seeking payment of statutory accident benefits. In this situation, if it was not already made clear by the Bulletin, the insurer with those dual responsibilities has an obligation to set up a firewall that prevents, without the consent of the insured/plaintiff, any dialogue or any transfer of the plaintiff/claimant's confidential accident benefit file to the tort adjuster.

[57] It does not matter that State Farm, with its responsibility to provide third party coverage and/or having added itself as a statutory third party, will ultimately come into possession of much of what is contained in the plaintiff's accident benefit file because of the disclosure obligations that the plaintiff has under the Rules. While this argument might have some preliminary appeal, in that State Farm and by implication the Reisler Law Firm will come into possession of most of the documentation found in the plaintiff's accident benefit file during the course of the tort proceedings, it fails to recognize that such information only comes into State Farm's possession with the consent of the plaintiff. State Farm does not have an automatic right to that information. The plaintiff has a privacy interest in the confidential health information supplied to State Farm, and it is only with the consent of the plaintiff, or by order of the court, that such information can be communicated to State Farm in its capacity as the statutory third party, or as the insurer obliged to provide coverage to the defendant, Cervenak.

[58] State Farm had an obligation to maintain the confidentiality of the plaintiff's accident benefit file. State Farm may very well be one distinct corporate entity and, as such, has possession of both information found within the accident benefit file and the tort file under one roof. Nonetheless, the insurance industry has recognized and implemented the principle of a firewall between the accident benefit department and the tort department within an insurance company. While the bodily injury adjuster for State Farm might very well be tempted to take a surreptitious look at the accident benefit file, such conduct is not condoned within the insurance industry, as reflected in the Bulletin. State Farm should not have retained Reisler to defend itself both with respect to the claims by the plaintiff for statutory accident benefits as well as in the plaintiff's tort action. The failure to separate the interests of State Farm on the tort and accident benefit side, by retaining the same law firm and disclosing confidential information to that law firm, resulted in a disqualifying conflict of interest as set forth in MacDonald Estate v. Martin, 1990 CanLII 32 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1235.

[59] State Farm retained Reisler to defend the interests of State Farm as the statutory third party, and as is made clear by the affidavit of documents prepared by State Farm, essentially also provided unfettered access to the plaintiff's accident benefit file together with information from other claimant accident file contents. Without the plaintiff's consent to, or court order, the transmission of this information to Reisler, State Farm allowed an unauthorized intrusion into the plaintiff's privacy interests which are contrary to the good faith obligation of utmost trust and fair dealing which State Farm owed to the plaintiff.

[60] None of the information that the plaintiff provided to State Farm, in the context of her accident benefit file, was provided to State Farm in its capacity as the statutory third party. State Farm was the plaintiff's insurer, and any information that the plaintiff provided to State Farm in that capacity was supplied in confidence and with the expectation that her right of privacy would be respected.

[61] The only basis upon which State Farm was entitled to access the plaintiff's accident benefit file contents was with the consent of the plaintiff or by court order. That consent was never sought, nor was it ever provided. By disclosing this information to Reisler without the consent of the plaintiff, State Farm placed Reisler in an irreconcilable position of conflict, and the only appropriate remedy is to remove Reisler as the solicitor of record for State Farm in these proceedings.

[62] In the result, the appeal by State Farm of the order of Hambly J. is dismissed with costs. If the parties cannot agree upon the costs of this appeal, written submissions limited to three pages in length may be submitted to this court no later than May 15, 2015. If submissions are not received within that time frame this court will assume that the issue of costs has been resolved between the parties.

Case Summary

Civil procedure — Costs — Entitlement to costs — Applicant applying unsuccessfully for declaration that change of beneficiary of life insurance policy in her favour was invalid — Court finding that applicant had prepared change of beneficiary form and that form had been altered after insured signed it and did not reflect insured's wishes — Applicant's conduct combined with insurer's unnecessary delay and its own unreasonable conduct in failing to apply for interpleader order and pay insurance proceeds into court or to participate in mediation being principal cause of litigation — Applicant's claim for costs against insurer and insurer's claim for costs against applicant denied — Both applicant and insurer ordered to pay individual respondents' costs.

D designated the individual respondents, the applicant's half-siblings, as the beneficiaries of his life insurance policy with the respondent insurer. The insurer subsequently received a change of beneficiary form with D's signature, the effect of which would have been to transfer 75 per cent of the insurance proceeds to the applicant. Because there were errors in the change of beneficiary form, the insurer did not act on it, but failed to notify D. After D's death, the applicant claimed 75 per cent of the insurance proceeds. When the insurer refused her claim, she applied for a declaration that the change of beneficiary form was valid and that she was entitled to 75 per cent of the proceeds. Her application was dismissed. The court found that the applicant and her brother had likely collaborated in the preparation of the form, that the form had been altered after D signed it, if he did, in fact, sign it, and that D did not want or intend to change the beneficiaries. The applicant sought her costs against the insurer alone on the ground that its negligent administration of the insurance policy gave rise to the litigation and that its approach to the litigation was unreasonable and caused the parties to incur unnecessary costs. The insurer claimed its costs against the applicant on the ground that she unreasonably insisted on it remaining a party to the proceeding after it paid the balance of the disputed proceeds into court. [page315]

Held, the applicant and the insurer should pay their own costs and should pay the individual respondents' costs.

The insurer was not liable to pay the applicant's costs because it failed to send a notice of incomplete information to D and thereby precipitated the litigation. It was, in fact, the applicant's contrivance of the change of beneficiary form and her attempt to secure 75 per cent of the proceeds for herself that were the principal causes of the litigation. The application was utterly without merit. The insurer acted reasonably in refusing to produce its complete file to the applicant before she brought her application because she was not in fact a beneficiary and because she had not produced a probated copy of D's will naming her as estate trustee. However, the insurer acted unreasonably in not applying in a timely manner for an interpleader order and paying the insurance proceeds into court after the application was commenced. Had it applied for an interpleader order, its file would have been produced to the other parties, who would have been in a better position to assess their respective positions and to resolve their dispute. The insurer also acted unreasonably in refusing to participate in mediation. While the Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.8 did not impose a statutory obligation on the insurer to mediate in the circumstances of this case, the insurer's unwillingness to do so was a factor that could be considered as evidence of unreasonable conduct which contributed to the bringing of the application and caused the parties to incur unnecessary costs. Where it not for the suspicious circumstances in which the change of beneficiary form was prepared, the insurer would have been ordered to pay the applicant's costs also. The applicant was ordered to pay a portion of the individual respondents' costs fixed at $33,500, and the insurer was ordered to pay a portion of the individual respondents' costs fixed at $15,500.

> Usually, we only get into Affidavits of Documents and Discoveries on claims where we deny liability. In this particular case, we admit liability. The policy proceeds are indeed now payable. However, it is our opinion that your client has no claim to these proceeds.
>
> A life insurance policy is a contract. As you know, any contract is a "meeting of the minds". That occurred in 1992, when the deceased and our Company agreed to issue this policy. That occurred again in 1996, when the deceased proposed an amendment to the policy contract, changing the designated beneficiary in favour of Rhinda Erica David and Randolph Hollis David, a proposal then agreed to by the Company. However, that did not occur in 2011, when the deceased again proposed another amendment again changing the designated beneficiary. His proposal was rejected by the Company and the policy contract was not amended in 2011. If the family cannot sort this matter out, we reserve the right to discharge our liability by paying the Accountant of the Superior Court of Justice. To advise the Court why we are doing this, we will prepare a sworn affidavit outlining the facts as we see them. The judge can then take it from there, assigning costs as he sees fit.

(Emphasis added)

[47] Transamerica produced to Mr. Morris a copy of the 1996 change of beneficiary, which it had accepted, and of the 2011 change of beneficiary, which it had rejected. It did not produce the notice of incomplete information that it had prepared in 2011, and which it now says it sent to Hollis David at the time, which Ms. David denies, and which I found, based on the evidence in the proceeding, was never sent to Mr. David.

[48] In the correspondence that ensued between Mr. Morris and Transamerica between March 11, 2013 and November 27, 2013, when Lystra David issued her application, Transamerica maintained its refusal to produce the remainder of its file to Ms. David. In an e-mail dated March 12, 2013, it stated:

> Thank you for your fax of March 11th, 2013.
>
> We note we do not consider a request for a copy of a file extending over 20 years to be routine. As noted previously, we have an established procedure re the release of such files following the review by our own counsel and removal of anything deemed privileged. [page332]
>
> You state Lystra David is a beneficiary of this life insurance policy contract. We disagree, for the reasons stated previously.
> We confirm we are in possession of a notarized copy of a Will dated November 9th, 2010, drawn up in the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago. We are unaware if there are any subsequent Wills. We are also unaware if this Will has been probated in Ontario, in the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago, or in the United States of America where we understand Lystra David resides. In any event, we confirm the Estate is not now nor has it ever been the designated beneficiary under the terms of this life insurance policy contract. We note there is nothing in this Will dealing with this policy.

(Emphasis added)

[49] In a further e-mail dated March 15, 2013, Transamerica stated:

> As noted in our previous email of March 12, 2013, we too are in possession of a notarized copy of a Will dated November 9, 2010, drawn up in the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago. We again note we are unaware if there are any subsequent Wills, a point we consider important in view of the dynamics of this family situation. Also, we are unaware if Lystra David has applied for a Certificate of Appointment of Estate Trustee with a Will.
> As you know, this Certificate is a document issued by the Court that proves the authority of an Estate Trustee (formerly called an Executor) to administer the provisions of the deceased's Will. An application for this Certificate is filed at the Superior Court of Justice in the county or district where the deceased had his permanent residence. If the deceased had no permanent residence in Ontario, the application is filed at the Superior Court of Justice where the deceased property is located.

(Emphasis added)

[50] It is reasonable for insurance companies to require probate to protect themselves from liability in the event they distribute under a false or invalid will. Section 47 of the Trustee Act gives the insurance companies a form of protection in requiring probate.[26] Therefore, Transamerica cannot be faulted for requiring probate.

[51] Section 47 of the Trustee Act states:

47(1) Where a court of competent jurisdiction has admitted a will to probate, or has appointed an administrator, even though the grant of probate or the appointment may be subsequently revoked as having been erroneously made, all acts done under the authority of the probate or appointment, including all payments made in good faith to or by the personal representative, are as valid and effectual as if the same had been rightly granted or made, but upon revocation of the probate or appointment, in cases of an erroneous presumption of death, the supposed decedent, and in other cases the new personal representative may, subject to subsections (2) and (3), recover from the person who acted under the revoked grant or appointment any part of the estate remaining in the person's hands undistributed and, [page333] subject to the Limitations Act, 2002, from any person who erroneously received any part of the estate as a devisee, legatee or one of the next of kin, or as a spouse of the decedent or supposed decedent, the part so received or the value thereof.

(Emphasis added)

[52] Additionally, the Estates Administration Act states:

2(1) All real and personal property that is vested in a person without a right in any other person to take by survivorship, on the person's death, whether testate or intestate and despite any testamentary disposition, devolves to and becomes vested in his or her personal representative from time to time as trustee for the persons by law beneficially entitled thereto, and, subject to the payment of the person's debts and so far as such property is not disposed of by deed, will, contract or other effectual disposition, it shall be administered, dealt with and distributed as if it were personal property not so disposed of.[27]

[53] Transamerica was entitled to refuse to produce its file to Lystra based on its position that she was not, in fact, a beneficiary of Hollis David's life insurance policy, and because she had not produced a probated copy of Mr. David's will, naming her as estate trustee. Lystra has not tendered any authority supporting her entitlement to the file, in the absence of a probated will, documenting her authority to act on behalf of her father's estate, before she acquired rights to production of the file as a party to the present proceeding.

[54] In its capacity as Hollis David's life insurer, Transamerica owed Mr. David, even following his death, a duty of good faith arising out of its fiduciary obligations to its insured.[28] Apart from its fiduciary obligation, Transamerica also had an obligation to ensure that the information supplied by its insured was kept private. Justice Marlys Edwards, speaking for the Divisional Court, made this point in Dervisholli v. Cervenak, in 2015, in the context of the duty of an automobile insurer for its insured's tort liability to keep its insured's information confidential, even from defence counsel whom the insurer had retained to represent itself in relation to the plaintiff's claim for accident benefits.[29] The court relied, in this regard, on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Jones v. Tsige, in 2012, involving unauthorized access by a bank employee to the banking records of a customer.[30] [page334]

[55] In Jones v. Tsige, the Court of Appeal recognized the existence of a tort of breach of privacy, or "intrusion upon seclusion". Justice Sharpe, after reviewing the elements of breach of privacy cause of action, stated:

> These elements make it clear that recognizing this cause of action will not open the floodgates. A claim for intrusion upon seclusion will arise only for deliberate and significant invasions of personal privacy. Claims from individuals who are sensitive or unusually concerned about their privacy are excluded; it is only intrusions into matters such as one's financial or health records, sexual practices and orientation, employment, diary or private correspondence that, viewed objectively on the reasonable person standard, can be described as highly offensive.[31]

[56] On this basis, the Divisional Court in Dervisholli concluded:

> The only basis upon which State Farm [tort liability department] was entitled to access the plaintiff's accident benefit file contents was with the consent of the plaintiff or by court order. That consent was never sought, nor was it ever provided. By disclosing this information to Reisler [the lawyer it had retained to examine the insured under oath pursuant to the Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule] without the consent of the plaintiff, State Farm placed Reisler in an irreconcilable position of conflict, and the only appropriate remedy is to remove Reisler as the solicitor of record for State Farm in these proceedings.[32]

(Emphasis added)

[57] Hollis David's life insurance file was private, containing financial and health information, and private correspondence. Transamerica therefore required the consent of his estate trustee or an order of the court to disclose them. It refused access to Lystra on the basis that she had not provided a probated will, since renamed a certificate of appointment of estate trustee with a will, pursuant to recent amendments to the Rules of Civil Procedure.

[58] The issue of whether a certificate of appointment of estate trustee is necessary to establish the authority of a person who applies for the release of confidential information was addressed by Steven Faughnan, as adjudicator for the Ontario Privacy Commissioner in the context of an appeal from a refusal of information under Ontario's Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act.[33] Although the Act does not govern requests to life insurance companies for information, its reasoning is instructive regarding the approach that the court can be [page335] expected to take to an insurer's common law obligation to maintain the privacy of a deceased insured's information in the face of a request by a person, such as Lystra David, who relies on a copy of the deceased's will naming her as estate trustee.

[59] The adjudicator in PO-2354 under the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act,[34] dealt with an appeal by the beneficiary of an estate from a refusal by the Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care to provide a summary of health care providers who had rendered care to the deceased testator before his death.[35] The beneficiary submitted an authorization signed by the person named as estate trustee in the deceased's will. The beneficiary's lawyer stated if the request was denied, his client would have to go to court and a judge would most certainly release the records, but that the application would result in an unnecessary expense to the estate.

[60] The ministry had denied the beneficiary's request on the basis of the mandatory exemption in s. 21(1) of the Act (personal privacy). It took the position that the request failed to satisfy the requirements of s. 66(a) of the Act (exercise of rights of deceased), which grants to the "personal representative" of a deceased person certain rights to access information about the deceased person under the Act so long as the exercise of these rights "relates to the administration of the individual's estate".

DECISION ON A MOTION

Before:	Arbitrator Deborah Anschell
Heard:	In-person at ADR Chambers on March 16, 2017
Appearances:	Mr. A. Fabio Longo participated for Ms. Raffaella De Rosa Mr. J. Claude Blouin and Ms. Hue Nguyen participated for Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company

Issues:

The Applicant, Ms. Raffaella De Rosa, was injured in a motor vehicle accident on May 1, 2013 ("the accident") and sought accident benefits from Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company ("Wawanesa"), payable under the Schedule.[1] The parties were unable to resolve their disputes through Mediation, and the Applicant, through her representative, applied for Arbitration at the Financial Services Commission of Ontario ("FSCO") under the Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.8, as amended.

Ms. De Rosa brought a Notice of Motion seeking the following relief:

1. An Order declaring that Blouin Dunn LLP is in a conflict of interest.
2. An Order declaring that Blouin Dunn LLP is precluded from representing Wawanesa in the within Arbitration.
3. An Order requiring Wawanesa to retain new counsel to represent them in the Arbitration.
4. An Order that the information of Ms. De Rosa and the non-party, Mr. Eugenio De Rosa ("Mr. De Rosa"), be kept separate and confidential.
5. In the alternative, an Order removing Blouin Dunn LLP as counsel for Wawanesa, as they exchanged confidential information of a non-party without consent and have expressed a manifest intention to use that information.
6. An Order abridging time for service of this Motion.
7. An Order that the costs of this Motion be payable by Wawanesa within 30 days on a substantial indemnity basis, as well as costs thrown away.

Result:

1. Blouin Dunn LLP is not in a conflict of interest.
2. Blouin Dunn LLP may continue to represent Wawanesa in the within Arbitration.
3. Wawanesa is not required to retain new counsel to represent them in the Arbitration.
4. Blouin Dunn is ordered to keep the information of Ms. De Rosa and the non-party, Mr. De Rosa, separate.
5. No medical information pertaining to the non-party, Mr. De Rosa, including the report of Dr. Jonathan Briskin dated September 13, 2013, shall be admissible in this Arbitration.
6. The time for service of this Motion is abridged.
7. Each party shall bear its own expenses with respect to this Motion.

EVIDENCE AND ANALYSIS:

APPLICANT'S EVIDENCE AND SUBMISSIONS

Affidavit of Kristy Kerwin

Ms. De Rosa relied on the Affidavit of Kristy Kerwin, dated March 15, 2017 (the "Kerwin Affidavit"). Kristy Kerwin is a lawyer with the law firm of Trianta Longo LLP, counsel for Ms. De Rosa.

The Kerwin Affidavit states that Ms. De Rosa was involved in the accident on May 1, 2013. As a result of the accident and the injuries she sustained, Ms. De Rosa made a claim for accident benefits to Wawanesa. Ms. De Rosa and her husband, Mr. De Rosa, had a single policy of automobile insurance with Wawanesa. Mr. De Rosa was also involved in the accident and made a separate claim for accident benefits.

On or about September 4, 2014, Ms. De Rosa filed an Application for Arbitration with FSCO. On or about October 9, 2014, Blouin Dunn LLP served A. Fabio Longo, Ms. De Rosa's counsel, with the Response by Insurer to an Application for Arbitration on behalf of Wawanesa.

On or about September 29, 2014, Mr. De Rosa filed an Application for Mediation with FSCO. Wawanesa retained the services of Blouin Dunn LLP to represent it with respect to Mr. De Rosa's Mediation. On October 23, 2014, Mr. George Kanellakos served Mr. De Rosa's counsel with an Insurer's Form B, Response to an Application for Mediation. On or about January 7, 2015, FSCO closed its file. Ms. Nguyen, counsel for Wawanesa, with respect to Ms. De Rosa's accident benefit claim, was not involved with Mr. De Rosa's accident benefit claim.

On January 18, 2016, the parties to Ms. De Rosa's case attended a Pre-Hearing at the offices of ADR Chambers. At no time during that meeting was an intention to rely upon documents contained in Mr. De Rosa's file ever raised.

On February 2, 2017, Ms. De Rosa's counsel advised Ms. Nguyen, counsel for Wawanesa, that they would be calling Mr. De Rosa as a witness at the Arbitration. Subsequently, however, Ms. De Rosa's counsel changed his mind and decided that he would not be calling Mr. De Rosa as a witness.

On March 6, 2017, Ms. Nguyen sent Ms. Kerwin an email requesting that Mr. De Rosa still be made available for cross-examination at the Hearing. Further, Ms. Nguyen attached a report from Dr. Jonathan Briskin (the "Briskin Report"), dated September 13, 2013, regarding Mr. De Rosa. Ms. Nguyen advised that it was her client's intention to rely upon that report at the Hearing.

On March 6, 2017, Ms. Kerwin advised Ms. Nguyen that she would need to summons Mr. De Rosa if Ms. Nguyen intended to call him as a witness at the Arbitration. Further, Ms. Kerwin stated that she would be objecting to the introduction of the Briskin Report, and anything in relation to Mr. De Rosa's accident benefits file.

Ms. Nguyen responded on March 6, 2017, advising that her firm represented Wawanesa in relation to Mr. De Rosa's claim for accident benefits, and therefore they had Mr. De Rosa's accident benefits file in their possession.

On March 7, 2017, Ms. Kerwin responded, disputing Wawanesa's use of Mr. De Rosa's accident benefits file without his consent to dispute Ms. De Rosa's claim to accident benefits.

On March 7, 2017, Mr. De Rosa was served with a summons to appear at Ms. De Rosa's Arbitration Hearing.

Ms. Kerwin deposed that the Briskin Report contains confidential information of a personal nature regarding Mr. De Rosa. Further, Mr. De Rosa did not authorize the disclosure of his file contents to Ms. Nguyen, and did not consent to her using materials from his file in the ongoing litigation relating to his wife's Arbitration.

From a review of the correspondence from Blouin Dunn LLP and Wawanesa, at no point did Wawanesa or its counsel request documentation regarding Mr. De Rosa for the purposes of defending or litigating Ms. De Rosa's claim for accident benefits. Furthermore, neither Wawanesa nor its counsel requested permission to use information obtained in adjusting Mr. De Rosa's accident benefits claim to defend or litigate a claim from Ms. De Rosa.

Submissions of Mr. Longo, Counsel for the Applicant

Mr. Longo submitted that Mr. De Rosa never gave consent to the use of the Briskin Report for this Arbitration. The report was provided to Wawanesa for the purpose of adjusting Mr. De Rosa's claim for accident benefits. Blouin Dunn LLP, on behalf of Wawanesa, at no time sought a Motion to access Mr. De Rosa's accident benefits file for the purpose of using it in this Arbitration. Furthermore, Mr. De Rosa formally advised Wawanesa that he did not consent to the access or use of his medical information for any purpose other than the reason it was collected. Blouin Dunn LLP made no pretense of erecting a firewall or maintaining a code of silence between the accident benefit files in defending Mr. De Rosa's claim.

Mr. Longo submitted that Wawanesa has an obligation to maintain the confidentiality of information of its Insured, and to ensure that information supplied by its Insured is kept private.[2]

Further, the duty of confidentiality is also mandated by federal legislation. Mr. Longo submitted that Wawanesa is bound by the Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act ("PIPEDA") that prohibits the disclosure of a person's personal information without the knowledge or consent of that person, unless, amongst other things, that disclosure is required to comply with an Order made by a court, or person with jurisdiction to compel production of that information.[3]

In addition, Wawanesa has posted its privacy policies online to recognize the importance of protection from disclosure of personal information. Wawanesa's privacy policy states that information will not be used or disclosed for other purposes except with the consent of the customer or as required by law.

Mr. Longo submitted that Wawanesa had a duty to act in good faith; separate from its obligation to compensate it's Insured for losses covered by the insurance policy.

Mr. Longo relied on the Dervisholli and Cervenak and State Farm case,[4] where the Divisional Court found that the only basis on which a non-party was entitled to access the contents of an accident benefits file was with the consent of the party or by Court Order.

Mr. Longo also relied on Jones v. Tsige,[5] where the Court of Appeal characterized invasions of personal privacy into matters such as one's health records to be highly offensive.

Further, Mr. Longo referenced Director Delegate Blackman's decision in Mujku and State Farm.[6] In that decision, Director Delegate Blackman found that a production Order for the accident benefits file for the claimant's husband must follow rules of service under the Dispute Resolution Practice Code.

Mr. Longo concluded that Wawanesa had a duty to protect the confidential information of Mr. De Rosa in addition to its duty of good faith. Wawanesa is only permitted to use this information for the intended purpose of adjusting Mr. De Rosa's claim.

Mr. Longo submitted that Ms. De Rosa would be prejudiced if the Briskin Report is admitted. She has not had access to this report prior to the 30-day deadline, and would be unable to call responding evidence. Pursuant to Rule 39.1, all documents to be introduced at a Hearing by either party must be served on the other party at least 30 days before the first day of the Hearing.[7] A party can only serve a document or report outside of the 30 days in extraordinary circumstances to justify an exception.

Mr. Longo argued that even if the report is excluded, Blouin Dunn LLP must be removed as counsel for Wawanesa. Neither Ms. De Rosa nor her counsel has any indications as to the extent that Blouin Dunn LLP accessed Mr. De Rosa's accident benefits file.

Mr. Longo also submitted that the conduct of Wawanesa's counsel has led to a conflict of interest. Counsel for Wawanesa received confidential information for the accident benefits claim of Mr. De Rosa, relevant to the accident benefits of Ms. De Rosa. Wawanesa's counsel must be removed as counsel of record due to the violation of Mr. De Rosa's privacy interests, and their irreconcilable conflict due to the unlawful receipt and use of Mr. De Rosa's information.

INSURER'S EVIDENCE AND SUBMISSIONS

Affidavit of Hue Nguyen

Wawanesa relied on the Affidavit of Hue Nguyen, sworn March 15, 2017 (the "Nguyen Affidavit"). Ms. Nguyen swore that she is the lawyer with carriage of this file. In her Affidavit, she swore that on May 1, 2013, Ms. De Rosa and Mr. De Rosa were involved in a motor vehicle accident. Mr. De Rosa was driving, and Ms. De Rosa was a front-seat passenger.

On May 7, 2013, Wawanesa received a call to inform it about the accident. According to the adjuster's log notes, it appeared that Mr. De Rosa's son, Mr. Alberto De Rosa, spoke on his parents' behalf. On June 19, 2013, Mr. Longo, then with Neinstein & Associates, wrote to Wawanesa to advise that he had been retained to represent Mr. and Ms. De Rosa relating to the accident. Both Mr. and Ms. De Rosa submitted Applications for Accident Benefits on July 10, 2013.

On April 23, 2014, Ms. De Rosa submitted an Application for Mediation. The Report of Mediator was issued on July 31, 2014. On September 4, 2014, Mr. Longo filed an Application for Arbitration. On October 6, 2014, Wawanesa retained Blouin Dunn LLP to represent it in the Arbitration. On October 9, 2014, Mr. George Kanellakos of Blouin Dunn LLP filed the Response by Insurer to an Application for Arbitration. On September 29, 2014, Mr. Longo filed a second Application for Mediation on behalf of Ms. De Rosa. On October 22, 2014, Mr. Kanellakos filed the Response to an Application for Mediation. This Arbitration was scheduled to commence on March 14, 2017.

With respect to Mr. De Rosa, he submitted an Application for Mediation on or about September 29, 2014. On October 22, 2014, Mr. Kanellakos filed the Response to an Application for Mediation. By e-mail, dated January 7, 2015, FSCO wrote to Mr. Longo and Mr. Kanellakos to advise that Mr. De Rosa's file had been closed. No Mediation took place with respect to Mr. De Rosa's claim.

In January 2015, Mr. Kanellakos internally transferred the files relating to both Mr. and Ms. De Rosa to Mr. Claude Blouin of Blouin Dunn LLP. Mr. Blouin subsequently requested that Ms. Nguyen maintain the day-to-day carriage of both claims.

The Pre-Hearing with respect to Ms. De Rosa's matter took place on January 12, 2016. In the meantime, Mr. Longo wrote to Mr. Blouin on several occasions, including in August, September, and October 2015, with respect to settling Mr. De Rosa's claim. At all times, both Mr. Longo and Ms. Kerwin were aware that Blouin Dunn LLP represented Wawanesa in the defence of the accident benefits claims made by both Mr. and Ms. De Rosa.

According to the Nguyen Affidavit, Ms. De Rosa's claim for Non-Earner Benefits is one of the main issues in dispute in this Arbitration. In a witness list provided on February 2, 2017, Ms. Kerwin advised that she would be calling Mr. De Rosa as a witness. Similar information was provided by Ms. Kerwin on February 14, 2017.

As noted, in a March 6, 2017 email, Ms. Kerwin provided a schedule of witnesses, omitting Mr. De Rosa. Ms. Nguyen wrote to Ms. Kerwin advising that she wanted Mr. De Rosa available for cross-examination. Further, she attached the Briskin Report and advised of her intention to rely on that report at this Arbitration.

Ms. Kerwin objected to the introduction of the Briskin Report, and suggested that Wawanesa summons Mr. De Rosa if it required his evidence at the Hearing.

The first time that Mr. Longo advised Ms. Nguyen that he would be seeking an Order removing Blouin Dunn LLP as counsel of record was on March 14, 2017 at approximately 9:55 a.m., immediately before the Arbitration Hearing was to commence.

Submissions of Mr. Blouin, Counsel for the Insurer

Mr. Blouin argued that Wawanesa's decision to retain Blouin Dunn LLP to represent Wawanesa in the claims for accident benefits made by both Mr. De Rosa and Ms. De Rosa did not create a conflict of interest. First, in contrast to cases cited by Ms. De Rosa's counsel, neither Mr. De Rosa nor Ms. De Rosa's files have been disclosed in separate civil proceedings to which they are parties in breach of their privacy interests. Second, Blouin Dunn LLP never acted on behalf of Mr. De Rosa or Ms. De Rosa, and therefore they are owed no duty of confidentiality arising from a past or present solicitor-client relationship.

Mr. Blouin argued that there is no duty to keep accident benefit files of different parties segregated. Further, in accordance with the Court's decision in Economical Insurance Company v. Fairview Assessment Centre Inc.,[8] the disclosure of parts of Mr. De Rosa's accident benefits file to Wawanesa's legal counsel was authorized by Mr. De Rosa's signed consent when he submitted a claim for accident benefits.

Mr. Blouin submitted that there is no conflict of interest when the same law firm represents the same party. At no time did Blouin Dunn LLP act for and against Wawanesa. There is no risk that the confidential information obtained will prejudice Wawanesa, as it is favourable to its defence.

Mr. Blouin argued that a contract of insurance is founded on a duty of utmost good faith. But the duty of good faith is a mutual duty. An Insured must be honest and make full disclosure in the claims process. Consistent with the duty of utmost good faith, neither an Insured's privacy interest in their accident benefits file nor an Insurer's duty of confidentiality is absolute. In this case, both Ms. De Rosa and Mr. De Rosa provided their consent to disclosure of their personal information for purposes related to the claims process, and broader policy considerations such as the prevention and detection of fraud, when they signed their separate Applications for Accident Benefits, dated July 10, 2013.

Mr. Blouin submitted that in Economical v. Fairview, the Ontario Superior Court found that the consent provided in an Application for Accident Benefits is "sufficiently broad" to consent to the use of the medical documentation of claimants in a separate civil proceeding without the claimant's knowledge or express consent.[9]

I agree with Mr. Longo's submission that Mr. De Rosa did not consent to the use of the Briskin Report in this Arbitration. The report was provided to Wawanesa for the purpose of adjusting Mr. De Rosa's claim for benefits, and I cannot find that his signed authorization permitted the use of the Briskin Report to defend against Ms. De Rosa's claim for accident benefits.

The authorization speaks to the investigation of Mr. De Rosa's claim, obtaining information relating to his claim, recovering payments from other Insurers for amounts paid in connection with his claim, identifying and analyzing goods and services provided by health care providers, preventing fraud, compiling statistics, and assessing risks. In my view, the purposes listed do not extend to using the Briskin Report to defend Ms. De Rosa's claim.

Furthermore, by the time this issue came before me, Mr. De Rosa had made it clear through his counsel that he did not consent to the access or use of his medical information for any purpose other than the purpose for which it was collected. In this sense, I agree with Mr. Longo that consent is not irrevocable and can be withdrawn. As noted by Mr. Longo, Mr. De Rosa explicitly withdrew any previous implied consent to Wawanesa's use of his personal information for the purposes of this Arbitration by Ms. Kerwin's email, dated March 6, 2017.

Furthermore, at no time prior to the hearing of this Motion were allegations of fraud made with respect to either Mr. or Ms. De Rosa. I am therefore not prepared to find that fraud exempts Wawanesa from the application of PIPEDA. I am also not prepared to find that fraud allegations somehow make the Briskin Report admissible. As noted by Mr. Longo, the fraud issue had never been raised previously, and no supporting information was provided to substantiate fraud.

Mr. Longo also relied on Wawanesa's privacy policy to argue that the Briskin Report should not be admitted at the Arbitration. That Policy provides in part that: "Personal information shall not be used or disclosed for purposes other than those for which the information was collected, except with the consent of the Customer or as required by law".[10]

On the basis of this Policy, and the fact that Mr. De Rosa has objected strongly to the introduction of the Briskin Report, I find that it would be inappropriate to introduce this report at the Arbitration. Wawanesa did not have Mr. De Rosa's consent or a Court Order to obtain the report. On this basis, I find that the Briskin Report is inadmissible in these Arbitration proceedings. It could be admitted at a later date if Mr. De Rosa provides his consent or if a Court Order is obtained.

This leaves the issue of whether or not Blouin Dunn LLP should be removed as Wawanesa's counsel on the basis of conflict of interest. Mr. Longo relies on the Dervisholli case[11] to support his position that the law firm should be removed. In that case, Mr. Dervisholli was successful at removing the defendant's counsel notwithstanding the fact that he was never formally a client of that firm. The Court found that the Insurer's duty went beyond good faith, and it also has an obligation to ensure that the information supplied by its Insured is kept private.

In Dervisholli, Reisler Franklin was hired by State Farm in relation to Mr. Dervisholli's accident benefits claim. Mr. Dervisholli also commenced a tort lawsuit and named State Farm with respect to his uninsured coverage. State Farm hired Reisler Franklin to defend both the third-party claim and Mr. Dervisholli's claim to accident benefits.

The Divisional Court considered at length the duty of an Insurer acting in a dual capacity as both the accident benefit Insurer and the tort Insurer. The Court states as follows at paragraph 58:

> State Farm had an obligation to maintain the confidentiality of the plaintiff's accident benefit file. State Farm may very well be one distinct corporate entity and, as such, has possession of both information found within the accident benefit file and the tort file under one roof. Nonetheless, the insurance industry has recognized and implemented the principle of a firewall between the accident benefit department and the tort department within an insurance > company. While the bodily injury adjuster for State Farm might very well be tempted to take a surreptitious look at the accident benefit file, such conduct is not condoned within the insurance industry, as reflected in the Bulletin. State Farm should not have retained Reisler to defend itself both with respect to the claims by the plaintiff for statutory accident benefits as well as in the plaintiff's tort action. The failure to separate the interests of State Farm on the tort and accident benefit side, by retaining the same law firm and disclosing confidential information to that law firm, resulted in a disqualifying conflict of interest as set forth in MacDonald Estate v. Martin, 1990 CanLII 32 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1235.

The Divisional Court seemed to be influenced a great deal by the practice of the insurance industry to implement a firewall between the accident benefit department and the tort department.

However, similar evidence was not provided in this matter with respect to any practice in the insurance industry regarding an Insurer defending two related accident benefits claims, arising from the same motor vehicle accident.

In this sense, I agree with Mr. Blouin. MacDonald Estate v. Martin[12] dealt with whether a law firm representing the respondent should be disqualified where one of its associates used to work at the appellant's law firm. The Court ruled in favour of disqualification, finding that confidential information could potentially be disclosed, applying a two-part test:

> 1) Did the lawyer receive confidential information attributable to a solicitor and client relationship relevant to the matter at hand?
> 2) Is there a risk that it will be used to the prejudice of the client?

But this authority has not been applied in the accident benefits context, where a law firm defends an Insurer from two related accident benefit claimants. As noted by Mr. Blouin, "at no time did Blouin Dunn LLP act for and against Wawanesa. There is no risk that the confidential information obtained will cause prejudice to Wawanesa as it is entirely favourable to its defence."[13]

I am not satisfied that Blouin Dunn LLP is in a conflict of interest. I do not find that the jurisprudence goes so far as to find a conflict of interest where one firm represents an Insurer in defending two accident benefit claims arising out of the same motor vehicle accident. Accordingly, I am not prepared to declare that Blouin Dunn LLP is precluded from representing Wawanesa, nor am I prepared to order that Wawanesa retain new counsel to represent them in the Arbitration.

EXPENSES:

As the parties achieved mixed success with respect to this Motion, I am directing that each party shall bear its own expenses.

Criminal law – Extortion – Extortion of sexual favours – Complainants persuaded to pose nude or semi-nude for accused who misrepresented himself as having connections with modelling agencies – Extortion of sexual favours by threatened exposure of compromising photographs – Whether extortion offence in Criminal Code includes extortion of sexual favours – Scope of word "anything" in extortion provision of Criminal Code – Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, s. 305(1).

Appeals – Supreme Court of Canada – Appeals as of right – Kienapple principle – Accused obtaining sexual favours from complainant by threatened exposure of compromising photographs – Supreme Court upholding both extortion and sexual assault convictions – Kienapple issue not raised in dissenting judgment in Court of Appeal – Whether Supreme Court has jurisdiction to address Kienapple issue – Supreme Court Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. S-26, s. 691(1)(a).

Criminal law – Kienapple principle – Extortion – Sexual assaults – Accused obtaining sexual favours from complainant by threatened exposure of compromising photographs – Whether principle against multiple convictions arising from same delict precluded convictions for both extortion and sexual assault.

Criminal law – Sexual assaults – Defence of honest but mistaken belief in consent – Whether trial judge failed to consider defence of honest but mistaken belief in consent – If so, whether there was air of reality to defence.

Criminal law – Sexual assaults – Reasonable doubt – Whether trial judge erred in applying principle of reasonable doubt – Whether trial judge's comment that he was "not convinced" that complainants consented to sexual activity reversed burden of proof.

Between 1984 and 1991, the accused, holding himself out as a photographer with connections to a modelling agency, invited the complainants, who ranged in age from 15 to 20, to pose for a portfolio of photographs with a view to initiating a modelling career. He persuaded all of them to pose nude or semi-nude, and some of them were photographed in bondage. The accused allegedly sexually assaulted the complainants D., K., S. and R. while they were posing in various stages of undress or were tied up and completely vulnerable. In the cases of B. and D., it was alleged that the accused threatened to send revealing photographs to either their parents or to a pornographic magazine if they did not agree to perform sexual favours for him. While D. ignored the accused's threats, B. acceded to them and performed sexual favours over the course of a two- to three-month period in exchange for the negatives. In her testimony, B. indicated that during that period there were at least two incidents in which the accused persisted in sexual activity after she had communicated her lack of consent. The accused testified that any sexual activity between B. and himself was consensual and that the photography sessions began after they had already been involved in a sexual relationship. He thus had no reason to threaten to expose the complainant, and never did so. In the case of D., the accused admitted taking her photos, but denied that any semi-nude photos were taken or that any sexual impropriety had occurred. He also denied trying to extort sexual favours from her, as there were no photographs with which to threaten her. With respect to K., S. and R., the accused claimed that any sexual contact was consensual. The trial judge convicted the accused of two counts of extortion against B. and D. and of five counts of sexual assault against the five complainants. On appeal, the majority of the Court of Appeal upheld the convictions.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

It is a crime to extort sexual favours. Although the extortion provision is located in the Part of the Criminal Code entitled "Offences Against Rights of Property", the word "anything" in the provision is not limited to things of a proprietary or pecuniary nature. Headings will never be determinative of legislative intention, but are merely one factor to be taken into account. In this case, the extortion provision's location in the Criminal Code is outweighed by competing considerations in determining the scope of "anything". First, the ordinary meaning of "anything" in its immediate context is clear and supports a broad interpretation, which would include sexual favours. Second, an interpretation of "anything" that includes sexual favours is suggested by the purpose and nature of the offence of extortion. That purpose, which can be directly inferred from the wording of the provision, is that extortion criminalizes intimidation and interference with freedom of choice. Given this objective, it would be unreasonable to criminalize extortion of money or property, but not extortion of sexual favours. Third, Parliament could have easily limited the scope of the word "anything" to things of a proprietary or pecuniary nature. Finally, a number of Canadian courts have found that "anything" includes sexual favours.

It is unnecessary in this case to decide whether there is consent to sexual activity if it is obtained by threatened exposure of nude photographs. The accused's conviction of sexually assaulting B. may be affirmed on the basis of an independent sexual assault, wholly apart from his extortionate conduct. B. testified that, during the two- to three-month period in which she went to the accused's apartment and had sexual intercourse with him in exchange for the negatives, there were at least two incidents in which the accused persisted in sexual activity after she had unambiguously communicated her lack of consent. The trial judge found B. to be a credible witness and this Court is satisfied that the events unfolded as the complainant described them. This evidence supports a conviction of sexual assault.

Even though this is an appeal as of right pursuant to s. 691(1)(a) of the Criminal Code and the dissenting judge in the Court of Appeal dissented only on the extortion and sexual assault convictions in relation to B., the Court has jurisdiction to address the application of Kienapple in the case of B. The Court's jurisdiction over both the extortion and sexual assault convictions must, of necessity, include the jurisdiction to make whatever order that is required to dispose of these grounds of appeal. The Court cannot make an order that would violate established principles or rules of law. In the case of B., there is a possibility that in affirming the convictions without considering the potential application of Kienapple the Court might be convicting the accused of multiple offences arising from the same delict. Such a disposition would be illegal, as it would contravene an established legal principle. Here, there is not a sufficient factual nexus between the extortion and sexual assault convictions to trigger the application of Kienapple in the case of B. The convictions arise out of different factual transactions. Any one of the occasions over the two- to three-month period in which the accused engaged in sexual activity with B. is sufficient to ground the extortion conviction. By contrast, the sexual assault conviction arises from one or two specific occasions in which B. explicitly communicated her lack of consent to sexual contact.

In the case of K., assuming, without deciding, that the trial judge failed to consider the defence of honest but mistaken belief in consent, a review of the evidence leads to the conclusion that there was no air of reality to the defence. Even if the testimony of the accused is completely accepted, it discloses that, at a minimum, he was wilfully blind as to whether K. consented to the fondling of her breasts and vagina. There is no suggestion by the accused that K. posed nude for any reason other than to further her modelling career. Nor was there any evidence that she invited him to touch her prior to his fondling of her breasts and vagina.

The trial judge did not err in his application of the principle of reasonable doubt. He clearly directed himself properly and his judgment reveals a thorough review of the evidence. In the cases of S. and R., the trial judge's remarks that he was "not convinced" that the complainants consented to the sexual activity in question suggest, when read out of context, that he may have reversed the burden of proof. These remarks, however, when viewed in the context of the entire judgment, were effectively neutralized by other passages.

[72] The broad prohibition in s. 346(1) is tempered by the availability of the defence of "reasonable justification or excuse".[2] That defence and similarly-phrased defences appear in many of the offence-creating provisions of the Criminal Code (e.g., ss. 69, 254(5), 349, 351, 450, 452). A reasonable justification or excuse refers to some matter that is extraneous to the existence of the essential elements of the offence that justifies or excuses actions that would otherwise constitute the crime. An accused who relies on a "reasonable justification or excuse" admits that he committed the prohibited act with the requisite culpable mental state, but argues that the circumstances in which he did so justify or at least excuse what he did: R. v. Taraschuk (1975), 1975 CanLII 37 (SCC), 25 C.C.C. (2d) 108 at 110 (S.C.C.); R. v. Holmes (1988), 1988 CanLII 84 (SCC), 41 C.C.C. (3d) 497 at 520-21 (S.C.C.); R. v. Santeramo (1976), 1976 CanLII 1456 (ON CA), 32 C.C.C. (2d) 35 at 44 (Ont. C.A.); R. v. Moser (1992), 1992 CanLII 2839 (ON CA), 71 C.C.C. (3d) 165, per Doherty J.A. (concurring) at 178-79 (Ont. C.A.); J.C. Smith, Justification and Excuse in the Criminal Law (London: Stevens & Sons, 1989) at 47-50.

[73] It is impossible to list the circumstances that could give rise to a successful claim of reasonable justification or excuse to an extortion charge. The defence is both fact and offence specific: see E. Colvin, Principles of Criminal Law, 2nd ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1991) at 199. For example, what may constitute a reasonable excuse for possession of counterfeit money would probably have no relevance to a claim of reasonable excuse in response to a charge of possession of house-breaking instruments.

[74] Two general statements can, however, be made. First, although I refer to the defence of "reasonable justification or excuse", the ultimate burden of persuasion is on the Crown to demonstrate beyond a reasonable doubt the absence of any reasonable justification or excuse: R. v. Natarelli and Volpe, 1967 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1968] 1 C.C.C. 154 at 161 (S.C.C.). If on the totality of the evidence there is an air of reality to the claim of reasonable justification or excuse, the trier of fact must determine whether the Crown has negated that claim beyond a reasonable doubt. Second, the use of the qualifying word "reasonable" connotes a partially objective inquiry when an accused advances a reasonable justification or excuse defence. The ultimate question is not whether the particular accused believed his threats were reasonably justifiable or excusable, but whether a reasonable person in the accused's position would have formed that view.[3]

[75] Natarelli, supra, is the leading authority on the meaning of the phrase "without reasonable justification or excuse" in s. 346. In that case, the accused threatened the victim and members of his family with death or bodily injury unless the victim paid money to the accused or gave certain shares to the accused. There was evidence that the money or shares demanded by the accused were legitimately owed to them, or that at least the accused believed that the money or shares were owed.

[76] A jury acquitted the accused. This court dismissed the Crown appeals, holding that a person who believed he was legally entitled to the thing demanded could not be convicted of extortion. The Supreme Court of Canada reversed. Cartwright J., for a unanimous court, rejected the contention that a genuine claim to the thing demanded precluded a conviction for extortion. He said at p. 160:

> To constitute a defence, there must be reasonable justification or excuse not only for the demand but for the making of the threats or menaces by which the accused sought to compel compliance with the demand.
> When it is proved that threats have been made for the making of which there could be no justification or excuse, that the threats were made with intent to gain something and were calculated to induce the person threatened to do something, the commission of the crime defined in s. 291 [now s. 346] is established, and it is unnecessary to inquire whether the person making the threats had a lawful right to the thing demanded or entertained an honest belief that he had such a right; that inquiry would be necessary only if the threats were such that there could be reasonable justification or excuse for making them [emphasis added].

[77] Cartwright J., at p. 161, emphasized that the Crown could establish culpability on a charge of extortion by proving beyond a reasonable doubt either that the demand was not reasonably justifiable or excusable, or that the threat used was not reasonably justifiable or excusable. Cartwright J. further observed that an intention to kill or cause grievous bodily harm could never be reasonably justified. Consequently, if the jury on the retrial was satisfied that the accused had made the threats alleged against them, they were guilty of extortion regardless of whether they were owed the money or shares demanded by them.

[78] It is true, as counsel for Alexander contends, that Natarelli is distinguishable from this case in that the threats allegedly used to collect the debt in that case were clearly unlawful. I cannot, however, find any support in Natarelli for equating all lawful threats with the reasonable justification or excuse defence. Natarelli does not suggest that the existence of a reasonable justification or excuse for a threat made to collect a lawful debt turns solely on the lawfulness of the conduct constituting the threat. To the contrary, Cartwright J. explicitly states at p. 161 that the entire course of the accused's conduct, including both the threat and the demand, must be considered in deciding whether the Crown has proved that the threat used to collect a legitimate debt was made without reasonable justification or excuse. The very same threat could be reasonably justified when made in connection with one demand and in one set of circumstances, and not reasonably justified when made in other circumstances or in connection with a different demand.

[79] A distinction between threats used to collect legitimate debts that is based exclusively on whether the conduct constituting the threat is in and of itself unlawful would undermine the rationale for the crime of extortion. The potential for a threat to overwhelm a person's free choice and compel that person to act in the manner dictated by the threat is not necessarily tied to the lawfulness of the conduct constituting the threat. Some threats, while not per se unlawful (e.g., the threat to disclose some despicable act from one's distant past), will have a much more coercive effect than a threat to do something which is in and of itself unlawful (e.g., a threat to trespass on property).

[80] If Alexander's interpretation of a reasonable justification or excuse defence is accepted, the extortion prohibition would be rendered ineffective in circumstances that have historically been regarded as typical examples of blackmail. For example, in R. v. McClure (1957), 1957 CanLII 485 (MB CA), 118 C.C.C. 192 (Man. C.A.), the accused threatened to sell a story to the newspaper providing the details of the victim's recent criminal conviction on a charge of disorderly conduct unless the victim paid the accused $200.00. Publication of the details surrounding the conviction had the potential to seriously harm the victim's standing in the community and his employment. Applying the appellant's analysis, the offence of extortion would not be made out because the accused was legally entitled to sell the story to the newspaper and a demand for payment in lieu of publication is not per se unlawful. However, the threat and the demand taken together constitute powerful intimidation calculated to overcome the free choice of even the strongest person.

[81] The Manitoba Court of Appeal, in upholding the accused's conviction on extortion, approved the following jury instruction relating to "reasonable justification and excuse" at p. 198:

> … The question is simply whether on all the facts the accused had some reason for his demand of money. Supposing it was not unreasonable to threaten to publish something, was it reasonable to demand money as the price for his refraining to do so? That is a question for you [the jury] to determine, whether he had any reasonable justification for demanding this money.[4]

[82] A review of the statutory provisions governing blackmail in England, Australia and New Zealand lends support to the Crown's contention that demands can be unjustified even if not per se unlawful and even if made to collect a legitimate debt. While the provisions in the other jurisdictions are worded differently from s. 346(1) and offer little assistance in interpreting s. 346(1), they all appear to contemplate convictions where an accused who is owed a debt uses threats that, while not necessarily unlawful, are regarded as "improper" or "unwarranted" in an effort to collect the debt.[5]

[83] I think the phrase "reasonable justification or excuse", used in the context of the crime of extortion where the accused seeks to collect a debt, exists to distinguish between situations where individuals use what could reasonably be regarded as warranted or legitimate – albeit perhaps harsh – tactics to collect debts and situations where the means used to attempt to collect those debts goes beyond what could reasonably be regarded as warranted or legitimate. The "reasonable justification or excuse" defence seeks to draw the line, for criminal purposes, between hard bargaining and criminal blackmail. That line may be difficult to draw in any given case. Like any factual issue in a criminal trial, the dividing line between guilt and innocence will turn on the trier of fact's assessment of the evidence and the application of the burden of proof to that assessment. In this regard, the defence of "reasonable justification or excuse" to an extortion charge is no more uncertain than other contextual defences that depend in part at least on an assessment of the reasonableness of the conduct of the accused in the circumstances measured against a necessarily general standard.

[84] When an accused charged with extortion has used threats in an attempt to collect a legitimate debt, the trier of fact must consider all of the circumstances, including the nature of the threat and the nature of the demand, to determine whether the Crown has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that there was no reasonable justification or excuse for the threat. In jury cases, trial judges will instruct juries that it is not every distasteful threat used to support a legitimate demand for repayment of a debt that will constitute extortion. The jury will be told that the threat must go beyond that which a reasonable person in the circumstances of the accused would view as a legitimate or warranted means of attempting to collect the debt.

[85] As is evident from my analysis to this point, the phrase "reasonable justification or excuse" in s. 346 requires a fact-specific inquiry. In some circumstances, a trier of fact may find that a threat to contact a debtor's employer was a reasonable means of seeking to collect a debt. For example, if the debt was somehow connected to the employment and if the purpose for involving the employer was to obtain repayment of the debt from the employer, a trier of fact could well have a reasonable doubt as to whether an accused's threat to go to the employer was made without reasonable justification or excuse.

[86] Although the defence of reasonable justification or excuse is fact-driven, it is not entirely free from judicial control. As with any defence, there must be an air of reality to the reasonable justification or excuse claim. If the trial judge is satisfied that no reasonable person in the circumstances of the accused would have viewed the threat made as a legitimate or warranted means of attempting to collect the debt, the trial judge will instruct the jury that the threat cannot, as a matter of law, be excused or justified: see R. v. Natarelli, supra. There may also be circumstances when a trial judge will instruct a jury that as a matter of law, a given threat is reasonably justified or excused. For example, if an accused claims that his or her actions said to constitute the threat were a statutorily-authorized means of collecting a debt, the defence of reasonable justification or excuse would prevail unless the Crown proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the conduct said to constitute the threat was not authorized by the statute.

[87] In the vast majority of cases, however, the ultimate applicability of the defence of "reasonable justification or excuse" will depend on the findings of fact made and the trier of fact's assessment of whether the conduct said to constitute a threat was reasonable in all of the circumstances.

[88] Throughout my analysis of the "reasonable justification or excuse" defence, I have treated the phrase as creating one rather than two discrete defences. I recognize the distinction between justifications and excuses as applied to criminal law defences. I see no purpose, however, in drawing that distinction when addressing the "reasonable justification or excuse" defence in s. 346. In my view, the approach outlined above properly draws the distinction between threats used to collect legitimate debts that do attract criminal liability under the extortion provision and those that do not. I note that counsel did not suggest the need to draw any distinction between reasonable justifications and reasonable excuses for the purposes of the extortion provision.

[89] In the case at bar, it is acknowledged that M.M. owed Mrs. Alexander money. Alexander's demand for repayment of that money was clearly reasonable. As Natarelli, supra, instructs, however, a legitimate demand does not alone provide a reasonable justification or excuse. The question remained whether there was any basis upon which to conclude that Alexander had a reasonable justification or excuse for threatening to have M.M. fired if she did not repay the legitimate debt.

[90] The trial judge, after observing that Alexander relied on the defence of reasonable justification or excuse, said:

> It is one thing to demand payment of a loan. It is quite another thing to threaten the continuance of a person's employment by reason of her failure to keep an agreement to repay a loan.

[91] As this was a trial by judge alone, it was for the trial judge to decide on the totality of the evidence whether the Crown had negated Alexander's claim of justification or excuse beyond a reasonable doubt. I read the above-quoted passage as an implicit finding in favour of the Crown on this issue.

[92] A threat to have someone fired can be a powerfully coercive one, especially where the threat is made by someone like Alexander, who has apparent connections to the victim's employer. Employment is a mainstay of most people's lives. Consequently, any threat to that employment can strike at the very heart of that individual's autonomy and free will. Like the trial judge, I see no basis for a reasonable justification or excuse claim by Alexander. The fact that M.M. owed Alexander's wife a debt that was completely unconnected to M.M.'s employment did not provide a reasonable justification for an attempt to compel repayment by threatening to have M.M.'s employment terminated. That threat went beyond what any reasonable person in Alexander's circumstances could view as a justified means of attempting to obtain repayment of the money owed to Mrs. Alexander.

[93] I would not interfere with the conviction on count twelve.

(iv) The Appeal from the Conviction on the Possession of "Bugging" Equipment

[94] Count eleven charged Alexander with an offence under s. 191(1) of the Criminal Code. The relevant parts of that provision provide:

> Everyone who possesses … any electromagnetic, acoustic, mechanical or other device or any component thereof knowing that the design thereof renders it primarily useful for surreptitious interception of private communications is guilty of an indictable offence …

[95] Count eleven particularized the device as "audio video cameras concealed in clock radios". Counsel for Alexander argued that these devices were not "primarily useful for surreptitious interception of private communications" because they were designed for both the surreptitious recording of private communications and the surreptitious taking of hand, the law does not require the person of extortion to act clumsily and without subtlety. What is required is that the message be sent in words definite enough to convey to a person of ordinary intelligence in the position of Brezinski, taking into account his shared police background with the Accused, a threat of harm to his "secret source" if the prosecution was not ended.

[16] Extortion criminalizes intimidation and interference with freedom of choice. Accordingly a veiled reference may constitute a threat if it is sufficient, in light of all the circumstances, to convey to the complainant the consequences which he or she fears or would prefer to avoid: R. v. McClure (1957), 1957 CanLII 485 (MB CA), 22 WWR 167 (Man. C.A.), at p. 172. The courts have adopted a similar contextual interpretation elsewhere: R. v. Hodson, 2001 ABCA 111, 92 Alta. L.R. (3d) 262 (Alta. CA), at paragraphs 11-13; R. c. Pelletier (1992), 1992 CanLII 12794 (QC CA), 71 CCC (3d) 438 (Que. CA).

[17] The question is, as a matter of law, what would a reasonable person in the position of Brezinski understand?

(c) The Intent of the Accused

[18] The Crown must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused intended his declaration of knowledge of the identity of the confidential informer to influence police decision making.

(d) Reasonable Justification or Excuse

[19] The legal test for extortion requires a court to delve below the surface of the exchanges between the Accused and those whom he or she is accused of threatening, particularly where, as here, the individuals come from the same occupational background. Much that is understood between them need not be stated explicitly

The Trial Evidence

Inspector Brezinski's Evidence

[20] Brezinski explained that "source" and "confidential informant" are interchangeable terms referring to persons who voluntarily provide information to police, but who are not directed by police, and who do not want to be identified or to testify in Court. On the other hand, an "agent" Brezinski explained is directed by police to perform certain acts, are identified by police, and do testify in Court.

[21] The Accused spoke to Brezinski on his cell phone at 6:42 a.m. at his home on May 6, 2005, and arranged a meeting for that afternoon to discuss the Qureshi and Ajaj files. Brezinski says that the Accused advised that he had been hired by Tarrabain to analyse both files, that he had met with Brezinski's source yesterday and knew 100% that was the Detective's source.

[22] Brezinski also testified that the Accused said on the phone, "this is bad for you and bad for me", that Tarrabain did not want to know the identity of the source, and that Brezinski would have to trust him. Brezinski told him he would be very surprised if he knew his source, and "laughed it off". They made arrangements to meet at a Tim Hortons at 2:30 that afternoon. The Accused asked Brezinski to bring someone else along and they agreed to bring fellow police officer, Krewenchuk, as he was golfing with Brezinski that morning.

[23] At 8:02 a.m., the Accused called Brezinski again to move the scheduled meeting earlier for that morning, so that it would precede the pending bail application, as that was important to Tarrabain and Quereshi who was in custody. It was mutually agreed to meet at 8:45 a.m. at the golf course before the scheduled 9:00 a.m. golf game.

[24] Once they arrived at the clubhouse and sat down, according to Brezinski, the Accused indicated that he had been hired by Tarrabain to review the file and identify Brezinski's source,

[2000] O.J. No. 4340
Court File No. 00-CL-3726

Ontario Superior Court of Justice
Farley J.
October 11, 2000

*Note: This case is being reported only with respect to the issue of s. 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the context of an Anton Piller order. In separate reasons for judgment (28 manuscript pages), Farley J. concluded that the Anton Piller order had been properly granted and that it should be continued.

Charter of Rights and Freedoms -- Search or seizure -- Anton Piller order in civil proceedings not contrary to s. 8 of Charter -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 8.

Injunctions -- Anton Piller order -- Anton Piller order in civil proceedings not contrary to s. 8 of Charter -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 8.

On April 19, 2000, on an ex parte motion, O Corp. obtained an Anton Piller order. The defendants asserted that (a) neither the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43 nor the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194 permitted the issuance of an Anton Piller order, (b) the Superior Court did not have inherent jurisdiction to grant the order and (c) the order constituted a civil search warrant that was contrary to s. 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The defendants challenged the constitutional validity of s. 66(2) (k) of the Courts of Justice Act and rule 45.01 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, and claimed a remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter.

Held, the Charter challenge should be dismissed.

There is a very strong public interest in ensuring that the court process in civil cases is not frustrated by the suppression of evidence. An Anton Piller order is not a civil search warrant. Its origins are found in the inherent jurisdiction of the court, and it enables the court to control and render efficacious its own process and to maintain the integrity of that process. The form of the order shows that it is not ordering or granting anything equivalent to a search warrant. The order is an order on the defendant in personam to permit inspection at the risk of being guilty of contempt. There is no authority granted by an Anton Piller order to demand entry to any location (be it a home or a place of business) with the right and authority to force entry if that demand is not acceded to. Rather, an Anton Piller order allows a request for entry and that request may be denied, but the denier faces contempt proceedings for failure to give the permission that the court h as ordered. There is no empowerment of the person who has obtained an Anton Piller order to force an entry; that person has no legal ability or capability to do so.

As the Anton Piller order is grounded in the inherent jurisdiction of the court, it is unnecessary and misleading to deal with s. 66(2)(k) of the Courts of Justice Act and rule 45.01 of the Rules of Civil Procedure. As an order of the court exercising its inherent jurisdiction, an Anton Piller order is not a government action subject to the Charter. However, assuming that s. 8 of the Charter did apply, Anton Piller orders meet the high standard required for a criminal search. Anton Piller orders generally have safeguards that exceed the requirements for a search as established by the Supreme Court of Canada. Further, if s. 8 of the Charter were infringed, then the infringement was justified under s. 1 of the Charter. The pressing and substantial objective of Anton Piller orders is to protect the judicial process from being undermined by those who are prima facie untrustworthy enough to sup press or destroy evidence.

MOTION to set aside an Anton Piller order.

[1] FARLEY J.: -- These Charter reasons should be read in conjunction with my non-Charter reasons as if they were one set of reasons.

[2] The defendants, (i) P. Gabriele & Sons Limited, Gabbro Construction Ltd., Gabriel Environmental Services Inc., 1331679 Ontario Limited, Pierino Gabriele, Frank Angelo Gabriele, Antonio Gabriele ("GG" collectively); (ii) 981602 Ontario Ltd. c.o.b. Tri-Spade ("TS"); and (iii) Vincent Catalfo ("C"), challenged the constitutional validity of s. 66(2)(k) of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43, as amended ("CJA") and rule 45.01 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, as amended ("Rules") and claimed a remedy under s. 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part 1 of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (U.K.), 1982, c. 11 (the "Charter") in relation to an act or omission of the Government of Ontario. In this challenge, as with the companion elements relating to the general unconstitutionality of the Anton Piller order I granted on April 19, 2000 pursuant to the ex parte motion of the plaintiff, Ontario Realty Corporation ("ORC"), the challengers were supported by Michael Zentil and Mario Tonietto (and their law firm Bianchi Presta). I will deal with the companion matters in a separate set of reasons. The ORC and the intervenor, Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Ontario, as represented by the Attorney General of Ontario ("Crown"), opposed this challenge.

[3] The challengers asserted that neither the CJA nor the Rules permitted the issuance of an Anton Piller order ("AP order"), that the Superior Court of Justice did not have inherent jurisdiction to grant an AP order, and that the AP order constituted a civil search warrant and was therefore contrary to the Charter. The challengers argued that s. 8 of the Charter is infringed because the procedural elements and requirements set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, 11 D.L.R. (4th) 641 were not explicitly set out in the impugned provisions of the CJA and Rules and they, therefore, sought to have such impugned provisions declared invalid, the granted AP order discharged and the seized materials returned.

[4] For the reasons set out below, I would dismiss this Charter challenge. It seems to me that the challengers have misconstrued the nature and substance of an AP order when they assert that it constitutes a civil search warrant. Unfortunately they may have been too eager to accept as unassailable truth some musings as to this type of order and perhaps further misguided by some references to s. 66(2)(k) of the CJA and rule 45.01. I would therefore think it helpful to note that the AP order had its origins out of the inherent jurisdiction of the court (and I should note that this involves a court of superior general jurisdiction).

[5] In Anton Piller KG v. Manufacturing Processes Ltd., [1976] 1 Ch. 55, [1976] 1 All E.R. 779 (C.A.), Lord Denning M.R. started his speech at p. 58 by saying:

> During the last 18 months the judges of the Chancery Division have been making orders of a kind not known before. They have some resemblance to search warrants. Under these orders, the plaintiff and his solicitors are authorised to enter the defendant's premises so as to inspect papers, provided the defendant gives permission.
> Now this is the important point: The court orders the defendant to give them permission. The judges have been making these orders on ex parte applications without prior notice to the defendant.

[6] It is pertinent that he stated that these orders had "some resemblance to search warrants". Certainly he did not state that they were search warrants, criminal or civil, nor that they constituted or were the equivalence of a civil search warrant. He merely stated that these orders had "some resemblance" to a warrant. He went on at p. 60 to declare that, "But the order sought in this case is not a search warrant" and after stating that, "This may seem to be a search warrant in disguise", he rejects that characterization. Furthermore, he stated at p. 61 that such an order was "not covered by the Rules of the Supreme Court and must be based on the inherent jurisdiction of the court."

[7] Brightman J. had refused to issue such an order for inspection or removal of documents in the Anton Piller case notwithstanding a strong prima facie case of copying, as he was concerned that such orders might be an instrument of oppression to be employed by a deep-pocketed plaintiff against a small man defendant. Lord Denning M.R. observed at p. 60 that Brightman J. "realized that the defendants might suppress evidence or misuse documentary material, but he thought that that was a risk which must be accepted in civil matters save in extreme cases." He then went on to state at pp. 60-61:

> Let me say at once that no court in this land has any power to issue a search warrant to enter a man's house so as to see if there are papers or documents there which are of an incriminating nature, whether libels or infringements of copyright or anything else of the kind. No constable or bailiff can knock at the door and demand entry so as to inspect papers or documents. The householder can shut the door in his face and say "Get out." That was established in the leading > case of Entick v. Carrington (1765) 2 Wils. K.B. 275. None of us would wish to whittle down that principle in the slightest. But the order sought in this case is not a search warrant. It does not authorise the plaintiffs' solicitors or anyone else to enter the defendants' premises against their will. It does not authorise the breaking down of any doors, nor the slipping in by a back door, nor getting in by an open door or window. It only authorises entry and inspection by the permission of the defendants. The plaintiffs must get the defendants' permission. But it does do this: It brings pressure on the defendants to give permission. It does more. It actually orders them to give permission -- with, I suppose, the result that if they do not give permission, they are guilty of contempt of court.

>
> Nevertheless, in the enforcement of this order, the plaintiffs must act with due circumspection. On the service of it, the plaintiffs should be attended by their solicitor, who is an officer of the court. They should give the defendants an opportunity of considering it and of consulting their own solicitor. If the defendants wish to apply to discharge the order as having been improperly obtained, they must be allowed to do so. If the defendants refuse permission to enter or to inspect, the plaintiffs must not force their way in. They must accept the refusal, and bring it to the notice of the court afterwards, if need be on an application to commit.
>
> You might think that with all these safeguards against abuse, it would be of little use to make such an order. But it can be effective in this way: It serves to tell the defendants that, on the evidence put before it, the court is of opinion that they ought to permit inspection -- nay, it orders them to permit -- and that they refuse at their peril. It puts them in peril not only of proceedings for contempt, but also of adverse inferences being drawn against them; so much so that their own solicitor may often advise them to comply. We are told that in two at least of the cases such an order has been effective. We are prepared, therefore, to sanction its continuance, but only in an extreme case where there is grave danger of property being smuggled away or of vital evidence being destroyed.

[8] Nothing which Lord Denning M.R. stated would appear to be contrary to Semayne's Case (1604), 5 Co. Rep. 91a, 77 E.R. 194, nor contrary to what Dickson J. expressed in Eccles v. Bourque, 1974 CanLII 191 (SCC), [1975] 2 S.C.R. 739 at p. 743:

> . . . the principle, so firmly entrenched in our jurisprudence, that every man's house is his castle, was expressed in these words: "That the house of every one is to him as his castle and fortress, as well for his defence against injury and violence, as for his repose . . .". That, then, is the basic principle, as important today as in Biblical times (Deuteronomy 24:10) or in the 17th century. But there are occasions when the interest of a private individual in the security of his house must yield to the public interest in the process to be executed.

[9] Ormrod L.J. at p. 61 of Anton Piller indicated: "I agree with all that Lord Denning MR has said." He went on at p. 62 to state:

> There are three essential pre-conditions for the making of such an order, in my judgment. First, there must be an extremely strong prima facie case. Secondly, the damage, potential or actual, must be very serious for the applicant. Thirdly, there must be clear evidence that the defendants have in their possession incriminating documents or things, and that there is a real possibility that they may destroy such material before any application inter partes can be made.
>
> The form of the order makes it plain that the court is not ordering or granting anything equivalent to a search warrant. The order is an order on the defendant in personam to permit inspection.

[10] The third member of the Anton Piller court, Shaw L.J., indicated at p. 62 that he agreed with both judgments of his colleagues and observed that:

> The overriding consideration in the exercise of this salutary jurisdiction is that it is to be resorted to only in circumstances where the normal processes of the law would be rendered nugatory if some immediate and effective measure was not available.

(Emphasis added)

[11] Thus it seems to me that the English Court of Appeal in Anton Piller clearly and forcefully found the basis for an AP order in the inherent jurisdiction of the court and concluded that such an order was not the equivalence of a search warrant.

[12] Keith Mason in his article "The Inherent Jurisdiction of the Court" (1983), 57 A.L.J. 449 observed (at pp. 449, 452-53, 457):

> Faced with the limitless ways in which the due administration of justice can be delayed, impeded or frustrated, judges have responded with a vast armoury of remedies claimed to be part of their inherent jurisdiction. This unwritten source of power is said to arise from the very nature of a court. The inherent jurisdiction has positive and negative aspects, depending on whether judicial powers are being invoked to facilitate the proper conduct of legal proceedings or to overcome practices or devices which tend to delay, impede or frustrate judicial functioning. The mere fact that some statute or rule of court enables a court to deal with the particular problem in a particular way will not usually exclude inherent powers to deal with it in other ways. Indeed, this jurisdiction may be asserted even though the conduct complained of may be in literal compliance with some statute or rule of Court.
>
> . . . . .
>
> (2) Preventing Steps being taken that would Render Judicial Proceedings Inefficacious.
>
> It is not surprising that those peculiarly concerned with the due administration of justice should arrogate to themselves power designed to punish or impede persons who seek to circumvent the due process of law, whether litigants or not. Much of the law of contempt involves the punishment of persons whose actions are calculated to interfere in this way with the administration of justice. Stating the matter in positive terms, courts have wide inherent powers to ensure that justice is not denied to those who litigate before them.
>
> The recent emergence of Mareva injunctions and Anton Piller orders neatly illustrates the judicial capacity to extend an appropriate remedy to meet a perceived "abuse" of this nature, as well as the way that substantive rights emerge "secreted in the interstices of procedure". Justification for the Mareva injunction was originally sought by resort to the statutory power contained in s. 45 of the Judicature Act 1925 (U.K.) and its Australian counterparts to grant interlocutory injunctions "in all cases in which it shall appear to the Court to be just or convenient". However this judicial basis was soundly attacked as being inconsistent with earlier authorities that held that the enactment was merely procedural since it extended equity's injunctive power to the common-law courts without increasing the scope of the jurisdiction. However, by the time this attack was mounted the utility of the new remedy had been perceived by courts and litigants. It is therefore not surprising that the judicial response was to anchor the remedy in the broader foundations of the inherent jurisdiction with the function of preventing the abuse and injustice that would result from a defendant making himself judgment-proof by removing or secreting his assets pendente lite. Whilst the English position has now been overtaken by express statutory enactment (s. 37(3) of the English > Supreme Court Act, 1981) and some English judges have expressed reservations about attributing these developments to the inherent jurisdiction, this basis has recently been asserted authoritatively in New South Wales.

> The birth and rapid development of the Anton Piller order whereby a plaintiff can obtain ex parte pre-trial inspection of premises where property or documents might otherwise be removed or destroyed to the prejudice of the plaintiff's proof of his claim or satisfaction of his judgment is another example of a substantive judge-made remedy justified on a "procedural" basis. The rationale of this manifestation of the Court's inherent jurisdiction is that "if the defendant were forewarned, there is a grave danger that vital evidence will be destroyed, that papers will be burnt or hidden or taken beyond the jurisdiction, and so the ends of justice be defeated". The power extends, in an appropriate case, to the making of an order requiring the property in question to be placed in the custody of a responsible person. Interesting illustrations of the inherent jurisdiction's capacity for exponential growth are found in recent authorities permitting an Anton Piller order coupled with an order for discovery to be granted in aid of a Mareva injunction.
>
> Since the inherent jurisdiction is not derived by implication from statutory provisions conferring a general or particular jurisdiction, the onus lies squarely upon those asserting statutory curtailment or modification. Because "rules and forms of procedure are not ends in themselves, but means to an end, which is the attainment of justice", it follows that the mere fact that a statute or rule of court addresses itself in a particular way to a particular matter does not usually exclude by implication a superior court's wider inherent powers relating to that matter if they are appropriate.

[13] Paul D. Godin in his article "Anton Piller Orders in an Age of Scepticism: Charter Application and Other Safeguards for Judicially-Ordered Searches" (1996), 54 U.T. Fac. L.R. 107 raises a number of concerns about AP orders. At pp. 110-11, he observes:

> Certainly, good reasons exist for having Anton Piller orders in today's world. The order effectively preserves evidence that might otherwise be destroyed and helps plaintiffs track down hidden wrongdoers. Traditional judicial methods of discovery are incapable of dealing with many modern cases of patent infringement, trade secret theft, entertainment piracy, etc. Evidence of the infringement, such as computer records, computer programs, and portable electronic circuitry, can easily be erased, destroyed, or hidden, and suppliers of pirated material are both difficult to identify and highly mobile. Since the evidence sought would be compellable during discovery anyway, it is argued that an Anton Piller order simply gives the plaintiff a head start and only those defendants who never intended to comply with the discovery rules in the first place will be affected. This view, however, ignores the problems listed below that are related primarily to the methodology of "forced discovery" rather to the discovery process itself.
> A number of aspects of the Anton Piller order raise concerns. The first is the nature of the order. Although it is not a search warrant, an Anton Piller order effectively allows the same level of intrusion into one's privacy, and even one's home. Moreover, it does so without the redeeming element of public interest present in criminal law search warrants.

I pause to note that one would think that there is a very strong public interest in ensuring that the court process in civil cases is not frustrated by the suppression of evidence. Godin goes on at pp. 112-15 to state:

> Three possible jurisdictional foundations for the Anton Piller order have been advanced. The first and most generally accepted is the inherent jurisdiction of the court. The second is found > in rules of civil procedure, which usually allow various forms of discovery, evidentiary preservation, and inspection of property. The third possibility is that orders can be made pursuant to statutes that authorize courts to grant interlocutory injunctions and mandatory orders "where it appears to a judge of the court to be just and convenient to do so". Although there is little doubt that Anglo-Canadian courts have the jurisdiction to grant Anton Piller orders, the implications for such orders will vary depending on the jurisdictional basis accepted. Constitutional provisions in Canada clearly apply to statutory instruments, for example, but may not apply to judge-made common law, at least not to the same extent.

>
> . . . . .
>
> How far does the inherent jurisdiction extend? The inherent jurisdiction of the court derives "not from any statute or rule but from the very nature of the court as a superior court." Wilson J.A. (as she then was) explained in Glover v. Glover et al. (No. 2) that
>
> > . . . the Court's inherent jurisdiction is part of the law of procedure and enables it to control and render efficacious its own process. It is, in other words, inherent in a Superior Court of Record that it have all the jurisdiction of a procedural nature which it requires in order to maintain the integrity of its process. . . . It is impossible to define the scope of the court's inherent jurisdiction because the contexts in which the Court may have to resort to it to protect its process and render it efficacious are themselves incapable of definition.
> >
> > . . . . .
> >
> > Even when Rules of Civil Procedure apply in part, courts can reach behind the Rules to the broader basis of inherent jurisdiction to support any aspects of the order that fall outside the rules.

(Emphasis added)

[14] Lamer C.J.C. in MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, 1995 CanLII 57 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725, 130 D.L.R. (4th) 385 concluded that the doctrine of inherent jurisdiction was alive and well in Canada and necessary for the functioning of the court system (for the benefit of all): see p. 751 where he notes the Mason article, pp. 749-50 as to the I.H. Jacob article "The Inherent Jurisdiction of the Courts" (1970), 23 Current Legal Problems 23; and the T.A. Cromwell article "Aspect of Constitutional Judicial Review in Canada" (1995), 46 S.C.L. Rev. 1027. Lamer C.J.C. noted Cromwell's observations that, "For example, the Superior Courts are said to possess 'inherent jurisdiction' and to have original jurisdiction in any matter unless jurisdiction is clearly taken away by statute". Lamer C.J.C. at p. 750 stated:

> While inherent jurisdiction may be difficult to define, it is of paramount importance to the existence of a superior court. The full range of powers which comprise the inherent jurisdiction of a superior court are, together, its "essential character" or "immanent attribute". To remove any part of this core emasculates the court, making it something other than a superior court.

[15] Huddart J. in Grenzservice Speditions Ges m.b.H. v. Jans (1995), 1995 CanLII 2507 (BC SC), 129 D.L.R. (4th) 733, 15 B.C.L.R. (3d) 370 (S.C.), stated at p. 744:

> The English Chancery judges found their jurisdiction in the English rules equivalent of Rules 30 and 46 of this court. The Court of Appeal in Anton Piller recognized that the ex parte inspection order extended well beyond both those jurisdictions (to order discovery and inspection of documents and to order inspection of property) and was derived from the inherent jurisdiction of the court to do what is necessary in the interests of justice.

She went on to observe at pp. 755-56:

> The Mareva and Anton Piller orders were conceived not so much to protect plaintiffs as to protect the court's jurisdiction against defendants bent on dissipating or secreting their assets or evidence in order to render inconsequential the judicial process again [sic] them. They represent an extraordinary assumption of power by the judiciary. Judges must be prudent and cautious in their issue. It follows that counsel must be discerning in their execution and particularly sensitive to the rights of unrepresented defendants who have not been heard.

[16] I am of the view that the AP order is grounded in the inherent jurisdiction of this court and therefore it will not be necessary to deal with s. 66(2)(k) of the CJA nor with rule 45.01. The addition of these provisions in any material seeking an AP order is, in my view, not merely surplusage but rather it is unnecessary and misleading.

[17] The AP order is not a search warrant nor is it a civil search warrant and there is no authority granted by an AP order to demand entry to any location (be it a home or a place of business) with the right and authority to force entry if that demand is not acceded to. Rather, an AP order allows a request for entry and that request may be denied, but if so, the denier faces contempt proceedings for failure to give permission which the court has ordered. There is no empowerment of the person who has obtained an AP order to force an entry; that person has no legal ability or capability to do so.

[18] The challengers have raised the spectre that an AP order may be obtained in any civil proceeding merely with the allegation of fraud or its equivalent. That overlooks the fact that the mere allegation of fraud will not suffice to meet the three-part test enunciated by Ormrod L.J. in the Anton Piller case -- particularly the requirement that a plaintiff show in the ex parte hearing to obtain the AP order that there is an extremely strong prima facie case and that there is a real possibility that incriminating materials may be destroyed before an application were made involving the participation of the defendant. Dillon L.J. in Booker McConnell plc v. Plascan, [1985] R.P.C. 425 (C.A.) noted this question of "a real possibility" and contrasted it with the court otherwise proceeding with justification to rely on persons complying with their production obligations when he stated at p. 441:

> The phrase "a real possibility" is to be contrasted with the extravagant fears which seem to afflict all plaintiffs who have complaints of breach of confidence, breach of copyright or passing off. Where the production and delivery up of documents is in question, the courts have always proceeded, justifiably, on the basis that the overwhelming majority of people in this country will comply with orders to, for example, produce and deliver up documents without it being necessary to empower the plaintiffs' solicitors to search the defendant's premises.

[19] To my view this further illustrates that the AP order is a necessary tool in the inherent jurisdiction of the court to prevent undermining of the court system which is the cornerstone of our free and democratic society, but it should be noted that this device is only to be used in those relatively few cases where the high standard of the test of Ormrod L.J. has been met. See Hoffmann J.'s observation at p. 1281 of Lock International plc v. Beswick, [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1268, [1989] 3 All E.R. 373 where he noted:

> The making of an intrusive order ex parte even against a guilty defendant is contrary to the natural justice and can only be done where there is a paramount need to prevent a denial of justice to the plaintiff.

[20] Anyone who wishes to contest me granting of AP order is free to do so under its provisions. How would one do that? Aside from having the terms of the AP order explained to them in layman's language (including as per Wein J. in Computer Security Products Inc. v. Forbes, [1999]

O.J. No. 4573 (S.C.J.), at para. 42: "To explain to the target that the [AP] order is not a search warrant but a civil remedy, and to ensure that the target is aware that he or she may contact counsel."). A person is entitled to consult with counsel of their own choice. With the benefit of that legal advice it would seem that the most practical way of proceeding would be to have the documentation at the location sealed, or, in the alternative, taken into the possession of the person's counsel with the counsel and client undertaking that the material would not [be] returned to the client pending a return to the court to contest the issuance of the AP order.

[21] The challengers assert that the April 19 AP order was not a true AP order since it contained the para. 21, which provides:

> 21. The Court Orders that a police officer shall assist Plaintiff's Counsel and the Investigators, if requested, to ensure public order and the avoidance of a disturbance by anyone, with respect to the entries permitted by this Order, and the Sheriff is authorized to use such reasonable force as may be necessary to carry out the terms of the Court Order, including the use of a locksmith to open any locked premises, equipment or storage places which the Defendants refuse to open voluntarily.

[22] First, it is clear that the purpose of the police officer being there is not to do anything but to ensure public order and the avoidance of a disturbance by anyone. This would include not only the defendants and third parties -- but also anyone from the plaintiff's side. I would suggest that the wording in this part might be clarified somewhat to avoid ambiguity. The second element about the sheriff using reasonable force including the services of a locksmith was candidly acknowledged by counsel for the ORC as being inappropriate and that on reflection he should not have included this in the draft order. However, it is I in the result who must bear the responsibility and blame for such language. Does this language imply that there may be a forced entry to the premises in question? I think not. Paragraph 4 is clear that the order provides that, the "Defendant . . . shall allow the persons enforcing this Order to search for, seize and copy . . . ORC-Related Information". The defendants are given a choice of allowing that (granting permission to do that) or as per para. 6, if they refuse to grant permission (or allow) that to happen, then they may risk contempt proceedings. There is absolutely no necessity to have anyone, let alone the sheriff, "use such reasonable force as may be necessary to carry out the terms of the Court Order". Further, once the defendant has permitted the search, that permission would carry with it free entry to any locked premises, equipment or storage places. Having granted permission to enter for the purposes of the search the defendant is not allowed to pick and choose what portion of the premises may be searched. I note in any event that no one refused to co-operate and all locked premises, equipment or storage places were voluntarily opened (including C's safety deposit box). The language of the second part of para. 21 is unfortunate. Words to this effect are unnecessary and should not form part of any AP order. I am in agreement with t he sentiments of Huddart J. expressed at p. 752 of Grenzservice.

> There is no power at common law to issue a warrant to enter and search private premises except with respect to stolen goods.

He went on to expand to say at pp. 93-94:

> At common law there is no power to search premises without a warrant (or with a warrant except for stolen goods) save as incident to a lawful arrest. After making a lawful arrest, an officer has the right to search the person arrested and take from his person any property which he reasonably believes is connected with the offence charged, or which may be used as evidence against the person arrested on the charge, or any weapon or instrument that might enable the arrested person to commit an act of violence or effect his escape: see Gottschalk v. Hutton (1921), 1921 CanLII 376 (AB CA), 36 C.C.C. 298 at pp. 301-2, 66 D.L.R. 499 at pp. 502-3, [1922] 1 W.W.R. 59 (Alta. S.C.A.D.); Dillon v. O'Brien and Davis (1887), 16 Cox C.C. 245. The power to search the person of the arrestee has generally been considered to extend to the premises where he is arrested and which are under his control: see the Report of the Canadian Committee on Corrections (1969), at p. 62; Leigh, Police Powers in England and Wales at p. 51. Thus, where a person has been arrested in his house, it seems that his house may be searched for evidence of the crime with which he is charged: see Ghani v. Jones, supra, at pp. 1165-6.

[24] Similarly it seems that Lamer C.J.C. in Caslake was similarly talking of that criminal power when he made the observation at p. 60:

> First, the state authority conducting the search must be able to point to a specific statute or common law rule that authorizes the search. It would seem to me that Lamer C.J.C. in referring to the common law rule is referring to those types of situations which Martin J.A. carved out as being extensions of the common law. That said, one should not be distracted from the fact that an AP order is not a search warrant as discussed above.

[25] In Nova Scotia (Attorney General) v. MacIntyre, 1982 CanLII 14 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 175, 132 D.L.R. (3d) 385, Dickson J. defined a search warrant and discussed the two conflicting public interests when he observed at pp. 179-80:

> A search warrant may be broadly defined as an order issued by a justice under statutory powers, authorizing a named person to enter a specified place to search for and seize specified property which will afford evidence of the actual or intended commission of a crime. A warrant may issue upon a sworn information and proof of reasonable grounds for its issuance. The property seized must be carried before the justice who issued the warrant to be dealt with by him according to law.
>
> Search warrants are part of the investigative pre-trial process of the criminal law, often employed early in the investigation and before the identity of all of the suspects is known. Parliament, in furtherance of the public interest in effective investigation and prosecution of crime, and through the enactment of s. 443 of the Code, has legalized what would otherwise be an illegal entry of premises and illegal seizure of property. The issuance of a search warrant is a judicial act on the part of the justice, usually performed ex parte and in camera, by the very nature of the proceedings.
>
> The search warrant in recent years has become an increasingly important investigatory aid, as crime and criminals become increasingly sophisticated and the incidence of corporate white collar crime multiplies. The effectiveness of any search made pursuant to the issuance of a search warrant will depend much upon timing, upon the degree of confidentiality which attends the issuance of the warrant and upon the element of surprise which attends the search.
>
> As is often the case in a free society there are at work two conflicting public interests. The one has to do with civil liberties and the protection of the individual from interference with the enjoyment of his property. There is a clear and important social value in avoidance of arbitrary searches and unlawful seizures. The other, competing, interest lies in the effective detection and proof of crime and the prompt apprehension and conviction of offenders. Public protection, afforded by efficient and effective law enforcement is enhanced through the proper use of search warrants.
>
> In this balancing of interests, Parliament has made a clear policy choice. The public interest in the detection, investigation and prosecution of crimes has been permitted to dominate the individual interest. To the extent of its reach, s. 443 has been introduced as an aid in the administration of justice and enforcement of the provisions of the Criminal Code.

[26] In Retail Wholesale and Department Store Union, Local 580 v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., 1986 CanLII 5 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 573, 33 D.L.R. (4th) 174, McIntyre J. stated the courts were not directly bound by the Charter as were the legislative executive and administrative branches of government. He went on to state at pp. 600-01:

> While in political science terms it is probably acceptable to treat the courts as one of the three fundamental branches of Government, that is, legislative, executive, and judicial, I cannot equate for the purposes of Charter application the order of a court with an element of governmental action. This is not to say that the courts are not bound by the Charter. The courts are, of course, bound by the Charter as they are bound by all law. It is their duty to apply the law, but in doing so they act as neutral arbiters, not as contending parties involved in a dispute. To regard a court order as an element of governmental intervention necessary to invoke the Charter would, it seems to me, widen the scope of Charter application to virtually all private litigation. All cases must end, if carried to completion, with an enforcement order and if the Charter precludes the making of the order, where a Charter right would be infringed, it would seem that all private litigation would be subject to the Charter. In my view, this approach will not provide the answer to the question. A more direct and a more precisely-defined connection between the element of government action and the claim advanced must be present before the Charter applies.

[27] In Dagenais v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp., 1994 CanLII 39 (SCC), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 835, 120 D.L.R. (4th) 12, Lamer C.J.C. at pp. 874-75 stated:

> Challenges to publication bans may be framed in several different ways, depending on the nature of the objection to the ban. If legislation requires a judge to order a publication ban, then any objection to that ban should be framed as a Charter challenge to the legislation itself. Similarly, if a common law rule requires a judge to order a publication ban or authorizes a judge to order a publication ban that infringes Charter rights in a manner not reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society, then any objection to that ban should be framed as a Charter challenge to the common law rule.
>
> In the case at bar, we are dealing with a common law rule which provides judges with the discretion to order a publication ban in certain circumstances. Discretion cannot be open-ended. It cannot be exercised arbitrarily. More to the point, as I stated in Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038, at p. 1078, in the context of legislative conferrals of discretion:
>
> > As the Constitution is the supreme law of Canada and any law that is inconsistent with its provisions is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect, it is impossible to interpret legislation conferring discretion as conferring a power to infringe the Charter, unless, of course, that power is expressly conferred or necessarily implied. Such an interpretation would require us to declare the legislation to be of no force or effect, unless it could be justified under s. 1.
>
> I would extend this reasoning, and hold that a common law rule conferring discretion cannot confer the power to infringe the Charter. Discretion must be exercised within the boundaries set by the principles of the Charter; exceeding these boundaries results in a reversible error of law. In this case, then, we are dealing with an error of law challenge to a publication ban imposed under a common law discretionary rule.

[28] In Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto, 1995 CanLII 59 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 1130, 126 D.L.R. (4th) 129, Cory J. at p. 1161 stated:

> The fact that persons are employed by the government does not mean that their reputation is automatically divided into two parts, one related to their personal life and the other to their > employment status. To accept the appellants' position would mean that identical defamatory comments would be subject to two different laws, one applicable to government employees, the other to the rest of society. Government employment cannot be a basis for such a distinction. Reputation is an integral and fundamentally important aspect of every individual. It exists for everyone quite apart from employment.

While it is true that the ORC was acting as an agent of the Crown in relation to the various properties entrusted to it for management (including environmental clean-up) and disposition, it would not seem to me that this condition superadds any responsibility upon the ORC. This is particularly so in light of the fact that the Crown (and the ORC), in relation to those properties, are acting not in any public authority sense but rather in a private commercial context.

[29] Section 8 of the Charter states:

> 8. Everyone has the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure.

[30] Dickson J. in Hunter, supra, stated that s. 8 of the Charter protected the right of privacy. At p. 159 he said:

> The guarantee of security from unreasonable search and seizure only protects a reasonable expectation.

(Emphasis in original)

[31] Here again it must be emphasized that Hunter was a case where the Director of Investigation and Research of the Combines Investigation Branch authorized several Combines Investigation Officers to enter the respondent's business premises and examine documents and other things. The Director did so pursuant to s. 10(1) of the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23. The authorization was certified by a member of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission pursuant to s. 10(3). The search was incident to the criminal power of that legislation. The Supreme Court of Canada determined that the legislation (s. 10) was unconstitutional for two general reasons. First, the authorizing procedures should be meaningful in the sense that the authorizing person should be able to assess the conflicting interests of the state and the individual on an entirely neutral and impartial manner. That person should act judicially and be capable of doing so. Thus, it would be inappropriate for those charged with the investigative and prosecutorial functions under that legislation to so act in a judicial capacity in authorizing a s. 10 search and seizure. Second, s. 10 did not embody a requirement for reasonable and probable grounds (established on oath) for the belief that an offence had been committed and that there was evidence to be found at the place searched; therefore, s. 10 did not measure up to the minimum standard consistent with s. 8 of the Charter of authorizing a search and seizure.

[32] Dickson J. observed at pp. 157-58:

> Historically, the common law protections with regard to governmental searches and seizures were based on the right to enjoy property and were linked to the law of trespass. It was on this basis that in the great case of Entick v. Carrington > (1765), 19 St. Tr. 1029, 1 Wils. K.B. 275, the Court refused to countenance a search purportedly authorized by the executive, to discover evidence that might link the plaintiff to certain seditious libels. Lord Camden prefaced his discussion of the rights in question by saying, at p. 1066 [19 St. Tr. 1029]:
> > The great end, for which men entered into society, was to preserve their property. That right is preserved sacred and incommunicable in all instances, where it has not been taken away or abridged by some public law for the good of the whole.

The defendants argued that their oaths as King's messengers required them to conduct the search in question and ought to prevail over the plaintiff's property rights. Lord Camden rejected this contention, at p. 291 [1 Wils. K.B. 275]:

> . . . our law holds the property of every man so sacred, that no man can set his foot upon his neighbour's close without his leave: if he does he is a trespasser, though he does no damage at all; if he will tread upon his neighbour's ground, he must justify it by law.

Lord Camden could find no exception from this principle for the benefit of King's messengers. He held that neither the instrusions [sic] nor the purported authorizations were supportable on the basis of the existing law. That law would only have countenanced such an entry if the search were for stolen goods and if authorized by a justice on the basis of evidence upon oath that there was "strong cause" to believe the goods were concealed in the place sought to be searched. In view of the lack of proper legal authorization for the governmental intrusion, the plaintiff was protected from the intended search and seizure by the ordinary law of trespass.

In my view interests protected by s. 8 are of a wider ambit than those enunciated in Entick v. Carrington. Section 8 is an entrenched constitutional provision. It is not therefore vulnerable to encroachment by legislative enactments in the same way as common law protections. There is, further, nothing in the language of the section to restrict it to the protection of property or to associate it with the law of trespass. It guarantees a broad and general right to be secure from unreasonable search and seizure.

[33] Thomson Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada (Director of Investigation and Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission), 1990 CanLII 135 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 425, 67 D.L.R. (4th) 161 discussed the Hunter criteria for appropriate legislation (and the searches and seizures thus authorized). Wilson J. then said at pp. 495-96:

> I would agree, however, that these criteria are not hard and fast rules which must be adhered to in all cases under all forms of legislation. What may be reasonable in the regulatory or civil context may not be reasonable in a criminal or quasi-criminal context. What is important is not so much that the strict criteria be mechanically applied in every case but that the legislation respond in a meaningful way to the concerns identified by Dickson J. in Hunter. This having been said, however, it would be my view that the more akin to traditional criminal law the legislation is, the less likely it is that departures from the Hunter criteria will be countenanced. This seems to have been what Dickson C.J. had in mind when he said in R. v. Simmons, 1988 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 495, at p. 527, that departures from the Hunter criteria will be exceedingly rare.

[34] If we assume for the purposes of this analysis that in fact s. 8 of the Charter applies to AP orders (assuming for this purpose then that there is governmental action) and as Adams J. observed at p. 285 of Ontario (Attorney General) v. Dieleman (1994), 1994 CanLII 7509 (ON SC), 20 O.R. (3d) 229, 117 D.L.R. (4th) 449 (Gen. Div.) that, "The Charter has relevance . . . as a superordinate constraint on common law doctrine supporting government action" but one should also keep in mind that in Dieleman the Attorney General took on a parens patriae role, then how do AP orders measure up? In my view Godin at pp. 143-44 provides a fair analysis. It would also be fair to observe that Godin is concerned about AP orders in practice not measuring up. He said:

> For all the reasons given above, the s. 8 balance should require standards for Anton Piller orders that are at least as high as for criminal searches, if not higher.
> Hunter sets out the standards of reasonableness for criminal searches, breaking them down into four main requirements:

> 1) There must be prior public authorization. For Anton Piller orders, the ex parte motion and order meet this requirement.
>
> 2) The authorization should be made by a neutral "judicial" decision-maker. Anton Piller orders are made by Masters or judges.
>
> 3) The justice must be satisfied by information sworn on oath. Anton Piller orders also require sworn evidence.
>
> 4) The substantive standards to be met are those set out in s. 487 of the Criminal Code. The mere possibility of finding evidence is not sufficient. One must show "reasonable and probable [that is, prima facie] grounds . . . to believe that an offence has been committed and that there is evidence to be found at the place of the search" Anton Piller orders satisfy and possibly exceed this test by requiring a strong prima facie case and "clear evidence that the defendants have in their possession incriminating documents or things." Because other safeguards and standards not required by Hunter are considered in granting an Anton Piller order, such orders theoretically meet a standard equal to or higher than Hunter. In practice, however, cases such as Thermax, along with the regularity with which Anton Piller orders are granted, suggest that these high standards are not maintained in practice. One important restriction enforced with search warrants that should also be strictly enforced for Anton Piller orders is that the search parameters not be overly broad.

(Emphasis added)

[35] It seems to me that AP orders generally have safeguards which exceed the s. 8 requirements as set out in Hunter. The challengers raised two of these points as a problem in the instant case -- (i) information sworn on oath and (ii) extremely strong prima facie case and clear evidence that the defendants have in their possession incriminating documents. They point to certain information given to me by counsel on the ex parte hearing on April 19 -- namely, the transcript of the interview of Ross Farewell, the existence of the Ontario Provincial Police investigation and the possibility that certain defendants might raise the question that the ORC was seeking the AP order to avoid closing on some properties. None of these points go to the question of whether the sworn material makes out an extremely strong prima facie case against the defendants; rather, they are the aspect of full and frank disclosure as to anything which may be of assistance to the defendants as known to the ORC. As to the second point, I would be of the view that once it has demonstrated that in a case which is based upon a fraudulent tendering process that [involves] bid rigging and phony tenders to do certain environmental clean-up, and the lack of doing the clean-up contracted for, there has been an extremely strong prima facie case made out, then this would impact directly upon the trustworthiness of the participants in such a scheme. Further, not only are the non-former employee defendants engaged in the business of performing such tendering, recommendations and clean-ups, and so would be presumed to have business records related to these elements, it is also a reasonable presumption that all defendants would have financial records which would include references to the assorted wrongdoings. Given that fraud-doers are untrustworthy and have either done things clandestinely or otherwise covered their tracks, when we are dealing with a case involving false documentation, it is reasonabl e to assume that there is a real possibility that such persons would continue to want to keep such incriminating material away from inspection. I will deal with the strength of the case otherwise and not get into assessing the various elements here.

[36] The challengers pointed out that Reed J. in Fila Canada Inc. v. Jane Doe, 1996 CanLII 4060 (FC), [1996] 3 F.C. 493 at pp. 497-98, [1996] F.C.J. No. 736 at paras. 5-6 stated:

> Anton Piller orders are, in effect, search and seizure orders. The fiction is that the defendant gives permission to the plaintiff to search and seize. [See Note 1 below] The defendant does so > under threat of being found in contempt of court if permission is not granted. The penalty for contempt of court, at least theoretically, can be a term of imprisonment. Also, while the theory is that the goods are seized to be retained as evidence for use at trial, the seizures in fact often operate as executions before or sometimes even without judgment. Plaintiffs are using these orders as self-help measures in circumstances in which, in other days, the police may have played a more active role.

>
> Section 8 of the Charter [Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, being Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, Schedule B, Canada Act 1982, 1982, c. 11 (U.K.) [R.S.C., 1985, appendix II, No. 44]] provides that individuals are entitled to be free from unreasonable search and seizures. That section is not confined to search and seizures by police officers or investigators pursuant to statutory powers. It is at least arguable that it applies to the civil search and seizures authorized by order of the Court under an Anton Piller order. An unreasonable search and seizure, as I understand that jurisprudence, encompasses one which has been conducted pursuant to an invalid order, or pursuant to an order which was too broadly drafted, or pursuant to an order which has been unreasonably executed; see Hunter et al. v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145. When Anton Piller orders are sought and obtained from this Court it is important to place them within this context.
> 1 See Anton Piller KG v. Manufacturing Processes Ltd., [1976] Ch. 55 (C.A.); Allan M. Rock, "The 'Anton Piller' order: An Examination of its Nature, Development and Present Position in Canada" (1984-85), 5 Advocates' Q. 191; Takach, George, "Exploring the Outer Limits: The Anton Piller order in Canada" (1985), 23 Alta. L. Rev. 310, at p. 311.

[37] I would think it important to note the differences as I have described above, but as well to note that what some might call a (legal) "fiction" is not, in fact, a fiction for legal purposes. Rather it is "non-fiction". Then without analysis there is the observation that "it [sic] at least arguable" that s. 8 of the Charter applies to AP orders. In Nike Canada Ltd. v. Jane Doe, [2000] F.C.J. No. 498, Tremblay-Lamer J. concluded at paras. 80-81 that the Charter could not be invoked to set aside an AP order and that the execution of an AP order, a process which is civil in nature, was not governed by the Hunter criteria. Teitelbaum J. in Proctor & Gamble Inc. v. John Doe, [2000] F.C.J. No. 61, at para. 58, merely observed that:

> Having said that, there is no merit to the Charter argument raised by the defendant as the facts illustrate that the search and seizure guidelines articulated in the s. 8 jurisprudence have clearly been met.

[38] I am of the view that the material obtained pursuant to an AP order is to ensure that evidence for that particular case not be destroyed or otherwise suppressed. An AP order does not in any way allow that evidence to be used for any other purpose outside the confines of the case, including any criminal investigation. If the police wish to obtain such evidence I am of the opinion that they would have to do so pursuant to a valid search warrant: see Koby Foods Ltd. v. Dawson City General Store Ltd., [1997] Y.J. No. 77.

[39] Even if there were to be a conclusion that an AP order infringed the Charter, namely s. 8, then I would conclude that s. 1 of the Charter is able to come to the rescue. The pressing and substantial objective is the maintenance of the court process from being undermined by those who have demonstrated to be untrustworthy and, therefore, there exists the real possibility that they would suppress evidence. This would not only be to the detriment of the litigant on the other side of the case but it would also tend to destroy the ability of the court to dispense civil justice (and thereby lessen the public's confidence in the court system as a means of resolving disputes). The typical AP order provides a rational and connected way of dealing with that end and in a way (with the many safeguards) which respects any Charter right to the maximum extent on a proportional basis.

[40] The April 19 AP order included the following safeguards and protections as cited by the Crown in its factum:

> 1) The Plaintiffs were required to establish a strong prima facie case on the basis of sworn evidence. (see Farley, J.'s endorsement)
>
> 2) Plaintiff's counsel, acting as an Officer of the court, were ordered to explain in fair and everyday language the nature and effect of the Order. (paragraphs 3 and 33(a) of the Order)
>
> 3) Defendants or persons in charge of a premises to be searched were entitled to consult with a lawyer before complying with the Order. (paragraph 7)
>
> 4) The Order was restricted to ORC related records and materials. (paragraph 4(a) of the Order)
>
> 5) Documents with respect to which solicitor/client privilege was claimed were ordered sealed and the claim determined by a court. (paragraph 11 of the Order)
>
> 6) The Order provided that materials seized or delivered up pursuant to the Order were to be used solely for the purpose of "the proceedings in relation to the allegations contained in the statement of claim."
> (paragraph 27 of the Order).
>
> 7) The Defendants or their representatives were entitled to be present to monitor the search as they desired.
> (paragraph 33(b) of the Order)
>
> 8) Copies of seized documents were ordered to be returned to the Defendants.
> (paragraph 33(c) of the Order)
> 9) The Order was issued on the Plaintiffs' undertaking to abide by an Order concerning damages that might be made, should it be found that compensation is owed the Defendants. (paragraph 35 of the Order)

[41] I should note that my endorsement only reads that there is a "strong prima facie" case and not that there was an "extremely strong prima facie case". While I did not include the word "extremely", I think it obvious that was my conclusion, that I in fact granted the order and I was fully cognizant of the three-part test of Ormrod L.J. in the Anton Piller case as to it including an extremely strong prima facie case. In any event the Supreme Court of Canada appears to determine that a "strong prima facie case" is sufficient: see Estey J. in Aetna Financial Services v. Feigelman, 1985 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 2, 15 D.L.R. (4th) 161.

[42] In my view it is not helpful to the analysis to assume that an AP order is a search warrant -- either criminal or civil. Such a characterization only confuses the issue. Lord Denning M.R. in Anton Piller carefully reviewed that question -- at the highest he observed that it may resemble a search warrant but he rejected that as being a proper characterization.

[43] In conclusion, I would dismiss the Charter challenge as indicated previously. I will deal in a separate set of reasons with the balance of the constitutional challenge and the review and continuance of the AP order of April 19, 2000, as executed.

Order accordingly.

ONTARIO SUPERIOR COURT OF JUSTICE

RE: MARY KATHLEEN YOUNG in her capacity as Trustee and Executor of the ESTATE OF BRUCE MALCOLM YOUNG, Applicant

-and-

IAMGOLD CORPORATION, Respondent

BEFORE: FL Myers J

COUNSEL: Nadia Campion and David Ionis, for the Applicant

Zohar R. Levy and Chad Pilkington, for the Respondent

HEARD: June 20, 2022

REVISED ENDORSEMENT[I]

The Application and Outcome

[1] The applicant asks the court to prohibit the respondent from dealing with property in which she wants to claim an interest. She wants the respondent to be required to preserve the property for six months while she tries to obtain control of the interest that she hopes to assert.

[2] The applicant submits that the respondent should be prevented from parting with the property that she wants to claim so that the property will still be there if and when she is able to commence an action to claim an interest in it.

[3] The applicant is effectively arguing, "u*bi jus ibi remedium"* or "where there is a right there is a remedy". The court has all manner of remedies available. Whether an injunction is needed, a preservation order, or a simple Certificate of Pending Litigation would suffice, the issue is not the availability of a remedy. Rather, the question is whether the applicant has any right to assert.

[4] In my view, the applicant has no or insufficient legal or equitable right or basis to claim an interest in the respondent's property to justify granting a remedy at this date. Whether that changes in future will be for another day.

[5] While there may be cases where a person who has not yet sued might have rights that need a remedy, in this case there are too many steps and too many years between the applicant and the property that she seeks. In fact, she acknowledges that she needs the Legislative Assembly of Ontario to pass a special statute for her to have even a chance to assert the right she claims.

[6] The Legislature has already considered the applicant's request for a statute and, in its wisdom, it refused her request to pass the special statute that she needs. Once the request was refused, even the bare expectancy that the applicant asserts has been denied.

[7] As there has recently been a general election, the applicant may try again to seek a statute this fall. I am unaware of any limits on a person's entitlement to petition the Legislature to ask for a law to be enacted. But, at the present time, the applicant has no basis to claim a right in the respondent's property and certainly insufficient basis to prohibit the respondent from dealing with its property as it sees fit.

[8] There has to be a minimum threshold to justify legal intervention. The plaintiff has a sympathetic story looked at in one light and ignoring the passage of time. But if the court ordered people not to deal with their property while someone with a sympathetic story asks Parliament to give her rights in the property, it would be inviting mischief, ignore the policy behind the doctrine of standing, and encourage the granting of extraordinary equitable relief on a wing and a prayer.

[9] In my view, granting the relief sought in this case would be an illegitimate incursion by the court into the respondent's private property rights. The respondent owns its property. It is entitled to do what it pleases with its property subject to law. The plaintiff concedes that she has no standing to sue for the interest she seeks. Neither does she have any legal or equitable right to obtain the standing she seeks. In short, right now, she has no rights that can or ought to be remedied.

The Facts

Superior Corporate Services Limited

[10] The facts are largely undisputed. I borrow liberally from the applicant's factum in the following recitation.

[11] Cyril Young was a prospector in the mid-1900s. He spent his life exploring and developing mineral claims in Chester Township, Ontario. Cyril's company, Young Shannon Gold Mines Limited, owned 11 patented mineral claims that now form part of Canada's largest gold mine called the Côté Gold Project. The land interests in the gold mine are currently held by the respondent IAMGOLD Corporation for itself and others.

[12] Cyril Young died in 1962. The economics of the times did not yet permit the mine to be brought into production.

[13] Bruce Young was Cyril's son. He worked with his father. On Cyril's death Bruce Young became the owner of Young Shannon Gold Mines Limited.

[14] The applicant Mary Young was Bruce Young 's spouse. She assisted Bruce in his work. She often visited the mine property. She is now quite elderly. She likes to tell the story of physically helping Bruce transport a generator on to the property and ensuring compliance with government regulations by capping the mine.

[15] In 1965 Bruce Young incorporated Superior Corporate Services Limited as the vehicle through which he would be remunerated for his work on the mine. There is more discussion on the shareholdings for this company below.

Superior Corporate Services Limited Receives a 1.5% Net Smelter Return Royalty Interest

[16] As the mine was not yet in production, Young Shannon Gold Mines Limited had no cash flow. It could not pay Bruce Young or his colleagues for the work they continued to do and the money they expended to develop the mine.

[17] Therefore, by written agreement dated April 15, 1987, Bruce Young had Young Shannon Gold Mines Limited grant to Superior Corporate Services Limited a 3% net smelter return royalty in the 11 mineral claims.

[18] The royalty interest was intended to be compensation in lieu of salary.

[19] On the same day, Bruce Young had Superior Corporate Services Limited assigned one quarter of its net smelter return royalty (or 0.75% of the net smelter return) to each of his colleagues James T. Riley and Harry S Ferguson. That left Bruce Young with a 1.5% net smelter return royalty interest in the 11 claims held by Superior Corporate Services Limited.

[20] On March 9, 1989, Mr. Riley registered on the land title registry for the mineral claims both the April 15, 1987 3% royalty grant from Young Shannon Gold Mines Limited to Superior Corporate Services Limited and the assignments from Superior Corporate Services Limited of 0.75% to each of himself and Mr. Ferguson.

[21] I am prepared to assume for the purposes of this application that the net smelter return royalties are interests in land. They have certainly been treated as interests in land by all of the various parties who have registered them on title to the land including IAMGOLD Corporation. This matters to the cause of action that Mary Young wishes to advance as discussed below.

Superior Corporate Services Limited was Dissolved in 1989

[22] Bruce Young did not pay taxes owing by Superior Corporate Services Limited. In 1989 the corporation was dissolved administratively due to its filing arrears.

[23] By 1989 Bruce Young had started to suffer health problems. He remained active in managing the mineral claims. Mary Young postulates that Bruce's illness may have impaired his management of the technical corporate affairs of Superior Corporate Services Limited.

[24] On the company's dissolution, the assets of Superior Corporate Services Limited, including its 1.5% net smelter return royalty in Young Shannon Gold Mines Limited mineral claims, escheated to the Crown.

[25] Under the relevant corporate law, Bruce Young, as the shareholder of the dissolved corporation, had the ability to revive the corporation or to ask Her Majesty for a conveyance of the corporate assets had he wished to do so.

[26] In 2002, Bruce Young had Young Shannon Gold Mines Limited sign an agreement to put the mine into production. Sadly Bruce passed away shortly afterward in August of 2003.

[27] Bruce Young had 14 years before his death to revive Superior Corporate Services Limited. But he never revived the dissolved company.

The Estate of Bruce Young

[28] Mary Young and Bruce Young's accountant were the executors of Bruce's estate from his death in 2003 until the accountant resigned recently. Assuming that shares of a dissolved corporation continue to exist, at least as pieces of paper or book entries, Bruce Young's shares of the dissolved Superior Corporate Services Limited would be owned by his estate.

[29] Despite the knowledge of Bruce's accountant and Mary's evidence that she helped perform some of the work for which Superior Corporate Services Limited received its 1.5% net smelter return royalty, neither of the executors caused the estate to take any step to revive Superior Corporate Services Limited or to obtain its assets from the Crown.

[30] Curiously, the Estate of Bruce Young has never distributed to his beneficiaries any shares of Superior Corporate Services Limited. There is no explanation in the evidence of why this is so.

[31] Under cross-examination, the applicant had no evidence to show that Bruce Young actually owned 100% of the shares of the dissolved corporation. It is therefore not clear that the applicant, as estate trustee of the Estate of Bruce Young, is actually the owner of the shares.

[32] For the purposes of this decision however, as there is no evidence to the contrary, I am prepared to assume that the applicant is currently the owner of the shares of the dissolved company (or stands in the owner's shoes).

After 20 Years a Statute is Required to Revive Superior Corporate Services Limited

[33] The year 2009 was significant. That marked the passing of 20 years from the dissolution of Superior Corporate Services Limited. It is common ground that under the applicable statutes, once a corporation has been dissolved for 20 years in the circumstances of Superior Corporate Services Limited the shareholders can no longer revive it on request. Rather, a statute is required to revive it.

[34] The legislative practice is that these statutes are usually introduced as private members' bills. They are apparently passed fairly routinely in the ordinary course.

O*ngoing Recognition of the 1.5% Net Smelter Return Royalty*

[35] Also in 2009 a company called Trelawney Mining and Exploration Inc. bought 92.5% of the mineral claims from Metallum Resources Inc. (formerly Young Shannon Gold Mines Limited). I am not told how much money Trelawney Mining and Exploration Inc. paid to Metallum/Young Shannon Gold Mines Limited or to Bruce Young's estate to buy the mineral claims i.e. to buy the mine.

[36] In any event, Trelawney Mining and Exploration Inc. issued public statements acknowledging that the Young family continued to hold a 3% net smelter return. Its public notices made no mention of the dissolved Superior Corporate Services Limited or of Messrs. Riley or Ferguson.

[37] Despite Trelawney's suggestion that the royalty was held by the "Young family", there is no evidence of any purported distribution of any part of the net smelter return royalty from the Estate of Bruce Young to any beneficiary. There is no evidence that between 2003 and 2018, any of the Estate, Bruce Young's accountant, or Mary Young, ever recognized the existence of any part of the royalty interest as an asset owned by Bruce Young on his death.

Enter IAMGOLD Corporation

[38] In 2012, IAMGOLD Corporation acquired the mineral claims from Trelawney Mining and Exploration Inc. I do not know if it owns 92.5% or perhaps it bought 100% by that time.

[39] The applicant makes much of the fact that IAMGOLD Corporation must have known of the net smelter return royalty when it bought the mineral claims. Trelawny's public technical material referred to it expressly. The grant was registered on title to the property.

[40] I agree that based on the registration on title if nothing else, IAMGOLD Corporation is deemed to have notice of the net smelter return royalty interest.

[41] Although Trelawney's public disclosures referred to a 3% interest in the "Young family", this was incorrect. As discussed above, the 3% net smelter return royalty interest was initially held by Superior Corporate Services Limited. Two pieces of 0.75% each were assigned to Messrs. Riley and Ferguson. The remaining 1.5% escheated to Her Majesty in 1989.

[42] In 2021, as IAMGOLD Corporation prepared to construct an operating mine at the site, it decided to evaluate the existing royalty interests. It searched the title register for the land. It then conducted a corporate search for Superior Corporate Services Limited. IAMGOLD Corporation found the actual ownership of the net smelter return royalty interests.

[43] In 2021, IAMGOLD Corporation approached the Public Guardian and Trustee about buying the 1.5% interest that had by then been owned by the Crown for some 32 years.

[44] IAMGOLD Corporation obtained a fair market value evaluation of the royalty interest and gave it to the Public Guardian and Trustee. It then negotiated to buy the Her Majesty's 1.5% net smelter return royalty interest. On June 28, 2021, IAMGOLD Corporation paid approximately $6 million to the Public Guardian and Trustee to buy the remaining 1.5% net smelter return royalty interest formerly owned by Superior Corporate Services Limited.

[45] IAMGOLD registered its purchase of the net smelter return royalty interest on title to the mineral claims.

The Estate Learns of the Sale of the Net Smelter Return Royalty Interests

[46] After IAMGOLD's Corporation purchase became public, the Estate of Bruce Young was contacted by a lawyer for Metalla Royalty & Streaming Ltd. It is in the business of acquiring royalty and income stream interests. In 2021 it purchased 0.6% of Mr. Riley's 0.75% interest in the net smelter royalty return and all of Mr. Ferguson's 0.75% interest. It then went looking for the remining 1.5% interest.

[47] The applicant postulates in her affidavit that it was the public announcement of the purchase of the two smaller interests by Metalla Royalty & Streaming Ltd. that prompted IAMGOLD Corporation to start looking for the rest of the 3% net smelter return royalty interest.

[48] Under cross-examination the applicant was not able to provide any information about the initial contact that the Estate of Bruce Young received from the lawyer for Metalla Royalty & Streaming Ltd. Apparently her daughter has been involved in helping her manage her affairs including helping her with her affidavit evidence. It is unclear how much of Ms. Young's evidence is her personal recollection or whether her recollection is very reliable.

[49] Questions asked of Ms. Young about the Estate's dealings with Metalla Royalty & Streaming Ltd. were refused. IAMGOLD Corporation postulates that this application has nothing to do with the Young family legacy as claimed and everything to do with an effort by Metalla to obtain a royalty interest in the very valuable mine. This is consistent with the fact that Ms. Young and Bruce Young's accountant, as executors of the Estate of Bruce Young, did nothing to realize or distribute the shares of Superior Corporate Services Limited or the net smelter return interest for 18 years after his death until someone was contacted by Metalla.

[50] In my view, this application does not turn on credibility or reliability of Ms. Young's recollection, the question of whether she is a front for Metalla Royalty & Streaming Ltd. or if the 1.5% net smelter return royalty interest represents her late husband's life's work and legacy.

The Technical Legal Issue

[51] The applicant argues that the Public Guardian and Trustee had no authority to sell the escheated royalty interest to IAMGOLD Corporation. The Public Guardian and Trustee can transfer interests under the Escheats Act, 2015, S.O. 2015, c. 38, Sched. 4. But subsection 2 (2)2 of that statute provides that it does not apply to forfeited corporate property under the Forfeited Corporate Property Act, 2015, S.O. 2015, c. 38.

[52] Forfeited corporate real property (i.e. land and interests in land) are subject to the Forfeited Corporate Property Act, 2015,. Under subsection 26 (1) of that statute the applicable minister may transfer Her Majesty's interest in forfeited property to:

> …an applicant who satisfies the Minister that the applicant has a legal or moral claim to the property based on facts that arose before the property became forfeited corporate property.

[53] I heard argument about whether this authority was subject to a 20 year or a 10 year limitation period and whether the limitation runs from 1989 or from 2016 when the relevant part of the statute came into force. The transition provisions of the statute are complex.

[54] Suffice it to say that as the remaining executrix of the Estate of Bruce Young, the applicant wants to revive Superior Corporate Services Limited so that it can sue to invalidate the purported sale by the Public Guardian and Trustee to IAMGOLD Corporation under the Escheats Act, 2015 of the 1.5% net smelter royalty return interest. For the purposes of this application, I am willing to assume that the claim, if brought by someone with standing to do so, would not be frivolous.

[55] Regardless, the applicant accepts that she lacks standing to bring the lawsuit to invalidate the sale. She needs to revive Superior Corporate Services Limited so that it can claim its interest back. And doing that requires a statute.

The Application to Revive Corporate Services Limited Failed

[56] When this application was brought initially, the applicant was in the midst of the process to obtain a private member's bill in the Legislature to revive Superior Corporate Services Limited. She sought a preservation order initially to require IAMGOLD Corporation to preserve the 1.5% net smelter return royalty interest to let the legislative process play out so that Superior Corporate Services Limited could be revived and then sue.

[57] Since then, however, the legislative committee charged with review of the proposed bill rejected it. The government refused to allow the proposed private member's bill to go forward. That means that the applicant's effort to revive Superior Corporate Services Limited came to an unsuccessful conclusion.

[58] The applicant complains that IAMGOLD Corporation interfered in what should have been a pro forma legislative process. Moreover, it did so at the last minute, twice, and deprived her of a fair hearing before the legislative committee. She also complains that the government members who formed the majority of the legislative committee did not want to take the risk that the government or the Public Guardian and Trustee might have to refund the $6 million that it received on the sale to IAMGOLD Corporation.

[59] Overall, the applicant believes that the legislative process was unfair and she will be trying again with the new government and perhaps under a new, streamlined procedure.

[60] I am not asked to weigh-in on the legislative process. It is not before me for review. Whether it ever could be before a court is not a matter on which I need to speculate.

[61] At best right now, the applicant says that the Estate has a moral if not legal claim to the 1.5% net smelter return royalty interest. It should have been notified of the sale process by the Public Guardian and Trustee or IAMGOLD Corporation before the sale of the interest by the former to the latter. Had it received notice of the sale, the Estate of Bruce Young could have revived Superior Corporate Services Limited and made a competing claim to the Minister for the return of the property escheated from the corporation, [62] I asked Ms. Campion to describe the basis to assert that the successor to the (possible) shareholder of a dissolved corporation was entitled to be given notice by a potential buyer from the Crown of assets that escheated more than 30 years ago. Ms. Campion submitted that IAMGOLD Corporation owed this obligation to the applicant if it is to be a "good corporate citizen".

[63] There is no public shareholder's register in Ontario. If IAMGOLD Corporation wanted to give notice, it would have had to guess that Bruce

Young was the shareholder of Superior Corporate Services Limited rather than the shareholder(s) perhaps being the owner of the mineral claims, Young Shannon Gold Mines Limited, or some other corporate holding company for any number of possible shareholders. Then if it assumed the "3% Young family" interest described by Trelawney was the registered 1.5% interest owned by Superior Corporate Services Limited and that Bruce Young was the sole shareholder of that dissolved company, it had to find his beneficiaries and their successors 18 years after his death in circumstances where neither Mr. Young nor the successors had done anything to revive the corporate royalty-holder for 30 years.

[64] Mr. Ionis submits that had the proper process been utilized under the Forfeited Corporate Property Act, 2015 the Minister was required to give notice to the prior owner before disposing of the forfeited net smelter return royalty interest. I do not agree.

[65] Under s. 25 (1)(c) of the statute, the Minister may sell forfeited corporate property in such manner as he or she considers appropriate. Subsection 25 (2) provides that where a corporation was dissolved for the reasons applicable to Superior Corporate Services Limited, the Minister must wait three years before disposing of its former property. Presumably this deferral is designed to give the owners of the dissolved corporation some time to try to revive the company.

[66] Then, subsection 25 (3) provides that "[d]espite subsections (2) and (3), the Minister may dispose of the property at any time, (a) after giving notice…". This means that if the Minister wants to sell forfeited property within the three-year waiting period prescribed under s. 25 (2), he or she can do so by giving notice. That is not at all what happened here.

[67] Moreover, the Minster's notice, if it is required, is to be published on a government website and is also to be given to:

> …the prior corporate owner and every person who is named as a director or officer of the prior corporate owner in the most recent notices or returns filed under the Corporations Information Act, or who is named in the prior corporate owner's articles or letters patent, whichever was most current as of the day before the prior corporate owner was dissolved,

[68] The Articles of Incorporation of Superior Corporate Services Limited show that it was incorporated in 1965. The initial shareholders were shown as lawyers in the law firm that incorporated the company. This is a typical process so that law firms have corporations available "on the shelf" for clients who need them. The notice of dissolution dated February 14, 1989 shows an address of an office suite on Richmond Street West. Ms. Young did not know the head office address of Superior Corporate Services Limited. There is no evidence of any available corporate filing showing any name of any former director or officer of the company. The most recent corporate search profile pulled in 2021 simply shows that the corporation was cancelled.

[69] Even if notice by the Minister had been required therefore, there is no evidence of any reference to Bruce Young in the material referred to in the statute.

The Request for a Preservation Order

[70] The Estate of Bruce Young asks for an order requiring IAMGOLD Corporation to preserve the 1.5% net smelter return royalty interest while it tries for a second time to obtain a statute to revive Superior Corporate Services Limited.

[71] Underlying the need for a statute is a very simple proposition: the Estate has no standing to challenge the sale by the Public Guardian and Trustee. Even if Bruce Young died owning all the shares of Superior Corporate Services Limited, the Estate has no legal interest in the assets of the company sufficient to allow it to challenge the sale by the Public Guardian and Trustee to IAMGOLD Corporation.

[72] That does not leave the Estate or its beneficiaries without any relief I note. For example, they may be able to sue the Public Guardian and Trustee or some other representative of Her Majesty for damages for selling the asset improperly and thereby depriving them of the ability to try to advance a moral if not legal claim to get the asset back. IAMGOLD Corporation makes the point that Her Majesty is not a party to this application. Therefore, I have no one before me to speak for the vendor of the asset to try to show the righteousness of the sale from its perspective.

[73] What is before me is the desire of the Estate to make a claim for the return of the asset itself rather than just for damages. It says that there is a prima facie or at least a not frivolous basis to assert that the Public Guardian and Trustee had no right to sell the 1.5% net smelter return royalty interest to IAMGOLD Corporation. If the sale was unlawful, someone has to have the ability to say so and sue to right the wrong. U*bi jus ibi remedium*.

[74] Moreover, the Estate submits that the court should not countenance the acts of IAMGOLD Corporation to interfere in the legislative process to prevent the Estate from having access to civil justice. This is not a question of reviewing the will of the Legislature. Rather, it is an equitable consideration in the balance of convenance on the question of whether IAMGOLD Corporation should be made to hold the disputed property interest for a few months while the Estate tries again.

[75] The Estate also argues that IAMGOLD Corporation suffers no prejudice in being required to hold the interest pending its efforts to revive Superior Corporate Services Limited so that it can sue for the return of its property.

[76] The Estate asks for a preservation order under Rule 45.01 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, RRO 1990, Reg 194. The rule is flexible and can be broadly interpreted to do justice between the parties.

[77] I agree with IAMGOLD Corporation however that Rule 45 is not available. The Rule allows the court to make an "interim order…for the custody or preservation of any property in question in a proceeding or relevant to an issue in a proceeding".

[78] The Rule requires that there be a proceeding in which property is in issue. It speaks of an "interim order". That is an order in a lawsuit that applies during a piece of the proceeding between two events. The order speaks to a situation where someone sues about a property interest and it empowers the court to make a temporary order for the defendant to hold the property pending trial or some other defined event.

[79] Rule 45.01 does not contemplate a separate application for a preservation order for a future, possible lawsuit. An application would have to be returnable only to a judge. A motion under Rule 45.01 is returnable to an Associate Justice as well as to a judge. This is not a situation like an interpleader order where the rule differentiates an application to a judge form a motion to an associate judge. A motion under Rule 45 is always for ran interim order in an existing lawsuit.

[80] There can be claims brought in contemplation of another proceeding that is not yet started. The court has the authority to grant injunctive relief if a cause of action is made out in an application and damages are an inadequate remedy. But I am not aware of any basis for a lawsuit by someone who admits they lack the right to sue but are trying to obtain it. If the applicant had a defined right to obtain the interest that might raise a more difficult question especially in light of its claim that IAMGOLD Corporation interfered. But the need to ask the Legislature to pass a statute after it has already refused to do so is not even the barest of bare expectancies. There may be some expectation of these things being pro forma. But here more than 30 years have passed and the government has been paid $6 million. It is not surprising that this is not a cookie cutter.

[81] The applicant wants the court to tell someone that it must preserve a piece of property while a putative plaintiff tries to obtain the right to sue it for an interest in the property. The effort to obtain the right to sue has already been refused. The applicant says that she only needs the order for a few months while she tries again with the Legislature. But why is a second try any different than a third, a fourth, or a fifth try?

[82] The court's jurisdiction can only be engaged by a party with standing to advance a cause of action against another. The court is not a roving tribunal righting wrongs it may encounter along its path. While it may be that Superior Corporate Services Limited has a right to claim that its former property has been improperly sold by the Public Guardian and Trustee, the fact that the Estate cannot or has not yet successfully revived the corporation does not mean that there is a right with no remedy or that the Estate is being wrongfully denied access to justice. It is putting the cart before the horse. Before it can be denied a legal right, it has to be entitled to it first.

[83] The Estate seems to be entitled to ask for a statute reviving Superior Corporate Services Limited. It is doing that. Unless or until it succeeds and Superior Corporate Services Limited is reinstated and sues, the Estate has no right to advance against the 1.5% net smelter return royalty currently owned by IAMGOLD Limited.

[84] Unless or until Superior Corporate Services Limited brings an action putting the title of IAMGOLD Corporation to its property in issue, no one has a right to an interim preservation order or other remedy against IAMGOLD Corporation's property.

[85] Even approached from a broad conception of flexibility, access to justice, and the Young family legacy, the balance of convenience favours the respondent. Too much time has passed. The Estate or the beneficiary of the shares of Metallum Resources Inc. (formerly Young Shannon Gold Mines Limited) sold the principal interest in the mine years ago for some undisclosed amount of money. None of Bruce Young, his accountant, Mary Young, or the daughter helping her give evidence did anything about the dissolved company or its property until they were contacted by Metalla Royalty & Streaming Ltd.

[86] Until there is an actual claim or someone with the right to make a claim for the asset itself, I see no basis for a court to be interfering in the affairs of IAMGOLD Corporation. In light of the timing and the government's refusal to pass the statute that the applicant concedes that she needs, I see no harm to the applicant in refusing the order sought. She continues to have whatever rights she and the Estate have against the Public Guardian and Trustee and the government (if any). But she has no rights against IAMGOLD Corporation and no legal basis to say that she will ever have rights against it.

[87] The applicant therefore lacks standing, lacks a cause of action, and even if she had a claim to an order under Rule 45.01, an injunction, or a CPL, the balance of convenience favours the dismissal of the request.

Result

[88] The application is dismissed.

[89] The parties agreed that costs of $60,000 should be payable to the successful party. Accordingly, the applicant is ordered to pay the respondent costs of $60,000 all-inclusive.

the Master's decision, or in the decision of the Divisional Court upholding that decision.

F. DISCUSSION

[37] In the discussion that follows I will begin by addressing some of the relevant principles. I will then identify the errors in the Master's analysis and that of the Divisional Court. Finally, I will explain why, on a proper consideration of the evidence, and having regard to the relevant factors, the order sought by the appellant must be granted.

(1) The Relevant Principles

[38] The parties invited the court on this appeal to address the test for r. 45.01 motions, clarifying the role of balance of convenience and whether there is a presumption in favour of the preservation of evidence in a proceeding. As I will explain, it is inappropriate to prescribe a single test for r. 45.01 motions, including a Taribo-type test that focusses on "balance of convenience", having regard to the variety of circumstances in which such motions can be brought. In a case such as the present, where the condition of property is at issue in the action and its preservation is sought for the purpose of inspection, the goal is to best ensure fairness in the litigation process. I will also explain why it is unnecessary to determine whether there is a presumption in all cases in favour of preserving evidence for litigation, but that r. 45.01 permits the court to address trial fairness concerns that would arise before evidence is destroyed.

(a) What is the Appropriate Test for Interim Preservation of Property in this Case?

[39] Rule 45.01 is available to parties as an interim measure during litigation. Rule 45.01(1) provides that the court may make an interim order for the custody or preservation of "any property in question in a proceeding or relevant to an issue in a proceeding". The order is discretionary. Although the rule provides that the court "may authorize entry on or into any property in the possession of a party or of a person not a party", and r. 45.01(2) permits the court to order the property to be sold in such manner and on such terms as are just, there are no criteria prescribed by the rule for the exercise of the court's discretion under r. 45.01 and there is no limitation on the terms and conditions that can be imposed.

[40] Rule 45.01 is available in a wide variety of circumstances in which interim preservation of property may be sought. The court, in considering whether to make such an order and on what terms, will take into consideration the evidence on the motion and make the order that best responds to the circumstances. The only precondition for preservation or custody is that the property is "in question in a proceeding or relevant to an issue in a proceeding". As I will explain, it is inappropriate to attempt to prescribe and apply a single test (such as that set out in Taribo or a derivation of such test) to all r. 45.01 motions.

[41] In some cases a r. 45.01 motion will seek to preserve the very property the plaintiff or applicant is pursuing in its litigation. In Taribo, for example, the litigation involved a dispute about shares that former employees of the respondent corporation had tendered in consideration for a reduction of their obligations under promissory notes. The shares were pledged and deposited with a third party. The moving parties' motion for an interim preservation order sought what was essentially a form of injunctive relief – to prevent the corporate respondent from having the shares released from deposit to it and then converting or cancelling the shares.

[42] The motion judge in Taribo articulated and applied a three-part test requiring that: (1) the assets sought to be preserved constitute the very subject matter of the dispute; (2) there is a serious issue to be tried regarding the plaintiff's claim to that asset; and (3) the balance of convenience favours granting the relief sought by the applicant or moving party. She relied on two cases involving r. 45.02, which provides that where the right of a party to a specific fund is in question, the court may order the fund to be paid into court or otherwise secured on such terms as are just: News Canada Marketing Inc. v. TD Evergreen, [2000] O.J. No. 3705 (S.C.); Sun v. Ho (1998), 18 C.P.C. (4th) 363 (Ont. Gen. Div.). The Taribo test has been applied in other cases involving r. 45.01 where the moving party is seeking to preserve property that it seeks to recover in the litigation: see e.g., Progressive Moulded Products Ltd. v. Great American Group, 2007 CanLII 12205 (Ont. S.C.); Meade v. Nelson Resources Limited (2005), 2005 CanLII 44818 (ON SC), 14 B.L.R. (4th) 244 (Ont. S.C.).

[43] I accept that the Taribo three-part test is appropriate where a r. 45.01 motion is brought to preserve property that the moving party is claiming in its litigation. In such cases, the moving party seeks to limit or constrain what the responding party may do with property that is in its possession, and to preserve the property for the benefit of its claim. Factors such as whether the property is unique and whether damages claimed in the alternative would be an adequate remedy are also relevant and can fit within the "balance of convenience" analysis: see Auto Enterprise Ltd. v. Oakville Motors Sales & Leasing Inc., [1995] O.J. No. 716 (Gen. Div.), at paras. 10-14. And, where an interim preservation order would "tilt the scales in favour of a plaintiff on the basis of unproven allegations" the court must exercise caution before making such an order: see Stearns v. Scocchia (2002), 27 C.P.C. (5th) 339 (Ont. S.C.) involving a motion under r. 45.02.

[44] While the Taribo test is appropriate for r. 45.01 motions where the moving party claims an interest in property, or for r. 45.02 motions where the claim is to a specific fund, it is not required to be applied or adapted for all motions for interim preservation of property. This is apparent from the wording of the rule itself. Rule 45.01(1) authorizes the court to make an order for entry into any property, including the property of third parties, for the purpose of an interim order under the rule. Likewise, r. 45.01(2) permits the court to order the sale of property. The test articulated in Taribo, even as modified by the Divisional Court, would be insufficient and would not account for the range of factors that would need to be considered where entry into property, third party interests, or sale of property arises in a r. 45.01 motion.

[45] Similarly, a Taribo-type test focussing on "serious issue to be tried" and "balance of convenience" is neither necessary nor appropriate in a case like the present, where the r. 45.01 motion sought to preserve evidence to permit inspection. In my view, the overall consideration in such motions is to make an order that is consistent with a fair litigation process. In making or refusing the order, and in establishing terms, the court should have regard to the issues in dispute in the litigation, the relevance and materiality of the property as evidence, the purpose for which interim preservation is sought and its proposed duration (whether for the entirety of the proceeding or for an interim period to permit the evidence to be documented, inspected, tested, and the like), and the benefits and harm or prejudice to the interests of each party in the litigation.

(b) Is There a Prima Facie Obligation to Preserve Evidence?

[46] The parties joined issue in the courts below and in this appeal on whether there is a prima facie obligation in all cases to preserve property that is the subject matter of litigation, or more narrowly, to preserve evidence for trial. It is unnecessary to determine that issue in this appeal. First, any attempt to delineate the scope of such a rule would be met by a range of factors, which could be characterized as exceptions to or limitations on such a rule, such as considerations of the importance of the evidence to the proceeding, the perishability of the property, the feasibility of its preservation, and the like. Second, the determination of the relatively narrow issue on the r. 45.01 motion in this case and accordingly on appeal would not turn on any such obligation or presumption. Autoport seeks interim preservation of the vehicles for a limited time and purpose, and BMW characterizes the question as simply one of cost.

[47] While it is unnecessary to determine whether there is a prima facie obligation to preserve evidence, and its scope, I do not agree with the Divisional Court's unqualified rejection of the duty of litigants to preserve evidence, and BMW's assertion in this court that parties must be free to deal with their property as they see fit. The principle advanced by BMW, articulated so broadly, would apply whether or not the property is evidence and whether or not its temporary preservation or pre-trial destruction would affect trial fairness.

[48] The courts have long recognized the doctrine of spoliation of evidence: see McDougall v. Black & Decker Canada Inc., 2008 ABCA 353, 302 D.L.R. (4th) 661 for a useful summary of the case law and principles. Underlying the doctrine is the trial fairness principle that parties to litigation are expected not to destroy important evidence, at least until the opposing party has had a fair opportunity to examine that evidence. The remedies are informed by considerations of trial fairness: the imposition at trial of a rebuttable presumption of fact that the missing evidence, had it been preserved, would have been unfavourable to the party who destroyed it, and other possible remedies to "level the playing field", such as the exclusion of expert reports: see Gutbir v. University Health Network, 2010 ONSC 6752, at para. 13; McDougall, at paras. 18, 29; Stilwell v. World Kitchen Inc., 2013 ONSC 3354, 47 C.P.C. (7th) 345, at para. 55; and Endean v. Canadian Red Cross Society (1998), 1998 CanLII 6489 (BC CA), 157 D.L.R. (4th) 465 (B.C.C.A.), at para. 32, leave to appeal granted but appeal discontinued, [1998] S.C.C.A. No. 260. The debate in the cases about whether there is a standalone tort of spoliation, and whether remedies are available for negligent spoliation (the cases are summarized at paras. 19 to 22 of McDougall), does not undermine the animating principle: that the destruction of evidence can be harmful to trial fairness.

[49] Rule 45.01 permits the court to address trial fairness concerns that would arise if property constituting evidence were to be destroyed prior to its destruction, and so avoid the kind of harm in the litigation process that spoliation remedies address.

(2) Application of the Considerations of Trial Fairness to This Case

[50] As I have already observed, it is not appropriate to apply the Taribo test, or a derivation of that test, to the motion that underlies this appeal. The focus here should have been on trial fairness – that is, on the parties' ability to prosecute and defend the proceeding, and ought to have considered the relevant factors, including the nature of the property and its materiality to the issues in the litigation, as well as the purpose of the preservation order and its proposed duration. In considering the r. 45.01 motion the court ought to have attempted to craft an order that was based on and responsive to the evidence before it on the motion.

[51] I agree with the appellant that the Master erred in concluding that she had to apply the Taribo test and that the balance of convenience in determining who should bear the cost of interim preservation of the vehicles favoured BMW. The Master considered only the cost of continued storage of the vehicles and Autoport's delay in inspecting when she concluded that the balance of convenience clearly favoured BMW: at para. 26. The Master referred to the fact that BMW had repeatedly offered to relinquish possession or custody of the vehicles to Autoport, and she concluded that it was manifestly unfair to require BMW to continue to bear the financial burden of storage when Autoport wanted preservation of the vehicles, but was unwilling to take possession of them. In arriving at this conclusion the Master failed to consider Autoport's evidence that it

REASONS ON RULE 30.10 MOTION FOR PRODUCTION OF RECORDS HELD BY TRIBUNALS ONTARIO

INTRODUCTION

[1] The Plaintiff, Lucia Derenzis, brings a motion pursuant to Rule 30.10 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, for production of records held by the License Appeal Tribunal ("LAT"). The records include adjudicators' notes and draft decisions (the "notes and drafts"), and more than 400 emails between adjudicators, counsel and staff (the "emails"). The LAT created the records during its administration of Derenzis' applications against her insurance company, Gore Mutual Insurance Company ("the Insurer").

[2] Because the records contain her personal information, Derenzis first requested them from the LAT directly. The LAT refused to provide them, asserting deliberative secrecy and solicitor-client privilege. Derenzis appealed the LAT's refusal to the Information and Privacy Commissioner for Ontario ("IPCO"). The LAT would not disclose the records to the IPCO for their review. While the IPCO refused to order release of the notes and drafts, it found that there was "insufficient evidence" to determine whether the emails were also subject to deliberative secrecy. The IPCO ordered the LAT "to issue an access decision" with respect to the emails. In its access decision, the LAT again refused to release the records to Derenzis. The IPCO's decision is now under review by the Divisional Court.

[3] Derenzis now appears before this court. She asks me to order Tribunals Ontario ("the Tribunal") to produce the records because they are relevant and necessary to her constitutional challenge to Ontario's no-fault auto insurance scheme, and because there are valid reasons for believing that the LAT did not comply with the rules of natural justice when administering her applications.

[4] The Tribunal opposes any production order: it says that the records are irrelevant to the claim and, in the alternative, that they are protected by deliberative secrecy and/or solicitor-client privilege. It says that I should not lift the veil of secrecy because the LAT complied with natural justice in administering her claim.

[5] Having carefully reviewed the records, I order the Tribunal to produce them to Derenzis, save and except those that I have determined are protected by solicitor-client privilege. The records are relevant to the constitutional challenge, and they are necessary because whether the LAT is sufficiently independent is a central issue in the litigation.

[6] While some records are protected by deliberative secrecy, the secrecy must give way on these facts because Derenzis has demonstrated concerns about a breach of natural justice. It is uncontroversial that two successive executive chairs of the Tribunal have directly intervened three times in Derenzis' applications to the LAT: first, to recuse a three-person panel for the appearance of bias; then, to recuse a panel member because she had been on the first three-person panel; and, most recently, to personally complain about plaintiff's counsel to the Law Society of Ontario.

OVERVIEW

[7] It is undisputed that Derenzis suffered catastrophic injuries after a truck ran her down on November 24, 2015. Pursuant to the Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule ("the Schedule"), Derenzis claimed statutory accident benefits from the Insurer ("the benefits"), while also suing the driver of the truck for damages (CV-16-00001766-0000).

[8] Derenzis' applied to the LAT three times for relief against her Insurer about her benefits eligibility and coverage. Derenzis was roundly unsuccessful at the LAT and her applications are now mired in multiple appeals to the Divisional Court.

[9] In this action (CV-19-00004487-0000), Derenzis seeks general and punitive damages totaling over ten million dollars against the Insurer amongst others. She alleges that the Insurer and its sub-contractors intentionally caused her emotional distress by requiring her to attend repeated medical examinations and through aggressive public surveillance of her and her family.

[10] The Insurer says that this Court does not have jurisdiction over the substance of the claim: Yang v. Co-operators General Insurance Company, 2022 ONCA 178, at para. 7. Indeed, it is well-established that the LAT has exclusive jurisdiction over all matters related to the nature and extent of the insurer's obligations under the Schedule, including any alleged efforts to circumvent them: Yang, at paras. 4-7, referring to Stegenga v. Economical Mutual Insurance Co., 2019 ONCA 615. At the same time, the LAT has interpreted its own enabling legislation to find that it does not have jurisdiction to award damages for torts or breach of contract: Gilani v. Travelers Insurance Company of Canada, 2022 ONLAT 19-009248/AABS.

[11] To get around these jurisdictional hurdles, as part of her civil claim, Derenzis asks me to declare sections 280 and 267.5 of the Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.8 unconstitutional ("the impugned provisions"). The impugned provisions form the backbone of Ontario's no-fault auto insurance scheme. They give the LAT exclusive jurisdiction over all aspects of disputes about how an insurer handles claims made pursuant to the Schedule. Derenzis says that the impugned provisions are invalid because they create a statutory bar on damage claims related to the administration of the benefits, and delegate adjudication of insurance contracts to an inferior tribunal that lacks independence (i.e., the LAT). Ontario is named as a defendant to respond to the constitutional issues but does not take a position on this motion.

[12] Derenzis now asks me to order the Tribunal to produce all the records in its possession that are relevant and necessary to her constitutional challenge.

[13] The Tribunal opposes the motion on behalf of the LAT. The Tribunal claims deliberative secrecy over all the records because they "may enclose a draft decision or direction, may reveal the adjudicator's procedural or substantive decisions or directions, and may reveal how adjudicators are assigned to files." The Tribunal claims solicitor-client privilege over the records where the adjudicator seeks advice from counsel or where counsel provides advice to the adjudicator, as well as staff communications that reveal legal advice sought or received.

[14] The parties agree that the law on a Rule 30.10 motion is set out in Ontario (Attorney General) v. Stavro (1995), 26 O.R. (3d) 39, 1995 CanLII 3509 (C.A.), and that I could review the records for the purposes of determining the motion.

[15] To decide this motion, I must answer the following questions:

- Are the records relevant to the constitutional challenge?
- Are the records necessary for a fair hearing of the constitutional application?
- Are the records protected by deliberative secrecy? If so, should the secrecy be lifted because Derenzis has demonstrated concerns about a breach of natural justice?
- Are any of the records protected by solicitor-client privilege?

[16] The LAT is a provincial administrative tribunal whose decision-makers have adjudicative independence but whose associate chair is accountable for the LAT's administration to the executive chair of the Tribunal. The executive chair is responsible for ensuring that all provincial administrative tribunals—including the LAT—are accountable, transparent, and efficient, while maintaining the independence of their decision-making: Adjudicative Tribunals Accountability, Governance and Appointments Act, 2009, S.O. 2009, c. 33, Sched. 5, s. 1 & 16(1).

[17] The Tribunal says that the records were all produced as part of the LAT's day-to-day administration of Derenzis' applications. The Tribunal provided an affidavit outlining the steps in the LAT application process:

- Step 1: Upon receipt, the application is uploaded to the case management portal by staff.
- Step 2: The staff team lead assigns a case management officer to assess the file and take the administrative steps necessary to implement the procedural directions given by the adjudicator.
- Step 3: The associate chair (or their delegate vice-chair) assigns an adjudicator to conduct a case conference; assignments are based on the nature of the proceedings, the legal issues involved, the size and composition of the hearing panel, adjudicator expertise, and adjudicator availability.
- Step 4: If settlement is not achieved at the case conference, the case management adjudicator, with assistance of staff, manages the next procedural steps in the application, including scheduling motions.

- Step 5: The associate chair (or their delegate vice-chair) assigns an adjudicator or panel of adjudicators to conduct the merits hearing ("merits adjudicator").

- Step 6: The merits adjudicator may direct staff to release final or interim decisions.

[18] The LAT's affiant did not provide details about how the associate chair is accountable to the executive chair of the Tribunal.

Are the records relevant to the constitutional application?

[19] It is uncontroversial that the constitutional application is a material issue in the trial. The only issue at this stage is whether the records are relevant to the constitutional challenge—meaning, do they make it more or less likely that a fact in issue is true.

[20] The pleadings in the action frame the relevance analysis. Derenzis pleads her constitutional claim in her Second As Amended Statement of Claim in two main ways. First, she alleges that the impugned provisions extinguish her common law rights to seek damages in tort, equity, and contract—without monetary limits—contrary to s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Second, she pleads that he impugned provisions provide an inferior tribunal that lacks adjudicative independence (i.e. the LAT) with exclusive jurisdiction to decide disputes, and that this has a disproportionate negative impact on the disabled people, contrary to ss. 7 & 15 of the Charter. Ontario has not moved to strike the constitutional application and has agreed that it should be heard on its merits.

[21] Leaving aside the merits of the Plaintiff's claim, it is clear from the pleadings that a key factual issue in dispute is whether the LAT lacks adjudicative independence. The records are relevant to that issue because they are directly related to the adjudicative and administrative processing of her claim by the LAT, including the interactions between adjudicators, counsel, staff, and associate, vice, and executive chairs. While the records may not be especially probative or even admissible at trial, that does not matter on a Rule 30.10 motion where the only question is relevance.

Are the records necessary for a fair hearing of the constitutional application?

[22] Having found that the records are relevant, I must go on the consider whether disclosure is necessary for a fair hearing of the constitutional application: Ontario v. Stavro.

[23] I find that it is. It is uncontroversial that Charter challenges cannot proceed in a factual vacuum and must be proven through evidence rather than speculation and conjecture. This is certainly the case here where Derenzis seeks to challenge legislation that creates Ontario's no fault auto insurance scheme: *Campisi v. Ontario (AG),*2017 ONSC 2884, at para. 15; aff'd 2018 ONCA 869.

[24] Meanwhile, the records cannot be obtained in any other way because the LAT has already refused Derenzis' freedom of information request. Suffice it to say, the Tribunal is not a typical third-party to this litigation: its actions lay at the heart of the constitutional challenge, its interests are the same as those of Ontario (they are accountable to the same Minister), and there is no contravening privacy interest in the documents.

Are the records protected by deliberative secrecy? If so, should the secrecy be lifted because Derenzis' has demonstrated concerns about a breach of natural justice?

[25] The LAT says that all the records are protected by deliberative secrecy. In addition to the adjudicator's draft and notes, the LAT says that the emails may reveal the adjudicator's procedural or substantive decisions or directions, and may reveal how adjudicators are assigned to files.

[26] Justice Nishikawa succinctly set out the law in Grogan v. Ontario College of Teachers, 2023 ONSC 2980, paras. 16-18. Deliberative secrecy is a core component of administrative independence: it promotes the finality of decision by preventing disclosure of how and why decision-makers reached their decisions, while also creating a zone of secrecy in which decision-makers can engage in collegial debate and seek appropriate feedback with the goal of ensuring consistency.

[27] Deliberative secrecy is not watertight in the administrative context because there is an inherent tension between secrecy and the fundamental right to know that the decision was made in accordance with the principles of natural justice. That is why the secrecy is interpreted more narrowly to only attach to matters that lie at the heart of the exercise of judgement or the deliberative process: Tremblay v. Quebec (Commission des affaires sociales), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 952, 1992 CanLII 1135.

[28] I start with the emails before turning to the notes and drafts. Based on my review, the emails fall into three broad categories. The first and largest category of emails are administrative communications about the management of Derenzis' applications before the LAT (the "administrative emails"). The administrative emails deal with day-to-day case management like receipt and distribution of application materials, receipt and response to routine communications, confirmation of procedural steps, internal tracking, and scheduling. The administrative emails are not protected by deliberative secrecy because there is nothing deliberative about them—they do not relate to the decision-making process in any way.

[29] The second category of emails are communications about adjudicator assignments and schedules ("scheduling emails"). In Mackeigan v. Hickman, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 796, 1989 CanLII 40, the Supreme Court reiterated the importance of courts having control over the assignment of judges without interference from the legislature or executive. This reasoning applies with equal force to administrative tribunals as far as it would be unthinkable for Ontario's Attorney General to instruct the LAT's associate chair to assign a particular adjudicator to a particular application. However, deliberative secrecy does not extend to the scheduling emails because they relate to scheduling and not decision-making. They have little to do with the associate chair applying his discretion to determine which members to assign to which files. Again, the substance of the scheduling emails is administrative; they are not protected by deliberative secrecy.

[30] The third category of emails are those that relate to or otherwise might reveal deliberations by adjudicators or the substantive decision-making processes employed by the LAT ("deliberative emails"). The deliberative emails shed light on the nature and extent to which adjudicators engage with other adjudicators, counsel, and staff as part of their decision-making process on both procedural and substantive matters. The deliberative emails are prima facie protected by deliberative secrecy because they relate to the process by which adjudicators arrived at both procedural and substantive decisions.

[31] Beyond the emails, the Tribunal claims deliberative secrecy over the notes and drafts. Most the notes and drafts fall within the core of the type of communications that are meant to be protected by deliberative secrecy. They include communications that go to the substance of the decision-making process, including what material was considered or not considered by the adjudicator, the legal advice that was requested or received, and the extent to which the adjudicator was influenced by the views of others: Agnew v. Ontario Association of Architects (1987), 1987 CanLII 4030 (ON SC), 64 O.R. (2d) 8 (Ont. Div. Ct.), at pp. 16-17.

[32] That all being said, administrative tribunals cannot rely on deliberative secrecy to the same extent as courts. The secrecy may be lifted where the litigant can present "valid reasons for believing that the process followed did not comply with the rules of natural justice": Commission scolaire de Laval v. Syndicat de l'enseignement de la region de Laval, 2016 SCC 8, at para. 58.

[33] Here, Derenzis says that I should order to lift the secrecy over the deliberative emails and the notes and drafts because she has presented valid reasons for believing that the process followed by the LAT did not comply with the rules of natural justice.

[34] I find that Derenzis has met her onus in this regard. To support my finding, I rely on three uncontroversial facts about Derenzis' applications before the LAT, that:

- On May 18, 2018, the executive chair recused a LAT panel assigned to hear the Derenzis matter after one of the adjudicator's told the parties that he had to take instructions from his "client."

- On May 1, 2019, the executive chair recused a LAT adjudicator from hearing a Derenzis matter because she had been on the LAT panel that had been recused in 2018.

- On January 24, 2025, the executive chair filed a complaint to the Law Society of Ontario against one of the Derenzis' lawyers based on materials that the lawyer filed at the LAT on her behalf.

[35] These facts alone raise concerns about the independence of LAT adjudicators, and whether their process complied with natural justice as it relates to Derenzis' applications. My concerns are amplified by the Court of Appeal's finding that the LAT's internal review process lacked sufficient independence during the same time frame as Derenzis' applications and under the same executive leadership: Shuttleworth v. License Appeal Tribunal, 2018 ONSC 3790, aff'd 2019 ONCA 518.

[36] I would order the LAT to produce the records save and except those protected by solicitor-client privilege. I turn to the privilege claim next.

Are any of the records protected by solicitor-client privilege?

[37] The LAT claims privilege over emails involving counsel who provide legal advice, provide comments on draft decisions when requested, and assist in the finalizing and publication of decisions.

[38] Because LAT counsel provides both legal and non-legal services, I must consider whether counsel's advice in each communication is such that it can be properly characterized as privileged: Pritchard v. Ontario (Human Rights Commission), 2004 SCC 31, at paras. 19-20.

[39] Solicitor-client privilege applies to communications between solicitor and client, which entails the giving of legal advice, and which are intended to be confidential by the parties. It is meant to create a zone of privacy where the client is able to speak freely with counsel to obtain their advice. In Pritchard, the Supreme Court found, for example, that staff counsel's legal opinion to the commission was protected by solicitor-client privilege, at para. 28. Once established, solicitor-client privilege is nearly absolute.

[40] The Tribunal claims solicitor-client privilege over nearly seventy emails, which include communications involving counsel, law clerks, staff, adjudicators, and larger staff teams. Having reviewed the emails, I find that some of them are properly considered privileged insofar as they relate to the request for and receipt of legal advice. However, many emails are not related to legal advice at all because they are administrative; they relate to the internal processing of Derenzis' application by the LAT and cannot be properly characterized as related to legal advice.

[41] Using the numbering found in the chart at Exhibit EE to the Tribunal's affidavit, I find that only the following emails are protected by solicitor-client privilege: 6, 7, 10, 17, 18, 20, 34, 36, 38, 43, 49, 52, 55, 56, 82, 85, 87, 148, 349-351, 353, 354.

[42] Using the LAT's document naming convention, I find that the following notes and drafts also protected by solicitor-client privilege because they involve legal advice:

ON APPEAL FROM THE FEDERAL COURT OF APPEAL

Administrative law — Judicial review — Standard of review — Proper approach to judicial review of administrative decisions — Proper approach to reasonableness review.

Citizenship — Canadian citizens — Registrar of Citizenship cancelling certificate of Canadian citizenship issued to Canadian-born son of parents later revealed to be Russian spies — Decision of Registrar based on interpretation of statutory exception to general rule that person born in Canada is Canadian citizen — Exception stating that Canadian-born child is not citizen if either parent was representative or employee in Canada of foreign government at time of child's birth — Whether Registrar's decision to cancel certificate of citizenship was reasonable — Citizenship Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-29, s. 3(2)(a).

V was born in Toronto in 1994. At the time of his birth, his parents were posing as Canadians under assumed names. In reality, they were foreign nationals working on assignment for the Russian foreign intelligence service. V did not know that his parents were not who they claimed to be. He believed that he was a Canadian citizen by birth, he lived and identified as a Canadian, and he held a Canadian passport. In 2010, V's parents were arrested in the United States and charged with espionage. They pled guilty and were returned to Russia. Following their arrest, V's attempts to renew his Canadian passport proved unsuccessful. However, in 2013, he was issued a certificate of Canadian citizenship.

Then, in 2014, the Canadian Registrar of Citizenship cancelled V's certificate on the basis of her interpretation of s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act. This provision exempts children of "a diplomatic or consular officer or other representative or employee in Canada of a foreign government" from the general rule that individuals born in Canada acquire Canadian citizenship by birth. The Registrar concluded that because V's parents were employees or representatives of Russia at the time of V's birth, the exception to the rule of citizenship by birth in s. 3(2)(a), as she interpreted it, applied to V, who therefore was not, and had never been, entitled to citizenship. V's application for judicial review of the Registrar's decision was dismissed by the Federal Court. The Court of Appeal allowed V's appeal and quashed the Registrar's decision because it was unreasonable. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration appeals.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Wagner C.J. and Moldaver, Gascon, Côté, Brown, Rowe and Martin JJ.: The Registrar's decision to cancel V's certificate of citizenship was unreasonable, and the Court of Appeal's decision to quash it should be upheld. It was not reasonable for the Registrar to interpret s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act as applying to children of individuals who have not been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities at the time of the children's birth.

More generally, this appeal and its companion cases (Bell Canada v. Canada (Attorney General), 2019 SCC 66, [2019] 4 S.C.R. 845) provide an opportunity to consider and clarify the law applicable to the judicial review of administrative decisions as addressed in Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190, and subsequent cases. The submissions presented to the Court have highlighted two aspects of the current framework which need clarification. The first aspect is the analysis for determining the standard of review. The second aspect is the need for better guidance from this Court on the proper application of the reasonableness standard.

It has become clear that Dunsmuir's promise of simplicity and predictability has not been fully realized. Certain aspects of the current standard of review framework are unclear and unduly complex. The former contextual analysis has proven to be unwieldy and offers limited practical guidance for courts attempting to determine the standard of review. The practical effect is that courts struggle in conducting the analysis, and debates surrounding the appropriate standard and its application continue to overshadow the review on the merits, thereby undermining access to justice. A reconsideration of the Court's approach is therefore necessary in order to bring greater coherence and predictability to this area of law. A revised framework to determine the standard of review where a court reviews the merits of an administrative decision is needed.

In setting out a revised framework, this decision departs from the Court's existing jurisprudence on standard of review in certain respects. Any reconsideration of past precedents can be justified only by compelling circumstances and requires carefully weighing the impact on legal certainty and predictability against the costs of continuing to follow a flawed approach. Although adhering to the established jurisprudence will generally promote certainty and predictability, in some instances doing so will create or perpetuate uncertainty. In such circumstances, following a prior decision would be contrary to the underlying values of clarity and certainty in the law.

The revised standard of review analysis begins with a presumption that reasonableness is the applicable standard in all cases. Where a legislature has created an administrative decision maker for the specific purpose of administering a statutory scheme, it must be presumed that the legislature also intended that decision maker to fulfill its mandate and interpret the law applicable to all issues that come before it. Where a legislature has not explicitly provided that a court is to have a more involved role in reviewing the decisions of that decision maker, it can safely be assumed that the legislature intended a minimum of judicial interference. Respect for these institutional design choices requires a reviewing court to adopt a posture of restraint. Thus, whenever a court reviews an administrative decision, it should start with the presumption that the applicable standard of review for all aspects of that decision will be reasonableness. As a result, it is no longer necessary for courts to engage in a contextual inquiry in order to identify the appropriate standard. Conclusively closing the door on the application of a contextual analysis to determine the applicable standard streamlines and simplifies the standard of review framework. As well, with the presumptive application of the reasonableness standard, the relative expertise of administrative decision makers is no longer relevant to a determination of the standard of review. It is simply folded into the new starting point. Relative expertise remains, however, a relevant consideration in conducting reasonableness review.

The presumption of reasonableness review can be rebutted in two types of situations. The first is where the legislature has indicated that it intends a different standard to apply. This will be the case where it has explicitly prescribed the applicable standard of review. Any framework rooted in legislative intent must respect clear statutory language. The legislature may also direct that derogation from the presumption is appropriate by providing for a statutory appeal mechanism from an administrative decision to a court, thereby signalling the legislature's intent that appellate standards apply when a court reviews the decision. Where a legislature has provided a statutory appeal mechanism, it has subjected the administrative regime to appellate oversight and it expects the court to scrutinize such administrative decisions on an appellate basis. The applicable standard is therefore to be determined with reference to the nature of the question and to the jurisprudence on appellate standards of review. Where, for example, a court hears an appeal from an administrative decision, it would apply the standard of correctness to questions of law, including on statutory interpretation and the scope of a decision maker's authority. Where the scope of the statutory appeal includes questions of fact or questions of mixed fact and law, the standard is palpable and overriding error for such questions.

Giving effect to statutory appeal mechanisms in this way departs from the Court's recent jurisprudence. This shift is necessary in order to bring coherence and conceptual balance to the standard of review analysis and is justified by weighing the values of certainty and correctness. First, there has been significant and valid judicial and academic criticism of the Court's recent approach to statutory appeal rights and of the inconsistency inherent in a standard of review framework based on legislative intent that otherwise declines to give meaning to an express statutory right of appeal. Second, there is no satisfactory justification for the recent trend in the Court's jurisprudence to give no effect to statutory rights of appeal in the standard of review analysis, absent exceptional wording. More generally, there is no convincing reason to presume that legislatures mean something entirely different when they use the word "appeal" in an administrative law statute. Accepting that the legislature intends an appellate standard of review to be applied also helps to explain why many statutes provide for both appeal and judicial review mechanisms, thereby indicating two roles for reviewing courts. Finally, because the presumption of reasonableness review is no longer premised upon notions of relative expertise and is now based on respect for the legislature's institutional design choice, departing from the presumption of reasonableness review in the context of a statutory appeal respects this legislative choice.

The second situation in which the presumption of reasonableness review will be rebutted is where the rule of law requires that the standard of correctness be applied. This will be the case for certain categories of legal questions, namely constitutional questions, general questions of law of central importance to the legal system as a whole and questions related to the jurisdictional boundaries between two or more administrative bodies. First, questions regarding the division of powers between Parliament and the provinces, the relationship between the legislature and the other branches of the state, the scope of Aboriginal and treaty rights under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, and other constitutional matters require a final and determinate answer from the courts. Second, the rule of law requires courts to have the final word with regard to general questions of law that are of central importance to the legal system as a whole because they require uniform and consistent answers. Third, the rule of law requires courts to intervene where one administrative body has interpreted the scope of its authority in a manner that is incompatible with the jurisdiction of another since the rule of law cannot tolerate conflicting orders and proceedings where they result in a true operational conflict between two administrative bodies. The application of the correctness standard for such questions therefore respects the unique role of the judiciary in interpreting the Constitution and ensures that courts are able to provide the last word on questions for which the rule of law requires consistency and for which a final and determinate answer is necessary.

The general rule of reasonableness review, when coupled with these limited exceptions, offers a comprehensive approach to determining the applicable standard of review. The possibility that another category could be recognized as requiring a derogation from the presumption of reasonableness review in a future case is not definitively foreclosed. However, any new basis for correctness review would be exceptional and would need to be consistent with this framework and the overarching principles set out in this decision. Any new correctness category based on legislative intent would require a signal of legislative intent as strong and compelling as a legislated standard of review or a statutory appeal mechanism. Similarly, a new correctness category based on the rule of law would be justified only where failure to apply correctness review would undermine the rule of law and jeopardize the proper functioning of the justice system in a manner analogous to the three situations described in this decision.

For example, the Court is not persuaded that it should recognize a distinct correctness category for legal questions on which there is persistent discord within an administrative body. A lack of unanimity within an administrative tribunal is the price to pay for decision-making freedom and independence. While discord can lead to legal incoherence, a more robust form of reasonableness review is capable of guarding against such threats to the rule of law. As well, jurisdictional questions should no longer be recognized as a distinct category subject to correctness review; there are no clear markers to distinguish such questions from other questions related to interpreting an administrative decision maker's enabling statute. A proper application of the reasonableness standard will enable courts to ensure that administrative bodies have acted within the scope of their lawful authority without having to conduct a preliminary assessment on jurisdictional issues and without having to apply the correctness standard.

Going forward, a court seeking to determine what standard of review is appropriate should look to this decision first in order to determine how the general framework applies. Doing so may require the court to resolve subsidiary questions on which past precedents will often continue to provide helpful guidance and will continue to apply essentially without modification, such as cases concerning general questions of law of central importance to the legal system as a whole or those relating to jurisdictional boundaries between administrative bodies. On other issues, such as the effect of statutory appeal mechanisms, true questions of jurisdiction or the former contextual analysis, certain cases will necessarily have less precedential force.

There is also a need for better guidance from the Court on the proper application of the reasonableness standard, what that standard entails and how it should be applied in practice. Reasonableness review is meant to ensure that courts intervene in administrative matters only where it is truly necessary to do so in order to safeguard the legality, rationality and fairness of the administrative process. Its starting point lies in the principle of judicial restraint and in demonstrating respect for the distinct role of administrative decision makers. However, it is not a "rubber-stamping" process or a means of sheltering decision makers from accountability. While courts must recognize the legitimacy and authority of administrative decision makers and adopt a posture of respect, administrative decision makers must adopt a culture of justification and demonstrate that their exercise of delegated public power can be justified. In conducting reasonableness review, a court must consider the outcome of the administrative decision in light of its underlying rationale, to ensure that the decision as a whole is transparent, intelligible and justified. Judicial review is concerned with both the outcome of the decision and the reasoning process that led to that outcome. To accept otherwise would undermine, rather than demonstrate respect toward, the institutional role of the administrative decision maker.

Reasonableness review is methodologically distinct from correctness review. The court conducting a reasonableness review must focus on the decision the administrative decision maker actually made, including the justification offered for it. A court applying the reasonableness standard does not ask what decision it would have made in place of the administrative decision maker, attempt to ascertain the range of possible conclusions, conduct a new analysis or seek to determine the correct solution to the problem. Instead, the reviewing court must consider only whether the decision made by the decision maker, including both the rationale for the decision and the outcome to which it led, was unreasonable.

In cases where reasons are required, they are the starting point for reasonableness review, as they are the primary mechanism by which decision makers show that their decisions are reasonable. Reasons are the means by which the decision maker communicates the rationale for its decision: they explain how and why a decision was made, help to show affected parties that their arguments have been considered and that the decision was made in a fair and lawful manner, and shield against arbitrariness. A principled approach to reasonableness review is therefore one which puts those reasons first. This enables a reviewing court to assess whether the decision as a whole is reasonable. Attention to the decision maker's reasons is part of how courts demonstrate respect for the decision-making process.

In many cases, formal reasons for a decision will not be given or required. Even without reasons, it is possible for the record and the context to reveal that a decision was made on the basis of an improper motive or for another impermissible reason. There will nonetheless be situations in which neither the record nor the larger context sheds light on the basis for the decision. In such cases, the reviewing court must still examine the decision in light of the relevant factual and legal constraints on the decision maker in order to determine whether the decision is reasonable.

It is conceptually useful to consider two types of fundamental flaws that tend to render a decision unreasonable. The first is a failure of rationality internal to the reasoning process. To be reasonable, a decision must be based on an internally coherent reasoning that is both rational and logical. A failure in this respect may lead a reviewing court to conclude that a decision must be set aside. Reasonableness review is not a line-by-line treasure hunt for error. However, the reviewing court must be able to trace the decision maker's reasoning without encountering any fatal flaws in its overarching logic. Because formal reasons should be read in light of the record and with due sensitivity to the administrative regime in which they were given, a decision will be unreasonable if the reasons for it, read holistically, fail to reveal a rational chain of analysis or if they reveal that the decision was based on an irrational chain of analysis. A decision will also be unreasonable where the conclusion reached cannot follow from the analysis undertaken or if the reasons read in conjunction with the record do not make it possible to understand the decision maker's reasoning on a critical point. Similarly, the internal rationality of a decision may be called into question if the reasons exhibit clear logical fallacies.

The second type of fundamental flaw arises when a decision is in some respect untenable in light of the relevant factual and legal constraints that bear on it. Although reasonableness is a single standard that already accounts for context, and elements of a decision's context should not modulate the standard or the degree of scrutiny by the reviewing court, what is reasonable in a given situation will always depend on the constraints imposed by the legal and factual context of the particular decision under review. These contextual constraints dictate the limits and contours of the space in which the decision maker may act and the types of solutions it may adopt. The governing statutory scheme, other relevant statutory or common law, the principles of statutory interpretation, the evidence before the decision maker and facts of which the decision maker may take notice, the submissions of the parties, the past practices and decisions of the administrative body, and the potential impact of the decision on the individual to whom it applies, are all elements that will generally be relevant in evaluating whether a given decision is reasonable. Such elements are not a checklist; they may vary in significance depending on the context and will necessarily interact with one another.

Accordingly, a reviewing court may find that a decision is unreasonable when examined against these contextual considerations. Because administrative decision makers receive their powers by statute, the governing statutory scheme is likely to be the most salient aspect of the legal context relevant to a particular decision. A proper application of the reasonableness standard is capable of allaying the concern that an administrative decision maker might interpret the scope of its own authority beyond what the legislature intended. Whether an interpretation is justified will depend on the context, including the language chosen by the legislature in describing the limits and contours of the decision maker's authority.

Both statutory and common law will also impose constraints on how and what an administrative decision maker can lawfully decide. Any precedents on the issue before the administrative decision maker or on a similar issue, as well as international law in some administrative decision making contexts, will act as a constraint on what the decision maker can reasonably decide. Whether an administrative decision maker has acted reasonably in adapting a legal or equitable doctrine involves a highly context-specific determination.

Matters of statutory interpretation are not treated uniquely and, as with other questions of law, may be evaluated on a reasonableness standard. Where this is the applicable standard, the reviewing court does not undertake a de novo analysis of the question or ask itself what the correct decision would have been. But an approach to reasonableness review that respects legislative intent must assume that those who interpret the law, whether courts or administrative decision makers, will do so in a manner consistent with the modern principle of statutory interpretation. Administrative decision makers are not required to engage in a formalistic statutory interpretation exercise in every case. But whatever form the interpretive exercise takes, the merits of an administrative decision maker's interpretation of a statutory provision must be consistent with the text, context and purpose of the provision.

Furthermore, the decision maker must take the evidentiary record and the general factual matrix that bears on its decision into account, and its decision must be reasonable in light of them. The reasonableness of a decision may be jeopardized where the decision maker has fundamentally misapprehended or failed to account for the evidence before it. The reasons must also meaningfully account for the central issues and concerns raised by the parties, even though reviewing courts cannot expect administrative decision makers to respond to every argument or line of possible analysis.

While administrative decision makers are not bound by their previous decisions, they must be concerned with the general consistency of administrative decisions. Therefore, whether a particular decision is consistent with the administrative body's past decisions is also a constraint that the reviewing court should consider when determining whether an administrative decision is reasonable. Finally, individuals are entitled to greater procedural protection when the decision in question involves the potential for significant personal impact or harm. Where the impact of a decision on an individual's rights and interests is severe, the reasons provided to that individual must reflect the stakes. The principle of responsive justification means that if a decision has particularly harsh consequences for the affected individual, the decision maker must explain why its decision best reflects the legislature's intention.

The question of the appropriate remedy — specifically, whether a court that quashes an unreasonable decision should exercise its discretion to remit the matter to the decision maker for reconsideration with the benefit of the court's reasons — is multi-faceted. The choice of remedy must be guided by the rationale for applying the reasonableness standard to begin with, including the recognition by the reviewing court that the legislature has entrusted the matter to the administrative decision maker, and not to the court, concerns related to the proper administration of the justice system, the need to ensure access to justice and the goal of expedient and cost-efficient decision making. Giving effect to these principles in the remedial context means that where a decision reviewed by applying the reasonableness standard cannot be upheld, it will most often be appropriate to remit the matter to the decision maker for reconsideration with the benefit of the court's reasons. However, there are limited scenarios in which remitting the matter would stymie the timely and effective resolution of matters in a manner that no legislature could have intended. An intention that the administrative decision maker decide the matter at first instance cannot give rise to endless judicial reviews and subsequent reconsiderations. Declining to remit a matter to the decision maker may be appropriate where it becomes evident that a particular outcome is inevitable and that remitting the case would therefore serve no useful purpose. Elements like concern for delay, fairness to the parties, urgency of providing a resolution to the dispute, the nature of the particular regulatory regime, whether the administrative decision maker had a genuine opportunity to weigh in on the issue in question, costs to the parties, and efficient use of public resources may also influence the exercise of a court's discretion to remit the matter.

In the case at bar, there is no basis for departing from the presumption of reasonableness review. The Registrar's decision has come before the courts by way of judicial review, not by way of a statutory appeal. Given that Parliament has not prescribed the standard to be applied, there is no indication that the legislature intended a standard of review other than reasonableness. The Registrar's decision does not give rise to any constitutional questions, general questions of law of central importance to the legal system as a whole or questions regarding the jurisdictional boundaries between administrative bodies. As a result, the standard to be applied in reviewing the Registrar's decision is reasonableness.

The Registrar's decision was unreasonable. She failed to justify her interpretation of s. 3(2)(a) in light of the constraints imposed by s. 3 considered as a whole, by international treaties that inform its purpose, by the jurisprudence on the interpretation of s. 3(2)(a), and by the potential consequences of her interpretation. Each of these elements — viewed individually and cumulatively — strongly supports the conclusion that s. 3(2)(a) was not intended to apply to children of foreign government representatives or employees who have not been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities. Though V had raised many of these considerations, the Registrar failed to address those submissions in her reasons and did not do more than conduct a cursory review of the legislative history of s. 3(2)(a) and conclude that her interpretation was not explicitly precluded by its text.

First, the Registrar failed to address the immediate statutory context of s. 3(2)(a), which provides clear support for the conclusion that all of the persons contemplated by s. 3(2)(a) must have been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities in some form for the exception to apply. Second, the Registrar disregarded compelling submissions that s. 3(2) is a narrow exception consistent with established principles of international law and with the leading international treaties that extend diplomatic privileges and immunities to employees and representatives of foreign governments. Third, it was a significant omission to ignore the relevant cases that were before the Registrar which suggest that s. 3(2)(a) was intended to apply only to those individuals whose parents have been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities. Finally, there is no evidence that the Registrar considered the potential consequences of expanding her interpretation of s. 3(2)(a) to include all individuals who have not been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities. Rules concerning citizenship require a high degree of interpretive consistency in order to shield against arbitrariness. The Registrar's interpretation cannot be limited to the children of spies — its logic would be equally applicable to other scenarios. As well, provisions such as s. 3(2)(a) must be given a narrow interpretation because they potentially take away rights which otherwise benefit from a liberal and broad interpretation. Yet there is no indication that the Registrar considered the potential harsh consequences of her interpretation, or whether, in light of those potential consequences, Parliament would have intended s. 3(2)(a) to apply in this manner. Although the Registrar knew her interpretation was novel, she failed to provide a rationale for her expanded interpretation.

It was therefore unreasonable for the Registrar to find that s. 3(2)(a) can apply to individuals whose parents have not been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities in Canada. It is undisputed that V's parents had not been granted such privileges and immunities. No purpose would therefore be served by remitting this matter to the Registrar. Given that V was born in Canada, his status is governed only by the general rule of citizenship by birth. He is a Canadian citizen.

Per Abella and Karakatsanis JJ.: There is agreement with the majority that the appeal should be dismissed. The Registrar's decision to cancel V's citizenship certificate was unreasonable and was properly quashed by the Court of Appeal.

There is also agreement with the majority that there should be a presumption of reasonableness in judicial review. The contextual factors analysis should be eliminated from the standard of review framework, and "true questions of jurisdiction" should be abolished as a separate category of issues subject to correctness review. However, the elimination of these elements does not support the foundational changes to judicial review outlined in the majority's framework that result in expanded correctness review. Rather than confirming a meaningful presumption of deference for administrative decision-makers, the majority strips away deference from hundreds of administrative actors, based on a formalistic approach that ignores the legislature's intention to leave certain legal and policy questions to administrative decision-makers. The majority's presumption of reasonableness review rests on a totally new understanding of legislative intent and the rule of law and prohibits any consideration of well-established foundations for deference. By dramatically expanding the circumstances in which generalist judges will be entitled to substitute their own views for those of specialized decision-makers who apply their mandates on a daily basis, the majority's framework fundamentally reorients the relationship between administrative actors and the judiciary, thus advocating a profoundly different philosophy of administrative law.

The majority's framework rests on a flawed and incomplete conceptual account of judicial review, one that unjustifiably ignores the specialized expertise of administrative decision-makers and reads out the foundations of the modern understanding of legislative intent. Instead of understanding legislative intent as being the intention to leave legal questions within their mandate to specialized decision-makers with expertise, the majority removes expertise from the equation entirely. In so doing, the majority disregards the historically accepted reason why the legislature intended to delegate authority to an administrative actor. In particular, such an approach ignores the possibility that specialization and expertise are embedded into this legislative choice. Post-Dunsmuir, the Court has been steadfast in confirming the central role of specialization and expertise, affirming their connection to legislative intent, and recognizing that they give administrative decision-makers the interpretative upper hand on questions of law. Specialized expertise has become the core rationale for deference. Giving proper effect to the legislature's choice to delegate authority to an administrative decision-maker requires understanding the advantages that the decision-maker may enjoy in exercising its mandate. Chief among those advantages are the institutional expertise and specialization inherent to administering a particular mandate on a daily basis. In interpreting their enabling statutes, administrative actors may have a particularly astute appreciation for the on-the-ground consequences of particular legal interpretations, of statutory context, of the purposes that a provision or legislative scheme are meant to serve, and of specialized terminology. The advantages stemming from specialization and expertise provide a robust foundation for deference. The majority's approach accords no weight to such institutional advantages and banishes expertise from the standard of review analysis entirely. The removal of the current conceptual basis for deference opens the gates to expanded correctness review.

In the majority's framework, deference gives way whenever the rule of law demands it. This approach, however, flows from a court-centric conception of the rule of law. The rule of law means that administrative decision-makers make legal determinations within their mandate; it does not mean that only judges decide questions of law with an unrestricted license to substitute their opinions for those of administrative actors through correctness review. The majority's approach not only erodes the presumption of deference; it erodes confidence in the fact that law-making and legal interpretation are shared enterprises between courts and administrative decision-makers. Moreover, access to justice is at the heart of the legislative choice to establish a robust system of administrative law. This goal is compromised when a narrow conception of the rule of law is invoked to impose judicial hegemony over administrative decision-makers, which adds unnecessary expense and complexity. Authorizing more incursions into the administrative system by judges and permitting de novo review of every legal decision adds to the delay and cost of obtaining a final decision.

The majority's reformulation of "legislative intent" invites courts to apply an irrebuttable presumption of correctness review whenever an administrative scheme includes a right of appeal. Elevating appeal clauses to indicators of correctness review creates a two-tier system that defers to the expertise of administrative decision-makers only where there is no appeal clause. Yet appeal rights do not represent a different institutional structure that requires a more searching form of review. The mere fact that a statute contemplates an appeal says nothing about the degree of deference required in the review process. The majority's position hinges almost entirely on a textualist argument — i.e., that the presence of the word "appeal" indicates a legislative intent that courts apply the same standards of review found in civil appellate jurisprudence. This disregards long-accepted institutional distinctions between courts and administrative decision-makers. The continued use by legislatures of the term "appeal" cannot be imbued with the intent that the majority ascribes to it. The idea that appellate standards of review must be applied to every right of appeal is entirely unsupported by the jurisprudence. For at least 25 years, the Court has not treated statutory rights of appeal as a determinative reflection of legislative intent, and such clauses have played little or no role in the standard of review analysis. Moreover, pre-Dunsmuir, statutory rights of appeal were still seen as only one factor and not as unequivocal indicators of correctness review. Absent exceptional circumstances, a statutory right of appeal does not displace the presumption of reasonableness.

The majority's disregard for precedent and stare decisis has the potential to undermine both the integrity of the Court's decisions, and public confidence in the stability of the law. Stare decisis places significant limits on the Court's ability to overturn its precedents. The doctrine promotes the predictable and consistent development of legal principles, fosters reliance on judicial decisions, and contributes to the integrity of the judicial process. Respect for precedent also safeguards the Court's institutional legitimacy. The precedential value of a judgment does not expire with the tenure of the panel of judges that decided it. When the Court does choose to overrule its own precedents, it should do so carefully, with moderation, and with due regard for all the important considerations that undergird the doctrine of stare decisis. A nuanced balance must be struck between maintaining the stability of the common law and ensuring that the law is flexible and responsive enough to adapt to new circumstances and societal norms. Stare decisis plays a critical role in maintaining that balance and upholding the rule of law.

There is no principled justification for departing from the existing jurisprudence and abandoning the Court's long-standing view of how statutory appeal clauses impact the standard of review analysis. In doing so, the majority disregards the high threshold required to overturn the Court's decisions. The unprecedented wholesale rejection of an entire body of jurisprudence is particularly unsettling. The affected cases are numerous and include many decisions conducting deferential review even in the face of a statutory right of appeal and bedrock judgments affirming the relevance of administrative expertise to the standard of review analysis. Overruling these judgments flouts stare decisis, which prohibits courts from overturning past decisions that simply represent a choice with which the current bench does not agree. The majority's approach also has the potential to disturb settled interpretations of many statutes that contain a right of appeal; every existing interpretation of such statutes that has been affirmed under a reasonableness standard will be open to fresh challenge. Moreover, if the Court, in its past decisions, misconstrued the purpose of statutory appeal clauses, legislatures were free to clarify this interpretation through legislative amendment. In the absence of legislative correction, the case for overturning decisions is even less compelling.

The Court should offer additional direction on reasonableness review so that judges can provide careful and meaningful oversight of the administrative justice system while respecting its legitimacy and the perspectives of its front-line, specialized decision-makers. However, rather than clarifying the role of reasons and how to review them, the majority revives the kind of search for errors that dominated the Court's prior jurisprudence. The majority's multi-factored, open-ended list of constraints on administrative decision making will encourage reviewing courts to dissect administrative reasons in a line-by-line hunt for error. These constraints may function in practice as a wide-ranging catalogue of hypothetical errors to justify quashing an administrative decision. Structuring reasonableness review in this fashion effectively imposes on administrative decision-makers a higher standard of justification than on trial judges. Such an approach undercuts deference. Reasonableness review should instead focus on the concept of deference to administrative decision-makers and to the legislative intention to confide in them a mandate. Curial deference is the hallmark of reasonableness review, setting it apart from the substitution of opinion permitted under correctness.

Deference imposes three requirements on courts conducting reasonableness review. First, deference is the attitude a reviewing court must adopt towards an administrative decision-maker. Deference mandates respect for the legislative choice to entrust a decision to administrative actors rather than to the courts, for the important role that administrative decision-makers play, and for their specialized expertise and the institutional setting in which they operate. Reviewing courts must pay respectful attention to the reasons offered for an administrative decision, make a genuine effort to understand why the decision was made, and give the decision a fair and generous construction. Second, deference affects how a court frames the question it must answer and the nature of its analysis. A reviewing court does not ask how it would have resolved an issue, but rather whether the answer provided by the decision-maker was unreasonable. Ultimately, whether an administrative decision is reasonable depends on the context, and a reviewing court must be attentive to all relevant circumstances, including the reasons offered to support the decision, the record, the statutory scheme and the particular issues raised, among other factors. Third, deferential review impacts how a reviewing court evaluates challenges to a decision. The party seeking judicial review bears the onus of showing that the decision was unreasonable; the decision-maker does not have to persuade the court that its decision is reasonable.

The administrative decision itself is the focal point of the review exercise. In all cases, the question remains whether the challenging party has demonstrated that a decision is unreasonable. Where reasons are neither required nor available, reasonableness may be justified by past decisions of the administrative body or in light of the procedural context. Where reasons are provided, they serve as the natural starting point to determine whether the decision-maker acted reasonably. By beginning with the reasons, read in light of the surrounding context and the grounds raised, reviewing courts provide meaningful oversight while respecting the legitimacy of specialized administrative decision making. Reviewing courts should approach the reasons with respect for the specialized decision-makers, their significant role and the institutional context chosen by the legislator. Reviewing courts should not second-guess operational implications, practical challenges and on-the-ground knowledge and must remain alert to specialized concepts or language. Further, a reviewing court is not restricted to the four corners of the written reasons and should, if faced with a gap in the reasons, look to other materials to see if they shed light on the decision, including: the record of any formal proceedings and the materials before the decision-maker, past decisions of the administrative body, and policies or guidelines developed to guide the type of decision under review. These materials may assist a court in understanding the outcome. In these ways, reviewing courts may legitimately supplement written reasons without supplanting the analysis. Reasons must be read together with the outcome to determine whether the result falls within a range of possible outcomes. This approach puts substance over form where the basis for a decision is evident on the record, but not clearly expressed in written reasons.

As well, a court conducting deferential review must view claims of error in context and with caution, cognizant of the need to avoid substituting its opinion for that of those empowered and better equipped to answer the questions at issue. Because judicial substitution is incompatible with deference, reviewing courts must carefully evaluate the challenges raised to ensure they go to the reasonableness of the decision rather than representing a mere difference of opinion. Courts must also consider the materiality of any alleged errors. An error that is peripheral to the reasoning process is not sufficient to justify quashing a decision. The same deferential approach must apply with equal force to statutory interpretation cases. In such cases, a court should not assess the decision by determining what, in its own view, would be a reasonable interpretation. Such an approach imperils deference. A de novo interpretation of a statute necessarily omits the perspective of the front-line, specialized administrative body that routinely applies the statutory scheme in question. By placing that perspective at the heart of the judicial review inquiry, courts display respect for specialization and expertise, and for the legislative choice to delegate certain questions to non-judicial bodies. Conversely, by imposing their own interpretation of a statute, courts undermine legislative intent.

In the instant case, there is agreement with the majority that the standard of review is reasonableness. The Registrar's reasons failed to respond to V's submission that the objectives of s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act require its terms to be read narrowly. Instead, the Registrar interpreted s. 3(2)(a) broadly, based on a purely textual assessment. This reading was only reasonable if the text is read in isolation from its objective. Nothing in the history of this provision indicates that Parliament intended to widen its scope. Furthermore, the judicial treatment of this provision also points to the need for a narrow interpretation. In addition, the text of s. 3(2)(c) can be seen as undermining the Registrar's interpretation of s. 3(2)(a), because the former denies citizenship to children born to individuals who enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities equivalent to those granted to persons referred to in the latter. This suggests that s. 3(2)(a) covers only those employees in Canada of a foreign government who have such privileges and immunities, in contrast with V's parents. By ignoring the objectives of s. 3 as a whole, the Registrar's decision was unreasonable.

The following is the judgment delivered by

[1] The Chief Justice and Moldaver, Gascon, Côté, Brown, Rowe and Martin JJ. — This appeal and its companion cases (see Bell Canada v. Canada (Attorney General), 2019 SCC 66, [2019] 4 S.C.R. 845), provide this Court with an opportunity to re-examine its approach to judicial review of administrative decisions.

[2] In these reasons, we will address two key aspects of the current administrative law jurisprudence which require reconsideration and clarification. First, we will chart a new course forward for determining the standard of review that applies when a court reviews the merits of an administrative decision. Second, we will provide additional guidance for reviewing courts to follow when conducting reasonableness review. The revised framework will continue to be guided by the principles underlying judicial review that this Court articulated in Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190: that judicial review functions to maintain the rule of law while giving effect to legislative intent. We will also affirm the need to develop and strengthen a culture of justification in administrative decision making.

[3] We will then address the merits of the case at bar, which relates to an application for judicial review of a decision by the Canadian Registrar of Citizenship concerning Alexander Vavilov, who was born in Canada and whose parents were later revealed to be Russian spies. The Registrar found on the basis of an interpretation of s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-29, that Mr. Vavilov was not a Canadian citizen and cancelled his certificate of citizenship under s. 26(3) of the Citizenship Regulations, SOR/93-246. In our view, the standard of review to be applied to the Registrar's decision is reasonableness, and the Registrar's decision was unreasonable. We would therefore uphold the Federal Court of Appeal's decision to quash it, and would dismiss the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration's appeal.

I. Need for Clarification and Simplification of the Law of Judicial Review

[4] Over the past decades, the law relating to judicial review of administrative decisions in Canada has been characterized by continuously evolving jurisprudence and vigorous academic debate. This area of the law concerns matters which are fundamental to our legal and constitutional order, and seeks to navigate the proper relationship between administrative decision makers, the courts and individuals in our society. In parallel with the law, the role of administrative decision making in Canada has also evolved. Today, the administration of countless public bodies and regulatory regimes has been entrusted to statutory delegates with decision-making power. The number, diversity and importance of the matters that come before such delegates has made administrative decision making one of the principal manifestations of state power in the lives of Canadians.

[5] Given the ubiquity and practical importance of administrative decision making, it is essential that administrative decision makers, those subject to their decisions and courts tasked with reviewing those decisions have clear guidance on how judicial review is to be performed.

[6] In granting leave to appeal in the case at bar and in its companion cases, this Court's leave to appeal judgment made clear that it viewed these appeals as an opportunity to consider the law applicable to the judicial review of administrative decisions as addressed in Dunsmuir and subsequent cases. In light of the importance of this issue, the Court appointed two amici curiae, invited the parties to devote a substantial portion of their submissions to the standard of review issue, and granted leave to 27 interveners, comprising 4 attorneys general and numerous organizations representing the breadth of the Canadian administrative law landscape. We have, as a result, received a wealth of helpful submissions on this issue. Despite this Court's review of the subject in Dunsmuir, some aspects of the law remain challenging. In particular, the submissions presented to the Court have highlighted two aspects of the current framework which need clarification.

[7] The first aspect is the analysis for determining the standard of review. It has become clear that Dunsmuir's promise of simplicity and predictability in this respect has not been fully realized. In Dunsmuir, a majority of the Court merged the standards of "patent unreasonableness" and "reasonableness simpliciter" into a single "reasonableness" standard, thus reducing the number of standards of review from three to two: paras. 34-50. It also sought to simplify the analysis for determining the applicable standard of review: paras. 51-64. Since Dunsmuir, the jurisprudence has evolved to recognize that reasonableness will be the applicable standard for most categories of questions on judicial review, including, presumptively, when a decision maker interprets its enabling statute: see, e.g., Alberta (Information and Privacy Commissioner) v. Alberta Teachers' Association, 2011 SCC 61, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 654; Mouvement laïque québécois v. Saguenay (City), 2015 SCC 16, [2015] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 46; Canadian National Railway Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 40, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 135, at para. 55; Canadian Artists' Representation v. National Gallery of Canada, 2014 SCC 42, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 197, at para. 13; Smith v. Alliance Pipeline Ltd., 2011 SCC 7, [2011] 1 S.C.R. 160, at paras. 26 and 28; Canada (Citizenship and Immigration) v. Khosa, 2009 SCC 12, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 339, at para. 25; Dunsmuir, at para. 54. The Court has indicated that this presumption may be rebutted by showing the issue on review falls within a category of questions attracting correctness review: see McLean v. British Columbia (Securities Commission), 2013 SCC 67, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 895, at para. 22. It may also be rebutted by showing that the context indicates that the legislature intended the standard of review to be correctness: McLean, at para. 22; Edmonton (City) v. Edmonton East (Capilano) Shopping Centres Ltd., 2016 SCC 47, [2016] 2 S.C.R. 293, at para. 32; Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 SCC 31, [2018] 2 S.C.R. 230 ("CHRC"), at paras. 45-46. However, uncertainty about when the contextual analysis remains appropriate and debate surrounding the scope of the correctness categories have sometimes caused confusion and made the analysis unwieldy: see, e.g., P. Daly, "Struggling Towards Coherence in Canadian Administrative Law? Recent Cases on Standard of Review and Reasonableness" (2016), 62 McGill L.J. 527.

[8] In addition, this analysis has in some respects departed from the theoretical foundations underpinning judicial review. While the application of the reasonableness standard is grounded, in part, in the necessity of avoiding "undue interference" in the face of the legislature's intention to leave certain questions with administrative bodies rather than with the courts (see Dunsmuir, at para. 27), that standard has come to be routinely applied even where the legislature has provided for a different institutional structure through a statutory appeal mechanism.

[9] The uncertainty that has followed Dunsmuir has been highlighted by judicial and academic criticism, litigants who have come before this Court, and organizations that represent Canadians who interact with administrative decision makers. These are not light critiques or theoretical challenges. They go to the core of the coherence of our administrative law jurisprudence and to the practical implications of this lack of coherence. This Court, too, has taken note. In Wilson v. Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd., 2016 SCC 29, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 770, at para. 19, Abella J. expressed the need to "simplify the standard of review labyrinth we currently find ourselves in" and offered suggestions with a view to beginning a necessary conversation on the way forward. It is in this context that the Court decided to grant leave to hear this case and the companion cases jointly.

[10] This process has led us to conclude that a reconsideration of this Court's approach is necessary in order to bring greater coherence and predictability to this area of law. We have therefore adopted a revised framework for determining the standard of review where a court reviews the merits of an administrative decision. The analysis begins with a presumption that reasonableness is the applicable standard in all cases. Reviewing courts should derogate from this presumption only where required by a clear indication of legislative intent or by the rule of law.

[11] The second aspect is the need for better guidance from this Court on the proper application of the reasonableness standard. The Court has heard concerns that reasonableness review is sometimes perceived as advancing a two-tiered justice system in which those subject to administrative decisions are entitled only to an outcome somewhere between "good enough" and "not quite wrong". These concerns have been echoed by some members of the legal profession, civil society organizations and legal clinics. The Court has an obligation to take these perspectives seriously and to ensure that the framework it adopts accommodates all types of administrative decision making, in areas that range from immigration, prison administration and social security entitlements to labour relations, securities regulation and energy policy.

[12] These concerns regarding the application of the reasonableness standard speak to the need for this Court to more clearly articulate what that standard entails and how it should be applied in practice. Reasonableness review is methodologically distinct from correctness review. It is informed by the need to respect the legislature's choice to delegate decision-making authority to the administrative decision maker rather than to the reviewing court. In order to fulfill Dunsmuir's promise to protect "the legality, the reasonableness and the fairness of the administrative process and its outcomes", reasonableness review must entail a sensitive and respectful, but robust, evaluation of administrative decisions: para. 28.

[13] Reasonableness review is an approach meant to ensure that courts intervene in administrative matters only where it is truly necessary to do so in order to safeguard the legality, rationality and fairness of the administrative process. It finds its starting point in the principle of judicial restraint and demonstrates a respect for the distinct role of administrative decision makers. However, it is not a "rubber-stamping" process or a means of sheltering administrative decision makers from accountability. It remains a robust form of review.

[14] On the one hand, courts must recognize the legitimacy and authority of administrative decision makers within their proper spheres and adopt an appropriate posture of respect. On the other hand, administrative decision makers must adopt a culture of justification and demonstrate that their exercise of delegated public power can be "justified to citizens in terms of rationality and fairness": the Rt. Hon. B. McLachlin, "The Roles of Administrative Tribunals and Courts in Maintaining the Rule of Law" (1998), 12 C.J.A.L.P. 171, at p. 174 (emphasis deleted); see also M. Cohen-Eliya and I. Porat, "Proportionality and Justification" (2014), 64 U.T.L.J. 458, at pp. 467-70.

[15] In conducting a reasonableness review, a court must consider the outcome of the administrative decision in light of its underlying rationale in order to ensure that the decision as a whole is transparent, intelligible and justified. What distinguishes reasonableness review from correctness review is that the court conducting a reasonableness review must focus on the decision the administrative decision maker actually made, including the justification offered for it, and not on the conclusion the court itself would have reached in the administrative decision maker's place.

II. Determining the Applicable Standard of Review

[16] In the following sections, we set out a revised framework for determining the standard of review a court should apply when the merits of an administrative decision are challenged. It starts with a presumption that reasonableness is the applicable standard whenever a court reviews administrative decisions.

[17] The presumption of reasonableness review can be rebutted in two types of situations. The first is where the legislature has indicated that it intends a different standard or set of standards to apply. This will be the case where the legislature explicitly prescribes the applicable standard of review. It will also be the case where the legislature has provided a statutory appeal mechanism from an administrative decision to a court, thereby signalling the legislature's intent that appellate standards apply when a court reviews the decision. The second situation in which the presumption of reasonableness review will be rebutted is where the rule of law requires that the standard of correctness be applied. This will be the case for certain categories of questions, namely constitutional questions, general questions of law of central importance to the legal system as a whole and questions related to the jurisdictional boundaries between two or more administrative bodies. The general rule of reasonableness review, when coupled with these limited exceptions, offers a comprehensive approach to determining the applicable standard of review. As a result, it is no longer necessary for courts to engage in a "contextual inquiry" (CHRC, at paras. 45-47; see also Dunsmuir, at paras. 62-64; McLean, at para. 22) in order to identify the appropriate standard.

[18] Before setting out the framework for determining the standard of review in greater detail, we wish to acknowledge that these reasons depart from the Court's existing jurisprudence on standard of review in certain respects. Any reconsideration such as this can be justified only by compelling circumstances, and we do not take this decision lightly. A decision to adjust course will always require the Court to carefully weigh the impact on legal certainty and predictability against the costs of continuing to follow a flawed approach: see Canada (Attorney General) v. Bedford, 2013 SCC 72, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 1101, at para. 47; Canada v. Craig, 2012 SCC 43, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 489, at paras. 24-27; Ontario (Attorney General) v. Fraser, 2011 SCC 20, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 3, at paras. 56-57, 129-31 and 139; R. v. Henry, 2005 SCC 76, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 609, at paras. 43-44; R. v. Bernard, 1988 CanLII 22 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 833, at pp. 849-50.

[19] On this point, we recall the observation of Gibbs J. in Queensland v. Commonwealth (1977), 139 C.L.R. 585 (H.C.A.), which this Court endorsed in Craig, at para. 26:

> No Justice is entitled to ignore the decisions and reasoning of his predecessors, and to arrive at his own judgment as though the pages of the law reports were blank, or as though the authority of a decision did not survive beyond the rising of the Court. A Justice, unlike a legislator, cannot introduce a programme of reform which sets at nought decisions formerly made and principles formerly established. It is only after the most careful and respectful consideration of the earlier decision, and after giving due weight to all the circumstances, that a Justice may give effect to his own opinions in preference to an earlier decision of the Court.

[20] Nonetheless, this Court has in the past revisited precedents that were determined to be unsound in principle, that had proven to be unworkable and unnecessarily complex to apply, or that had attracted significant and valid judicial, academic and other criticism: Craig, at paras. 28-30; Henry, at paras. 45-47; Fraser, at para. 135 (per Rothstein J., concurring in the result); Bernard, at pp. 858-59. Although adhering to the established jurisprudence will generally promote certainty and predictability, in some instances doing so will create or perpetuate uncertainty in the law: Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development v. Ranville, 1982 CanLII 202 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 518, at p. 528; Bernard, at p. 858; R. v. B. (K.G.), 1993 CanLII 116 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 740, at p. 778. In such circumstances, "following the prior decision because of stare decisis would be contrary to the underlying value behind that doctrine, namely, clarity and certainty in the law": Bernard, at p. 858. These considerations apply here.

[21] Certain aspects of the current framework are unclear and unduly complex. The practical effect of this lack of clarity is that courts sometimes struggle in conducting the standard of review analysis, and costly debates surrounding the appropriate standard and its application continue to overshadow the review on the merits in many cases, thereby undermining access to justice. The words of Binnie J. in his concurring reasons in Dunsmuir, at para. 133, are still apt:

> . . . judicial review is burdened with undue cost and delay. Litigants understandably hesitate to go to court to seek redress for a perceived administrative injustice if their lawyers cannot predict with confidence even what standard of review will be applied. . . . If litigants do take the plunge, they may find the court's attention focussed not on their complaints, or the government's response, but on lengthy and arcane discussions of something they are told is [the choice of standard analysis]. . . . A victory before the reviewing court may be overturned on appeal because the wrong "standard of review" was selected. A small business denied a licence or a professional person who wants to challenge disciplinary action should be able to seek judicial review without betting the store or the house on the outcome.

Regrettably, we find ourselves in a similar position following Dunsmuir. As Karakatsanis J. observed in Edmonton East, at para. 35, "[t]he contextual approach can generate uncertainty and endless litigation concerning the standard of review". While counsel and courts attempt to work through the complexities of determining the standard of review and its proper application, litigants "still find the merits waiting in the wings for their chance to be seen and reviewed": Wilson, at para. 25, per Abella J.

[22] As noted in CHRC, this Court "has for years attempted to simplify the standard of review analysis in order to 'get the parties away from arguing about the tests and back to arguing about the substantive merits of their case'": para. 27, quoting Alberta Teachers, at para. 36, citing Dunsmuir, at para. 145, per Binnie J. The principled changes set out below seek to promote the values underlying stare decisis and to make the law on the standard of review more certain, coherent and workable going forward.

A. Presumption That Reasonableness Is the Applicable Standard

[23] Where a court reviews the merits of an administrative decision (i.e., judicial review of an administrative decision other than a review related to a breach of natural justice and/or the duty of procedural fairness), the standard of review it applies must reflect the legislature's intent with respect to the role of the reviewing court, except where giving effect to that intent is precluded by the rule of law. The starting point for the analysis is a presumption that the legislature intended the standard of review to be reasonableness.

[24] Parliament and the provincial legislatures are constitutionally empowered to create administrative bodies and to endow them with broad statutory powers: Dunsmuir, at para. 27. Where a legislature has created an administrative decision maker for the specific purpose of administering a statutory scheme, it must be presumed that the legislature also intended that decision maker to be able to fulfill its mandate and interpret the law as applicable to all issues that come before it. Where a legislature has not explicitly prescribed that a court is to have a role in reviewing the decisions of that decision maker, it can safely be assumed that the legislature intended the administrative decision maker to function with a minimum of judicial interference. However, because judicial review is protected by s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867, legislatures cannot shield administrative decision making from curial scrutiny entirely: Dunsmuir, at para. 31; Crevier v. Attorney General of Quebec, 1981 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 220, at pp. 236-37; U.E.S., Local 298 v. Bibeault, 1988 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 1048, at p. 1090. Nevertheless, respect for these institutional design choices made by the legislature requires a reviewing court to adopt a posture of restraint on review.

[25] For years, this Court's jurisprudence has moved toward a recognition that the reasonableness standard should be the starting point for a court's review of an administrative decision. Indeed, a presumption of reasonableness review is already a well-established feature of the standard of review analysis in cases in which administrative decision makers interpret their home statutes: see Alberta Teachers, at para. 30; Saguenay, at para. 46; Edmonton East, at para. 22. In our view, it is now appropriate to hold that whenever a court reviews an administrative decision, it should start with the presumption that the applicable standard of review for all aspects of that decision will be reasonableness. While this presumption applies to the administrative decision maker's interpretation of its enabling statute, the presumption also applies more broadly to other aspects of its decision.

[26] Before turning to an explanation of how the presumption of reasonableness review may be rebutted, we believe it is desirable to clarify one aspect of the conceptual basis for this presumption. Since Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 963 v. New Brunswick Liquor Corp., 1979 CanLII 23 (SCC), [1979] 2 S.C.R. 227 ("C.U.P.E."), the central rationale for applying a deferential standard of review in administrative law has been a respect for the legislature's institutional design choice to delegate certain matters to non-judicial decision makers through statute: C.U.P.E., at pp. 235-36. However, this Court has subsequently identified a number of other justifications for applying the reasonableness standard, some of which have taken on influential roles in the standard of review analysis at various times.

[27] In particular, the Court has described one rationale for applying the reasonableness standard as being the relative expertise of administrative decision makers with respect to the questions before them: see, e.g., C.U.P.E., at p. 236; Pushpanathan v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1998 CanLII 778 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 982, at paras. 32-35; Pezim v. British Columbia (Superintendent of Brokers), 1994 CanLII 103 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 557, at pp. 591-92; Canada (Director of Investigation and Research) v. Southam Inc., 1997 CanLII 385 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 748, at paras. 50-53; Dunsmuir, at para.

49, quoting D. J. Mullan, "Establishing the Standard of Review: The Struggle for Complexity?" (2004), 17 C.J.A.L.P. 59, at p. 93; see also Dunsmuir, at para. 68. However, this Court's jurisprudence has sometimes been deeply divided on the question of what expertise entails in the administrative context, how it should be assessed and how it should inform the standard of review analysis: see, e.g., Khosa, at paras. 23-25, per Binnie J. for the majority, compared to paras. 93-96, per Rothstein J., concurring in the result; Edmonton East, at para. 33, per Karakatsanis J. for the majority, compared to paras. 81-86, per Côté and Brown JJ., dissenting. In the era of what was known as the "pragmatic and functional" approach, which was first set out in Bibeault, a decision maker's expertise relative to that of the reviewing court was one of the key contextual factors said to indicate legislative intent with respect to the standard of review, but the decision maker was not presumed to have relative expertise. Instead, whether a decision maker had greater expertise than the reviewing court was assessed in relation to the specific question at issue and on the basis of a contextual analysis that could incorporate factors such as the qualification of an administrative body's members, their experience in a particular area and their involvement in policy making: see, e.g., Pezim, at pp. 591-92; Southam, at paras. 50-53; Dr. Q v. College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia, 2003 SCC 19, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 226, at paras. 28-29; Canada (Deputy Minister of National Revenue) v. Mattel Canada Inc., 2001 SCC 36, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 100, at paras. 28-32; Moreau-Bérubé v. New Brunswick (Judicial Council), 2002 SCC 11, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 249, at para. 50.

[28] Unfortunately, this contextual analysis proved to be unwieldy and offered limited practical guidance for courts attempting to assess an administrative decision maker's relative expertise. More recently, the dominant approach in this Court has been to accept that expertise simply inheres in an administrative body by virtue of the specialized function designated for it by the legislature: Edmonton East, at para. 33. However, if administrative decision makers are understood to possess specialized expertise on all questions that come before them, the concept of expertise ceases to assist a reviewing court in attempting to distinguish questions for which applying the reasonableness standard is appropriate from those for which it is not.

[29] Of course, the fact that the specialized role of administrative decision makers lends itself to the development of expertise and institutional experience is not the only reason that a legislature may choose to delegate decision-making authority. Over the years, the Court has pointed to a number of other compelling rationales for the legislature to delegate the administration of a statutory scheme to a particular administrative decision maker. These rationales have included the decision maker's proximity and responsiveness to stakeholders, ability to render decisions promptly, flexibly and efficiently, and ability to provide simplified and streamlined proceedings intended to promote access to justice.

[30] While specialized expertise and these other rationales may all be reasons for a legislature to delegate decision-making authority, a reviewing court need not evaluate which of these rationales apply in the case of a particular decision maker in order to determine the standard of review. Instead, in our view, it is the very fact that the legislature has chosen to delegate authority which justifies a default position of reasonableness review. The Court has in fact recognized this basis for applying the reasonableness standard to administrative decisions in the past. In Khosa, for example, the majority understood Dunsmuir to stand for the proposition that "with or without a privative clause, a measure of deference has come to be accepted as appropriate where a particular decision had been allocated to an administrative decision-maker rather than to the courts": para. 25. More recently, in Edmonton East, Karakatsanis J. explained that a presumption of reasonableness review "respects the principle of legislative supremacy and the choice made to delegate decision making to a tribunal, rather than the courts": para. 22. And in CHRC, Gascon J. explained that "the fact that the legislature has allocated authority to a decision maker other than the courts is itself an indication that the legislature intended deferential review": para. 50. In other words, respect for this institutional design choice and the democratic principle, as well as the need for courts to avoid "undue interference" with the administrative decision maker's discharge of its functions, is what justifies the presumptive application of the reasonableness standard: Dunsmuir, at para. 27.

[31] We wish to emphasize that because these reasons adopt a presumption of reasonableness as the starting point, expertise is no longer relevant to a determination of the standard of review as it was in the contextual analysis. However, we are not doing away with the role of expertise in administrative decision making. This consideration is simply folded into the new starting point and, as explained below, expertise remains a relevant consideration in conducting reasonableness review.

[32] That being said, our starting position that the applicable standard of review is reasonableness is not incompatible with the rule of law. However, because this approach is grounded in respect for legislative choice, it also requires courts to give effect to clear legislative direction that a different standard was intended. Similarly, a reviewing court must be prepared to derogate from the presumption of reasonableness review where respect for the rule of law requires a singular, determinate and final answer to the question before it. Each of these situations will be discussed in turn below.

B. Derogation From the Presumption of Reasonableness Review on the Basis of Legislative Intent

[33] This Court has described respect for legislative intent as the "polar star" of judicial review: C.U.P.E. v. Ontario (Minister of Labour), 2003 SCC 29, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 539, at para. 149. This description remains apt. The presumption of reasonableness review discussed above is intended to give effect to the legislature's choice to leave certain matters with administrative decision makers rather than the courts. It follows that this presumption will be rebutted where a legislature has indicated that a different standard should apply. The legislature can do so in two ways. First, it may explicitly prescribe through statute what standard courts should apply when reviewing decisions of a particular administrative decision maker. Second, it may direct that derogation from the presumption of reasonableness review is appropriate by providing for a statutory appeal mechanism from an administrative decision maker to a court, thereby signalling the application of appellate standards.

(1) Legislated Standards of Review

[34] Any framework rooted in legislative intent must, to the extent possible, respect clear statutory language that prescribes the applicable standard of review. This Court has consistently affirmed that legislated standards of review should be given effect: see, e.g., R. v. Owen, 2003 SCC 33, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 779, at paras. 31-32; Khosa, at paras. 18-19; British Columbia (Workers' Compensation Board) v. Figliola, 2011 SCC 52, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 422, at para. 20; Moore v. British Columbia (Education), 2012 SCC 61, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 360, at para. 55; McCormick v. Fasken Martineau DuMoulin LLP, 2014 SCC 39, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 108, at para. 16; British Columbia (Workers' Compensation Appeal Tribunal) v. Fraser Health Authority, 2016 SCC 25, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 587, at paras. 8 and 29; British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal v. Schrenk, 2017 SCC 62, [2017] 2 S.C.R. 795, at para. 28.

[35] It follows that where a legislature has indicated that courts are to apply the standard of correctness in reviewing certain questions, that standard must be applied. In British Columbia, the legislature has established the applicable standard of review for many tribunals by reference to the Administrative Tribunals Act, S.B.C. 2004, c. 45: see ss. 58 and 59. For example, it has provided that the standard of review applicable to decisions on questions of statutory interpretation by the B.C. Human Rights Tribunal is to be correctness: ibid., s. 59(1); Human Rights Code, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 210, s. 32. We continue to be of the view that where the legislature has indicated the applicable standard of review, courts are bound to respect that designation, within the limits imposed by the rule of law.

(2) Statutory Appeal Mechanisms

[36] We have reaffirmed that, to the extent possible, the standard of review analysis requires courts to give effect to the legislature's institutional design choices to delegate authority through statute. In our view, this principled position also requires courts to give effect to the legislature's intent, signalled by the presence of a statutory appeal mechanism from an administrative decision to a court, that the court is to perform an appellate function with respect to that decision. Just as a legislature may, within constitutional limits, insulate administrative decisions from judicial interference, it may also choose to establish a regime "which does not exclude the courts but rather makes them part of the enforcement machinery": Seneca College of Applied Arts and Technology v. Bhadauria, 1981 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 181, at p. 195. Where a legislature has provided that parties may appeal from an administrative decision to a court, either as of right or with leave, it has subjected the administrative regime to appellate oversight and indicated that it expects the court to scrutinize such administrative decisions on an appellate basis. This expressed intention necessarily rebuts the blanket presumption of reasonableness review, which is premised on giving effect to a legislature's decision to leave certain issues with a body other than a court. This intention should be given effect. As noted by the intervener Attorney General of Quebec in her factum, [TRANSLATION] "[t]he requirement of deference must not sterilize such an appeal mechanism to the point that it changes the nature of the decision-making process the legislature intended to put in place": para. 2.

[37] It should therefore be recognized that, where the legislature has provided for an appeal from an administrative decision to a court, a court hearing such an appeal is to apply appellate standards of review to the decision. This means that the applicable standard is to be determined with reference to the nature of the question and to this Court's jurisprudence on appellate standards of review. Where, for example, a court is hearing an appeal from an administrative decision, it would, in considering questions of law, including questions of statutory interpretation and those concerning the scope of a decision maker's authority, apply the standard of correctness in accordance with Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235, at para. 8. Where the scope of the statutory appeal includes questions of fact, the appellate standard of review for those questions is palpable and overriding error (as it is for questions of mixed fact and law where the legal principle is not readily extricable): see Housen, at paras. 10, 19 and 26-37. Of course, should a legislature intend that a different standard of review apply in a statutory appeal, it is always free to make that intention known by prescribing the applicable standard through statute.

[38] We acknowledge that giving effect to statutory appeal mechanisms in this way departs from the Court's recent jurisprudence. However, after careful consideration, we are of the view that this shift is necessary in order to bring coherence and conceptual balance to the standard of review analysis and is justified by a weighing of the values of certainty and correctness: Craig, at para. 27. Our conclusion is based on the following considerations.

[39] First, there has been significant judicial and academic criticism of this Court's recent approach to statutory appeal rights: see, e.g., Y.-M. Morissette, "What is a 'reasonable decision'?" (2018), 31 C.J.A.L.P. 225, at p. 244; the Hon. J. T. Robertson, Administrative Deference: The Canadian Doctrine that Continues to Disappoint (April 18, 2018) (online), at p. 8; the Hon. D. Stratas, "The Canadian Law of Judicial Review: A Plea for Doctrinal Coherence and Consistency" (2016), 42 Queen's L.J. 27, at p. 33; Daly, at pp. 541-42; Québec (Procureure générale) v. Montréal (Ville), 2016 QCCA 2108, 17 Admin. L.R. (6th) 328, at paras. 36-46; Bell Canada v. 7262591 Canada Ltd., 2018 FCA 174, 428 D.L.R. (4th) 311, at paras. 190-92, per Nadon J.A., concurring, and at paras. 66 and 69-72, per Rennie J.A., dissenting; Garneau Community League v. Edmonton (City), 2017 ABCA 374, 60 Alta. L.R. (6th) 1, at paras. 91 and 93-95, per Slatter J.A., concurring; Nova Scotia (Attorney General) v. S&D Smith Central Supplies Limited, 2019 NSCA 22, at paras. 250, 255-64 and 274-302 (CanLII), per Beveridge J.A., dissenting; Atlantic Mining NS Corp. (D.D.V. Gold Limited) v. Oakley, 2019 NSCA 14, at paras. 9-14 (CanLII). These critiques seize on the inconsistency inherent in a standard of review framework based on legislative intent that otherwise declines to give meaning to an express statutory right of appeal. This criticism observes that legislative choice is not one-dimensional; rather, it pulls in two directions. While a legislative choice to delegate to an administrative decision maker grounds a presumption of reasonableness on the one hand, a legislative choice to enact a statutory right of appeal signals an intention to ascribe an appellate role to reviewing courts on the other hand.

[40] This Court has in the past held that the existence of significant and valid judicial, academic and other criticism of its jurisprudence may justify reconsideration of a precedent: Craig, at para. 29; R. v. Robinson, 1996 CanLII 233 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 683, at paras. 35-41. This consideration applies in the instant case. In particular, the suggestion that the recent treatment of statutory rights of appeal represents a departure from the conceptual basis underpinning the standard of review framework is itself a compelling reason to re-examine the current approach: Khosa, at para. 87, per Rothstein J., concurring in the result.

[41] Second, there is no satisfactory justification for the recent trend in this Court's jurisprudence to give no effect to statutory rights of appeal in the standard of review analysis absent exceptional wording: see Tervita Corp. v. Canada (Commissioner of Competition), 2015 SCC 3, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 161, at paras. 35-39. Indeed, this approach is itself a departure from earlier jurisprudence: the Hon. J. T. Robertson, "Judicial Deference to Administrative Tribunals: A Guide to 60 Years of Supreme Court Jurisprudence" (2014), 66 S.C.L.R. (2d) 1, at pp. 91-93. Under the former "pragmatic and functional" approach to determining the applicable standard of review, the existence of a privative clause or a statutory right of appeal was one of four contextual factors that a court would consider in order to determine the standard that the legislature intended to apply to a particular decision. Although a statutory appeal clause was not determinative, it was understood to be a key factor indicating that the legislature intended that a less deferential standard of review be applied: see, e.g., Pezim, at pp. 589-92; British Columbia Telephone Co. v. Shaw Cable Systems (B.C.) Ltd., 1995 CanLII 101 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 739, at paras. 28-31; Southam, at paras. 30-32, 46 and 54-55; Pushpanathan, at paras. 30-31; Dr. Q, at para. 27; Mattel, at paras. 26-27; Law Society of New Brunswick v. Ryan, 2003 SCC 20, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 247, at paras. 21 and 27-29; Barrie Public Utilities v. Canadian Cable Television Assn., 2003 SCC 28, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 476, at para. 11; Monsanto Canada Inc. v. Ontario (Superintendent of Financial Services), 2004 SCC 54, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 152, at para. 7.

[42] The Court did indeed sometimes find that, even in a statutory appeal, a deferential standard of review was warranted for the legal findings of a decision maker that lay at the heart of the decision maker's expertise: see, e.g., Pezim. In other instances, however, the Court concluded that the existence of a statutory appeal mechanism and the fact that the decision maker did not have greater expertise than a court on the issue being considered indicated that correctness was the appropriate standard, including on matters involving the interpretation of the administrative decision maker's home statute: see, e.g., Mattel, at paras. 26-33; Barrie Public Utilities, at paras. 9-19; Monsanto, at paras. 6-16.

[43] Yet as, in Dunsmuir, Alberta Teachers, Edmonton East and subsequent cases, the standard of review analysis was simplified and shifted from a contextual analysis to an approach more focused on categories, statutory appeal mechanisms ceased to play a role in the analysis. Although this simplification of the standard of review analysis may have been a laudable change, it did not justify ceasing to give any effect to statutory appeal mechanisms. Dunsmuir itself provides little guidance on the rationale for this change. The majority in Dunsmuir was silent on the role of a statutory right of appeal in determining the standard of review, and did not refer to the prior treatment of statutory rights of appeal under the pragmatic and functional approach.

[44] More generally, there is no convincing reason to presume that legislatures mean something entirely different when they use the word "appeal" in an administrative law statute than they do in, for example, a criminal or commercial law context. Accepting that the word "appeal" refers to the same type of procedure in all these contexts also accords with the presumption of consistent expression, according to which the legislature is presumed to use language such that the same words have the same meaning both within a statute and across statutes: R. Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (6th ed. 2014), at p. 217. Accepting that the legislature intends an appellate standard of review to be applied when it uses the word "appeal" also helps to explain why many statutes provide for both appeal and judicial review mechanisms in different contexts, thereby indicating two roles for reviewing courts: see, e.g., Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7, ss. 27 and 28. This offers further support for giving effect to statutory rights of appeal. Our colleagues' suggestion that our position in this regard "hinges" on what they call a "textualist argument" (at para. 246) is inaccurate.

[45] That there is no principled rationale for ignoring statutory appeal mechanisms becomes obvious when the broader context of those mechanisms is considered. The existence of a limited right of appeal, such as a right of appeal on questions of law or a right of appeal with leave of a court, does not preclude a court from considering other aspects of a decision in a judicial review proceeding. However, if the same standards of review applied regardless of whether a question was covered by the appeal provision, and regardless of whether an individual subject to an administrative decision was granted leave to appeal or applied for judicial review, the appeal provision would be completely redundant — contrary to the well-established principle that the legislature does not speak in vain: Attorney General of Quebec v. Carrières Ste-Thérèse Ltée, 1985 CanLII 35 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 831, at p. 838.

[46] Finally, and most crucially, the appeals now before the Court have allowed for a comprehensive and considered examination of the standard of review analysis with the goal of remedying the conceptual and practical difficulties that have made this area of the law challenging for litigants and courts alike. To achieve this goal, the revised framework must, for at least two reasons, give effect to statutory appeal mechanisms. The first reason is conceptual. In the past, this Court has looked past an appeal clause primarily when the decision maker possessed greater relative expertise — what it called the "specialization of duties" principle in Pezim, at p. 591. But, as discussed above, the presumption of reasonableness review is no longer premised upon notions of relative expertise. Instead, it is now based on respect for the legislature's institutional design choice, according to which the authority to make a decision is vested in an administrative decision maker rather than in a court. It would be inconsistent with this conceptual basis for the presumption of reasonableness review to disregard clear indications that the legislature has intentionally chosen a more involved role for the courts. Just as recognizing a presumption of reasonableness review on all questions respects a legislature's choice to leave some matters first and foremost to an administrative decision maker, departing from that blanket presumption in the context of a statutory appeal respects the legislature's choice of a more involved role for the courts in supervising administrative decision making.

[47] The second reason is that, building on developments in the case law over the past several years, this decision conclusively closes the door on the application of a contextual analysis to determine the applicable standard, and in doing so streamlines and simplifies the standard of review framework. With the elimination of the contextual approach to selecting the standard of review, the need for statutory rights of appeal to play a role becomes clearer. Eliminating the contextual approach means that statutory rights of appeal must now either play no role in administrative law or be accepted as directing a departure from the default position of reasonableness review. The latter must prevail.

[48] Our colleagues agree that the time has come to put the contextual approach espoused in Dunsmuir to rest and adopt a presumption of reasonableness review. We part company on the extent to which the departure from the contextual approach requires corresponding modifications to other aspects of the standard of review jurisprudence. We consider that the elimination of the contextual approach represents an incremental yet important adjustment to Canada's judicial review roots. While it is true that this Court has, in the past several years of jurisprudential development, warned that the contextual approach should be applied "sparingly" (CHRC, at para. 46), it is incorrect to suggest that our jurisprudence was such that the elimination of the contextual analysis was "all but complete": reasons of Abella and Karakatsanis JJ., at para. 277; see, in this regard, CHRC, at paras. 44-54; Saguenay, at para. 46; Tervita, at para. 35; McLean, at para. 22; Edmonton East, at para. 32; Rogers Communications Inc. v. Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers of Canada, 2012 SCC 35, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 283, at para. 15. The contextual analysis was one part of the broader standard of review framework set out in Dunsmuir. A departure from this aspect of the Dunsmuir framework requires a principled rebalancing of the framework as a whole in order to maintain the equilibrium between the roles of administrative decision makers and reviewing courts that is fundamental to administrative law.

[49] In our view, with the starting position of this presumption of reasonableness review, and in the absence of a searching contextual analysis, legislative intent can only be given effect in this framework if statutory appeal mechanisms, as clear signals of legislative intent with respect to the applicable standard of review, are given effect through the application of appellate standards by reviewing courts. Conversely, in such a framework that is based on a presumption of reasonableness review, contextual factors that courts once looked to as signalling deferential review, such as privative clauses, serve no independent or additional function in identifying the standard of review.

[50] We wish, at this juncture, to make three points regarding how the presence of a statutory appeal mechanism should inform the choice of standard analysis. First, we note that statutory regimes that provide for parties to appeal to a court from an administrative decision may allow them to do so in all cases (that is, as of right) or only with leave of the court. While the existence of a leave requirement will affect whether a court will hear an appeal from a particular decision, it does not affect the standard to be applied if leave is given and the appeal is heard.

[51] Second, we note that not all legislative provisions that contemplate a court reviewing an administrative decision actually provide a right of appeal. Some provisions simply recognize that all administrative decisions are subject to judicial review and address procedural or other similar aspects of judicial review in a particular context. Since these provisions do not give courts an appellate function, they do not authorize the application of appellate standards. Some examples of such provisions are ss. 18 to 18.2, 18.4 and 28 of the Federal Courts Act, which confer jurisdiction on the Federal Court and the Federal Court of Appeal to hear and determine applications for judicial review of decisions of federal bodies and grant remedies, and also address procedural aspects of such applications: see Khosa, at para. 34. Another example is the current version of s. 470 of Alberta's Municipal Government Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. M-26, which does not provide for an appeal to a court, but addresses procedural considerations and consequences that apply "[w]here a decision of an assessment review board is the subject of an application for judicial review": s. 470(1).

[52] Third, we would note that statutory appeal rights are often circumscribed, as their scope might be limited with reference to the types of questions on which a party may appeal (where, for example, appeals are limited to questions of law) or the types of decisions that may be appealed (where, for example, not every decision of an administrative decision maker may be appealed to a court), or to the party or parties that may bring an appeal. However, the existence of a circumscribed right of appeal in a statutory scheme does not on its own preclude applications for judicial review of decisions, or of aspects of decisions, to which the appeal mechanism does not apply, or by individuals who have no right of appeal. But any such application for judicial review is distinct from an appeal, and the presumption of reasonableness review that applies on judicial review cannot then be rebutted by reference to the statutory appeal mechanism.

C. The Applicable Standard Is Correctness Where Required by the Rule of Law

[53] In our view, respect for the rule of law requires courts to apply the standard of correctness for certain types of legal questions: constitutional questions, general questions of law of central importance to the legal system as a whole and questions regarding the jurisdictional boundaries between two or more administrative bodies. The application of the correctness standard for such questions respects the unique role of the judiciary in interpreting the Constitution and ensures that courts are able to provide the last word on questions for which the rule of law requires consistency and for which a final and determinate answer is necessary: Dunsmuir, at para. 58.

[54] When applying the correctness standard, the reviewing court may choose either to uphold the administrative decision maker's determination or to substitute its own view: Dunsmuir, at para. 50. While it should take the administrative decision maker's reasoning into account — and indeed, it may find that reasoning persuasive and adopt it — the reviewing court is ultimately empowered to come to its own conclusions on the question.

(1) Constitutional Questions

[55] Questions regarding the division of powers between Parliament and the provinces, the relationship between the legislature and the other branches of the state, the scope of Aboriginal and treaty rights under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, and other constitutional matters require a final and determinate answer from the courts. Therefore, the standard of correctness must continue to be applied in reviewing such questions: Dunsmuir, at para. 58; Westcoast Energy Inc. v. Canada (National Energy Board), 1998 CanLII 813 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 322.

[56] The Constitution — both written and unwritten — dictates the limits of all state action. Legislatures and administrative decision makers are bound by the Constitution and must comply with it. A legislature cannot alter the scope of its own constitutional powers through statute. Nor can it alter the constitutional limits of executive power by delegating authority to an administrative body. In other words, although a legislature may choose what powers it delegates to an administrative body, it cannot delegate powers that it does not constitutionally have. The constitutional authority to act must have determinate, defined and consistent limits, which necessitates the application of the correctness standard.

[57] Although the amici questioned the approach to the standard of review set out in Doré v. Barreau du Québec, 2012 SCC 12, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 395, a reconsideration of that approach is not germane to the issues in this appeal. However, it is important to draw a distinction between cases in which it is alleged that the effect of the administrative decision being reviewed is to unjustifiably limit rights under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (as was the case in Doré) and those in which the issue on review is whether a provision of the decision maker's enabling statute violates the Charter (see, e.g., Nova Scotia (Workers' Compensation Board) v. Martin, 2003 SCC 54, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 504, at para. 65). Our jurisprudence holds that an administrative decision maker's interpretation of the latter issue should be reviewed for correctness, and that jurisprudence is not displaced by these reasons.

(2) General Questions of Law of Central Importance to the Legal System as a Whole

[58] In Dunsmuir, a majority of the Court held that, in addition to constitutional questions, general questions of law which are "both of central importance to the legal system as a whole and outside the adjudicator's specialized area of expertise" will require the application of the correctness standard: para. 60, citing Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, 2003 SCC 63, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 77, at para. 62, per LeBel J., concurring. We remain of the view that the rule of law requires courts to have the final word with regard to general questions of law that are "of central importance to the legal system as a whole". However, a return to first principles reveals that it is not necessary to evaluate the decision maker's specialized expertise in order to determine whether the correctness standard must be applied in cases involving such questions. As indicated above (at para. 31) of the reasons, the consideration of expertise is folded into the new starting point adopted in these reasons, namely the presumption of reasonableness review.

[59] As the majority of the Court recognized in Dunsmuir, the key underlying rationale for this category of questions is the reality that certain general questions of law "require uniform and consistent answers" as a result of "their impact on the administration of justice as a whole": Dunsmuir, at para. 60. In these cases, correctness review is necessary to resolve general questions of law that are of "fundamental importance and broad applicability", with significant legal consequences for the justice system as a whole or for other institutions of government: see Toronto (City), at para. 70; Alberta (Information and Privacy Commissioner) v. University of Calgary, 2016 SCC 53, [2016] 2 S.C.R. 555, at para. 20; Canadian National Railway, at para. 60; Chagnon v. Syndicat de la fonction publique et parapublique du Québec, 2018 SCC 39, [2018] 2 S.C.R. 687, at para. 17; Saguenay, at para. 51; Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 SCC 53, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 471 ("Mowat"), at para. 22; Commission scolaire de Laval v. Syndicat de l'enseignement de la région de Laval, 2016 SCC 8, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 29, at para. 38. For example, the question in University of Calgary could not be resolved by applying the reasonableness standard, because the decision would have had legal implications for a wide variety of other statutes and because the uniform protection of solicitor-client privilege — at issue in that case — is necessary for the proper functioning of the justice system: University of Calgary, at paras. 19-26. As this shows, the resolution of general questions of law "of central importance to the legal system as a whole" has implications beyond the decision at hand, hence the need for "uniform and consistent answers".

[60] This Court's jurisprudence continues to provide important guidance regarding what constitutes a general question of law of central importance to the legal system as a whole. For example, the following general questions of law have been held to be of central importance to the legal system as a whole: when an administrative proceeding will be barred by the doctrines of res judicata and abuse of process (Toronto (City), at para. 15); the scope of the state's duty of religious neutrality (Saguenay, at para. 49); the appropriateness of limits on solicitor-client privilege (University of Calgary, at para. 20); and the scope of parliamentary privilege (Chagnon, at para. 17). We caution, however, that this jurisprudence must be read carefully, given that expertise is no longer a consideration in identifying such questions: see, e.g., CHRC, at para. 43.

[61] We would stress that the mere fact that a dispute is "of wider public concern" is not sufficient for a question to fall into this category — nor is the fact that the question, when framed in a general or abstract sense, touches on an important issue: see, e.g., Communications, Energy and Paperworkers Union of Canada, Local 30 v. Irving Pulp & Paper, Ltd., 2013 SCC 34, [2013] 2 S.C.R. 458, at para. 66; McLean, at para. 28; Barreau du Québec v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2017 SCC 56, [2017] 2 S.C.R. 488, at para. 18. The case law reveals many examples of questions this Court has concluded are not general questions of law of central importance to the legal system as a whole. These include whether a certain tribunal can grant a particular type of compensation (Mowat, at para. 25); when estoppel may be applied as an arbitral remedy (Nor-Man Regional Health Authority Inc. v. Manitoba Association of Health Care Professionals, 2011 SCC 59, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 616, at paras. 37-38); the interpretation of a statutory provision prescribing timelines for an investigation (Alberta Teachers, at para. 32); the scope of a management rights clause in a collective agreement (Irving Pulp & Paper, at paras. 7, 15-16 and 66, per Rothstein and Moldaver JJ., dissenting but not on this point); whether a limitation period had been triggered under securities legislation (McLean, at paras. 28-31); whether a party to a confidential contract could bring a complaint under a particular regulatory regime (Canadian National Railway, at para. 60); and the scope of an exception allowing non-advocates to represent a minister in certain proceedings (Barreau du Québec, at paras. 17-18). As these comments and examples indicate, this does not mean that simply because expertise no longer plays a role in the selection of the standard of review, questions of central importance are now transformed into a broad catch-all category for correctness review.

[62] In short, general questions of law of central importance to the legal system as a whole require a single determinate answer. In cases involving such questions, the rule of law requires courts to provide a greater degree of legal certainty than reasonableness review allows.

(3) Questions Regarding the Jurisdictional Boundaries Between Two or More Administrative Bodies

[63] Finally, the rule of law requires that the correctness standard be applied in order to resolve questions regarding the jurisdictional boundaries between two or more administrative bodies: Dunsmuir, at para. 61. One such question arose in Regina Police Assn. Inc. v. Regina (City) Board of Police Commissioners, 2000 SCC 14, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 360, in which the issue was the jurisdiction of a labour arbitrator to consider matters of police discipline and dismissal that were otherwise subject to a comprehensive legislative regime. Similarly, in Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse) v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 39, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 185, the Court considered a jurisdictional dispute between a labour arbitrator and the Quebec Human Rights Tribunal.

[64] Administrative decisions are rarely contested on this basis. Where they are, however, the rule of law requires courts to intervene where one administrative body has interpreted the scope of its authority in a manner that is incompatible with the jurisdiction of another. The rationale for this category of questions is simple: the rule of law cannot tolerate conflicting orders and proceedings where they result in a true operational conflict between two administrative bodies, pulling a party in two different and incompatible directions: see British Columbia Telephone Co., at para. 80, per McLachlin J. (as she then was), concurring. Members of the public must know where to turn in order to resolve a dispute. As with general questions of law of central importance to the legal system as a whole, the application of the correctness standard in these cases safeguards predictability, finality and certainty in the law of administrative decision making.

D. A Note Regarding Jurisdictional Questions

[65] We would cease to recognize jurisdictional questions as a distinct category attracting correctness review. The majority in Dunsmuir held that it was "without question" (para. 50) that the correctness standard must be applied in reviewing jurisdictional questions (also referred to as true questions of jurisdiction or vires). True questions of jurisdiction were said to arise "where the tribunal must explicitly determine whether its statutory grant of power gives it the authority to decide a particular matter": see Dunsmuir, at para. 59; Quebec (Attorney General) v. Guérin, 2017 SCC 42, [2017] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 32. Since Dunsmuir, however, majorities of this Court have questioned the necessity of this category, struggled to articulate its scope and "expressed serious reservations about whether such questions can be distinguished as a separate category of questions of law": McLean, at para. 25, referring to Alberta Teachers, at para. 34; Edmonton East, at para. 26; Guérin, at paras. 32-36; CHRC, at paras. 31-41.

[66] As Gascon J. noted in CHRC, the concept of "jurisdiction" in the administrative law context is inherently "slippery": para. 38. This is because, in theory, any challenge to an administrative decision can be characterized as "jurisdictional" in the sense that it calls into question whether the decision maker had the authority to act as it did: see CHRC, at para. 38; Alberta Teachers, at para. 34; see similarly City of Arlington, Texas v. Federal Communications Commission, 569 U.S. 290 (2013), at p. 299. Although this Court's jurisprudence contemplates that only a much narrower class of "truly" jurisdictional questions requires correctness review, it has observed that there are no "clear markers" to distinguish such questions from other questions related to the interpretation of an administrative decision maker's enabling statute: see CHRC, at para. 38. Despite differing views on whether it is possible to demarcate a class of "truly" jurisdictional questions, there is general agreement that "it is often difficult to distinguish between exercises of delegated power that raise truly jurisdictional questions from those entailing an unremarkable application of an enabling statute": CHRC, at para. 111, per Brown J., concurring. This tension is perhaps clearest in cases where the legislature has delegated broad authority to an administrative decision maker that allows the latter to make regulations in pursuit of the objects of its enabling statute: see, e.g., Green v. Law Society of Manitoba, 2017 SCC 20, [2017] 1 S.C.R. 360; West Fraser Mills Ltd. v. British Columbia (Workers' Compensation Appeal Tribunal), 2018 SCC 22, [2018] 1 S.C.R. 635.

[67] In CHRC, the majority, while noting this inherent difficulty — and the negative impact on litigants of the resulting uncertainty in the law — nonetheless left the question of whether the category of true questions of jurisdiction remains necessary to be determined in a later case. After hearing submissions on this issue and having an adequate opportunity for reflection on this point, we are now in a position to conclude that it is not necessary to maintain this category of correctness review. The arguments that support maintaining this category — in particular the concern that a delegated decision maker should not be free to determine the scope of its own authority — can be addressed adequately by applying the framework for conducting reasonableness review that we describe below. Reasonableness review is both robust and responsive to context. A proper application of the reasonableness standard will enable courts to fulfill their constitutional duty to ensure that administrative bodies have acted within the scope of their lawful authority without having to conduct a preliminary assessment regarding whether a particular interpretation raises a "truly" or "narrowly" jurisdictional issue and without having to apply the correctness standard.

[68] Reasonableness review does not give administrative decision makers free rein in interpreting their enabling statutes, and therefore does not give them licence to enlarge their powers beyond what the legislature intended. Instead, it confirms that the governing statutory scheme will always operate as a constraint on administrative decision makers and as a limit on their authority. Even where the reasonableness standard is applied in reviewing a decision maker's interpretation of its authority, precise or narrow statutory language will necessarily limit the number of reasonable interpretations open to the decision maker — perhaps limiting it to one. Conversely, where the legislature has afforded a decision maker broad powers in general terms — and has provided no right of appeal to a court — the legislature's intention that the decision maker have greater leeway in interpreting its enabling statute should be given effect. Without seeking to import the U.S. jurisprudence on this issue wholesale, we find that the following comments of the Supreme Court of the United States in Arlington, at p. 307, are apt:

> The fox-in-the-henhouse syndrome is to be avoided not by establishing an arbitrary and undefinable category of agency decision-making that is accorded no deference, but by taking seriously, and applying rigorously, in all cases, statutory limits on agencies' authority. Where [the legislature] has established a clear line, the agency cannot go beyond it; and where [the legislature] has established an ambiguous line, the agency can go no further than the ambiguity will fairly allow. But in rigorously applying the latter rule, a court need not pause to puzzle over whether the interpretive question presented is "jurisdictional".

E. Other Circumstances Requiring a Derogation From the Presumption of Reasonableness Review

[69] In these reasons, we have identified five situations in which a derogation from the presumption of reasonableness review is warranted either on the basis of legislative intent (i.e., legislated standards of review and statutory appeal mechanisms) or because correctness review is required by the rule of law (i.e., constitutional questions, general questions of law of central importance to the legal system as a whole, and questions regarding jurisdictional boundaries between administrative bodies). This framework is the product of careful consideration undertaken following extensive submissions and based on a thorough review of the relevant jurisprudence. We are of the view, at this time, that these reasons address all of the situations in which a reviewing court should derogate from the presumption of reasonableness review. As previously indicated, courts should no longer engage in a contextual inquiry to determine the standard of review or to rebut the presumption of reasonableness review. Letting go of this contextual approach will, we hope, "get the parties away from arguing about the tests and back to arguing about the substantive merits of their case": Alberta Teachers, at para. 36, quoting Dunsmuir, at para. 145, per Binnie J., concurring.

[70] However, we would not definitively foreclose the possibility that another category could be recognized as requiring a derogation from the presumption of reasonableness review in a future case. But our reluctance to pronounce that the list of exceptions to the application of a reasonableness standard is closed should not be understood as inviting the routine establishment of new categories requiring correctness review. Rather, it is a recognition that it would be unrealistic to declare that we have contemplated every possible set of circumstances in which legislative intent or the rule of law will require a derogation from the presumption of reasonableness review. That being said, the recognition of any new basis for correctness review would be exceptional and would need to be consistent with the framework and the overarching principles set out in these reasons. In other words, any new category warranting a derogation from the presumption of reasonableness review on the basis of legislative intent would require a signal of legislative intent as strong and compelling as those identified in these reasons (i.e., a legislated standard of review or a statutory appeal mechanism). Similarly, the recognition of a new category of questions requiring correctness review that is based on the rule of law would be justified only where failure to apply correctness review would undermine the rule of law and jeopardize the proper functioning of the justice system in a manner analogous to the three situations described in these reasons.

[71] The amici curiae suggest that, in addition to the three categories of legal questions identified above, the Court should recognize an additional category of legal questions that would require correctness review on the basis of the rule of law: legal questions regarding which there is persistent discord or internal disagreement within an administrative body leading to legal incoherence. They argue that correctness review is necessary in such situations because the rule of law breaks down where legal inconsistency becomes the norm and the law's meaning comes to depend on the identity of the decision maker. The amici curiae submit that, where competing reasonable legal interpretations linger over time at the administrative level — such that a statute comes to mean, simultaneously, both "yes" and "no" — the courts must step in to provide a determinative answer to the question without according deference to the administrative decision maker: factum of the amici curiae, at para. 91.

[72] We are not persuaded that the Court should recognize a distinct correctness category for legal questions on which there is persistent discord within an administrative body. In Domtar Inc. v. Quebec (Commission d'appel en matière de lésions professionnelles), 1993 CanLII 106 (SCC), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 756, this Court held that "a lack of unanimity [within a tribunal] is the price to pay for the decision-making freedom and independence given to the members of these tribunals": p. 800; see also Ellis-Don Ltd. v. Ontario (Labour Relations Board), 2001 SCC 4, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 221, at para. 28. That said, we agree that the hypothetical scenario suggested by the amici curiae — in which the law's meaning depends on the identity of the individual decision maker, thereby leading to legal incoherence — is antithetical to the rule of law. In our view, however, the more robust form of reasonableness review set out below, which accounts for the value of consistency and the threat of arbitrariness, is capable, in tandem with internal administrative processes to promote consistency and with legislative oversight (see Domtar, at p. 801), of guarding against threats to the rule of law. Moreover, the precise point at which internal discord on a point of law would be so serious, persistent and unresolvable that the resulting situation would amount to "legal incoherence" and require a court to step in is not obvious. Given these practical difficulties, this Court's binding jurisprudence and the hypothetical nature of the problem, we decline to recognize such a category in this appeal.

III. Performing Reasonableness Review

[73] This Court's administrative law jurisprudence has historically focused on the analytical framework used to determine the applicable standard of review, while providing relatively little guidance on how to conduct reasonableness review in practice.

[74] In this section of our reasons, we endeavour to provide that guidance. The approach we set out is one that focuses on justification, offers methodological consistency and reinforces the principle "that reasoned decision-making is the lynchpin of institutional legitimacy": factum of the amici curiae, at para. 12.

[75] We pause to note that our colleagues' approach to reasonableness review is not fundamentally dissimilar to ours. Our colleagues emphasize that reviewing courts should respect administrative decision makers and their specialized expertise, should not ask how they themselves would have resolved an issue and should focus on whether the applicant has demonstrated that the decision is unreasonable: paras. 288, 289 and 291. We agree. As we have stated above, at para. 13, reasonableness review finds its starting point in judicial restraint and respects the distinct role of administrative decision makers. Moreover, as explained below, reasonableness review considers all relevant circumstances in order to determine whether the applicant has met their onus.

A. Procedural Fairness and Substantive Review

[76] Before turning to a discussion of the proposed approach to reasonableness review, we pause to acknowledge that the requirements of the duty of procedural fairness in a given case — and in particular whether that duty requires a decision maker to give reasons for its decision — will impact how a court conducts reasonableness review.

[77] It is well established that, as a matter of procedural fairness, reasons are not required for all administrative decisions. The duty of procedural fairness in administrative law is "eminently variable", inherently flexible and context-specific: Knight v. Indian Head School Division No. 19, 1990 CanLII 138 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 653, at p. 682; Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 (SCC), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817, at paras. 22-23; Moreau-Bérubé, at paras. 74-75; Dunsmuir, at para. 79. Where a particular administrative decision-making context gives rise to a duty of procedural fairness, the specific procedural requirements that the duty imposes are determined with reference to all of the circumstances: Baker, at para. 21. In Baker, this Court set out a non-exhaustive list of factors that inform the content of the duty of procedural fairness in a particular case, one aspect of which is whether written reasons are required. Those factors include: (1) the nature of the decision being made and the process followed in making it; (2) the nature of the statutory scheme; (3) the importance of the decision to the individual or individuals affected; (4) the legitimate expectations of the person challenging the decision; and (5) the choices of procedure made by the administrative decision maker itself: Baker, at paras. 23-27; see also Congrégation des témoins de Jéhovah de St-Jérôme-Lafontaine v. Lafontaine (Village), 2004 SCC 48, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 650, at para. 5. Cases in which written reasons tend to be required include those in which the decision-making process gives the parties participatory rights, an adverse decision would have a significant impact on an individual or there is a right of appeal: Baker, at para. 43; D. J. M. Brown and the Hon. J. M. Evans, with the assistance of D. Fairlie, Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada (loose-leaf), vol. 3, at p. 12-54.

[78] In the case at bar and in its companion cases, reasons for the administrative decisions at issue were both required and provided. Our discussion of the proper approach to reasonableness review will therefore focus on the circumstances in which reasons for an administrative decision are required and available to the reviewing court.

[79] Notwithstanding the important differences between the administrative context and the judicial context, reasons generally serve many of the same purposes in the former as in the latter: R. v. Sheppard, 2002 SCC 26, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 869, at paras. 15 and 22-23. Reasons explain how and why a decision was made. They help to show affected parties that their arguments have been considered and demonstrate that the decision was made in a fair and lawful manner. Reasons shield against arbitrariness as well as the perception of arbitrariness in the exercise of public power: Congrégation des témoins de Jéhovah de St-Jérôme-Lafontaine, at paras. 12-13. As L'Heureux-Dubé J. noted in Baker, "[t]hose affected may be more likely to feel they were treated fairly and appropriately if reasons are given": para. 39, citing S. A. de Smith, J. Jowell and Lord Woolf, Judicial Review of Administrative Action (5th ed. 1995), at pp. 459-60. And as Jocelyn Stacey and the Hon. Alice Woolley persuasively write, "public decisions gain their democratic and legal authority through a process of public justification" which includes reasons "that justify [the] decisions [of public decision makers] in light of the constitutional, statutory and common law context in which they operate": "Can Pragmatism Function in Administrative Law?" (2016), 74 S.C.L.R. (2d) 211, at p. 220.

[80] The process of drafting reasons also necessarily encourages administrative decision makers to more carefully examine their own thinking and to better articulate their analysis in the process: Baker, at para. 39. This is what Justice Sharpe describes — albeit in the judicial context — as the "discipline of reasons": Good Judgment: Making Judicial Decisions (2018), at p. 134; see also Sheppard, at para. 23.

[81] Reasons facilitate meaningful judicial review by shedding light on the rationale for a decision: Baker, at para. 39. In Newfoundland and Labrador Nurses' Union v. Newfoundland and Labrador (Treasury Board), 2011 SCC 62, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 708, the Court reaffirmed that "the purpose of reasons, when they are required, is to demonstrate 'justification, transparency and intelligibility'": para. 1, quoting Dunsmuir, at para. 47; see also Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 SCC 1, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3, at para. 126. The starting point for our analysis is therefore that where reasons are required, they are the primary mechanism by which administrative decision makers show that their decisions are reasonable — both to the affected parties and to the reviewing courts. It follows that the provision of reasons for an administrative decision may have implications for its legitimacy, including in terms both of whether it is procedurally fair and of whether it is substantively reasonable.

B. Reasonableness Review Is Concerned With the Decision-making Process and Its Outcomes

[82] Reasonableness review aims to give effect to the legislature's intent to leave certain decisions with an administrative body while fulfilling the constitutional role of judicial review to ensure that exercises of state power are subject to the rule of law: see Dunsmuir, at paras. 27-28 and 48; Catalyst Paper Corp. v. North Cowichan (District), 2012 SCC 2, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 5, at para. 10; Reference re Remuneration of

Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 10.

[83] It follows that the focus of reasonableness review must be on the decision actually made by the decision maker, including both the decision maker's reasoning process and the outcome. The role of courts in these circumstances is to review, and they are, at least as a general rule, to refrain from deciding the issue themselves. Accordingly, a court applying the reasonableness standard does not ask what decision it would have made in place of that of the administrative decision maker, attempt to ascertain the "range" of possible conclusions that would have been open to the decision maker, conduct a de novo analysis or seek to determine the "correct" solution to the problem. The Federal Court of Appeal noted in Delios v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 FCA 117, 472 N.R. 171, that, "as reviewing judges, we do not make our own yardstick and then use that yardstick to measure what the administrator did": para. 28; see also Ryan, at paras. 50-51. Instead, the reviewing court must consider only whether the decision made by the administrative decision maker — including both the rationale for the decision and the outcome to which it led — was unreasonable.

[84] As explained above, where the administrative decision maker has provided written reasons, those reasons are the means by which the decision maker communicates the rationale for its decision. A principled approach to reasonableness review is one which puts those reasons first. A reviewing court must begin its inquiry into the reasonableness of a decision by examining the reasons provided with "respectful attention" and seeking to understand the reasoning process followed by the decision maker to arrive at its conclusion: see Dunsmuir, at para. 48, quoting D. Dyzenhaus, "The Politics of Deference: Judicial Review and Democracy", in M. Taggart, ed., The Province of Administrative Law (1997), 279, at p. 286.

[85] Developing an understanding of the reasoning that led to the administrative decision enables a reviewing court to assess whether the decision as a whole is reasonable. As we will explain in greater detail below, a reasonable decision is one that is based on an internally coherent and rational chain of analysis and that is justified in relation to the facts and law that constrain the decision maker. The reasonableness standard requires that a reviewing court defer to such a decision.

[86] Attention to the decision maker's reasons is part of how courts demonstrate respect for the decision-making process: see Dunsmuir, at paras. 47-49. In Dunsmuir, this Court explicitly stated that the court conducting a reasonableness review is concerned with "the qualities that make a decision reasonable, referring both to the process of articulating the reasons and to outcomes": para. 47. Reasonableness, according to Dunsmuir, "is concerned mostly with the existence of justification, transparency and intelligibility within the decision-making process", as well as "with whether the decision falls within a range of possible, acceptable outcomes which are defensible in respect of the facts and law": ibid. In short, it is not enough for the outcome of a decision to be justifiable. Where reasons for a decision are required, the decision must also be justified, by way of those reasons, by the decision maker to those to whom the decision applies. While some outcomes may be so at odds with the legal and factual context that they could never be supported by intelligible and rational reasoning, an otherwise reasonable outcome also cannot stand if it was reached on an improper basis.

[87] This Court's jurisprudence since Dunsmuir should not be understood as having shifted the focus of reasonableness review away from a concern with the reasoning process and toward a nearly exclusive focus on the outcome of the administrative decision under review. Indeed, that a court conducting a reasonableness review properly considers both the outcome of the decision and the reasoning process that led to that outcome was recently reaffirmed in Delta Air Lines Inc. v. Lukács, 2018 SCC 2, [2018] 1 S.C.R. 6, at para. 12. In that case, although the outcome of the decision at issue may not have been unreasonable in the circumstances, the decision was set aside because the outcome had been arrived at on the basis of an unreasonable chain of analysis. This approach is consistent with the direction in Dunsmuir that judicial review is concerned with both outcome and process. To accept otherwise would undermine, rather than demonstrate respect toward, the institutional role of the administrative decision maker.

C. Reasonableness Is a Single Standard That Accounts for Context

[88] In any attempt to develop a coherent and unified approach to judicial review, the sheer variety of decisions and decision makers that such an approach must account for poses an inescapable challenge. The administrative decision makers whose decisions may be subject to judicial review include specialized tribunals exercising adjudicative functions, independent regulatory bodies, ministers, front-line decision makers, and more. Their decisions vary in complexity and importance, ranging from the routine to the life-altering. These include matters of "high policy" on the one hand and "pure law" on the other. Such decisions will sometimes involve complex technical considerations. At other times, common sense and ordinary logic will suffice.

[89] Despite this diversity, reasonableness remains a single standard, and elements of a decision's context do not modulate the standard or the degree of scrutiny by the reviewing court. Instead, the particular context of a decision constrains what will be reasonable for an administrative decision maker to decide in a given case. This is what it means to say that "[r]easonableness is a single standard that takes its colour from the context": Khosa, at para. 59; Catalyst, at para. 18; Halifax (Regional Municipality) v. Nova Scotia (Human Rights Commission), 2012 SCC 10, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 364, at para. 44; Wilson, at para. 22, per Abella J.; Canada (Attorney General) v. Igloo Vikski Inc., 2016 SCC 38, [2016] 2 S.C.R. 80, at para. 57, per Côté J., dissenting but not on this point; Law Society of British Columbia v. Trinity Western University, 2018 SCC 32, [2018] 2 S.C.R. 293, at para. 53.

[90] The approach to reasonableness review that we articulate in these reasons accounts for the diversity of administrative decision making by recognizing that what is reasonable in a given situation will always depend on the constraints imposed by the legal and factual context of the particular decision under review. These contextual constraints dictate the limits and contours of the space in which the decision maker may act and the types of solutions it may adopt. The fact that the contextual constraints operating on an administrative decision maker may vary from one decision to another does not pose a problem for the reasonableness standard, because each decision must be both justified by the administrative body and evaluated by reviewing courts in relation to its own particular context.

D. Formal Reasons for a Decision Should Be Read in Light of the Record and With Due Sensitivity to the Administrative Setting in Which They Were Given

[91] A reviewing court must bear in mind that the written reasons given by an administrative body must not be assessed against a standard of perfection. That the reasons given for a decision do "not include all the arguments, statutory provisions, jurisprudence or other details the reviewing judge would have preferred" is not on its own a basis to set the decision aside: Newfoundland Nurses, at para. 16. The review of an administrative decision can be divorced neither from the institutional context in which the decision was made nor from the history of the proceedings.

[92] Administrative decision makers cannot always be expected to deploy the same array of legal techniques that might be expected of a lawyer or judge — nor will it always be necessary or even useful for them to do so. Instead, the concepts and language employed by administrative decision makers will often be highly specific to their fields of experience and expertise, and this may impact both the form and content of their reasons. These differences are not necessarily a sign of an unreasonable decision — indeed, they may be indicative of a decision maker's strength within its particular and specialized domain. "Administrative justice" will not always look like "judicial justice", and reviewing courts must remain acutely aware of that fact.

[93] An administrative decision maker may demonstrate through its reasons that a given decision was made by bringing that institutional expertise and experience to bear: see Dunsmuir, at para. 49. In conducting reasonableness review, judges should be attentive to the application by decision makers of specialized knowledge, as demonstrated by their reasons. Respectful attention to a decision maker's demonstrated expertise may reveal to a reviewing court that an outcome that might be puzzling or counterintuitive on its face nevertheless accords with the purposes and practical realities of the relevant administrative regime and represents a reasonable approach given the consequences and the operational impact of the decision. This demonstrated experience and expertise may also explain why a given issue is treated in less detail.

[94] The reviewing court must also read the decision maker's reasons in light of the history and context of the proceedings in which they were rendered. For example, the reviewing court might consider the evidence before the decision maker, the submissions of the parties, publicly available policies or guidelines that informed the decision maker's work, and past decisions of the relevant administrative body. This may explain an aspect of the decision maker's reasoning process that is not apparent from the reasons themselves, or may reveal that an apparent shortcoming in the reasons is not, in fact, a failure of justification, intelligibility or transparency. Opposing parties may have made concessions that had obviated the need for the decision maker to adjudicate on a particular issue; the decision maker may have followed a well-established line of administrative case law that no party had challenged during the proceedings; or an individual decision maker may have adopted an interpretation set out in a public interpretive policy of the administrative body of which he or she is a member.

[95] That being said, reviewing courts must keep in mind the principle that the exercise of public power must be justified, intelligible and transparent, not in the abstract, but to the individuals subject to it. It would therefore be unacceptable for an administrative decision maker to provide an affected party formal reasons that fail to justify its decision, but nevertheless expect that its decision would be upheld on the basis of internal records that were not available to that party.

[96] Where, even if the reasons given by an administrative decision maker for a decision are read with sensitivity to the institutional setting and in light of the record, they contain a fundamental gap or reveal that the decision is based on an unreasonable chain of analysis, it is not ordinarily appropriate for the reviewing court to fashion its own reasons in order to buttress the administrative decision. Even if the outcome of the decision could be reasonable under different circumstances, it is not open to a reviewing court to disregard the flawed basis for a decision and substitute its own justification for the outcome: Delta Air Lines, at paras. 26-28. To allow a reviewing court to do so would be to allow an administrative decision maker to abdicate its responsibility to justify to the affected party, in a manner that is transparent and intelligible, the basis on which it arrived at a particular conclusion. This would also amount to adopting an approach to reasonableness review focused solely on the outcome of a decision, to the exclusion of the rationale for that decision. To the extent that cases such as Newfoundland Nurses and Alberta Teachers have been taken as suggesting otherwise, such a view is mistaken.

[97] Indeed, Newfoundland Nurses is far from holding that a decision maker's grounds or rationale for a decision is irrelevant. It instead tells us that close attention must be paid to a decision maker's written reasons and that they must be read holistically and contextually, for the very purpose of understanding the basis on which a decision was made. We agree with the observations of Rennie J. in Komolafe v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2013 FC 431, 16 Imm. L.R. (4th) 267, at para. 11:

> Newfoundland Nurses is not an open invitation to the Court to provide reasons that were not given, nor is it licence to guess what findings might have been made or to speculate as to what the tribunal might have been thinking. This is particularly so where the reasons are silent on a critical issue. It is ironic that Newfoundland Nurses, a case which at its core is about deference and standard of review, is urged as authority for the supervisory court to do the task that the decision maker did not do, to supply the reasons that might have been given and make findings of fact that were not made. This is to turn the jurisprudence on its head. Newfoundland Nurses allows reviewing courts to connect the dots on the page where the lines, and the direction they are headed, may be readily drawn.

[98] As for Alberta Teachers, it concerned a very specific and exceptional circumstance in which the reviewing court had exercised its discretion to consider a question of statutory interpretation on judicial review, even though that question had not been raised before the administrative decision maker and, as a result, no reasons had been given on that issue: paras. 22-26. Furthermore, it was agreed that the ultimate decision maker — the Information and Privacy Commissioner's delegate — had applied a well-established interpretation of the statutory provision in question and that, had she been asked for reasons to justify her interpretation, she would have adopted reasons the Commissioner had given in past decisions. In other words, the reasons of the Commissioner that this Court relied on to find that the administrative decision was reasonable were not merely reasons that could have been offered, in an abstract sense, but reasons that would have been offered had the issue been raised before the decision maker. Far from suggesting in Alberta Teachers that reasonableness review is concerned primarily with outcome, as opposed to rationale, this Court rejected the position that a reviewing court is entitled to "reformulate a tribunal's decision in a way that casts aside an unreasonable chain of analysis in favour of the court's own rationale for the result": para. 54, quoting Petro-Canada v. British Columbia (Workers' Compensation Board), 2009 BCCA 396, 276 B.C.A.C. 135, at paras. 53 and 56. In Alberta Teachers, this Court also reaffirmed the importance of giving proper reasons and reiterated that "deference under the reasonableness standard is best given effect when administrative decision makers provide intelligible and transparent justification for their decisions, and when courts ground their review of the decision in the reasons provided": para. 54. Where a decision maker's rationale for an essential element of the decision is not addressed in the reasons and cannot be inferred from the record, the decision will generally fail to meet the requisite standard of justification, transparency and intelligibility.

E. A Reasonable Decision Is One That Is Both Based on an Internally Coherent Reasoning and Justified in Light of the Legal and Factual Constraints That Bear on the Decision

[99] A reviewing court must develop an understanding of the decision maker's reasoning process in order to determine whether the decision as a whole is reasonable. To make this determination, the reviewing court asks whether the decision bears the hallmarks of reasonableness — justification, transparency and intelligibility — and whether it is justified in relation to the relevant factual and legal constraints that bear on the decision: Dunsmuir, at paras. 47 and 74; Catalyst, at para. 13.

[100] The burden is on the party challenging the decision to show that it is unreasonable. Before a decision can be set aside on this basis, the reviewing court must be satisfied that there are sufficiently serious shortcomings in the decision such that it cannot be said to exhibit the requisite degree of justification, intelligibility and transparency. Any alleged flaws or shortcomings must be more than merely superficial or peripheral to the merits of the decision. It would be improper for a reviewing court to overturn an administrative decision simply because its reasoning exhibits a minor misstep. Instead, the court must be satisfied that any shortcomings or flaws relied on by the party challenging the decision are sufficiently central or significant to render the decision unreasonable.

[101] What makes a decision unreasonable? We find it conceptually useful here to consider two types of fundamental flaws. The first is a failure of rationality internal to the reasoning process. The second arises when a decision is in some respect untenable in light of the relevant factual and legal constraints that bear on it. There is, however, no need for reviewing courts to categorize failures of reasonableness as belonging to one type or the other. Rather, we use these descriptions simply as a convenient way to discuss the types of issues that may show a decision to be unreasonable.

(1) A Reasonable Decision Is Based on an Internally Coherent Reasoning

[102] To be reasonable, a decision must be based on reasoning that is both rational and logical. It follows that a failure in this respect may lead a reviewing court to conclude that a decision must be set aside. Reasonableness review is not a "line-by-line treasure hunt for error": Irving Pulp & Paper, at para. 54, citing Newfoundland Nurses, at para. 14. However, the reviewing court must be able to trace the decision maker's reasoning without encountering any fatal flaws in its overarching logic, and it must be satisfied that "there is [a] line of analysis within the given reasons that could reasonably lead the tribunal from the evidence before it to the conclusion at which it arrived": Ryan, at para. 55; Southam, at para. 56. Reasons that "simply repeat statutory language, summarize arguments made, and then state a peremptory conclusion" will rarely assist a reviewing court in understanding the rationale underlying a decision and "are no substitute for statements of fact, analysis, inference and judgment": R. A. Macdonald and D. Lametti, "Reasons for Decision in Administrative Law" (1990), 3 C.J.A.L.P. 123, at p. 139; see also Gonzalez v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2014 FC 750, 27 Imm. L.R. (4th) 151, at paras. 57-59.

[103] While, as we indicated earlier (at paras. 89-96), formal reasons should be read in light of the record and with due sensitivity to the administrative regime in which they were given, a decision will be unreasonable if the reasons for it, read holistically, fail to reveal a rational chain of analysis or if they reveal that the decision was based on an irrational chain of analysis: see Wright v. Nova Scotia (Human Rights Commission), 2017 NSSC 11, 23 Admin. L.R. (6th) 110; Southam, at para. 56. A decision will also be unreasonable where the conclusion reached cannot follow from the analysis undertaken (see Sangmo v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2016 FC 17, at para. 21 (CanLII)) or if the reasons read in conjunction with the record do not make it possible to understand the decision maker's reasoning on a critical point (see Blas v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2014 FC 629, 26 Imm. L.R. (4th) 92, at paras. 54-66; Reid v. Criminal Injuries Compensation Board, 2015 ONSC 6578; Lloyd v. Canada (Attorney General), 2016 FCA 115, 2016 D.T.C. 5051; Taman v. Canada (Attorney General), 2017 FCA 1, [2017] 3 F.C.R. 520, at para. 47).

[104] Similarly, the internal rationality of a decision may be called into question if the reasons exhibit clear logical fallacies, such as circular reasoning, false dilemmas, unfounded generalizations or an absurd premise. This is not an invitation to hold administrative decision makers to the formalistic constraints and standards of academic logicians. However, a reviewing court must ultimately be satisfied that the decision maker's reasoning "adds up".

(2) A Reasonable Decision Is Justified in Light of the Legal and Factual Constraints That Bear on the Decision

[105] In addition to the need for internally coherent reasoning, a decision, to be reasonable, must be justified in relation to the constellation of law and facts that are relevant to the decision: Dunsmuir, at para. 47; Catalyst, at para. 13; Nor-Man Regional Health Authority, at para. 6. Elements of the legal and factual contexts of a decision operate as constraints on the decision maker in the exercise of its delegated powers.

[106] It is unnecessary to catalogue all of the legal or factual considerations that could constrain an administrative decision maker in a particular case. However, in the sections that follow, we discuss a number of elements that will generally be relevant in evaluating whether a given decision is reasonable, namely: the governing statutory scheme; other relevant statutory or common law; the principles of statutory interpretation; the evidence before the decision maker and facts of which the decision maker may take notice; the submissions of the parties; the past practices and decisions of the administrative body; and the potential impact of the decision on the individual to whom it applies. These elements are not a checklist for conducting reasonableness review, and they may vary in significance depending on the context. They are offered merely to highlight some elements of the surrounding context that can cause a reviewing court to lose confidence in the outcome reached.

[107] A reviewing court may find that a decision is unreasonable when examined against these contextual considerations. These elements necessarily interact with one another: for example, a reasonable penalty for professional misconduct in a given case must be justified both with respect to the types of penalties prescribed by the relevant legislation and with respect to the nature of the underlying misconduct.

(a) Governing Statutory Scheme

[108] Because administrative decision makers receive their powers by statute, the governing statutory scheme is likely to be the most salient aspect of the legal context relevant to a particular decision. That administrative decision makers play a role, along with courts, in elaborating the precise content of the administrative schemes they administer should not be taken to mean that administrative decision makers are permitted to disregard or rewrite the law as enacted by Parliament and the provincial legislatures. Thus, for example, while an administrative body may have considerable discretion in making a particular decision, that decision must ultimately comply "with the rationale and purview of the statutory scheme under which it is adopted": Catalyst, at paras. 15 and 25-28; see also Green, at para. 44. As Rand J. noted in Roncarelli v. Duplessis, 1959 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1959] S.C.R. 121, at p. 140, "there is no such thing as absolute and untrammelled 'discretion'", and any exercise of discretion must accord with the purposes for which it was given: see also Congrégation des témoins de Jéhovah de St-Jérôme-Lafontaine, at para. 7; Montréal (City) v. Montreal Port Authority, 2010 SCC 14, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 427, at paras. 32-33; Nor-Man Regional Health Authority, at para. 6. Likewise, a decision must comport with any more specific constraints imposed by the governing legislative scheme, such as the statutory definitions, principles or formulas that prescribe the exercise of a discretion: see Montréal (City), at paras. 33 and 40-41; Canada (Attorney General) v. Almon Equipment Limited, 2010 FCA 193, [2011] 4 F.C.R. 203, at paras. 38-40. The statutory scheme also informs the acceptable approaches to decision making: for example, where a decision maker is given wide discretion, it would be unreasonable for it to fetter that discretion: see Delta Air Lines, at para. 18.

[109] As stated above, a proper application of the reasonableness standard is capable of allaying the concern that an administrative decision maker might interpret the scope of its own authority beyond what the legislature intended. As a result, there is no need to maintain a category of "truly" jurisdictional questions that are subject to correctness review. Although a decision maker's interpretation of its statutory grant of authority is generally entitled to deference, the decision maker must nonetheless properly justify that interpretation. Reasonableness review does not allow administrative decision makers to arrogate powers to themselves that they were never intended to have, and an administrative body cannot exercise authority which was not delegated to it. Contrary to our colleagues' concern (at para. 285), this does not reintroduce the concept of "jurisdictional error" into judicial review, but merely identifies one of the obvious and necessary constraints imposed on administrative decision makers.

[110] Whether an interpretation is justified will depend on the context, including the language chosen by the legislature in describing the limits and contours of the decision maker's authority. If a legislature wishes to precisely circumscribe an administrative decision maker's power in some respect, it can do so by using precise and narrow language and delineating the power in detail, thereby tightly constraining the decision maker's ability to interpret the provision. Conversely, where the legislature chooses to use broad, open-ended or highly qualitative language — for example, "in the public interest" — it clearly contemplates that the decision maker is to have greater flexibility in interpreting the meaning of such language. Other language will fall in the middle of this spectrum. All of this is to say that certain questions relating to the scope of a decision maker's authority may support more than one interpretation, while other questions may support only one, depending upon the text by which the statutory grant of authority is made. What matters is whether, in the eyes of the reviewing court, the decision maker has properly justified its interpretation of the statute in light of the surrounding context. It will, of course, be impossible for an administrative decision maker to justify a decision that strays beyond the limits set by the statutory language it is interpreting.

(b) Other Statutory or Common Law

[111] It is evident that both statutory and common law will impose constraints on how and what an administrative decision maker can lawfully decide: see Dunsmuir, at paras. 47 and 74. For example, an administrative decision maker interpreting the scope of its regulation-making authority in order to exercise that authority cannot adopt an interpretation that is inconsistent with applicable common law principles regarding the nature of statutory powers: see Katz Group Canada Inc. v. Ontario (Health and Long-Term Care), 2013 SCC 64, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 810, at paras. 45-48. Neither can a body instructed by legislation to determine what tax rate is applicable in accordance with an existing tax system ignore that system and base its determination on a "fictitious" system it has arbitrarily created: Montréal (City), at para. 40. Where a relationship is governed by private law, it would be unreasonable for a decision maker to ignore that law in adjudicating parties' rights within that relationship: Dunsmuir, at para. 74. Similarly, where the governing statute specifies a standard that is well known in law and in the jurisprudence, a reasonable decision will generally be one that is consistent with the established understanding of that standard: see, e.g., the discussion of "reasonable grounds to suspect" in Canada (Transport, Infrastructure and Communities) v. Farwaha, 2014 FCA 56, [2015] 2 F.C.R. 1006, at paras. 93-98.

[112] Any precedents on the issue before the administrative decision maker or on a similar issue will act as a constraint on what the decision maker can reasonably decide. An administrative body's decision may be unreasonable on the basis that the body failed to explain or justify a departure from a binding precedent in which the same provision had been interpreted. Where, for example, there is a relevant case in which a court considered a statutory provision, it would be unreasonable for an administrative decision maker to interpret or apply the provision without regard to that precedent. The decision maker would have to be able to explain why a different interpretation is preferable by, for example, explaining why the court's interpretation does not work in the administrative context: M. Biddulph, "Rethinking the Ramifications of Reasonableness Review: Stare Decisis and Reasonableness Review on Questions of Law" (2018), 56 Alta. L.R. 119, at p. 146. There may be circumstances in which it is quite simply unreasonable for an administrative decision maker to fail to apply or interpret a statutory provision in accordance with a binding precedent. For instance, where an immigration tribunal is required to determine whether an applicant's act would constitute a criminal offence under Canadian law (see, e.g., Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, S.C. 2001, c. 27, ss. 35 to 37), it would clearly not be reasonable for the tribunal to adopt an interpretation of a criminal law provision that is inconsistent with how Canadian criminal courts have interpreted it.

[113] That being said, administrative decision makers will not necessarily be required to apply equitable and common law principles in the same manner as courts in order for their decisions to be reasonable. For example, it may be reasonable for a decision maker to adapt a common law or equitable doctrine to its administrative context: see Nor-Man Regional Health Authority, at paras. 5-6, 44-45, 52, 54 and 60. Conversely, a decision maker that rigidly applies a common law doctrine without adapting it to the relevant administrative context may be acting unreasonably: see Delta Air Lines, at paras. 16-17 and 30. In short, whether an administrative decision maker has acted reasonably in adapting a legal or equitable doctrine involves a highly context-specific determination.

[114] We would also note that in some administrative decision making contexts, international law will operate as an important constraint on an administrative decision maker. It is well established that legislation is presumed to operate in conformity with Canada's international obligations, and the legislature is "presumed to comply with the values and principles of customary and conventional international law": R. v. Hape, 2007 SCC 26, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 292, at para. 53; R. v. Appulonappa, 2015 SCC 59, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 754, at para. 40. Since Baker, it has also been clear that international treaties and conventions, even where they have not been implemented domestically by statute, can help to inform whether a decision was a reasonable exercise of administrative power: Baker, at paras. 69-71.

(c) Principles of Statutory Interpretation

[115] Matters of statutory interpretation are not treated uniquely and, as with other questions of law, may be evaluated on a reasonableness standard. Although the general approach to reasonableness review described above applies in such cases, we recognize that it is necessary to provide additional guidance to reviewing courts on this point. This is because reviewing courts are accustomed to resolving questions of statutory interpretation in a context in which the issue is before them at first instance or on appeal, and where they are expected to perform their own independent analysis and come to their own conclusions.

[116] Reasonableness review functions differently. Where reasonableness is the applicable standard on a question of statutory interpretation, the reviewing court does not undertake a de novo analysis of the question or "ask itself what the correct decision would have been": Ryan, at para. 50. Instead, just as it does when applying the reasonableness standard in reviewing questions of fact, discretion or policy, the court must examine the administrative decision as a whole, including the reasons provided by the decision maker and the outcome that was reached.

[117] A court interpreting a statutory provision does so by applying the "modern principle" of statutory interpretation, that is, that the words of a statute must be read "in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament": Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, at para. 21, and Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership v. Rex, 2002 SCC 42, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 559, at para. 26, both quoting E. Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 87. Parliament and the provincial legislatures have also provided guidance by way of statutory rules that explicitly govern the interpretation of statutes and regulations: see, e.g., Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21.

[118] This Court has adopted the "modern principle" as the proper approach to statutory interpretation, because legislative intent can be understood only by reading the language chosen by the legislature in light of the purpose of the provision and the entire relevant context: Sullivan, at pp. 7-8. Those who draft and enact statutes expect that questions about their meaning will be resolved by an analysis that has regard to the text, context and purpose, regardless of whether the entity tasked with interpreting the law is a court or an administrative decision maker. An approach to reasonableness review that respects legislative intent must therefore assume that those who interpret the law — whether courts or administrative decision makers — will do so in a manner consistent with this principle of interpretation.

[119] Administrative decision makers are not required to engage in a formalistic statutory interpretation exercise in every case. As discussed above, formal reasons for a decision will not always be necessary and may, where required, take different forms. And even where the interpretive exercise conducted by the administrative decision maker is set out in written reasons, it may look quite different from that of a court. The specialized expertise and experience of administrative decision makers may sometimes lead them to rely, in interpreting a provision, on considerations that a court would not have thought to employ but that actually enrich and elevate the interpretive exercise.

[120] But whatever form the interpretive exercise takes, the merits of an administrative decision maker's interpretation of a statutory provision must be consistent with the text, context and purpose of the provision. In this sense, the usual principles of statutory interpretation apply equally when an administrative decision maker interprets a provision. Where, for example, the words used are "precise and unequivocal", their ordinary meaning will usually play a more significant role in the interpretive exercise: Canada Trustco Mortgage Co. v. Canada, 2005 SCC 54, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 601, at para. 10. Where the meaning of a statutory provision is disputed in administrative proceedings, the decision maker must demonstrate in its reasons that it was alive to these essential elements.

[121] The administrative decision maker's task is to interpret the contested provision in a manner consistent with the text, context and purpose, applying its particular insight into the statutory scheme at issue. It cannot adopt an interpretation it knows to be inferior — albeit plausible — merely because the interpretation in question appears to be available and is expedient. The decision maker's responsibility is to discern meaning and legislative intent, not to "reverse-engineer" a desired outcome.

[122] It can happen that an administrative decision maker, in interpreting a statutory provision, fails entirely to consider a pertinent aspect of its text, context or purpose. Where such an omission is a minor aspect of the interpretive context, it is not likely to undermine the decision as a whole. It is well established that decision makers are not required "to explicitly address all possible shades of meaning" of a given provision: Construction Labour Relations v. Driver Iron Inc., 2012 SCC 65, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 405, at para. 3. Just like judges, administrative decision makers may find it unnecessary to dwell on each and every signal of statutory intent in their reasons. In many cases, it may be necessary to touch upon only the most salient aspects of the text, context or purpose. If, however, it is clear that the administrative decision maker may well, had it considered a key element of a statutory provision's text, context or purpose, have arrived at a different result, its failure to consider that element would be indefensible, and unreasonable in the circumstances. Like other aspects of reasonableness review, omissions are not stand-alone grounds for judicial intervention: the key question is whether the omitted aspect of the analysis causes the reviewing court to lose confidence in the outcome reached by the decision maker.

[123] There may be other cases in which the administrative decision maker has not explicitly considered the meaning of a relevant provision in its reasons, but the reviewing court is able to discern the interpretation adopted by the decision maker from the record and determine whether that interpretation is reasonable.

[124] Finally, even though the task of a court conducting a reasonableness review is not to perform a de novo analysis or to determine the "correct" interpretation of a disputed provision, it may sometimes become clear in the course of reviewing a decision that the interplay of text, context and purpose leaves room for a single reasonable interpretation of the statutory provision, or aspect of the statutory provision, that is at issue: Dunsmuir, at paras. 72-76. One case in which this conclusion was reached was Nova Tube Inc./Nova Steel Inc. v. Conares Metal Supply Ltd., 2019 FCA 52, in which Laskin J.A., after analyzing the reasoning of the administrative decision maker (at paras. 26-61 (CanLII)), held that the decision maker's interpretation had been unreasonable, and, furthermore, that the factors he had considered in his analysis weighed so overwhelmingly in favour of the opposite interpretation that that was the only reasonable interpretation of the provision: para. 61. As discussed below, it would serve no useful purpose in such a case to remit the interpretative question to the original decision maker. Even so, a court should generally pause before definitively pronouncing upon the interpretation of a provision entrusted to an administrative decision maker.

(d) Evidence Before the Decision Maker

[125] It is trite law that the decision maker may assess and evaluate the evidence before it and that, absent exceptional circumstances, a reviewing court will not interfere with its factual findings. The reviewing court must refrain from "reweighing and reassessing the evidence considered by the decision maker": CHRC, at para. 55; see also Khosa, at para. 64; Dr. Q, at paras. 41-42. Indeed, many of the same reasons that support an appellate court's deferring to a lower court's factual findings, including the need for judicial efficiency, the importance of preserving certainty and public confidence, and the relatively advantageous position of the first instance decision maker, apply equally in the context of judicial review: see Housen, at paras. 15-18; Dr. Q, at para. 38; Dunsmuir, at para. 53.

[126] That being said, a reasonable decision is one that is justified in light of the facts: Dunsmuir, at para. 47. The decision maker must take the evidentiary record and the general factual matrix that bears on its decision into account, and its decision must be reasonable in light of them: see Southam, at para. 56. The reasonableness of a decision may be jeopardized where the decision maker has fundamentally misapprehended or failed to account for the evidence before it. In Baker, for example, the decision maker had relied on irrelevant stereotypes and failed to consider relevant evidence, which led to a conclusion that there was a reasonable apprehension of bias: para. 48. Moreover, the decision maker's approach would also have supported a finding that the decision was unreasonable on the basis that the decision maker showed that his conclusions were not based on the evidence that was actually before him: ibid.

(e) Submissions of the Parties

[127] The principles of justification and transparency require that an administrative decision maker's reasons meaningfully account for the central issues and concerns raised by the parties. The principle that the individual or individuals affected by a decision should have the opportunity to present their case fully and fairly underlies the duty of procedural fairness and is rooted in the right to be heard: Baker, at para. 28. The concept of responsive reasons is inherently bound up with this principle, because reasons are the primary mechanism by which decision makers demonstrate that they have actually listened to the parties.

[128] Reviewing courts cannot expect administrative decision makers to "respond to every argument or line of possible analysis" (Newfoundland Nurses, at para. 25), or to "make an explicit finding on each constituent element, however subordinate, leading to its final conclusion" (para. 16). To impose such expectations would have a paralyzing effect on the proper functioning of administrative bodies and would needlessly compromise important values such as efficiency and access to justice. However, a decision maker's failure to meaningfully grapple with key issues or central arguments raised by the parties may call into question whether the decision maker was actually alert and sensitive to the matter before it. In addition to assuring parties that their concerns have been heard, the process of drafting reasons with care and attention can alert the decision maker to inadvertent gaps and other flaws in its reasoning: Baker, at para. 39.

(f) Past Practices and Past Decisions

[129] Administrative decision makers are not bound by their previous decisions in the same sense that courts are bound by stare decisis. As this Court noted in Domtar, "a lack of unanimity is the price to pay for the decision-making freedom and independence" given to administrative decision makers, and the mere fact that some conflict exists among an administrative body's decisions does not threaten the rule of law: p. 800. Nevertheless, administrative decision makers and reviewing courts alike must be concerned with the general consistency of administrative decisions. Those affected by administrative decisions are entitled to expect that like cases will generally be treated alike and that outcomes will not depend merely on the identity of the individual decision maker — expectations that do not evaporate simply because the parties are not before a judge.

[130] Fortunately, administrative bodies generally have a range of resources at their disposal to address these types of concerns. Access to past reasons and summaries of past reasons enables multiple individual decision makers within a single organization (such as administrative tribunal members) to learn from each other's work, and contributes to a harmonized decision-making culture. Institutions also routinely rely on standards, policy directives and internal legal opinions to encourage greater uniformity and guide the work of frontline decision makers. This Court has also held that plenary meetings of a tribunal's members can be an effective tool to "foster coherence" and "avoid . . . conflicting results": IWA v. Consolidated-Bathurst Packaging Ltd., 1990 CanLII 132 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 282, at pp. 324-28. Where disagreement arises within an administrative body about how to appropriately resolve a given issue, that institution may also develop strategies to address that divergence internally and on its own initiative. Of course, consistency can also be encouraged through less formal methods, such as the development of training materials, checklists and templates for the purpose of streamlining and strengthening institutional best practices, provided that these methods do not operate to fetter decision making.

[131] Whether a particular decision is consistent with the administrative body's past decisions is also a constraint that the reviewing court should consider when determining whether an administrative decision is reasonable. Where a decision maker does depart from longstanding practices or established internal authority, it bears the justificatory burden of explaining that departure in its reasons. If the decision maker does not satisfy this burden, the decision will be unreasonable. In this sense, the legitimate expectations of the parties help to determine both whether reasons are required and what those reasons must explain: Baker, at para. 26. We repeat that this does not mean administrative decision makers are bound by internal precedent in the same manner as courts. Rather, it means that a decision that departs from longstanding practices or established internal decisions will be reasonable if that departure is justified, thereby reducing the risk of arbitrariness, which would undermine public confidence in administrative decision makers and in the justice system as a whole.

[132] As discussed above, it has been argued that correctness review would be required where there is "persistent discord" on questions on law in an administrative body's decisions. While we are not of the view that such a correctness category is required, we would note that reviewing courts have a role to play in managing the risk of persistently discordant or contradictory legal interpretations within an administrative body's decisions. When evidence of internal disagreement on legal issues has been put before a reviewing court, the court may find it appropriate to telegraph the existence of an issue in its reasons and encourage the use of internal administrative structures to resolve the disagreement. And if internal disagreement continues, it may become increasingly difficult for the administrative body to justify decisions that serve only to preserve the discord.

(g) Impact of the Decision on the Affected Individual

[133] It is well established that individuals are entitled to greater procedural protection when the decision in question involves the potential for significant personal impact or harm: Baker, at para. 25.

However, this principle also has implications for how a court conducts reasonableness review. Central to the necessity of adequate justification is the perspective of the individual or party over whom authority is being exercised. Where the impact of a decision on an individual's rights and interests is severe, the reasons provided to that individual must reflect the stakes. The principle of responsive justification means that if a decision has particularly harsh consequences for the affected individual, the decision maker must explain why its decision best reflects the legislature's intention. This includes decisions with consequences that threaten an individual's life, liberty, dignity or livelihood.

[134] Moreover, concerns regarding arbitrariness will generally be more acute in cases where the consequences of the decision for the affected party are particularly severe or harsh, and a failure to grapple with such consequences may well be unreasonable. For example, this Court has held that the Immigration Appeal Division should, when exercising its equitable jurisdiction to stay a removal order under the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, consider the potential foreign hardship a deported person would face: Chieu v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 SCC 3, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 84.

[135] Many administrative decision makers are entrusted with an extraordinary degree of power over the lives of ordinary people, including the most vulnerable among us. The corollary to that power is a heightened responsibility on the part of administrative decision makers to ensure that their reasons demonstrate that they have considered the consequences of a decision and that those consequences are justified in light of the facts and law.

F. Review in the Absence of Reasons

[136] Where the duty of procedural fairness or the legislative scheme mandates that reasons be given to the affected party but none have been given, this failure will generally require the decision to be set aside and the matter remitted to the decision maker: see, e.g., Congrégation des témoins de Jéhovah de St-Jérôme-Lafontaine, at para. 35. Also, where reasons are provided but they fail to provide a transparent and intelligible justification as explained above, the decision will be unreasonable. In many cases, however, neither the duty of procedural fairness nor the statutory scheme will require that formal reasons be given at all: Baker, at para. 43.

[137] Admittedly, applying an approach to judicial review that prioritizes the decision maker's justification for its decisions can be challenging in cases in which formal reasons have not been provided. This will often occur where the decision-making process does not easily lend itself to producing a single set of reasons, for example, where a municipality passes a bylaw or a law society renders a decision by holding a vote: see, e.g., Catalyst; Green; Trinity Western University. However, even in such circumstances, the reasoning process that underlies the decision will not usually be opaque. It is important to recall that a reviewing court must look to the record as a whole to understand the decision, and that in doing so, the court will often uncover a clear rationale for the decision: Baker, at para. 44. For example, as McLachlin C.J. noted in Catalyst, "[t]he reasons for a municipal bylaw are traditionally deduced from the debate, deliberations and the statements of policy that give rise to the bylaw": para. 29. In that case, not only were "the reasons [in the sense of rationale] for the bylaw . . . clear to everyone", they had also been laid out in a five-year plan: para. 33. Conversely, even without reasons, it is possible for the record and the context to reveal that a decision was made on the basis of an improper motive or for another impermissible reason, as, for example, in Roncarelli.

[138] There will nonetheless be situations in which no reasons have been provided and neither the record nor the larger context sheds light on the basis for the decision. In such a case, the reviewing court must still examine the decision in light of the relevant constraints on the decision maker in order to determine whether the decision is reasonable. But it is perhaps inevitable that without reasons, the analysis will then focus on the outcome rather than on the decision maker's reasoning process. This does not mean that reasonableness review is less robust in such circumstances, only that it takes a different shape.

G. A Note on Remedial Discretion

[139] Where a court reviews an administrative decision, the question of the appropriate remedy is multi-faceted. It engages considerations that include the reviewing court's common law or statutory jurisdiction and the great diversity of elements that may influence a court's decision to exercise its discretion in respect of available remedies. While we do not aim to comprehensively address here the issue of remedies on judicial review, we do wish to briefly address the question of whether a court that quashes an unreasonable decision should exercise its discretion to remit the matter to the decision maker for reconsideration with the benefit of the court's reasons.

[140] Where the reasonableness standard is applied in conducting a judicial review, the choice of remedy must be guided by the rationale for applying that standard to begin with, including the recognition by the reviewing court that the legislature has entrusted the matter to the administrative decision maker, and not to the court, to decide: see Delta Air Lines, at para. 31. However, the question of remedy must also be guided by concerns related to the proper administration of the justice system, the need to ensure access to justice and "the goal of expedient and cost-efficient decision making, which often motivates the creation of specialized administrative tribunals in the first place": Alberta Teachers, at para. 55.

[141] Giving effect to these principles in the remedial context means that where a decision reviewed by applying the reasonableness standard cannot be upheld, it will most often be appropriate to remit the matter to the decision maker to have it reconsider the decision, this time with the benefit of the court's reasons. In reconsidering its decision, the decision maker may arrive at the same, or a different, outcome: see Delta Air Lines, at paras. 30-31.

[142] However, while courts should, as a general rule, respect the legislature's intention to entrust the matter to the administrative decision maker, there are limited scenarios in which remitting the matter would stymie the timely and effective resolution of matters in a manner that no legislature could have intended: D'Errico v. Canada (Attorney General), 2014 FCA 95, 459 N.R. 167, at paras. 18-19. An intention that the administrative decision maker decide the matter at first instance cannot give rise to an endless merry-go-round of judicial reviews and subsequent reconsiderations. Declining to remit a matter to the decision maker may be appropriate where it becomes evident to the court, in the course of its review, that a particular outcome is inevitable and that remitting the case would therefore serve no useful purpose: see Mobil Oil Canada Ltd. v. Canada-Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board, 1994 CanLII 114 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 202, at pp. 228-30; Renaud v. Quebec (Commission des affaires sociales), 1999 CanLII 642 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 855; Groia v. Law Society of Upper Canada, 2018 SCC 27, [2018] 1 S.C.R. 772, at para. 161; Sharif v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 FCA 205, 50 C.R. (7th) 1, at paras. 53-54; Maple Lodge Farms Ltd. v. Canadian Food Inspection Agency, 2017 FCA 45, 411 D.L.R. (4th) 175, at paras. 51-56 and 84; Gehl v. Canada (Attorney General), 2017 ONCA 319, 138 O.R. (3d) 52, at paras. 54 and 88. Elements like concern for delay, fairness to the parties, urgency of providing a resolution to the dispute, the nature of the particular regulatory regime, whether the administrative decision maker had a genuine opportunity to weigh in on the issue in question, costs to the parties, and the efficient use of public resources may also influence the exercise of a court's discretion to remit a matter, just as they may influence the exercise of its discretion to quash a decision that is flawed: see MiningWatch Canada v. Canada (Fisheries and Oceans), 2010 SCC 2, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 6, at paras. 45-51; Alberta Teachers, at para. 55.

IV. Role of Prior Jurisprudence

[143] Given that this appeal and its companion cases involve a recalibration of the governing approach to the choice of standard of review analysis and a clarification of the proper application of the reasonableness standard, it will be necessary to briefly address how the existing administrative law jurisprudence should be treated going forward. These reasons set out a holistic revision of the framework for determining the applicable standard of review. A court seeking to determine what standard is appropriate in a case before it should look to these reasons first in order to determine how this general framework applies to that case. Doing so may require the court to resolve subsidiary questions on which past precedents will often continue to provide helpful guidance. Indeed, much of the Court's jurisprudence, such as cases concerning general questions of law of central importance to the legal system as a whole or those relating to jurisdictional boundaries between two or more administrative bodies, will continue to apply essentially without modification. On other issues, certain cases —including those on the effect of statutory appeal mechanisms, "true" questions of jurisdiction or the former contextual analysis — will necessarily have less precedential force. As for cases that dictated how to conduct reasonableness review, they will often continue to provide insight, but should be used carefully to ensure that their application is aligned in principle with these reasons.

[144] This approach strives for future doctrinal stability under the new framework while clarifying the continued relevance of the existing jurisprudence. Where a reviewing court is not certain how these reasons relate to the case before it, it may find it prudent to request submissions from the parties on both the appropriate standard and the application of that standard.

[145] Before turning to Mr. Vavilov's case, we pause to note that our colleagues mischaracterize the framework developed in these reasons as being an "encomium" for correctness, and a turn away from the Court's deferential approach to the point of being a "eulogy" for deference (at paras. 199 and 201). With respect, this is a gross exaggeration. Assertions that these reasons adopt a formalistic, court-centric view of administrative law (at paras. 229 and 240), enable an unconstrained expansion of correctness review (at para. 253) or function as a sort of checklist for "line-by-line" reasonableness review (at para. 284), are counter to the clear wording we use and do not take into consideration the delicate balance that we have accounted for in setting out this framework.

V. Mr. Vavilov's Application for Judicial Review

[146] The case at bar involves an application for judicial review of a decision made by the Canadian Registrar of Citizenship on August 15, 2014. The Registrar's decision concerned Mr. Vavilov, who was born in Canada and whose parents were later revealed to be undercover Russian spies. The Registrar determined that Mr. Vavilov was not a Canadian citizen on the basis of an interpretation of s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship

Act and cancelled his certificate of citizenship under s. 26(3) of the Citizenship Regulations. We conclude that the standard of review applicable to the Registrar's decision is reasonableness, and that the Registrar's decision was unreasonable. We would uphold the decision of the Federal Court of Appeal to quash the Registrar's decision and would not remit the matter to the Registrar for redetermination.

A. Facts

[147] Mr. Vavilov was born in Toronto as Alexander Foley on June 3, 1994. At the time of his birth, his parents were posing as Canadians under the assumed names of Tracey Lee Ann Foley and Donald Howard Heathfield. In reality, they were Elena Vavilova and Andrey Bezrukov, two foreign nationals working on a long-term assignment for the Russian foreign intelligence service, the SVR. Their false Canadian identities had been assumed prior to the birth of Mr. Vavilov and of his older brother, Timothy, for purposes of a "deep cover" espionage network under the direction of the SVR. The United States Department of Justice refers to it as the "illegals" program.

[148] Ms. Vavilova and Mr. Bezrukov were deployed to Canada to establish false personal histories as Western citizens. They worked, ran a business, pursued higher education and, as noted, had two children here. After their second son was born, the family moved to France, and later to the United States. In the United States, Mr. Bezrukov obtained a Masters of Public Administration at Harvard University and worked as a consultant, all while working to collect information on a variety of sensitive national security issues for the SVR. The nature of the undercover work of Ms. Vavilova and Mr. Bezrukov meant that there was no point at which either of them had any publicly acknowledged affiliation with the Russian state, held any official diplomatic or consular status, or had been granted any diplomatic privilege or immunity.

[149] Until he was about 16 years old, Mr. Vavilov did not know that his parents were not who they claimed to be. He believed that he was a Canadian citizen by birth, lived and identified as a Canadian, held a Canadian passport, learned both official languages and was proud of his heritage. His parents' true identities became known to him on June 27, 2010, when they were arrested in the United States and charged (along with several other individuals) with conspiracy to act as unregistered agents of a foreign government. On July 8, 2010, they pled guilty, admitted their status as Russian citizens acting on behalf of the Russian state, and were returned to Russia in a "spy swap" the following day. Mr. Vavilov has described the revelation as a traumatic event characterized by disbelief and a crisis of identity.

[150] Just prior to his parents' deportation, Mr. Vavilov left the United States with his brother on a trip that had been planned before their parents' arrest, going first to Paris, and then to Russia on a tourist visa. In October 2010, Mr. Vavilov unsuccessfully attempted to renew his Canadian passport through the Canadian Embassy in Moscow. Although he submitted to DNA testing and changed his surname from Foley to Vavilov at the behest of passport authorities, his second attempt to obtain a Canadian passport in December 2011 was also unsuccessful. He was then informed that despite his Canadian birth certificate, he would also need to obtain and provide a certificate of Canadian citizenship before he would be issued a passport. Mr. Vavilov applied for that certificate in October 2012, and it was issued to him on January 15, 2013. At that point, he made another passport application through the Canadian Embassy in Buenos Aires, Argentina, and, after a delay, applied for mandamus, a process that was settled out of court in June 2013. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration undertook to issue a new travel document to Mr. Vavilov by July 19, 2013.

[151] However, Mr. Vavilov never received a passport. Instead, he received a "procedural fairness letter" from the Canadian Registrar of Citizenship dated July 18, 2013 in which the Registrar stated that Mr. Vavilov had not been entitled to a certificate of citizenship, that his certificate of citizenship had been issued in error and that, pursuant to s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act, he was not a citizen of Canada. Mr. Vavilov was invited to make submissions in response, and he did so. On August 15, 2014, the Registrar formally cancelled Mr. Vavilov's Canadian citizenship certificate pursuant to s. 26(3) of the Citizenship Regulations.

B. Procedural History

(1) Registrar's Decision

[152] In a brief letter sent to Mr. Vavilov on August 15, 2014, the Registrar informed him that she was cancelling his certificate of citizenship pursuant to s. 26(3) of the Citizenship Regulations on the basis that he was not entitled to it. The Registrar summarized her position as follows:

(a) Although Mr. Vavilov was born in Toronto, neither of his parents was a citizen of Canada, and neither of them had been lawfully admitted to Canada for permanent residence at the time of his birth.

(b) In 2010, Mr. Vavilov's parents were convicted of "conspiracy to act in the United States as a foreign agent of a foreign government", and recognized as unofficial agents working as "illegals" for the SVR.

(c) As a result, the Registrar believed that, at the time of Mr. Vavilov's birth, his parents were "employees or representatives of a foreign government".

(d) Accordingly, pursuant to s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act, Mr. Vavilov had never been a Canadian citizen and had not been entitled to receive the certificate of Canadian citizenship that had been issued to him in 2013. Section 3(2)(a) provides that s. 3(1)(a) of the Citizenship Act (which grants citizenship by birth to persons born in Canada after February 14, 1977) does not apply to an individual if, at the time of the individual's birth, neither of their parents was a citizen or lawfully admitted to Canada for permanent residence and either parent was "a diplomatic or consular officer or other representative or employee in Canada of a foreign government."

[153] For these reasons, the Registrar cancelled the certificate and indicated that Mr. Vavilov would no longer be recognized as a Canadian citizen. The Registrar's letter did not offer any analysis or interpretation of s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act. However, it appears that in coming to her decision, the Registrar relied on a 12-page report prepared by a junior analyst, which included an interpretation of this key statutory provision.

[154] In that report, the analyst provided a timeline of the procedural history of Mr. Vavilov's file, a summary of the investigation into and charges against his parents in the United States, and background information on the SVR's "illegals" program. The analyst also discussed several provisions of the Citizenship Act, including s. 3(2)(a), and it is this aspect of her report that is most relevant to Mr. Vavilov's application for judicial review. The analyst's ultimate conclusion was that the certificate of citizenship issued to Mr. Vavilov in January 2013 was issued in error, as his parents had been "working as employees or representatives of a foreign government (the Russian Federation) during the time they resided in Canada, including at the time of Mr. Vavilov's birth", and that "[a]s such, Mr. Vavilov was not entitled to receive a citizenship certificate pursuant to paragraph 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act": A.R., vol. I, at p. 3. The report was dated June 24, 2014.

[155] In discussing the relevant legislation, the analyst cited s. 3(1)(a) of the Citizenship Act, which establishes the general rule that persons born in Canada after February 14, 1977 are Canadian citizens. The analyst also referred to an exception to that general rule set out in s. 3(2) of the Citizenship Act, which reads as follows:

> (2) Paragraph (1)(a) does not apply to a person if, at the time of his birth, neither of his parents was a citizen or lawfully admitted to Canada for permanent residence and either of his parents was
>
> (a) a diplomatic or consular officer or other representative or employee in Canada of a foreign government;
>
> (b) an employee in the service of a person referred to in paragraph (a); or
> (c) an officer or employee in Canada of a specialized agency of the United Nations or an officer or employee in Canada of any other international organization to whom there are granted, by or under any Act of Parliament, diplomatic privileges and immunities certified by the Minister of Foreign Affairs to be equivalent to those granted to a person or persons referred to in paragraph (a).

[156] The analyst noted that s. 3(2)(a) refers both to diplomatic and consular officers and to other representatives or employees of a foreign government. She acknowledged that the term "diplomatic or consular officer" is defined in s. 35(1) of the Interpretation Act and that the definition lists a large number of posts within a foreign mission or consulate. However, the analyst observed that no statutory definition exists for the phrase "other representative or employee in Canada of a foreign government".

[157] The analyst compared the wording of s. 3(2)(a) with that of a similar provision in predecessor legislation. That provision, s. 5(3)(b) of the Canadian Citizenship Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-19, excluded from citizenship children whose "responsible parent" at the time of birth was:

> (i) a foreign diplomatic or consular officer or a representative of a foreign government accredited to Her Majesty,
>
> (ii) an employee of a foreign government attached to or in the service of a foreign diplomatic mission or consulate in Canada, or
> (iii) an employee in the service of a person referred to in subparagraph (i).

[158] The analyst reasoned that because s. 3(2)(a) "makes reference to 'representatives or employees of a foreign government', but does not link the representatives or employees to 'attached to or in the service of a foreign diplomatic mission or consulate in Canada' (as did the earlier version of the provision), it is reasonable to maintain that this provision intends to encompass individuals not included in the definition of 'diplomatic and consular staff'": A.R., vol. I, at p. 7.

[159] Although the analyst acknowledged that "Ms. Vavilova and Mr. Bezrukov, were employed in Canada by a foreign government without the benefits or protections (i.e.: immunity) that accompany diplomatic, consular, or official status positions", she concluded that they were nonetheless "unofficial employees or representatives" of Russia at the time of Mr. Vavilov's birth: A.R., vol. I, at p. 13. The exception in s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act, as she interpreted it, therefore applied to Mr. Vavilov. As a result, the analyst recommended that the Canadian Registrar of Citizenship "recall" Mr. Vavilov's certificate on the basis that he was not, and had never been, entitled to citizenship: ibid., at p. 14.

(2) Federal Court (Bell J.), 2015 FC 960, [2016] 2 F.C.R. 39

[160] Mr. Vavilov sought and was granted leave to bring an application for judicial review of the Registrar's decision in the Federal Court pursuant to s. 22.1 of the Citizenship Act. His application was dismissed.

[161] The Federal Court rejected Mr. Vavilov's argument that the Registrar had breached her duty of procedural fairness by failing to disclose the documentation that had prompted the procedural fairness letter. In the Federal Court's view, the Registrar had provided Mr. Vavilov sufficient information to allow him to meaningfully respond, and had thereby satisfied the requirements of procedural fairness in the circumstances.

[162] The Federal Court also rejected Mr. Vavilov's challenge to the Registrar's interpretation of s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act. Applying the correctness standard, the Federal Court agreed with the Registrar that undercover foreign operatives living in Canada fall within the meaning of the phrase "diplomatic or consular officer or other representative or employee in Canada of a foreign government" in s. 3(2)(a). In the Federal Court's view, to interpret s. 3(2)(a) in any other way would render the phrase "other representative or employee in Canada of a foreign government" meaningless and would lead to the "absurd result" that "children of a foreign diplomat, registered at an embassy, who conducts spy operations, cannot claim Canadian citizenship by birth in Canada but children of those who enter unlawfully for the very same purpose, become Canadian citizens by birth": para. 25.

[163] Finally, the Federal Court was satisfied, given the evidence, that the Registrar's conclusion that Mr. Vavilov's parents had at the time of his birth been in Canada as part of an undercover operation for the Russian government was reasonable.

(3) Federal Court of Appeal (Stratas J.A. with Webb J.A. Concurring; Gleason J.A. Dissenting), 2017 FCA 132, [2018] 3 F.C.R. 75

[164] A majority of the Federal Court of Appeal allowed Mr. Vavilov's appeal from the Federal Court's judgment and quashed the Registrar's decision.

[165] The Court of Appeal unanimously rejected Mr. Vavilov's argument that he had been denied procedural fairness by the Registrar. In the Court of Appeal's view, the Registrar had provided Mr. Vavilov sufficient information in the procedural fairness letter to enable him to know the case to meet. Even if Mr. Vavilov had been entitled to more information at the time of that letter, the court indicated that his procedural fairness challenge would nevertheless have failed because he had subsequently obtained that additional information through his own efforts and was able to make meaningful submissions.

[166] The Court of Appeal was also unanimously of the view that the appropriate standard of review for the Registrar's interpretation and application of s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act was reasonableness. It split, however, on the application of that standard to the Registrar's decision.

[167] The majority of the Court of Appeal concluded that the analyst's interpretation of s. 3(2)(a), which the Registrar had adopted, was unreasonable and that the Registrar's decision should be quashed. The analysis relied on by the Registrar on the statutory interpretation issue was confined to a consideration of the text of s. 3(2)(a) and an abbreviated review of its legislative history, which totally disregarded its purpose or context. In the majority's view, such a "cursory and incomplete approach to statutory interpretation" in a case such as this was indefensible: para. 44. Moreover, when the provision's purpose and its context were taken into account, the only reasonable conclusion was that the phrase "employee in Canada of a foreign government" in s. 3(2)(a) was meant to apply only to individuals who have been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities under international law. Because it was common ground that neither of Mr. Vavilov's parents had been granted such privileges or immunities, s. 3(2)(a) did not apply to him. The cancellation of his citizenship certificate on the basis of s. 3(2)(a) therefore could not stand, and Mr. Vavilov was entitled to Canadian citizenship under the Citizenship Act.

[168] The dissenting judge disagreed, finding that the Registrar's interpretation of s. 3(2)(a) was reasonable. According to the dissenting judge, the text of that provision admits of at least two rational interpretations: one that includes all employees of a foreign government and one that is restricted to those who have been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities. In the dissenting judge's view, the former interpretation is not foreclosed by the context or the purpose of the provision. It was thus open to the Registrar to conclude that Mr. Vavilov's parents fell within the scope of s. 3(2)(a). The dissenting judge would have upheld the Registrar's decision.

C. Analysis

(1) Standard of Review

[169] Applying the standard of review analysis set out above leads to the conclusion that the standard to be applied in reviewing the merits of the Registrar's decision is reasonableness.

[170] When a court reviews the merits of an administrative decision, reasonableness is presumed to be the applicable standard of review, and there is no basis for departing from that presumption in this case. The Registrar's decision has come before the courts by way of judicial review, not by way of a statutory appeal. On this point, we note that ss. 22.1 through 22.4 of the Citizenship Act lay down rules that govern applications for judicial review of decisions made under that Act, one of which, in s. 22.1(1), is that such an application may be made only with leave of the Federal Court. However, none of these provisions allow for a party to bring an appeal from a decision under the Citizenship Act. Given this fact, and given that Parliament has not prescribed the standard to be applied on judicial review of the decision at issue, there is no indication that the legislature intended a standard of review other than reasonableness to apply. The Registrar's decision does not give rise to any constitutional questions, general questions of law of central importance to the legal system as a whole or questions regarding the jurisdictional boundaries between two or more administrative bodies. As a result, the standard to be applied in reviewing the decision is reasonableness.

(2) Review for Reasonableness

[171] The principal issue before this Court is whether it was reasonable for the Registrar to find that Mr. Vavilov's parents had been "other representative[s] or employee[s] in Canada of a foreign government" within the meaning of s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act.

[172] In our view, it was not. The Registrar failed to justify her interpretation of s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act in light of the constraints imposed by the text of s. 3 of the Citizenship Act considered as a whole, by other legislation and international treaties that inform the purpose of s. 3, by the jurisprudence on the interpretation of s. 3(2)(a), and by the potential consequences of her interpretation. Each of these elements — viewed individually and cumulatively — strongly supports the conclusion that s. 3(2)(a) was not intended to apply to children of foreign government representatives or employees who have not been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities. Though Mr. Vavilov raised many of these considerations in his submissions in response to the procedural fairness letter, the Registrar failed to address those submissions in her reasons and did not, to justify her interpretation of s. 3(2)(a), do more than conduct a cursory review of the legislative history and conclude that her interpretation was not explicitly precluded by the text of s. 3(2)(a).

[173] Our review of the Registrar's decision leads us to conclude that it was unreasonable for her to find that the phrase "diplomatic or consular officer or other representative or employee in Canada of a foreign government" applies to individuals who have not been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities in Canada. It is undisputed that Mr. Vavilov's parents had not been granted such privileges and immunities. No purpose would therefore be served by remitting this matter to the Registrar.

(a) Section 3(2) of the Citizenship Act

[174] The analyst justified her conclusion that Mr. Vavilov is not a citizen of Canada by reasoning that his parents were "other representative[s] or employee[s] in Canada of a foreign government" within the meaning of s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act. Section 3(2)(a) provides that children of "a diplomatic or consular officer or other representative or employee in Canada of a foreign government" are exempt from the general rule in s. 3(1)(a) that individuals born in Canada after February 14, 1977 acquire Canadian citizenship by birth. The analyst observed that although the term "diplomatic or consular officer" is defined in the Interpretation Act and does not apply to individuals like Mr. Vavilov's parents, the phrase "other representative or employee in Canada of a foreign government" is not so defined, and may apply to them.

[175] The analyst's attempt to give the words "other representative or employee in Canada of a foreign government" a meaning distinct from that of "diplomatic or consular officer" is sensible. It is generally consistent with the principle of statutory interpretation that Parliament intends each word in a statute to have meaning: Sullivan, at p. 211. We accept that if the phrase "other representative or employee in Canada of a foreign government" were considered in isolation, it could apply to a spy working in the service of a foreign government in Canada. However, the analyst failed to address the immediate statutory context of s. 3(2)(a), including the closely related text in s. 3(2)(c):

> (2) Paragraph (1)(a) does not apply to a person if, at the time of his birth, neither of his parents was a citizen or lawfully admitted to Canada for permanent residence and either of his parents was
>
> (a) a diplomatic or consular officer or other representative or employee in Canada of a foreign government;
>
> (b) an employee in the service of a person referred to in paragraph (a); or
>
> (c) an officer or employee in Canada of a specialized agency of the United Nations or an officer or employee in Canada of any other international organization to whom there are granted, by or under any Act of Parliament, diplomatic privileges and immunities > certified by the Minister of Foreign Affairs to be equivalent to those granted to a person or persons referred to in paragraph (a).

[176] As the majority of the Court of Appeal noted (at paras. 61-62), the wording of s. 3(2)(c) provides clear support for the conclusion that all of the persons contemplated by s. 3(2)(a) — including those who are "employee[s] in Canada of a foreign government" — must have been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities in some form. If, as the Registrar concluded, s. 3(2)(a) includes persons who do not benefit from these privileges or immunities, it is difficult to understand how effect could be given to the explicit equivalency requirement articulated in s. 3(2)(c). However, the analyst did not account for this tension in the immediate statutory context of s. 3(2)(a).

(b) The Foreign Missions and International Organizations Act and the Treaties It Implements

[177] Before the Registrar, Mr. Vavilov argued that s. 3(2) of the Citizenship Act must be read in conjunction with both the Foreign Missions and International Organizations Act, S.C. 1991, c. 41 ("FMIOA"), and the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, Can. T.S. 1966 No. 29 ("VCDR"). The VCDR and the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, Can. T.S. 1974 No. 25, are the two leading treaties that extend diplomatic and/or consular privileges and immunities to employees and representatives of foreign governments in diplomatic missions and consular posts. Parliament has implemented the relevant provisions of both conventions by means of s. 3(1) of the FMIOA.

[178] To begin, we note that Canada affords citizenship in accordance both with the principle of jus soli, the acquisition of citizenship through birth regardless of the parents' nationality, and with that of jus sanguinis, the acquisition of citizenship by descent, that is through a parent: Citizenship Act, s. 3(1)(a) and (b); see I. Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law (5th ed. 1998), at pp. 391-93. These two principles operate as a backdrop to s. 3 of the Citizenship Act as a whole. It is undisputed that s. 3(2)(a) operates as an exception to these general rules. However, Mr. Vavilov took a narrower view of that exception than did the Registrar. In his submissions to the Registrar, he argued that Parliament intended s. 3(2) of the Citizenship Act to simply mirror the FMIOA and the VCDR, as well as Article II of the Optional Protocol to the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, concerning Acquisition of Nationality, 500 U.N.T.S. 223, which provides that "[m]embers of the mission not being nationals of the receiving State, and members of their families forming part of their household, shall not, solely by the operation of the law of the receiving State, acquire the nationality of that State". Mr. Vavilov made the following submission to the Registrar:

> The purpose in excluding diplomats and their families, including newborn children, from acquiring citizenship in the receiving state relates to the immunities which extend to this group of people. Diplomats and their family members are immune from criminal prosecution and civil liability in the receiving state. As such, they cannot acquire citizenship in the receiving state and also benefit from these immunities. A citizen has duties and responsibilities to its country. Immunity is inconsistent with this principle and so does not apply to citizens. See Article 37 of the Convention.
>
> Section 3(2) legislates into Canadian domestic law the above principles and should be narrowly interpreted with these purposes in mind. The term "employee in Canada of a foreign government" must be interpreted to mean an employee of a diplomatic mission, or connected to it, who benefits from the immunities of the Convention. Any other interpretation would lead to absurd results. There is no purpose served in excluding any child born of a person not having a connection to a diplomatic mission in Canada while sojourning here from the principle of Jus soli.

(A.R., vol. IV, at pp. 449-50)

[179] In Al-Ghamdi v. Canada (Minister of Foreign Affairs and International Trade), 2007 FC 559, 64 Imm. L.R. (3d) 67, a case which was referred to in the analyst's report and which we will discuss in greater detail below, the Federal Court, at para. 53, quoted a passage by Professor Brownlie on this point:

> . . . Of particular interest are the special rules relating to the jus soli, appearing as exceptions to that principle, the effect of the exceptions being to remove the cases where its application is clearly unjustifiable. A rule which has very considerable authority stipulated that children born to persons having diplomatic immunity shall not be nationals by birth of the state to which the diplomatic agent concerned is accredited. Thirteen governments stated the exception in the preliminaries of the Hague Codification Conference. In a comment on the relevant article of the Harvard draft on diplomatic privileges and immunities it is stated: 'This article is believed to be declaratory of an established rule of international law'. The rule receives ample support from legislation of states and expert opinion. The Convention on Certain Questions relating to the Conflict of Nationality Laws of 1930 provides in Article 12: 'Rules of law which confer nationality by reason of birth on the territory of a State shall not apply automatically to children born to persons enjoying diplomatic immunities in the country where the birth occurs.'
> In 1961 the United Nations Conference on Diplomatic Intercourse and Immunities adopted an Optional Protocol concerning Acquisition of Nationality, which provided in Article II: 'Members of the mission not being nationals of the receiving State, and members of their families forming part of their household, shall not, solely by the operation of the law of the receiving State, acquire the nationality of that State'. Some states extend the rule to the children of consuls, and there is some support for this from expert opinion. [Footnotes omitted.]

(Brownlie, at pp. 392-93)

[180] Mr. Vavilov included relevant excerpts from the parliamentary debate that had preceded the enactment of the Citizenship Act in support of his argument that the very purpose of s. 3(2) of the Citizenship Act was to align Canada's citizenship rules with these principles of international law. These excerpts describe s. 3(2) as "conform[ing] to international custom" and as having been drafted with the intention of "exclud[ing] children born in Canada to diplomats from becoming Canadian citizens": Hon. J. Hugh Faulkner, Secretary of State of Canada, House of Commons, Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, Respecting Bill C-20, An Act respecting citizenship, No. 34, 1st Sess., 30th Parl., February 24, 1976, at p. 34:23. The record of that debate also reveals that Parliament took care to avoid the danger that because of how some provisions were written, "a number of other people would be affected such as those working for large foreign corporations": ibid. Although the analyst discussed the textual difference between s. 3(2) and a similar provision in the former Canadian Citizenship Act, she did not grapple with these other elements of the legislative history, despite the fact that they cast considerable doubt on her conclusions, indicating that s. 3(2) was not intended to affect the status of individuals whose parents have not been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities.

[181] In attempting to distinguish the meaning of the phrase "other representative or employee in Canada of a foreign government" from that of the term "diplomatic or consular officer", the analyst also appeared to overlook the possibility that some individuals who fall into the former category might be granted privileges or immunities despite not being considered "diplomatic or consular officer[s]" under the Interpretation Act. Yet, as the majority of the Federal Court of Appeal pointed out, such individuals do in fact exist: paras. 53-55, citing FMIOA, at ss. 3 and 4 and Sched. II, Articles 1, 41, 43, 49, and 53. In light of Mr. Vavilov's submissions regarding the purpose of s. 3(2), the failure to consider this possibility is a noticeable omission.

[182] It is well established that domestic legislation is presumed to comply with Canada's international obligations, and that it must be interpreted in a manner that reflects the principles of customary and conventional international law: Appulonappa, at para. 40; see also Pushpanathan, at para. 51; Baker, at para. 70; GreCon Dimter inc. v. J.R. Normand inc., 2005 SCC 46, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 401, at para. 39; Hape, at paras. 53-54; B010 v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2015 SCC 58, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 704, at para. 48; India v. Badesha, 2017 SCC 44, [2017] 2 S.C.R. 127, at para. 38; Office of the Children's Lawyer v. Balev, 2018 SCC 16, [2018] 1 S.C.R. 398, at paras. 31-32. Yet the analyst did not refer to the relevant international law, did not inquire into Parliament's purpose in enacting s. 3(2) and did not respond to Mr. Vavilov's submissions on this issue. Nor did she advance any alternate explanation for why Parliament would craft such a provision in the first place. In the face of compelling submissions that the underlying rationale of s. 3(2) was to implement a narrow exception to a general rule in a manner that was consistent with established principles of international law, the analyst and the Registrar chose a different interpretation without offering any reasoned explanation for doing so.

(c) Jurisprudence Interpreting Section 3(2) of the Citizenship Act

[183] Although the analyst cited three Federal Court decisions on s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act in a footnote, she dismissed them as being irrelevant on the basis that they related only to "individuals whose parents maintained diplomatic status in Canada at the time of their birth": A.R., vol. I, at p. 7. But this distinction, while true, does not explain why the reasoning employed in those decisions, which directly concerned the scope, the meaning and the legislative purpose of s. 3(2)(a), was inapplicable in Mr. Vavilov's case. Had the analyst considered just the three cases cited in her report — Al-Ghamdi; Lee v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2008 FC 614, [2009] 1 F.C.R. 204; and Hitti v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 FC 294, 310 F.T.R. 168 — it would have been evident to her that she needed to grapple with and justify her interpretation in light of the persuasive and comprehensive legal reasoning that supports the position that s. 3(2)(a) was intended to apply only to those individuals whose parents have been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities.

[184] In Al-Ghamdi, the Federal Court considered the constitutionality of paras. (a) and (c) of s. 3(2) of the Citizenship Act in reviewing a decision in which Passport Canada had refused to issue a passport to a child of a Saudi Arabian diplomat. In its reasons, the court came to a number of conclusions regarding the purpose and scope of s. 3(2), including, at para. 5, that > [t]he only individuals covered in paragraphs 3(2)(a) and (c) of the Citizenship Act are children of individuals with diplomatic status. These are individuals who enter Canada under special circumstances and without undergoing any of the normal procedures. Most importantly, while in Canada, they are granted all of the immunities and privileges of diplomats . . . .

[185] The court went on to extensively document the link between the exception to the rule of citizenship by birth set out in s. 3(2) of the Citizenship Act and the rules of international law, the FMIOA and the VCDR: Al-Ghamdi, at paras. 52 et seq. It noted that there is an established rule of international law that children born to parents who enjoy diplomatic immunities are not entitled to automatic citizenship by birth, and that their status in this respect is an exception to the principle of jus soli: Al-Ghamdi, at para. 53, quoting Brownlie, at pp. 391-93. In finding that the exceptions under s. 3(2) to citizenship on the basis of jus soli do not infringe the rights of children of diplomats under s. 15 of the Charter, the court emphasized that all children to whom s. 3(2) applies are entitled to an "extraordinary array of privileges under the Foreign Missions and International Organizations Act": Al-Ghamdi, at para. 62. Citing the VCDR, it added that "[i]t is precisely because of the vast array of privileges accorded to diplomats and their families, which are by their very nature inconsistent with the obligations of citizenship, that a person who enjoys diplomatic status cannot acquire citizenship": para. 63. In its analysis under s. 1 of the Charter, the court found that the choice to deny citizenship to individuals provided for in s. 3(2) is "tightly connected" to a pressing government objective of ensuring "that no citizen is immune from the obligations of citizenship", such as the obligations to pay taxes and comply with the criminal law: Al-Ghamdi, at paras. 74-75. In the case at bar, the analyst failed entirely to engage with the arguments endorsed by the Federal Court in Al-Ghamdi despite the court's key finding that s. 3(2)(a) applies only to "children born of foreign diplomats or an equivalent", a conclusion upon which the very constitutionality of the provision turned: Al-Ghamdi, at paras. 3, 9, 27, 28, 56 and 59.

[186] In Lee, another case cited by the analyst, the Federal Court confirmed the finding in Al-Ghamdi that "[t]he only individuals covered in paragraphs 3(2)(a) and (c) of the Citizenship Act are children of individuals with diplomatic status": Lee, at para. 77. The court found in Lee that the "functional duties of the applicant's father" were not relevant to whether or not the applicant was excluded from citizenship pursuant to s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act: para. 58. Rather, what mattered was only that at the time of the applicant's birth, his father had been a registered consular official and had held a diplomatic passport and the title of Vice-Consul: paras. 44, 58, 61 and 63.

[187] Hitti, the third case cited in the analyst's report, concerned a decision to confiscate two citizenship certificates on the basis that, under s. 3(2) of the Citizenship Act, their holders had never been entitled to them. In that case, the applicants' father, a Lebanese citizen, had been employed as an information officer of the League of Arab States in Ottawa. Although the League did not have diplomatic standing at that time, Canada had agreed as a matter of courtesy to extend diplomatic status to officials of the League's information centre, treating them as "attachés" of their home countries' embassies: Hitti, at paras. 6 and 9; see also Interpretation Act, s. 35(1). Mr. Hitti argued he did not, in practice, fulfill diplomatic tasks or act as a representative of Lebanon, but there was nonetheless a record of his being an accredited diplomat, enjoying the benefits of that status and being covered by the VCDR when his children were born: paras. 5 and 8. The Federal Court rejected a submission that Mr. Hitti would have had to perform duties in the service of Lebanon in order for his children to fall within the meaning of s. 3(2)(a), and concluded that "what Mr. Hitti did when he was in the country is not relevant": para. 32.

[188] What can be seen from both Lee and Hitti is that what matters, for the purposes of s. 3(2)(a), is not whether an individual carries out activities in the service of a foreign state while in Canada, but whether, at the relevant time, the individual has been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities. Thus, in addition to the Federal Court's decision in Al-Ghamdi, the analyst was faced with two cases in which the application of s. 3(2) had turned on the existence of diplomatic status rather than on the "functional duties" or activities of the child's parents. In these circumstances, it was a significant omission for her to ignore the Federal Court's reasoning when determining whether the espionage activities of Ms. Vavilova and Mr. Bezrukov were sufficient to ground the application of s. 3(2)(a).

(d) Possible Consequences of the Registrar's Interpretation

[189] When asked why the children of individuals referred to in s. 3(2)(a) would be excluded from acquiring citizenship by birth, another analyst involved in Mr. Vavilov's file (who had also been involved in Mr. Vavilov's brother's file) responded as follows:

> Well, usually the way we use section 3(2)(a) is for — you're right, for diplomats and that they don't — because they are not — they are not obliged . . . to the law of Canada and everything, so that's why their children do not obtain citizenship if they were born in Canada while the person was in Canada under that status.

> But then there is also this other part of the Act that says other representatives or employees of a foreign government in Canada, that may open the door for other person[s] than diplomats and that's how we interpreted in this specific case 3(2)(a) but there is no jurisprudence on that . . . .

(R.R., transcript, at pp. 87-88)

[190] In other words, the officials responsible for these files were aware that s. 3(2)(a) was informed by the principle that individuals subject to the exception are "not obliged . . . to the law of Canada". They were also aware that the interpretation they had adopted in the case of the Vavilov brothers was a novel one. Although the Registrar knew this, she failed to provide a rationale for this expanded interpretation.

[191] Additionally, there is no evidence that the Registrar considered the potential consequences of expanding her interpretation of s. 3(2)(a) to include individuals who have not been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities. Citizenship has been described as "the right to have rights": U.S. Supreme Court Chief Justice Earl Warren, as quoted in A. Brouwer, Statelessness in Canadian Context: A Discussion Paper (July 2003) (online), at p. 2. The importance of citizenship was recognized in Benner v. Canada (Secretary of State), 1997 CanLII 376 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 358, in which Iacobucci J., writing for this Court, stated: "I cannot imagine an interest more fundamental to full membership in Canadian society than Canadian citizenship": para. 68. This was reiterated in Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Tobiass, 1997 CanLII 322 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 391, in which this Court unanimously held that "[f]or some, such as those who might become stateless if deprived of their citizenship, it may be valued as highly as liberty": para. 108.

[192] It perhaps goes without saying that rules concerning citizenship require a high degree of interpretive consistency in order to shield against a perception of arbitrariness and to ensure conformity with Canada's international obligations. We can therefore only assume that the Registrar intended that this new interpretation of s. 3(2)(a) would apply to any other individual whose parent is employed by or represents a foreign government at the time of the individual's birth in Canada but has not been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities. The Registrar's interpretation would not, after all, limit the application of s. 3(2)(a) to the children of spies — its logic would be equally applicable to a number of other scenarios, including that of a child of a non-citizen worker employed by an embassy as a gardener or cook, or of a child of a business traveller who represents a foreign government-owned corporation. Mr. Vavilov had raised the fact that provisions such as s. 3(2)(a) must be given a narrow interpretation because they deny or potentially take away rights — that of citizenship under s. 3(1) in this case — which otherwise benefit from a liberal and broad interpretation: Brossard (Town) v. Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne), 1988 CanLII 7 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 279, at p. 307. Yet there is no indication that the Registrar considered the potential harsh consequences of her interpretation for such a large class of individuals, which included Mr. Vavilov, or the question whether, in light of those possible consequences, Parliament would have intended s. 3(2)(a) to apply in this manner.

[193] Moreover, we would note that despite following a different legal process, the Registrar's decision in this case had the same effect as a revocation of citizenship — a process which has been described by scholars as "a kind of 'political death'" — depriving Mr. Vavilov of his right to vote and the right to enter and remain in Canada: see A. Macklin, "Citizenship Revocation, the Privilege to Have Rights and the Production of the Alien" (2014), 40 Queen's L.J. 1, at pp. 7-8. While we question whether the Registrar was empowered to unilaterally alter Canada's position with respect to Mr. Vavilov's citizenship and recognize that the relationship between the cancellation of a citizenship certificate under s. 26 of the Citizenship Regulations and the revocation of an individual's citizenship (as set out in s. 10 of the Citizenship Act) is not clear, we leave this issue for another day because it was neither raised nor argued by the parties.

D. Conclusion

[194] Multiple legal and factual constraints may bear on a given administrative decision, and these constraints may interact with one another. In some cases, a failure to justify the decision against any one relevant constraint may be sufficient to cause the reviewing court to lose confidence in the reasonableness of the decision. Section 3 of the Citizenship Act considered as a whole, other legislation and international treaties that inform the purpose of s. 3, the jurisprudence cited in the analyst's report, and the potential consequences of the Registrar's decision point overwhelmingly to the conclusion that Parliament did not intend s. 3(2)(a) to apply to children of individuals who have not been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities. The Registrar's failure to justify her decision with respect to these constraints renders her interpretation unreasonable, and we would therefore uphold the Federal Court of Appeal's decision to quash the Registrar's decision.

[195] As noted above, we would exercise our discretion not to remit the matter to the Registrar for redetermination. Crucial to our decision is the fact that Mr. Vavilov explicitly raised all of these issues before the Registrar and that the Registrar had an opportunity to consider them but failed to do so. She offered no justification for the interpretation she adopted except for a superficial reading of the provision in question and a comment on part of its legislative history. On the other hand, there is overwhelming support — including in the parliamentary debate, established principles of international law, an established line of jurisprudence and the text of the provision itself — for the conclusion that Parliament did not intend s. 3(2)(a) of the Citizenship Act to apply to children of individuals who have not been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities. That being said, we would stress that it is not our intention to offer a definitive interpretation of s. 3(2)(a) in all respects, nor to foreclose the possibility that multiple reasonable interpretations of other aspects might be available to administrative decision makers. In short, we do not suggest that there is necessarily "one reasonable interpretation" of the provision as a whole. But we agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal that it was not reasonable for the Registrar to interpret s. 3(2)(a) as applying to children of individuals who have not been granted diplomatic privileges and immunities at the time of the children's birth.

[196] Given that it is undisputed that Ms. Vavilova and Mr. Bezrukov, as undercover spies, were granted no such privileges, it would serve no purpose to remit the matter in this case to the Registrar. Given that Mr. Vavilov is a person who was born in Canada after February 14, 1977, his status is governed only by the general rule set out in s. 3(1)(a) of the Citizenship Act. He is a Canadian citizen.

E. Disposition

[197] The appeal is dismissed with costs throughout to Mr. Vavilov.

The following are the reasons delivered by [198] Abella and Karakatsanis JJ. — Forty years ago, in Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 963 v. New Brunswick Liquor Corp., 1979 CanLII 23 (SCC), [1979] 2 S.C.R. 227, this Court embarked on a course to recognize the unique and valuable role of administrative decision-makers within the Canadian legal order. Breaking away from the court-centric theories of years past, the Court encouraged judges to show deference when specialized administrative decision-makers provided reasonable answers to legal questions within their mandates. Building on this more mature understanding of administrative law, subsequent decisions of this Court sought to operationalize deference and explain its relationship to core democratic principles. These appeals offered a platform to clarify and refine our administrative law jurisprudence, while remaining faithful to the deferential path it has travelled for four decades.

[199] Regrettably, the majority shows our precedents no such fidelity. Presented with an opportunity to steady the ship, the majority instead dramatically reverses course — away from this generation's deferential approach and back towards a prior generation's more intrusive one. Rather than confirming a meaningful presumption of deference for administrative decision-makers, as our common law has increasingly done for decades, the majority's reasons strip away deference from hundreds of administrative actors subject to statutory rights of appeal; rather than following the consistent path of this Court's jurisprudence in understanding legislative intent as being the intention to leave legal questions within their mandate to specialized decision-makers with expertise, the majority removes expertise from the equation entirely and reformulates legislative intent as an overriding intention to provide — or not provide — appeal routes; and rather than clarifying the role of reasons and how to review them, the majority revives the kind of search for errors that dominated the pre-C.U.P.E. era. In other words, instead of reforming this generation's evolutionary approach to administrative law, the majority reverses it, taking it back to the formalistic judge-centred approach this Court has spent decades dismantling.

[200] We support the majority's decision to eliminate the vexing contextual factors analysis from the standard of review framework and to abolish the shibboleth category of "true questions of jurisdiction". These improvements, accompanied by a meaningful presumption of deference for administrative decision-makers, would have simplified our judicial review framework and addressed many of the criticisms levied against our jurisprudence since Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9 (CanLII), [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190.

[201] But the majority goes much further and fundamentally reorients the decades-old relationship between administrative actors and the judiciary, by dramatically expanding the circumstances in which generalist judges will be entitled to substitute their own views for those of specialized decision-makers who apply their mandates on a daily basis. In so doing, the majority advocates a profoundly different philosophy of administrative law than the one which has guided our Court's jurisprudence for the last four decades. The majority's reasons are an encomium for correctness and a eulogy for deference.

The Evolution of Canadian Administrative Law

[202] The modern Canadian state "could not function without the many and varied administrative tribunals that people the legal landscape" (The Rt. Hon. Beverley McLachlin, Administrative Tribunals and the Courts: An Evolutionary Relationship, May 27, 2013 (online)). Parliament and the provincial legislatures have entrusted a broad array of complex social and economic challenges to administrative actors, including regulation of labour relations, welfare programs, food and drug safety, agriculture, property assessments, liquor service and production, infrastructure, the financial markets, foreign investment, professional discipline, insurance, broadcasting, transportation and environmental protection, among many others. Without these administrative decision-makers, "government would be paralyzed, and so would the courts" (Guy Régimbald, Canadian Administrative Law (2nd ed. 2015), at p. 3).

[203] In exercising their mandates, administrative decision-makers often resolve claims and disputes within their areas of specialization (Gus Van Harten et al., Administrative Law: Cases, Text, and Materials (7th ed. 2015), at p. 13). These claims and disputes vary greatly in scope and subject-matter. Corporate merger requests, professional discipline complaints by dissatisfied clients, requests for property reassessments and applications for welfare benefits, among many other matters, all fall within the purview of the administrative justice system.

[204] The administrative decision-makers tasked to resolve these issues come from many different walks of life (Van Harten et al., at p. 15). Some have legal backgrounds, some do not. The diverse pool of decision-makers in the administrative system responds to the diversity of issues that it must resolve. To address this broad range of issues, administrative dispute-resolution processes are generally "[d]esigned to be less cumbersome, less expensive, less formal and less delayed" than their judicial counterparts — but "no less effectiv[e] or credibl[e]" (Rasanen v. Rosemount Instruments Ltd. (1994), 1994 CanLII 608 (ON CA), 17 O.R. (3d) 267 (C.A.), at p. 279). In the field of labour relations, for example, Parliament explicitly rejected a court-based system to resolve workplace disputes in favour of a Labour Board, staffed with representatives from management and labour alongside an independent member (Bora Laskin, "Collective Bargaining in Ontario: A New Legislative Approach" (1943), 21 Can. Bar Rev. 684; John A. Willes, The Ontario Labour Court: 1943-1944 (1979); Katherine Munro, "A 'Unique Experiment': The Ontario Labour Court, 1943-1944" (2014), 74 Labour 199). Other administrative processes — license renewals, zoning permit issuances and tax reassessments, for example — bear even less resemblance to the traditional judicial model.

[205] Courts, through judicial review, monitor the boundaries of administrative decision making. Questions about the standards of judicial review have been an enduring feature of Canadian administrative law. The debate, in recent times, has revolved around "reasonableness" and "correctness", and determining when each standard applies. On the one hand, "reasonableness" review expects courts to defer to decisions by specialized decision-makers that "are defensible in respect of the facts and law"; on the other, "correctness" review allows courts to substitute their own opinions for those of the initial decision-maker (Dunsmuir, at paras. 47-50). This standard of review debate has profound implications for the extent to which reviewing courts may substitute their views for those of administrative decision-makers. At its core, it is a debate over two distinct philosophies of administrative law.

[206] The story of modern Canadian administrative law is the story of a shift away from the court-centric philosophy which denied administrative bodies the authority to interpret or shape the law. This approach found forceful expression in the work of Albert Venn Dicey. For Dicey, the rule of law meant the rule of courts. Dicey developed his philosophy at the end of the 19th century to encourage the House of Lords to restrain the government from implementing ameliorative social and welfare reforms administered by new regulatory agencies. Famously, Dicey asserted that administrative law was anathema to the English legal system (Albert Venn Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (10th ed. 1959), at pp. 334-35). Because, in his view, only the judiciary had the authority to interpret law, there was no reason for a court to defer to legal interpretations proffered by administrative bodies, since their decisions did not constitute "law" (Kevin M. Stack, "Overcoming Dicey in Administrative Law" (2018), 68 U.T.L.J. 293, at p. 294).

[207] The canonical example of Dicey's approach at work is the House of Lords' decision in Anisminic Ltd. v. Foreign Compensation Commission, [1969] 2 A.C. 147, the judicial progenitor of "jurisdictional error". Anisminic entrenched non-deferential judicial review by endorsing a lengthy checklist of "jurisdictional errors" capable of undermining administrative decisions. Lord Reid noted that there were two scenarios in which an administrative decision-maker would lose jurisdiction. The first was narrow and asked whether the legislature had empowered the administrative decision-maker to "enter on the inquiry in question" (p. 171). The second was wider:

> [T]here are many cases where, although the tribunal had jurisdiction to enter on the inquiry, it has done or failed to do something in the course of the inquiry which is of such a nature that its decision is a nullity. It may have given its decision in bad faith. It may have made a decision which it had no power to make. It may have failed in the course of the inquiry to comply with the requirements of natural justice. It may in perfect good faith have misconstrued the provisions giving it power to act so that it failed to deal with the question remitted to it and decided some question which was not remitted to it. It may have refused to take into account something which it was required to take into account. Or it may have based its decision on some matter which, under the provisions setting it up, it had no right to take into account. I do not intend this list to be exhaustive. [Emphasis added; p. 171.]

[208] The broad "jurisdictional error" approach in Anisminic initially found favour with this Court in cases like Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. v. International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 796, 1970 CanLII 7 (SCC), [1970] S.C.R. 425, and Bell v. Ontario Human Rights Commission, 1971 CanLII 195 (SCC), [1971] S.C.R. 756. These cases "took the position that a definition of jurisdictional error should include any question pertaining to the interpretation of a statute made by an administrative tribunal", and in each case, "th[e] Court substituted what was, in its opinion, the correct interpretation of the enabling provision of the tribunal's statute for that of the tribunal" (Canada (Attorney General) v. Public Service Alliance of Canada, 1991 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 614, at p. 650, per Cory J., dissenting, but not on this point). In Metropolitan Life, for example, this Court quashed a labour board's decision to certify a union, concluding that the Board had "ask[ed] itself the wrong question" and "decided a question which was not remitted to it" (p. 435). In Bell, this Court held that a human rights commission had strayed beyond its jurisdiction by deciding to investigate a complaint of racial discrimination filed against a landlord. The Court held that the Commission had incorrectly interpreted the term "self-contained dwelling uni[t]" found in s. 3 of the Ontario Human Rights Code, 1961-62, S.O. 1961-62, c. 93, and by so doing, had lost jurisdiction to inquire into the complaint of discrimination (pp. 767 and 775).

[209] As these cases illustrate, the Anisminic approach proved easy to manipulate, allowing courts to characterize any question as "jurisdictional" and thereby give themselves latitude to substitute their own view of the appropriate answer without regard for the original decision-maker's decision or reasoning. The Anisminic era and the "jurisdictional error" approach were and continue to be subject to significant judicial and academic criticism (Public Service Alliance, at p. 650; National Corn Growers Assn. v. Canada (Import Tribunal), 1990 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1324, at p. 1335, per Wilson J., concurring; Beverley McLachlin, P.C., "'Administrative Law is Not for Sissies': Finding a Path Through the Thicket" (2016), 29 C.J.A.L.P. 127, at pp. 129-30; Jocelyn Stacey and Alice Woolley, "Can Pragmatism Function in Administrative Law?" (2016), 74 S.C.L.R. (2d) 211, at pp. 215-16; R. A. Macdonald, "Absence of Jurisdiction: A Perspective" (1983), 43 R. du B. 307).

[210] In 1979, the Court signaled a turn to a more deferential approach to judicial review with its watershed decision in C.U.P.E. There, the Court challenged the "jurisdictional error" model and planted the seeds of a home-grown approach to administrative law in Canada. In a frequently-cited passage, Dickson J., writing for a unanimous Court, cautioned that courts "should not be alert to brand as jurisdictional, and therefore subject to broader curial review, that which may be doubtfully so" (p. 233; cited in nearly 20 decisions of this Court, including Dunsmuir, at para. 35; Canada (Citizenship and Immigration) v. Khosa, 2009 SCC 12 (CanLII), [2009] 1 S.C.R. 339, at para. 45; Alberta (Information and Privacy Commissioner) v. Alberta Teachers' Association, 2011 SCC 61 (CanLII), [2011] 3 S.C.R. 654, at para. 33; Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 SCC 31 (CanLII), [2018] 2 S.C.R. 230, at para. 31). The Court instead endorsed an approach that respected the legislature's decision to assign legal policy issues in some areas to specialized, non-judicial decision-makers. The Court recognized that legislative language could "bristl[e] with ambiguities" and that the interpretive choices made by administrative tribunals deserved respect from courts, particularly when, as in C.U.P.E., the decision was protected by a privative clause (pp. 230 and 234-36).

[211] By championing "curial deference" to administrative bodies, C.U.P.E. embraced "a more sophisticated understanding of the role of administrative tribunals in the modern Canadian state" (National Corn Growers, at p. 1336, per Wilson J., concurring; Domtar Inc. v. Quebec (Commission d'appel en matière de lésions professionnelles), 1993 CanLII 106 (SCC), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 756, at p. 800). As one scholar has observed:

> . . . legislatures and courts in . . . Canada have come to settle on the idea that the functional capacities of administrative agencies – their expertise, investment in understanding the practical circumstances at issue, openness to participation, and level of responsiveness to political change – justify not only their law-making powers but also judicial deference to their interpretations and decisions. Law-making and legal interpretation are shared enterprises in the administrative state. [Emphasis added.]

(Stack, at p. 310)

[212] In explaining why courts must sometimes defer to administrative actors, C.U.P.E. embraced two related foundational justifications for Canada's approach to administrative law — one based on the legislature's express choice to have an administrative body decide the issues arising from its mandate; and one animated by the recognition that an administrative justice system could offer institutional advantages in relation to proximity, efficiency, and specialized expertise (David Dyzenhaus, "The Politics of Deference: Judicial Review and Democracy" in Michael Taggart, ed., The Province of Administrative Law (1997), 279 at p. 304).

[213] A new institutional relationship between the courts and administrative actors was thus being forged, based on "an understanding of the role of expertise in the modern administrative state" which "acknowledge[d] that judges are not always in the best position to interpret the law" (The Hon. Frank Iacobucci, "Articulating a Rational Standard of Review Doctrine: A Tribute to John Willis" (2002), 27 Queen's L.J. 859, at p. 866).

[214] In subsequent decades, the Court attempted to reconcile the deference urged by C.U.P.E. with the lingering concept of "jurisdictional error". In U.E.S., Local 298 v. Bibeault, 1988 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 1048, the Court introduced the "pragmatic and functional" approach for deciding when a matter was within the jurisdiction of an administrative body. Instead of describing jurisdiction as a preliminary or collateral matter, the Bibeault test directed reviewing courts to consider the wording of the enactment conferring jurisdiction on the administrative body, the purpose of the statute creating the tribunal, the reason for the tribunal's existence, the area of expertise of its members, and the nature of the question the tribunal had to decide — all to determine whether the legislator "intend[ed] the question to be within the jurisdiction conferred on the tribunal" (p. 1087; see also p. 1088). If so, the tribunal's decision could only be set aside if it was "patently unreasonable" (p. 1086).

[215] Although still rooted in a formalistic search for jurisdictional errors, the pragmatic and functional approach recognized that legislatures had assigned courts and administrative decision-makers distinct roles, and that the specialization and expertise of administrative decision-makers deserved deference. In her concurring reasons in National Corn Growers, Wilson J. noted that part of the process of moving away from Dicey's framework and towards a more sophisticated understanding of the role of administrative tribunals:

> . . . has involved a growing recognition on the part of courts that they may simply not be as well equipped as administrative tribunals or agencies to deal with issues which Parliament has chosen to regulate through bodies exercising delegated power, e.g., labour relations, telecommunications, financial markets and international economic relations. Careful management of these sectors often requires the use of experts who have accumulated years of experience and a specialized understanding of the activities they supervise. [p. 1336]

[216] By the mid-1990s, the Court had accepted that specialization and the legislative intent to leave issues to administrative decision-makers were inextricable and essential factors in the standard of review analysis. It stressed that "the expertise of the tribunal is of the utmost importance in determining the intention of the legislator with respect to the degree of deference to be shown to a tribunal's decision . . . [e]ven where the tribunal's enabling statute provides explicitly for appellate review" (United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Local 579 v. Bradco Construction Ltd., 1993 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 316, at p. 335). Of the factors relevant to setting the standard of review, expertise was held to be "the most important" (Canada (Director of Investigation and Research) v. Southam Inc., 1997 CanLII 385 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 748, at para. 50).

[217] Consistent with these judgments, this Court invoked the specialized expertise of a securities commission to explain why its decisions were entitled to deference on judicial review even when there was a statutory right of appeal. Writing for a unanimous Court, Iacobucci J. explained that "the concept of the specialization of duties requires that deference be shown to decisions of specialized tribunals on matters which fall squarely within the tribunal's expertise" (Pezim v. British Columbia (Superintendent of Brokers), 1994 CanLII 103 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 557, at p. 591; see also Bell Canada v. Canada (Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission), 1989 CanLII 67 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1722, at pp. 1745-46). Critically, the Court's willingness to show deference demonstrated that specialization outweighed a statutory appeal as the most significant indicator of legislative intent.

[218] In Pushpanathan v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1998 CanLII 778 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 982, the Court reformulated the pragmatic and functional approach, engaging four slightly different factors from those in Bibeault, namely: (1) whether there was a privative clause, or conversely, a right of appeal; (2) the expertise of the decision-maker on the matter in question relative to the reviewing court; (3) the purpose of the statute as a whole, and of the provision in particular; and (4) the nature of the problem, i.e., whether it was a question of law, fact, or mixed law and fact (paras. 29-37). Instead of using these factors to answer whether a question was jurisdictional, Pushpanathan deployed them to discern how much deference the legislature intended an administrative decision to receive on judicial review. Pushpanathan confirmed three standards of review: patent unreasonableness, reasonableness simpliciter, and correctness (para. 27; see also Southam, at paras. 55-56).

[219] Significantly, Pushpanathan did not disturb the finding reaffirmed in Southam that specialized expertise was the most important factor in determining whether a deferential standard applied. Specialized expertise thus remained integral to the calibration of legislative intent, even in the face of statutory rights of appeal (see Law Society of New Brunswick v. Ryan, 2003 SCC 20 (CanLII), [2003] 1 S.C.R. 247, at paras. 21 and 29-34; Cartaway Resources Corp. (Re), 2004 SCC 26 (CanLII), [2004] 1 S.C.R. 672, at para. 45; Council of Canadians with Disabilities v. VIA Rail Canada Inc., 2007 SCC 15 (CanLII), [2007] 1 S.C.R. 650, at paras. 88-92 and 100).

[220] Next came Dunsmuir, which sought to simplify the pragmatic and functional analysis while maintaining respect for the specialized expertise of administrative decision-makers. The Court merged the three standards of review into two: reasonableness and correctness. Dunsmuir also wove together the deferential threads running through the Court's administrative law jurisprudence, setting out a presumption of deferential review for certain categories of questions, including those where the decision-maker had expertise or was interpreting its "home" statute (paras. 53-54, per Bastarache and LeBel JJ., and para. 124, per Binnie J., concurring). Certain categories of issues remained subject to correctness review, including constitutional questions regarding the division of powers, true questions of jurisdiction, questions of law that were both of central importance to the legal system as a whole and outside the adjudicator's specialized area of expertise, and questions about jurisdictional lines between tribunals (paras. 58-61). Where the standard of review had not been satisfactorily determined in the jurisprudence, four contextual factors — the presence or absence of a privative clause, the purpose of the tribunal, the nature of the question at issue and the expertise of the tribunal — remained relevant to the standard of review analysis (para. 64).

[221] Notably, Dunsmuir did not mention statutory rights of appeal as one of the contextual factors, and left undisturbed their marginal role in the standard of review analysis. Instead, the Court explicitly affirmed the links between deference, the specialized expertise of administrative decision-makers and legislative intent. Justices LeBel and Bastarache held that "deference requires respect for the legislative choices to leave some matters in the hands of administrative decision makers, for the processes and determinations that draw on particular expertise and experiences, and for the different roles of the courts and administrative bodies within the Canadian constitutional system" (para. 49). They noted that "in many instances, those working day to day in the implementation of frequently complex administrative schemes have or will develop a considerable degree of expertise or field sensitivity to the imperatives and nuances of the legislative regime" (para. 49, citing David J. Mullan, "Establishing the Standard of Review: The Struggle for Complexity?" (2004), 17 C.J.A.L.P. 59, at p. 93).

[222] Post-Dunsmuir, this Court continued to stress that specialized expertise is the basis for making administrative decision-makers, rather than the courts, the appropriate forum to decide issues falling within their mandates (see Khosa, at para. 25; R. v. Conway, 2010 SCC 22 (CanLII), [2010] 1 S.C.R. 765, at para. 53; McLean v. British Columbia (Securities Commission), 2013 SCC 67 (CanLII), [2013] 3 S.C.R. 895, at paras. 30-33). Drawing on the concept of specialized expertise, the Court's post-Dunsmuir cases expressly confirmed a presumption of reasonableness review for an administrative decision-maker's interpretation of its home or closely-related statutes (see Alberta Teachers' Association, at paras. 39-41). As Gascon J. explained in Mouvement laïque québécois v. Saguenay (City), 2015 SCC 16 (CanLII), [2015] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 46:

> Deference is in order where the Tribunal acts within its specialized area of expertise . . . (Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v. Whatcott, 2013 SCC 11, [2013] 1 S.C.R. 467, at paras. 166-68; Mowat, at para. 24). In Alberta (Information and Privacy Commissioner) v. Alberta Teachers' Association, 2011 SCC 61, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 654, at paras. 30, 34 and 39, the Court noted that, on judicial review of a decision of a specialized administrative tribunal interpreting and applying its enabling statute, it should be presumed that the standard of review is reasonableness (Canadian National Railway Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 40, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 135, at para. 55; Canadian Artists' Representation v. National Gallery of Canada, 2014 SCC 42, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 197 ("NGC"), at para. 13; Khosa, at para. 25; Smith v. Alliance Pipeline Ltd., 2011 SCC 7, [2011] 1 S.C.R. 160, at paras. 26 and 28; Dunsmuir, at para. 54).

[223] And in Edmonton (City) v. Edmonton East (Capilano) Shopping Centres Ltd., 2016 SCC 47 (CanLII), [2016] 2 S.C.R. 293, the majority recognized:

> The presumption of reasonableness is grounded in the legislature's choice to give a specialized tribunal responsibility for administering the statutory provisions, and the expertise of the tribunal in so doing. Expertise arises from the specialization of functions of administrative tribunals like the Board which have a habitual familiarity with the legislative scheme they administer . . . . [E]xpertise is something that inheres in a tribunal itself as an institution: ". . . at an institutional level, adjudicators . . . can be presumed to hold relative expertise in the interpretation of the legislation that gives them their mandate, as well as related legislation that they might often encounter in the course of their functions." [Citation omitted; para. 33.]

[224] The presumption of deference, therefore, operationalized the Court's longstanding jurisprudential acceptance of the "specialized expertise" principle in a workable manner, continuing the deferential path Dickson J. first laid out in C.U.P.E.

[225] As for statutory rights of appeal, they continued to be seen as either an irrelevant factor in the standard of review analysis or one that yielded to specialized expertise. So firmly entrenched was this principle that in cases like Bell Canada v. Bell Aliant Regional Communications, 2009 SCC 40 (CanLII), [2009] 2 S.C.R. 764, Smith v. Alliance Pipeline Ltd., 2011 SCC 7 (CanLII), [2011] 1 S.C.R. 160, ATCO Gas and Pipelines Ltd. v. Alberta (Utilities Commission), 2015 SCC 45 (CanLII), [2015] 3 S.C.R. 219, and Canada (Attorney General) v. Igloo Vikski Inc., 2016 SCC 38 (CanLII), [2016] 2 S.C.R. 80, the Court applied the reasonableness standard without even referring to the presence of an appeal clause. When appeal clauses were discussed, the Court consistently confirmed that they did not oust the application of judicial review principles.

[226] In Khosa, Binnie J. explicitly endorsed Pezim and rejected "the idea that in the absence of express statutory language . . . a reviewing court is 'to apply a correctness standard as it does in the regular appellate context'" (para. 26). This reasoning was followed in Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 SCC 53 (CanLII), [2011] 3 S.C.R. 471 ("Mowat"), where the Court confirmed that "care should be taken not to conflate" judicial and appellate review (para. 30; see also para. 31). In McLean, decided two years after Mowat, the majority cited Pezim and other cases for the proposition that "general administrative law principles still apply" on a statutory appeal (see para. 21, fn. 2). Similarly, in Mouvement laïque, Gascon J. affirmed that

> [w]here a court reviews a decision of a specialized administrative tribunal, the standard of review must be determined on the basis of administrative law principles. This is true regardless > of whether the review is conducted in the context of an application for judicial review or of a statutory appeal . . . . [para. 38]

[227] In Edmonton East, the Court considered — and again rejected — the argument that statutory appeals should form a new category of correctness review. As the majority noted, "recognizing issues arising on statutory appeals as a new category to which the correctness standard applies — as the Court of Appeal did in this case — would go against strong jurisprudence from this Court" (para. 28). Even the dissenting judges in Edmonton East, although of the view that the wording of the relevant statutory appeal clause and legislative scheme pointed to the correctness standard, nonetheless unequivocally stated that "a statutory right of appeal is not a new 'category' of correctness review" (para. 70).

[228] By the time these appeals were heard, contextual factors had practically disappeared from the standard of review analysis, replaced by a presumption of deference subject only to the correctness exceptions set out in Dunsmuir — which explicitly did not include statutory rights of appeal. In other words, the Court was well on its way to realizing Dunsmuir's promise of a simplified analysis. Justice Gascon recognized as much last year in Canadian Human Rights Commission:

> This contextual approach should be applied sparingly. As held by the majority of this Court in Alberta Teachers, it is inappropriate to "retreat to the application of a full standard of review analysis where it can be determined summarily" . . . . After all, the "contextual approach can generate uncertainty and endless litigation concerning the standard of review" (Capilano [Edmonton East], at para. 35). The presumption of reasonableness review and the identified categories will generally be sufficient to determine the applicable standard. In the exceptional cases where such a contextual analysis may be justified to rebut the presumption, it need not be a long and detailed one (Capilano [Edmonton East], at para. 34). Where it has been done or referred to in the past, the analysis has been limited to determinative factors that showed a clear legislative intent justifying the rebuttal of the presumption (see, e.g., Rogers, at para. 15; Tervita, at paras. 35-36; see also, Saguenay, at paras. 50-51). [Emphasis added; para. 46.]

[229] In sum, for four decades, our standard of review jurisprudence has been clear and unwavering about the foundational role of specialized expertise and the limited role of statutory rights of appeal. Where confusion persists, it concerns the relevance of the contextual factors in Dunsmuir, the meaning of "true questions of jurisdiction" and how best to conduct reasonableness review. That was the backdrop against which these appeals were heard and argued. But rather than ushering in a simplified next act, these appeals have been used to rewrite the whole script, reassigning to the courts the starring role Dicey ordained a century ago.

The Majority's Reasons

[230] The majority's framework rests on a flawed and incomplete conceptual account of judicial review, one that unjustifiably ignores the specialized expertise of administrative decision-makers. Although the majority uses language endorsing a "presumption of reasonableness review", this presumption now rests on a totally new understanding of legislative intent and the rule of law. By prohibiting any consideration of well-established foundations for deference, such as "expertise . . . institutional experience . . . proximity and responsiveness to stakeholders . . . prompt[ness], flexib[ility], and efficien[cy]; and . . . access to justice", the majority reads out the foundations of the modern understanding of legislative intent in administrative law.

[231] In particular, such an approach ignores the possibility that specialization and other advantages are embedded into the legislative choice to delegate particular subject matters to administrative decision-makers. Giving proper effect to the legislature's choice to "delegate authority" to an administrative decisionmaker requires understanding the advantages that the decision-maker may enjoy in exercising its mandate (Dunsmuir, at para. 49). As Iacobucci J. observed in Southam:

> Presumably if Parliament entrusts a certain matter to a tribunal and not (initially at least) to the courts, it is because the tribunal enjoys some advantage that judges do not. For that reason alone, review of the decision of a tribunal should often be on a standard more deferential than correctness. [Emphasis added; para. 55.]
