(b) an order of the Ontario Municipal Board. ("règlement")

Filing of regulations

18. (1) Every regulation shall be filed with the Registrar, except as provided in sections 19 to 21.

Regulations made or approved by Lieutenant Governor in Council

(2) If a regulation is made or approved by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, a copy of the regulation certified to be a true copy by the Clerk or Deputy Clerk of the Executive Council shall be filed.

Fr

Other regulations

(3) If a regulation is not made or approved by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, the original regulation, signed by the person or entity authorized to make the regulation, shall be filed.

Same

(4) If a regulation described in subsection (3) requires the approval of a person or entity other than the Lieutenant Governor in Council, the original regulation, signed by the person or entity authorized to make the regulation and by the person or entity whose approval is required, shall be filed.

Corporation or other entity

(5) If a corporation or other entity makes or approves a regulation, the signature of an officer or agent who has authority to sign on behalf of the corporation or entity is deemed to be the signature of the corporation or entity for the purposes of subsections (3) and (4).

Proof of office not required

(6) A regulation signed by an officer or agent under subsection (5) may be filed without proof of the authority, office or signature of the person signing on behalf of the corporation or entity, but the signed regulation shall show his or her office or title.

Other requirement

(7) A regulation presented for filing shall show the date on which it was made and, if approval is required, the date on which it was approved.

Public inspection

(8) A filed regulation shall be made available for public inspection.

Filing date

19. (1) A regulation shall not be filed on a date that is later than four months after the date on which it was made or, if approval of the regulation is required, the date it is approved.

Consent to extend filing date

(2) Despite subsection (1), a regulation may be filed on a date that is later than that described in subsection (1) if consent to do so has been obtained from the person or entity authorized to make the regulation and, if the regulation requires approval, from the person or entity authorized to approve the regulation.

Date to be specified

Fr

(3) The consent shall specify a date after the four-month period described in subsection (1) by which the regulation shall be filed.

Timing of consent

(4) A consent to extend the filing date and any subsequent consents may be given at any time,

(a) whether before or after the four-month period described in subsection (1) has expired; and

(b) whether or not a date set out in an earlier consent has expired.

Filing restriction

(5) The regulation shall not be filed after the date specified in the consent.

Consent to be filed

(6) The consent extending the filing date shall be filed with the Registrar at the same time as the regulation is filed, and the rules for signing and certifying the regulation set out in section 18 apply to the consent, with necessary modifications.

Same

(7) A consent filed under this section need not be published.

Transition

(8) This section does not apply to a regulation made on or before the coming into force of this section, even if approval, if required, was given after the coming into force of this section.

Registrar's discretion not to file

20. The Registrar may refuse to file a regulation if the rules for filing set out in section 18 or prescribed under clause 32 (a) have not been complied with.

Registrar's duty not to file

21. (1) The Registrar shall refuse to file a regulation if the regulation is not bilingual but purports to amend a bilingual regulation.

Same

(2) The Registrar shall refuse to file a regulation if section 19 has not been complied with.

Deemed validity of filing

(3) If a regulation that fails to meet the requirements of this section is inadvertently accepted for filing, the regulation is deemed to be validly filed despite that

Fr

Same

(4) Subsection (3) shall be interpreted only as validating a procedural irregularity.

When regulation effective

22. (1) A regulation that is not filed has no effect.

Same

(2) Unless otherwise provided in a regulation or in the Act under which the regulation is made, a regulation comes into force on the day on which it is filed.

No retroactivity authorized

(3) Nothing in this section authorizes the making of a regulation that is effective with respect to a period before its filing.

Time of commencement and revocation

Commencement

23. (1) Unless otherwise provided in a regulation or in the Act under which the regulation is made, a regulation comes into force at the first instant of the day on which it comes into force.

Limitation

(2) Unless otherwise provided in a regulation or in the Act under which the regulation is made, a regulation is not effective against a person before the earliest of the following times:

1. When the person has actual notice of it.
2. The last instant of the day on which it is published on the e-Laws website.
3. The last instant of the day on which it is published in the print version of The Ontario Gazette.

Revocation

(3) Unless a regulation or an Act provides otherwise, the revocation of a regulation takes effect at the first instant of the day of revocation.

Proof of making, approval, filing and publication

When made

24. (1) Unless the contrary is proved, the date indicated on the e-Laws website or in the print version of The Ontario Gazette as the date on which a regulation was made is proof that the regulation was made on that date.

Fr

When approved

(2) Unless the contrary is proved, if approval is required for the making of a regulation, the date indicated on the e-Laws website or in the print version of The Ontario Gazette as the date on which approval was given is proof that the regulation was approved on that date.

When filed

(3) Unless the contrary is proved, the date indicated on the e-Laws website or in the print version of The Ontario Gazette as the date on which a regulation was filed is proof that the regulation was filed on that date.

When published on e-Laws

(4) Unless the contrary is proved, the date of publication indicated for a regulation on the e-Laws website is proof that the regulation was published on the e-Laws website on that date.

When published in The Ontario Gazette

(5) Unless the contrary is proved, the date of publication indicated for a regulation in the print version of The Ontario Gazette is proof that the regulation was published in the print version of The Ontario Gazette on that date.

When published

25. (1) Every regulation shall be published,

(a) on the e-Laws website promptly after its filing; and

(b) in the print version of The Ontario Gazette within one month after its filing or in accordance with such other timelines as may be specified in a regulation made under clause 32 (c).

Date of filing, publication, etc.

(2) A published regulation shall show the date of its filing, the date of its publication on the e-Laws website and the date of its publication in the print version of The Ontario Gazette, in the manner directed by the Registrar.

Publication in order of filing

(3) Regulations shall be published in the order in which they are filed unless, in the opinion of the Registrar, for practical or technical reasons related to the publication process, it is impossible, impractical or unreasonably difficult or costly to do so.

Numbering

(4) Regulations shall be numbered in the order in which they are a new series shall be commenced each year.

Fr

Same, e-Laws publication

(5) For the purposes of subsection (3), regulations that are published on the e-Laws website simultaneously or as a batch are deemed to be published in the order in which they are filed.

Pre-publication corrections

26. (1) At any time before a filed regulation is first published under subsection 25 (1), the Registrar may,

(a) correct spelling, punctuation or grammatical errors, or errors that are of a clerical, typographical or similar nature;

(b) alter the style or presentation of text or graphics to be consistent with the editorial or drafting practices of Ontario, or to improve electronic or print presentation; and

(c) correct errors in the numbering of provisions and make any changes in cross-references that are required as a result.

Same

(2) Corrections and alterations made under this section are deemed to be part of the regulation as filed with the Registrar under this Part.

Post-publication corrections

27. (1) If the Registrar discovers that a regulation published on the e-Laws website differs from the filed regulation, the Registrar shall promptly publish a corrected regulation on the e-Laws website.

Same

(2) A corrected regulation published under subsection (1) shall be accompanied by a notice of correction, if the Registrar considers it appropriate, having regard to the nature of the correction.

Same

(3) If the Registrar discovers that a regulation published in the print version of The Ontario Gazette differs from the filed regulation, the Registrar shall, as soon as possible, publish a notice of correction in the print version of The Ontario Gazette.

Same

(4) The Registrar need not publish a notice of correction under subsection (3) if, in his or her opinion, the difference between the filed regulation and the printed regulation is so insignificant that the notice is not warranted.

Same

Fr

(5) A notice of correction published under subsection (3) shall include a corrected regulation, if the Registrar considers it appropriate, having regard to the nature of the correction.

No validation

28. The filing, publication or correction of a regulation under this Act does not validate the regulation if it is otherwise invalid.

Judicial notice

29. Judicial notice shall be taken of the making, approval where required, filing, contents and publication of a regulation that is published on the e-Laws website or in the print version of The Ontario Gazette.

Citation of regulations

(c) any statement, mark or certification associated with the creation, recording, transmission, storage, authentication, reception, display or perception of the copy.

PART V
CHANGE POWERS

Editorial and other changes

42. (1) This Part does not authorize any change that alters the legal effect of any Act or regulation.

Same

(2) The Chief Legislative Counsel may make the following changes to consolidated laws:

1. Correct spelling, punctuation or grammatical errors, or errors that are of a clerical, typographical or similar nature.

2. Alter the style or presentation of text or graphics to be consistent with the editorial or drafting practices of Ontario, or to improve electronic or print presentation.

3. Replace a form of reference to an Act or regulation, or a provision or other portion of an Act or regulation, with a different form of reference, in accordance with Ontario drafting practices.

4. Replace a description of a date or time with the actual date or time.

5. After a bill has been enacted, replace a reference to the bill or a provision or other portion of the bill with a reference to the Act or provision or other portion of the Act.

6. If a provision provides that it is contingent on the occurrence of a future event and the event occurs, remove text referring to the contingency and make any other changes that are required as a result.

7. Make such changes to the title of an Act or regulation, including but not limited to omitting the year from the title of an Act, as are required to deal with changes in methods of citing Acts or regulations or changes in the electronic or print presentation of Acts or regulations, and make any other changes that are required as a result.

Fr

8. If an Act or regulation provides that references to a body, office, person, place or thing are deemed or considered to be references to another body, office, person, place or thing, replace a reference to the original body, office, person, place or thing with a reference to the other.

9. When the name, title, location or address of a body, office, person, place or thing has been altered, change references to the name, title, location or address to reflect the alteration, if the body, office, person, place or thing continues under the new name or title or at the new location or address.

10. Correct errors in the numbering of provisions or other portions of an Act or regulation and make any changes in cross-references that are required as a result.

11. If a provision of a transitional nature is contained in an amending Act or regulation, incorporate it as a provision of the relevant consolidated law and make any other changes that are required as a result.

12. Make a correction, if it is patent both that an error has been made and what the correction should be.

Exception, par. 9 of subs. (2)

(3) Paragraph 9 of subsection (2) does not apply to alterations to the name or title of,

(a) a Minister or Ministry of the Government of Ontario;

(b) a municipality, as defined in the Municipal Act, 2001;

(c) a non-legislative document incorporated by reference into an Act or regulation; or

(d) an Act or regulation.

Error in consolidation

(4) If the Chief Legislative Counsel discovers that an error was made in the process of publishing or consolidating a consolidated law,

(a) in the case of a consolidated law published on the e-Laws website, he or she shall ensure that a corrected consolidated law is published on the e-Laws website; and

(b) in the case of a consolidated law printed by the Queen's Printer or by an entity that is prescribed under clause 41 (1) (a), he or she may cause a corrected consolidated law to be published in print, if he or she considers it appropriate in the circumstances.

Notice of change

43. (1) The Chief Legislative Counsel may provide notice of changes made under paragraphs 1 to 3 of subsection 42 (2) and of corrections made under subsection 42 (4), in the manner that he or she considers appropriate.

Fr

Same

(2) The Chief Legislative Counsel shall provide notice of the changes made under paragraphs 4 to 12 of subsection 42 (2), in the manner that he or she considers appropriate.

Same

(3) In determining whether to provide notice of a change made under paragraphs 1 to 3 of subsection 42 (2), the Chief Legislative Counsel shall consider,

(a) the nature of the change; and

(b) the extent to which notice, and the information provided in it, would provide assistance in understanding the relevant legislative history.

Same

(4) In providing notice under subsection (1) or (2), the Chief Legislative Counsel shall state the change or the nature of the change.

Date of change

44. No legal significance shall be inferred from the timing of the exercise of a power under this Part.

Interpretation

45. Regardless of when a change is made to a consolidated law under this Part, the change may be read, if it is appropriate to do so,

(a) into the source law as of the date it was enacted or filed; or

(b) into earlier consolidations of the Act or regulation.

PART VI
INTERPRETATION

Application

Application to Acts and regulations

46. Every provision of this Part applies to every Act and regulation.

Contrary intention or context requiring otherwise

47. Section 46 applies unless,

(a) a contrary intention appears; or

(b) its application would give to a term or provision a meaning that is inconsistent with the context.

Fr

Existing and future legislation

48. Section 46 applies whether the Act or regulation was enacted or made before, on or after the day the Access to Justice Act, 2006 receives Royal Assent.

Other documents

49. The following provisions also apply, in the same way as to a regulation, to every document that is made under an Act but is not a regulation:

1. Subsection 52 (6) (regulation continues).

2. Section 54 (regulations – power to make, amend, etc.).

3. Section 58 (reference to Act or regulation includes reference to individual provisions).

4. Section 59 (rolling incorporation of Ontario legislation), but only with respect to the document that contains the reference.

5. Section 86 (terms used in regulations).

6. Section 89 (computation of time).

Interpretation and definition provisions

50. The interpretation and definition provisions in every Act and regulation are subject to the exceptions contained in section 47.

Legislative Changes

Effect of repeal and revocation

51. (1) The repeal of an Act or the revocation of a regulation does not,

(a) affect the previous operation of the repealed or revoked Act or regulation;

(b) affect a right, privilege, obligation or liability that came into existence under the repealed or revoked Act or regulation;

(c) affect an offence committed against the repealed or revoked Act or regulation, or any penalty, forfeiture or punishment incurred in connection with the offence;

(d) affect an investigation, proceeding or remedy in respect of,

(i) a right, privilege, obligation or liability described in clause (b), or

(ii) a penalty, forfeiture or punishment described in clause (c).

Same

(2) An investigation, proceeding or remedy described in clause (1) (d) may be commenced, continued and enforced as if the Act or regulation had not been repealed or revoked.

Fr

Same

(3) A penalty, forfeiture or punishment described in clause (1) (c) may be imposed as if the Act or regulation had not been repealed or revoked.

Effect of amendment and replacement

Application

52. (1) This section applies,

(a) if an Act is repealed and replaced;

(b) if a regulation is revoked and replaced;

(c) if an Act or regulation is amended.

Authorized persons continue to act

(2) A person authorized to act under the former Act or regulation has authority to act under the corresponding provisions, if any, of the new or amended one until another person becomes authorized to do so.

(3) Proceedings commenced under the former Act or regulation shall be continued under the new or amended one, in conformity with the new or amended one as much as possible.

New procedure

(4) The procedure established by the new or amended Act or regulation shall be followed, with necessary modifications, in proceedings in relation to matters that happened before the replacement or amendment.

Reduction of penalty

(5) If the new or amended Act or regulation provides for a lesser penalty, forfeiture or punishment, the lesser one applies when a sanction is imposed, after the replacement or amendment, in respect of matters that happened before that time.

Regulation continues

(6) If an Act under which a regulation has been made is replaced or amended, the regulation remains in force to the extent that it is authorized by the new or amended Act.

Effect of repeal and revocation on amendments

53. The repeal or revocation of an Act or regulation includes the revocation of any amendment to the Act or regulation.

Fr

Regulations – power to make, amend, etc.

54. (1) Power to make regulations includes power to amend, revoke or replace them from time to time.

Survival of power to revoke

(2) Power to revoke a regulation remains even if the provision conferring power to make it has been repealed.

New regulation-maker

(3) If a provision conferring power on a person or entity to make a regulation is amended, or repealed and replaced, so as to confer the power or substantially the same power on a different person or entity, the second person or entity has power to revoke, amend or replace the regulation made by the first one.

Obsolete regulations

55. (1) If a provision of an Act under which a regulation is made is repealed and not replaced, the regulation ceases to have effect, subject to section 51 and subsection 59 (3).

Same

(2) The Lieutenant Governor in Council may, by regulation, revoke a regulation,

(a) that has ceased to have effect under subsection (1); or

(b) that has been rendered obsolete by events or the passage of time.

No implication

56. (1) The repeal, revocation or amendment of an Act or regulation does not imply anything about the previous state of the law or that the Act or regulation was previously in force.

Same

(2) The amendment of an Act or regulation does not imply that the previous state of the law was different.

Same

(3) The re-enactment, remaking, amendment or changing under Part V (Change Powers) of an Act or regulation does not imply an adoption of any judicial or other interpretation of the language used in the Act or regulation, or of similar language.

No revival

Fr

57. The repeal or revocation of an Act or regulation does not imply the revival of an Act or regulation that is not in force or another thing that is not in existence at the time the repeal or revocation takes effect.

Revocation of Unconsolidated Regulations

Unconsolidated regulations

99. (1) Every regulation listed in the Table to this section is revoked if it has not previously been revoked.

Same

(2) The Table to this section comprises a portion of the regulations listed in the Schedule to the Revised Regulations of Ontario, 1990, which is set out in volume 9 of the Revised Regulations of Ontario, 1990 and lists the regulations that were left unrevoked and unconsolidated by the Revised Regulations of Ontario, 1990.

Same

(3) The Chief Legislative Counsel may at any time cause a regulation that is unrevoked and unconsolidated to be consolidated and published on the e-Laws website as consolidated law.

ii. The fair market value of any real property and of any personal property, as at the date the action is commenced.

(2) If there are two or more plaintiffs, the procedure set out in this Rule shall be used if each plaintiff's claim, considered separately, meets the requirements of subrule (1).

When Optional

(3) The procedure set out in this Rule may be used in any other action at the option of the plaintiff, subject to subrules (4) to (9).

Originating Process

(4) The statement of claim (Form 14A, 14B or 14D) or notice of action (Form 14C) shall indicate that the action is being brought under this Rule.

Action Continues to Proceed Under Rule

(5) An action commenced under this Rule continues to proceed under this Rule unless,

(a) the defendant objects in the statement of defence to the action proceeding under this Rule because the plaintiff's claim does not comply with subrule (1), and the plaintiff does not abandon in the reply the claims or parts of claims that do not comply; or

(b) a defendant by counterclaim, crossclaim or third party claim objects in the statement of defence to the counterclaim, crossclaim or third party claim proceeding under this Rule because the counterclaim, crossclaim or third party claim does not comply with subrule (1), and the defendant does not abandon in the reply to the counterclaim, crossclaim or third party claim the claims or p aims that do not comply.

Fr

Continuance Under Ordinary Procedure — Where Notice Required

(a) the action is continued under the ordinary procedure or under Rule 77, as the case may be; and

(b) the plaintiff shall deliver, after all the pleadings have been delivered or at the time of amending the pleadings, as the case may be, a notice (Form 76A) stating that the action and any related proceedings are continued as an ordinary action or under Rule 77, as the case may be.

Continuance Under Simplified Procedure — Where Notice Required

(7) An action that was not commenced under this Rule is continued under this Rule if,

(a) a party's pleading is amended;

(b) the amended pleading complies with subrule (1);

(c) all other claims, counterclaims, crossclaims or third party claims comply with this Rule; and

(d) the consent of all the parties is filed.

(8) The plaintiff shall deliver a notice (Form 76A) stating that the action and any related proceedings are continued under this Rule.

Effect of Abandonment

(9) A party who abandons a claim or part of a claim or amends a pleading so that the claim, counterclaim, crossclaim or third party claim complies with subrule (1) may not bring the claim or part in any other proceeding.

AFFIDAVIT OF DOCUMENTS

Copies of Documents

76.03 (1) A party to an action under this Rule shall, within 10 days after the close of pleadings, serve on every other party,

(a) an affidavit of documents (Form 30A or 30B) disclosing to the full extent of the party's knowledge, information and belief all documents relating to any matter in issue in the action that are or have been in the party's possession, control or power; and

Lawyer's Certificate

(4) The lawyer's certificate under subrule 30.03 (4) (full disclosure in affidavit) shall include a statement that the lawyer has explained to the deponent the necessity of complying with subrules (1) and (2).

NO DISCOVERY, CROSS-EXAMINATION ON AN AFFIDAVIT OR EXAMINATION OF A WITNESS

76.04 The following are not permitted in an action under this Rule:

1. Examination for discovery under rule 31.03 or 31.10.
2. Examination for discovery by written questions and answers under Rule 35.
3. Cross-examination of a deponent on an affidavit under rule 39.02.
4. Examination of a witness on a motion under rule 39.03.

MOTIONS

Motion Form

76.05 (1) The moving party shall serve a motion form (Form 76B) in accordance with rule 37.07 and shall submit it to the court before the motion is heard.

Place of Hearing

(2) Unless the parties agree otherwise or the court orders otherwise, the motion shall be heard in the county where the action was commenced.

Procedure

(3) Depending on the practical requirements of the situation, the motion may be made,

(a) with or without supporting material or a motion record;

(b) by attendance, in writing, by fax or under rule 1.0[illegible]hone and video conferences).

Fr

registrar shall make an order granting the relief sought:

1. The motion is for an order on consent, the consent of all parties is filed and the consent states that no party affected by the order is under disability.

2. No responding material is filed and the notice of motion or the motion form states that no party affected by the order is under disability.

(5) Subrule (4) applies to a motion for,

(a) amendment of a pleading or notice of motion;

(b) addition, deletion or substitution of a party whose consent is filed;

(c) removal of a solicitor as solicitor of record;

(d) setting aside the noting of a party in default;

(6) The court or registrar shall record the disposition of the motion on the motion form.

(7) No formal order is required unless,

(a) the court or registrar orders otherwise;

(b) an appeal is made to a judge; or

(c) an appeal or motion for leave to appeal is made to an appellate court.

DISMISSAL BY REGISTRAR

If No Defence Filed

76.06 (1) The registrar shall make an order dismissing an action as abandoned if the following conditions are satisfied, unless the court orders otherwise:

1. More than 180 days have passed since the date the originating process was issued.

2. No statement of defence has been filed.

3. The action has not been disposed of by final order or judgment.

4. The action has not been set down for trial or summary trial.

Fr

If Defence Filed

(2) The registrar shall make an order dismissing an action as abandoned if the following conditions are satisfied, unless the court orders otherwise:

1. More than 150 days have passed since the filing of the first statement of defence or notice of intent to defend.

2. The action has not been disposed of by final order or judgment.

3. The action has not been set down for trial or summary trial.

4. The registrar has given 45 days notice that the action will be dismissed as abandoned.

Service on Parties

(3) The registrar shall serve a copy of the order made under subrule (1) or (2) on the parties.

Effect on Subsequent Action

(4) The dismissal of an action as abandoned has the same effect as a dismissal for delay under rule 24.05.

SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Where Available

76.07 (1) After the close of pleadings, a party may move before a judge with supporting affidavit material for summary judgment.

Place of Hearing

(2) Unless the parties agree otherwise or the court orders otherwise, the motion shall be heard in the county where the action was commenced.

Application of Summary Judgment Procedure

(3) Rules 20.05, 20.07, 20.08 and 20.09 (summary judgment procedure) apply to the motion, but rules 20.01 to 20.04 (availability, affidavits, factums, disposition of motion) and rule 20.06 (costs) do not apply.

Responding Party's Material

Fr

Contents of Affidavit

(5) An affidavit for use on the motion may be made on information and belief as permitted by subrule 39.01 (4), but on the hearing of the motion an adverse inference may be drawn, if appropriate, from a party's failure to provide the evidence of persons having personal knowledge of contested facts.

Motion Record Required

(6) The moving party shall serve a motion record on every other party to the motion and file it, with proof of service, in the court office where the motion is to be heard, at least two days before the hearing of the motion.

Contents of Motion Record

(7) The motion record shall contain, in consecutively numbered pages arranged in the following order,

(a) a table of contents describing each document, including each exhibit, by its nature and date and, in the case of an exhibit, by exhibit number or letter;

(b) a copy of the notice of motion;

(c) a copy of all affidavits served by any party for use on the motion; and

(d) a copy of the pleadings, including those relating to any counterclaim, crossclaim or third party claim.

Factums Required

(8) Every party to the motion shall serve on every other party a factum consisting of a concise statement of the facts and law relied upon by the party and file it, with proof of service, in the court office where the motion is to be heard, at least two days before the hearing of the motion.

Test for Summary Judgment

(9) The presiding judge shall grant judgment on the motion unless,

(a) he or she is unable to decide the issues in the action without cross-examination; or

(b) it would be otherwise unjust to decide the issues on the motion.

Fr

determine the mode of trial that is appropriate in all the circumstances.

SETTLEMENT DISCUSSION AND DOCUMENTARY DISCLOSURE

76.08 Within 60 days after the filing of the first statement of defence or notice of intent to defend, the parties shall, in a meeting or telephone call, consider whether,

(a) all documents relating to any matter at issue have been disclosed; and

(b) settlement of any or all issues is possible.

HOW DEFENDED ACTION IS SET DOWN FOR TRIAL OR SUMMARY TRIAL

Notice of Readiness for Pre-Trial Conference

76.09 (1) Despite rule 48.02 (how action set down for trial), the plaintiff shall, within 90 days after the first statement of defence or notice of intent to defend is filed, set the action down for trial by serving a notice of readiness for pre-trial conference (Form 76C) on every party to the action and any counterclaim, crossclaim or third party claim and forthwith filing the notice with proof of service.

(2) If the plaintiff does not act under subrule (1), any other party may do so.

Certificate

(3) The party who sets the action down for trial shall certify in the notice of readiness for pre-trial conference that there was a settlement discussion.

PRE-TRIAL CONFERENCE

Notice

76.10 (1) The registrar shall serve notice of a pre-trial conference at least 45 days before the scheduled date.

Attendance

(2) A party and his or her lawyer shall, unless the court orders otherwise, participate in the pre-trial conference,

(a) by personal attendance; or

(b) under rule 1.08 (telephone and video conferences) if personal attendance would require undue amounts of travel time or expense.

Fr

Authority to Settle person throughout the conference, whether it takes place during or after regular business hours.

Documents

(4) At least five days before the pre-trial conference, each party shall,

(a) file,

(i) a copy of the party's affidavit of documents and copies of the documents relied on for the party's claim or defence,

(ii) a copy of any expert report, and

(iii) any other material necessary for the conference; and

(b) deliver,

(i) a two-page statement setting out the issues and the party's position with respect to them, and

(ii) a trial management checklist (Form 76D).

Trial Date

(5) The pre-trial conference judge or master shall fix a date for trial, subject to the direction of the regional senior judge.

Mode of Trial

(6) The parties may agree that the trial shall be an ordinary trial or a summary trial under rule 76.12; if they do not agree, the pre-trial conference judge or master shall determine the mode of trial that is appropriate in all the circumstances.

(7) If the trial is to be a summary trial under rule 76.12, the pre-trial conference judge or master may vary the order and time of presentation.

PLACING DEFENDED ACTION ON TRIAL LIST

Registrar

76.11 (1) The registrar shall place a defended action on the appropriate trial list immediately after the pre-trial conference.

Trial Record

Fr

(2) At least 10 days before the date fixed for trial, the party who set the action down for trial shall serve a trial record on every party to the action and any counterclaim, rule 48.03.

(4) In the case of a summary trial under rule 76.12, the trial record shall contain, in consecutively numbered pages arranged in the following order,

(a) a table of contents describing each document, including each exhibit, by its nature and date and, in the case of an exhibit, by exhibit number or letter;

(b) a copy of the pleadings, including those relating to any counterclaim, crossclaim or third party claim;

(c) a copy of any demand or order for particulars of a pleading and the particulars delivered in response;

(d) a copy of any order respecting the trial;

(e) a copy of all the affidavits served by all the parties for use on the summary trial; and

(f) a certificate signed by the solicitor of the party filing the trial record, stating that it contains the documents described in clauses (a) to (e).

SUMMARY TRIAL

Procedure

76.12 (1) At a summary trial, the evidence and argument shall be presented as follows, subject to any direction under subrule 76.10 (7):

1. The plaintiff shall adduce evidence by affidavit.

2. A party who is adverse in interest may cross-examine the deponent of any affidavit served by the plaintiff.

3. The plaintiff may re-examine any deponent who is cross-examined under this subrule for not more than 10 minutes.

4. When any cross-examinations and re-examinations of the plaintiff's deponents are concluded, the defendant shall adduce evidence by affidavit.

5. A party who is adverse in interest may cross-examine the deponent of any affidavit served by a defendant.

6. A party shall complete all of the party's cross-examinations [illegible]60 minutes.

7. A defendant may re-examine any deponent who is cross-examined under this subrule for not more than 10 minutes.

Fr

evidence.

9. After the presentation of evidence, each party may make oral argument for not more than 45 minutes.

(2) The trial judge may extend a time provided in subrule (1).

(3) A party who intends to cross-examine the deponent of an affidavit at the summary trial shall, at least 10 days before the date fixed for trial, give notice of that intention to the party who filed the affidavit, who shall arrange for the deponent's attendance at the trial.

Judgment after Summary Trial

(4) The judge shall grant judgment after the conclusion of the summary trial.

COSTS CONSEQUENCES

Opting In

76.13 (1) Regardless of the outcome of the action, if this Rule applies as the result of amendment of the pleadings under subrule 76.02 (7), the party whose pleadings are amended shall pay, on a substantial indemnity basis, the costs incurred by the opposing party up to the date of the amendment that would not have been incurred had the claim originally complied with subrule 76.02 (1), unless the court orders otherwise.

Plaintiff Denied Costs

(2) Subrules (3) to (10) apply to a plaintiff who obtains a judgment that satisfies the following conditions:

1. The judgment awards exclusively one or more of the following:

   i. Money.

   ii. Real property.

   iii. Personal property.

2. The total of the following amounts is $50,000 or less, exclusive of interest and costs:

   i. The amount of money awarded, if any.

   ii. The fair market value of any real property and of any personal property awarded, as at the date the action is commenced.

Fr

(3) The plaintiff shall not recover any costs unless, and continued the action under the ordinary procedure.

(4) Subrule (3) applies despite subrule 49.10 (1) (plaintiff's offer to settle).

(5) Subrule (3) does not apply if this Rule was unavailable because of the counterclaim, crossclaim or third party claim of another party.

Plaintiff may be Ordered to Pay Defendant's Costs

(6) The plaintiff may, in the trial judge's discretion, be ordered to pay all or part of the defendant's costs, including substantial indemnity costs, in addition to any costs the plaintiff is required to pay under subrule 49.10 (2) (defendant's offer to settle).

Defendant Objecting to Simplified Procedure

(7) In an action that includes a claim for real or personal property, if the defendant objected to proceeding under this Rule on the ground that the property's fair market value exceeded $50,000 at the date the action was commenced and the court finds the value did not exceed that amount at that date, the defendant shall pay, on a substantial indemnity basis, the costs incurred by the plaintiff that would not have been incurred had the claim originally complied with subrule 76.02 (1), unless the court orders otherwise.

Burden of Proof

(8) The burden of proving that the fair market value of the real or personal property at the date of commencement of the action was $50,000 or less is on the plaintiff.

Counterclaims, Crossclaims and Third Party Claims

(9) Subrules (1) to (8) apply, with necessary modifications, to counterclaims, crossclaims and third party claims.

Transition

(10) In the case of an action that was commenced before January 1, 2002, subrules (2), (7) and (8) apply as if "$50,000" read "$25,000".

26. Subrules 77.06 (3), (4), (4.1), (8), (9) and (10) of the Regulation are revoked.

27. Rule 77.09 of the Regulation is revoked and the following substituted:

NOTICE OF RENEWAL OF GARNISHMENT

TO (name and address of garnishee)

A LEGAL PROCEEDING in this court between the creditor and the debtor has resulted in an order that the debtor pay a sum of money to the creditor. The creditor claims that you owe a debt to the debtor. A debt to the debtor includes both a debt payable to the debtor and a debt payable to the debtor and one or more co-owners. The creditor has had this notice of renewal of garnishment directed to you as garnishee in order to seize any debt that you owe or will owe to the debtor. Where the debt is payable to the debtor and to one or more co-owners, you must pay one-half of the indebtedness or the greater or lesser amount specified in an order made under subrule 60.08 (16).

(Where appropriate, add: This notice of renewal of garnishment enforces an order for support.)

YOU ARE REQUIRED TO PAY to the Sheriff of the (name of county or district),

(a) within 10 days after this notice is served on you, all debts now payable by you to the debtor; and

(b) within 10 days after they become payable, all debts that become payable by you to the debtor within 6 years after this notice is served on you, subject to the exemptions provided by section 7 of the Wages Act. The total amount of all your payments to the sheriff is not to exceed $.....less $10 for your costs of making each payment.

EACH PAYMENT MUST BE SENT with a copy of the attached garnishee's payment notice to the sheriff at the address shown below.

IF YOU DO NOT PAY THE TOTAL AMOUNT OF $..... LESS $10 FOR YOUR COSTS OF MAKING EACH PAYMENT WITHIN 10 DAYS after this notice is served on you, because the debt is owed to the debtor and to one or more co-owners or for any other reason, you must within that time serve on the creditor and the debtor and file with the court a garnishee's statement in Form 60I attached to this notice.

Fr

IF YOU FAIL TO OBEY THIS NOTICE, THE COURT MAY MAKE AND ENFORCE AN ORDER AGAINST YOU for payment of the amount set out above and the costs of the creditor.

IF YOU MAKE PAYMENT TO ANYONE OTHER THAN THE SHERIFF, YOU MAY BE LIABLE TO PAY AGAIN.

TO THE CREDITOR, THE DEBTOR AND THE GARNISHEE.

Any party may make a motion to the court to determine any matter in relation to this notice of renewal of garnishment.

AMENDING REG. 194 OF R.R.O. 1990 (RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE)

1. The definitions of "partial indemnity costs" and "substantial indemnity costs" in subrule 1.03 (1) of Regulation 194 of the Revised Regulations of Ontario, 1990 are revoked and the following substituted:

"partial indemnity costs" mean costs awarded in accordance with Part I of Tariff A, and "on a partial indemnity basis" has a corresponding meaning; ("dépens d'indemnisation partielle")

"substantial indemnity costs" mean costs awarded in an amount that is 1.5 times what would otherwise be awarded in accordance with Part I of Tariff A, and "on a substantial indemnity basis" has a corresponding meaning. ("dépens d'indemnisation substantielle")

2. (1) Subrule 15.04 (2) of the Regulation is revoked and the following substituted:

(2) Service of a notice of motion for the removal of a solicitor from the record and service of the order shall be made on the client,

(a) personally or by an alternative to personal service under rule 16.03; or

(b) by mailing a copy to the client at,

(i) the client's last known address, and

(ii) another address, if any, where the solicitor believes is likely to come to the client's attention.

Fr

Contents of Order

(4) The order removing a solicitor from the record shall include,

(a) the client's last known address, or the address for service if different;

(b) another address, if any, where the solicitor believes the copy is likely to come to the client's attention;

(c) the client's telephone number and fax number, if any, unless the court orders otherwise;

(d) if the client is a corporation, the text of subrules (6) and (7); and

(e) if the client is not a corporation, the text of subrules (8) and (9).

(3) Rule 15.04 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following subrules:

Clients Other Than Corporations

(8) A client who is not a corporation shall, within 30 days after being served with the order removing the solicitor from the record,

(a) appoint a new solicitor of record by serving a notice under subrule 15.03 (2); or

(b) serve a notice of intention to act in person under subrule 15.03 (2).

(9) If the client fails to comply with subrule (8),

(a) the court may dismiss the client's proceeding or strike out his or her defence; and

(b) in an appeal,

(i) a judge of the appellate court may, on motion, dismiss the client's appeal, or

(ii) the court hearing the appeal may deny the client the right to be heard.

3. Rule 43 of the Regulation is revoked and the following substituted:

RULE 43 INTERPLEADER

GENERAL

Definition

Fr

43.01 (1) In rules 43.02 to 43.04,

"property" means personal property and includes a debt.

1. In the case of an application or motion for an interpleader order under subrule 43.02 (1), each person who makes a claim in respect of the property.

2. In the case of an application or motion for an interpleader order under subrule 43.02 (2),

i. the judgment debtor against whom the enforcement process has been filed, ii. every creditor who has filed with the sheriff an enforcement process against the judgment debtor, and

iii. each person who makes a claim in respect of the property.

WHERE AVAILABLE

Person Claiming No Beneficial Interest

43.02 (1) A person may seek an interpleader order (Form 43A) in respect of property if,

(a) two or more other persons have made adverse claims in respect of the property; and

(b) the first-named person,

(i) claims no beneficial interest in the property, other than a lien for costs, fees or expenses, and

(ii) is willing to deposit the property with the court or dispose of it as the court directs.

Claims Under Rule 60.13

(2) A claimant who is entitled to do so under subrule 60.13 (4) or (5) may seek an interpleader order (Form 43A).

HOW OBTAINED

Application or Motion under Subrule 43.02 (1)

43.03 (1) The following requirements apply when a person seeks an interpleader order under subrule 43.02 (1):

1. If no proceeding has been commenced in respect of the property, the person shall make an application naming the claimants as respondents.

2. If a proceeding has been commenced in respect of the property, the person shall make a motion in the proceeding on notice to the claimants.

Fr

4. The application or motion shall be supported by an affidavit identifying the property, containing the names and addresses of every claimant of whom the deponent has knowledge, and stating that the applicant or moving party,

i. claims no beneficial interest in the property, other than a lien for costs, fees or expenses,

ii. does not collude with any of the claimants, and

iii. is willing to deposit the property with the court or dispose of it as the court directs.

Motion under Subrule 43.02 (2)

(2) The following requirements apply when a claimant seeks an interpleader order under subrule 43.02 (2):

1. The claimant shall make a motion, on notice to the other claimants, in the proceeding in which the writ of execution was issued against the debtor.

2. The notice of motion shall require the other claimants to attend the hearing to substantiate their claims.

DISPOSITION

Powers of Court

43.04 (1) On the hearing of an application or motion for an interpleader order, the court may,

(a) order that the applicant or moving party deposit the property with an officer of the court, sell it as the court directs or, in the case of money, pay it into court to await the outcome of a specified proceeding;

(b) declare that, on compliance with an order under clause (a), the liability of the applicant or moving party in respect of the property or its proceeds is extinguished; and

(c) order that the costs of the applicant or moving party be paid out of the property or its proceeds.

(2) In an order under subrule (1), the court may,

(a) order a claimant to be made a party to a proceedin commenced in substitution for or in addition to the moving party;

Fr

(c) where the question is one of law and the facts are not in dispute, decide the question without directing the trial of an issue;

(d) on the request of a claimant, determine the rights of the claimants in a summary manner, if, having regard to the value of the property and the nature of the issues in dispute, it seems desirable to do so;

(e) where a claimant fails to attend the hearing, or attends and fails to comply with an order made in the course of the proceeding, make an order declaring that the claimant and all persons claiming under the claimant are forever barred from making a claim against the applicant or moving party and all persons claiming under the applicant or moving party, without affecting the rights of the claimants as between themselves;

(f) stay any further step in a proceeding in respect of the property; and

(g) make such other order as is just.

Certain Motions to be Heard by Judge

(3) A motion for an interpleader order that is made to a master and raises a genuine issue of fact or of law shall be adjourned to be heard by a judge.

4. (1) Subrule 57.01 (1) of the Regulation is amended by adding the following clauses:

(0.a) the principle of indemnity, including, where applicable, the experience of the lawyer for the party entitled to the costs as well as the rates charged and the hours spent by that lawyer;

(0.b) the amount of costs that an unsuccessful party could reasonably expect to pay in relation to the step in the proceeding for which costs are being fixed;

(2) Subrule 57.01 (4) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "or" at the end of clause (b) and by adding the following clauses:

(d) to award costs in an amount that represents full indemnity; or

(e) to award costs to an unrepresented party.

(3) Rule 57.01 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following subrules:

Fr

Costs Outline

every other party involved in the same step, and bring to the hearing, a costs outline (Form 57B) not exceeding three pages in length.

Process for Fixing Costs

(7) The court shall devise and adopt the simplest, least expensive and most expeditious process for fixing costs and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, costs may be fixed after receiving written submissions, without the attendance of the parties.

5. Form 15B of the Regulation is amended by striking out "formerly acting in person".

6. The Regulation is amended by adding the following Form:

AMENDING REG. 194 OF R.R.O. 1990
(RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE)

1. Subrule 1.03 (1) of Regulation 194 of the Revised Regulations of Ontario, 1990 is amended by adding the following definition:

"timetable" means a schedule for the completion of one or more steps required to advance the proceeding (including delivery of affidavits of documents, examinations under oath, where available, or motions), established by order of the court or by written agreement of the parties that is not contrary to an order. ("calendrier")

2. Rule 1.04 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following subrule:

Proportionality

(1.1) In applying these rules, the court shall make orders and give directions that are proportionate to the importance and complexity of the issues, and to the amount involved, in the proceeding.

3. (1) Paragraph 8 of subrule 1.08 (1) of the Regulation is revoked and the following substituted:

8. A pre-trial conference or case conference.

(2) Subrule 1.08 (3) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "the court on motion may make an order" and substituting "the court may, on motion or on its own initiative, make an o

Fr

4. Clause 3.01 (1) (b) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "less than seven days" and substituting "seven days or less".

5. Subrule 3.02 (4) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "except as provided in subrule 77.01 (4) (no extension by consent in case management)" at the end.

6. Rule 3 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following rule:

TIMETABLES

Amendment

3.04 (1) Parties may, by written agreement, amend a timetable established by order of a judge or case management master, unless the order expressly prohibits amendment by the parties.

Same

(2) Parties may, by written agreement, amend a timetable established by written agreement of the parties and amended by the order of a judge or case management master, unless the order expressly prohibits amendment by the parties.

Limitation

(3) Despite subrules (1) and (2), in the case of an action, an agreement to amend a timetable shall not amend the date before which the action shall be set down for trial or restored to a trial list, as the case may be.

Non-Compliance

(4) If a party fails to comply with a timetable, a judge or case management master may, on any other party's motion,

(a) stay the party's proceeding;

(b) dismiss the party's proceeding or strike out the party's defence; or

(c) make such other order as is just.

7. (1) Paragraph 1 of subrule 4.05 (2) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "paragraphs 2 and 3" at the end and substituting "paragraphs 2, 3 and 4".

(2) Subrule 4.05 (2) of the Regulation is amended by adding the following paragraph:

Fr

4. Documents relating to a motion to transfer a proceeding to another county under rule 13.1.02 shall be filed in the court office of the county to which the transfer is sought, if subrule 13.1.02 (3.1) applies.

8. The Regulation is amended by adding the following Rule:

RULE 4.1 DUTY OF EXPERT

DUTY OF EXPERT

4.1.01 (1) It is the duty of every expert engaged by or on behalf of a party to provide evidence in relation to a proceeding under these rules,

(a) to provide opinion evidence that is fair, objective and non-partisan;

(b) to provide opinion evidence that is related only to matters that are within the expert's area of expertise; and

(c) to provide such additional assistance as the court may reasonably require to determine a matter in issue.

Duty Prevails

(2) The duty in subrule (1) prevails over any obligation owed by the expert to the party by whom or on whose behalf he or she is engaged.

9. The Regulation is amended by adding the following Rule:

RULE 6.1 SEPARATE HEARINGS

SEPARATE HEARINGS

6.1.01 With the consent of the parties, the court may order a separate hearing on one or more issues in a proceeding, including separate hearings on the issues of liability and damages.

10. Rule 13.1.02 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following subrule:

(3.1) Despite subrules 37.03 (1) and 76.05 (2) (place of hearing motions), a motion under subrule (1), (2) or (3) may be brought and heard in the county to which the transfer of the proceeding is sought.

11. (1) Subrule 14.08 (3) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "rules 76.06 and 77.08, which provide" and substi 'rule 48.15, which provides".

Fr

(2) Subrule 14.08 (5) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "July 1, 2009" at the end and substituting "January 1, 2010".

12. Rule 20.02 of the Regulation is revoked and the following substituted:

EVIDENCE ON MOTION

20.02 (1) An affidavit for use on a motion for summary judgment may be made on information and belief as provided in subrule 39.01 (4), but, on the hearing of the motion, the court may, if appropriate, draw an adverse inference from the failure of a party to provide the evidence of any person having personal knowledge of contested facts.

(2) In response to affidavit material or other evidence supporting a motion for summary judgment, a responding party may not rest solely on the allegations or denials in the party's pleadings, but must set out, in affidavit material or other evidence, specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue requiring a trial.

13. (1) Subrule 20.04 (1) of the Regulation is revoked.

(2) Clause 20.04 (2) (a) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "no genuine issue for trial" and substituting "no genuine issue requiring a trial".

(3) Rule 20.04 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following subrules:

Powers

(2.1) In determining under clause (2) (a) whether there is a genuine issue requiring a trial, the court shall consider the evidence submitted by the parties and, if the determination is being made by a judge, the judge may exercise any of the following powers for the purpose, unless it is in the interest of justice for such powers to be exercised only at a trial:

1. Weighing the evidence.
2. Evaluating the credibility of a deponent.
3. Drawing any reasonable inference from the evidence.

Oral Evidence (Mini-Trial)

Fr

(2.2) A judge may, for the purposes of exercising any of the powers set out in subrule (2.1), order that oral evidence be presented by one or more parties, with or without time limits on its presentation.

(4) The French version of subrules 20.04 (3) and (4) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "seule question litigieuse" wherever it appears and substituting in each case "seule véritable question litigieuse".

14. Rules 20.05 and 20.06 of the Regulation are revoked and the following substituted:

WHERE TRIAL IS NECESSARY

Powers of Court

20.05 (1) Where summary judgment is refused or is granted only in part, the court may make an order specifying what material facts are not in dispute and defining the issues to be tried, and order that the action proceed to trial expeditiously.

Directions and Terms

(2) If an action is ordered to proceed to trial under subrule (1), the court may give such directions or impose such terms as are just, including an order,

(a) that each party deliver, within a specified time, an affidavit of documents in accordance with the court's directions;

(b) that any motions be brought within a specified time;

(c) that a statement setting out what material facts are not in dispute be filed within a specified time;

(d) that examinations for discovery be conducted in accordance with a discovery plan established by the court, which may set a schedule for examinations and impose such limits on the right of discovery as are just, including a limit on the scope of discovery to matters not covered by the affidavits or any other evidence filed on the motion and any cross-examinations on them;

(e) that a discovery plan agreed to by the parties under Rule 29.1 (discovery plan) be amended;

(f) that the affidavits or any other evidence filed on the [Fr] nd any cross-examinations on them may be used at trial in the same ma[illegible]n examination for discovery;

(g) that any examination of a person under Rule 36 (taking evidence before trial) be subject to a time limit;

(h) that a party deliver, within a specified time, a written summary of the anticipated evidence of a witness;

(i) that any oral examination of a witness at trial be subject to a time limit;

(j) that the evidence of a witness be given in whole or in part by affidavit;

(k) that any experts engaged by or on behalf of the parties in relation to the action meet on a without prejudice basis in order to identify the issues on which the experts agree and the issues on which they do not agree, to attempt to clarify and resolve any issues that are the subject of disagreement and to prepare a joint statement setting out the areas of agreement and any areas of disagreement and the reasons for it if, in the opinion of the court, the cost or time savings or other benefits that may be achieved from the meeting are proportionate to the amounts at stake or the importance of the issues involved in the case and,

(i) there is a reasonable prospect for agreement on some or all of the issues, or

(ii) the rationale for opposing expert opinions is unknown and clarification on areas of disagreement would assist the parties or the court;

(l) that each of the parties deliver a concise summary of his or her opening statement;

(m) that the parties appear before the court by a specified date, at which appearance the court may make any order that may be made under this subrule;

(n) that the action be set down for trial on a particular date or on a particular trial list, subject to the direction of the regional senior judge;

(o) for payment into court of all or part of the claim; and

(p) for security for costs.

Specified Facts

(3) At the trial, any facts specified under subrule (1) or clause (2) (c) shall be deemed to be established unless the trial judge orders otherwise to prevent injustice.

Order re Affidavit Evidence

(4) In deciding whether to make an order under clause (2) (j), the fact that an adverse party may reasonably require the attendance of the depon[illegible]ial for cross-examination is a relevant consideration.

Fr

Order re Experts, Costs

(5) If an order is made under clause (2) (k), each party shall bear his or her own costs.

Failure to Comply with Order

(6) Where a party fails to comply with an order under clause (2) (o) for payment into court or under clause (2) (p) for security for costs, the court on motion of the opposite party may dismiss the action, strike out the statement of defence or make such other order as is just.

(7) Where on a motion under subrule (6) the statement of defence is struck out, the defendant shall be deemed to be noted in default.

COSTS SANCTIONS FOR IMPROPER USE OF RULE

20.06 The court may fix and order payment of the costs of a motion for summary judgment by a party on a substantial indemnity basis if,

(a) the party acted unreasonably by making or responding to the motion; or

(b) the party acted in bad faith for the purpose of delay.

15. Rule 24.1.01 of the Regulation is amended by striking out "in case managed actions" and substituting "in specified actions".

16. (1) Subrules 24.1.04 (1), (2) and (2.1) of the Regulation are revoked and the following substituted:

Scope

(1) This Rule applies to the following actions:

1. Actions that were governed by this Rule immediately before January 1, 2010.

2. Actions that are commenced in one of the following counties on or after January 1, 2010:

i. The City of Ottawa.

ii. The City of Toronto.

iii. The County of Essex.

Exceptions

(2) Despite subrule (1), this Rule does not apply to,

(a) actions to which Rule 75.1 (Mandatory Mediation – [illegible]s, Trusts and Substitute Decisions) applies;

Fr

(b) actions in relation to a matter that was the subject of a mediation under section 258.6 of the Insurance Act, if the mediation was conducted less than a year before the delivery of the first defence in the action;

(c) actions placed on the Commercial List established by practice direction in the Toronto Region;

(d) actions under Rule 64 (Mortgage Actions);

(e) actions under the Construction Lien Act, except trust claims; and

(f) actions under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Canada).

Exceptions, Class Proceedings Act, 1992

(2.1) Despite subrule (1), this Rule,

(a) applies to an action commenced under the Class Proceedings Act, 1992 only if certification as a class proceeding has been denied; and

(b) does not apply to actions certified as class proceedings under the Class Proceedings Act, 1992.

(2) Subrule 24.1.04 (4) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "July 1, 2009" at the end and substituting "January 1, 2010".

17. Rule 24.1.06 of the Regulation is amended by striking out "the Schedule to".

18. (1) Subrule 24.1.07 (1) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "the Schedule to".

(2) Subrule 24.1.07 (3) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "a judge" and substituting "a judge or a case management master".

19. Clause 24.1.08 (2) (b) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "subrule 24.1.09 (6)" and substituting "subrule 24.1.09 (6) or (6.1)".

20. (1) Subrule 24.1.09 (1) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "90 days" and substituting "180 days".

(2) Clauses 24.1.09 (2) (c) and (d) of the Regulation are amended by striking out "90-day period" wherever it appears and substituting in each case "180-day period".

Fr

(3) Rule 24.1.09 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following subrule:

Transition

(2.1) Despite subrule (1), in the case of an action described in paragraph 1 of subrule 24.1.04 (1), the 180-day period begins to run on January 1, 2010.

(4) Subrule 24.1.09 (3) of the Regulation is revoked and the following substituted:

Postponement

(3) Despite subrule (1), the mediation session may be postponed to a later date if,

(a) the parties consent to the date in writing; and

(b) the consent is filed with the mediation co-ordinator.

(5) Subrules 24.1.09 (5) and (6) of the Regulation are revoked and the following substituted:

(5) Before setting the action down for trial, one of the parties shall file with the mediation co-ordinator,

(a) a notice (Form 24.1A) stating the mediator's name and the date of the mediation session; or

(b) a mediator's report under subrule 24.1.15 (1) indicating that the mediation has been concluded.

Assignment of Mediator

(6) If the mediation co-ordinator does not, within 180 days after the first defence has been filed, receive an order under subrule (1), a consent under subrule (3), a notice under clause (5) (a), a mediator's report or a notice that the action has been settled, he or she shall immediately assign a mediator from the list, unless the court orders otherwise.

(6.1) If the mediation co-ordinator does not, within the time provided by an order under subrule (1) or a consent under subrule (3), receive a notice under clause (5) (a), a mediator's report or a notice that the action has been settled, and the action is set down for trial, he or she shall immediately assign a mediator from the list, unless the court orders otherwise.

Fr

(6) Rule 24.1.09 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following subrule:

(7.1) The date fixed for the mediation session shall be within 90 days after the appointment of the mediator, unless the court orders otherwise.

21. Subrule 24.1.09.1 (3) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "July 1, 2009" at the end and substituting "January 1, 2010".

22. Subrule 24.1.11 (1.1) of the Regulation is revoked and the following substituted:

Representative of Insurer

(1.1) Unless the court orders otherwise, if an insurer may be liable to satisfy all or part of a judgment in the action or to indemnify or reimburse an insured party for money paid in satisfaction of all or part of a judgment in the action,

(a) a representative of the insurer shall attend the mediation session; and

(b) despite subrule (1), the insured party is not required to attend the mediation session.

23. (1) Subrule 24.1.13 (1) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "a case management master or case management judge" at the end and substituting "a judge or case management master".

(2) Subrule 24.1.13 (2) of the Regulation is amended by striking out the portion before clause (a) and substituting the following:

(2) The judge or case management master may convene a case conference under rule 77.08, and may,

29.14 Third and subsequent party claims shall be given the same file number as the main action, followed by a suffix letter.

25. The Regulation is amended by adding the following Rules immediately after the heading "Discovery":

Fr

RULE 29.1 DISCOVERY PLAN

NON-APPLICATION OF RULE

29.1.01 This Rule does not apply to parties who are subject to a discovery plan established by the court under clause 20.05 (2) (d).

DEFINITION

29.1.02 In this Rule,

"document" has the same meaning as in clause 30.01 (1) (a).

DISCOVERY PLAN

Requirement for Plan

29.1.03 (1) Where a party to an action intends to obtain evidence under any of the following Rules, the parties to the action shall agree to a discovery plan in accordance with this rule:

1. Rule 30 (Discovery of Documents).
2. Rule 31 (Examination for Discovery).
3. Rule 32 (Inspection of Property).
4. Rule 33 (Medical Examination).
5. Rule 35 (Examination for Discovery by Written Questions).

Timing

(2) The discovery plan shall be agreed to before the earlier of,

(a) 60 days after the close of pleadings or such longer period as the parties may agree to; and

(b) attempting to obtain the evidence.

Contents

(3) The discovery plan shall be in writing, and shall include,

(a) the intended scope of documentary discovery under rule 30.02, taking into account relevance, costs and the importance and complexity of the issues in the particular action;

(b) dates for the service of each party's affidavit of docum n 30A or 30B) under rule 30.03;

Fr

(c) information respecting the timing, costs and manner of the production of documents by the parties and any other persons;

(d) the names of persons intended to be produced for oral examination for discovery under Rule 31 and information respecting the timing and length of the examinations; and

(e) any other information intended to result in the expeditious and cost-effective completion of the discovery process in a manner that is proportionate to the importance and complexity of the action.

Principles re Electronic Discovery

(4) In preparing the discovery plan, the parties shall consult and have regard to the document titled "The Sedona Canada Principles Addressing Electronic Discovery" developed by and available from The Sedona Conference.

DUTY TO UPDATE PLAN

29.1.04 The parties shall ensure that the discovery plan is updated to reflect any changes in the information listed in subrule 29.1.03 (3).

FAILURE TO AGREE TO PLAN

29.1.05 On any motion under Rules 30 to 35 relating to discovery, the court may refuse to grant any relief or to award any costs if the parties have failed to agree to or update a discovery plan in accordance with this Rule.

RULE 29.2 PROPORTIONALITY IN DISCOVERY

DEFINITION

29.2.01 In this Rule,

"document" has the same meaning as in clause 30.01 (1) (a).

APPLICATION

29.2.02 This Rule applies to any determination by the court under any of the following Rules as to whether a party or other person must answer a question or produce a document:

1. Rule 30 (Discovery of Documents).
2. Rule 31 (Examination for Discovery).
3. Rule 34 (Procedure on Oral Examinations).
4. Rule 35 (Examination for Discovery by Written Questions).

Fr

CONSIDERATIONS

General

29.2.03 (1) In making a determination as to whether a party or other person must answer a question or produce a document, the court shall consider whether,

(a) the time required for the party or other person to answer the question or produce the document would be unreasonable;

(b) the expense associated with answering the question or producing the document would be unjustified;

(c) requiring the party or other person to answer the question or produce the document would cause him or her undue prejudice;

(d) requiring the party or other person to answer the question or produce the document would unduly interfere with the orderly progress of the action; and

(e) the information or the document is readily available to the party requesting it from another source.

Overall Volume of Documents

(2) In addition to the considerations listed in subrule (1), in determining whether to order a party or other person to produce one or more documents, the court shall consider whether such an order would result in an excessive volume of documents required to be produced by the party or other person.

26. Subrules 30.02 (1) and (2) of the Regulation are amended by striking out "relating to any matter in issue" wherever it appears and substituting in each case "relevant to any matter in issue".

27. (1) Subrule 30.03 (1) of the Regulation is revoked and the following substituted:

Party to Serve Affidavit

(1) A party to an action shall serve on every other party an affidavit of documents (Form 30A or 30B) disclosing to the full extent of the party's knowledge, information and belief all documents relevant to any matter in issue in the action that are or have been in the party's possession, control or power.

(2) Subrule 30.03 (2) of the Regulation is amend[illegible] striking out "relating to any matter in issue" in the portion before clause (a) and substituting "relevant to any matter in issue".

(3) Subrule 30.03 (3) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "relating to any matter in issue" and substituting "relevant to any matter in issue".

(4) Clause 30.03 (4) (a) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "relating to any matter in issue" and substituting "relevant to any matter in issue".

28. (1) Subrule 31.03 (1) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "(3) to (8)" at the end and substituting "(2) to (8)".

(2) Rule 31.03 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following subrule:

Requirements for Leave

(4) Before making an order under clause (2) (b) or (3) (b), the court shall satisfy itself that,

(a) satisfactory answers respecting all of the issues raised cannot be obtained from only one person without undue expense and inconvenience; and

(b) examination of more than one person would likely expedite the conduct of the action.

29. Rule 31 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following rule:

TIME LIMIT

Not to Exceed Seven Hours

31.05.1 (1) No party shall, in conducting oral examinations for discovery, exceed a total of seven hours of examination, regardless of the number of parties or other persons to be examined, except with the consent of the parties or with leave of the court.

Considerations for Leave

(2) In determining whether leave should be granted under subrule (1), the court shall consider,

(a) the amount of money in issue;

(b) the complexity of the issues of fact or law;

Fr

(c) the amount of time that ought reasonably to be required in the action for oral examinations;

(d) the financial position of each party;

(e) the conduct of any party, including a party's unresponsiveness in any examinations for discovery held previously in the action, such as failure to answer questions on grounds other than privilege or the questions being obviously irrelevant, failure to provide complete answers to questions, or providing answers that are evasive, irrelevant, unresponsive or unduly lengthy;

(f) a party's denial or refusal to admit anything that should have been admitted; and

(g) any other reason that should be considered in the interest of justice.

30. (1) Subrule 31.06 (1) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "relating to any matter in issue" in the portion before clause (a) and substituting "relevant to any matter in issue".

(2) Clause 31.06 (3) (a) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "relating to any matter in issue" and substituting "relevant to any matter in issue".

31. Clause 34.10 (3) (a) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "relating to any matter in issue" and substituting "relevant to any matter in issue".

32. Subrule 37.03 (1) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "heard" and substituting "brought and heard".

33. Subrule 37.07 (6) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "four" and substituting "seven".

34. Subrule 37.08 (1) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "three" and substituting "seven".

35. (1) Subrule 37.10 (1) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "three" and substituting "seven".

ACTION NOT ON TRIAL LIST

Status Notice

48.14 (1) Unless the court orders otherwise, if an action in which a statement of defence has been filed has not been placed on a trial list or terminated by any means within two years after the filing of a statement of defence, the registrar shall serve on the parties a status notice in Form 48C.1 that the action will be dismissed for delay unless, within 90 days after service of the notice, the action is set down for trial or terminated, or documents are filed in accordance with subrule (10).

(2) Unless the court orders otherwise, if an action that was placed on a trial list and was subsequently struck off is not restored to a trial list within 180 days after being struck off, the registrar shall serve on the parties a status notice in Form 48C.2 that the action will be dismissed for delay unless, within 90 days after service of the notice, the action is restored to a trial list or terminated, or documents are filed in accordance with subrule (10).

Notice to Client

(3) A lawyer who receives a status notice shall forthwith give a copy of the notice to his or her client.

Dismissal by Registrar

(4) The registrar shall dismiss the action for delay, with costs, 90 days after service of the status notice, unless,

(a) the action has been set down for trial or restored to a trial list, as the case may be;

(b) the action has been terminated by any means;

(c) documents have been filed in accordance with subrule (10); or

(d) the judge or case management master presiding at a status hearing has ordered otherwise.

(5) If an action is not set down for trial, restored to a trial list or terminated by any means within the time specified in an order made at a status hearing, the registrar shall dismiss the action for delay, with costs.

Dismissal Order to be Served

(6) The registrar shall serve an order made under subrule (4) o n 48D) on the parties.

Fr

Dismissal Order to Client

(7) A lawyer who is served with an order dismissing the action for delay shall forthwith give a copy of the order to his or her client.

Status Hearing

(8) Where a status notice has been served, any party may request that the registrar arrange a status hearing, in which case the registrar shall mail to the parties a notice of the status hearing, and the hearing shall be held before a judge or case management master.

Notice to Client

(9) A lawyer who receives a notice of status hearing shall forthwith give a copy of the notice to his or her client.

When Hearing in Writing

(10) Unless the presiding judge or case management master orders otherwise, the status hearing shall be held in writing and without the attendance of the parties if a party files the following documents at least seven days before the date of the status hearing:

1. A timetable, signed by all the parties, containing the information set out in subrule (11).

2. A draft order establishing the timetable.

(11) The timetable shall,

(a) identify the steps to be completed before the action may be set down for trial or restored to a trial list;

(b) show the date or dates by which the steps will be completed; and

(c) show a date, which shall be no more than 12 months after the date of the status hearing, before which the action shall be set down for trial or restored to a trial list.

Status Hearing in Person

(12) In the case of a status hearing that is not to be held in writing, the lawyers of record shall attend, and the parties may attend, the status hearing.

Fr

Disposition at Status Hearing

(13) At the status hearing, the plaintiff shall show cause why the action should not be dismissed for delay and,

(a) if the presiding judge or case management master is satisfied that the action should proceed, the judge or case management master may,

(i) set time periods for the completion of the remaining steps necessary to have the action placed on or restored to a trial list and order that it be placed on or restored to a trial list within a specified time,

(ii) adjourn the status hearing to a specified date on such terms as are just, or

(iii) if the action is an action to which Rule 77 may apply under rule 77.02, assign the action for case management under that Rule, subject to the direction of the regional senior judge,

(iv) make such other order as is just; or

(b) if the presiding judge or case management master is not satisfied that the action should proceed, the judge or case management master may dismiss the action for delay.

Plaintiff under Disability

(14) Unless the court orders otherwise, where the plaintiff is under a disability, an action may be dismissed for delay under this rule only if the defendant gives notice to the Children's Lawyer or, if the Public Guardian and Trustee is litigation guardian of the plaintiff, to the Public Guardian and Trustee.

Effect of Dismissal

(15) Rules 24.03 to 24.05 (effect of dismissal for delay) apply to an action dismissed for delay under subrule (4), (5) or (14).

Setting Aside Dismissal

(16) An order under this rule dismissing an action may be set aside under rule 37.14.

ACTION ABANDONED

Dismissal

48.15 (1) The registrar shall make an order dismissing an action as abandoned if the following conditions are satisfied, unless the court orders otherwise:

1. More than 180 days have passed since the date the c g process was issued.

2. No statement of defence has been filed.

Fr

3. The action has not been disposed of by final order or judgment.

4. The action has not been set down for trial.

5. The registrar has given 45 days notice in Form 48E that the action will be dismissed as abandoned.

Service on Parties

(2) The registrar shall serve a copy of the order made under subrule (1) (Form 48F) on the parties.

Effect on Subsequent Action

(3) The dismissal of an action as abandoned has the same effect as a dismissal for delay under rule 24.05.

Plaintiff under Disability

(4) Unless the court orders otherwise, where the plaintiff is under a disability, an action may be dismissed as abandoned under this rule only if the defendant gives notice to the Children's Lawyer or, if the Public Guardian and Trustee is litigation guardian of the plaintiff, to the Public Guardian and Trustee.

Setting Aside Dismissal

(5) An order under this rule dismissing an action may be set aside under rule 37.14.

47. Rule 50 of the Regulation is revoked and the following substituted:

RULE 50 PRE-TRIAL CONFERENCE

PURPOSE

50.01 The purpose of this Rule is to provide an opportunity for any or all of the issues in a proceeding to be settled without a hearing and, with respect to any issues that are not settled, to obtain from the court orders or directions to assist in the just, most expeditious and least expensive disposition of the proceeding, including orders or directions to ensure that any hearing proceeds in an orderly and efficient manner.

PRE-TRIAL CONFERENCES FOR ACTIONS

50.02 The registrar shall, within 90 days after an action is set down for trial, give the parties notice to appear before a judge or case management [illegible] for a pre-trial conference under this Rule, unless the court orders otherwise.

Fr

PRE-TRIAL CONFERENCES FOR APPLICATIONS

50.03 In an application, a judge may direct that a pre-trial conference under this Rule be held before a judge or case management master.

MATERIALS TO BE FILED

50.04 At least five days before a pre-trial conference, each party shall file with proof of service a pre-trial conference brief containing concise statements, without argument, of the following matters:

1. The nature of the proceeding.

2. The issues raised and the party's position.

3. In the case of an action, the names of the witnesses that the party is likely to call at the trial and the length of time that the evidence of each of those witnesses is estimated to take.

4. The steps that need to be completed before the action is ready for trial or the application is ready to be heard, and the length of time that it is estimated that the completion of those steps will take.

ATTENDANCE

50.05 (1) The lawyers for the parties shall appear at the pre-trial conference and, unless the presiding judge or case management master orders otherwise, the parties shall participate,

(a) by personal attendance; or

(b) under rule 1.08 (telephone and video conferences), if personal attendance would require undue amounts of travel time or expense.

Authority to Settle

(2) A party who requires another person's approval before agreeing to a settlement shall, before the pre-trial conference, arrange to have ready telephone access to the other person throughout the conference, whether it takes place during or after regular business hours.

MATTERS TO BE CONSIDERED

50.06 The following matters shall be considered at a pre-trial conference:

1. The possibility of settlement of any or all of the issues in the proceeding.

2. Simplification of the issues.

3. The possibility of obtaining admissions that may facilitate the hearing.

4. The question of liability.

Fr

5. The amount of damages, if damages are claimed.

6. The estimated duration of the trial or hearing.

7. The advisability of having the court appoint an expert.

8. In the case of an action, the number of expert witnesses and other witnesses that may be called by each party, and dates for the service of any outstanding or supplementary experts' reports.

9. The advisability of fixing a date for the trial or hearing.

10. The advisability of directing a reference.

11. Any other matter that may assist in the just, most expeditious and least expensive disposition of the proceeding.

POWERS

50.07 (1) If the proceeding is not settled at the pre-trial conference, the presiding judge or case management master may,

(a) establish a timetable and, subject to the direction of the regional senior judge or a judge designated by him or her, fix a date for the trial or hearing;

(b) in the case of a proceeding governed by Rule 77, order a case conference under rule 77.08 if it is impractical to establish a timetable; and

(c) make such order as the judge or case management master considers necessary or advisable with respect to the conduct of the proceeding, including any order under subrule 20.05 (1) or (2).

Order Binds Parties

(2) An order made under this rule binds the parties unless the judge or officer presiding at the hearing of the proceeding orders otherwise to prevent injustice.

Copy of Order

(3) A copy of any order made under this rule shall be placed with the trial or application record.

PRE-TRIAL CONFERENCE REPORT

Requirement

50.08 (1) If a date for a trial or hearing is fixed under clause 50. the presiding judge or case management master shall complete a pre-trial con eport,

Fr

(a) stating what steps need to be completed before the action is ready for the trial or hearing, and how much time is needed to complete those steps;

(b) stating the anticipated length of the trial or hearing; and

(c) setting out any other matter relevant to scheduling the trial or hearing.

Copy of Report

(2) A copy of the pre-trial conference report shall be placed with the trial or application record.

Certificate

(3) Each party or the party's lawyer shall certify on the copy of the pre-trial conference report that is to be placed with the trial or application record that he or she understands the contents of the report and acknowledges the obligation to be ready to proceed on the date fixed for the trial or hearing.

Duty of Lawyer

(4) Each lawyer who represents a party shall, in addition to giving the certificate described in subrule (3), undertake to the court to advise the party of,

(a) the contents of the pre-trial conference report; and

(b) the obligation to be ready to proceed on the date fixed for the trial or hearing.

NO DISCLOSURE

50.09 No communication shall be made to the judge or officer presiding at the hearing of the proceeding or a motion or reference in the proceeding with respect to any statement made at a pre-trial conference, except as disclosed in an order under rule 50.07 or in a pre-trial conference report under rule 50.08.

PRE-TRIAL JUDGE NOT TO PRESIDE AT HEARING

50.10 (1) A judge who conducts a pre-trial conference shall not preside at the trial of the action or the hearing of the application, except with the written consent of all parties.

Conference Before Trial Judge

(2) Subrule (1) does not prevent a judge before whom a proceeding has been called for hearing from holding a conference either before or during the hearing to consider any matter that may assist in the just, most expeditious and least expensive disposition of the proceeding without disqualifying himself or herself from presiding at the hearing.

Fr

DOCUMENTS TO BE MADE AVAILABLE

50.11 All documents intended to be used at the trial or hearing that may be of assistance in achieving the purposes of a pre-trial conference, such as any medical reports and reports of experts, shall be provided to the presiding judge or case management master at the conference.

COSTS OF PRE-TRIAL CONFERENCE

50.12 At the pre-trial conference, the presiding judge or case management master may make an order for costs of the conference, but in the absence of such an order the costs shall be assessed as part of the costs of the proceeding.

48. Subrules 53.03 (1) and (2) of the Regulation are revoked and the following substituted:

(1) A party who intends to call an expert witness at trial shall, not less than 90 days before the pre-trial conference required under Rule 50, serve on every other party to the action a report, signed by the expert, containing the information listed in subrule (2.1).

(2) A party who intends to call an expert witness at trial to respond to the expert witness of another party shall, not less than 60 days before the pre-trial conference, serve on every other party to the action a report, signed by the expert, containing the information listed in subrule (2.1).

(2.1) A report provided for the purposes of subrule (1) or (2) shall contain the following information:

1. The expert's name, address and area of expertise.

2. The expert's qualifications and employment and educational experiences in his or her area of expertise.

3. The instructions provided to the expert in relation to the proceeding.

4. The nature of the opinion being sought and each issue in the proceeding to which the opinion relates.

5. The expert's opinion respecting each issue and, where there is a range of opinions given, a summary of the range and the reasons for the expert's own opinion within that range.

6. The expert's reasons for his or her opinion, including,

i. a description of the factual assumptions on which the [illegible] based,

ii. a description of any research conducted by the exper[illegible] him or her to form the opinion, and

Fr

iii. a list of every document, if any, relied on by the expert in forming the opinion.

7. An acknowledgement of expert's duty (Form 53) signed by the expert.

Schedule for Service of Reports

(2.2) Within 60 days after an action is set down for trial, the parties shall agree to a schedule setting out dates for the service of experts' reports in order to meet the requirements of subrules (1) and (2), unless the court orders otherwise.

RULE 77 CIVIL CASE MANAGEMENT

PURPOSE AND GENERAL PRINCIPLES

Purpose

77.01 (1) The purpose of this Rule is to establish a case management system that provides case management only of those proceedings for which a need for the court's intervention is demonstrated and only to the degree that is appropriate, as determined in reliance on the criteria set out in this Rule.

General Principles

(2) This Rule shall be construed in accordance with the following principles:

1. Despite the application of case management under this Rule to a proceeding, the greater share of the responsibility for managing the proceeding and moving it expeditiously to a trial, hearing or other resolution remains with the parties.

2. The nature and extent of the case management provided by a judge or case management master under this Rule in respect of a proceeding shall be informed by any relevant practices, traditions, customs or judicial resource issues that apply locally in the region in which the proceeding is commenced or to which it is transferred.

APPLICATION

Scope

77.02 (1) This Rule applies to actions and applications commenced in or transferred to one of the following counties on or after January 1, 2010 and assigned to case management by an order under these rules:

1. The City of Ottawa.

2. The City of Toronto.

3. The County of Essex.

Fr

Exceptions

(2) Despite subrule (1), this Rule does not apply to,

(a) actions or applications placed on the Commercial List established by practice direction in the Toronto Region;

(b) actions or applications under Rules 74 and 75 (Estates);

(c) applications for the removal or replacement of personal representatives under the Trustee Act;

(d) applications under Part V of the Succession Law Reform Act;

(e) applications for guardianship of property or persons under the Substitute Decisions Act, 1992;

(f) actions under Rule 64 (Mortgage Actions);

(g) actions under Rule 76 (Simplified Procedure);

(h) actions or applications under the Construction Lien Act, except trust claims; and

(i) actions or applications under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Canada).

Exceptions, Class Proceedings Act, 1992

(3) Despite subrule (1), this Rule,

(a) applies to an action or application commenced under the Class Proceedings Act, 1992 only if certification as a class proceeding has been denied; and

(b) does not apply to actions or applications certified as class proceedings under the Class Proceedings Act, 1992.

Conflict with Other Rules

(4) In the event of a conflict between a provision in this Rule and a provision in any other Rule, the provision in this Rule prevails.

DEFINITIONS

77.03 In this Rule,

"defence" includes a notice of intent to defend, a statement of defence, a notice of appearance and a notice of motion in response to a proceeding; ("défense")

"defendant" includes a respondent; ("défendeur")

"plaintiff" includes an applicant. ("demandeur")

CASE MANAGEMENT POWERS

Fr

77.04 (1) A judge or case management master may,

(a) extend or abridge a time prescribed by an order or the rules;

(b) adjourn a case conference;

(c) set aside an order made by the registrar;

(d) establish or amend a timetable; and

(e) make orders, impose terms, give directions and award costs as necessary to carry out the purpose of this Rule.

(2) A judge or case management master may, on his or her own initiative, require the parties to appear before him or her or to participate in a conference call to deal with any matter arising in connection with the case management of the proceeding, including a failure to comply with an order or the rules.

(3) For greater certainty, the powers set out in subrules (1) and (2) are in addition to any other powers set out in this Rule.

ASSIGNMENT FOR CASE MANAGEMENT

On Consent of Parties

77.05 (1) A regional senior judge or, subject to the direction of a regional senior judge, any judge or case management master may, with the consent of all parties, assign a proceeding to which this Rule may apply for case management under this Rule.

No Consent

(2) At any time on or after the filing of the first defence in a proceeding to which this Rule may apply, a regional senior judge or, subject to the direction of a regional senior judge, any judge or case management master may assign the proceeding for case management under this Rule,

(a) on his or her own initiative; or

(b) on the request of a party or on motion if the court requires it.

Multiple Proceedings

(3) Two or more proceedings may be assigned under subrule (1) or (2) for case management together.

Criteria

(4) In considering whether to assign a proceeding for case management, the regional senior judge, other judge or case management master shall have regard to all the relevant circumstances, including any or all of the following:

Fr

1. The purpose set out in subrule 77.01 (1).

2. The complexity of the issues of fact or law.

3. The importance to the public of the issues of fact or law.

4. The number and type of parties or prospective parties, and whether they are represented.

5. The number of proceedings involving the same or similar parties or causes of action.

6. The amount of intervention by the court that the proceeding is likely to require.

7. The time required for discovery, if applicable, and for preparation for trial or hearing.

8. In the case of an action, the number of expert witnesses and other witnesses.

9. The time required for the trial or hearing.

10. Whether there has been substantial delay in the conduct of the proceeding.

ASSIGNMENT TO INDIVIDUAL MANAGEMENT BY A JUDGE

Assignment to Particular Judge

77.06 (1) The Chief Justice or Associate Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Justice, a regional senior judge, or a judge designated by any of them may direct that all steps in a proceeding that is assigned for case management under this Rule be heard and conducted by a particular judge.

Limitation

(2) A judge who is directed under subrule (1) to hear all steps in a proceeding shall not preside at the trial of the action or the hearing of the application, except with the written consent of all parties.

MOTIONS

To Whom Made

77.07 (1) A motion may be made only to a judge or case management master.

Same, Particular Judge

(2) If a direction is made under subrule 77.06 (1) for all steps in a proceeding to be heard by a particular judge, then any motions in the proceeding shall be made to that judge.

Fr

Referral by Particular Judge

(3) A judge who is directed under subrule 77.06 (1) to hear all steps in a proceeding may refer to a case management master any motion within the jurisdiction of a master under subrule 37.02 (2), unless the judge who made the direction directs otherwise.

Procedure

(4) Depending on the practical requirements of the situation, the motion may be made,

(a) with or without supporting material or a motion record; and

(b) by attendance, in writing, by fax or under rule 1.08 (telephone and video conferences).

Costs on Motion

(5) The judge or case management master shall address the issue of costs at the conclusion of each motion in accordance with rule 57.03, regardless of whether the motion is contested.

Formal Order Not Required

(6) The judge or case management master may provide that no formal order need be prepared, signed or entered if the order has been recorded in writing, unless an appeal of the disposition of the motion or a motion for leave to appeal is made to a judge or an appellate court.

AMENDING REG. 194 OF R.R.O. 1990
(RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE)

1. Subrule 1.03 (1) of Regulation 194 of the Revised Regulations of Ontario, 1990 is amended by adding the following definition:

"limited scope retainer" means the provision of legal services by a lawyer for part, but not all, of a client's legal matter by agreement between the lawyer and the client; ("mandat à portée limitée")

2. Subrule 1.04 (3) of the Regulation is revoked.

3. Rule 15.01 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following subrule:

(4) Subrule (3) permits a party to be represented by a lawyer acting under a limited scope retainer, but a limited scope retainer does not, in itself, make a lawyer the lawyer of record for the party.

4. Rule 15 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following rule:

INTERPRETATION

Party Acting in Person

15.01.1 (1) Where a party to a proceeding is not represented by a lawyer but acts in person, anything these rules require or permit a lawyer to do shall be done by the party.

Party Represented under Limited Scope Retainer

Fr

and, to that end,

(a) a reference in these rules to a party acting in person includes a reference to a party who is represented in this manner; and

(b) anything these rules require or permit a party to do shall be done by the party.

Exception, Lawyer of Record

(3) Subsection (2) does not apply if the lawyer acting under the limited scope retainer is the party's lawyer of record.

5. Clause 17.02 (h) of the Regulation is revoked.

6. Clause 17.05 (3) (b) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "by Article 10 of the Convention" and substituting "by the Convention".

7. Subrule 24.1.04 (1) of the Regulation is amended by adding the following paragraph:

3. Actions that are transferred to a county listed in paragraph 2 on or after January 1, 2014, unless the court orders otherwise.

8. (1) Subrule 24.1.09 (2.1) of the Regulation is revoked and the following substituted:

Transfer

(2.1) In the case of an action described in paragraph 3 of subrule 24.1.04 (1),

(a) subrules (1) and (6) do not apply; and

(b) the court may make an order, on motion or otherwise, specifying the date by which a mediation session must take place.

(2) Subrule 24.1.09 (3) of the Regulation is amended by adding "and clause (2.1) (b)" after "subrule (1)" in the portion before clause (a).

(3) Subrule 24.1.09 (6.1) of the Regulation is amended by adding "or clause (2.1) (b)" after "subrule (1)".

(4) Rule 24.1.09 of the Regulation is amende[Fr]dding the following subrule:

without the mediation co-ordinator having received a notice under clause (5) (a), a mediator's report or a notice that the action has been settled, he or she shall immediately assign a mediator from the list, unless the court orders otherwise.

9. (1) Clauses 53.09 (1) (a) and (b) of the Regulation are revoked and the following substituted:

(a) for the 15-year period that follows the start of the trial, the greater of,

(i) the average of the value for the last Wednesday in each month of the real rate of interest on long-term Government of Canada real return bonds (Series V121808, formerly Series B113911), as published in the Bank of Canada's Weekly Financial Statistics for the period starting on March 1 and ending on August 31 in the year before the year in which the trial begins, less ½ per cent and rounded to the nearest 1/10 per cent, and

(ii) zero; and

(b) for any later period covered by the award, 2.5 per cent per year for each year in that period.

(2) Clause 53.09 (2) (b) of the Regulation is revoked and the following substituted:

(b) determine the rate to be assumed for future inflation in accordance with the following formula:

g rounded to the nearest 1/10 per cent where,

"i" is the average of the value for the last Wednesday in each month of the nominal rate of interest on long-term Government of Canada bonds (Series V121758, formerly Series B113867), as published in the Bank of Canada's Weekly Financial Statistics for the period starting on March 1 and ending on August 31 in the year before the year in which the trial begins;

(a) for the 15-year period that follows the start of the trial, the greater of,

(i) the average of the value for the last Wednesday in each month of the real rate of interest on long-term Government of Canada real return bonds (Series V121808,

Fr

the year in which the trial begins, less ½ per cent, and

(ii) zero, and

(b) for any later period covered by the award, 2.5 per cent per year for each year in that period.

(3) Rule 53.09 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following subrule:

Transition

(3) This rule, as it read on December 31, 2013, continues to apply with respect to actions in which the trial commenced before January 1, 2014.

10. The French version of subrule 59.03 (1) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "sur laquelle une ordonnance a une incidence" and substituting "concernée par une ordonnance".

11. Rule 59 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following rule:

LIMITED SCOPE RETAINER

59.08 (1) Despite subrule 15.01.1 (2), if an order arises from a hearing at which a lawyer who is not a party's lawyer of record appeared under a limited scope retainer for the party, that lawyer shall act in the place of the party for the purposes of this Rule.

(2) Subrule (1) does not apply if,

(a) the agreement governing the limited scope retainer provides otherwise; and

(b) the lawyer acting under the limited scope retainer provides written notice of the fact to the other parties and to the registrar.

AMENDING REG. 194 OF R.R.O. 1990 (RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE)

1. Rules 1.08 and 1.08.1 of Regulation 194 of the Revised Regulations of Ontario, 1990 are revoked and the following substituted:

METHOD OF ATTENDANCE AT HEARINGS, ETC.

1.08 (1) A party seeking a hearing or other step in a proceeding that permits or requires the attendance of parties shall, in the forms or other documents required under these rules to be filed in advance of the hearing or step, specify by which of the following methods the party proposes that the parties attend at the hearing or step:

1. In person.
2. By telephone conference.
3. By video conference.

Exception, Court of Appeal

(2) This rule does not apply with respect to proceedings in the Court of Appeal, which may be heard as directed by the court.

Exception, Case Conferences

(3) This rule does not apply with respect to case conferences, which shall be held by telephone conference unless the court specifies a different method of attendance.

Objection

(4) A party who wishes to oppose the proposed method of attendance shall deliver a notice of objection in Form 1A before the earlier of,

Fr

(b) seven days before the hearing or step.

Objection to be Dealt with at Case Conference

(5) If a notice of objection is delivered, the court shall direct that a case conference be held to deal with the objection.

Method to be Determined by Order

(6) At the case conference referred to in subrule (5), the court shall make an order directing the method of attendance at the hearing or step and, in doing so, the court shall consider,

(a) the availability of telephone conference or video conference facilities;

(b) the general principle that evidence and argument should be presented orally in open court;

(c) the importance of the evidence to the determination of the issues in the case;

(d) the effect of a telephone conference or video conference on the court's ability to make findings, including determinations about the credibility of witnesses;

(e) the importance in the circumstances of the case of observing the demeanour of a witness;

(f) whether a party, witness or lawyer for a party is unable to attend because of infirmity, illness or any other reason;

(g) the balance of convenience between any party wishing the telephone conference or video conference and any party or parties opposing; and

(h) any other relevant matter.

No Objection

(7) If no notice of objection is filed, the parties are deemed to have agreed to attendance by the proposed method and, unless the court directs otherwise, the hearing or step shall proceed by that method.

Mandatory Mediations, Oral Examinations for Discovery

(8) This rule applies with the following modifications to mandatory mediations (Rules 24.1 and 75.1) and oral examinations for discovery (Rule 31):

Fr

1. One of the parties shall propose the method of attendance by notice to the other parties.

3. The factors in clauses (6) (b) to (e) do not apply.

4. If the court makes an order under subrule (6) directing a telephone conference or video conference, the court shall,

i. direct a party to make the necessary arrangements and to give notice of those arrangements to the other parties, and

ii. make any other direction respecting the telephone conference or video conference, including any related requirements or procedures, that the court considers appropriate in the circumstances.

5. If no notice of objection is filed and the parties are to proceed by telephone conference or video conference, one of the parties shall make the necessary arrangements and give notice of those arrangements to the other parties.

Transition, References under the Solicitors Act

(9) Rule 1.08.1, as it read immediately before it was revoked, continues to apply with respect to a reference under the Solicitors Act of a lawyer's bill for assessment, if a party to the reference made a request under that rule before the day section 1 of Ontario Regulation 689/20 came into force.

2. Rule 4.01 of the Regulation is revoked and the following substituted:

DOCUMENT STANDARDS

4.01 A document in writing in a proceeding shall meet the following standards:

1. In the case of a document in paper format,

i. the text shall be printed, typed, written or reproduced legibly, with double spaces between the lines and a margin of approximately 40 millimetres on the left-hand side,

ii. the characters used shall be of at least 12 point or 10 pitch size,

ELECTRONIC SIGNATURES

4.01.1 (1) In this rule,

"electronic signature" means electronic information that a person creates or adopts in order to sign a document and that is in, attached to or associated with the document.

Electronic Signatures Permitted

(2) A document that may or must be signed by the court, a registrar, a judge or an officer under these rules may be signed with an electronic signature.

4. (1) Clause 4.02 (3) (f) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "fax number (if any), e-mail address (if any)" and substituting "e-mail address".

(2) Clause 4.02 (3) (g) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "fax number (if any)".

(3) Clause 4.02 (3) (h) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "the fax number and e-mail address" and substituting "the e-mail address".

5. Rule 4.03 of the Regulation is revoked and the following substituted:

CERTIFIED COPIES OF COURT DOCUMENTS

4.03 (1) The registrar shall provide a certified copy of a document that is in the court file to a person who is entitled to see the document under section 137 of the Courts of Justice Act, if the person files a requisition (Form 4E) and pays the prescribed fee, if any.

Certified Copy in Electronic Format

(2) The registrar may provide a certified copy in electronic format of a document that is in the court file.

Fr

Valid Certification

(a) the copy bears the registrar's signature and the date of certification; and

(b) in the case of a copy that is provided in electronic format, the copy accurately reproduces the information set out in the document, even if the way in which information is displayed in the document and in the copy differs.

Printed Version of Electronic Certified Copy may be Used

(4) If a certified copy of a document is provided by the registrar in electronic format, a requirement under these rules that a person provide a certified copy of a document to another person in paper format may be satisfied by printing the electronic certified copy by any means that produces the document in paper format and providing the printed version of the certified copy.

6. (1) Subrule 4.05 (1.1) of the Regulation is revoked and the following substituted:

Electronic Issuing

(1.1) Any document to be issued under these rules may be issued electronically,

(a) by the registrar dating, signing and sealing with an electronic version of the seal of the court a copy of the document in electronic format; or

(b) by use of the software authorized by the Ministry of the Attorney General for the purpose.

(2) Subrules 4.05 (7) and (8) of the Regulation are revoked and the following substituted:

Date of Electronic Issuance, Filing

(7) A document that is issued or filed electronically is considered to have been issued or filed, as the case may be, on the date indicated on the document by the registrar or the authorized software.

Issuance, Filing Outside of Business Hours

(8) If a document is issued or filed electronically outside of regular business hours, the registrar or the authorized software shall indicate that the document was issued or filed, as the case may be, on the next day that is not a holiday.

Fr

7. The Regulation is amended by adding the following rule:

"CaseLines" means the software authorized by the Ministry of the Attorney General for the purposes of this rule and that is available on the internet under the name "CaseLines".

Application

(2) This rule applies to all or part of any hearing, pre-trial conference or case conference under these rules, except in a proceeding in the Court of Appeal.

Requirement to Use CaseLines

(3) A party shall provide the following documents to the court by submitting them to CaseLines in accordance with this rule, if the court requires the party to do so:

1. Every document the party files or has filed with the court in respect of the hearing or conference.

2. Subject to subrule (5), any other document in the court file that the party intends to rely on at the hearing or conference and that has not already been submitted to CaseLines by another party.

3. A compendium containing the excerpted portions of the cases and of the evidence to which the party intends to refer during the hearing or conference.

Deadline

(4) Subject to subrule (5), the documents listed in subrule (3) must be submitted to CaseLines by the following deadline:

1. In the case of the hearing of a motion or application where the party is required to give the registrar a confirmation of motion (Form 37B) or confirmation of application (Form 38B), the deadline is the date and time by which the confirmation is required to be given.

2. In any other case, the deadline is five days before the date of the hearing or conference, unless the court orders otherwise.

Transcripts

(5) A transcript for use at a trial shall not be submitted to CaseLines until a party refers to the transcript at trial and files a copy of it in accordance with 34.18 (4), and, for greater certainty, that subrule also applies with respect to submitted to CaseLines.

AMENDING REG. 194 OF R.R.O. 1990
(RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE)

1. Rule 2.1 of Regulation 194 of the Revised Regulations of Ontario, 1990 is revoked and the following substituted:

RULE 2.1 FRIVOLOUS, VEXATIOUS OR ABUSIVE PROCEEDINGS

Stay or Dismissal of Proceedings

Court May Stay, Dismiss

2.1.01 (1) The court may make an order staying or dismissing a proceeding that appears on its face to be frivolous or vexatious or otherwise an abuse of the process of the court.

Summary Determination

(2) The court may make a determination under subrule (1) in a summary manner, subject to the procedures set out in this rule.

On Own Initiative or On Request

(3) An order under subrule (1) may be made by the court on its own initiative or on the request of a party to the proceeding under subrule (4).

How to Request

(4) A party may seek an order under subrule (1) by serving a request in Form 2.1A on every other party and filing it with proof of service.

Fr

Registrar May Notify Court

(5) If, in the registrar's opinion, there is reason to believe that a proceeding may be frivolous or vexatious or otherwise an abuse of the process of the court, the registrar may, in the absence of a request under subrule (4), notify the court.

Notice to Parties

(6) If, on review of a request under subrule (4) or on its own initiative, the court determines that it may be appropriate to make an order under subrule (1), the court shall direct the registrar to give notice to the parties in Form 2.1B that the proceeding may be stayed or dismissed.

Effect of Notice

(7) Once the registrar gives notice to the parties,

(a) the proceeding is automatically stayed until the court either makes an order under subrule (1) or an order declining to stay or dismiss the proceeding; and

(b) no party may take any step in the proceeding other than the steps in this rule, unless the court orders otherwise.

Procedures

(8) Unless the court orders otherwise, an order under subrule (1) shall be made on the basis of written submissions, if any, in accordance with the following procedures:

1. The plaintiff or applicant may, within 15 days after receiving the notice, file with the court a written submission, no more than 10 pages in length, responding to the notice.

2. If the plaintiff or applicant does not file a written submission that complies with paragraph 1, the court may make the order without any further notice to the plaintiff or applicant or to any other party.

3. If the plaintiff or applicant files a written submission that complies with paragraph 1, the court may direct the registrar to give a copy of the submission to any other party.

4. A party who receives a copy of the plaintiff's or applicant's submission may, within 10 days after receiving the copy, file with the court a written submission, no more than 10 pages in length, responding to the plaintiff's or applicant's submission.

5. A party who files a responding submission shall give a c to the plaintiff or applicant and to any other party who requests a copy.

Fr

(9) A document required to be given to a party under subrule (8),

(a) shall be given to the party's lawyer in a manner listed in rule 16.05; or

(b) if the party is acting in person, shall be mailed to the party in the manner described in subclause 16.01 (4) (b) (i).

(10) Rule 16 applies with necessary modifications to the determination of when a document given or mailed to a person under subrule (9) is considered to have been received.

Copy of Order

(11) After the court makes an order under subrule (1) or an order declining to stay or dismiss the proceeding, the registrar shall promptly provide a copy of the order to each of the parties in a manner listed in subrule 59.04 (4).

Stay or Dismissal of Motions

Court May Stay, Dismiss

2.1.02 (1) The court may make an order staying or dismissing a motion that appears on its face to be frivolous or vexatious or otherwise an abuse of the process of the court.

Procedures, etc.

(2) Subrules 2.1.01 (2) to (11), other than subrule (7), apply for the purposes of subrule (1), with the following and any other necessary modifications:

1. A reference to a proceeding shall be read as a reference to the motion.

2. A reference to the plaintiff or applicant shall be read as a reference to the moving party.

Restriction on Further Motions

(3) In making an order under subrule (1), the court may also make an order under rule 37.16 prohibiting the moving party from making further motions in the proceeding without leave.

RULE 2.2 VEXATIOUS LITIGANT ORDERS

Interpretation

2.2.01 In this Rule,

"notified person" means a person, other than the potential subject of a vexatious litigant order, who receives a notice under rule 2.2.03 or 2.2.04 [illegible]ne avisée")

"participant" means, as the case may be,

(a) the person who is the potential subject of a vexatious litigant order,

Fr

(b) a notified person who serves and files a reply in accordance with subrule 2.2.05 (2), or

(c) the moving party or applicant under rule 2.2.03, if any; ("participant")

"vexatious litigant order" means an order under subsection 140 (1) of the Courts of Justice Act. ("ordonnance de déclaration de plaideur quérulent")

Vexatious Litigant Order

2.2.02 A vexatious litigant order may be made,

(a) on a person's motion or application, commenced in accordance with rule 2.2.03; or

(b) on a judge's initiative, initiated in accordance with rule 2.2.04.

Order Sought by Person

By Motion or Application

2.2.03 (1) A vexatious litigant order against a person may be sought,

(a) by motion in accordance with subrule (2), if the person is a party to an ongoing proceeding and the order is sought by another party in the proceeding; or

(b) in any other case, by application made in the Superior Court of Justice in accordance with subrule (3).

If by Motion

(2) For the purposes of clause (1) (a), the moving party shall serve on the persons listed in subrule (5) and file with proof of service a notice of motion for a vexatious litigant order (Form 2.2A).

If by Application

(3) For the purposes of clause (1) (b), following issuance of a notice of application for a vexatious litigant order (Form 2.2B) as provided by rule 14.07, the applicant shall serve the notice on the persons listed in subrule (5) and file it with proof of service.

Notice Requirements

(4) A notice in Form 2.2A or 2.2B shall set out,

(a) the grounds on which the vexatious litigant order is sought; and

(b) the following information, to the extent that it can be determined by the moving party or applicant using their best efforts:

Fr

(i) The file number, location and title of any ongoing proceeding in any court in Ontario to which the person against whom the vexatious litigant order is sought is a party, and the address for service of every other party to any such proceeding.

(ii) The file number, location and title of any proceeding that was finally disposed of in any court in Ontario to which the person against whom the vexatious litigant order is sought was a party.

(iii) The citation of every reported decision made in the course of a proceeding referred to in subclause (i) or (ii).

Service

(5) A notice in Form 2.2A or 2.2B shall be served on,

(a) the person against whom the order is sought; and

(b) every party to a proceeding set out in the notice under subclause (4) (b) (i).

(6) Rule 16.04 applies with respect to service under this rule, except that a judge may not make an order dispensing with service on the person against whom the vexatious litigant order is sought.

Non-Application of Certain Rules

(7) Unless this Rule or a court order provides otherwise, Rules 37, 38 and 39 do not apply with respect to a motion or application under this rule.

On Judge's Own Initiative

Registrar's Notice

2.2.04 (1) If it appears to a judge of a court that a vexatious litigant order against a party to an ongoing proceeding in that court may be warranted, the judge may give written direction to the registrar to prepare a registrar's notice proposing consideration of a vexatious litigant order (Form 2.2C).

(2) The written direction shall,

(a) specify the information the registrar is required to include in the notice, which shall either be the information listed in subrule 2.2.03 (4), with necessary modifications, or such other information as the judge may specify in the direction; and

(b) be attached to the notice.

Fr

No Review

(3) The written direction may not be set aside or varied.

Registrar to Send, File Notice

(4) The registrar shall,

(a) subject to subrule (5), send the notice by mail or e-mail to the persons referred to in subrule 2.2.03 (5), with necessary modifications; and

(b) file a copy of the notice, and a list of the persons to whom it was sent, in the court file.

(5) The judge may give directions to the registrar respecting how to send the notice and to whom, but shall not direct the registrar to dispense with sending the notice to the person who is the potential subject of a vexatious litigant order.

(6) Rule 16 applies with necessary modifications to the determination of whether and when the notice is considered to have been received, unless any directions given under subrule (5) require otherwise.

Response and Reply

Response

2.2.05 (1) The person who is the potential subject of a vexatious litigant order may, within 20 days after receiving a notice in Form 2.2A, 2.2B or 2.2C,

(a) serve a response in Form 2.2D on every notified person and, if applicable, the moving party or applicant; and

(b) file the response with proof of service.

Reply

(2) A moving party, applicant or notified person may serve and file with proof of service a reply in Form 2.2E, within,

(a) 20 days after receiving a response; or

(b) if no response is served, 30 days after serving or receiving the notice, as the case may be.

(3) A reply shall be served on the person who is the potential subject of a vexatious litigant order, on every notified person and, if applicable, on the moving party or applicant.

Effect of Not Replying

Fr

(4) A notified person who does not file a reply is not entitled to be heard at any hearing of the matter under rule 2.2.07 without leave of a judge.

(5) Subrule (4) does not affect any entitlement under rule 2.2.06 or 2.2.07 of a person to receive or obtain a copy of an order, decision or reasons.

Initial Review and Order

2.2.06 (1) After the time for filing a response and any replies has passed, a judge shall conduct an initial review of the notice and submissions, following which the judge shall make an order in Form 2.2F,

(a) directing that a hearing of the matter be held under rule 2.2.07; or

(b) dismissing the matter, with reasons.

(2) Without limiting the generality of rule 1.05, the judge may, in making an order under subrule (1),

(a) direct that a participant serve and file a motion record in accordance with Rule 37 or application record in accordance with Rule 38, with such modifications as the judge may specify;

(b) direct a participant to file supplementary arguments or further evidence;

(c) direct the person who is the potential subject of a vexatious litigant order to confirm every ongoing proceeding to which they are a party, and the name and address for service of every other party to any such proceeding;

(d) direct a participant to conduct a search to confirm every ongoing proceeding to which the person who is the potential subject of a vexatious litigant order is a party, and the name and address for service of every other party to any such proceeding;

(e) direct a participant to prepare a draft order in Form 2.2G;

(f) if notice was given in respect of an ongoing proceeding (Form 2.2A or 2.2C) and the judge is directing a hearing under rule 2.2.07, order a stay of the ongoing proceeding pending the determination of the matter; or

(g) establish a timetable.

Issuance of Order

(3) The registrar shall issue the order, as signed by the judge, and subrules 59.04 (1) and (2) apply with necessary modifications with respect to the issuance.

Copy of Order

(4) A copy of the order shall promptly be provided, by a method set out in subrule 59.04 (4), to each of the participants and any other person a judge may order.

Fr

No Review

(5) An order under subrule (1) directing a hearing of the matter or dismissing it may not be set aside or varied.

Hearing and Disposition

Powers of Judge

2.2.07 (1) The judge presiding at the hearing to determine whether to make a vexatious litigant order may make such orders and give such directions as the judge considers appropriate in the interest of justice.

Determination Following Hearing

(2) Following the hearing, the judge shall,

(a) make a vexatious litigant order in Form 2.2G, with reasons; or

(b) decline to make a vexatious litigant order, with reasons.

(3) For greater certainty, rule 1.05 applies with respect to an order made under subrule (2).

If Vexatious Litigant Order is Made

(4) If making a vexatious litigant order, the judge shall specify the details of any limitations in the order's application.

(5) A vexatious litigant order shall include reference to the right of appeal or review under subsection 140 (2.3) of the Courts of Justice Act.

Issuance of Order

(6) The registrar shall issue the vexatious litigant order, as signed by the judge, and subrules 59.04 (1) and (2) apply with necessary modifications with respect to the issuance.

Copy of Order

(7) The issued vexatious litigant order and reasons shall promptly be provided, by a method listed in subrule 59.04 (4), to each of the participants, any other notified person and any other person a judge may order.

(8) The registrar shall provide a copy of every issued vexatious litigant order and reasons to the Court Services Division of the Ministry of the A[illegible]eneral for the purposes of inclusion in the index of vexatious litigant orde[illegible]stered by the Division.

Fr

If Vexatious Litigant Order is Not Made

(9) If the judge makes an order under clause (2) (b) declining to make a vexatious litigant order, any participant may require the registrar to issue and enter an order reflecting the judge's decision by filing a requisition (Form 4E) and draft order (Form 59A or 59B).

Leave Despite Order

2.2.08 A person who is the subject of a vexatious litigant order may, in the manner provided for under subrule 38.01 (3), seek leave under subsection 140 (3) of the Courts of Justice Act to institute or continue a proceeding.

Proceeding Instituted, Continued without Leave

Court Shall Order Stay, Dismissal

2.2.09 (1) If a proceeding is instituted or continued without leave by a plaintiff, applicant or appellant who is the subject of a vexatious litigant order, and the court determines that the proceeding is subject to the vexatious litigant order, the court shall make an order staying or dismissing the proceeding.

Request for Order

(2) A party to the proceeding may file a request with the court for an order under subrule (1).

Notice Not Required

(3) The order may be made without notice.

Copy of Order

(4) Once the order has been made, a copy of it shall promptly be provided to every party to the proceeding by a method listed in subrule 59.04 (4).

Refusal by Registrar

(5) Nothing in this rule prevents a registrar from refusing to issue an originating process or accept a document for filing in a proceeding if the registrar has determined that,

(a) the plaintiff, applicant or appellant is the subject of a vexatious litigant order;

(b) the proceeding is subject to the vexatious litigant order; and

(c) the plaintiff, applicant or appellant has not obtained leave to institute or continue the proceeding.

AMENDING REG. 194 OF R.R.O. 1990
(RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE)

1. Rule 4.05 of Regulation 194 of the Revised Regulations of Ontario, 1990 is amended by adding the following subrules:

Conversion from Paper Format

(11) In the case of a proceeding that is commenced or continued in the City of Toronto, the registrar may prepare an electronic copy of any document that was filed or issued in the proceeding in paper format and include it in the court file.

(12) If the registrar prepares an electronic copy of a paper document, the registrar may return the paper document to the person who filed it or to whom it was issued, in which case subrule (10) applies with necessary modifications to the returned document.

(13) Subrules (11) and (12) apply with necessary modifications with respect to documents filed with the sheriff in the City of Toronto, in which case a reference in those subrules to the registrar shall be read as a reference to the sheriff.

(14) An electronic copy of a filed or issued document that is prepared under subrule (11) shall be considered to be the document as it was filed or issued in the proceeding.

2. Rule 4.05.1 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following subrule:

Non-Application, City of Toronto

(1.1) This rule does not apply with respect to proceedings comm[illegible]r continued in the City of Toronto.

Fr

Non-Application, City of Toronto

(1.1) This rule does not apply with respect to proceedings commenced or continued in the City of Toronto.

4. The Regulation is amended by adding the following rule:

Ontario Courts Public Portal

4.05.2.1 (1) In this rule,

"Ontario Courts Public Portal" means the software authorized by the Ministry of the Attorney General for the purposes of this rule and that is available on the internet under the name "Ontario Courts Public Portal" in English and "Portail public des tribunaux de l'Ontario" in French.

Application, City of Toronto

(2) This rule applies with respect to,

(a) the filing and issuance of documents in proceedings commenced or continued in the City of Toronto; and

(b) the filing of documents with the sheriff in the City of Toronto.

Permitted Use

(3) Any document that, under these rules, may or must be filed with the registrar or sheriff or issued may be submitted for filing or issuance electronically through the Ontario Courts Public Portal if,

(a) the Portal provides for the electronic filing or issuance of the document; and

(b) the person requesting the filing or issuance of the document has agreed to the Portal's terms of use and submitted, through the Portal, an e-mail address at which the person agrees to accept documents electronically.

Subject to Confirmation

(4) A document submitted for filing or issuance through the Ontario Courts Public Portal is considered to have been filed or issued only if the registrar or sheriff sends confirmation of the filing or issuance by e-mail.

Inconsistencies

(6) In the event of an inconsistency between information provided in a document submitted and accepted for filing or issuance electronically through the Ontario Courts Public Portal and information provided through the Portal by the person submitting the document,

(a) the information in the document as accepted for filing or issuance prevails, except with respect to the county specified by the person for the purposes of Rule 13.1, if applicable, where the information provided through the Portal prevails; and

(b) the registrar or sheriff may request from the person written clarification, in the manner specified by the registrar or sheriff, respecting the inconsistency, and the person shall promptly provide it.

Non-Application of Certain Subrules

(7) Subrules 4.05 (4.2), (7) and (8) do not apply with respect to a document filed or issued electronically by using the Ontario Courts Public Portal.

5. (1) Rule 4.05.3 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following subrule:

Modification, City of Toronto

(3.0.1) In the case of a proceeding that is commenced or continued in the City of Toronto, the documents referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 of subrule (3) in respect of each party shall be uploaded to Case Center by the registrar and not by the party.

(2) Subrule 4.05.3 (4) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "subrule (5)" in the portion before paragraph 1 and substituting "subrules (4.1) and (5)".

(3) Rule 4.05.3 of the Regulation is amended by adding the following subrule:

(4.1) Subrule (4) does not apply to the registrar.

(4) Subrule 4.05.3 (8) of the Regulation is amended by striking out "The party shall ensure that every document that the party uploads to Case Center" at the beginning and substituting "A party who while preserving the harmony, coherence and consistency of the legislative scheme (Bell ExpressVu, at para. 27; see also Interpretation Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. I-8, s. 10 (in Appendix)). "[S]tatutory interpretation is the art of finding the legislative spirit embodied in enactments": Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., at para. 102.

50 Consequently, a grant of authority to exercise a discretion as found in s. 15(3) of the AEUBA and s. 37 of the PUBA does not confer unlimited discretion to the Board. As submitted by ATCO, the Board's discretion is to be exercised within the confines of the statutory regime and principles generally applicable to regulatory matters, for which the legislature is assumed to have had regard in passing that legislation (see Sullivan, at pp. 154-55). In the same vein, it is useful to refer to the following passage from Bell Canada v. Canada (Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission), 1989 CanLII 67 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1722, at p. 1756:

> The powers of any administrative tribunal must of course be stated in its enabling statute but they may also exist by necessary implication from the wording of the act, its structure and its purpose. Although courts must refrain from unduly broadening the powers of such regulatory authorities through judicial law-making, they must also avoid sterilizing these powers through overly technical interpretations of enabling statutes.

51 The mandate of this Court is to determine and apply the intention of the legislature (Bell ExpressVu, at para. 62) without crossing the line between judicial interpretation and legislative drafting (see R. v. McIntosh, 1995 CanLII 124 (SCC), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 686, at para. 26; Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., at para. 174). That being said, this rule allows for the application of the "doctrine of jurisdiction by necessary implication"; the powers conferred by an enabling statute are construed to include not only those expressly granted but also, by implication, all powers which are practically necessary for the accomplishment of the object intended to be secured by the statutory regime created by the legislature (see Brown, at p. 2-16.2; Bell Canada, at p. 1756). Canadian courts have in the past applied the doctrine to ensure that administrative bodies have the necessary jurisdiction to accomplish their statutory mandate:

> When legislation attempts to create a comprehensive regulatory framework, the tribunal must have the powers which by practical necessity and necessary implication flow from the regulatory authority explicitly conferred upon it.

Re Dow Chemical Canada Inc. and Union Gas Ltd. (1982), 1982 CanLII 3238 (ON SCDC), 141 D.L.R. (3d) 641 (Ont. H.C.), at pp. 658-59, aff'd (1983), 1983 CanLII 1879 (ON CA), 42 O.R. (2d) 731 (C.A.) (see also Interprovincial Pipe Line Ltd. v. National Energy Board, 1977 CanLII 3163 (FCA), [1978] 1 F.C. 601 (C.A.); Canadian Broadcasting League v. Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission, 1982 CanLII 5204 (FCA), [1983] 1 F.C. 182 (C.A.), aff'd 1985 CanLII 63 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 174).

52 I understand the City's arguments to be as follows: (1) the customers acquire a right to the property of the owner of the utility when they pay for the service and are therefore entitled to a return on the profits made at the time of the sale of the property; and (2) the Board has, by necessity, because of its jurisdiction to approve or refuse to approve the sale of utility assets, the power to allocate the proceeds of the sale as a condition of its order. The doctrine of jurisdiction by necessary implication is at the heart of the City's second argument. I cannot accept either of these arguments which are, in my view, diametrically contrary to the state of the law. This is revealed when we scrutinize the entire context which I will now endeavour to do.

53 After a brief review of a few historical facts, I will probe into the main function of the Board, rate setting, and I will then explore the incidental powers which can be derived from the context.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR MANITOBA

Law of professions — Barristers and solicitors — Continuing professional development — Law Society suspending lawyer for failing to comply with Rules of the Law Society of Manitoba imposing mandatory professional development — Lawyer seeking declaration that impugned rules invalid because they impose suspension for non-compliance without right to hearing or right of appeal — Whether rules valid in light of Law Society's mandate under The Legal Profession Act, C.C.S.M., c. L107.

Law of professions — Barristers and solicitors — Law society — Rules — Standard of review — Statute governing legal profession empowering benchers of Law Society of Manitoba to make rules of general application to profession — Standard of review applicable to rules made by Law Society.

G was called to the Bar in 1955 and has been a practising lawyer and member of The Law Society of Manitoba ("Law Society") for over 60 years. Despite the Law Society's mandatory rules requiring all practising lawyers to complete 12 hours of continuing professional development ("CPD") a year, G did not report any CPD activities for 2012 or 2013. Over a year after G's failure to report the completion of any CPD hours, the Law Society notified him that if he did not comply with the rules within 60 days, he would be suspended from practising law. G was also invited to correct any errors in his CPD record and was informed that it was possible for the 60-day delay to be extended. G did not reply, nor did he apply for judicial review of the decision to suspend him. Rather, he challenged the validity of certain provisions of the Rules of the Law Society of Manitoba ("Rules") with respect to CPD, by applying for declaratory relief. The application judge dismissed G's application, concluding that the impugned rules fell squarely within the Law Society's legislative mandate. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal for similar reasons.

Held (Abella and Côté JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Wagner and Gascon JJ.: The standard applicable to the review of a law society rule is reasonableness. A rule will be set aside only if it is one no reasonable body informed by the relevant factors could have enacted. This means that the substance of the rule must conform to the rationale of the statutory regime set up by the legislature. Reasonableness is the appropriate standard for several reasons. First, in making rules of general application to the profession, the benchers of a law society act in a legislative capacity. The standard of review must reflect a law society's broad discretion to regulate the legal profession on the basis of policy considerations related to the public interest. Second, many benchers of a law society are also elected by and accountable to members of the legal profession, and applying the reasonableness standard ensures that the courts will respect the benchers' responsibility to serve those members. Third, a law society acts pursuant to its home statute in making rules such as those challenged by G, and as a result, there is a presumption that the appropriate standard is reasonableness. A law society must be afforded considerable latitude in making rules based on its interpretation of the "public interest" in the context of its enabling statute. Finally, a law society is a self-governing professional body with expertise in regulating the legal profession at an institutional level.

To determine whether the impugned rules are reasonable, the scope of the Law Society's statutory mandate must first be construed. The purpose, words and scheme of The Legal Profession Act ("Act"), support an expansive construction of the Law Society's rule-making authority. The Law Society was given a broad public interest mandate and broad regulatory powers to accomplish its mandate — a mandate which must be interpreted using a broad and purposive approach. The wording and scheme of the Act are also indicative of the breadth of the Law Society's authority and rule-making power. In particular, it is empowered to establish consequences for contravening the Act or the Rules, such as a suspension, for failing to meet the educational standards it is statutorily required to put in place. Since the Law Society has the power to create a CPD scheme, it necessarily has the power to enforce the scheme's standards.

In this case, the impugned rules are reasonable in light of the Law Society's statutory mandate. It is reasonable for the Rules to expose a lawyer to a suspension as a consequence for non-compliance with the CPD program. The Act provides clear authority for the Law Society to create a CPD program that can be enforced by means of a suspension, and the overall purpose of the Act, the words used in it and the scheme of the Act show that the impugned rules are reasonable in light of the Law Society's statutory mandate. A suspension, the purpose of which relates to compliance, not to punishment or professional competence, is a reasonable and effective way to ensure consistency of legal service across the province and to guarantee that even lawyers who are not interested in meeting the educational standards will comply. The right to practise law is not a common law right or a property right, but a statutory right that depends on the principles set out in the Act and the Rules.

Moreover, imposing a suspension on members for failing to comply with the impugned rules without giving such members a right to a hearing or a right of appeal is not unreasonable in light of the Law Society's statutory powers. Rather, it is entirely consistent with the Law Society's duty to establish and enforce educational standards. The suspension at issue is administrative in nature, and the impugned rules reasonably include no right to a hearing or right of appeal because lawyers are solely in control of complying with the rules in question at their leisure. Only they can end the suspension by complying with the requirements. Further, the rules permitting a suspension are not self-applying. In addition to a lawyer's common law procedural rights, the rules permitting a suspension expressly vest the chief executive officer of the Law Society with discretion to ensure that the effect of the Rules is not overly harsh. A lawyer's failure to comply with the impugned educational rules, even after having been warned and given an opportunity to seek an extension, provides clear justification for the Law Society to impose a temporary suspension.

Per Abella and Côté JJ. (dissenting): The issue in this appeal is not whether the Law Society can impose a suspension for failing to complete the 12 annual hours of mandatory education courses, but whether it can impose an automatic one.

A law society can only enact rules that are consistent with the purposes, scope and objectives of its enabling statute, and its authority to do so must be exercised in a reasonable manner. However, the fact that deference is owed does not mean that a law society has carte blanche; there are several grounds for finding delegated legislation to be unreasonable, such as where it is manifestly unjust.

In Manitoba, the Law Society's purpose is to "uphold and protect the public interest in the delivery of legal services with competence, integrity and independence". Those are the core values of a lawyer's professionalism. Protecting the public interest necessarily involves not only ensuring that a lawyer delivers legal services in accordance with those core values, but also protecting the public's perception in the professionalism of the delivery. While the primary goal of the Law Society is the protection of the public interest, it cannot do so without also protecting the ability of its members to practise law professionally. A law society must, as a result, exercise its mandate in a way that not only protects the ability of lawyers to act professionally, but that also reinforces the public's perception that lawyers are behaving professionally. The flip side is that a law society cannot enact rules which unreasonably undermine public confidence in lawyers.

In this case, the Law Society's rule that members who fail to complete 12 mandatory hours of continuing professional development activities in a calendar year are automatically suspended is unreasonable, because it is inconsistent with the Law Society's mandate to protect the public's confidence in the legal profession. When a lawyer is suspended, so is public confidence in him or her. That is why the Law Society takes such care in its investigation of complaints regarding professional misconduct or incompetence — it helps ensure that a suspension is imposed only after at least some minimal procedural protections have been provided, and then only after a range of lesser penalties has been considered. When a suspension is the result of such a process, the loss of public confidence is warranted. Where, however, a suspension is imposed automatically for the least serious disciplinary breach possible — failing to attend 12 hours of classes — the Law Society is in breach of its duty to protect the public from the needless erosion of trust in the professionalism of lawyers.

The economic costs of the suspension are manifest, as are the reputational ones, especially since the rules require the chief executive officer to notify every member of the Law Society and each of the chief justices of the courts in Manitoba of the name of a member who is suspended. This is the only competence matter regulated by the Law Society that has no procedural protections, no range of remedies, and no discretionary leeway on the part of the chief executive officer, and it alone attracts an automatic suspension, regardless of justificatory circumstances. This makes it arbitrary. The absence of discretion, procedural fairness or remedial options stands in stark contrast to other provisions of the Act or Rules furthering the Law Society's mandate to establish standards for the competence of lawyers. It also stands in stark contrast to the regulations, policies and by-laws of the continuing professional development requirements of most other Canadian provinces and territories.

The lack of discretion in this case is fatal. A rule that leads to an automatic suspension for failing to attend 12 hours of continuing professional development is so far removed from ensuring the public's confidence in lawyers that it is manifestly unjust, and therefore, unreasonable.

Court of Appeal for Ontario, O'Connor A.C.J.O., Feldman and Rouleau JJ.A. July 4, 2007

Municipal law -- By-laws -- Validity -- Licensing by-law requiring dealers of second-hand goods to submit daily reports to police including detailed personal information about vendors of each item -- By-law being authorized under s. 150(2) of Municipal Act as "consumer protection" legislation -- By-law conflicting with s. 28(2) of Municipal Freedom of Information and Privacy Protection Act -- Impugned sections of by-law being of no force or effect -- Municipal Act, 2001, S.O. 2001, c. 25, s. 150 -- Municipal Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. M.56, s. 28(2).

In 2004, the City replaced its licensing by-law for second- hand goods dealers with a new by-law which requires dealers of second-hand goods to submit daily reports to the police, electronically, which include detailed personal information about the vendors of each item. The applicants brought an application attacking the validity of the by-law. The application was dismissed. The applicants appealed.

Held, the appeal should be allowed.

The by-law was enacted under s. 150(1) of the Municipal Act, 2001. Section 150(2) of the Act provides that a municipality may only exercise its licensing powers for one or more of three purposes, namely, health and safety, nuisance control and consumer protection. The City submitted that collecting information about goods and vendors may deter unscrupulous vendors from attempting to sell stolen goods and that this can be seen as a form of consumer protection by helping to keep stolen goods out of the marketplace.

Under s. 14 of the Municipal Act, 2001, to the extent of any conflict with a provincial or federal Act or regulation, a by- law is "without effect". Section 28(2) of the Municipal Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act ("MFIPPA") provides that no person shall collect information on behalf of an institution (which includes a municipality) unless the collection is expressly authorized by statute, used for the purposes of law enforcement or necessary to the proper administration of a lawfully authorized activity. The application judge erred in finding that the collection of personal information was "expressly authorized by statute" on the basis that the by-law itself was authorized under s. 150(2) of the Municipal Act, 2001. The phrase "expressly authorized by statute" means that the specific types of personal information collected must be expressly described either in a statute or in a regulation that has been authorized by a general reference to the activity in a statute. It was not the intention of the legislature to allow municipalities, simply by virtue of their power to enact by-laws, to determine the type of personal information that can be collected. Although some of the information collected might ultimately be used for law enforcement, the purpose of the by-law was consumer protection, not law enforcement. In order to show that the collection of personal information is "necessary to the proper administration of a lawfully authorized activity", an institution is required to show that each item or [page402] class of personal information that is to be collected is necessary to properly administer that activity. Where the personal information would merely be helpful to the activity, it is not "necessary" within the meaning of the MFIPPA. Similarly, where the purpose could be accomplished another way, the institution is obliged to choose the other route. In this case, the City failed to demonstrate that the impugned provisions of the new by-law were necessary for an effective consumer protection regime to license second-hand dealers. The impugned provisions did not come within the exceptions in s. 28(2) of the MFIPPA. The provisions were of no force or effect.

THORBURN J.

AMENDED REASONS FOR DECISION

OVERVIEW

[1] On September 28, 2012, the Applicant, Mary Shuttleworth, was sitting in the front passenger seat of a motor vehicle when it was hit head-on by another vehicle. She suffered physical and psychological injuries as a result of the accident.

[2] The Licence Appeal Tribunal ("LAT") adjudicator decided that the Applicant was not sufficiently badly injured to be entitled to benefits for catastrophic impairment under the applicable Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule.

[3] Several months after the adjudicator rendered her decision, the Applicant's legal counsel received an anonymous note. The author of the note said that after the adjudicator wrote her decision, the decision was reviewed by the executive chair of the umbrella organization, the Safety, Licensing Appeals and Standards Ontario ("SLASTO") who "changed the decision to make the applicant not catastrophically impaired." The note contains indicia including the file number and the name of counsel that would suggest the author was familiar with some of the circumstances of this case.

[4] The Applicant then sought further information from the LAT about how the adjudicator arrived at her decision. She discovered that, pursuant to an unwritten review process imposed by the executive chair, the legal department sent the adjudicator's draft decision to the executive chair for her review and comments. The executive chair provided comments to the adjudicator. The adjudicator thanked the executive chair for her helpful review of the decision and advised that she was working on revising it. Further revisions were made and the decision was released.

[5] The Applicant claims the process followed does not meet the requirements established by the Supreme Court of Canada to allow for consultation in the decision-making process while protecting the independence of the decision-maker. In particular, the Applicant says that the process followed by the LAT was deficient in the following ways:

a. Consultation was imposed on the adjudicator by the executive chair, a "superior level of authority within the administrative hierarchy"; and

b. There is reason to believe the executive chair changed the adjudicator's decision. The Respondents have refused to provide evidence to confirm the nature of the revisions made by the executive chair so there is no way of knowing whether the executive chair changed the decision as suggested in the anonymous note.

(Ellis-Don Ltd. v. Ontario (Labour Relations Board), 2001 SCC 4 (CanLII), [2001] 1 SCR 221.)

[6] The Applicant claims there is reason to believe the adjudicator's decision was influenced by the executive chair and does not represent the adjudicator's independent decision. She seeks to quash the decision and order a rehearing or reconsideration without input from the executive chair. Alternatively, she seeks an adjournment of this proceeding to allow her to examine the adjudicator and executive chair for discovery, and/or obtain further documentation and an extension of time to file such evidence.

[7] The Respondents submit that the anonymous letter is not admissible as it is double hearsay. In any event, decision-making is a consultative process. This was the first decision to determine whether someone suffered a catastrophic impairment under the recently implemented administrative structure at the LAT. Counsel for the LAT advised that where an LAT decision involves a novel, contentious, precedent-setting or high-profile issue, the executive chair reviews the decision as a second peer reviewer. The review is not intended to question the facts and evidence or to comment on the ultimate result. It is intended to offer suggestions to improve clarity, reasoning, readability, and ensure the correct legal test has been applied. Counsel for the LAT submits that adjudicators cannot be compelled to participate in the review process. The Respondents submit there is no credible evidence to challenge the adjudicator's independence and the Application for judicial review must therefore fail.

[8] For the reasons that follow, I allow the application and set aside the adjudicator's decision. As discussed below, I make no finding of any actual impropriety having occurred on the facts of this case. The applicant did not prove that the executive chair did anything to force the adjudicator to change her decision. Rather, the consultative decision-making process followed by the LAT in this case did not meet the minimum standards required to ensure both the existence and the appearance of adjudicative independence of the adjudicator's decision. Justice must not only be done; it must be seen to be done. In the absence of a properly limited, voluntary consultative process, an informed, cautious observer would have a reasonable basis to believe that the decision did not reflect the independent decision of the adjudicator. It must therefore be set aside.

BACKGROUND

The Role of SLASTO and LAT

[9] Before 1990, compensation for those who were injured in a motor vehicle accident was left largely to the tort system.

[10] On June 1, 1990, Ontario enacted the Insurance Statute Law Amendment Act, 1990. S.O. 1990, c. 2. This new regime for motor vehicle accident compensation in Ontario is premised on an "exchange of rights" principle under that the legislature restricted the rights of innocent accident victims to maintain a tort actions against the wrongdoers in exchange for payment of enhanced no-fault accident benefits from their own insurers under the Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule (the "SABS"). (Meyer v. Bright (1993), 1993 CanLII 3389 (ONCA), 15 O.R. (3d) 129, 110 D.L.R. (4th) 354 (C.A.) and Sullivan Estate v. Bond (2001), 2001 CanLII 8584 (ON CA), 55 O.R. (3d) 97, 202 D.L.R. (4th) 193 (C.A.)).

[11] Section 268(1) of the Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.8 provides that, > 268(1) Every contract evidenced by a motor vehicle liability policy, including every such contract in force when the Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule is made or amended, shall be deemed to provide for the statutory accident benefits set out in the Schedule and any amendments to the Schedule, subject to the terms, conditions, provisions, exclusions and limits set out in that Schedule.

[12] Pursuant to this system, every automobile insurance policy in Ontario provides its own insured with access to prescribed benefits in the event of a motor vehicle accident regardless of fault.

[13] Section 280 of the Insurance Act grants the LAT the jurisdiction to resolve disputes "in respect of an insured person's entitlement to statutory accident benefits or in respect of the amount of statutory accident benefits to which an insured person is entitled."

[14] This is new jurisdiction for the LAT. Under the Adjudicative Tribunals Accountability, Governance and Appointments Act, 2009, SO 2009, c 33, Sch 5, (the "ATAGAA") the LAT has been designated as part of the SLASTO cluster of tribunals. The executive chair of SLASTO is a member of the LAT and has the powers and authority as its chair under s. 17 (1) of ATAGAA. Section 14 (4) of ATAGAA provides as follows:

> Chair to recommend appointments, reappointments
> (4) No person shall be appointed or reappointed to an adjudicative tribunal unless the chair of the tribunal, after being consulted as to his or her assessment of the person's qualifications under subsections (1) and (2) and, in the case of a reappointment, of the member's performance of his or her duties on the tribunal, recommends that the person be appointed or reappointed.

[15] In so doing, the executive chair of SLASTO exercises a "superior level of authority within the administrative hierarchy."

Accident Benefits and Catastrophic Impairment Regime

[16] The Applicant applied for and received statutory accident benefits from her insurer, the Respondent Peel, payable under the SABS.

[17] There is a $50,000 limit on the amount of medical and rehabilitation benefits, and a $36,000 limit on the amount of attendant care benefits an insured person is to be paid, under the SABS Schedule. These limits are increased to one million dollars if the insured is found to have suffered a "catastrophic impairment" as a result of a motor vehicle accident. (Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule – Effective September 1, 2010, Ont. Reg. 34/10 of the Insurance Act, RSO 1990, c I.8.)

[18] In December 2014, the Applicant submitted that her injuries resulted in "catastrophic impairment".

[19] As outlined in the SABS, "catastrophic impairment" is a 55% impairment of the whole person. There are several factors used to calculate whole person impairment. Physical and neurological impairments are rated under the appropriate chapter and are each assigned a percentage impairment rating. Individual percentages are then combined according to a formula in the Guides to the Evaluation of Permanent Impairment, arriving at a total whole person impairment ("WPI"). Psychological and mental impairments are assigned a class of impairment based on how seriously they affect a person's useful functioning in four domains of daily life, according to the Guides. To arrive at a total WPI, the psychological impairments must be converted to percentage values and then combined with the other ratings. (American Medical Association, Guides to the Evaluation of Permanent Impairment, 4th ed. (Chicago: American Medical Association, 1993.).

[20] The Guides allow for the final estimated WPI to be rounded to the nearest values ending in 0 or 5, meaning a WPI of 53% will be rounded up to 55%.

[21] The Applicant and the Respondent Peel both commissioned assessments to determine whether she met the catastrophic impairment threshold.

[22] The Applicant's assessors found her catastrophically impaired, as her physical and neurological impairments, when combined with her mental or psychological impairments met or exceeded the 55% WPI threshold. The Respondent Peel's assessors found the Applicant to have a 40% WPI, falling short of the 55% threshold. The following chart shows the respective positions of the parties and where the parties differed in their assessments:

IMPAIRMENT	GUIDE CHAPTER	OMEGA's WPI	DIRECT IME's WPI

[23] The parties were unable to resolve their dispute and the matter was brought to a hearing before the LAT to resolve the issue.

The Decision Review Process

[24] In-house counsel for the LAT swore an affidavit explaining that the executive chair implemented a decision review process at the LAT. The stated reason was to maximize the quality of the tribunal's decisions. The peer review process has not been adopted formally. No written policy was provided but counsel swore that, "generally, the LAT decision review process for final decisions is, and at all material times in this case was" as follows:

> First, there is peer review: After drafting a decision, an adjudicator is expected to send the decision for peer review by the Duty Vice-Chair. The Duty Chair offers suggestions to improve clarity, reasoning and readability and might also evaluate, for example, whether the correct legal test has been applied and whether any related case law that was not mentioned might be helpful.
> Second, there is legal review: The SLASTO Legal Services Unit reviews the decision to ensure that the correct legal test has been applied and to identify any related case law that was not mentioned that might be helpful.

> Third, there is a second peer review by the executive chair: "In some rare instances – such as when a decision involves a novel, contentious, precedent-setting, or high profile issue – the Legal Services Unit will send the decision to the Executive chair for her review. In these instances, the Executive chair serves, in essence, as a second peer reviewer and accordingly will order the same kinds of comments that the author would typically receive during the initial peer review."
> Fourth, there is a review by the file's case management officer: The case management officer acts as an intake officer and primary point of contact for the parties. This review involves examining the decision's format, correcting grammatical and spelling errors, and ensuring that the template and parties' names are correct. [Emphasis added.]

[25] The absence of a written policy is significant. The ATAGAA contains a very formal process to ensure the accountability of tribunal members and officers both internally and to the public. Sections 7 and 8 of ATAGAA read as follows:

> Member accountability framework
> 7 (1) Every adjudicative tribunal shall develop a member accountability framework.
>
> Contents
> (2) The member accountability framework must contain,
>
> (a) a description of the functions of the members, the chair and the vice-chairs, if any, of the tribunal;
>
> (b) a description of the skills, knowledge, experience, other attributes and specific qualifications required of a person to be appointed as a member of the tribunal;
>
> (c) a code of conduct for the members of the tribunal; and
>
> (d) any other matter specified in the regulations or in a directive of the Management Board of Cabinet. 2009, c. 33, Sched. 5, s. 7 (2).
>
> Approval
> (3) The member accountability framework must be approved by the tribunal's responsible minister.

> 8 Every adjudicative tribunal shall make its public accountability documents, approved as required by section 3, 4, 5, 6 or 7, as the case may be, available to the public.

[26] No documents were provided to outline LAT's review process nor were we advised that the process had been adopted and published in accordance with the statutory process designed to protect and enhance accountability as provided by the statute.

[27] According to counsel for the LAT,

> … those who review a draft decision accept, and do not question, the facts and evidence as presented in the draft. To the extent that a reviewer's comments might relate to the facts or evidence, they are simply intended to clarify the author's findings. The reviewer functions simply as an editor. Likewise, those who review a draft decision do not comment on the decision's policy choice(s) or ultimate result. In this sense, the LAT's decision review process recognizes that an adjudicator assigned to hear and determine a matter is completely independent to render whatever determination he or she sees fit. Again, the reviewer functions simply as an editor. The adjudicator has complete discretion to accept or reject any suggested revisions offered as part of the decision review process, as well as complete discretion over the extent to which he or she shows a reviewer any further drafts or revisions before releasing the decision to the parties; and while SLASTO has a formal process for peer and legal review as described above, there is no means to compel adjudicators to participate in it. If an adjudicator declined to participate in process, there is no means to prevent him or her from releasing the decisions without further comment or discussion.

[28] By contrast, the graphic presentation of the peer review algorithm disclosed to the court makes no reference to the voluntariness of the peer review process. Moreover, according to counsel, adjudicators "are expected" to subject their decisions for review and decisions get sent to the executive chair by the legal department without any assent or input from adjudicators. When comments come back to adjudicators from the executive chair, they are being made by a person with authority over the adjudicator's reappointment.

The Tribunal Hearing

[29] The adjudicator heard the catastrophic impairment issue on September 7 and 8, 2016.

[30] The adjudicator submitted her decision for peer review by the Duty Vice-Chair, after which she sent her decision for legal review. After legal review was completed, the SLASTO's Head of Legal Services provided a copy of the decision to the executive chair as the decision was the first of its kind for the LAT and, as such, was viewed as highly significant. The executive chair then offered her comments to the adjudicator.

[31] On April 11, 2017, the adjudicator thanked the executive chair for her comments and indicated that she would further revise her draft. The adjudicator rendered her decision on April 21, 2017. She held that the Applicant had a WPI of 51% and that, accordingly, the Applicant was not catastrophically impaired.

[32] The Applicant did not request reconsideration of the decision nor did she appeal the decision. It is agreed that if she had received a WPI of 53% (rather than the 51% she received), this would have been rounded up to 55% and she would have been entitled to benefits for catastrophic injury. That is, a small change of any one finding on any single input into the WPI calculation would have changed the outcome of the decision.

The Anonymous Letter

[33] Almost two months after she received the Tribunal's decision, the Applicant's lawyer received an anonymous letter with no return address dated June 16, 2017. The note reads as follows:

> I have heard from [sic] reliable source that the [adjudicator] Sapin's initial decision was that this was a catastrophic impairment. This decision then went up for review and the [executive chair] Linda Lamoureux changed the decision to make the applicant not catastrophically impaired.
>
> Thought you should know that the decision was not made by an independent decision maker who heard the evidence.
>
> I was also told that [the adjudicator] Sapin hesitated to sign this order.

The Results of the FOI request made by the Applicant

[34] After receiving the anonymous letter and being denied further information by the LAT, the Applicant's counsel made an access to information request to the LAT for "any/or all documents, notes and records relating to" the applicant and/or the adjudicator's decision, along with a second request for any "documents, emails, notes, letters, and all communications" between the executive chair and the adjudicator from September 7, 2016 to April 21, 2017.

[35] In response, the LAT disclosed, among other things, two emails. The first, dated April 11, 2017, was from the adjudicator to the executive chair. The email reads as follows:

> I just wanted to thank you for your helpful review of this decision and to let you know that I have met with [legal counsel] and am working on revising it (for the umpteenth time, this was not a first draft!) to re-organize it a bit, tighten it up and clarify some points in keeping with your suggestions. And try to make it shorter.
> I also wanted to point out that this will take more time, and although I will do my best to meet recent deadlines for this and my three other decisions, I just wanted to advise in advance that the deadlines may be affected somewhat.
>
> I look forward to discussing this decision with you.

[36] The executive chair responded as follows:

> Susan thank you for your note. This is a complex case. I had the benefit of reading it after a great deal of work on your part and after legal review. I recall stopping by your desk on a few occasions where you indicated you were struggling with a CAT [catastrophic injury] case – no wonder given the issues at play. I do appreciate your understanding and willingness to work with legal and myself to ensure the best possible decision. You must be a fan of Justice Laskin's as he takes a similar approach. This is an important decision, one that will be referenced. I suspect it will receive a great deal of attention.
> Although I am concerned about the delay already experienced by the applicant and the further delay that will ensue because of my comments, I do appreciate your understanding of the importance of ensuring quality decision writing, and your willingness to accept constructive feedback. At the end of the day, the people we serve benefit.

[37] The Applicant filed her application for judicial review on June 21, 2017.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

[38] The Court is "required to evaluate whether the rules of procedural fairness or the duty of fairness have been adhered to. The court does this by assessing the specific circumstances giving rise to the allegation and by determining what procedures and safeguards were required in those circumstances in order to comply with the duty to act fairly." (London (City) v. Ayerswood Development Corp (2005), 2002 CanLII 3225 (ON CA), 167 O.A.C. 120 at para 10.)

[39] This involves a review of the nature of the decision, the process followed; the statutory scheme pursuant to which the body operates; the importance of the decision to the individual affected; the legitimate expectations of the person challenging the decision; and the choice of procedure selected by the agency. (See Baker v Canada 1999 CanLII 699 (SCC), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817.)

THE ISSUES

[40] The issues are as follows:

1. May the Applicant seek judicial review prior to reconsideration and/or appeal of the decision?
2. Should the anonymous letter be admitted and if so, for what purpose?
3. Is there a reasonable apprehension that the decision was not made by an independent decision-maker and if so, what is the appropriate remedy?

1. MAY THE APPLICANT SEEK JUDICIAL REVIEW PRIOR TO RECONSIDERATION OR APPEAL?

[41] The Applicant has not sought reconsideration nor has she appealed the Adjudicator's decision.

[42] Section 18.1 of the Licence Appeal Tribunal Rules of Practice and Procedure permits reconsideration by the executive chair of the SLASTO within 21 days of the date of the decision. Section 11(1) of the Licence Appeal Tribunal Act, 1999, S.O. 1999, c. 12, Sch. G ("the Act") provides that the Divisional Court may hear appeals from decisions relating to matters under the Insurance Act on questions of law that are brought within 30 days of the order appealed from.

[43] Reconsideration is not an absolute prerequisite to judicial review. (Ellis-Don Ltd. v. Ontario (Labour Relations Board), 2001 SCC 4 (CanLII), [2001] 1 SCR 221, 52 OR (3d) 160; 194 DLR (4th) 385.)

[44] The Applicant claims it would not have been appropriate to proceed by way of reconsideration or appeal because:

a. the deadline to apply for an internal review of the decision and appeal had passed by the time she received the anonymous letter which forms the basis for application for judicial review;

b. the whistleblower alleges that the executive chair changed the decision to deny her benefits for catastrophic injury; and

c. the executive chair is in charge of the reconsideration process.

[45] The Respondents do not object to the Applicant's filing outside the usual timeframe.

[46] This Application for judicial review may proceed notwithstanding that there has been no reconsideration or appeal of the decision because:

a. There is no prerequisite that a party must seek reconsideration before an application for judicial review;

b. The Applicant did not receive the new information upon which this review is based until after the timeframe for reconsideration or appeal had expired; and

c. Reconsideration is effected by the executive chair who is also the person who edited the draft decision.

[47] The anonymous letter should be admitted into evidence.

[48] It is not admitted for the truth of its contents (that the executive chair changed the outcome) but for the purpose of narrative: to explain why the Applicant became concerned about the decision after the time for reconsideration and appeal had expired, and why she sought further information from the respondents regarding the decision and the process of decision-making.

3. WAS THERE A REASONABLE APPREHENSION THAT THE ADJUDICATOR DID NOT ARRIVE AT HER DECISION INDEPENDENTLY?

Is there a reasonable apprehension that the decision was not made independently by the adjudicator?

[49] The Applicant claims there is reason to believe the adjudicator's decision was not decided by an impartial decision-maker. The Applicant relies on the information obtained from the Tribunal.

[50] It is important to the administration of justice that*Committee for Justice and Liberty v. National Energy Board*, 1976 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 369 and Yukon Francophone School Board, Education Area #23 v. Yukon (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 25 at para. 20.)

[51] An administrative decision-maker's discussion of a draft decision with colleagues does not, in and of itself, breach the rules of natural justice. (IWA v. Consolidated-Bathurst Packaging Ltd., 1990 CanLII 132 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 282 and Tremblay v. Quebec (Commission des affaires sociales), 1992 CanLII 1135 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 952.)

[52] "Contemporary reason-writing is very much a consultative process during which the writer of the reasons resorts to many sources" and "[t]o hold that any 'outside' influence vitiates the validity of … the decision reached is to insist on a degree of isolation which is not only totally unrealistic, but also destructive of effective reason-writing." (Khan v. College of Physicians & Surgeons of Ontario, 1992 CanLII 2784 (ON CA))

[53] The implementation of an institutional consultation procedure does not create an apprehension of bias or lack of independence provided the system is designed to safeguard the ability of the decision-maker to decide the facts and the law to be applied, independently. The basic principles that must be followed to ensure compliance with the rules of natural justice are as follows:

> First, the consultation proceeding cannot be imposed by a superior level of authority within the administrative hierarchy, but can be requested only by the adjudicators themselves.

> Second, the consultation must be limited to questions of policy and law. Members of the organization who have not heard the evidence cannot be allowed to re-assess it. The consultation must proceed on the basis of the facts as stated by the members who heard the evidence.
> Finally, even on questions of law and policy, decision-makers must remain free to take whatever decision they deem right in their conscience and understanding of the facts and the law, and not be compelled to adopt the views expressed by other members of the administrative tribunal.

(Ellis-Don Ltd. (supra) at para 29 per Lebel J. for the majority, citing IWA v. Consolidated-Bathurst Packaging Ltd., 1990 CanLII 132 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 282 per Gonthier J.; and Domtar Inc. v. Quebec (Commission d'appel en matière de lésions professionnelles), 1993 CanLII 106 (SCC) 2 S.C.R. 756. at p. 798.)

[54] As long as these rules are followed, decision-makers may change their minds as a result of discussions with colleagues or because they have further reflected on the matter. (IWA v. Consolidated-Bathurst (supra))

[55] The information provided by the Respondent Tribunal in this case must be considered to determine whether there is a reasonable apprehension that the adjudicator's decision was not made independently.

[56] We recognize that there is a presumption of regularity of the administrative process and that establishing some form of decision review process to ensure consistency in style and form is accepted practice. (Ellis-Don at para 55.)

[57] The legal department sent the draft decision to the executive chair because the decision was the first of its kind for the Tribunal and thus significant. The draft was reviewed by the executive chair, the executive chair offered her comments and further changes were made by the adjudicator. There is no evidence as to the nature of those changes.

[58] It would appear from the email exchange between the adjudicator and the executive chair that the adjudicator was informed of the review after it had taken place.

[59] The Applicant did not cross-examine the affiant for the Respondent Tribunal. There is therefore no evidence to refute the affiant's assertion that,

> … The adjudicator has complete discretion to accept or reject any suggested revisions offered as part of the decision review process, as well as complete discretion over the extent to which he or she shows a reviewer any further drafts or revisions before releasing the decision to the parties; and while SLASTO has a formal process for peer and legal review as described above, there is no means to compel adjudicators to participate in it.

[60] Therefore, on the evidence before us and given the presumption of regularity of an administrative process, we are unable to conclude that the adjudicator did not make her decision independently.

[61] However, an important rule of consultation set out in Ellis-Don was contravened. Review was imposed by the executive chair; a person at a supervisory level of authority within the administrative hierarchy. Consultation was not requested by the Adjudicator. There was no formal or written policy protecting the adjudicator's right to decline to participate in review by the executive chair or to decline to make changes proposed by the executive chair. In their emails, the adjudicator and executive chair discussed the fact that the changes proposed would take time to draft but the executive chair indicated that the changes were important enough to justify further delay in the finalization of the decision.

[62] This failure to comply with the rules for consultation laid out in Consolidated Bathurst and applied in Ellis-Don, creates a reasonable apprehension of lack of independence.

CONCLUSION AND REMEDY

[63] The Applicant had a legitimate concern about the basis for the decision that she was not catastrophically injured. She therefore sought further information and was provided an affidavit from Board counsel that set out the process for editing decisions.

[65] consultation cannot be imposed by a superior level of authority within the administrative hierarchy, but can only be requested by the adjudicator herself. This breach creates a reasonable apprehension of lack of independence.

[66] Deliberative privilege is meant to ensure that any peer review or consultative process has robust protections to safeguard adjudicative independence. Absent bad faith, the formality and express limits set out in a formal peer review process will usually be the last and best protection that the parties and the public have against improper interference and to safeguard the appearance of propriety of the decision-making process.

[67] There is no formal and voluntary process, despite the statutory accountability process that calls for one. As the decision in this case was subjected to a peer review process that did not contain the required safeguards of adjudicative independence, decision of the adjudicator is set aside and referred back to the LAT for a new hearing.

[68] On the agreement of the parties as to the quantum, costs of this Application are awarded to the Applicant in the amount of $12,000 inclusive of HST and disbursements.

Case Summary

Administrative law — Bias — Reasonable apprehension of bias — Executive chair of Safety, Licensing Appeals and Standards Tribunals Ontario reviewing draft decision of Licence Appeal Tribunal adjudicator — Adjudicator making significant changes to draft decision as result — Adjudicator not requesting review — Adjudicator's right to decline to participate in review or make proposed changes not being protected by any formal or written policy — Executive chair having power over reappointment of adjudicators — Divisional Court not erring in finding that circumstances gave rise to reasonable apprehension of lack of adjudicative independence.

The applicant sought a hearing before the Licence Appeal Tribunal ("LAT") on whether she met the statutory threshold for a "catastrophic impairment" as defined in the Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule, O. Reg. 34/10. At the time, the LAT was a part of a cluster of tribunals known as the Safety, Licensing Appeals and Standards Tribunals Ontario ("SLASTO"). The adjudicator released a decision determining that the threshold was not met. The applicant's counsel later received an anonymous letter stating that, before the decision was released, it was reviewed by the executive chair of SLASTO, who reversed the adjudicator's determination that the applicant's injuries qualified as a catastrophic impairment. As a result, the applicant brought an application for judicial review of the adjudicator's decision. The Divisional Court found that: the SLASTO Legal Services Unit generally sent decisions to the executive chair without assent or input from the adjudicator; the adjudicator in this case did not request the review and was unaware of it until it had taken place; there was no formal or written policy protecting the adjudicator's right to decline to participate in the review or to decline to make changes proposed by the executive chair; a manual describing the tribunal's procedure made no reference to the voluntariness of peer review; and the executive chair had power over the reappointment of adjudicators. The Divisional Court concluded that the circumstances gave rise to a reasonable apprehension of a lack of adjudicative independence. The application was allowed. The respondents appealed.

Held, the appeal should be dismissed.

A superior level of authority imposed consultation on the adjudicator. Evidence that the LAT lacked the legal power to force an adjudicator to participate in the peer review process did not mean that consultation was not imposed. The adjudicator was never given the opportunity to decline the review and was instead presented with the executive chair's review as a fait accompli. The Lieutenant Governor in Council could not reappoint the adjudicator without the executive chair's recommendation. The review process lacked the appropriate procedural safeguards. As the Divisional Court noted, the procedural manual made no reference to the voluntariness of the peer review process. There was no evidence that adjudicators were ever told that they were free to decline to participate in a review by [page370] the executive chair, and considerable evidence tending to show that adjudicators were expected to participate in such a review. The adjudicator in this case made significant changes following the executive chair's comments. The Divisional Court did not err in its conclusion that there was a reasonable apprehension of a lack of independence on the facts of this case.

Introduction

[1] Mary Shuttleworth was injured in a car accident on September 28, 2012. In December 2014, she applied to her insurer, Peel Mutual Insurance Company ("Peel"), for a determination that her accident injuries resulted in impairments that met the statutory threshold for a "catastrophic impairment" as defined in the Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule, O. Reg. 34/10 (the "SABS"). When the parties were unable to agree whether the threshold was met, she sought a hearing before the Licence Appeal Tribunal (the "LAT"). At the time, the LAT was a part of a cluster of tribunals known as the Safety, Licensing Appeals and Standards Tribunals Ontario ("SLASTO"). On April 21, 2017, LAT vice-chair Susan Sapin released a decision determining that the threshold was not met.

[2] Approximately two months later, Ms. Shuttleworth's counsel received an anonymous letter stating that, before the decision was released, it was reviewed and changed by Linda Lamoureux, the executive chair of SLASTO. The letter claimed that in Ms. Sapin's initial decision, Ms. Shuttleworth's injuries qualified as a catastrophic impairment, but when Ms. Lamoureux reviewed the decision, she altered it and determined that Ms. Shuttleworth did not meet the threshold. The letter also indicated that Ms. Sapin was reluctant to sign the decision.

[3] Ms. Shuttleworth attempted to obtain information about the process followed in her case. This was met by a broad claim of adjudicative privilege asserted by the LAT. However, the LAT did produce some e-mails without attachments, which it relied on in support of its position that there was no interference with Ms. Sapin's decision. Having obtained no meaningful information regarding the serious charges in the anonymous letter, Ms. Shuttleworth brought an application for judicial review. [page372]

[4] The Divisional Court granted Ms. Shuttleworth's application for judicial review and set aside the LAT's decision. While it made no finding of any actual impropriety, the court held that the LAT's decision-making process did not meet the minimum standards required to ensure both the existence and appearance of adjudicative independence.

[5] The LAT and SLATSO appeal the order of the Divisional Court, as does Peel (the "appellants"). They assert that the court erred in law in finding that there was a reasonable apprehension of lack of independence in relation to Ms. Sapin. As I will explain below, I do not accept this submission and would dismiss the appeal.

Facts

[6] Ms. Shuttleworth suffered physical and psychological injuries as a result of her motor vehicle accident. A finding that she was catastrophically impaired would entitle her to enhanced benefits. Peel's assessments determined that Ms. Shuttleworth's impairment of the whole person ("WPI") fell below the 55 per cent threshold for catastrophic impairment provided in the SABS, while an assessment that Ms. Shuttleworth commissioned confirmed that she met the threshold. She applied to the LAT under s. 280 of the Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.8 to resolve the dispute.

[7] To promote efficiency, the Adjudicative Tribunals Accountability, Governance and Appointments Act, 2009, S.O. 2009, c. 33, Sch. 5, s. 15 ("ATAGAA") allows two or more adjudicative tribunals to be designated as a "cluster" by regulation. Until January 1, 2019, the LAT was part of SLASTO.[1] Ms. Lamoureux was appointed as executive chair of SLASTO, pursuant to s. 16 of ATAGAA. The LAT acquired jurisdiction over disputes in respect of the SABS on April 1, 2016. Ms. Shuttleworth's case was the first catastrophic impairment decision that the LAT was to release.

[8] On April 21, 2017, Ms. Sapin ruled that Ms. Shuttleworth's WPI was 51 per cent and that Ms. Shuttleworth was, therefore, not catastrophically impaired. If Ms. Shuttleworth's WPI was assessed at 53 per cent, it would have been rounded up to 55 per cent and she would have been found catastrophically impaired. Ms. Shuttleworth did not request a reconsideration of the decision and did not appeal.

[9] Approximately two months after the decision was released, Ms. Shuttleworth's counsel received an anonymous letter advising [page373] that the decision was reviewed and changed by Ms. Lamoureux before its release. The letter stated:

> I have heard from reliable source that Sapin's initial decision was that this was a catastrophic impairment. This decision then went up for review and the ED Linda Lamoureux changed the decision to make the applicant not catastrophically impaired.
> Thought you should know that the decision was not made by an independent decision maker who heard the evidence.
> I was also told that Sapin hesitated to sign this order.

[10] After receiving the anonymous letter and being denied further information by the LAT, Ms. Shuttleworth's counsel made an access to information request. In response to that request, the LAT refused to produce the drafts of the decision, which could have resolved the issue. Instead, it made limited disclosure, including of internal e-mails. The respondent did not pursue further disclosure. In one e-mail of particular note, dated April 11, 2017, Ms. Sapin wrote to Ms. Lamoureux as follows:

> I just wanted to thank you for your helpful review of this decision and to let you know that I have met with Liz and am working on revising it (for the umpteenth time, this was not a first draft!) to re-organize it a bit, tighten it up and clarify some points in keeping with your suggestions. And try to make it shorter.
> I also wanted to point out that this will take more time, and although I will do my best to meet Karen's recent deadlines for this and my three other decisions, I just wanted to advise in advance that the deadlines may be affected somewhat.

[11] Ms. Lamoureux responded the same day, she wrote:

> Susan thank you for your note. This is a complex case. I had the benefit of reading it after a great deal of work on your part and after legal review. I recall stopping by your desk on a few occasions where you indicated you were struggling with a CAT case -- no wonder given the issues at play. I do appreciate your understanding and willingness to work with legal and myself to ensure the best possible decision. You must be a fan of Justice Laskin's as he takes a similar approach. This is an important decision, one that will be referenced. I suspect it will receive a great deal of attention.
> Although I am concerned about the delay already experienced by the applicant and the further delay that will ensue because of my comments, I do appreciate your understanding of the importance of ensuring quality decision writing, and your willingness to accept constructive feedback. At the end of the day, the people we serve benefit.

[12] On June 21, 2017, Ms. Shuttleworth filed an application for judicial review. She argued that the LAT had failed to remain neutral in its decision-making process and sought an order reversing the decision or referring the matter back to the LAT for a rehearing. [page374]

[13] On the application for judicial review, Benson Cowan, head of legal services for SLASTO, affirmed an affidavit explaining the LAT's decision review process. His uncontested evidence was that an adjudicator "is expected to send the decision for peer review" upon completing the draft. However, there was "no means to compel adjudicators to participate" and no means to prevent an adjudicator who declined to participate from releasing the decision. According to Mr. Cowan, in some situations, the review proceeds through a total of four phases: (1) peer review by the duty vice-chair; (2) legal review by the SLASTO Legal Services Unit; (3) a second peer review by the executive chair; and (4) a review by the file's case management officer. The Legal Services Unit would only send the decision to the executive chair in "rare instances" such as when a decision involved a "novel, contentious, precedent-setting, or high profile issue".

[14] Finally, Mr. Cowan provided some evidence about the operation of the peer review process in the case at bar. He stated that the adjudicator submitted her decision for peer review by the duty vice-chair and then to the Legal Services Unit for legal review. Mr. Cowan sent the decision to the executive chair for review because it was the first catastrophic impairment decision that the LAT was going to release.

Decision of the Divisional Court

[15] The Divisional Court accepted that an adjudicator's discussion of a draft decision with colleagues does not in and of itself breach the rules of natural justice. It relied on Khan v. College of Physicians & Surgeons of Ontario (1992), 1992 CanLII 2784 (ON CA), 9 O.R. (3d) 641, [1992] O.J. No. 1725 (C.A.), for the principle that some "outside" influence on reason writing is permissible and accepted. However, the court emphasized that the institutional consultation procedure must be designed to safeguard a decision-maker's ability to independently decide the facts and the law. It relied on Ellis-Don Ltd. v. Ontario (Labour Relations Board), [2001] 1 S.C.R. 221, [2001] S.C.J. No. 5, 2001 SCC 4, at para. 29, for the propositions that the consultation procedure cannot be imposed by a superior level of authority, consultation must be limited to questions of policy and law, and decision-makers must remain free to decide independently even on questions of policy and law.

[16] The Divisional Court was unable to find that the adjudicator lacked actual independence. It held that, as Ms. Shuttleworth elected not to cross-examine Mr. Cowan, there was no evidence to refute his evidence that the reviewers do not question the facts and evidence and do not comment on the policy choices or outcome, that there is no means to compel adjudicators to participate [page375] in peer review, or that the adjudicator has complete discretion to accept or reject any suggested revisions. This evidence, coupled with the presumption of regularity that applies to administrative proceedings, meant that Ms. Shuttleworth failed to prove a lack of actual independence.

[17] Notwithstanding the foregoing, the Divisional Court concluded that there was a reasonable apprehension of a lack of independence. The LAT breached the rule of consultation from Ellis-Don because the executive chair imposed a review that was not requested by the adjudicator. The court emphasized that peer review or other consultative processes must be accompanied by robust protections to safeguard adjudicative independence. It stressed that there was no formal or written policy protecting the adjudicator's right to decline to participate in a review by the executive chair or make changes proposed by the executive chair. The court found the absence of this policy "significant" because ss. 7-8 of ATAGAA required it and because its existence would safeguard the appearance of propriety. Accordingly, it concluded that the LAT subjected the decision to a peer review process that lacked the required safeguards of adjudicative independence.

[18] It is important to note that, in reaching its conclusion, the Divisional Court made a number of factual findings about the review process, none of which are challenged on appeal:

(1) the SLASTO Legal Services Unit generally sent decisions to the executive chair without assent or input from the adjudicators;

(2) in this particular case, the adjudicator did not request the consultation with the executive chair and the executive chair only informed the adjudicator of her review after it had already taken place;

(3) there was no formal or written policy protecting the adjudicator's right to decline to participate in the review by the executive chair or to decline to make changes proposed by the executive chair;

(4) a manual describing the tribunal's procedure made no reference to the voluntariness of the peer review process; and

(5) by virtue of reappointment powers granted to the executive chair under s. 14(4) of ATAGAA, she exercised a superior level of authority within the administrative hierarchy.

[19] In the result, the Divisional Court granted Ms. Shuttleworth's application, set aside the adjudicator's decision and referred the matter back to the LAT for a new hearing. [page376]

Analysis

[20] The appellants submit that the Divisional Court erred by (a) incorrectly articulating and applying the test for reasonable apprehension of bias; (b) wrongly applying the trilogy of Supreme Court of Canada cases involving the preparation of reasons by administrative tribunals; (c) mistakenly finding that ss. 7 and 8 of the ATAGAA required SLATSO to have written consultation procedures; (d) failing to conduct a holistic analysis as mandated by Khan; and (e) conducting an incorrect analysis regarding reasonable apprehension of lack of adjudicative independence in relation to Ms. Sapin. These issues will be considered below.

(a) Test for a reasonable apprehension of bias

[21] In the overview section of its reasons, the Divisional Court stated [at para. 8], "Justice must not only be done; it must be seen to be done. In the absence of a properly limited, voluntary consultative process, an informed, cautious observer would have a reasonable basis to believe that the decision did not reflect the independent decision of the adjudicator."

[22] The appellants submit that the Divisional Court misapplied the test for reasonable apprehension of bias by introducing the concept of a "cautious observer". This, they argue, is novel and inconsistent with the test for reasonable apprehension of bias articulated in R. v. Valente, 1985 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 673, [1985] S.C.J. No. 77, which Ellis-Don confirms applies to the tribunal context.

[23] The test for a reasonable apprehension of bias or lack of independence in respect of an administrative tribunal is whether the apprehension is "a reasonable one, held by reasonable and right minded persons, applying themselves to the question and obtaining thereon the required information": International Woodworkers of America, Local 2-69 v. Consolidated-Bathurst Packaging Ltd., 1990 CanLII 132 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 282, [1990] S.C.J. No. 20, at p. 334 S.C.R. The question is thus whether "an informed person, viewing the matter realistically and practically -- and having thought the matter through" would think that it is more likely than not that the decision-maker would decide fairly: Consolidated-Bathurst, at p. 334 S.C.R. The Supreme Court recently confirmed this test in Yukon Francophone School Board, Education Area #23 v. Yukon (Attorney General), [2015] 2 S.C.R. 282, [2015] S.C.J. No. 25, 2015 SCC 25.

[24] I would not give effect to the appellants' submission that the Divisional Court applied the incorrect test. The appellants seize on the Divisional Court's passing reference to a "cautious [page377] observer". It is unfortunate that the term was used, as it may appear to introduce an unknown element to the test. However, on a review of the court's reasons as a whole, it is plain that it correctly articulated the test for a reasonable apprehension of a lack of independence, at para. 50 of its reasons, and cited the relevant authorities on the issue. At paras. 62 and 65, the court applied that test and found a reasonable apprehension of a lack of independence without making reference to a "cautious observer".

[25] In my view, the Divisional Court did not apply a novel test for reasonable apprehension of a lack of independence. Accordingly, this ground of appeal should fail.

(b) Application of the trilogy

[26] The Supreme Court's trilogy of cases on consultations in the course of preparing reasons for a decision -- Consolidated-Bathurst, Tremblay v. Quebec (Commission des affaires sociales), 1992 CanLII 1135 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 952, [1992] S.C.J. No. 20 and Ellis-Don -- sets out a framework of considerations for assessing whether there is a reasonable apprehension of bias or lack of independence.

[27] The guiding principle from the trilogy is that the decision-maker must be free to decide cases "in accordance with his own conscience and opinions": Consolidated-Bathurst, at p. 332 S.C.R. Consolidated-Bathurst establishes that discussions with colleagues are permissible even though they raise the possibility of "moral suasion", and that adjudicators are entitled to consider the opinion of their colleagues in the interest of adjudicative coherence: at pp. 331-33 S.C.R. The court also recognized that consultation could allow the adjudicator to benefit from the acquired experience of the entire board and foster coherence in the board's jurisprudence: at pp. 326-28 S.C.R. At the same time, the court concluded that any procedure or practice that unduly restricted independence would be contrary to the rules of natural justice: at p. 323 S.C.R. Accordingly, procedures that "effectively compel or induce" decision-makers to decide against their own conscience and opinions are impermissible: at p. 333 S.C.R.

[28] To reconcile the demands of decision-making by administrative tribunals with procedural fairness, the court held that full-board consultation was permissible if accompanied by appropriate safeguards. As Gonthier J. stated, the question is whether the "safeguards attached to this consultation process are . . . sufficient to allay any fear of violations of the rules of natural justice": Consolidated-Bathurst, at para. 96. Consolidated-Bathurst establishes that the fact that the board's chair or other board members lack any de jure power to impose their opinion on other [page378] board members is not a sufficient safeguard, as procedures may still "effectively compel or induce" members to decide against their conscience and opinions: at p. 333 S.C.R. Accordingly, the court must examine the "actual structure of the machinery created to promote collegiality" and "determine the actual situation prevailing in the body in question": Tremblay, at pp. 968 and 973 S.C.R. (emphasis in original).

[29] The Supreme Court also outlined specific rules that govern the practice of full-board consultation. In Consolidated-Bathurst, the court found it "obvious" that "no outside interference may be used to compel or pressure a decision maker to participate in discussions on policy issues raised by a case on which he must render a decision": at p. 332 S.C.R. Likewise, in Tremblay, the court found that the tribunal president's ability to refer a matter for plenary discussion without the permission of the adjudicator was a sufficient basis to find an appearance of a lack of independence: at p. 974 S.C.R. As a result, Ellis-Don held that it was a basic principle that only the adjudicators could request consultation and that their superiors in the administrative hierarchy could not impose it on them: at para. 29. This conclusion is consistent with leading treatises. As Sara Blake states in Administrative Law in Canada, 6th ed. (Toronto: LexisNexis, 2017), at pp. 116-17:

> A process for compulsory consultation . . . is not acceptable. The decision to consult must be up to the decision makers. It should not be imposed on them. If they do not wish to consult, they must be truly free to choose not to do so. Compulsory consultation creates an appearance [of] constraint on their freedom to decide the case.

[30] The appellants attempt to distinguish the LAT's review process from the full-board meetings the trilogy considered on two bases. First, they submit that the review process was purely focused on the quality of the written decision, unlike the full-board meetings that involved reviewing policy choices and the ultimate result. Second, they submit that the same moral suasion concerns are not present in the review process because only a maximum of four reviewers are involved and it is a simple editorial exercise. I would reject these submissions for the following reasons.

[31] First, it is inaccurate to characterize the review process as a purely qualitative or editorial exercise. Mr. Cowan's evidence was that reviewers did comment on whether the correct legal test and jurisprudence has been identified and applied. Ellis-Don emphasized that the procedural safeguards were required to protect a decision-maker's ability to decide questions of law independently from compulsion by other members of the tribunal: at para. 29. [page379]

[32] Second, the fact that fewer people were involved in the review than in the full-board consultations the trilogy considered does not assist the appellants. The fact remains that the executive chair occupies the most superior level of authority within the LAT and SLATSO. It should be recalled that the executive chair undertakes any reconsideration of the LAT adjudicators' decisions and holds power over the reappointment of individual adjudicators under s. 14(4) of ATAGAA. That subsection provides:

> 14(4) No person shall be appointed or reappointed to an adjudicative tribunal unless the chair of the tribunal, after being consulted as to his or her assessment of the person's qualifications under subsections (1) and (2) and, in the case of a reappointment, of the member's performance of his or her duties on the tribunal, recommends that the person be appointed or reappointed.

[33] The appellants submit that the moral suasion concern related to the executive chair's power over reappointment would be equally strong even if the adjudicator requested review by the executive chair. This submission should be rejected. As Tremblay and Consolidated-Bathurst recognize, adjudicators are more likely to feel free to decide according to their own conscience and opinions if the consultation occurs at their own request: Consolidated-Bathurst, at pp. 334-35 S.C.R.; and Tremblay, at p. 974 S.C.R.

[34] Third, it is also important to note that this court and other courts have found the principles from the trilogy on full-board consultation relevant to cases dealing with other review processes for draft decisions. In the context of review of draft reasons by counsel to a disciplinary committee, this court in Khan relied on Tremblay for the principle that compulsion to consult with others may cause the appearance of independence to be lost: Khan, at pp. 673-74 O.R. Similarly, in Bovbel v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), 1994 CanLII 3465 (FCA), [1994] F.C.J. No. 190, [1994] 2 F.C. 563 (C.A.), the Federal Court of Appeal relied on Consolidated-Bathurst and Tremblay to evaluate whether the Immigration and Refugee Board's practice of encouraging board members to submit their reasons for review by staff lawyers gave rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias.

[35] I would therefore reject the submission that the Divisional Court erred in its application of the trilogy.

(c) Written procedures

[36] The appellants submit that the Divisional Court erred in holding that the absence of a written peer-review policy was [page380] "significant" on the basis that ss. 7-8 of ATAGAA required such a policy. These sections provide as follows:

> Member accountability framework
> 7(1) Every adjudicative tribunal shall develop a member accountability framework.
>
>
> (2) The member accountability framework must contain,
>
> (a) a description of the functions of the members, the chair and the vice-chairs, if any, of the tribunal;
>
> (b) a description of the skills, knowledge, experience, other attributes and specific qualifications required of a person to be appointed as a member of the tribunal;
>
> (c) a code of conduct for the members of the tribunal; and
>
> (d) any other matter specified in the regulations or in a directive of the Management Board of Cabinet.
> Approval

(3) The member accountability framework must be approved by the tribunal's responsible minister.

PUBLICATION, AMENDMENT AND REVIEW OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTABILITY DOCUMENTS

Publication of public accountability documents
8. Every adjudicative tribunal shall make its public accountability documents, approved as required by section 3, 4, 5, 6 or 7, as the case may be, available to the public.

[37] The appellants argue that the text of s. 7 of ATAGAA does not include a requirement for a written peer-review policy and that SLASTO has adopted all the required documents. Their position is that the documents codify the principle of adjudicative independence and address the roles of members and vice-chairs in the peer-review process. Nor, they argue, does the case law demand a written peer-review policy. They note that in Consolidated-Bathurst and Ellis-Don, the Supreme Court upheld the Ontario Labour Relations Board's practice of full-board consultation even though the board lacked a written policy codifying the procedural safeguards in that process.

[38] I accept that ss. 7-8 of ATAGAA do not require SLATSO to publish a written peer review policy. Section 7(2) of ATAGAA only requires a tribunal to describe the functions of the members, the skills and qualifications required to be appointed a member, and a member code of conduct. SLATSO did publish a code of conduct, as well as descriptions of the vice-chair and member positions. [page381] The appellants are also correct that the Supreme Court upheld the Ontario Labour Relations Board's practice of full-board consultations in Consolidated-Bathurst and Ellis-Don despite the board's lack of a written policy governing those consultations, and that the Supreme Court found a reasonable apprehension of bias in Tremblay even though there was a written policy that protected adjudicative independence.

[39] Despite the foregoing, the Divisional Court was still entitled to find the absence of such a policy significant when it considered the adequacy of LAT's procedural safeguards. The absence of a formal policy protecting the adjudicator's right to decline to participate was significant in an environment where the procedure manual made no reference to the voluntariness of review by the executive chair and Mr. Cowan's own evidence was that adjudicators were expected to participate in the review process. While Mr. Cowan's evidence was that there was no means to compel adjudicators to participate, he did not give evidence that SLATSO communicated to adjudicators that they were free not to have their drafts reviewed by the executive chair. The principal safeguard the appellants point to is the executive chair's inability to lawfully compel the adjudicator to change her mind. However, Consolidated-Bathurst establishes that this is not a sufficient safeguard: at p. 333 S.C.R.

[40] Further, the absence of a written policy on full-board consultations in Consolidated-Bathurst and Ellis-Don and its presence of such a policy in Tremblay do not assist the appellants. The Ontario Labour Relations Board's practice of full-board consultations was well-known to board members and litigants before the board, as it was described in a 1971 government report and in legal treatises: Consolidated-Bathurst, Sopinka J., dissenting (but not on this point), at pp. 290-91 S.C.R. In particular, both board members and litigants knew that only the hearing panel could request a full-board meeting and it could not be centrally imposed: Gonthier J., writing for the majority, at pp. 316-17 S.C.R.

[41] In contrast, in this case, the Divisional Court found there was no evidence that adjudicators were aware that they had the right to refuse a review by the executive chair and that the process gave them no opportunity to refuse: at para. 28. The absence of a written policy was thus significant because it confirmed that the LAT had not communicated to adjudicators that they had the right to refuse. As for Tremblay, all it establishes is that a formal policy that protects adjudicative independence will not be an adequate safeguard if it is disregarded in practice: at pp.

972-73 S.C.R. The presence of the formal policy likely would have been [page382] a relevant consideration in Tremblay but for the evidence that the tribunal was disregarding it in practice.

[42] The SLASTO code of conduct and the position descriptions for the member and vice-chair positions undermine the appellants' position. The appellants point to the guarantee of adjudicative independence in these documents. However, the code of conduct simply states that "[m]embers should be independent in decision-making" and makes no mention of a member's right to refuse a review by the executive chair. This provides no evidence to undermine the Divisional Court's finding that members were not advised of their right to refuse. Moreover, the member position description confirms the Divisional Court's finding that members were expected to submit their decisions for peer review and were not advised of their right to refuse. Under the heading "Key Duties," the description states "A Member, where appropriate . . . submits draft decisions for, and participates in, peer and other decision reviews before they are issued in accordance with SLASTO policy."

[43] The appellants' submission that the Divisional Court failed to apply the holistic approach from Khan is unfounded. It is important to recognize that the court in Khan did not purport to undermine the holding in Tremblay that imposed consultation is generally inappropriate and did not suggest that it is merely one factor among others. To the contrary, Doherty J.A. found Tremblay "an appropriate starting place", quoted from it, and relied on it for the proposition that the result of compulsory consultation is that "the appearance of independence may be lost": Khan, at pp. 673-74 O.R.

[44] In Khan the court considered all of the factual circumstances of the case. Similarly, the Divisional Court recognized the need to look at all the circumstances. At paras. 38-39, it stated it was necessary to assess the "specific circumstances" and review the five factors from Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 (SCC), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817, [1999] S.C.J. No. 39, to determine the level of procedural fairness required.

[45] In addition, the review process in this case lacked the guarantees that led Doherty J.A. to find in Khan that the discipline committee's use of counsel in the drafting process did not give rise to a reasonable apprehension of lack of independence. Doherty J.A. stressed that counsel's involvement "could not have had any coercive effect" because counsel was the "servant of the Committee" and his involvement "was not mandatory, and was entirely under the control of the Committee": Khan, at [page383] p. 674 O.R. In contrast, the executive chair was the superior of the adjudicator with power over her reappointment, not the adjudicator's servant.

[46] In summary, I would reject this ground of appeal on the basis that the Divisional Court conducted an analysis of all of the circumstances of the case. I will consider in the next section of my reasons the adequacy of that analysis.

[47] The appellants' position is that the case before the LAT was an important, precedent-setting matter, and that it was thus an appropriate case for the executive chair's limited decision review role, which is consistent with her statutory responsibility in s. 20(1) of ATAGAA to ensure the LAT performs its duties and functions. The appellants submit that the Divisional Court's finding that there was no evidence that the adjudicator did not make her decision independently should have led the court to conclude that the executive chair's review of the draft decision did not raise a reasonable apprehension of a lack of independence. They argue that the uncontested evidence was that peer reviewers do not question the facts, evidence, policy choices, or result in a decision, and that adjudicators have complete discretion to accept or reject any suggested revisions. As a result, there is no danger of moral suasion of the kind discussed in Ellis-Don. Had the Divisional Court properly examined the facts of this case, the appellants submit, it would have found that a reasonable observer would conclude that the peer review adequately safeguards adjudicative independence.

[48] I am not persuaded that the Divisional Court erred in its conclusion that there was a reasonable apprehension of a lack of independence on the facts of this case. I reach this conclusion for the following reasons.

[49] First, the Divisional Court correctly found that the executive chair's imposition of the review on the adjudicator breached the rules set out in the trilogy. The Divisional Court found as a fact that the adjudicator was expected to send the decision for peer review: at para. 28. It also found that, as was the general practice, the legal department sent the decision to the executive chair without the adjudicator's prior knowledge or assent. The adjudicator was only informed of the review after it had taken place: at paras. 28, 57-58. The Divisional Court thus correctly concluded that the tribunal violated the rule from the trilogy because a superior level of authority imposed consultation on the adjudicator. [page384]

[50] I do not agree with the appellants' arguments that the Divisional Court erred in fact by finding that consultation was imposed. The appellants submit that the executive chair did not impose the review on the adjudicator because it was staff counsel that forwarded the decision to the executive chair. The fact remains that, by deciding to provide comments on the decision without seeking the adjudicator's permission, the executive chair imposed the review on the adjudicator. I likewise disagree with the argument that Mr. Cowan's evidence that the LAT lacked the legal power to force an adjudicator to participate in the peer review process meant that consultation was not imposed. Mr. Cowan forwarded the decision to the executive chair and the executive chair provided comments without seeking the adjudicator's consent. As Ms. Shuttleworth submits, the adjudicator's freedom to decline the review does not assist her because she was never given the opportunity to decline and was instead presented with the executive chair's review as a fait accompli.

[51] Second, the Divisional Court found that the breach was significant because of the power of the SLATSO executive chair. Consolidated-Bathurst recognized the possibility that a tribunal chair could exert moral suasion over tribunal members: at p. 333 S.C.R. Similarly, Tremblay stressed the control the tribunal president exercised over the consultation process in finding a reasonable apprehension of bias: at p. 973-74 S.C.R.; see, also, David Mullan, Administrative Law (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2001), at p. 344.

[52] The Lieutenant Governor in Council could not reappoint the adjudicator without the executive chair's recommendation: ATAGAA, s. 14(4). This power over reappointment is significant, as the Divisional Court found: at paras. 14-15, 28. The New Brunswick Court of Appeal has twice held that Ministers or Members of the Legislative Assembly should not be permitted to represent a claimant before a tribunal because the tribunal's members owe their re-appointment to the provincial cabinet: Chipman Wood Products (1973) Ltd. v. Thompson, 1996 CanLII 12488 (NB CA), [1996] N.B.J. No. 395, 181 N.B.R. (2d) 386 (C.A.); Fundy Linen Service Inc. v. New Brunswick (Workplace Health, Safety and Compensation Commission), [2009] N.B.J. No. 41, 2009 NBCA 13, 341 N.B.R. (2d) 286. Legal commentators have also recognized the power of the executive chair and the potential danger the chair's control over reappointments poses to the independence of individual adjudicators: Gus Van Harten et al., Administrative Law: Cases, Text, and Materials, 7th ed. (Toronto: Emond Publishing, 2015), at p. 529; Mullan, at pp. 343-44.

[53] Third, the Divisional Court correctly concluded that the review process lacked the appropriate procedural safeguards. The [page385] court stated that peer review processes must be accompanied by "robust protections to safeguard adjudicative independence": at para. 66. This is consistent with the trilogy: see Consolidated-Bathurst, at p. 341 S.C.R. One of the factors the court considered in this regard was the lack of a written policy protecting the adjudicator's right to decline a review. However, the Divisional Court considered other relevant factors in drawing its conclusion. At para. 28, it stressed that the procedure manual made no reference to the voluntariness of the peer review process and that there was an expectation that adjudicators subject their decisions to review. There was thus no evidence that the Tribunal had ever communicated to adjudicators that they were free to decline to participate in a review by the executive chair and considerable evidence tending to show that adjudicators were expected to participate in such a review.

[54] The Divisional Court's finding of a reasonable apprehension of a lack of independence was supported by the facts of this case. The Divisional Court found, based on the e-mails, that the adjudicator did make changes following the executive chair's comments: at para. 57. The Divisional Court further found that those changes were significant, as the executive chair believed they were important enough to justify further delay: at para. 61.

[55] In addition, the executive chair became involved without the adjudicator's consent. The Divisional Court appropriately gave weight to the fact that the executive chair imposed the review and the adjudicator was only informed of it after it took place. It considered this evidence cumulatively with the lack of a formal written policy to protect the adjudicator's right to decline to participate and the lack of evidence as to the nature of the changes stemming from the review.

[56] In summary, there is no basis for appellate interference with the Divisional Court's analysis of the issue of a reasonable apprehension of a lack of independence. In my view, that analysis is correct.

Disposition

[57] For the foregoing reasons, I would dismiss the appeal. On a new hearing before the LAT, Ms. Shuttleworth and Peel have agreed to rely only on evidence available at the time of the original hearing so no party would be in a better position.

[58] The parties have agreed on costs in the event Ms. Shuttleworth is successful. Those costs are fixed in the all-inclusive total sums of $2,500 against the LAT and SLASTO, and $6,250 against Peel.

Appeal dismissed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Right to be tried within reasonable time — Delay of more than four years between charges and end of trial — Whether accused's right to be tried within reasonable time under s. 11(b) of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms infringed — New framework for applying s. 11(b).

J was charged in December 2008 for his role in a dial-a-dope operation. His trial ended in February 2013. J brought an application under s. 11(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, seeking a stay of proceedings due to the delay. In dismissing the application, the trial judge applied the framework set out in R. v. Morin, 1992 CanLII 89 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 771. Ultimately, J was convicted. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal.

Held: The appeal should be allowed, the convictions set aside and a stay of proceedings entered.

Per Abella, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Côté and Brown JJ.: The delay was unreasonable and J's s. 11(b) Charter right was infringed. The Morin framework for applying s. 11(b) has given rise to both doctrinal and practical problems, contributing to a culture of delay and complacency towards it. Doctrinally, the Morin framework is too unpredictable, too confusing, and too complex. It has itself become a burden on already over-burdened trial courts. From a practical perspective, the Morin framework's after-the-fact rationalization of delay does not encourage participants in the justice system to take preventative measures to address inefficient practices and resourcing problems.

A new framework is therefore required for applying s. 11(b). This framework is intended to focus the s. 11(b) analysis on the issues that matter and encourage all participants in the criminal justice system to cooperate in achieving reasonably prompt justice, with a view to fulfilling s. 11(b)'s important objectives.

At the heart of this new framework is a presumptive ceiling beyond which delay — from the charge to the actual or anticipated end of trial — is presumed to be unreasonable, unless exceptional circumstances justify it. The presumptive ceiling is 18 months for cases tried in the provincial court, and 30 months for cases in the superior court (or cases tried in the provincial court after a preliminary inquiry). Delay attributable to or waived by the defence does not count towards the presumptive ceiling.

Once the presumptive ceiling is exceeded, the burden is on the Crown to rebut the presumption of unreasonableness on the basis of exceptional circumstances. If the Crown cannot do so, a stay will follow. Exceptional circumstances lie outside the Crown's control in that (1) they are reasonably unforeseen or reasonably unavoidable, and (2) they cannot reasonably be remedied.

It is obviously impossible to identify in advance all circumstances that may qualify as exceptional for the purposes of adjudicating a s. 11(b) application. Ultimately, the determination of whether circumstances are exceptional will depend on the trial judge's good sense and experience. The list is not closed. However, in general, exceptional circumstances fall under two categories: discrete events and particularly complex cases.

If the exceptional circumstance relates to a discrete event (such as an illness or unexpected event at trial), the delay reasonably attributable to that event is subtracted from the total delay. If the exceptional circumstance arises from the case's complexity, the delay is reasonable and no further analysis is required.

An exceptional circumstance is the only basis upon which the Crown can discharge its burden to justify a delay that exceeds the ceiling. The seriousness or gravity of the offence cannot be relied on, nor can chronic institutional delay. Most significantly, the absence of prejudice can in no circumstances be used to justify delays after the presumptive ceiling is breached. Once so much time has elapsed, only circumstances that are genuinely outside the Crown's control and ability to remedy may furnish a sufficient excuse for the prolonged delay.

Below the presumptive ceiling, however, the burden is on the defence to show that the delay is unreasonable. To do so, the defence must establish that (1) it took meaningful steps that demonstrate a sustained effort to expedite the proceedings, and (2) the case took markedly longer than it reasonably should have. Absent these two factors, the s. 11(b) application must fail. Stays beneath the presumptive ceiling should only be granted in clear cases.

As to the first factor, while the defence might not be able to resolve the Crown's or the trial court's challenges, it falls to the defence to show that it attempted to set the earliest possible hearing dates, was cooperative with and responsive to the Crown and the court, put the Crown on timely notice when delay was becoming a problem, and conducted all applications (including the s. 11(b) application) reasonably and expeditiously. At the same time, trial judges should not take this opportunity, with the benefit of hindsight, to question every decision made by the defence. The defence is required to act reasonably, not perfectly.

Turning to the second factor, the defence must show that the time the case has taken markedly exceeds the reasonable time requirements of the case. These requirements derive from a variety of factors, including the complexity of the case and local considerations. Determining the time the case reasonably should have taken is not a matter of precise calculation, as has been the practice under the Morin framework.

For cases currently in the system, a contextual application of the new framework is required to avoid repeating the post-Askov situation, where tens of thousands of charges were stayed as a result of the abrupt change in the law. Therefore, for those cases, the new framework applies, subject to two qualifications. First, for cases in which the delay exceeds the ceiling, a transitional exceptional circumstance may arise where the charges were brought prior to the release of this decision. This transitional exceptional circumstance will apply when the Crown satisfies the court that the time the case has taken is justified based on the parties' reasonable reliance on the law as it previously existed. This requires a contextual assessment, sensitive to the manner in which the previous framework was applied, and the fact that the parties' behaviour cannot be judged strictly, against a standard of which they had no notice.

The second qualification applies to cases currently in the system in which the total delay (minus defence delay) falls below the ceiling. For these cases, the two criteria — defence initiative and whether the time the case has taken markedly exceeds what was reasonably required — must also be applied contextually, sensitive to the parties' reliance on the previous state of the law. Specifically, the defence need not demonstrate having taken initiative to expedite matters for the period of delay preceding this decision. Since defence initiative was not expressly required by the Morin framework, it would be unfair to require it for the period of time before the release of this decision. Further, if the delay was occasioned by an institutional delay that was, before this decision was released, reasonably acceptable in the relevant jurisdiction under the Morin framework, that institutional delay will be a component of the reasonable time requirements of the case for cases currently in the system.

In this case, the total delay between the charges and the end of trial was 49.5 months. As the trial judge found, four months of this delay were waived by J when he changed counsel shortly before the trial was set to begin, necessitating an adjournment. In addition, one and a half months of the delay were caused solely by J for the adjournment of the preliminary inquiry because his counsel was unavailable for closing submissions on the last day. This leaves a remaining delay of 44 months, an amount that vastly exceeds the presumptive ceiling of 30 months in the superior court. The Crown has failed to discharge its burden of demonstrating that the delay of 44 months (excluding defence delay) was reasonable. While the case against J may have been moderately complex given the amount of evidence and the number of co-accused, it was not so exceptionally complex that it would justify such a delay.

Nor does the transitional exceptional circumstance justify the delay in this case. Since J's charges were brought prior to the release of this decision, the Crown was operating without notice of the new framework within a jurisdiction with some systemic delay issues. But a total delay of 44 months (excluding defence delay), of which the vast majority was either Crown or institutional delay, in an ordinary dial-a-dope trafficking prosecution is simply unreasonable regardless of the framework under which the Crown was operating. Therefore, it cannot be said that the Crown's reliance on the previous state of the law was reasonable. While the Crown did make some efforts to bring the matter to trial more quickly, these efforts were too little and too late. And the systemic delay problems that existed at the time cannot justify the delay either. Much of the institutional delay could have been avoided had the Crown proceeded on the basis of a more reasonable plan by more accurately estimating the amount of time needed to present its case. To the extent that the trial judge held that this delay was reasonable, he erred.

All the parties were operating within the culture of complacency towards delay that has pervaded the criminal justice system in recent years. Broader structural and procedural changes, in addition to day-to-day efforts, are required to maintain the public's confidence by delivering justice in a timely manner. Ultimately, all participants in the justice system must work in concert to achieve speedier trials. After all, everyone stands to benefit from these efforts. Timely trials are possible. More than that, they are constitutionally required.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Cromwell, Wagner and Gascon JJ.: This Court's jurisprudence for dealing with alleged breaches of s. 11(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms over the last 30 years supplies a clear answer to this appeal. Striking out in the completely new direction adopted by the majority is unnecessary. A reasonable time for trial under s. 11(b) cannot and should not be defined by numerical ceilings, as the majority concludes.

The right to be tried in a reasonable time is multi-factored, fact-sensitive, and case-specific; its application to specific cases is unavoidably complex. The relevant factors and general approach set out in R. v. Morin, 1992 CanLII 89 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 771, respond to these complexities. With modest adjustments to make the analysis more straightforward and with some additional clarification, a revised Morin framework will continue to ensure that the constitutional right of accused persons to be tried in a reasonable time is defined and applied in a way that appropriately balances the many relevant considerations. In order to do so, the Morin considerations should be regrouped under four main analytical steps.

First, the accused must establish that there is a basis for the s. 11(b) inquiry. The court should look to the overall period between the charge and the completion of the trial to determine whether its length merits further inquiry.

Second, the court must determine on an objective basis what would be a reasonable time for the disposition of a case like the one under review — that is, how long a case of this nature should reasonably take. The objective standard of reasonableness has two components: institutional delay and inherent time requirements of the case. Both of these periods of time are to be determined objectively. The acceptable period of institutional delay is the period that is reasonably required for the court to be ready to hear the case once the parties are ready to proceed, and is determined in accordance with the administrative guidelines for institutional delay set out by this Court in Morin: eight to ten months before the provincial courts and six to eight months before the superior courts. These guidelines set some rough limits on the point at which inadequacy of state resources will be accepted as an excuse. The guidelines should not be understood as precluding allowance for any sudden and temporary strain on resources that causes a temporary congestion in the courts. The inherent time requirements of a case, on the other hand, represent the period of time that is reasonably required for the parties to be ready to proceed and to conclude the trial for a case similar in nature to the one before the court, and are to be determined on the basis of judicial experience, supplemented by submissions of counsel and evidence. In estimating a reasonable time period, the court should also take into account the liberty interests of the accused.

Third, the court must consider how much of the actual delay in the case counts against the state. This is done by subtracting the periods attributable to the defence, including any waived time periods, from the overall period of delay. When the accused consents to a date for trial offered by the court or to an adjournment sought by the Crown, that consent, without more, does not amount to waiver. The onus is on the Crown to demonstrate that this period is waived, that is, that the accused's conduct reveals something more than mere acquiescence in the inevitable, and that it meets the high bar of being clear, unequivocal, and informed acceptance. Delay resulting from unreasonable actions solely attributable to the accused must also be subtracted from the period for which the state is responsible, such as last-minute changes in counsel or adjournments flowing from a lack of diligence. It is also necessary to subtract from the actual delay any periods that, although not fairly attributable to the defence, are nonetheless not fairly counted against the state, including unavoidable delays due to inclement weather or illness of a trial participant.

Fourth, the court must determine whether the actual period of time that fairly counts against the state exceeds the reasonable time by more than can be justified on any acceptable basis. Where the actual time exceeds what would have been reasonable for a case of that nature, the result will be a finding of unreasonable delay unless the Crown can show that the delay was justified. Even substantial excess delay may be justified and therefore reasonable where, for example, there is a particularly strong societal interest in the prosecution proceeding on its merits, or where the delay results from temporary and extraordinary pressures on counsel or the court system. However, it does not follow that in these conditions the excess period is invariably justified. The accused still may be able to demonstrate actual prejudice. Although actual prejudice need not be proved to find an infringement of s. 11(b), its presence would make unreasonable (in the particular circumstances of the case) a delay that might otherwise be objectively viewed as reasonable. As a result, justification may be found to be lacking.

Under this revised Morin framework, any delay in excess of the reasonable time requirements and any actual prejudice arising from the overall delay must be evaluated in light of societal interests: on one hand, fair treatment and prompt trial of accused persons and, on the other, determination of cases on their merits. If there are exceptionally strong societal interests in the prosecution of a case against an accused which substantially outweigh the societal interest and the interest of the accused person in prompt trials, these can serve as an acceptable basis upon which exceeding the inherent and institutional requirements of a case can be justified.

This approach is a slight reorientation of the Morin framework because the focus is more explicitly on the period of delay which exceeds what would have been reasonable. But there is no change in principle.

Applying these four steps of the revised Morin framework in this case, J's constitutional right to be tried within a reasonable time was violated. The 49.5-month delay from the charges to the end of the scheduled trial date is sufficient to trigger an inquiry into whether the delay is unreasonable. There were 10.5 months of inherent delay and 18 months of institutional delay. These findings make it appropriate to conclude that the reasonable time requirements for a case of this nature were 28.5 months. The case in fact took 49.5 months. The difference is 21 months. Of that, 4 months are attributable to the defence. The rest — a period of 17 months — counts against the state. In other words, this case took almost a year and a half longer than what would be a reasonable period to prosecute a case of this nature. This is not a close case. The time to the end of trial greatly exceeds what would be a reasonable time to prosecute a similar case. While there are societal interests in the trial on the merits of the serious drug crimes alleged against J, these cannot make reasonable the grossly excessive time that it took society to bring him to trial.

In contrast, the majority's new framework is not an appropriate approach to interpreting and applying the s. 11(b) right, for several reasons. First, the new approach reduces reasonableness to numerical ceilings. Reasonableness cannot be judicially defined with precision or captured by a number. As well, the majority's judicially created ceilings largely uncouple the right to be tried within a reasonable time from the bedrock constitutional requirement of reasonableness, which is the core of the right.

Moreover, this approach unjustifiably diminishes the right to be tried within a reasonable time. When the elapsed time is below the ceiling, an accused would have to show not only that the case took markedly longer than it reasonably should have but also that he or she took meaningful steps that demonstrate a sustained effort to expedite the proceedings. This requirement has no bearing on whether the delay was unreasonable.

The majority's approach also exceeds the proper role of the Court. Creating fixed or presumptive ceilings is a task better left to legislatures. The ceilings place new limits on the exercise of the s. 11(b) right to a trial within a reasonable time for reasons of administrative efficiency that have nothing to do with whether the delay in a given case was or was not excessive. This is inconsistent with the judicial role.

As well, the ceilings have no support in the record in this case. What evidence there is in the record suggests that it would be unwise to establish these sorts of ceilings. For the vast majority of cases, the ceilings are so high that they risk being meaningless. They are unlikely to address the culture of delay that is said to exist and are more likely to feed such a culture.

the Attorney General and Minister of Justice (or a person authorized by him or her) to make decisions which infringe upon the administrative independence of the Alberta Provincial Court.

266 Section 13(1)(a) confers the power to "designate the place at which a judge shall have his residence". Counsel for the appellant rightly points out that it is reasonable (although not necessary) to vest responsibility for designating the residence of judges with the executive, because that decision concerns the proper allocation of court resources. However, my concern is that, as it is presently worded, s. 13(1)(a) creates the reasonable apprehension that it could be used to punish judges whose decisions do not favour the government, or alternatively, to favour judges whose decisions benefit the government. Section 13(1)(a)'s constitutional defect lies in the fact that it is not limited to the initial appointment of judges. The appellant tried to demonstrate that s. 13(1)(a), when properly interpreted, was so confined. However, the words of the provision are not qualified in the manner in which the appellant suggests. Section 13(1)(a) authorizes the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General to designate a judge's place of residence at any time, including his initial appointment or afterward. It therefore violates s. 11(d) of the Charter.

267 Section 13(1)(b) is also unconstitutional. It confers the power to "designate the day or days on which the Court shall hold sittings". This provision violates s. 11(d) because it flies in the face of explicit language in Valente, supra, at p. 709, which held that the administrative independence of the judiciary, encompasses, inter alia, "sittings of the court".

268 I do, however, wish to make one further comment in respect of this issue. The strongest argument made by the appellant in favour of the constitutionality of s. 13(1)(b) is that giving the executive control over sitting days enables the executive to give specific dates to defendants for their first appearance in criminal proceedings. The implication of this argument is that judicial control of the dates of court sittings would preclude the establishment of a system to inform defendants when they must first appear. This argument, however, is incorrect, because it ignores the fact that the courts can and should coordinate their sitting days with the relevant government authorities.

C. Manitoba: The Closing of the Provincial Court

269 One of the issues raised at trial in the Manitoba case, and pursued on appeal, is whether the Government of Manitoba infringed the administrative independence of the Manitoba Provincial Court by effectively shutting down those courts on a number of days known as "Filmon Fridays". The trial judge made a specific finding of fact that control over sitting days had remained with the judiciary, largely because the Chief Judge had been consulted on the withdrawal of court staff, and because the government had assured the Chief Judge that had she decided that the Provincial Court would remain open on those days, adequate staff would have been provided.

270 However, a careful perusal of the record has led me to conclude that Scollin J. made an overriding and palpable error in making this factual finding. The record shows that the government effectively shut down the Manitoba Provincial Court by ordering the withdrawal of court staff several days before the Chief Judge announced the closing of the Manitoba Provincial Court. As well, the government also shut down the courts by rescheduling trials involving accused persons who had already been remanded by the court. These acts constituted a violation of the administrative independence of the Manitoba Provincial Court. Moreover, even if Scollin J. were correct in finding that the Chief Judge had retained control throughout, I would nevertheless find that there had been a violation of s. 11(d), because it was not within her constitutional authority unilaterally to shut down the Manitoba Provincial Court.

271 The chronology of events illustrates how it was the executive, not the judiciary, that shut down the Manitoba Provincial Court. Bill 22 was enacted on July 27, 1993. Section 4 of the Bill conferred the power on public sector employers, including the province of Manitoba, to require employees to take days of leave without pay. It appears that the government used s. 4 to order its employees to take 10 unpaid days of leave in 1993, and on these days, the Provincial Court of Manitoba, with the exception of one adult custody docket court and one youth custody docket court, was closed down.

272 However, the events which concern me here transpired in the spring of 1994. On March 1, 1994, letters were sent from the Manitoba Civil Service Commission to the Crown Attorneys of Manitoba Association, the Legal Aid Lawyers' Association, and the Manitoba Government Employees' Union. These letters gave these groups notice that they would be required to take 10 unpaid days of leave, pursuant to Bill 22. The dates for the unpaid days of leave were announced by the Assistant Deputy Minister, Marvin Bruce, on March 24, 1994:

> 2. Office closures will be on 7 Fridays in the summer months commencing July 8, 1994 to and including August 19, 1994 and 3 days during Christmas time, that is, December 28, 29 and 30th, 1994.

Almost two weeks passed before a memorandum was sent from Chief Judge Webster to all members of the Manitoba Provincial Court on April 6, 1994. Her memorandum states in full:

> Further to my memo of March 24th, the following 10 days have been designated as reduced work week days:
>
> July 8, 15, 22, 29; August 5, 12, 19; December 28, 29, 30.
>
> During the 10 days on which the government offices are closed ALL PROVINCIAL COURTS will be closed with the exception of the two custody courts:
>
> -One at 408 York
> -One at the Manitoba Youth Centre.

The days on which the Provincial Court were closed was identical to the days on which the Manitoba government required its employees to take unpaid days of leave.

273 These facts clearly demonstrate that the decision to withdraw court staff was taken almost two weeks before the Chief Judge ordered the closure of the Manitoba Provincial Court. As well, the court was closed on the same days as the unpaid days of leave for court staff. Moreover, it is the uncontroverted evidence of Judge Linda Giesbrecht, which was presented at trial, that the Manitoba Provincial Court could not function "without the assistance and presence of Courts' staff including Court clerks, Crown Attorneys, Legal Aid lawyers and Sheriff's officers and other administrative personnel". The only conclusion I can draw is that the government, through its decision of March 24, 1994, effectively forced Chief Judge Webster to close the Manitoba Provincial Court by her decision of April 6, 1994.

274 I reject the argument that the government would have provided the necessary staff to keep the Manitoba Provincial Court open if the Chief Judge had so requested. Although it had apparently made this offer in conversations with the Chief Judge before the closure was announced, the letter from Marvin Bruce announcing the dates of closure makes no reference to the possibility of staff being required on days designated as unpaid days of leave. Moreover, this conclusion is strengthened by the fact that Crown attorneys rescheduled trials that were set to be held on "Filmon Fridays" before Chief Judge Webster announced the closure of the Manitoba Provincial Court. In particular, the record indicates that on March 22, 1994, a trial scheduled for Friday, July 8, 1994, was moved to September 28, 1994, on the motion of a Crown attorney.

275 Even if the trial judge had been right to conclude that the Chief Judge retained control over the decision to close the Manitoba Provincial Court throughout, there would nevertheless have been a violation of s. 11(d), because the Chief Judge would have exceeded her constitutional authority when she made that decision. As this Court held in Valente, control over the sittings of the court falls within the administrative independence of the judiciary. And as I indicated above, administrative independence is a characteristic of judicial independence which normally has a collective or institutional dimension. It attaches to the court as a whole. Although certain decisions may be exercised on behalf of the judiciary by the Chief Judge, it is important to remember that the Chief Judge is no more than "primus inter pares": Ruffo v. Conseil de la magistrature, 1995 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 267, at para. 59. Important decisions regarding administrative independence cannot be made by the Chief Judge alone. In my opinion, the decision to close the Manitoba Provincial Court is precisely this kind of decision.

276 In conclusion, the closure of the Manitoba Provincial Court on "Filmon Fridays" violated s. 11(d) of the Charter. Since s. 4 of Bill 22 authorized the withdrawal of court staff on "Filmon Fridays", and hence enabled the government to close the Manitoba Provincial Court on those days, that provision is therefore unconstitutional. It is worth emphasizing that s. 4 cannot be read down in such a precise way so as not to authorize conduct which violates the Charter. Although reading down the impugned legislation to the extent strictly necessary would be the normal solution in a case like this (Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038), this is very difficult in relation to violations of s. 11(d) because, unlike other Charter provisions, it requires that judicial independence be secured by "objective conditions or guarantees" (Valente, supra, at p. 685). Objective guarantees are the means by which the reasonable perception of independence is secured and, hence, any legislative provision which does not contain those objective guarantees is unconstitutional. In effect, then, to read down the legislation to its proper scope would amount to reading in those objective conditions and guarantees. This would result in a fundamental rewriting of the legislation. On the other hand, if the Court were to strike down the legislation in its entirety, the effect would be to prevent its application to all those employees of the Government of Manitoba who were required to take leave without pay. In the circumstances, the best solution would be to read down the legislation so that it

The appellant is a judge of the Court of Québec, Youth Division, noted for her many public statements. In 1988, the director general of a social services centre filed a complaint against her with the Conseil de la magistrature (the "Conseil") alleging that she had committed a number of breaches of the Judicial Code of Ethics. The Conseil designated one of its members to examine the complaint. After hearing the appellant's and the complainant's versions of the events, he recommended that the Conseil hold an inquiry into the complaint. The Conseil set up a Comité d'enquête. At the conclusion of its inquiry, this Comité concluded that the Code of Ethics had been breached and a majority of the members recommended that the Conseil reprimand the appellant. Despite the Conseil's reprimand, the appellant continued her public activities and statements. The Chief Judge of the Court of Québec then laid his own complaint against the appellant with the Conseil, in which he alleged that the appellant had acted in a manner inconsistent with the Code of Ethics, in particular by breaching her duty to act in a reserved manner and uphold the independence of the judiciary. The Conseil itself ruled on the admissibility of this complaint without hearing the parties and set up a Comité d'enquête made up of five members, including three Court of Québec judges. The Chief Judge did not participate in this session, at the conclusion of which the Conseil called the appellant to a subsequent meeting in order to hear her views on whether she should be suspended for the duration of the inquiry. At that meeting the Conseil denied the appellant's request for an adjournment in order to urge preliminary exceptions asking for the dismissal of the complaint and raising the lack of jurisdiction of the Conseil and the Comité over the case, concluding that it did not have to reconsider jurisdictional issues on which it had already ruled at its meeting on the admissibility of the complaint. The appellant then filed a motion in evocation with the Superior Court, in which she argued that the Conseil and Comité members did not have the necessary impartiality to make a fair and equitable decision concerning her. She further argued that ss. 263 and 265 of the Courts of Justice Act ("CJA"), if they are to be interpreted as authorizing the Chief Judge of the Court of Québec to lodge a complaint with the Conseil, violate the rights guaranteed by s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and s. 23 of the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms. The Superior Court dismissed the motion. The Court of Appeal affirmed this judgment in a majority decision. Before this Court, the appellant made the same arguments. She also argued that s. 8 of the Code of Ethics, which provides that judges of the Court of Québec should act in a reserved manner, violates s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter and is void on the ground of vagueness.

Held (Sopinka J. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin and Iacobucci JJ.: The right to be tried by an independent and impartial tribunal is an integral part of the principles of fundamental justice protected by s. 7 of the Canadian Charter, and the constitutional guarantee of an independent and impartial tribunal includes the concept of institutional impartiality. The protection provided by s. 7 is essentially the same as is provided by s. 23 of the Quebec Charter. In the present case, ss. 263 and 265 CJA do not violate the rights guaranteed by ss. 7 and 23.

Sections 263 and 265 CJA authorize the Chief Judge of the Court of Québec to lay a complaint with the Conseil against a judge of his court. Under s. 248(a) CJA the Chief Judge is the chairman of the Conseil, and ss. 263 and 265 provide that any person may lodge a complaint with the Conseil, including a member of the Conseil, although a member cannot participate in the examination of the complaint in such a case. The key role given to the Chief Judge in ethical matters under s. 96(3) CJA is simply the expression of a reality that is consistent with general practice and gradual developments over time. The supervisory powers of chief judges over ethics are inherent in the exercise of their functions. In view of the Chief Judge's preferred position, the power to lay a complaint for a breach of the Code of Ethics is therefore an intrinsic part of his responsibility as Chief Judge.

As regards institutional impartiality, it cannot be concluded from an examination of the powers conferred on the Chief Judge of the Court of Québec by the CJA that they might compromise the impartiality of members of the Conseil or the Comité d'enquête in dealing with a complaint lodged by the Chief Judge. These powers are largely administrative in nature and as such are not liable to compromise the impartiality of Conseil or Comité members in dealing with a complaint.

The Conseil is responsible for receiving and examining complaints lodged by any person against a judge for failure to comply with the Code of Ethics and, if an inquiry is necessary, it establishes a Comité d'enquête for that purpose consisting of five persons chosen from among its members. Under the Code of Ethics, these members must perform this function in an impartial manner. When the inquiry is completed, the Comité submits its recommendations to the Conseil. Proceedings before the Comité are not similar to an adversarial trial. The complainant is not a prosecutor on whom the burden of proof lies. Rather, the Comité's inquiry is intended to be the expression of purely investigative functions and, in light of this, the actual conduct of the case is the responsibility not of the parties but of the Comité itself. The complaint is merely what sets the process in motion. It does not initiate litigation, which means that, where the Conseil decides to conduct an inquiry after examining a complaint lodged by one of its members, the Comité does not thereby become both judge and party: its primary role is to search for the truth. The concept of "party" at a Comité hearing does not change the essence of the institution in question. Where the Chief Judge makes use of the disciplinary process by taking the initiative of laying a complaint, there is therefore no reason to think that the Conseil and its Comité do not, in the eyes of a reasonable and well-informed observer, have the impartiality required to carry out their duties. The Chief Judge's authority under the CJA is essentially administrative and his moral authority, which is naturally associated with his status and functions, is not restrictive and is part of the context in which all judges perform their duties. This moral authority does not in itself affect the capacity of a judge to decide to the best of his or her knowledge and belief and on the basis of the relevant factors. Finally, the existence of a friendly relationship between the Chief Judge and the members of the Conseil and the Comité d'enquête is not liable to compromise their impartiality. Such an assertion has no legal basis and challenges the dignity and professionalism of the judiciary and its Conseil.

With respect to case-by-case impartiality, a reasonable and well-informed observer would not apprehend in this case that the Conseil was unable to make an impartial decision. The main reason for the Chief Judge's complaint was a general concern with the threat that the appellant's overall conduct represented to judicial institutions and the public's respect for them. The fact that the Chief Judge chose to rely on documents from the same "media monitoring services" agency that had already provided documents to support the first complaint laid against the appellant does not indicate any sort of collusion. There is no reason that the same documents could not be used for separate purposes. The appellant's general conduct was not in issue in the context of the first complaint.

As regards the issue of the Conseil's precipitous conduct, its decision to depart from the usual procedure by not appointing an examiner at the initial stage of examining the complaint cannot be seen as evidence of bias. The purpose of appointing an examiner, which is not mandatory, is solely to assess whether there are grounds for an inquiry. In the present case, such an assessment was made possible not only by the extensive information provided by the Chief Judge in support of his complaint, but also by the fact that most of the information submitted to the Conseil was already in the public domain. Moreover, in this case the duty to act fairly did not mean the appellant had to be given the opportunity to express her views during the initial examination of the complaint, despite the possible consequences of the decision to hold an inquiry concerning her. The appointment of an examiner is the first step in a procedure that can itself be described as preliminary, since after the formal inquiry the Conseil and the Comité can of their own initiative only reprimand the judge concerned or recommend that removal proceedings be initiated. Finally, the hearing on the suspension of the appellant did not indicate any precipitous conduct that might give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of the Conseil members. The Conseil was already aware of certain facts that could prima facie have justified a suspension during the proceedings, and the nature of the complaint put directly in issue the appellant's ability to act with the confidence of the parties and to continue to carry out her duties in a manner consistent with public order. By inviting the appellant within the 30-day period provided for by the CJA for beginning the inquiry, the Conseil gave itself enough time to make an informed decision on suspension before the inquiry began.

The complaint's tone and language must be assessed on the basis of the specific nature of the complaint, which focuses on an overall situation involving both a judge's conduct and the public's possible perception thereof. Because of the general nature of the duty to act in a reserved manner, it was necessary for the complainant to specify and explain the relevant aspects that he felt might impair the appellant's ability to perform her duties. Although the complaint resembles an indictment because of its categorical tone, the complainant cannot be criticized for setting out facts and conduct that were the matter to be assessed by the Comité d'enquête. The complaint could have been worded more neutrally, but it cannot be said that it made accusations based on supposed intentions. The Chief Judge's concerns related not to illegitimate intentions but to activities and the public's perception of them. There is accordingly no reason to fear that Comité members would be influenced by the language of the complaint or the particular status of its author. The Chief Judge's position carries with it no, or very little, direct authority and his moral authority would be harmful only if it led the decision maker to adopt opinions it did not share. The Comité is for the most part made up of judicial professionals who are bound by an oath and whose functions essentially require them to be able to decide dispassionately between positions that are opposed and fervently defended.

Since the Comité d'enquête has not yet had an opportunity to hear the merits of the case, it appears premature for this Court to rule on the constitutionality of s. 8 of the Code of Ethics, which establishes the duty of judges appointed under the CJA to act in a reserved manner, under s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter in a context in which no evidence has been adduced and no light can be shed on the issue by lower court judgments. There is no reason, however, to find that the duty to act in a reserved manner is void on the ground of vagueness. More precision cannot be required of ethical rules than their subject matter allows. The general nature of the duty to act in a reserved manner as it is worded does not, as far as substance is concerned, mean that an area of risk is not sufficiently delineated or that there is no adequate basis for legal debate.

Per Sopinka J. (dissenting): For the reasons given by Gonthier J., ss. 263 and 265 CJA do not violate the principles of judicial impartiality and independence guaranteed by s. 7 of the Canadian Charter. It is also premature for the Court to rule at this stage on the constitutionality of s. 8 of the Code of Ethics. Although this section is not void for vagueness, it is open to very broad interpretation. Before determining whether it imposes an unreasonable limitation on freedom of expression, it would be preferable to know how it will be interpreted by the Conseil or the Comité d'enquête.

Under the CJA, the Conseil receives and deals with complaints made against judges. Although the legislative framework does not violate the principle of judicial independence and in this sense has no inherent bias, the situation is one which approaches the threshold of tolerance. An appearance of bias may result in some circumstances even though the process followed is consistent with the statutory rules. The Chief Judge's power to file a complaint places the Conseil and the Comité d'enquête close to the edge of the fine line that separates impartiality and partiality.

When the Chief Judge's complaint in this case is analysed in a general context, a number of factors, including the tone and language of the complaint, when taken together raise a reasonable apprehension of bias. The chairman of the Conseil for the second complaint was the dissenting member of the Comité d'enquête formed to examine the first complaint, who had recommended that removal proceedings be initiated. A significant part of the Chief Judge's complaint referred to the appellant's disregard of this Comité's decision recommending that she be reprimanded: all the members of the Comité d'enquête set up to hear the second complaint were members of the Conseil which approved this decision. A majority of this new Comité was also made up of judges of the Court of Québec. Although the Comité d'enquête agreed to appoint counsel to handle the presentation of evidence against the appellant, this placed the parties in a rather unusual situation where the opponent of the person defending herself against the complaint was the tribunal's counsel. Moreover, the proceedings which followed the filing of the second complaint indicate unwarranted haste. Whether or not the stage of preliminary examination of a complaint is mandatory, the Conseil's decision to bypass it gives the impression that it dealt with the Chief Judge's complaint as evidence and not merely as an allegation. At the hearing to determine whether the appellant should be suspended during the inquiry, the Conseil refused to hear her on such a serious matter as the jurisdiction of the Conseil and Comité on the ground that it had already ruled on this matter ex parte and proprio motu at the meeting of the Conseil at which it had ruled on the admissibility of the complaint. The 30-day period set out in the CJA for beginning the inquiry cannot explain this precipitous conduct, since this period relates simply to the calling of the parties and not the presentation of evidence. Finally, the Chief Judge's complaint is more in the nature of a judgment. It contains both opinions and conclusions expressed with considerable vehemence. The Comité's proceedings are not primarily in the nature of an inquiry, since it may make an official reprimand and may even recommend that removal proceedings be instituted. In short, although the members of the Comité harboured no prejudices against the appellant, when all the circumstances surrounding this matter are considered a well-informed person would have a reasonable apprehension of bias.

INDEXED AS: CANADIAN JUDICIAL COUNCIL V. GIROUARD

Federal Court of Appeal, Pelletier, de Montigny and Gleason JJ.A.—Ottawa, May 3 and 16, 2019.

Judges and Courts — Appeal from Federal Court decision dismissing Canadian Judicial Council's (Council or appellant) motions to strike applications for judicial review filed by respondent Honourable Justice Michel Girouard (Justice Girouard) — Underlying applications covering various decisions made by Council during inquiries conducted under Judges Act (Act), ss. 63 et seq. regarding Justice Girouard's conduct, particularly Council's report recommending removal thereof to Minister of Justice (Minister) — Council essentially arguing Council's reports, recommendations, decisions made in course of inquiry by inquiry committee not subject to judicial review under Federal Courts Act (FCA), s. 18.1, Council simply not "federal board, commission or other tribunal" within meaning of FCA, s. 2 — Justice Girouard appointed to Superior Court of Quebec in 2010 — In 2012, complaint filed with Council against Justice Girouard — Review Committee established to consider complaint, then, inquiry committee established for considering complaint — First inquiry committee rejecting all allegations against Justice Girouard — Then, joint complaint filed with Council regarding Justice Girouard's conduct in first disciplinary proceeding — Complaint triggering mandatory inquiry, leading to establishment of new inquiry committee — Second inquiry committee concluding Justice Girouard incapacitated or disabled from due execution of office of judge by reason of misconduct during first disciplinary process, Council adopting findings of second inquiry committee — Justice Girouard applying for judicial review of recommendation made by Council — Council filing motion to strike application as well as number of other applications filed in course of two inquiries — Federal Court dismissing Council's motions to strike — Federal Court concluding Council, its inquiry committees federal boards, commissions or other tribunals under FCA, s. 2 — Federal Court also rejecting idea Act, ss. 63(4)(a), (b) grant Council superior court status, Council's claims its reports, recommendations not reviewable decisions under FCA, s. 18 — Whether Council, its inquiry committees federal boards, commissions or other tribunals subject to Federal Court's jurisdiction with respect to judicial review, whether Council's reports, recommendations reviewable decisions — Two-step test to determine whether body "federal board, commission or other tribunal" within meaning of FCA, s. 2 applied — Federal Court correct to conclude only source of powers of Council, its committees Act, at ss. 60(2)(c), (d), 63(1), (4) — Had Parliament not adopted Act, Council would simply not exist — Council's investigative power strictly statutory — Federal Court correct in concluding power exercised by Council "over the conduct of judges and certain public servants holding office during good behaviour is investigative in nature", "power of inquiry" — Appellant's argument its members exercise judicial functions rejected — Mere fact procedural safeguards required in specific process does not mean process necessarily results from exercise by decision maker of judicial power immune from review under FCA, s. 18.1 — With respect to exception relating to Constitution Act, 1867, s. 96, Federal Court correct in concluding judges sit on Council in their capacity as chief justices, role "administrative in nature", rather than as judges drawing their powers from Constitution Act, 1867, s. 96 — As for Act, s. 63(4), deeming provision, Federal Court coming to well-founded conclusion appellant's interpretation of provision could not be accepted — In case at hand, every indication Act provides Council, its committees "deemed" superior court strictly for purposes of inquiry or investigation — Regarding independence, efficiency, rule of law, since Council administrative decision maker exercising powers conferred on Council by ordinary statute, not surprising Federal Court can review legality of Council's decisions on judicial review — In short, clear Council, its inquiry committees included in definition of "federal board, commission or other tribunal" in FCA, s. 2 — Neither Council nor its committees among persons or bodies expressly excluded from scope of definition — With respect to whether Council's reports, recommendations reviewable decisions, appellant's argument involving general principle that application for judicial review cannot be brought where conduct attacked fails to affect legal rights, impose legal obligations or cause prejudicial effects — Federal Court holding finding "a judge has become incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of his or her office amounting to 'capital punishment' for that judge's career" — Insofar as Minister of Justice cannot, under Act, ask Parliament to remove judge without inquiry by Council, its inquiry committee, Federal Court determining report, its conclusions have major impact on rights, interests of judge under investigation — Full agreement herein with Federal Court's findings in this regard — Appeal dismissed.

This was an appeal from a Federal Court decision dismissing the Canadian Judicial Council's (the Council or the appellant) motions to strike the applications for judicial review filed by the respondent, the Honourable Justice Michel Girouard (Justice Girouard). The underlying applications covered various decisions made by the Council during inquiries conducted under sections 63 et seq. of the Judges Act (the Act), regarding Justice Girouard's conduct, particularly the Council's report recommending his removal to the Minister of Justice (the Minister). The Council essentially argued that its reports and recommendations, as well as decisions made in the course of an inquiry by an inquiry committee, are not subject to judicial review under section 18.1 of the Federal Courts Act (FCA). It claimed that it simply is not a “federal board, commission or other tribunal” within the meaning of section 2 of the FCA.

Justice Girouard was appointed to the Superior Court of Quebec in September 2010. In November 2012, a complaint was filed with the Council after a video was sent to the Chief Justice of the Superior Court at the time. According to the complaint, the video showed a transaction involving an illicit substance between Justice Girouard, then a lawyer, and one of his clients at the time. In 2013, the Council established a review committee to consider the complaint and have a preliminary inquiry conducted by outside counsel. The review committee concluded that, if the allegations were substantiated, they would be serious enough to warrant the removal of Justice Girouard. In 2014, the Council constituted, in accordance with subsection 63(3) of the Act, an inquiry committee responsible for considering the complaint received. The first inquiry committee said it was unable to conclude that the exchange captured on video involved an illicit substance and therefore rejected all of the allegations against Justice Girouard. The Council subsequently accepted the recommendations of the first inquiry committee in that regard. In 2016, the Minister and the Minister of Justice of Quebec filed a joint complaint to the Council regarding Justice Girouard’s conduct in the first disciplinary proceeding. This complaint triggered the mandatory inquiry under subsection 63(1) of the Act. It also consequently led to the establishment of a new inquiry committee. The second inquiry committee submitted its report, which concluded that Justice Girouard had become incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of the office of judge by reason of the misconduct of which he had been found guilty during the inquiry of the first inquiry committee. Then, a majority of the Council judges adopted the findings of the second inquiry committee and concluded that Justice Girouard had become incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of the office of judge. Justice Girouard applied for judicial review of the recommendation made by the majority of the Council. This proceeding was in addition to a number of other applications filed over the course of the two inquiries against various decisions made by inquiry committees and the decision of the two ministers of Justice to file a complaint with the Council. In response, the Council filed a motion to strike the applications for judicial review in question.

The Federal Court dismissed the Council’s motions to strike. It found that the Council and its inquiry committee were federal boards, commissions or other tribunals under section 2 of the FCA. According to the Court, the Council’s investigative powers do not derive from the Constitution, but from the Act. In addition, these powers belong to the Council as an institution, not to the chief justices individually because of their status. The Federal Court also rejected the idea that paragraphs 63(4)(a) and (b) of the Act grant the Council superior court status. Finally, the Court rejected the Council’s claims that the Council’s reports and recommendations are not reviewable decisions under section 18 of the FCA.

The issues in the appeal were whether the Council and its inquiry committees are federal boards, commissions or other tribunals subject to the Federal Court’s jurisdiction with respect to judicial review and whether the Council’s reports and recommendations are reviewable decisions.

Held, the appeal should be dismissed.

To determine whether a body is a “federal board, commission or other tribunal” within the meaning of section 2 of the FCA, the Court developed a two-step test. According to Anisman v. Canada (Border Services Agency), the Court must determine “what jurisdiction or power” the body seeks to exercise and then “what is the source or the origin” of that jurisdiction or power. The Federal Court was quite correct to conclude that the only source of the powers of the Council and its committees is the Act, notably paragraphs 60(2)(c) and (d) and subsections 63(1) and 63(4). Had the Act not been adopted by Parliament, the Council would simply not exist. In summary, the Council’s investigative power is strictly statutory. This means that if the Act were to be repealed, the Council and, certainly, the chief justices would not be empowered to conduct inquiries or investigations, summon witnesses and compel them to give evidence during these investigations or inquiries.

As to the nature of the powers, the Federal Court was right to conclude that the power exercised by the Council “over the conduct of judges and certain public servants holding office during good behaviour is investigative in nature”, that it is a “power of inquiry”. Paragraph 60(2)(c) of the Act, from which the Council derives its jurisdiction in this case, very clearly grants it the power to “make the inquiries and the investigation of complaints or allegations described in section 63 [of the Act]”. The arguments put forth by the appellant did not show that the Federal Court was mistaken in concluding, as it did, that the role given to the Council by the Act is dissimilar to the role that a judge can play in a court of law. It follows that the appellant's position that its members' powers are "judicial in nature" and that, as such, the exercise of such powers is not subject to judicial review must be rejected.

The appellant's argument that its members exercise judicial functions was rejected. The mere fact that procedural safeguards are required in a specific process does not mean that the process necessarily results from the exercise by the decision maker of a judicial power immune from a review under section 18.1 of the FCA.

With respect to the exception relating to section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867, the Federal Court was correct in concluding that judges sit on the Council in their capacity as chief justices, a role that is "administrative in nature", rather than as judges drawing their powers from section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. The Council's jurisdiction and powers concerning judicial ethics are conferred on it by the Act.

As for subsection 63(4) of the Act, the deeming provision, the Federal Court came to the well-founded conclusion that the appellant's interpretation of this provision could not be accepted. In the case at hand, there was every indication that it is strictly for the purposes of inquiry or investigation that the Act provides that the Council and its committees are "deemed" to be a superior court. This section must not be interpreted in a manner that transforms the Council into a superior court or grants it all the attributes of a superior court.

Regarding independence, efficiency and the rule of law, since the Council is an administrative decision maker exercising powers conferred on it by an ordinary statute, it is not surprising that the legality of its decisions can be reviewed by the Federal Court on judicial review. The issue of whether a superior court judge should be removed is, and will remain, within the jurisdiction of the Council and, ultimately, of the Senate and the House of Commons. The sole task of the Federal Court, on judicial review, will be to verify the legality of the decisions made by the Council and respect for procedural fairness. In doing so, it has to accord the Council all the deference that its status as a specialized decision maker requires.

In short, it is clear that the Council and its inquiry committees are included in the definition of "federal board, commission or other tribunal" in section 2 of the FCA. They are the creation of an Act of Parliament, that is, the Judges Act, and neither the Council nor its committees is among the persons or bodies expressly excluded from the scope of the definition. While some members of the Council are judges appointed under section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867, they do not exercise a judicial function when they sit on the Council; they therefore do not fall within the express exclusion set out in section 2 of the FCA.

With respect to whether the Council's reports and recommendations are reviewable decisions, the appellant's argument involved the general principle that an application for judicial review cannot be brought where the conduct attacked fails to affect legal rights, impose legal obligations or cause prejudicial effects. The Federal Court held that a finding that "a judge has become incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of his or her office amounts to 'capital punishment' for that judge's career". Insofar as the Minister of Justice cannot, under the Act, ask Parliament to remove a judge without an inquiry by the Council and its inquiry committee, the Federal Court determined that the report and its conclusions have a major impact on the rights and interests of the judge under investigation. The mere fact that the decision takes the form of a recommendation is not determinative, especially since the case law clearly acknowledges that a matter other than a decision or order may be reviewed under section 18.1 of the FCA. There was full agreement herein with the Federal Court's findings in this regard.

The following is the English version of the reasons for judgment rendered by

THE COURT:

I. OVERVIEW

[1] The Canadian Judicial Council (the Council or the appellant) is appealing the Federal Court judgment (the Honourable Justice Noël), rendered on August 29, 2018, [Girouard v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 FC 865, [2019] 1 F.C.R. 404] (the Decision), dismissing its motions to strike the applications for judicial review filed by the Honourable Justice Michel Girouard (Justice Girouard). The underlying applications cover various decisions made by the Council during inquiries conducted under sections 63 et seq. of the Judges Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. J-1 (the Act), regarding Justice Girouard's conduct, particularly the Council's report recommending his removal to the Minister of Justice (the Minister).

[2] The Council essentially argues that its reports and recommendations, as well as decisions made in the course of an inquiry by an inquiry committee, are not subject to judicial review under section 18.1 of the Federal Courts Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. F-7 (FCA). It claims that it simply is not a "federal board, commission or other tribunal" within the meaning of section 2 of that statute.

[3] For the reasons set out below, the appeal will be dismissed, without costs.

II. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

A. General legal framework

[4] Subsection 99(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867, 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3 (U.K.) (as am. by Canada Act 1982, 1982, c. 11 (U.K.), Schedule to the Constitution Act, 1982, Item 1) [R.S.C., 1985, Appendix II, No. 5] (CA 1867) provides that the judges of the superior courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons. In 1971, Parliament created the Council through amendments to the Act and conferred on it the power to investigate complaints against federally appointed judges.

[5] Section 63 of the Act provides two circumstances in which the Council can investigate the conduct of a federally appointed judge: at the request of the Minister of Justice or the attorney general of a province (subsection 63(1) of the Act), or following receipt of any complaint or allegation made in respect of a judge of a superior court (subsection 63(2) of the Act). The procedure differs somewhat depending on the subsection under which the process is initiated.

[6] In both cases, an inquiry committee, composed of an uneven number of members, can be called to look into the conduct of a given judge. If the committee includes members of the bar of a province appointed by the Minister, the majority of the members of the committee must be Council members (see subsection 63(3) of the Act and section 3 of the Canadian Judicial Council Inquiries and Investigations By-laws, 2015, SOR/2015-203 (the By-laws)). The powers of an inquiry committee are set out in subsection 63(4) of the Act. The inquiry committee hears the evidence concerning the complaints or allegations and, under section 8 of the By-laws, submits to the Council a report in which it sets out the findings of the inquiry. This report contains findings of fact and conclusions of the committee as to whether or not a recommendation should be made for the judge's removal.

[7] The Council then examines the allegations and makes a decision on their merit. In order to perform this task, sections 10 and 11 of the By-laws provide that the Council shall be made up of at least 17 members of the Council who did not participate in the inquiry process and who are not of the same court as that of the judge who is the subject of the inquiry or investigation. It is then up to the Committee to determine whether the judge in respect of whom an inquiry or investigation has been made has become incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of the office of judge. In that respect, it should be noted that the Chairperson of the Council, that is, the Chief Justice of Canada, does not participate in deliberations in matters involving the conduct of judges.

[8] Section 65 of the Act states that, after an inquiry or investigation has been completed, the Council shall report its conclusions and submit the record of the inquiry or investigation to the Minister. The Council's inquiry report contains a recommendation as to whether or not the judge should be removed from office.

B. Factual background

[9] Justice Girouard was appointed to the Superior Court of Quebec on September 30, 2010.

[10] On November 30, 2012, a complaint was filed with the Council after a video was sent by the Director of Criminal and Penal Prosecutions to the Honourable François Rolland, then Chief Justice of the Superior Court. According to the complaint, the video showed a transaction involving an illicit substance between the respondent Girouard, then a lawyer, and one of his clients at the time.

[11] In October 2013, the Council established a review committee to consider the complaint and have a preliminary inquiry conducted by outside counsel. The review committee concluded that, if the allegations were substantiated, they would be serious enough to warrant the removal of the judge.

[12] In February 2014, the Council constituted, in accordance with subsection 63(3) of the Act, an inquiry committee responsible for considering the complaint received. The first inquiry committee said it was unable to conclude that the exchange captured on video involved an illicit substance despite the fact that a majority of its members questioned the reliability and credibility of Justice Girouard's testimony. The committee therefore rejected all of the allegations against him. The Council subsequently accepted the recommendations of the first inquiry committee in that regard.

[13] In June 2016, the Minister and the Minister of Justice of Quebec filed a joint complaint to the Council regarding Justice Girouard's conduct in the first disciplinary proceeding. This complaint triggered the mandatory inquiry under subsection 63(1) of the Act. It also consequently led to the establishment of a new inquiry committee, as stipulated in subsection 63(3) of the Act.

[14] On November 6, 2017, the second inquiry committee submitted its report. It concluded that Justice Girouard had become incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of the office of judge by reason of the misconduct of which he had been found guilty during the inquiry of the first inquiry committee.

[15] On February 20, 2018, 20 of the 23 Council judges adopted the findings of the second inquiry committee and concluded that Justice Girouard had become incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of the office of judge. The three dissenting judges suggested that he not be removed as they were of the opinion that he did not have a fair hearing to the extent that some of the Council members could not understand and evaluate the entire record by reason of their unilingualism.

[16] Justice Girouard applied for judicial review of the recommendation made by the majority of the Council. This proceeding was in addition to a number of other applications filed over the course of the two inquiries against various decisions made by inquiry committees and the decision of the two ministers of Justice to file a complaint with the Council.

[17] In response, the Council filed a motion to strike the applications for judicial review in question on the ground that the Federal Court does not have jurisdiction to hear the case under sections 2 and 18 of the FCA since the Council is not a "federal board, commission or other tribunal".

III. FEDERAL COURT DECISION

[18] On August 29, 2018, Federal Court Justice Simon Noël dismissed the Council's motions to strike. After his analysis, he reached the conclusion that the Council and its inquiry committee are federal boards, commissions or other tribunals under section 2 of the FCA (Decision, at paragraph 61–111). According to him, the Council's investigative powers do not derive from the Constitution, but from the Act (at paragraph 81). In addition, he stated that these powers belong to the Council as an institution, not to the chief justices individually because of their status (at paragraph 81). He also rejected the idea that paragraphs 63(4)(a) and (b) of the Act grant the Council superior court status. In his opinion, the purpose of these paragraphs is only to recognize the immunity of the Council and the inquiry judges, to grant them powers to summon witnesses and compel them to give evidence and to grant to the judges subject to inquiry protection with respect to their testimony (at paragraph 156). The Judge also rejected the Council's claims that the Council's reports and recommendations are not reviewable decisions under section 18 of the FCA (at paragraph 172).

IV. ISSUES

[19] The following issues arise in this appeal:

1. Are the Council and its inquiry committees federal boards, commissions or other tribunals subject to the Federal Court's jurisdiction with respect to judicial review?

2. Are the Council's reports and recommendations reviewable decisions?

[20] The Council's notice of appeal and memorandum of fact and law raise another issue, that is, a reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of the Judge. The Council did not mention this issue during the hearing of the appeal and did not rely on its memorandum on this matter. There was no mention of this issue by counsel for Justice Girouard or the Attorney General of Canada (AGC). In the circumstances, this Court considers this ground of appeal to be abandoned. Moreover, nothing in the appellant's written submissions rebutted the strong presumption of the Judge's impartiality, as established in Wewaykum Indian Band v. Canada, 2003 SCC 45, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 259, at paragraph 59.

[21] The two issues will be dealt with in turn.

V. PRELIMINARY ISSUES

[22] Before dealing with the merits, there are two preliminary issues to examine. Two motions were made at the beginning of the appeal hearing. The first, filed by Justice Girouard, requests the addition to the appeal book of a copy of the application for judicial review amended with the permission of Justice Simon Noël as the case management judge. As the other parties did not object, the motion was granted from the bench.

[23] However, there was no unanimity on the second motion. In that motion, the appellant asked the Court to grant it leave to present new evidence on a question of fact under rule 351 of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106. The evidence in question is the minutes of the annual conference of the chief justices of Canada, which took place when Parliament was considering the amendments to the Act that established the Council. The minutes reveal that during that meeting, the Honourable Justice Fauteux, then Chief Justice of Canada, apparently explained that subsection 32(4) [R.S.C. 1970, c. J-1], now subsection 63(4) of the Act, was amended to prevent the possibility of the Council being subject to the Federal Court's power of review.

[24] The appellant argues that that evidence meets the criteria applicable to the admissibility of new evidence under rule 351, as set out in Brace v. Canada, 2014 FCA 92, 63 C.P.C. (7th) 81, at paragraph 11:

> (1) The evidence should not be admitted if, by due diligence, it could have been adduced at trial….
>
> (2) The evidence must be relevant in the sense that it bears upon a decisive or potentially decisive issue in the trial….
>
> (3) The evidence must be credible in the sense that it is reasonably capable of belief….
>
> (4) The evidence must be such that if believed it could reasonably, when taken with the other evidence adduced at trial, be expected to have affected the result…. [Emphasis in original.]

(See also Shire Canada Inc. v. Apotex Inc., 2011 FCA 10, 414 N.R. 270.)

[25] Since all of these criteria must be met, the failure to meet one of them is enough for the motion to be dismissed.

[26] On the basis of this evidence, the appellant wants to show that the intention of Parliament, when it amended subsection 63(4) of the Act to include the expression "shall be deemed to be a superior court", was to insulate the appellant from the Federal Court's jurisdiction as concerns judicial review.

[27] Yet, as the Judge aptly noted in paragraphs 138 and 140 of his reasons, a public servant from the Department of Justice who testified before the parliamentary committee during the debates regarding this amendment explained that the purpose of amending the bill to insert the phrase "shall be deemed to be a superior court" was "[t]o give the judges … the usual judicial protection that they would need", that is, immunity from prosecution (Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, House of Commons, Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, 28th Parl., 3rd Sess. (16 June 1971), at page 27:27). The new evidence that the appellant wishes to present contradicts this testimony. First, the appellant did not demonstrate that the minutes are authentic and accurately reflect the comments of Justice Fauteux; second, the comments attributed to Justice Fauteux would only be his opinion and can in no way be considered Parliament's intent. It is therefore difficult to say that this new evidence could "be expected to have affected the result".

[28] It should also be noted that the document in question contradicts the main argument put forward by the appellant before this Court, that is, that the Council's members derive their immunity from the Constitution. In fact, it suggests instead that in the absence of the current subsection 63(4) of the Act, the Council's decisions would indeed be subject to the supervisory authority of the Federal Court. It is therefore difficult to conclude, as required by the case law, that if believed, the new evidence could be expected to have affected the result in favour of the appellant.

[29] In short, the criteria for the admission of the new evidence were not met. The appellant's motion will therefore be dismissed.

VI. STANDARD OF REVIEW

[30] The issue of whether the Federal Court had jurisdiction to rule on the applications for judicial review in dispute is a question of law that must be reviewed on a standard of correctness (Canada (Governor General in Council) v. Mikisew Cree First Nation, 2016 FCA 311, [2017] 3 F.C.R. 298 (Mikisew FCA), at paragraph 18, affd by 2018 SCC 40, [2018] 2 S.C.R. 765; Spike Marks Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2008 FCA 406, 386 N.R. 194, at paragraph 11, leave to appeal to the S.C.C. refused, April 30, 2009 (33023) [[2009] 1 S.C.R. xiii]; Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235, at paragraph 8).

VII. ANALYSIS

A. Is the Council a federal board, commission or other tribunal subject to the Federal Court's jurisdiction with respect to judicial review?

(1) General legal framework

[31] The Federal Court's jurisdiction is not inherent; it is statutory. It follows that, in order for the Court to hear and decide a case, Parliament must have conferred on it the necessary jurisdiction (Canada (Attorney General) v. TeleZone Inc., 2010 SCC 62, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 585 (TeleZone), at paragraph 43). By adopting section 18 of the FCA, Parliament granted the Federal Court exclusive jurisdiction to review the actions taken or decisions made by a "federal board, commission or other tribunal", except for those in respect of which the Federal Court of Appeal has express jurisdiction under section 28. Section 18.1 of the FCA sets out the scope of the remedies available on an application for judicial review by the Attorney General or by an interested party.

[32] The term "federal board, commission or other tribunal" generally means a "body exercising statutory powers or powers under an order made pursuant to a prerogative of the Crown" (Mikisew Cree First Nation v. Canada (Governor General in Council), 2018 SCC 40, [2018] 2 S.C.R. 765 (Mikisew SCC), at paragraph 18). More specifically, section 2 of the FCA defines this notion as follows:

> Definitions
> 2 (1) In this Act,
>
> federal board, commission or other tribunal means any body, person or persons having, exercising or purporting to exercise jurisdiction or powers conferred by or under an Act of Parliament or by or under an order made pursuant to a prerogative of the Crown, other than the Tax Court of Canada or any of its judges, any such body constituted or established by or under a law of a province or any such person or persons appointed under or in accordance with a law of a province or under section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[33] With respect to this definition, the Supreme Court of Canada stated that it is "sweeping" and that it "goes well beyond what are usually thought of as 'boards and commissions'" (Telezone, at paragraphs 3 and 50).

[34] To determine whether a body is a "federal board, commission or other tribunal" within the meaning of section 2 of the FCA, this Court developed a two-step test. According to Anisman v. Canada (Border Services Agency), 2010 FCA 52, 400 N.R. 137 (Anisman), the Court must determine "what jurisdiction or power" the body seeks to exercise and then "what is the source or the origin" of that jurisdiction or power (at paragraph 29; Mikisew SCC, at paragraph 109).

[35] It should also be noted that Parliament amended the definition of "federal board, commission or other tribunal" several times to explicitly exclude bodies that could otherwise be included. This is notably the case with the Senate, the House of Commons, any committee or member of either House, and the ethics commissioners of these institutions with respect to the exercise of their powers pursuant to the Parliament of Canada Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. P-1 (see subsection 2(2) of the FCA).

(2) Discussion

(a) Anisman criteria

[36] The Federal Court Judge set out the Anisman test in paragraph 96 of his reasons. Examining the statutory scheme at issue in light of the criteria established in the case law, he concluded that the Council and its committees exercise powers that are investigative in nature (at paragraph 97), similar to those of a commissioner of inquiry under the Inquiries Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. I-11 (Inquiries Act) (at paragraph 83). He also found that the source of these powers can only be found in paragraphs 60(2)(c) and (d) and subsections 63(1) and 63(4) of the Act, that is, an "Act of Parliament" within the meaning of section 2 of the FCA (at paragraph 97).

[37] The appellant is challenging the Judge's conclusions in relation to (i) the source of the powers exercised and (ii) the nature of those powers. These criticisms will be considered in turn. As the "source" of the powers is the "principal determinant" of whether a decision maker falls within the definition of a "federal board, commission or other tribunal", this question will be dealt with first (Mikisew SCC, at paragraph 109; Donald J. M. Brown and the Honourable John M. Evans, Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada, looseleaf (Toronto: Thomson Reuters Canada Limited, 2018), at pages 2-50 and 2-51).

(i) The source of powers

[38] Relying on Ruffo v. Conseil de la magistrature, 1995 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 267 (Ruffo), the appellant argues that the powers in dispute here are "inherent" in its members' exercise of their functions. According to the appellant, the result is that these powers are constitutional and that they are therefore not conferred by or under an "Act of Parliament" within the meaning of section 2 of the FCA.

[39] These arguments do not withstand scrutiny.

[40] The Judge was quite correct to conclude that the only source of the powers of the Council and its committees is the Act, notably paragraphs 60(2)(c) and (d) and subsections 63(1) and 63(4). Had the Act not been adopted by Parliament, the Council would simply not exist. Furthermore, it should be noted that it has only been in existence since 1971; before that date, judicial discipline was entrusted to ad hoc commissions of inquiry established by the Governor in Council. In addition, there is every reason to believe that if the roles and composition of the Council were to be modified, it would be up to Parliament and not the Council itself to make such changes through legislation. The only power granted to the Council in that respect, under subsection 61(3) of the Act, is that of making by-laws to regulate the procedure in regard to its meetings and its inquiries and investigations.

[41] As rightly noted by the respondent the AGC, the Anisman analysis implies that this Court must focus on the source of the powers conferred on the body that exercises them —in this case, the Council, not its members. In any event, even if the powers conferred on chief justices were to be taken into account, the same conclusion applies in this case.

[42] The appellant's argument that its powers are constitutional since they are inherent to the office of chief justice is based on the following passage from Ruffo [at paragraphs 57 and 58]:

> … It must not be forgotten that a large part of the chief judge's role in maintaining high-quality justice was defined gradually over the years, in the same way as judicial precedents. Many aspects of this role derived from judicial tradition without being transferred to legislation. Therefore, the fact that there was no explicit legislation on ethics until quite recently does not mean we can doubt the continuity that marked the development of the chief judge's responsibilities in this regard. It accordingly cannot be argued that the supervisory powers conferred on the chief judge by … s. 96 [of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.Q., c T-16 then in force] were assigned spontaneously by the legislature; in my view, they must rather be seen as the expression of a reality that is consistent with general practice and gradual developments over time.
> This opinion is shared by the American author … Geyh, who asserts that the chief judge's supervisory powers over ethics are inherent in the exercise of his or her functions and need not be conferred by specific statutory provisions …. I agree. [Emphasis in original.]

[43] However, to understand its real import, this excerpt from Ruffo should be put in its original context. Those comments were made by Justice Gonthier, on behalf of the majority, in response to the argument that the chief judge of the Court of Québec should not be allowed to lay a complaint with the Conseil de la magistrature against a judge of his court because it would go against the principles of judicial impartiality and independence. It is in this very specific context that the comments reproduced above were made and should be understood. This is clear from the paragraph that follows [at paragraph 59]:

> We must recognize that the chief judge, as primus inter pares in the court, the efficient operation of which he or she oversees in all other respects, is in a preferred position to ensure compliance with judicial ethics. First, because of the chief judge's role as co-ordinator, events that may raise ethical issues are more readily brought to his or her attention. As well, because of the chief judge's status, he or she is often the best situated to deal with such delicate matters, thereby relieving the other judges of the court of the difficult task of laying a complaint against one of their colleagues where necessary. In short, the power to lay a complaint is an intrinsic part of the chief judge's responsibility in this area and it would not be fitting for the chief judge to act through someone else, whether a judge or a person outside the judiciary, to fulfil his or her obligations in this regard. [Emphasis added.]

[44] What we understand from this passage is that the only inherent power of a chief justice identified by the Supreme Court in Ruffo with respect to judicial discipline is that of

INTRODUCTION

[1] The applicant applies for an order of certiorari quashing the decision of the Provincial Court judge denying a request to transfer a matter from the St. Boniface Judicial Centre to the Winnipeg Judicial Centre (for a guilty plea and sentencing). The applicant says that in doing so, the Provincial Court judge improperly interpreted his jurisdiction such that he acted outside of his jurisdiction. In denying this transfer, the Provincial Court judge referred to the following notice of practice directive, dated July 25, 2019, issued by the Chief Judge of the Provincial Court:

> Re: Transferring Matters between Judicial Court Centres
>
> There is a general presumption, based on principles of access to justice, matters will be heard in the community in which the incident is alleged to have occurred. It is in the public interest to have matters heard in the community or the closest judicial centre so that members of the affected community can participate fully in the proceedings and see that justice is done.
> There may be extenuating circumstances where the above principles should not apply. If that is the case and counsel are seeking to have any matter heard in a judicial centre other than the judicial centre closest to where the incident is alleged to have occurred, counsel shall bring an application before the presiding judge, in Federal Court, Zinn J.—Toronto, January 21; Ottawa, May 21, 2020.

Judges and Courts — Judicial review of Canadian Judicial Council's (CJC) decision to constitute Judicial Conduct Review Panel (Review Panel), Review Panel's conclusion that applicant contravening Judges Act, s. 55 — Applicant, Ontario Superior Court of Justice judge, accepting appointment to position of Interim Dean of law school — Chief Justice granting applicant special leave pursuant to Judges Act, s. 54(1)(a) after obtaining approval from Minister of Justice — Executive Director of CJC of view that in light of Judges Act, ss. 54, 55, general duties, ethical obligations of Judges, acceptance by applicant of Interim Dean role may warrant consideration by Council — Referring matter to Judicial Conduct Committee Vice-Chairperson — Matter referred to Review Panel — Review Panel concluding that leave of absence granted under Judges Act, s. 54 not removing prohibition under s. 55 — Finding applicant breaching ethical obligations, impermissibly using prestige of judicial office — Vice-Chairperson endorsing Review Panel's decision — Whether Review Panel decision reasonable, CJC proceedings procedurally unfair or abuse of process — Review Panel's interpretation of Judges Act, s. 55 unreasonable — "Prohibition" identified by Review Panel not "on judges carrying on extra-judicial activities" but rather on judges engaging "in any occupation or business other than his or her judicial duties" — Review Committee's broad interpretation exhibiting neither justification nor intelligibility — Applicant not breaching s. 55 when accepting appointment — S. 55 not complete ban on judges taking on non-judicial roles — S. 54 allowing for leave from judicial duties for reasons not inconsistent with those duties — Review Panel's decision as to ethical breach by applicant unreasonable — Review Panel failing to examine applicant's conduct on basis of informed public exercising mature judgment — CJC process involving applicant unfair, contrary to interests of justice — Constituting abuse of process — Nothing in record explaining how, on what basis Executive Director concluding that referral to Judicial Conduct Committee in public interest, due administration of justice — Applicant also denied procedural fairness by Executive Director — Not receiving fundamental procedural right to know case to be met — Initial referral to Judicial Conduct Committee failing to accord with CJC procedures — Executive Director raising matter on his own in absence of public complaint — In such circumstances, Executive Director ought to weight conduct against test set out in Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) for conduct worthy of removal from bench, be convinced that conduct could result in such a finding — Here, removal of applicant by Minister of Justice inconceivable — Applications allowed.

These were applications for judicial review of the Canadian Judicial Council's (CJC) decision to constitute a Judicial Conduct Review Panel (Review Panel) and of the Review Panel's conclusion that the applicant contravened section 55 of the Judges Act.

The applicant, an Ontario Superior Court of Justice judge, accepted an appointment as Interim Dean of the Bora Laskin Faculty of Law at Lakehead University (the Law School). After obtaining the approval of the Minister of Justice, the Chief Justice granted the applicant special leave pursuant to paragraph 54(1)(a) of the Judges Act to accept the assignment, subject to certain parameters, including that his role be confined to "academic leadership". The Executive Director of the CJC subsequently wrote to the applicant informing him that "in light of sections 54 and 55 of the Judges Act, and given the general duties and ethical obligations of judges," acceptance of the Interim Dean role "brings me to the view that the situation may warrant consideration by Council." The Chief Justice informed the Executive Director of the CJC that the appointment would attract no remuneration, that the applicant's duties would be restricted to providing only academic leadership, and that he would be insulated from concerns about future litigation. The Executive Director nevertheless referred the matter to the Vice-Chairperson of the Judicial Conduct Committee (Vice-Chairperson). The applicant responded that he did not view section 55 of the Judges Act as a bar to his acceptance of the position at the Law School. The applicant later signed a written agreement setting out the limitations of his appointment with Lakehead University. In August 2018, the Executive Director advised the applicant that the Vice-Chairperson had decided to constitute a review panel in respect of the appointment. The CJC later issued a press release stating that the applicant's decision to become Interim Dean raised some questions about whether such duties were compatible with judicial office. The Vice-Chairperson's reasons for referral rested on his view that the applicant accepted the role without considering the reaction from First Nations chiefs or the potential effect on the prestige of judicial office. Following notice that the matter had been referred to the Review Panel, the applicant advised the Executive Director that he had resigned from his position at the Law School in September 2018 and would return to his judicial duties with the Superior Court of Justice. The Review Panel concluded that section 55 of the Judges Act "requires judges … to confine themselves to their judicial role" and that a leave of absence granted under section 54 does not remove this prohibition. It further found that the applicant had breached an ethical obligation to avoid becoming involved in public controversy, and he had impermissibly used the prestige of judicial office to bolster the Law School, but his conduct was not serious enough to warrant removal from the bench and it therefore decided not to constitute an inquiry committee. The Vice-Chairperson endorsed the decision of the Review Panel and concluded that in light of the applicant's resignation from the position, no further measures were needed. The applicant sought a declaration that he did not contravene section 55 of the Judges Act.

The main issues were whether the decision of the Review Panel was reasonable, and whether the CJC proceedings were procedurally unfair or an abuse of process.

Held, the applications should be allowed.

The interpretation given by the Review Panel to section 55 of the Judges Act was unreasonable. The "prohibition" identified by the Review Panel is set out in clear and explicit terms in the English version. However, the prohibition is not "on judges carrying on extra-judicial activities". Rather, it is on judges engaging "in any occupation or business other than his or her judicial duties". The Review Committee interpreted the phrase "occupation or business" in isolation from its context. Properly read, the phrase says that judicial duties are an occupation or business. By failing to include and examine this critical qualifier in its initial summary of the section, the Review Panel may have engaged in "reverse engineering" to achieve a desired outcome rather than discerning the meaning and legislative intent of the section. In ignoring the context, the Review Panel's reasoning failed to properly apply the modern principle of statutory construction. The Review Panel's conclusion that the phrase "occupation or business" is to be broadly interpreted exhibited neither justification nor intelligibility. It was problematic in several respects, including the failure to consider the entire phrase. When considering the legislative history of section 55, the Review Panel did not address or consider the original wording of the provision. In neither official language do the words of section 55 support the conclusion of the Review Panel that the intent of Parliament was to restrict judges from performing non-remunerative engagements. To the contrary, they are focused on remunerative commercial engagements. When a judge is appointed by Parliament or a Legislature to head a commission or act as an arbitrator, his or her judicial compensation under the Judges Act continues and pursuant to section 57, there is no additional remuneration. However, that does not mean that these exceptional duties are done on a non-remunerative basis. Rather, they are done for the judge's regular remuneration. The Review Panel's reasoning was flawed and led to an unreasonable conclusion on interpretation. The applicant did not breach section 55 of the Judges Act when he accepted the appointment of Interim Dean. There is nothing in the language of section 54 of the Judges Act, suggesting that leaves of absence may not be granted to enable judges to take on responsibilities outside of their judicial duties. This leave provision was not enacted to be used exclusively for absences "such as an illness, a period of recovery from accident or parental leave" as the Review Panel suggested. Leaves under section 54 are not restricted to maternity or parental leaves. Section 55 is not a complete ban on judges taking on non-judicial roles. Parliament's intention was that judges are able to assume non-judicial roles in certain circumstances and section 54 of the Act allows for a leave from judicial duties for a variety of reasons that are not inconsistent with those duties. The decision of the Review Panel as to the ethical breach of the applicant in accepting the appointment was unreasonable and could not stand. The Review Panel failed to examine whether the applicant's conduct unnecessarily exposed him to criticism or attack on the basis of an informed public exercising mature judgment.

The CJC process involving the applicant was unfair to the point that it was contrary to the interests of justice. It was an abuse of process. The CJC disciplinary procedure was misused from the beginning, i.e. when the Executive Director determined that the applicant accepting the appointment to the Law School was a matter that "warrants consideration." There was nothing in the record explaining how and on what basis the Executive Director concluded that his referral to the Judicial Conduct Committee was in the public interest and the due administration of justice. The Executive Director placed no weight on the Minister's approval of the applicant's appointment. The Minister's approval could not reasonably be said to be "unofficial" simply because she did not expressly use the word "approved." In addition to the improper decision of the Executive Director that the matter "warrants consideration" there was evidence in the record that the applicant was also denied procedural fairness by the Executive Director. Specifically, the applicant was not informed of the Executive Director's concerns about the call for him to resign, nor was he provided with any of the "public comments" made in response to statements made by First Nations chiefs, nor those statements. The Executive Director failed to give to the applicant the fundamental procedural right to know the case to be met. If the real concern of the Executive Director was the adverse reaction of some First Nations chiefs to his appointment, then the applicant was entitled to know that and respond to it. Accordingly, the initial referral to the Judicial Conduct Committee by the Executive Director failed to accord with the procedures established by the CJC. It was not a matter that warranted consideration, and the referral was done in a procedurally unfair manner. In raising matters on his own in the absence of any complaint from the public, the Executive Director would be well advised seriously to consider whether to do so. The Executive Director ought to weigh conduct against the test set by the Supreme Court in Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) for conduct worthy of removal from the bench. Although that ultimate decision is not his to make, he ought to be convinced that it could result in such a finding. Here, in light of the approval of the Minister of Justice, removal action by the Minister of Justice was inconceivable.

The declarations sought by the applicant were appropriate. The Court declared that the applicant, in accepting the appointment of Interim Dean, did not breach section 55 of the Judges Act, nor did he breach his judicial ethics.

Review Panel fails to note that unlike Justice Fauteux, Justice Smith's deanship was limited to academic matters —an area that can hardly be said to be a wellspring of "controversial and highly public topical issues".

[118] With respect to Justice Gillese, the Review Panel notes [at paragraph 62] that the CJC agreed to her appointment as Chancellor because "of the strict limitations" agreed to by the university and the judge, and because "of the ceremonial nature of the post." This fails to reference the view of Pidgeon A.C.J. that the limitations agreed to by Justice Smith and the Law School limited his role to a ceremonial one. As to the conditions, it writes [at paragraph 74], "the use of such conditions may be an imperfect attempt to address unknowable contingencies arising in a dynamic environment". Nonetheless, significant conditions were agreed upon that removed Justice Smith from the administration of the Law School and the university. Most importantly, he had undertaken to inform and seek guidance from his Chief Justice if circumstances changed or "any issues arise which may raise new ethical implications, or [possibly] lead to public controversy" [at paragraph 72]. A condition not mentioned by the Review Panel.

[119] Moreover, and critically, his acceptance of the Interim Dean (Academic) role with these conditions was approved by his Chief Justice. If his decision was ill-advised, what does that say of the decisions of his Chief Justice and the Minister of Justice?

[120] The role of his Chief Justice both in terms of consenting to the appointment and her subsequent role should any public controversy arise was worthy of consideration and weight. In Ruffo v. Conseil de la magistrature, 1995 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 267, at paragraph 59, Justice Gonthier for the majority, notes the important role a chief justice plays in ethical decisions:

> We must recognize that the chief judge, as primus inter pares in the court, the efficient operation of which he or she oversees in all other respects, is in a preferred position to ensure compliance with judicial ethics. First, because of the chief judge's role as co-ordinator, events that may raise ethical issues are more readily brought to his or her attention. As well, because of the chief judge's status, he or she is often the best situated to deal with such delicate matters, thereby relieving the other judges of the court of the difficult task of laying a complaint against one of their colleagues where necessary. In short, the power to lay a complaint is an intrinsic part of the chief judge's responsibility in this area and it would not be fitting for the chief judge to act through someone else, whether a judge or a person outside the judiciary, to fulfil his or her obligations in this regard.

[121] The underpinning for the conclusion the Review Panel reaches on its consideration of the judicial ethics question is: (1) media reports that the former Dean had threatened litigation; (2) the possibility of litigation should the Law Society of Ontario remove the Law School's accreditation; (3) "extensive" media reports "which included allegations of a failure on the part of Lakehead to fulfill the Faculty of Law's Indigenous mandate and some criticism of Justice Smith's appointment from Indigenous leaders" [at paragraph 27]; and (4) that prior to accepting the appointment, the CJC Executive Director informed Justice Smith that it could be a matter for the CJC's consideration.

ORDER AND REASONS

[1] The applicant, the Honourable Gérard Dugré, a judge of the Superior Court of Quebec, is the subject of two ethics complaints filed in 2018 with the Canadian Judicial Council [Council], the respondent. The defendant, the Attorney General of Canada, is now seeking the summary striking of the two notices of application for judicial review (files T-1622-19 and T-1637-19) filed by the applicant.

[2] The facts alleged in the applicant's proceedings were found to be true by the Court.

[3] In January 2009, the applicant was appointed to the federal judiciary after an exemplary career as a lawyer and member of the Quebec Bar, since November 1981, in a large law firm in Montreal.

[4] The first ethics complaint (file T-1622-19) concerns the failure to render a timely judgment in a divorce, child custody, and related matters case, and the failure to respond to emails from the lawyer for one of the parties. The second (file T-1637-19) concerns comments made during conciliation proceedings prior to the adjudication of a family law application for a school change.

[5] When an ethics complaint is filed with the Council, an administrative process that may include six steps is then initiated:

> 1) The Executive Director of the Council examines the complaint and decides whether it justifies opening a case;
> 2) If a case is opened, the chairperson (or vice-chairperson) of the Committee on Judicial Conduct examines the complaint and may close the case or request additional information;
>
> 3) If the case is not closed, a Judicial Conduct Review Committee examines the complaint and the judge's written observations and decides whether the complaint can be resolved at this stage or whether it is serious enough to be referred to a Committee of Inquiry;
> 4) If the matter is referred, the Inquiry Committee holds a hearing, hears the evidence concerning the complaint and submits a report to the Council in which it records the results of the inquiry, including the conclusion as to whether the removal of the judge should be recommended;
> 5) The Council examines the complaint and decides on its merits; and
> 6) The Council submits to the Minister of Justice a report on its findings, including the conclusion as to whether the removal of the judge is recommended, and provides him with the file.

See the Canadian Judicial Council Procedures for the Review of Complaints or Allegations Concerning Federally Appointed Judges , effective July 29, 2015; Girouard v Review Committee established under the Procedures for the Review of Complaints Filed with the Canadian Judicial Council Concerning Federally Appointed Judges , 2014 FC 1175 at para. 8 [Girouard] .

[6] In this case, pursuant to subsection 2(1) of the Canadian Judicial Council's Administrative Regulations Respecting Investigations (2015) , SOR/2015-203 [Regulations], the Vice-Chair of the Council's Judicial Conduct Committee, the Honourable Glenn Joyal, reviewed the two files. On March 14, 2019, he decided to establish two Review Panels, each composed of four judges, including three Chief Justices, and one person who is not a judge or a member of the bar of a province, to examine the two complaints. In practice, the same individuals served on both Review Panels.

[7] On August 30, 2019, the Review Committees made two decisions to establish a Committee of Inquiry for each of the complaints under subsection 63(3) of the Judges Act , RSC 1985, c J-1 [Act], on the grounds in each case that the matter could prove to be serious enough to justify the removal of the applicant as a judge, hence the two applications for judicial review initiated last October by the applicant.

[8] In essence, the applicant sets out three main grounds of attack against the contested decisions, which he considers null and void ab initio , unlawful or otherwise unreasonable:

> a) Chief Justice Joyal and the Review Panel exceeded their powers and failed to comply with the Rules by not limiting themselves to a "first-eye" analysis, but instead rendering a "reasoned decision" and issuing "factual findings" regarding the merits of the two complaints. On their merits, the complaints should have been dismissed;
>
> (b) Chief Justice Joyal and the Review Committee also failed to provide procedural fairness. In particular, the applicant was not given the opportunity to respond to the letters from the Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Quebec during Chief Justice Joyal's review. Furthermore, the same individuals sat on both Review Committees, which invalidated the entire process because the complaints were analyzed through a "distorting lens"; and

(c) The contested decisions are otherwise unreasonable. On the one hand, a delay of nine months and eleven days in rendering a judgment, which is indeed understandable, does not justify the revocation of the applicant's privileges (Case T-1622-19). On the other hand, listening to the recording of the hearing in which the statements in question were made necessarily leads to the conclusion that there is no ground for revocation in this case (Case T-1637-19).

[9] In file T-1622-19, the applicant adds a question of constitutional law, namely whether the failure to respect the maximum deliberation period of 6 months under article 324 of the Code of Civil Procedure , CQLR c C-25.01, can be considered as derogatory ethical conduct under section 99 of the Constitution Act, 1867 , 30 & 31 Victoria, c 3 – and therefore within the jurisdiction of the Council – or whether it is simply a question of the administration of justice within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces under subsection 92(4).

[10] Nevertheless, the defendant now requests that the Court summarily strike out, in their entirety, both applications for judicial review, since they are premature from the outset and therefore have no chance of success. Indeed, the challenged decisions are interlocutory in nature. The applicant is required to exhaust all effective remedies available to him within the Council's administrative inquiry process before applying to the Court.

[11] The applicant replies that the applications for judicial review concern the Council's failure to comply with the administrative process it itself adopted. However, when there is a requirement for a multi-stage review, there can be no "prematureness" regarding the fact that the process was not followed at one stage, since the subsequent decision will not allow for a resumption of the review process that was flawed from the outset. In this sense, the decisions of the Vice-President and the two Review Committees are "final."

[12] Subsection 18.4(1) of the Federal Courts Act , RSC 1985, c F-7 , requires that the Court "decide applications for judicial review expeditiously and summarily." As a general rule, motions to strike are therefore not appropriate in such matters. However, the Court may strike an application for judicial review if it is "devoid of any prospect of success" (Turp v. Canada (Foreign Affairs) , 2018 FC 12 at para. 19). This is a very heavy burden (see Canada (National Revenue) v JP Morgan Asset Management (Canada) Inc , 2013 CAF 250 ; Odynsky v B'Nai Brith Human Rights League Canada , 2009 CAF 82 at para . 5 citing David Bull Laboratories (Canada) Inc v Pharmacia Inc , 1994 CanLII 3529 (CAF) , [1995] 1 RCF 588, 176 NR 48 (CA)).

[13] The issue of whether an application for judicial review is premature has given rise to extensive case law. As a general rule, an applicant cannot obtain a judicial remedy until the administrative process is complete and all effective remedies have been exhausted (Canada (Border Services Agency) v. C.B. Powell Limited , 2010 FCA 61 at paras. 30-33 [C.B. Powell]). Exceptionally, a court may agree to intervene in judicial review at a preliminary stage (C.B. Powell at para. 33 ; Halifax (Regional Municipality) v. Nova Scotia (Human Rights Commission) , 2012 SCC 10 at para. 35 ; Douglas v. Canada (Attorney General) , 2014 FC 299 at para. 128 [Douglas]).

[14] In Wilson v Atomic Energy of Canada Limited , 2015 FCA 17 (overturned on appeal, but upheld on this issue), the Federal Court of Appeal noted:

> Because of the strength and pervasiveness of the general principle prohibiting premature applications for judicial review, and the need to discourage premature incursions into review tribunals, exceptions to this general principle are rare, and courts readily grant preliminary applications for striking out. As the Court explained in the aforementioned C.B. Powell decision, the exceptions recognized to this principle take into account the specific facts of each case. In rare instances, the values derived from public law may not be clearly apparent from the particular circumstances of a case, or they may be neutralized by competing values, or both. For example, in rare situations, the consequences of an interlocutory decision for the applicant are so immediate and radical that the court is led to question whether the principle of the rule of law has been respected (Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick , 2008 SCC 9 (CanLII) , [2008] 1 SCR 190, at paragraphs 27 to 30). In such cases—where there is often an opening for a writ of prohibition—the values underlying the general > principle prohibiting premature judicial review become less important.

[15] In Budlakoti , the Federal Court of Appeal defined what it means by “exceptional circumstances” permitting judicial review of a preliminary decision: “ it is possible to relax the general rule when the judge is called upon to consider compliance with the rule of law or when the public law values arising from the circumstances of a case favour the right to apply immediately to the reforming court.” To these two notable exceptions, the Federal Court of Appeal adds certain emergency situations (Okwuobi v. Lester B. Pearson School Board ; Casimir v. Quebec (Attorney General) ; Zorrilla v. Quebec (Attorney General) , 2005 SCC 16 at para. 50). Note that in the aforementioned Douglas case , the Federal Court intervened in a preliminary manner because there was a concern about bias on the part of the Committee of Inquiry, and this at a stage of the proceedings much more advanced than the contested decisions that the applicant wishes to have overturned by the Court.

[16] In the case under consideration, both applications for judicial review are premature, while no exceptional circumstances justify this Court intervening at a preliminary stage.

[17] In support of its claim that a multi-stage investigative process can be controlled at a preliminary stage, the applicant relies on the fact that decisions of the Canadian Human Rights Commission are subject to review, even though the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal has not yet ruled on the merits of a discrimination complaint. With all due respect, this comparison strikes me as flawed. We are talking about a completely different legislative environment. The Canadian Human Rights Commission is a separate and independent federal body from the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal. The rules for investigating discrimination complaints are codified in legislation, and there is no parallel with the judicial ethics jurisdiction conferred on the Council under sections 63 to 65 of the Act .

[18] On the other hand, the present judicial review proceedings are similar to the Girouard case , where I summarily struck out the application for judicial review of the Judicial Conduct Review Board's decision to establish a Panel of Inquiry. The same reasoning and considerations of judicial economy must apply, mutatis mutandis, in the present case. That said, in his written submissions, the applicant also invited me to consider Whalen v. Fort McMurray First Nation No. 468 , 2019 FC 732 , where my colleague, Justice Grammond, emphasizes that the best approach to excluding judicial review is a holistic one that takes into account the following relevant factors: (1) the prejudice suffered by the applicant; (2) waste; (3) delay; (4) division; (5) the merits of the claims; and (6) the legislative context. Although the plaintiff's counsel did not really elaborate in their oral arguments on how each of these factors might apply in the exercise of my discretion, the following should be mentioned.

[19] The applicant invokes his irremovability. This strongly supports the continuation of these judicial review proceedings, since he is currently unable to sit as a judge, which he now claims contravenes the constitutional principle of judicial irremovability. This argument does not appear convincing to me. The continuation of the ethics process initiated before the Council is not likely to jeopardize the rule of law. The Council's investigative power is expressly provided for in sections 63 to 65 of the Act , and no convincing argument put forward at this stage by the applicant allows me to dismiss the presumption of constitutionality of a validly adopted Act of Parliament.

[20] Furthermore, the applicant appears to be indirectly challenging the Chief Justice of the Superior Court's decision not to have him sit as a judge during the investigation. The Chief Justice has broad authority to coordinate, allocate, and supervise the work of judges. The applicant is undoubtedly suffering some inconvenience, including any prejudice arising from the ongoing investigation. While the applicant cannot sit on new cases at this time, he continues to be a judge and to receive his salary and other benefits associated with his judicial status. And, as the Federal Court of Appeal noted in Newbould v. Canada (Attorney General) , 2017 FCA 106 , this prejudice is "inherent in the process in which [the applicant] is engaged."

[21] Moreover, the directive to no longer assign cases to Justice Dugré is not subject to review by the Federal Court. It should be recalled that, according to the teachings of the Supreme Court of Canada, the supervisory powers of a chief justice with respect to professional conduct are inherent in the exercise of his judicial functions and do not require any specific legislative authority, whereas, as primus inter pares , he therefore occupies a privileged position to ensure compliance with judicial ethics within the Court (Ruffo v. Conseil de la magistrature , 1995 CanLII 49 (SCC) , [1995] 4 SCR 267 at paras. 58-59). In any event, when a Committee of Inquiry has been established under subsection 63(3) of the Act , the Chief Justice has the implied power to relieve, in whole or in part, a judge of certain judicial functions, pending the outcome of the investigation into a disciplinary complaint, to the extent that this may appear necessary in the best interests of justice and its administration, and to preserve public confidence in the courts and the judges who are part of them.

[22] Furthermore, without diminishing any harm the applicant may suffer, allowing the continuation of these judicial review proceedings would necessarily lead to a multiplication of proceedings, which would not serve the interests of justice and its administration, while also causing significant delays in the processing of ethics complaints. As for the applicant's reputation, it should be noted that concrete measures have already been taken to protect it. To date, all elements of the Council's file have remained confidential. Moreover, the personal details and names of the individuals involved in the family law matters are confidential. Although the Inquiry Committee holds its hearings in public, it may nevertheless order a full or partial closed session and prohibit the publication of any information or document submitted to it.

[23] Because of the current administrative compartmentalization, the multi-stage procedure before the Council is designed to protect the applicant's rights. It is not appropriate to intervene before the initiated process has at least passed the fourth stage, namely the Inquiry Committees, where the applicant will have the opportunity to present all preliminary and substantive arguments justifying the dismissal of the complaints in question. Moreover, as I noted in Girouard , the Inquiry Committee will also have the power to rule on any question of fact or law, including any constitutional argument or statutory interpretation, and will be able to decide on the merits of any "Boilard motion" that the applicant might present in the event (see also Alexion at para. 48; Forest Ethics Advocacy Association v. Canada (National Energy Board) , 2014 FCA 245 at paras. 40-45 ; on the Inquiry Committee's ability to decide constitutional questions, see the Inquiry Committee's Report on its Jurisdiction to Conduct an Inquiry Concerning Justice Gratton of the Ontario Court of Justice, Ottawa, January 26, 1994 ; on the "Boilard motion", see Cosgrove v. Canada (Attorney General) , 2008 FC 941).

[24] In conclusion, the present applications for judicial review are premature. There are no exceptional circumstances in this case that would justify departing from the general rule of non-intervention by the Court at a preliminary stage. The Attorney General's motions to strike the case are therefore granted, without costs.

ORDER in case T-1622-19 and T-1637-19

THE COURT ORDERS that:

1. The notice of application for judicial review dated October 4, 2019 in file T-1622-19 is struck off without possibility of amendment;
2. The notice of application for judicial review dated October 7, 2019, in file T-1637-19 is struck off without possibility of amendment; and
3. All at no cost.

JOYAL, C.J.Q.B.

I. INTRODUCTION

[1] This case comes before me as a set of joint motions consented to by all accused (hereinafter referred to as the "accused").

[2] This case has received considerable media attention, not only because of the serious crimes alleged to have been committed (drug, proceeds, firearm and conspiracy offences), but also, because of allegations made by the accused about their inability to receive impartial and unbiased pre-trial and trial determinations in this, the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench.

[3] The Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench is the province's highest trial court. It is where the province's most serious criminal offences eventually appear and are adjudicated. As with any court, allegations of bias, real or apprehended, valid or invalid, are by definition serious and they can have an insidious effect on the integrity of a court's reputation for administering impartial justice. Any suggestion of bias need be addressed by a judge and a court quickly, directly and with the safeguarding assistance and rigour of the governing legal test.

[4] These reasons address the accused's motion for my recusal. These reasons also address the order that the accused originally sought for the prohibition and disqualification of each and every judge of the Court of Queen's Bench on the basis of what the accused publicly asserted was a reasonable apprehension of bias. That particular motion was eventually and abruptly abandoned, but in my view still requires and will receive comment later in this judgment.

[5] These reasons will also explain my decision on the accused's earlier and connected motion for disclosure. I dismissed that motion for disclosure by way of an oral disposition following the hearing. At the time of that oral disposition, I indicated written reasons might follow. Those reasons are now included in this judgment.

[6] I set out immediately below the issues raised by the three original motions brought by the accused.

II. ISSUES

(1) On the accused's motion for "disclosure", should the materials and items stipulated in the notice of motion be provided to counsel for the accused as relevant to the allegations of bias?

(2) Are the background circumstances in the present case such that any judge of the Court of Queen's Bench of Manitoba ought to be disqualified and prohibited from adjudicating the matters to be considered in a joint motion to quash the wiretap authorizations?

(3) Do the circumstances of this case and the role of the Chief Justice create a reasonable apprehension of bias with respect to the Chief Justice's adjudication of the matters to be considered on the joint motion to quash the wiretap authorizations?

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

III. BACKGROUND AND CONTEXT

[7] The accused were arrested in February of 2014 following a lengthy investigation conducted by members of the Winnipeg Police Service. The investigation was designated as "Project Sideshow". This investigation utilized a series of authorizations to intercept private communications.

[8] The first ex parte application for an authorization was granted by Mr. Justice Mainella, then a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, on January 18, 2013. He had been appointed to the Court of Queen's Bench of Manitoba on October 5, 2012. Prior to his initial appointment, Justice Mainella had been employed at the Winnipeg office of the Public Prosecution Service of Canada. He now sits as a judge of the Manitoba Court of Appeal.

[9] Prior to issuing the authorization on January 18, 2013, Justice Mainella would have had before him the approximately 250-page supporting affidavit of Detective Graham Grafton sworn on January 17, 2013. Detective Grafton's 250-page affidavit would have included – as such documents routinely do – supporting information respecting the criminal records or previous convictions of any of the targets who possess such criminal records. That same information about any previous criminal convictions possessed by any of the targets would have been before any other judge involved in the issuance of any subsequent authorization in connection to Project Sideshow.

[10] The supporting material for the first authorization would have been compendious and would have detailed a lengthy investigation which began in April of 2012 and which relied upon warrants which were sought and granted during the timeframe when Justice Mainella was still employed by the Winnipeg office of the Public Prosecution Service of Canada. Three of the primary targets of the Project Sideshow authorizations were individuals that Justice Mainella had jointly prosecuted for similar offences less than four years earlier. Those prosecutions involved Justice Mainella working with Ms. Judy Kliewer of the Public Prosecution Service of Canada, who also was the coordinating prosecutor or "police agent" for the applications for wiretap authorizations in the present case.

[11] As a result of the Winnipeg Police Service investigation, which would have included the wiretap interceptions obtained as a result of the court authorizations, 23 individuals (including the six joint applicants in the present case) were arrested and charged with serious drug, proceeds, firearm and conspiracy offences. The six joint applicants in this case have given notice of their intention to challenge the issuance of the wiretap authorizations based on, amongst other things, an alleged reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of Justice Mainella. As I explain later, that challenge to the issuance of the wiretap authorization will take place September 26-30, 2016.

[12] Following the conclusion of the police investigation and the direct indictment of all of the accused, I was asked to designate this matter as one deserving of case management pursuant to s. 551.7 of the Criminal Code.

[13] Given the nature of some of the identified motions that would require determination prior to trial (particularly the motion in relation to the alleged reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of all judges of the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench), I acceded to the request for case management and I also assigned myself to the role of the case management judge. In that role, I would preside over not only the foundational challenge respecting bias (on the part of all judges of the Court of Queen's Bench), but also, I would preside over any other adjudication of issues relating to the granting of the wiretap authorizations. Following notification of my assigned role as case management judge, the accused proceeded to advise that they would also be seeking my recusal, again, on the basis of a reasonable apprehension of bias.

[14] The application for my recusal arises in connection to my current role as the case management judge and the above motions that I am set to decide. In seeking my recusal, the accused seem to base their application on the speculative assumption that I had specifically assigned Justice Mainella to be the "duty judge" who in turn, would preside over the ex parte application leading to the wiretap authorization. The accused also contend that the mere fact of my role and duties as Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench creates the impression of an institutional protectiveness in relation to the Court of Queen's Bench judges and the system of assigning judges. The accused suggest that the assignment of Justice Mainella in this case, whether done knowingly or unknowingly by me or my office, can be perceived as having been endorsed by me and the court as a whole. The accused say that even an indirect role in the assignment or in the endorsement of the assignment creates a reasonable apprehension of bias.

[15] As I will explain later, the accused also seek my recusal based on a written public explanation provided by me to the Winnipeg Free Press in response to a journalist's questions posed in the context of an article written and appearing on May 5, 2014 in relation to this case. That article itself flows from comments made to a journalist by at least one of the accused respecting Justice Mainella's involvement in the issuance of the wiretap authorization. The comment was made by one of the accused as he awaited a decision on his application for bail in Provincial Court. The resulting headline of the May 5, 2014 article was "Man Arrested in Huge Undercover Operation Raises Troubling Questions."

[16] As mentioned, apart from their concerns respecting my impartiality in the context of my role as case management judge, the accused also initially moved for the disqualification and prohibition of any and all judges of the Court of Queen's Bench from hearing this matter. That motion was based on what the accused said was the judges' "privity to the issue being decided and the potential that they [the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench] are possessed of information regarding the internal policies of the Court of Queen's Bench that are not before the court." The accused summarized their position even more starkly at para. 37 of their brief:

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

> In summation, the Applicants submit that the circumstances surrounding the challenge to the Authorizations in this case creates a situation where the need for fairness and impartiality, and the appearance thereof, requires that no member of the Court of Queen's Bench be tasked with adjudicating and pronouncing on the propriety of the conduct of their former colleague who is now a sitting Justice of the Court of Appeal for Manitoba, the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, or the collective administration of the court of which they are a member.

[17] In the lead-up to the motions explained above, the accused brought a separate motion for what they said was "the production of disclosure" from the Court of Queen's Bench. In that regard, the accused enumerated a number of items which they argue are "relevant" in relation to the motion for my recusal and the motion for prohibition and disqualification of all other Court of Queen's judges. The accused submitted that the "disclosure" was also relevant in respect of the future motion in connection to the challenge of the authorization granted by Justice Mainella. In short, all of the disclosure/production sought in the items stipulated in the accused's notice of motion relate to that aspect of the accused's argument wherein they contend a reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of Justice Mainella, myself and all judges of the Court of Queen's Bench. Notwithstanding what I will explain is "the third party nature" of the records sought by the accused, the accused formulated and argued that motion on the basis of what they said was an application for disclosure pursuant to R. v. Stinchcombe, [1991] 3 S.C.R. 326.

[18] In the course of the case management discussions with all counsel, timelines were set for the bringing of the identified motions (and supporting materials) in respect of the bias related recusal and prohibition issues. Those timelines were not complied with by accused's counsel. Counsel for the accused explained the delay by submitting that they were seeking out-of-province counsel who they sought to have argue the motions on behalf of all of the accused's counsel of record.

[19] Following the court's insistence and in an effort to minimize any further delay flowing from the accused's motions and inaction in respect of the bias issue, a date for the actual hearing of the recusal and prohibition motions was finally fixed. Dates could then also be set in relation to the accused's application for leave to cross-examine the affiant (May 26, 2016), and the Garofoli motion (September 26-30, 2016) in which the issuance of the authorization itself will be challenged on the basis of ss. 7 and 8 of the Charter, which arguments now include the specific issue of Justice Mainella's involvement and the alleged apprehension of bias. See R. v. Garofoli, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1421. Trial dates have been set for January 2017 and following.

IV. ANALYSIS

The accused's motion for "disclosure"

[20] The accused explain that what they seek is "relevant" material/information which they say might be of use to support the bias aspect of their overall challenge to the wiretap authorization. That motion is to proceed in September 2016 in the context of arguments with respect to ss. 7 and 8. Those arguments will be based in part on the alleged reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of the issuing judge, Justice Mainella.

[21] The accused also seek any relevant material/information in relation to the arguments they make respecting the need for my recusal based on a similar allegation of apprehended bias.

[22] It must be noted that on most motions where recusal is raised in relation to an issue of bias, the initial and often only evidentiary basis or record upon which counsel's position is taken and argued, and upon which the court's determination is made, is that which results from the information provided "on the record" by counsel and the judge in question as "officers" or "representatives" of the court. In other words, a typical scenario is one where prior to the commencement of a matter, counsel or the judge will themselves raise the issue of a prior association, involvement or action that may give rise to a question about the court's real or perceived impartiality. Whether in relation to real bias or a reasonable apprehension of bias, the issue is raised if for nothing else, "to clear the air". Sometimes the issue is raised in the context of the other party (or the court) having no knowledge or recollection of the now identified or impugned previous association, involvement or action by the judge. In some instances, the information raised by the court or one or both of the parties may lead to an argument for recusal which the court must then address. However the scenario plays out, it is noteworthy that in almost all instances the issue is raised by one or both of the parties and/or the court in a way that provides an easy and agreed evidentiary basis, context or record for any argument the court is required to hear and any recusal determination that it is required to make.

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

That said, there may be cases such as this one where the moving party for the recusal, given its onus, seeks additional information and evidence relevant to the legal test. Needless to say, those efforts cannot involve nor should they contemplate a judge giving formal evidence. Despite the somewhat vague and indirect suggestion by the accused in the present case that the joint motion may have required the presiding judge to hear evidence from other judges or myself, the law in that regard is clear. Testimony from any judge in a context like this one is prevented by judicial immunity, which is in place in order to protect the judiciary as an institution and the public confidence in it. Judicial immunity is not something that can be waived by the parties or the judge. See Kosko v. Bijimine, 2006 QCCA 671 at para. 43, [2006] R.J.Q. 1539. That includes any testimony in respect of the assignment of judges to particular cases or roles. See MacKeigan v. Hickman, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 796 at para. 71.

[23] As it relates to an accused's efforts to obtain more documentary information or evidence from the court, it should also be clear that a mere request for "disclosure" cannot result in automatic or perfunctory provision of court records (assuming they exist) to a moving party. In those rare situations involving a recusal application where more relevant and clearly identifiable information is needed and sought from a court (and where not provided as earlier described), a rigorous process for the production of third party records need be followed. I repeat, such scenarios will be rare as in most instances the background and context for a potential recusal application will be provided in the course of the interaction between the parties and the court, which interaction takes place "on the record".

[24] I will address in a moment the manner in which the accused's motion has been, in my view, erroneously formulated as a motion for disclosure pursuant to R. v. Stinchcombe. However formulated, the question of "relevance" on any motion for production, disclosure or discovery is key. Needless to say, relevance requires a reference point.

[25] In order to properly contextualize the issue on this motion and to provide a reference point for the "relevance" of the material/information the accused seek, it is instructive to set out the governing legal test. When determining whether he or she should recuse, the judge must address the following question:

> …. what would an informed person, viewing the matter realistically and practically – and having thought the matter through – conclude? Would he think that it is more likely than not that [the decision maker], whether consciously or unconsciously, would decide fairly?
> [See Committee for Justice and Liberty v. Canada (National Energy Board), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 369]

[26] In examining the above test, it is important to note that it is a purely objective test. It is also important to note the well-known legal proposition that judges are assumed to know the law. Accordingly, it should be assumed that judges know the test for recusal and are cognizant that the test is an objective one. The nature of the legal test and the assumed knowledge of it on the part of the judiciary are – as will be seen – significant considerations when one reviews the particular and stipulated items sought on the accused's motion for more material/information.

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

[27] Although judges must ensure that they themselves feel free from the sort of genuine discomfort and inhibition that could come from previous or current associations, engagements or activity that might reasonably affect their ability to decide impartially, it is nonetheless clear that the governing test sets forth a reference point that is objective, not subjective. Accordingly, idiosyncratic squeamishness or excessive personal scrupulousness on the part of an individual judge should not displace a test which uses, as a reference point, the objective notion of "an informed person". The test itself has been informed by subsequent jurisprudence which in turn has implicitly confirmed and clarified not only the objective nature of the test itself, but also, the presumption of judicial impartiality. See Wewaykum Indian Band v. Canada, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 259; and R. v. R.D.S., [1997] 3 S.C.R. 484. The presumption of judicial impartiality can only be displaced where there are serious and convincing grounds to support recusal. A real likelihood or probability of bias must be demonstrated. See R. v. R.D.S. at paras. 112-113.

[28] The inquiry into bias (real or apprehended) is inherently contextual and fact-specific and there is a correspondingly high burden that rests on the applicants to prove the claim of bias. See Yukon Francophone School Board, Education Area #23 v. Yukon (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 25 at paras. 25-26, [2015] 2 S.C.R. 282. Informing the objective test is the recognition that the "informed person" who is reviewing the matter "realistically and practically" is not only informed of the relevant circumstances of the case, but also "the tradition of integrity and impartiality that are the backdrop of our judicial system and which are reflected and reinforced by the judicial oath." See Kalo v. Manitoba (Human Rights Commission), 2008 MBQB 92 at para. 18, 226 Man.R. (2d) 139. It is in the context of the above objective test, legal presumption and legal burden, that the accused in the present case seek material/information that will assist in providing a more fact-specific basis to prove their claim of bias.

[29] Before I set out what specifically the accused are seeking and what should have been the proper characterization of their motion, I will pause to note what is currently "on the record" as information upon which the accused can argue respecting their claim of bias. Consistent with what I have already mentioned typically occurs where motions for recusal are brought, the participants themselves, in the present case, have provided some information which constitutes a backdrop, specific and/or general, against which the accused's arguments can be made. While the accused are in no way pre-empted from bringing the present application in which they attempt to seek more information, it need be noted that part of the current "record" on which the parties can address the issue of bias, includes the Crown's endorsement of the accused's presentation of the factual history of Justice Mainella's past involvement with the accused, both while a judge, and earlier, as a prosecutor. The record also includes my categorical clarification respecting my non-involvement in the assignment of Justice Mainella as the duty judge on the day the authorization was granted. In that regard, I stipulated for counsel that I had no direct or indirect involvement in the assignment of Justice Mainella respecting his functions as duty judge and respecting his role in the issuance of the wiretap authorization. It was explained to counsel that it is the duty judge who typically receives applications for authorizations like the application in the present case. It was also explained to counsel that the "duty judge" is assigned that role by the trial coordinator. That assignment by the trial coordinator of the duty judge is in turn done arbitrarily and randomly based upon the availability of the judge and the general exigencies and vagaries of the Court of Queen's Bench rota. Accordingly, where there is an initial application for something such as a wiretap authorization, the supporting materials are brought to the court after they are prepared and without prior knowledge of the identity of the assigned duty judge.

[30] Notwithstanding the above background provided to counsel respecting my involvement (or non-involvement) in the assignment of Justice Mainella, and the general factual agreement provided by the Crown respecting the past involvement of Justice Mainella with the accused, the accused on this motion seek the following additional material and/or information:

(a) policies of the court on "cooling off periods" and the duty to avoid conflicts of interest;

(b) whether new judges are directed to the Canadian Judicial Council Publication on Ethical Principles;

(c) what guidance or education judges receive on conflicts of interest;

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

(d) what guidance or manuals may exist on the role of the Chief Justice;

(e) whether Chief Justice Joyal attended any meetings of the Canadian Judicial Council and if he did not, the member who was sent in as substitution;

(f) the date on which the application for authorization 1/213 was made;

(g) the date on which Justice Mainella was assigned to review the application;

(h) the process by which Justice Mainella was assigned to review the application;

(i) any meetings between the court, affiant and/or Ms. Kliewer;

(j) policies of the Chief Justice to prevent conflicts of interest in case assignments;

(k) whether Justice Mainella or any other justice of the court reported a potential conflict of interest to the Chief Justice.

[31] When one examines the nature of the materials, documents and/or information the accused seek on this motion, it becomes apparent that except in a couple of instances, those documents, materials and information, if they exist, are assumed to be in the possession or control of the court. As such, the accused's application which has been framed pursuant to the Crown's first party disclosure obligation under Stinchcombe, is erroneously framed.

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

[32] As this should properly be characterized as a motion for third party records thereby triggering the process in R. v. O'Connor, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, the Crown takes no position on the ultimate order that should be made, although it does agree that any determination granting or dismissing production should be made in the context of a third party records application under O'Connor. In that regard, the Crown asserts the now well-known demarcated scope of its own disclosure obligation. The obligation on the Crown is to disclose all relevant information in its possession relating to the charges against the accused. The law does not impose an obligation on the Crown to disclose material which it does not have and cannot obtain. In reminding the court of the necessary limitation to its obligation respecting the provision of information, the Crown invokes R. v. McNeil, 2009 SCC 3, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 66, wherein the Supreme Court made clear that the Crown does not encompass other state authorities. The Crown concedes that the concept of "the Crown" does not encompass the court with its constitutionally enshrined independence from other branches of government. This seemingly obvious point is underscored in R. v. Levin, 2014 ABQB 113, 585 A.R. 176, wherein an accused charged with attempting to bribe a jury member sought disclosure of the names of the other jury members. A similar point was made in R. v. Kokopenace, 2011 ONCA 759, 108 O.R. (3d) 284, where jury rules were sought as part of a challenge to the process of jury selection.

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

[33] Although the accused's notice of motion did not properly plead for third party records, it was agreed at the hearing of this motion that for reasons of expediency (where the pre-trial motions have been already too long delayed), the accused's counsel would be permitted to transform their motion into one brought under the process in O'Connor. The motion would, in turn, still rely upon the November 30, 2015 affidavit of Chantale Carriere which had been filed on the incorrectly framed disclosure motion.

[34] The process for an O'Connor application where third party record documents are sought, was summarized at para. 27 of McNeil, supra:

> 27 Stated briefly, the procedure to be followed on an O'Connor application is the following.
> (1) The accused first obtains a subpoena duces tecum under ss. 698(1) and 700(1) of the Criminal Code and serves it on the third party record holder. The subpoena compels the person to whom it is directed to attend court with the targeted records or materials.
>
> (2) The accused also brings an application, supported by appropriate affidavit evidence, showing that the records sought are likely to be relevant in his or her trial. Notice of the application is given to the prosecuting Crown, the person who is the subject of the records and any other person who may have a privacy interest in the records targeted for production.
> (3) The O'Connor application is brought before the judge seized with the trial, although it may be heard before the trial commences. If production is unopposed, of course, the application for production becomes moot and there is no need for a hearing.
> (4) If the record holder or some other interested person advances a well-founded claim that the targeted documents are privileged, in all but the rarest cases where the accused's innocence is at stake, the existence of privilege will effectively bar the accused's application for production of the targeted documents, regardless of their relevance. Issues of privilege are therefore best resolved at the outset of the O'Connor process.

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

> (5) Where privilege is not in question, the judge determines whether production should be compelled in accordance with the two-stage test established in O'Connor. At the first stage, if satisfied that the record is likely relevant to the proceeding against the accused, the judge may order production of the record for the court's inspection. At the next stage, with the records in hand, the judge determines whether, and to what extent, production should be ordered to the accused.

[35] While some modification may be required in applying the O'Connor process in circumstances involving records sought from a court, in the present case, no such modification is required as it is possible to dispose of the accused's motion with simple reference to the first stage of the test set out in O'Connor. Although some of the materials and documents sought by the accused may not even exist, most of that which is sought by the accused fails to meet the test of relevance ("likely relevant") as properly understood in the context of O'Connor and McNeil and with reference to the earlier identified governing test for recusal.

[36] Subject to what might sometimes be more or less complicated preliminary matters in the O'Connor process, the ultimate substantive step in any application for production of documents in the possession of a third party is for an applicant to satisfy the court that the documents are "likely relevant" to the proceedings. The threshold burden of "likely relevance" in the case of third party records, unlike first party disclosure in the context of Stinchcombe, carries no presumption of relevance. The somewhat distinct threshold of "likely relevance" for third party records underscores the important fact that for the effective administration of justice, criminal trials must remain focused on the issues to be tried and that scarce judicial resources not be diverted to or expended in "fishing expeditions" for possibly relevant evidence. Simply put, the likely relevant threshold reflects a gatekeeper function. Yet as part of that gatekeeper function, a balance need be sought. It is a balance which recognizes what I just identified as the importance of preventing unnecessary applications for production from consuming scarce judicial resources which could unduly protract criminal proceedings. At the same time, it must be a balance which also recognizes that an accused person cannot be required, as a condition to accessing information that may assist in making full answer and defence, "to demonstrate the specific use to which they might put information which they have not even seen". See O'Connor at para. 25. Mindful of the need for that balance, the phrase "likely relevant" is meant to ensure that there is a reasonable possibility that the information is logically probative of an issue at trial or in a given proceeding. See McNeil at para. 33.

[37] With the above threshold in mind, I have examined the accused's specific requests for production based upon their somewhat vague and bald assertions that such production is relevant and required.

[38] Amongst the requests made by the accused are those in relation to material and/or information respecting the date on which the application or authorization 1/213 was made. The accused also seek to know whether there were any meetings between the court (Justice Mainella or other judges) and the affiant and/or the police agent, Ms. Kliewer. The information surrounding those two questions was conceded by the Crown to be within the proper ambit for Crown disclosure. Accordingly, those inquiries, although part of the itemized list on this motion, have been answered by the Crown and will not be addressed by the court.

[39] I have examined all of the other stipulated requests made by the accused on this motion. A rather large number of those items do not exist or if they do exist, they exist outside of the court's knowledge or outside of its exclusive possession and control. More fundamentally, given the applicable test on questions of recusal and given the threshold of "likely relevance" regarding third party records, I have determined that the accused have not satisfied their onus. Put simply, even if I had determined that the items stipulated did exist, or if they were in the exclusive possession, control or knowledge of the court, there is no reasonable possibility that they are logically probative of any issue respecting a test which I have already identified is purely objective and which is assumed to be known by the judges in question.

[40] The overall approach and focus of the accused fails to establish any basis for determining that much of the production sought even exists. The Crown is correct to suggest that many of the requests appear to be "fishing expeditions". Although discussed in the context of first party applications, it is worth noting that the Supreme Court of Canada has made clear that there is some obligation on the defence to establish a basis to believe that the material sought in a disclosure motion actually exists. See R. v. Chaplin, [1995] 1 S.C.R. 727 at paras. 30-32.

[41] Just as the submissions of the accused fail to establish the actual existence of much of what they seek, their submissions and supporting materials similarly fail to satisfy the significant burden to show "likely relevance". The accused baldly assert relevance without any compelling or persuasive explanation. Their brief in this regard consisted in its entirety of the following written submission:

> 2. The landmark case of R. v. Stinchcombe … holds that the defence is entitled to all disclosure that could possibly be relevant to the case, regardless of whether the Crown plans to call that evidence at trial or not.
> 3. The Applicants say that the materials detailed in the Notice of Motion are relevant to their Motion for Recusal, Motion for an Order of Disqualification and Prohibition, and the substantive motion yet to be filed challenging the Authorizations granted by Justice Mainella and are thus subject to the disclosure requirement.

[42] The accused have requested that they be provided policies of the court on "cooling off periods" and the duty to avoid conflicts of interest. Nothing was provided by the accused to suggest that such policies exist or that any such policies or guidelines would go beyond those published by the Canadian Judicial Council. It is those published principles and commentaries which provide some of what the accused may be seeking. Assuming without deciding that such information may be relevant, that information is available elsewhere and is not a document which the court controls.

[43] The accused have requested information answering whether new judges are directed to the Canadian Judicial Council Publication on Ethical Principles. Respecting this request, I agree with the Crown that there is no possible relevance to this question. The publication itself may have some limited relevance in informing the discussion as to the existence of an apprehension of bias, but whether a new judge was directed to the policy or not is indeed immaterial to the question of whether a reasonably informed observer would believe that the presiding judge could not decide the case fairly. The reference point is clearly an objective standard which makes the subjective knowledge of any judge as to the policies irrelevant. To the extent that a publication such as the one referred to informs any issue in this case, it can be stated that just as a judge is assumed to know the law, so too is a judge assumed to know the ethical parameters (broadly speaking) within which he or she must work. The Crown put it succinctly and accurately when it stated:

> It does not matter what a judge is taught about avoiding conflicts or the apprehension of bias; what matters is whether the informed person would perceive [in the particular circumstances] that there was a conflict of interest or an appearance of bias.

[44] The accused have requested to know what guidance or education judges receive on conflicts of interest. As with an earlier request, there is no evidence to support the existence of any policies beyond the published policy of the Canadian Judicial Council. Even if something further did exist, it would not satisfy the test of "likely relevance" in relation to the issue before the court. Such policies would only go to the subjective knowledge of the judge.

[45] The accused have requested information about what guidance or manuals may exist respecting the role of the Chief Justice. It should be noted that most information about the role of Chief Justice is public information. The role of the Chief Justice is legislatively set out in s. 24 of The Court of Queen's Bench Act, C.C.S.M. c. C280. The section notes that he or she shall "be responsible for the judicial functions of the court, including direction over sittings of the court and the assignment of judicial duties, and may assign to the judges of the court other duties relating to the administration of justice or for the purposes of an Act of the Legislature." If further information respecting the role of the Chief Justice is required, such information/material is not within the exclusive control, possession or knowledge of the court and it can be obtained by consulting, amongst other sources, various scholarly commentary. See, for example, Professor Peter W. Hogg, The Role of the Chief Justice in Canada (1993), 19 Queen's Law Journal 248 at 249. Irrespective of legislative provisions, scholarly comment or manuals that may or may not exist on the role of the Chief Justice, there is in my view little if any relevance to those materials or information in respect of the court's determinations on bias or recusal. In other words, irrespective of the role of the Chief Justice, what is relevant is not the mere existence of the office of the Chief Justice or the potential role of that office, but rather, whether any acts, associations or engagements on the part of the Chief Justice could give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias in the particular circumstances of the present case.

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

[46] The accused have also requested information as to whether I attended any meetings of the Canadian Judicial Council. I will spend little time on this point as in my view, my attendance at meetings of the Canadian Judicial Council has no bearing on the test that need be applied to the issues of bias and recusal as they arise in these proceedings.

[47] The accused have requested the date on which Justice Mainella was assigned to review the application. The Crown has responded accurately in its brief when it says that it is part of the public policy of the court that there is always available a duty judge, emergency or otherwise (see Notice to the Profession, October 1, 2001). I have already stipulated that the duty judges are randomly assigned by the trial coordinator. The accused are also already aware that Justice Mainella received the application for wiretap authorization in the context of his role as a duty judge and that he was not "assigned" to the application per se. Indeed, counsel for the accused Baldovi acknowledged as much at Mr. Baldovi's bail application:

> The agent in this case was Ms. Judy Kliewer of the federal Crown's office. And the application process, as I understand it, involves the application being dropped at the coordinator's office for the judges. There's a motions coordinator who will then take the file up, as I understand it, to whoever the duty judge is at that time, provide [it] to the duty judge, leave it with them and then wait to hear back.

[48] The accused request information about the process by which Justice Mainella was assigned to review the application. As noted in my stipulated clarification to counsel and as can be observed from the previous paragraph, applications such as the one in question are reviewed by the duty judge. The duty judge is assigned randomly subject to the exigencies and vagaries of the Queen's Bench rota.

[49] The accused seek to know the policies of the Chief Justice as they exist to prevent conflicts of interest in case assignments. In response to this request, it is important to note that the accused know - because they have been advised - that Justice Mainella was not specifically assigned to this matter, but rather, received the application as the randomly assigned duty judge. For that reason, it is not relevant to know the policies of the court for avoiding assignments that might give rise to issues of apprehended bias. Irrespective of the random nature of the assignment, to the extent that such identified policies exist, they are not relevant to nor will they assist in the application of the objective test to the particular facts of this case. In this case, Justice Mainella did not recuse himself from the application for the authorization. What matters in that context is whether an informed person – viewing the matter realistically and practically – mindful of the presumption of judicial impartiality and the sanctity of the judicial oath, perceives an appearance of bias.

[50] The accused have requested to know whether Justice Mainella or any other judge of the court reported a potential conflict of interest to the Chief Justice. That question posed by the accused, even if it uses the conditional language of "a potential conflict of interest", seeks irrelevant information as the information would again (as explained above) have no role or application in the consideration of the governing objective test. In any event, I repeat my earlier stipulation that I had no involvement, direct or indirect, with the assignment of Justice Mainella.

[51] For the foregoing reasons, the accused's motion seeking the identified materials and information from the court is dismissed.

The accused's motion for the prohibition and disqualification of all judges of the Court of Queen's Bench [52] This motion was filed by the accused on October 30, 2015. It was a motion for which written submissions were also filed.

[53] When, on the basis of an allegation of bias, a litigant seeks the prohibition or disqualification of an entire court, that is, each and every judge of that court, the relief itself speaks to and suggests a perceived loss of confidence in the entire court's capacity to decide impartially. Whatever the context or circumstance, and however it is framed, no allegation goes more directly to the heart of the service a judge and a court are expected to provide. Any such allegation, however isolated and unique, can have long-lasting effects on the reputation of the court as it relates to its own institutional integrity, the integrity of its individual members and, as well, the integrity of the entire administration of justice. See R. v. R.D.S., supra, at para. 113.

[54] Motions such as this one brought by the accused are extremely rare. They are rare because most members of the legal profession accept that to seek to prohibit or disqualify an entire bench would require factual circumstances that create, in the clearest of ways, a perception of bias that could not but negate the presumption of impartiality and marginalize the significance and sanctity (for the member judges) of the judicial oath. The breadth and scope of a motion such as this one seem not to be directed at an "informed person" – aware of the rigours of the applicable test – but rather, the cynical onlooker whose reactions will be reflexive and not moored to legal concepts and understandings that tend to complicate outrage with nuance.

[55] Whoever the citizen (informed or uninformed) that hears or reads about the supposed need for the extreme relief contemplated on this motion, the reaction will likely be one of serious concern regarding the fairness and objectivity of those who sit as judges in the impugned Court of Queen's Bench. As a result, where a motion such as this one is not responsibly brought with the required full care and reflection, the motion's supposed goal of ensuring and reinforcing public confidence will be compromised. In fact, paradoxically, where such extraordinary and comprehensive relief is sought, it is the superficially formulated motions themselves which could lead to a loss of public confidence.

[56] Not surprisingly, given the extraordinary relief sought and given what was implied in the requested relief, this motion for prohibition and disqualification received considerable attention in the media. I note, for example, that The Winnipeg Free Press published an additional article on December 16, 2015, with the accompanying headline "Judges on Trial in Drug Case".

[57] The motion for the disqualification and prohibition of each and every judge of the Court of Queen's Bench remained "alive" until January 11, 2016. It was on that morning, in the comparative quiet of a one-hour 9:00 a.m. hearing intended for argument on the accused's initially framed disclosure motion, in the media's absence, that the accused's counsel advised that they would be abandoning this particular motion. They stated that they were doing so because the motion "had no merit". That advice and admission came casually but abruptly in the course of argument in response to a specific question that I raised in relation to my concerns respecting the relevance of the items sought in light of the applicable test for recusal. Had I not rooted my specific question in relation to the prohibition and disqualification motion, it was not clear when all of the counsel involved intended to share and advise the court of their realization that this particular motion had no merit and was to be abandoned. I note that there has been no subsequent media coverage of this case informing the public that this extraordinary motion and the extreme relief it sought has been abandoned because of counsel's own recognition that it "had no merit".

[58] When considering the possible need to bring a motion for recusal, counsel should never feel an inhibition or a "chill" such that it might prevent them or their clients from bringing any motion designed to ensure that they receive an impartial and unbiased hearing in any court in which they seek relief. Recusal motions, when properly grounded in at least arguable fact and law, are legitimate and counsel need not apologize for bringing such motions. However delicate, it can be assumed that in most cases where motions for recusal are brought, there are reasonable and genuine issues which require a determination.

Indeed, in that regard, some of the motions brought in the case at bar present such genuine issues requiring determination.

[59] Given the acknowledgement by the accused that their argument "had no merit" and given the abrupt and casual manner in which such a motion was abandoned, questions can be legitimately asked about the ethical appropriateness of bringing such a motion in the first place. However indirectly framed in the language of apprehended bias, the motion has nonetheless the effect of calling into question the impartiality (or the capacity to be impartial) of members of an entire court. Questions can be asked about whether a motion as categorically and provocatively pled as one which seeks the disqualification and prohibition of an entire court was properly researched, where in the end it was determined by counsel themselves to possess no merit. Questions might also be asked as to whether counsel – prior to making an allegation which impugns the perceived impartiality of all the members of a court – bear some special and particular responsibility to ensure that such arguments are grounded in fact and law.

[60] One could be forgiven for saying that in a case where the integrity of a court has been challenged, anything but well-researched arguments based on supporting fact and law will be, at the very least, imprudent and ill-considered. Indeed, if this were a civil case, in light of the public and reputational implications arising from the ill-considered and later, casually abandoned allegations, the moving party would be facing the prospect of punitive costs.

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

The accused's motion for my recusal

[61] The accused seek my recusal in respect of my role as case management judge and in any connected role in the adjudication of matters to be considered on the joint motion to quash the wiretap authorization.

[62] The accused allege, on my part, a reasonable apprehension of bias based on what can be summarized as the following three grounds:

(1) speculation around my role in the assignment of Justice Mainella as the judge who reviewed the application for the wiretap authorization;

(2) my role as Chief Justice generally in the court in which Justice Mainella was assigned to and performed his responsibilities as duty judge on June 18, 2013;

(3) my written comments to The Winnipeg Free Press in the context of the May 5, 2014 article in which questions were raised about Justice Mainella and the Court of Queen's Bench as a result of comments made to a journalist by one of the accused.

[63] The governing test in respect of recusal applications flowing from allegations of bias (real or apprehended) has already been set out at para. 25 of this judgment. The refinement, amplification and clarification of the governing test has been reported in various decisions encompassing distinct and diverse scenarios. That relevant jurisprudence has been discussed and supplemented by this court in, amongst other cases, Kalo v. Manitoba, supra; R. v. Trunzo,

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

2012 MBQB 211, 282 Man.R. (2d) 18; and more recently, in R. v. Amsel, 2016 MBQB 43, [2016] M.J. No. 68 (QL). Those cases were decided in ways consistent with the application of an objective test and with what the Supreme Court of Canada had reaffirmed in R. v. R.D.S., supra, was the stringent requirement for a demonstration of a real likelihood or probability of bias. Mere suspicion will never be enough. That requirement and caution is particularly important given the presumption of impartiality and the significance of the judicial oath. About the judicial oath, Cory J. had the following to say:

> 116 Often the most significant occasion in the career of a judge is the swearing of the oath of office. It is a moment of pride and joy coupled with a realization of the onerous responsibility that goes with the office. The taking of the oath is solemn and a defining moment etched forever in the memory of the judge. The oath requires a judge to render justice impartially. To take that oath is the fulfilment of a life's dreams. It is never taken lightly. Throughout their careers, Canadian judges strive to overcome the personal biases that are common to all humanity in order to provide and clearly appear to provide a fair trial for all who come before them. Their rate of success in this difficult endeavour is high.

[64] For the reasons that follow, based on the facts, the submissions of the parties and on an application of the governing law, I have determined that there is no cogent evidence establishing a real likelihood of any sort of bias, apprehended, institutional or otherwise, as it relates to my role in either the purported assignment of Justice Mainella, my general role as Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, or as it relates to my written comments to The Winnipeg Free Press as appearing in the article of May 5, 2014.

[65] The threshold for finding a real or perceived bias is high. The accused's onus in this case has not been satisfied.

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

(i) My role in the assignment of Justice Mainella

[66] This ground for alleging reasonable apprehension of bias on my part can be disposed of quickly. I have already stipulated that I had no involvement, direct or indirect, with Justice Mainella's assignment either as the duty judge on the day in question or with his assignment on the application per se.

[67] Any duty judge, in the course of his or her responsibilities as the duty judge, may decide that a case or an issue before him/her gives rise to an issue of bias (real or apprehended) that might lead to his/her recusal. Any decision in that regard, taken or not taken by a judge in relation to a given matter, may subsequently be reviewed (as is occurring in the present case) on the basis of the governing objective test set out in, amongst other places, Committee for Justice and Liberty v. Canada, supra.

[68] Given my non-involvement with any aspect of the assignment of Justice Mainella, I am not persuaded that an informed person with knowledge of all of the relevant circumstances, including the significance of the judicial oath and the traditions of integrity and impartiality that form a part of the background of this and all cases, would determine that it is more likely that I would not (consciously or unconsciously) decide the matter fairly.

(ii) My role as Chief Justice generally

[69] As I identified at para. 14 of this judgment, separate and apart from my non-involvement with the assignment of Justice Mainella, the accused contend that the mere fact of my role and duties as Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's

Bench, creates the impression of an institutional protectiveness in relation to the Court of Queen's Bench judges themselves and the system of assigning judges.

[70] The fact of my role as Chief Justice, along with the many responsibilities that accompany that role, cannot by itself, in the absence of cogent evidence, be seen to displace the well-understood duty that flows from the judicial oath to decide matters impartially. Similarly, to the extent that the office of the Chief Justice is, broadly speaking and in part, associated with the scheduling and assignment of judges, it does not inexorably follow that with respect to any legal controversy involving the scheduling or assigning of judges, the Chief Justice cannot be impartial in his or her review concerning any potential allegation of bias flowing from a given assignment. In the absence of cogent evidence, for an informed person to believe or perceive that the person holding the office of Chief Justice could not so impartially decide such questions, is tantamount to suggesting that the Chief Justice would have difficulty complying with his or her judicial oath. Any such suggestion, without compelling evidence, represents the sort of intellectual shortcut that the Supreme Court of Canada has specifically warned against. It also represents a conclusion that de-emphasizes the importance of the presumption of impartiality which in turn is connected to the perceived sanctity of the judicial oath.

[71] I acknowledge that aspect of the accused's argument that emphasizes the fact that as the case management judge in this instance, I will be adjudicating the motions in question not only as the Chief Justice of the court from which these issues arose, but also, as the Chief Justice of the court in which the impugned judge (Justice Mainella) had been sitting. While I acknowledge the argument, it too presents a logic that constitutes a superficial "shortcut". It is also a logic which is irreconcilable with the presumption of impartiality, the importance of the judicial oath and a rigorous application of the objective test. The reality is that as it relates to the accused's now scheduled September 26-30 challenge to the issuance of the wiretap authorization (which in this case includes the bias argument), that challenge involves the sort of review and adjudication routinely performed by the trial judge or case management judge who is, in the case of wiretap authorizations, a member of the same court as the issuing judge.

[72] In addition to the practical reality discussed above, it can also be said that from time to time, a case presents as "a Chief's case". Such a case may be defined by its challenges, its controversy and/or its high profile nature. Such a case may also present as one whose circumstances place the focus on the integrity of the court. Even if an ultimate adjudication (concerning initial questions that touch the integrity of a court's process) proves not to be determinative in a legal sense, there is in most cases – given the stakes – no one more appropriately positioned to conduct such adjudications than the Chief Justice. While not all judicial decisions to recuse or not recuse can or should be reduced to an ethical issue, to the extent that a potential link does exist, the Chief Justice as primus inter pares is often in a preferred position to comment.

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

No less so in the context of a formal adjudication. See Ruffo v. Conseil de la magistrature, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 267 at paras. 58-59. That is not to say that any Chief Justice can or should consider him or herself in court or in chambers as the final arbiter of ethical questions. Yet, as the face of the court, the Chief Justice is uniquely placed to present for his colleagues, the legal profession and the public generally, a leadership that will address potential legal/ethical issues that require administrative or adjudicative clarification so as to ensure public confidence not only in his or her own court, but the judiciary generally.

[73] Finally, it is instructive to take note of a judgment that addresses many of the concerns raised by the accused in respect of my potential involvement in this case. In Bossé v. Lavigne, 2015 NBCA 54 at para. 4, 440 N.B.R. (2d) 118, the New Brunswick Court of Appeal heard a recusal motion where the party being sued had since been appointed to the New Brunswick Court of Queen's Bench. According to the appellant in that case, the judge's appointment and his involvement in the already existing litigation raised an apprehension of bias on the part of the New Brunswick Court of Appeal. In dismissing that argument, the court said:

> 8. … The argument we should recuse because the respondent is now a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench is untenable. It should go without saying that a litigant who is now a judge is not isolated from the application of the law, either for events that occurred while that litigant was a lawyer, or those occurring after his or her appointment to the bench. To suggest we would let the current status of a litigant interfere with the fulfillment of our oath of office is an argument devoid of any merit. In this appeal, we simply have to determine a question of law: whether the judge who determined the motion for summary judgment erred in finding that all of the appellants' claims are prescribed. We will not be called upon to pass judgment on anything the respondent is > alleged to have done as a lawyer, since those allegations have not been adjudicated. More importantly though, the argument would still have no merit if we had to pass judgment on the actions of the respondent. While litigation involving a judge is not a common occurrence, instances of judges adjudicating a matter in which one of the parties happens to be a judge are not unknown. In those cases, like all others, the judicial oath rises to the occasion.

> (emphasis added)

[74] In the circumstances, notwithstanding their arguments concerning my institutional role as Chief Justice, the accused have not satisfied me that an informed person, viewing the matter realistically and practically, would conclude that I would not decide this matter fairly or be perceived to decide this matter fairly mindful of the facts and applicable law.

(iii) My comments to The Winnipeg Free Press

[75] Leading up to and resulting in what was to be a Winnipeg Free Press article, published on May 5, 2014, one of the accused made comments to the journalist about Justice Mainella's involvement in the issuance of the wiretap authorization in the investigation known as Project Sideshow. Those comments were made while he awaited the Provincial Court judge's decision on his pending bail. The article when it appeared was headlined as "Man Arrested in Huge Undercover Operation Raises Troubling Questions". In the context of inquiries to my office from the same journalist with The Winnipeg Free Press who authored the May 5, 2014 article, I provided certain written comments. Those written comments appeared verbatim in the May 5, 2014 article. For the purposes of completeness and precision, I reproduce that written statement immediately below:

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

The specific Project Sideshow prosecution identified in Mr. McIntyre's email and the related questions he poses, relate to ongoing cases currently before the Court of Queen's Bench. Accordingly, it would not be appropriate for me as chief justice, or indeed for any judge of this or any other court, to comment upon any aspect of any judicial determination made at any stage of these cases.

Without commenting upon the specific details concerning the case involving Ronald Baldovi now proceeding in the Court of Queen's Bench, it would appear that a concern has been raised by an unidentified accused involved in Project Sideshow respecting Justice Mainella's judicial involvement and by extension, Justice Mainella's impartiality, as it relates to his granting of a judicial authorization in connection to Project Sideshow.

While the press has every right to explore those matters it believes touch upon the public interest, an accused person, especially one represented by counsel, should know that rather than raise a legal issue in the media (where it is known, because of the principle of judicial restraint and the ongoing nature of the proceeding, that the judge in question and the court cannot comment), an aggrieved accused person may challenge and have adjudicated at trial, the validity of an earlier granted authorization. That challenge and adjudication takes place before a trial judge who is not the same judge who granted the authorization. Such a challenge and adjudication respecting the validity of the authorization, would take place in open court where the governing legal principles will be applied. If there is any foundation to an allegation of bias, real or apprehended, the accused person will argue for the appropriate remedy. Any decision by the trial judge is also subject to review in the ordinary course by the Manitoba Court of Appeal.

The questions that Mr. McIntyre poses in his email and the concerns that were raised by the unidentified accused touch directly or indirectly on the issue of a judge's impartiality. A concern about a judge's impartiality, if it has any basis, must find connection in the legal concept of judicial bias, real or apprehended. As a matter of general public information, where a judge's impartiality is challenged on the basis of bias, real or apprehended, certain governing principles apply.

The criterion for judicial disqualification that an accused may argue should, or should have occurred, is the concept of reasonable apprehension of bias. The apprehension of bias must be a reasonable one, held by reasonable and right-minded persons, applying themselves to the question and obtaining thereon the required information. A reasonable person must be informed not only of the relevant circumstances of the particular case, but also of the tradition of integrity and impartiality that are the backdrop for our judicial system and which are reflected in and reinforced by the judicial oath.

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

> There are no 'textbook' cases of bias and in each case, the inquiry is highly fact-specific. Whether the facts, as established, point to financial or personal interest of the decision-maker; present or past link with a party, counsel or judge; earlier participation or knowledge of the litigation; or expression of views and activities, they must be addressed carefully in light of the entire context. There are no shortcuts.
>
> One of the shortcuts that the courts have identified and rejected is that shortcut which flows from the proposition that apprehended bias will inexorably follow from a judge's prior involvement in proceedings involving the same litigant. For example, the mere fact that a judge had previously decided adversely a case involving an accused does not create a reasonable apprehension of bias. The presumption of judicial impartiality prevails in the absence of cogent evidence to the contrary.

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

[76] When one reviews my published comments, it should be clear that I offered no comment or opinion whatsoever on Project Sideshow or any of the legal issues that might arise therefrom. My comments were limited to nothing more than an explanation respecting how, where an accused has concerns about a judge's real or apprehended bias, a challenge to the issuance of a court order (in this case a wiretap authorization) can occur. My comments do nothing more than review the general legal principles relating to the sort of relief that is available in a court of law for an accused seeking a determination arising from concerns in relation to a judge's impartiality. To repeat, nothing whatever was said, directly or indirectly, that would express an opinion regarding the issues to be adjudicated in this matter. The focus and scope of my comments provided - in the context of a very provocative article which could be seen to raise questions about the integrity of certain judges and the Court of Queen's Bench - important public information about the dispassionate legal process that can be followed where an accused citizen believes he or she has been aggrieved because of an issue of a real or apprehended bias on the part of a member of the judiciary.

[77] The written comments that I provided to The Winnipeg Free Press are consistent with the role that the Chief Justice must occasionally play in ensuring the provision of important but objective public information, especially in a context where questions are being raised in respect of the integrity of certain judges, the court generally and the process by which such questions can be addressed. Part of such public education involves ensuring that the public is aware of the indispensability of an impartial judiciary and that the public is aware as well, that the governing legal test will be applied in a process that exists so as to ensure that any concerns about impartiality are addressed in an identifiable and transparent legal forum. Animating the public role of a Chief Justice and the focused public information provided in a case like the present, is the knowledge that the constitutional importance and legitimacy of judicial independence is premised upon a public confidence which, in turn, assumes a judiciary that can and will ensure impartial decision-making.

[78] In the circumstances and based upon the application of the governing test, I have concluded that there is nothing in the nature or content of my written comments to The Winnipeg Free Press that would cause an informed person, viewing the matter realistically and practically, to conclude that I could not adjudicate the matters in the present case fairly or impartially.

2016 MBQB 90 (CanLII)

V. CONCLUSION

[79] Having abandoned their motion for the disqualification and prohibition of all judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, the accused's two remaining motions were in respect of third party production and my recusal. As explained, the two remaining motions are dismissed.

Heard: August 7, 2025

By the Court:

[1] These reasons address the outstanding issues in the motion brought by the respondent, Mr. Swaine, seeking various orders pursuant to ss. 683(1)(a) and (b) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, in support of an anticipated fresh evidence application. The factual background to the motion is set out in the court's previous decisions of February 18, 2025 and June 27, 2025: R. v. Swaine, 2025 ONCA 117, at paras. 2-7; R. v. Swaine, 2025 ONCA 471. Because of the issues raised in relation to judicial immunity/privilege, the court granted leave to intervene to the Office of the Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Justice (the "Office of the Chief Justice") and the Ontario Superior Court Judges' Association (the "OSCJA"): R. v. Swaine, 2025 ONCA 313.

[2] Two issues remain to be decided. First, Mr. Swaine requests a will-say statement from the Executive Legal Officer of the Superior Court (the "ELO") about any communications with the trial Crowns in this matter and that the ELO submit to cross-examination about any such communications. As noted at para. 11 of our June 27, 2025 decision, Mr. Swaine limits this request to the ELO's "outward-looking communications" – i.e., any communications with the trial Crowns. He has abandoned his request for the ELO's communications with the Regional Senior Judge (the "RSJ") or any other communications within the Superior Court about this case. Second, although not contained in Mr. Swaine's Notice of Motion or Amended Notice of Motion to Resume, Mr. Swaine seeks direction on whether his counsel may communicate with the now retired trial judge to inquire about issues raised in the trial judge's emails of October 25 and November 2, 2024, "to fill in any necessary details".

(1) The request for a will-say from the ELO of the Superior Court and to cross-examine on her communications with either of the trial Crowns

[3] Mr. Swaine seeks a will-say from the ELO, along with any texts, emails, and correspondence about any communications she had with the trial Crowns in this matter and to cross-examine the ELO about any such communications. Mr. Swaine submits that the ELO's version of the same communications about which this court directed cross-examination of the trial Crowns is relevant for the same reasons that the trial Crowns' evidence about the communications is relevant. In particular, Mr. Swaine anticipates challenging the credibility of the version of events provided by the trial Crown who communicated with the ELO, and argues that the ELO's version of events will assist him in that endeavour. Mr. Swaine argues that his abandonment of the request for information about the ELO's communications about this case within the Superior Court obviates any concerns about judicial immunity. He further submits that any risk that cross-examination would lead to disclosure of matters subject to judicial immunity can be managed by the supervision of the examination by a retired judge, as has been ordered for the examinations of the trial Crowns, as well as the presence of counsel for the Office of the Chief Justice to raise objections as necessary.

[4] The Crown initially took the position that evidence about any communications between the trial Crowns and the ELO was not relevant to the only issue in the appeal – the adequacy of the trial judge's reasons – and therefore could not meet the admissibility test for fresh evidence and ground an order for production and cross-examination. However, in light of this court's decision of February 18, 2025 regarding the relevance of the trial Crowns' accounts of these communications, the Crown concedes that the ELO's account is relevant. The Crown submits that the ELO's communications with trial Crown counsel (i.e., outward-facing only) are not privileged and do not engage judicial immunity. However, the Crown maintains that judicial immunity and solicitor-client privilege protect inward-facing communications between the ELO and the Chief Justice and the RSJ. In the event the court orders a will-say and cross-examination of the ELO about any communications with the trial Crowns, the Crown seeks permission to cross-examine the ELO on whether she was aware of any other issues or concerns about the trial judge at the time of, or after, her communications with trial Crown counsel. The Crown limits this request to information that is not subject to judicial immunity or other privilege and also does not seek to elicit specific details regarding any other issues or concerns about the trial judge that the ELO was aware of.

[5] Mr. Gover, on behalf of the Office of the Chief Justice, acknowledges the potential relevance of the ELO's account of any communications with the trial Crowns in this matter. He also acknowledges that the narrow area of any communications by the ELO with the trial Crowns is not itself subject to judicial immunity or any other privilege. However, he argues that it would be contrary to the interests of justice to order the ELO to provide a will-say and be cross-examined in light of the broader constitutional and institutional values at stake. In particular, ordering the ELO to provide evidence risks undermining the institutional independence afforded to courts over administrative matters – an essential component of judicial independence with constitutional dimensions. He also raises the concern that if the court orders the ELO to provide evidence, even if limited to the narrow area of her communications with trial Crown counsel, cross-examination can be difficult to control and raises the risk of unintentional disclosure of matters subject to judicial immunity.

[6] The OSCJA made no submissions on this issue.

[7] In the court's decision of June 27, 2025, we granted the motion of the Office of the Chief Justice to file for "judicial inspection only" the unredacted communications in possession of the ELO relating to this matter, communications over which judicial immunity or other privilege is asserted. These records were filed in sealed format, along with an index to the communications and the position of the Office of the Chief Justice on the nature of privilege applicable to each communication and a summary of the communications for the benefit of the panel. Those materials were delivered to the court as directed and the panel has reviewed them. As we explain below, we have come to the view that there is no need to rely on the content of the sealed records and do not take them into account in reaching our decision.

[8] Judicial immunity[1] is central to both issues the court must decide in this motion. Thus, we begin by summarizing the key aspects of judicial immunity. Judicial immunity is grounded in the principle of judicial independence. Judicial immunity prevents the compulsion of judges to testify about judicial proceedings in which they have played a role: MacKeigan v. Hickman, 1989 CanLII 40 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 796, at pp. 828-33. The purpose of judicial immunity is not to protect the interests of individual judges, but rather is to ensure public confidence in an impartial and independent judicial system: Kosko c. Bijimine, 2006 QCCA 671, [2006] R.J.Q. 1539, at paras. 39-41. Judicial immunity has constitutional dimensions because it is an essential attribute of an independent and impartial judiciary: MacKeigan, at pp. 826, 830-32; Valente v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 673, at p. 708-9; and Commission scolaire de Laval v. Syndicat de l'enseignement de la région de Laval, 2016 SCC 8, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 29, at para. 57.

[9] Without attempting a comprehensive definition of judicial immunity, it includes both deliberative immunity, which prevents a judge from being compelled to testify about their deliberations or to justify their judgment (outside of reasons for judgment), and judicial administrative immunity, which protects the administrative or institutional aspect of judicial independence: MacKeigan, at pp. 830-33. Judicial administrative immunity protects the need for courts to control administrative matters without interference from the other branches of government. Judicial administrative immunity encompasses "judicial control over the administrative decisions that bear directly and immediately on the exercise of the judicial function": Valente, at p. 712. These include the "assignment of judges, sittings of the court, and court lists – as well as the related matters of allocation of court rooms and direction of the administrative staff engaged in carrying out these functions": Valente, at p. 709; MacKeigan, at pp. 832-33; and Ontario v. Criminal Lawyers' Association of Ontario, 2013 SCC 43, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 40. Judicial immunity prevents compulsion to answer questions about how these judicial administrative functions have been exercised: MacKeigan, at p. 833.

[10] Relying only on the public record on this motion, in particular, the comments of the RSJ in court on April 10 and May 27, 2024, there can be no question that the decisions made within the Superior Court in relation to whether, when, and why the trial judge in this case was or was not assigned to sit and was on medical leave in the spring of 2024 are within the scope of judicial administrative privilege. They involve the authority of the court over the assignment of judges.

[11] The trial judge reserved judgment in this trial, and on October 25, 2023, put the matter over to January 24, 2024 for reasons. On January 24, 2024, his reasons were not ready and the trial judge put the matter over to February 21, 2024. This happened several more times, with the reasons not being ready on February 21, March 1, and March 15, 2024. We note that this pattern of the reasons for judgment not being ready on multiple occasions is, on its face, unusual. On March 19, 2024, the trial judge advised that he would provide the verdict, but provide reasons at a later date. He acquitted the respondent, giving very brief reasons, and put the matter over to April 10, 2024 to "read [his] reasons into the record".

[12] On April 10, 2024, the RSJ appeared in place of the trial judge. The RSJ noted on the record that April 25, 2024 would be six months from when the trial decision was taken under reserve, the deadline to provide reasons, pursuant to s. 123(5) of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43. The RSJ advised that due to "medical reasons" he was exercising his discretion as the Chief Justice's designate to grant a 30-day extension for the trial judge to provide his reasons. The matter was put over to be spoken to on May 27, 2024.

[13] On May 27, 2024, the RSJ again appeared. He advised the parties that the trial judge was still "unwell". The RSJ further advised that he was not granting a further extension of time for the trial judge to prepare reasons for judgment because he was of the view that even if a further extension were granted, it "would not result in reasons being released." As a result, the RSJ advised the parties that: "[w]hatever the reasons were on the record [i.e., on March 19, 2024], will effectively become the reasons. There will not be any written reasons provided."

[14] Order-in-Council P.C. 2024-1038, dated September 20, 2024, documents the acceptance by the Governor General in Council of the trial judge's resignation. The Order-in-Council confirms the impact of medical issues on the trial judge's exercise of his judicial functions by providing for his retirement annuity pursuant to s. 42(1.1)(b) of the Judges Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. J-1. Section 42(1.1)(b) of the Judges Act provides for a retirement annuity to be provided to a judge who resigns from office because the judge "has become afflicted with a permanent infirmity disabling him or her from the due execution of the office of judge".

[15] The nature of the ELO's role within the Office of the Chief Justice dictates that she would be involved in internal communications within the court – in particular with the Chief Justice and the RSJ – regarding medical issues of a judge that impact their ability to exercise their judicial functions. The Office of the Chief Justice filed evidence on the motion regarding the ELO's role within the Superior Court. The ELO is the direct reporting officer for all staff of the Office of the Chief Justice across the province and is the principal advisor to the Chief Justice. The ELO provides legal, strategic, and policy advice to the Chief Justice, and, among others, the Regional Senior Judges. The ELO operates as the "right hand" of the Chief Justice. A key aspect of her role is to protect judicial independence by acting as the principal liaison between the judicial and executive branches of government (both provincial and federal). Given these functions, the ELO's responsibilities form an integral part of the Superior Court's management of its own affairs.

[16] Of particular relevance to this motion, the ELO provides the Chief Justice and the Regional Senior Judges with privileged advice regarding issues brought to her attention, including issues that engage the obligation of judges to provide timely decisions, as required by the Courts of Justice Act and the Ethical Principles for Judges (Ottawa: Canadian Judicial Council, 2021). The advice the ELO provides on these types of issues involves not only privileged advice, but also confidential information relating to judges including about complaints to the Canadian Judicial Council and medical information related to medical leave requests.

[17] As noted above, Mr. Swaine has abandoned his request for evidence from the ELO about her communications with the RSJ or anyone else inside the Superior Court about this matter. Thus, his request does not directly implicate information subject to judicial immunity. However, given the ELO's role within the Office of the Chief Justice, concerns about judicial immunity are important considerations in whether ordering her to provide a will-say about any communications with the trial Crowns and submit to cross-examination about the same is in the interests of justice.

[18] Pursuant to ss. 683(1)(a) and (b) of the Criminal Code, this court may order the production of "any writing, exhibit or other thing connected with the proceedings" and order a witness to be examined where the court "considers it in the interests of justice" to do so. In R. v. Trotta (2004), 2004 CanLII 60014 (ON CA), 23 C.R. (6th) 261 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 25, this court held that a two-part test is to be applied where a party seeks production of records and testimonial evidence in aid of a fresh evidence motion. The applicant must demonstrate that:

- There is a reasonable possibility that the order for production or testimony could assist on the motion to produce fresh evidence; and
- There is a reasonable possibility that the order for production or testimony may be received as fresh evidence on appeal.

[19] In R. v. Jaser, 2023 ONCA 24, at para. 17, this court modified the test enunciated in Trotta to account for the privacy interests of a third party in records for which production was sought, incorporating the factors relevant to a third-party records application.

[20] Mr. Swaine does not seek privileged material but, as we explain below, the material he does seek creates a risk of exposing matters subject to judicial immunity. Pursuant to Trotta as modified in Jaser, this risk must be weighed with the potential probative value of the evidence sought in assessing whether it is in the interests of justice to order the ELO to provide evidence about her communications with trial Crown counsel in this matter.

[21] We have outlined above well-established principles that judicial administrative immunity is an essential aspect of judicial independence with constitutional dimensions. These principles protect the vital public interest in an independent and impartial judiciary.

[22] Mr. Swaine has already been provided with will-says from both trial Crowns regarding any communications with the ELO about this matter. In addition, as outlined in our endorsement of June 27, 2025, during case management of this motion, the Office of the Chief Justice agreed to provide all electronic communications (texts and emails) between the ELO and trial Crown counsel in this matter. These were provided on May 30, 2025. The electronic communications provided by the Office of the Chief Justice and with the will-say of one of the trial Crowns confirm that on March 14, 15, and 19, 2024, one of the trial Crowns communicated with the ELO by text message and email to register concern about the delay in the trial judge providing reasons.

[23] The will-says from the trial Crowns also reference two phone conversations, which could be potential subjects of evidence from the ELO – March 15 and March 19, 2024. The record does not support a reasonable possibility that the second conversation will assist Mr. Swaine with his fresh evidence application. In their will-says, both trial Crowns describe the March 19, 2024 conversation as one of the Crowns placing a call to the ELO during their drive back from court after the trial judge had acquitted Mr. Swaine. The ELO answered the phone, but as one of the trial Crowns began to describe what had happened in court that day, the ELO said she couldn't speak at the moment and would call him back. She never called back.

[24] The March 15, 2024 conversation potentially has more substance. The one trial Crown who was a party to that conversation with the ELO describes it in his will-say as lasting approximately 15 minutes and describes the concerns he says he raised with the ELO about the trial judge's delay in providing judgment (recall, this was a few days before the trial judge acquitted Mr. Swaine).

[25] The question we must grapple with is whether, given the risk of exposing matters subject to judicial immunity if the ELO is required to provide evidence, there is a basis to conclude that evidence from the ELO about her version of the telephone call is of such potential evidentiary value that it justifies the risk to judicial immunity and judicial independence?

[26] On the information provided to Mr. Swaine to date, there is no dispute that the communications took place between one of the trial Crowns and the ELO.

There is no dispute about the dates of the communications. There is no dispute that the communications concerned the delay in the trial judge providing judgment. The parties have been provided with the full record of the electronically documented portions of the communications. Mr. Swaine has been provided will-says from both Crown counsel about the communications and the right, not yet exercised, to cross-examine the trial Crowns.

[27] Given the information already provided about the communications between one of the trial Crowns and the ELO, the limits imposed by judicial immunity, and the resulting decision of Mr. Swaine to limit his request for evidence from the ELO to her outward-facing communications with the trial Crowns, the potential evidence that Mr. Swaine could obtain from the ELO is narrow. In substance, all that she could provide is her version of the March 15, 2024 phone conversation with one of the trial Crowns.

[28] But weighed against this is the risk that this narrow area of cross-examination could lead to disclosure of matters subject to judicial immunity or solicitor-client privilege. Anything apart from the actual words of the conversation inevitably leads into prohibited areas of judicial immunity – what steps did the ELO take as a result of the communication with Crown counsel? Privileged. What information, if any, did she pass on to the RSJ? Privileged. Was she aware of prior issues or concerns about the trial judge? Privileged.

[29] In light of the ELO's role within the Superior Court and her participation in and knowledge of internal communications and decisions of the Superior Court which are cloaked with judicial immunity, the request that she be required to produce a will-say about any communications with the trial Crowns and submit to cross-examination raises issues somewhat analogous to those considered in R. v. Pires; R. v. Lising, 2005 SCC 66 (CanLII), [2005] 3 S.C.R. 343.

[30] Pires concerned the threshold to be met for leave to cross-examine the affiant on a wiretap authorization. The threshold test for cross-examination of an affiant is grounded not only in concerns about the relevance and materiality of anticipated evidence, but also about the need to protect the identity of informants (a public interest privilege) and concerns about the prolixity of proceedings: Pires, at para. 33. In particular, at para. 36, the court identified the concern that cross-examination may inadvertently risk identifying confidential informants as a factor justifying a threshold showing before leave to cross-examine is granted.

[31] Balancing the very limited scope of potentially relevant evidence that the ELO could provide against the real risk of disclosure of matters subject to judicial administrative immunity if she is ordered to provide evidence, we are not satisfied that it is in the interests of justice to direct that she be ordered to provide a will-say or be cross-examined about any communication with the trial Crowns in this matter.

[32] For these reasons, Mr. Swaine's motion for a will-say from the ELO about any communications with the trial Crowns and that she submit to cross-examination is dismissed. As a result, it is not necessary to consider the Crown's request that if cross-examination of the ELO were ordered, it be permitted to examine the ELO about any other issues or concerns she was aware of about the trial judge. We would add that, in any event, it is clear such questions would be barred by judicial immunity because they seek information within the scope of the judicial administrative immunity. The Crown's proposal not to ask for detail or specifics does not remove the judicial immunity concern.

[33] As mentioned above, we reach the conclusion that it is not in the interests of justice to order the ELO to provide a will-say and submit to cross-examination without reliance on the content of the sealed records filed by the Office of the Chief Justice. Because it was unnecessary for the panel to rely on the sealed materials, we deny the request that a summary of them be provided to the parties. The records remain under seal with the court.

(2) The request to communicate with the trial judge

[34] During case management of this appeal, the case management judge directed that counsel not communicate with the trial judge. The Crown has raised issues about the admissibility of the trial judge's emails to trial counsel dated October 25 and November 2, 2024 in Mr. Swaine's anticipated fresh evidence application – in particular, hearsay concerns and whether they are inadmissible due to judicial immunity. Although Mr. Swaine maintains that the October 25 and November 2, 2024 emails from the trial judge are admissible, he requests that his counsel be permitted to communicate with the trial judge to flesh out the details in the trial judge's emails. While not expressly stated by Mr. Gold, it appears that the request to communicate with the trial judge is made with a view to inquiring whether he would be prepared to provide evidence in support of Mr. Swaine's fresh evidence application.

[36] We direct that neither counsel for Mr. Swaine nor Crown counsel may communicate with the now retired trial judge about this trial and appeal. The subject matter that Mr. Swaine wishes to inquire about – what were the reasons for, and any direction given by the RSJ that led to, the trial judge not sitting and not providing reasons; and whether the trial judge had draft reasons for judgment prepared or would have been able to provide reasons for judgment – are the subject of judicial administrative immunity and deliberative privilege.

[37] Mr. Swaine's request to communicate directly with the trial judge about these issues presupposes that the trial judge would be permitted to waive these immunities. We do not accept that proposition.

[38] The law is clear that judges are not compellable to testify about their involvement in judicial proceedings on matters within the scope of deliberative privilege and judicial administrative immunity: MacKeigan, at pp. 830-33. In Ontario, there is no binding authority on whether a judge can waive[2] judicial immunity and choose to testify about their involvement in judicial proceedings. In R. v. Moran (1987), 1987 CanLII 124 (ON CA), 36 C.C.C. (3d) 225 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 244, leave to appeal refused, [1988] S.C.C.A. No. 213,[3] Martin J.A. expressly declined to decide whether a justice of the peace was competent or compellable to testify as to their mental process in granting a warrant. In declining to decide this issue, Martin J.A. expressed doubt that a judicial official would be competent to testify about their involvement in an adjudicative matter:

> I do not wish, however, to be thought in any way to accept the proposition that the justice of the peace was compellable, or even competent, to testify as to his mental processes in deciding to grant the warrant. [Emphasis added.]

[39] In our view, the purposes underlying judicial immunity and the weight of authority support the conclusion that individual judges cannot waive judicial immunity.

[40] The constitutional principle of judicial independence, from which judicial immunity derives, exists for the benefit of the public, not for individual judges: Conférence des juges de paix magistrats du Québec v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2016 SCC 39, [2016] 2 S.C.R. 116, at para. 33; Ell v. Alberta, 2003 SCC

35, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 857, at para. 29. Similarly, judicial immunity exists to protect the independence of the judiciary and the public's confidence in it. It is not for the benefit of individual judges: Kosko, at para. 40; Morier and Boily v. Rivard, 1985 CanLII 26 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 716, at p. 737.

[41] In our view, because the purpose of judicial immunity is to protect the independence of the judiciary and public confidence in the administration of justice – for the benefit of the public – it follows that an individual judge is not permitted to waive judicial immunity. Because the purpose of judicial immunity is not to protect individual judges, the privilege is not theirs to waive.

[42] This conclusion is consistent with appellate authority from other provinces, as well as some trial level authority. We agree with the conclusion of the Court of Appeal of Quebec in Kosko, at paras. 43-44:

> Judges may not voluntarily waive this immunity and agree to testify. Immunity belongs neither to judges nor to the parties before them. Rather, it exists to protect the institution of the judiciary and the public's confidence in it. Consequently, it may not be waived by either the judges or the parties. [Translation.]

[43] This holding in Kosko was recently followed by the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal in K.J.M.J., at para. 44. It has also been adopted by various trial courts: R. v. Hahn, 2013 SKQB 295, at para. 24, aff'd (but not specifically on this issue) 2018 SKCA 73; West Moberly First Nations v. British Columbia, 2018 BCSC 1835, 24 C.E.L.R. (4th) 214, at para. 158; and R. v. Baldovi et al., 2016 MBQB 90, 328 Man. R. (2d) 155, at para. 22.

[44] Also of assistance on this issue is the trial level holding of Glube C.J.T.D. in MacKeigan (1988), 1988 CanLII 7124 (NS SC), 43 C.C.C. (3d) 287 (N.S.S.C.), at pp. 336-337, where she held that judges are not competent to testify about judicial matters they were involved in, even if they want to testify:

> A judge must not testify before a commission or court on matters which came before the judge in his or her judicial capacity, even if the judge would like to respond to one or more of the questions which have been publicly raised. It would be wrong to do so. One question could not be asked in isolation and there is an obligation to preserve the judicial immunity for the benefit of the public. For this immunity, in the performance of judicial duties, is not for a judge personally, it is for the benefit of the public "to protect the judicial system against interference or influence which might pervert the course of justice" (Morier, p. 737).

Glube C.J.T.D. was affirmed on the testimonial competence issue by the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal: (1988), 1988 CanLII 7144 (NS CA), 46 C.C.C. (3d) 191. The Supreme Court affirmed the result, but did not address the issue of competence to testify.

[45] Finally, we note the comments of Gascon J. in obiter in Commission scolaire de Laval. That case considered whether deliberative secrecy attached to discussions leading to a decision by a school board to dismiss a teacher. Ultimately, the court held that deliberative secrecy did not attach because the board was not performing a public adjudicative function; rather, its decision was of a private nature in the context of an employment relationship: at paras. 61, 65. In discussing deliberative secrecy, Gascon J., writing for the majority of the Supreme Court, stated, at para. 64: "Judges cannot of course choose to lift deliberative secrecy to explain the reasoning behind their conclusions whenever it suits them to do so."

[46] Based on these authorities, we conclude that the trial judge cannot waive judicial immunity. Because the inquiries that Mr. Swaine wishes to pursue with the trial judge necessarily would disclose matters covered by judicial immunity they ought not to be permitted.

[47] Counsel are directed not to communicate with the trial judge about this trial or appeal.

(3) Next steps

[48] This ruling disposes of all of the issues in Mr. Swaine's motion. The parties shall proceed with the cross-examinations of the trial Crowns as directed in the court's decision of February 18, 2025. As previously directed pursuant to s. 683 of the Criminal Code, the cross-examinations will be conducted before the Honourable Robert J. Sharpe. The parties are directed to confer and propose a schedule for the filing of Mr. Swaine's fresh evidence application and the Crown's responding materials, which should be provided to the court's Executive Legal Officer by September 22, 2025.

[1] Judicial immunity is sometimes referred to as "judicial privilege": R. v. K.J.M.J., 2023 NSCA 84, at paras. 43-44.
[2] Some of the jurisprudence characterizes this issue in terms of competence to testify.
[3] In R. v. Lafrance, 2022 SCC 32, [2022] 2 S.C.R. 393, at paras. 24-27, the Supreme Court overruled the s. 9 Charter analysis from Moran. However, this has no impact on the comments in Moran in relation to judicial immunity.

INDEXED AS: HIGH-CREST ENTERPRISES LIMITED V. CANADA

Federal Court of Appeal, Pelletier, Stratas and Webb JJ.A.—Halifax, November 9, 2016; Ottawa, April 28, 2017.

Judges and Courts — Power of Chief Justice to reassign — Appeal from Tax Court of Canada (T.C.C.) decision rendered by judge who did not hear appeal before T.C.C. — Appellant successful bidder in proposal to construct addition to nursing home facility — Appealing assessment of HST by Canada Revenue Agency — With consent of parties, Chief Justice removing appeal file from presiding judge after matter heard for purpose of having judgment rendered as soon as possible — Assigning appeal to judge of his choosing — As a result, decision rendered by another judge — Respondent arguing, inter alia, power of Chief Justice to remove file from presiding judge, assign it to another resulting from Courts Administration Service Act, ss. 8(1),(2), Tax Court of Canada Act, s. 14(2) — Main issue whether Chief Justice having power to remove file from presiding judge, assign it to another judge; whether second judge having authority to render judgment in this matter — Per Webb J.A (Pelletier J.A. concurring): Chief Justice not having power to unilaterally remove judge from case with which judge seized — Doing so not allowed by Courts Administration Service Act, ss. 8(1), (2), Tax Court of Canada Act, s. 14(2) — Clearer language required if Parliament intending to alter rule that judge seized of matter is only one having jurisdiction to continue with that matter — Removal also not justified under implied jurisdiction of T.C.C. to carry out its functions as a court — No indication herein that removal of judge necessary — That judge still seized with the matter — Matter referred back to judge who heard case to render decision — Appeal allowed — Per Stratas J.A. (dissenting): Power of Chief Justice to reassign confirmed by context, purpose of Tax Court of Canada Act, s. 14 — Question herein whether Chief Justice's power to reassign extending to situations beyond death or incapacity of original judge assigned to case — Power to reassign must extend to situations beyond death or incapacity — Factors guiding Chief Justice to use his discretion to reassign is a question distinct from the question of jurisdiction — Courts Administration Service Act, s. 8, Tax Court of Canada Act, s. 14 not giving Chief Justice blank cheque — Parliament intending that Chief Justice should exercise power to reassign only after carefully considering all circumstances — Protection of mission of court prevailing in certain circumstances — Here, Court not bound to deal with Chief Justice's exercise of discretion — Procedural unfairness in this case — However, appellant not objecting in timely way, could not succeed — Matter should have been remitted to Chief Justice for assignment of a judge in accordance with principles herein.

Customs and Excise — Excise Tax Act — Appellant successful bidder in proposal to construct addition to nursing home facility — Self-supply rule under Excise Tax Act, s. 191(4) resulting in deemed supply of addition — Canada Revenue Agency determining that Excise Tax Act, s. 191.1 applying, assessing appellant HST — Issue before Tax Court of Canada whether s. 191.1 applicable — Per Webb J.A (Pelletier J.A. concurring): Excise Tax act, s. 191.1(2)(c) in dispute herein — Question whether necessary to determine primary purpose of total amount builder may reasonably expect to receive from a grantor, or whether only necessary that builder may reasonably expect to receive an amount for required purpose from a grantor — Condition in s. 191.1(2)(c) one that, if satisfied, having certain consequences under Act — Amount of tax payable under Act not affected by amount of funding provided or expected to be provided.

This was an appeal from a Tax Court of Canada (T.C.C.) decision rendered by a judge who did not hear the appeal before that Court.

The Province of Nova Scotia issued a request for proposals to increase the number of nursing home beds and residential care facility beds. The appellant was one of the successful bidders in proposing to construct an addition to its existing nursing home facility. The self-supply rule under subsection 191(4) of the Excise Tax Act (ETA) resulted in a deemed supply of the addition. The Canada Revenue Agency determined that section 191.1 was applicable. The appellant was assessed HST based on the amount of HST paid in relation to the cost of the addition and not on the fair market value of the addition. The issue before the T.C.C. was whether section 191.1 of the ETA was applicable. The matter was heard on February 26, 2014. On June 23, 2015 a post-hearing discussion conference call was held during which the Chief Justice of the T.C.C. stated that he had removed the appeal file from the presiding judge of this appeal for the purpose of having a judgement rendered as soon as possible. With the consent of the parties, it was decided that the matter would be determined by another judge, chosen by the Chief Justice, based on the record and transcripts. As a result, a decision was rendered by another judge of the T.C.C., dismissing the appellant's appeal.

The respondent argued, inter alia, that the Chief Justice has the authority to remove the file from the presiding judge and assign it to another judge as a result of the provisions of subsections 8(1) and (2) of the Courts Administration Service Act, and subsection 14(2) of the Tax Court of Canada Act.

The main issue was whether the Chief Justice had the power to remove the file from the presiding judge and assign it to another judge, and whether the second judge had the authority to render judgment in this matter.

Held (Stratas J.A. dissenting), the appeal should be allowed.

Per Webb J.A (Pelletier J.A. concurring): The Chief Justice of the T.C.C. did not have the power to unilaterally remove the judge from the case with which he was seized. Parliament did not intend to grant the Chief Justice the power to remove a case from a judge who has been seized with that matter. Reassigning a case that has not been heard is not the same as removing a judge who is seized with a case from that case. As a result, subsections 8(1) and (2) of the Courts Administration Service Act and subsection 14(2) of the Tax Court of Canada Act do not allow a Chief Justice to unilaterally remove a case from a judge who is seized with that case. The general rule is that a judge who is seized of a matter is the one who has the jurisdiction to continue with that matter. If Parliament intended to alter this rule to provide the Chief Justice with the power to remove a file from a judge who was seized of this matter, clearer language would be required. The removal could also not be justified under the implied jurisdiction of the T.C.C. to carry out its functions as a court. This implied jurisdiction does not give the Chief Justice the power to unilaterally remove a case from a judge who has heard the matter and who is not incapacitated. There was no indication in this case that the removal of the judge from this matter was necessary. As a result, that judge was still seized with the matter and all of the proceedings that occurred after the file was removed were annulled. The matter was referred back to the judge who heard the case to render a decision.

Some matters were raised that should be addressed by the presiding judge in deciding how to interpret section 191.1 of the ETA. The ETA provides that generally a builder of an addition to a residential complex is deemed to have made a self-supply of that addition when the conditions as set out in paragraphs 191(4)(a) to (c) of the ETA are satisfied. The builder, subject to certain exceptions, is deemed to have collected tax on the supply based on the fair market value of the addition. Section 191.1 of the ETA provides an exception to this general rule if the conditions set out thereunder are satisfied. The condition in paragraph 191.1(2)(c) was the only condition in dispute herein. A question to be addressed is whether it is necessary to determine the primary purpose of the total amount that a builder may reasonably expect to receive from a grantor or whether it is only necessary that the builder may reasonably expect to receive an amount from a grantor and that amount is for the required purpose. Paragraph 191.1(2)(c) is a condition that, if satisfied, will result in certain consequences under the ETA. The amount of tax payable under the ETA is not affected by the amount of the funding that is provided or that is expected to be provided by the grantor.

Per Stratas J.A. (dissenting): The context and purpose of section 14 of the Tax Court of Canada Act confirms that the Chief Justice has the power to reassign. The central question in this case was whether the Chief Justice's power to reassign potentially extends to situations beyond the death or incapacity of the original judge assigned to determine the case. The power to reassign is coextensive with the need to advance the mission of the courts. Situations beyond death and incapacity can undercut the mission of the courts. Consistent with its purpose, the power to reassign must extend to those situations. What factors will guide the Chief Justice to use his discretion to reassign is a question distinct from the question of jurisdiction. In enacting section 14 of the Tax Court of Canada Act and section 8 of the Courts Administration Service Act, Parliament did not give the Chief Justice a blank cheque. Instead, Parliament intended that the Chief Justice should exercise the power to reassign only after carefully considering all of the circumstances, both for and against reassignment. The precise circumstances matter. After the judge has heard the matter and is writing reasons, a Chief Justice will be much more constrained. A judge must be allowed to decide a case without any interference. However, there are circumstances where the need to protect the mission of the court must prevail. Here, the Court was not bound to deal with the Chief Justice's exercise of discretion. There was procedural unfairness in this case. The exercise of discretion by the Chief Justice mattered to the parties: they had already argued the case before the original judge and justifiably expected it would be decided by that judge. They should have been asked to make submissions. However, the appellant did not object in a timely way and could not succeed. This was a textbook case of waiver. The matter should have been remitted to the Chief Justice for assignment of a judge to this case in accordance with the principles in these reasons. Further, the Court should not gratuitously pronounce law at this time and tie the hands of a future panel of this Court that may consider this same case.

Introduction

Professor William R. Lederman, in the course of his long, productive, and brilliant career, influenced the way we think about most areas of Canadian constitutional law. His influence on scholarship, practice, and doctrine has been immense. One of his early contributions was a massive two-part article entitled "The Independence of the Judiciary," which appeared in the Canadian Bar Review in 1956.[1] That article is still universally recognized as the seminal work on the topic. It continues to be cited frequently, and later writers have had to be content to nibble at the edges of the topic. This article is one of those nibbles.

I also acknowledge the help of my colleague, Garry Watson, and of Jeannie Thomas, Executive Director of the Canadian Judicial Council, both of whom made useful comments on an earlier version of the paper. An earlier version was delivered at a seminar for the Canadian Judicial Council on 24 March 1993, and I benefitted from discussions that took place there.

Professor Lederman never turned his attention to the role of a Chief Justice in the maintenance of the independence of the judiciary. Indeed, very little has been written on the topic by anyone.[2] And yet it is the Chief Justice of each superior court who manages the relationship between the court and the government which is responsible for the administration of justice in that jurisdiction. It is that relationship which carries the most obvious risks to the independence of the judiciary. The Chief Justice, therefore, has a unique responsibility, which is not shared with the puisne judges, for safeguarding the independence of the judiciary. In this article, I will first describe the office of Chief Justice of a superior court,[3] and then I will address the issue of judicial independence.

I. Appointment

The Chief Justice of Canada,[4] the Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Canada,[5] and the Chief Justices of the superior courts of the provinces[6] are all appointed by the Governor in Council — that is, by the federal Cabinet. In law, the appointment process for a Chief Justice is the same as for a puisne judge of the same court. It is often claimed, however, that in practice there is a slight difference in the process; the recommendation to Cabinet for the appointment of a Chief Justice is made by the Prime Minister,

2. The only study that I could find was A. Linden, et al., "The Status and Role of the Chief Justice in Canada" (Study commissioned by the Canadian Institute for the Administration of Justice, 1981) [unpublished]. This proved to be a very useful source.

3. The scope of this article is confined to Chief Justices of the superior courts in Canada. I do not deal with Associate Chief Justices that exist in most of the superior courts, or with Chief Judges of the Provincial Courts. However, most of what I have to say is applicable to them.

5. Federal Court Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7, s. 5(4) [hereinafter Federal Court Act].

6. The mode of appointment of the judges of the superior, district, and county courts of the provinces is stipulated by the Constitution Act, 1867 (U.K.), 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3, s. 96 [hereinafter Constitution Act, 1867].

while the recommendation for the appointment of a puisne judge is made by the Minister of Justice.[7]

The qualifications for appointment as a Chief Justice are, in law, no different from those for a puisne judge of the same court. In the case of the Supreme Court of Canada, the appointee must be either a judge of the superior court of a province or a member of the bar of a province of at least ten years' standing.[8] In the case of the Federal Court of Canada, the requirement is the same.[9] In the case of the superior courts of the provinces, the appointee must be a member of the bar of the province of at least ten years' standing.[10] In practice, however, Chief Justices are rarely appointed directly from the bar, but usually from the ranks of the puisne judges.[11] As well, of course, in practice, a Chief Justice must possess qualities of leadership, organization, and diplomacy that are not always essential to the task of being a judge.[12]

As will be elaborated later in this article, the Chief Justice of each superior court has the power to assign judges to particular cases. This includes the power to assign himself or herself to a particular case. The Chief Justice also controls the list of cases, including the order in which they are to be tried or heard and the courtrooms in which they are to be tried or heard. As will be elaborated later, it is a constitutional prerequisite of judicial

11. In the case of the Supreme Court of Canada, all but the first of the Chief Justices have been appointed from within the Court.

12 It goes without saying that Chief Justices have no power to select the new judges to fill vacancies on their courts. These vacancies are filled by the Governor in Council, acting under the powers referred to above, supra notes 4-6. independence that these functions be carried out by or under the control of judges and not of the government.[13]

II. Tenure

Chief Justices hold office on the same basis as puisne judges, that is, they hold office "during good behaviour," and are subject to removal only by a joint address of the Senate and House of Commons.[14] There is mandatory retirement at age 75.[15] However, the Chief Justice of a provincial superior court may relinquish the office after five years and revert to being a puisne judge.[16]

Chief Justices play a unique role in securing the tenure of superior court judges through their membership in the Canadian Judicial Council. The Canadian Judicial Council is chaired by the Chief Justice of Canada, and comprises all Chief Justices and Associate Chief Justices of the superior courts.[17] As well as certain coordinating and educative functions, the duty of the Council is to inquire into complaints against superior court judges and to report to the federal Minister of Justice. If the Council recommends that a judge be removed from office and Cabinet agrees, then (if the judge does not resign), a joint address of the two Houses of Parliament is required under the Constitution[18] in order to carry out the recommendation.

III. Payment

The salaries of superior court judges, including Chief Justices, are "fixed and provided" by the federal Judges Act.[19] Each Chief Justice is paid more than the puisne judges on the same court.

IV. Administration of Court

The most obvious way in which a Chief Justice differs from other judges is that the Chief Justice is responsible for administering the operations of his or her court.

In carrying out this function, a Chief Justice is subject to external constraints. The most obvious and important of them is lack of access to public funds. The Chief Justice can only request funds from the Minister of Justice (or Attorney General), and hope that the Minister will succeed in persuading his or her Cabinet colleagues, including the Minister of Finance (or Treasurer), that the full amount requested should be included in the estimates for the Department of Justice (or Attorney General). The estimates have to be approved by the Parliament (or Legislature), of course, and they will have to be defended from Opposition criticism by the Minister of Justice.

Once funds have been appropriated, the ability of a Chief Justice to spend them is severely constrained. The buildings, equipment, books, and other physical requirements of the court are all supplied by the Minister of Justice, who must obey the same procurement rules that bind other departments of government. The personnel of the court are public servants within the Department of Justice. Their appointment, job descriptions, and other terms and conditions of employment are all governed by the same rules as apply to the public service generally, including, in many cases, the provisions of collective agreements. Their career prospects are not confined to the courts, and their ultimate loyalty may be owed to Ministers and senior officials in government rather than to the Chief Justice in whose courts they are serving for the time being.

In summary, the Chief Justice may be unable to obtain the resources that he or she is convinced are required for the efficient operation of the court. With the resources that are available, the Chief Justice may be unable to secure the personnel, facilities, and services that he or she is convinced would be best for the efficient operation of the court. An analogy may be drawn to the dean of the law faculty of a university, who must endure the same absence of power to carry out his or her responsibilities. This does not mean that a Chief Justice (or a law dean) is necessarily an ineffective administrator. But it does mean that the ability of the Chief Justice to engage the sympathetic cooperation of the Minister of Justice and the Deputy Minister is of critical importance. This is the part of the work of the Chief Justice that carries risks to the independence of the judiciary.

V. Protection of Institutional Independence

In Valente,[19] the Supreme Court of Canada held that "institutional independence" was an essential element of the independence of the judiciary. This required that a court be independent of government "with respect to matters of administration bearing directly on the exercise of its judicial function."[20] These matters of administration included the "assignment of judges, sittings of the court, and court lists."[22] According to Valente, the management of the docket of a court is essential to judicial independence. The Chief Justice, or other judges or officials acting under his or her supervision, must prepare court lists, determine the order in which cases are to be tried or heard, and assign judges and courtrooms to the cases.

19 Supra note 15.

These tasks require resources. These resources must be obtained by the Chief Justice from the Minister of Justice. The problem which the Chief Justice has is that the judiciary has nothing to give in return. The most obvious and valuable consideration for government funding and cooperation would be the rendering of decisions that are pleasing to the government. That cannot be promised or delivered by the Chief Justice, because it would be the most serious breach of the independence of the judiciary imaginable. Any partiality to government would involve an abandonment of the rule of law, which requires (among other things) that judges be even-handed in resolving disputes between Crown and subject. Thus, the Chief Justice must deal with the Minister and the Deputy at the same time as the judges of the court of the Chief Justice (including the Chief Justice himself or herself, of course) are doing things that are displeasing to the government. Judges acquit defendants who are charged with crime by the Crown; they award damages and other civil remedies against the Crown; and they strike down legislation, regulations, and administrative acts that were drafted, made, or performed by the Crown. Some of these things are bound to be resented by some ministers and officials in the government. Therefore, when the Chief Justice of the court meets with representatives of the government, the Chief Justice does not occupy a position of tangible strength.

The relationship between the Chief Justice and the Minister of Justice (or Attorney General) is further complicated by the fact that the Minister of Justice is the Minister who is responsible for conducting litigation on behalf of the Crown. This means that the Minister of Justice, acting through his or her Crown attorneys (or prosecutors) and his or her civil counsel, is far and away the principal litigant in every jurisdiction. It is anomalous that the Minister who is the principal litigant in the courts is also the Minister who provides the courts with their support staff and services and who presents and defends the budget for the courts in the Parliament or Legislature.

Within a system of responsible, parliamentary government, there are serious limits to the degree of financial and administrative independence that can be accorded the judiciary. Obviously, only the Parliament or Legislature can authorize the expenditure of money, and a Minister of the Crown must be responsible for defending the budget of the courts in the legislative chamber. In principle, as well, a Minister should be responsible for the funding of the courts, because it is the government that is accountable to the electorate for problems in the court system caused by underfunding. Nor is it reasonable to demand that the courts should always receive every cent that the Chief Justice believes is necessary. It is right and proper that the government should ration the available funds among many worthy objects, and the courts cannot be immune from that process.

A Chief Justice is not a member of the Parliament or Legislature or a member of the Cabinet, and is not accountable to the electorate for problems in the court system. Nor could a Chief Justice make direct representations to the Parliament or Legislature (as occurs in many jurisdictions of the United States) without becoming involved in the political process, which would give rise to serious perceptions of a lack of independence from political parties and from government. It seems to be both unavoidable and desirable that the Chief Justice should have to persuade a Minister of the fiscal requirements of the court, because the Minister is then able to carry the brief in Cabinet and in the Parliament or Legislature.

One possible reform would be to confer responsibility over the courts on a minister other than the Minister of Justice (or Attorney General). In this way, the role of funding and staffing the courts would be separated from the role of prosecuting criminal and civil cases before the courts. Here, however, it is important to balance practical concerns with theoretical concerns about judicial independence. I say theoretical concerns because there is no evidence that the Minister of Justice (or Attorney General) uses his or her position to pressure the courts to favour the government side in criminal or civil cases. The practical concerns that arise in my mind are that a minister other than the Minister of Justice (or Attorney General) is likely to be less senior, less influential, and less committed to the rule of law than the Minister of Justice (or Attorney General). A shift to another portfolio might leave the courts with a weaker champion in Cabinet and in Parliament or the Legislature. The courts would be more exposed to competing claims on public funds, and their own level of funding might suffer.

In the federal jurisdiction, an attempt has been made to give the courts a greater degree of institutional independence. The Minister of Justice remains responsible for the courts. But the Judges Act establishes an official called the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs, who has "the rank and status of a deputy head of a department" and who is responsible for preparing budgetary submissions for the Federal Court, the Tax Court, and the Canadian Judicial Council, and for providing premises, equipment, and other supplies and services to those courts and the Council.[23] In the case of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Judges Act confers these functions on the Registrar of the Court, who also has the status of a deputy head.[24] In this way, the officials who provide support services to the federal courts are separated from those in the Department of Justice who conduct the litigation of the government.[25] As well, the Supreme Court Act confers on the Registrar of the Court the duty to "superintend the officers, clerks and employees appointed to the Court," and the Act makes this duty "[s]ubject to the direction of the Chief Justice."[26] In this way, the Act seeks to locate the legal authority over the staff of the Supreme Court of Canada within the Court 23. Judges Act, ss. 71 and 74.

24. Ibid., s. 75.

26. Supreme Court Act, s. 15.

A few provinces have established a separate division of court administration within their departments of justice,[27] and some provincial statutes also require court staff to work under the direction of the Chief Justice.[28] These measures, like the federal measures, do reinforce the institutional independence of the judiciary. However, no Canadian jurisdiction has removed the funding of the courts from the budgetary responsibility of the Minister of Justice or exempted the funding of the courts from the regular governmental process of budgetary control. Nor has any Canadian jurisdiction excluded the personnel of the courts from the rules of the public service on recruitment, classification, promotion, remuneration, and like matters. Thus, in no Canadian jurisdiction can it be said that the theoretical concerns about judicial independence have been eliminated. In every jurisdiction, the Chief Justice is dependent upon the Minister of Justice (or Attorney General) for the funding of the courts of the Chief Justices, and in some degree upon the Minister of Justice or other Government Ministers or officials for the courtrooms, equipment, supplies, and services that are needed to operate the courts.

In 1981, Jules Deschênes, who was then Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Québec, wrote a report entitled Masters in their Own House,[29] which proposed a series of radical reforms to fully secure the independence of the judiciary. Relying on American models, Deschênes C.J. recommended that the courts should present their own budgetary estimates directly to the Speaker of the House of Commons or Legislative Assembly. The estimates would be examined by a legislative committee on judicial affairs before which the Chief Justices (or other spokespersons for the

29. J. Deschênes, Masters in their Own House (Ottawa: Canadian Judicial Council, 1981). The report proposed three stages of reform — consultation, decision sharing, and independence — of which only the final stage is described here. judiciary] would appear. Upon approval by the committee, the judicial estimates would be automatically included in the budget of the Minister of Justice. In this way, the funding of the courts would be exempt from treasury board constraints and all other internal governmental rules of financial management. The funding of the courts would not be compared with the funding of other areas of government until all the estimates were presented to the Parliament or Legislature for approval.

As I indicated earlier in this article, in my view such a system would be an abdication by government of its responsibility for an important part of the administration of justice. In the United States, a real debate on spending estimates takes place within the Congress or Legislature, and the appropriations that emerge from the legislative process, as well as any related taxing proposals, may well differ from what was initially proposed. But this is not the case in Canada, where the conventions of responsible parliamentary government virtually preclude the Parliament or Legislature from modifying the fiscal measures proposed by the government. In Canada, the effective review of spending proposals takes place within the government before the estimates are placed before the Parliament or Legislature. To exempt the funding of the courts from the Treasury Board or other internal governmental controls would place the administration of the courts in a privileged position enjoyed by no other part of government.

That privileged position was the goal of the Deschênes proposals, which were premised on the proposition that the independence of the judiciary was a value to which competing fiscal considerations should yield. That is obviously a tenable position, but I do not share it. In my view, since only elected Ministers can be politically accountable for problems caused by the underfunding of the courts, it is elected Ministers who ought to determine funding levels. The funding of the courts has a powerful political constituency in the organized legal profession. There is also the interest of the press and the Opposition in the administration of justice, especially criminal justice. And the requirement in the Charter that a person charged with an offence must be tried within a reasonable time[30] adds legal weight to the political forces at play.[31] The democratic process thus seems unlikely to produce major problems of underfunding for the courts.

However, even if that conclusion is too optimistic, it seems wrong in principle to me that the courts alone should be exempt from the competition among worthy claimants for their share of scarce public revenues. It is the task of an elected government to assign priorities to the various claims on the public purse, and to take political responsibility for those priorities. The administration of the courts should not be exempt from that process.

Conclusion

A Chief Justice is unlike a puisne judge, not only because of membership in the Canadian Judicial Council, but also because of his or her responsibility for the administration of the court. That responsibility is not accompanied by control over the amount of funding that the court receives. The Chief Justice must persuade the Minister of Justice (or Attorney General) of the requirements of the court, and must hope that the Minister will succeed in obtaining desired funds through the internal budgetary process of the government and through the legislative process. Once funds have been obtained, the Chief Justice must rely upon government procedures regarding recruitment and procurement to obtain the personnel, premises, equipment, and services that are needed to operate the court. These are all constraints on the institutional independence of the court of the Chief Justice, but they are constraints that are difficult to remove without fundamental changes to the system of parliamentary government in Canada.

31. See R. v. Askov, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1199, which held that a trial must be held within six to eight months of committal. It was followed by the staying or withdrawing of 47,200 criminal charges in Ontario alone. The publicity that was given to this virtual amnesty for many persons accused of crime was followed by prompt increases by the Attorney General in the resources available to the courts. The case and its aftermath are discussed in Hogg, supra note 14 at s. 49.8(e).

It is realistic to acknowledge that a Chief Justice is inescapably dependent upon government for the resources needed to operate the court. Within those important constraints, however, the Chief Justice must be independent of government "with respect to matters of administration bearing directly on the exercise of [the Court's] judicial function."[52] The most important role of the Chief Justice is to make sure that the ineluctable reliance upon government for resources does not infect the independence of the judicial function.

Lepp was ordered to pay Duncan $50,000 in general damages, $10,000 in aggravated damages for conduct which was high-handed and oppressive, and $10,000 in punitive damages for actions that were malicious and unfounded.

Lepp has appealed the decision.

[10] For completeness, the online version was edited on October 26th, 2020, such that the first nine words, "A decision from Superior Court in Newmarket in May" were replaced with "A recent decision from the Ontario Superior Court of Justice in Toronto."

The Words Complained Of (in the order that they appear)

[11] To succeed in defamation, Mr. Lepp must establish, amongst other things, that the words complained of refer to him, and that those words would tend to lower his reputation in the eyes of a reasonable person (Skafco, supra, at paragraph 15). For the Defendants to succeed with their absolute or qualified privilege defence to publish a report on a court proceeding, the Column must, amongst other things, be a fair and accurate representation of the contents of the Decision. For each portion of the Column complained of, I will address these factors at the same time. What follows in the italicized bulleted headings are Mr. Lepp's assertions:

- The Column inaccurately stated that the trial was held in Newmarket.

[12] Mr. Lepp correctly points out that the trial referenced in the Decision was held in Toronto: not Newmarket. Citing the wrong court location does not defame Mr. Lepp. This misnomer, however, is of no consequence since the law in Ontario is the same, regardless of the courthouse location where the decision was rendered.

- The Column inaccurately stated that Mr. Lepp "interfered" in the dispute."

[13] Mr. Lepp asserts that the Decision never described him in this way, and it is defamatory of his character because he did not "interfere," but rather he was hired, or at least invited to advocate, on behalf of Buckles. The parties debated this issue at length: each providing a different dictionary definition of the term "interfere." The Defendants relied on the following definition: "to enter into or take a part in the concerns of others," which they say is an accurate description of Mr. Lepp's involvement. Mr. Lepp, relied on the following definition: "to involve yourself in a situation when your involvement is not wanted or is not helpful," which Mr. Lepp argues, portrays him very unfavourably, like a meddler or interloper when this was furthest from the truth.

[14] Black's Law Dictionary®, Ninth Edition does not have a definition for the word "interfere," but it does define "interference" as: "1. The act of meddling in another's affairs. 2. An obstruction or hindrance."

[15] Allegedly defamatory comments must be read in context, and not in isolation (Frank v. Legate, 2015 ONCA 631 at para 48). In isolation, the term "interfered" would in my opinion inappropriately suggests that Mr. Lepp was interloping; however, the Column read as a whole makes it abundantly clear that this was not the case, explaining that "in January 2018, Buckles engaged Robert Lepp to assist in her dispute when he considered her in need of that assistance."

ARNUP, DUBIN AND MARTIN, JJ.A.
5TH JANUARY 1977.

Criminal Law -- Obstructing justice -- Elements of offence -- Accused giving false name to police to avoid charge of driving while disqualified -- Meaning of "course of justice" -- Whether offence limited to judicial proceedings existing or proposed -- Whether includes proceedings which accused apprehends may be taken -- Cr. Code, s. 127(2).

Statutes -- Interpretation -- Ejusdem generis rule -- Charge of obstructing justice -- Subsections referring to "judicial proceeding" and to judicial proceeding "existing or proposed" -- Third subsection merely referring to "course of justice" -- Whether ejusdem generis rule applies to limit course of justice to judicial proceedings existing or proposed -- Cr. Code, s. 127.

Civil rights -- Self-incrimination -- Charge of obstructing justice -- Accused giving false name to police to avoid charge of driving while disqualified -- Whether constitutes offence -- Whether accused protected from prosecution by right to remain silent -- Cr. Code, s. 127(2).

The expression "the course of justice" in s. 127(2) (rep. & sub. 1972, c. 13, s. 8) of the Criminal Code which provides that everyone who "wilfully attempts in any manner ... to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice is guilty of an indictable offence" includes judicial proceedings existing or proposed but is not limited to such proceedings and includes an attempt to obstruct, pervert or defeat a prosecution which the accused contemplates may take place, notwithstanding that no decision to prosecute has been made. Although s. 127(1), which deals with obstructing justice through indemnifying sureties, and s. 127(3), which deems certain acts to constitute obstructing justice, both use the words "in a judicial proceeding" and s. 127(3) provides that the proceeding may be "existing or proposed" the ejusdem generis rule should not be applied to similarly limit the offence in s. 127(2). Accordingly, where an accused gives a police officer a false name in order to avoid a charge of driving while disqualified and to thus escape a prosecution which he apprehends may ensue, the "course of justice" has commenced and the accused may be convicted of the offence contrary to s. 127(2) of the Criminal Code. The accused's common law right to remain silent cannot protect him in such circumstances. Although not every false statement to the police, such as a false denial of guilt, will be capable of supporting a charge of wilfully attempting to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice, whatever protection is afforded the accused by his right to remain silent cannot shield him from prosecution where he makes false statements to the police and misleads the police by giving a false name in order to protect himself.

APPEAL by the accused from his conviction on a charge of attempting to obstruct justice contrary to s. 127(2) of the Criminal Code.

H. M. Kelly, for accused, appellant.

J. D. Ewart, for the Crown, respondent.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

MARTIN, J.A.:-- The appellant appeals from his conviction after a trial by a Provincial Court Judge under Part XVI of the Code and from the sentence of 30 days' imprisonment imposed upon him, on a charge as follows:

> ... on or about the 8th day of January 1976, at the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto in the Judicial District of York, unlawfully did wilfully attempt to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice, by identifying himself to a police officer as Vito Miceli, while he was disqualified from driving, and his driver's licence in the name of Frank Spezzano was suspended.

The material facts are these: On January 8, 1976, Police Constable Hoover had set up a radar location on Wilson Ave. At approximately 9:45 p.m., he observed a truck leaving a nearby plaza. The truck pulled into the eastbound curb lane of Wilson Ave. and cut off an eastbound vehicle. The officer followed the truck and stopped it. The appellant was the driver of the truck, which was a delivery truck for a pizzeria. The officer asked the appellant for his licence and he stated "that he had none". He was then requested to produce evidence of identification but was unable to do so. The appellant identified himself verbally to the officer as Vito Miceli, 62 Langstaffe Ave., Thornhill. He also gave the officer the date of his birth, and told him that he had left his licence at home.

The officer was familiar with the name, Vito Miceli, having stopped a person by that name earlier that month. In the meantime another officer had arrived on the scene. Constable Hoover told the appellant that he was not the person he claimed to be, but the appellant maintained that he was. Constable Hoover then left the appellant with the other officer and went to the store of the appellant's employer who was also the owner of the vehicle in question. When Constable Hoover returned with the appellant's employer the appellant was again asked what his name was; whereupon he admitted that he had lied to the officer, and said that "he was under suspension, he needed a job, and that's why he was driving." The appellant then gave the officer his correct name and address.

The appellant did not testify at his trial. The trial Judge in his reasons for judgment said:

> In this case on the evidence I find that the Crown has shown that this man did identify himself in the name of some other living person. The Crown on the statement which was given by the accused has proved that the man was driving under suspension, he was disqualified, the accused admitted that, and the evidence which he admitted to the officer is prima facie evidence that he is driving under suspension, and that in fact he used the name of Vito Miceli in order to avoid being prosecuted.
> There are cases on this particular section. One case that comes to mind is where the accused denies that he was in fact himself, denies that he was the person that the officer was looking for, and it was held in that case that that was not the purpose of the section, the whole purpose of this section is to prevent people from identifying themselves as some other particular living person, and for that purpose only. It is not an obstruction of justice to deny that you are a particular person, nor is it obstruction of justice to remain silent, but once you step past that mark and identify yourself as some other living person then you are in breach of this section. I find this accused did in fact breach this section and there will in fact be a conviction.

Counsel for the appellant contended before us that there was no evidence that Vito Miceli was a living person. I am disposed to think there was some evidence in support of the trial Judge's finding on this point, although I do not consider that proof that Vito Miceli was a living person was essential to support a conviction of the offence charged against the appellant. I am also of the view that there was evidence which warranted the trial Judge's finding, which is implicit in his reasons for judgment, that the appellant gave a false name to avoid a prosecution under the Code for driving while disqualified, although, for the reasons which I will develop later, it is immaterial whether the appellant's intention was to avoid a prosecution for a criminal offence in the strict sense as distinct from an offence created by provincial enactment, if his conduct otherwise fell within s. 127(2) of the Code.

Two separate but related questions are presented by this appeal:

(a) Is the offence of wilfully attempting to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice under s. 127(2) of the Code confined to attempts to interfere with judicial proceedings, instituted or proposed, or does the section extend to attempts to obstruct police investigation which may lead to the detection of an offence or the offender's connection with it

(b) If the offence is not confined to interference with existing or proposed judicial proceedings, did the appellant, in making the particular false statement, commit the offence

Section 127 reads:

127(1) Every one who wilfully attempts in any manner to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice in a judicial proceeding,

(a) by indemnifying or agreeing to indemify a surety, in any way and either in whole or in part, or

(b) where he is a surety, by accepting or agreeing to accept a fee or any form of indemnity whether in whole or in part from or in respect of a person who is released or is to be released from custody, is guilty of

(c) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years, or

(d) an offence punishable on summary conviction.

(2) Every one who wilfully attempts in any manner other than a manner described in subsection (1) to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years.

(3) Without restricting the generality of subsection (2), every one shall be deemed wilfully to attempt to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice who in a judicial proceeding, existing or proposed,

(a) dissuades or attempts to dissuade a person by threats, bribes or other corrupt means from giving evidence;

(b) influences or attempts to influence by threats, bribes or other corrupt means, a person in his conduct as a juror; or

(c) accepts or obtains, agrees to accept or attempts to obtain a bribe or other corrupt consideration to abstain from giving evidence, or to do or to refrain from doing anything as a juror.

Counsel for the appellant contended before us that s. 127(2) must be read ejusdem generis with s-ss. (1) and (3), and that the words "in any manner other than a manner described in subsection (1)" are confined to wilfully attempting to obstruct, pervert, or defeat the course of justice in a judicial proceeding existing or proposed in a manner other than that specified in s. 127(1). He also contended that there is no evidence that the constable intended to charge the accused with an offence at the time the appellant gave the false name.

I am unable to accept this submission. In my view, notwithstanding the way in which the section is now cast, s. 127(2) creates a separate offence of wilfully attempting to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice and is not limited by the language of s-ss. (1) and (3). The expression "the course of justice" in s. 127(2) includes judicial proceedings existed or proposed but is not limited to such proceedings. The offence under s. 127(2) also includes attempts by a person to obstruct, pervert or defeat a prosecution which he contemplates may take place, notwithstanding that no decision to prosecute has been made.

The legislative history of s. 127(2) as well as the decided cases make it clear that this is the proper construction to be placed on s. 127(2). The predecessor of s. 127 was s. 119 in the Criminal Code that came into force on April 1, 1955. Section 119 read:

119(1) Every one who wilfully attempts in any manner to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

(2) Without restricting the generality of subsection (1), every one shall be deemed wilfully to attempt to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice who in a judicial proceeding, existing or proposed,

(a) dissuades or attempts to dissuade a person by threats, bribes or other corrupt means from giving evidence,

(b) influences or attempts to influence by threats, bribes or other corrupt means, a person in his conduct as a juror,

(c) accepts a bribe or other corrupt consideration to abstain from giving evidence, or to do or to refrain from doing anything as a juror,

(d) before or after being released from custody under recognizance, indemnifies or agrees to indemnify in any way, in whole or in part, his bondsman, or

(e) being a bondsman, accepts or agrees to accept indemnity, in whole or in part, from a person who is released or is to be released from custody under a recognizance.

Section 119 was renumbered s. 127 in R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, but the wording of the section remained unchanged. Paragraphs (d) and (e) of s-s. (2) of s. 127 were re-enacted and reworded by the Bail Reform Act, 1970-71-72, c. 37, s. 3. The entire section was then re-enacted by 1972, c. 13, s. 8, in its present form. The manifest purpose of the re-casting of the section was to leave the penalty imposed for offences in relation to the indemnification or payment of bondsmen at two years and to increase the penalty for the other offences created by the section to 10 years. Unquestionably, Parliament did not thereby intend to narrow the scope of s. 127(2) as it previously existed.

The predecessor of the present s. 127 was s. 180 in the Code, 1927, c. 36. The wording of s. 180 in the 1927 Code was identical to that of s. 154 in the Code, 1892, c. 29; s. 154 of the 1892 Code was derived from s. 128 and 129 of the English Draft Code, para. (d) of s. 154 of the 1892 Code being derived from s. 128 of the Draft Code which read [Report of Royal Commission, Law Relating to Indictable Offences (1879)]:

128. Every one shall be guilty of an indictable offence, and shall be liable upon conviction thereof to two years' imprisonment with hard labour, who wilfully attempts in any way not otherwise criminal to obstruct prevent pervert or defeat the course of justice or the administration of the law.

Section 154 of the 1892 Code read:

154. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who--

(a.) dissuades or attempts to dissuade any person by threats, bribes or other corrupt means from giving evidence in any cause or matter, civil or criminal; or

(b.) influences or attempts to influence, by threats or bribes or other corrupt means, any juryman in his conduct as such, whether such person has been sworn as a juryman or not; or

(c.) accepts any such bribe or other corrupt consideration to abstain from giving evidence, or on account of his conduct as a juryman; or (d.) wilfully attempts in any other way to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice.

I observe that s. 117 of the New Zealand Crimes Act, 1961 No. 43, is virtually identical to that of s. 154 of the Canadian Criminal Code of 1892, being also derived from the English Draft Code. The New Zealand Court of Appeal has held that the ejusdem generis rule should not be applied to the section; that para. (d) of s. 117 of that Act (the counterpart of para. (d) of s. 154 in the 1892 Canadian Criminal Code) includes all attempts to obstruct, prevent, pervert or defeat the course of justice not covered by paras. (a), (b) and (c), and that the expression "the course of justice" in s. 117(d) of the Crimes Act is not restricted to the process of adjudication but encompasses the investigation of offences and the arrest of suspected persons: see R. v. Coneybear et al., [1966] N.Z.L.R. 52; R. v. Kane, [1967] N.Z.L.R. 60.

In my view, the reasoning of the majority judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada in Kalick v. The King (1920), 1920 CanLII 488 (SCC), 35 C.C.C. 159, 61 S.C.R. 175, 55 D.L.R. 104, is conclusive against the contention of the appellant as to what is encompassed by the words "the course of justice" in s. 127(2), although the Court in that case was dealing with a different section of the Code. The appellant in that case was convicted under s. 157 of the Code [now s. 109] on a charge that with intent to interfere corruptly with "the due administration of justice" he corruptly gave a police officer a sum of money in order to induce such officer not to proceed against him for a violation of the Saskatchewan Temperance Act. The Supreme Court upheld the conviction. The Court held that the words "the due administration of justice" were not limited to apprehended proceedings in respect of crimes in the strict sense, that is to say, crimes created by Parliament under its exclusive power to legislate in relation to criminal law but extended to proceedings in respect of provincial offences. The Court also held that it was immaterial whether the police officer actually intended to institute a prosecution; it sufficed if the accused was apprehensive of a prosecution and gave the bribe to prevent it.

It is quite immaterial whether the police officer actually intended or contemplated instituting a prosecution. It suffices that the appellant gave the bribe with intent to head off such a proceeding. The due administration of justice is interfered with quite as much by improperly preventing the institution of a prosecution as by corruptly burking one already begun.

Brodeur, J., said at pp. 166-7 C.C.C., p. 186 S.C.R., p. 112 D.L.R.:

> I am of opinion that the "administration of justice" mentioned in sec. 157 of the Crim. Code should not be restricted to what takes place after an information had been laid; but it includes the taking of necessary steps to have a person who has committed an offence brought before the proper tribunal and punished for his offence.

Mignault, J., said at p. 167 C.C.C., p. 187 S.C.R., p. 112 D.L.R.:

> To give a bribe to a police officer with this intent is a corrupt interference with the administration of justice within the terms of sec. 157. It is, in my opinion, immaterial whether proceedings were then pending or merely likely to be taken, and I do not think that the fact that these proceedings were to be instituted under the Saskatchewan Temperance Act takes the case out of the operation of this section of the Criminal Code.

In R. v. Morin (1968), 5 C.R.N.S. 297, Rinfret, J. (with whom Casey and Salvas, JJ., concurred), after referring to the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in Kalick v. The King, supra, and the broad meaning given in that case to the words "the administration of justice", held that the expression "the course of justice" must be interpreted in the same way:
see also R. v. Sharpe and Stringer (1937), 26 Cr.App.R. 122; R. v. Robinson et al., Journal of Criminal Law, vol. II (1938), p. 62; Dalton v. H.M. Advocate, [1951] S.C. (J.) 76; R. v. Whalen et al. (1974), 1974 CanLII 1581 (ON SC), 17 C.C.C. (2d) 217.

I am of the view, as previously indicated, that there was evidence to support the finding of the trial Judge that the appellant made the false statement to the constable during an investigation by the latter of a suspected offence and that it was made by the appellant to escape prosecution for an offence which the appellant apprehended might ensue. In those circumstances the "course of justice" had commenced.

The appellant contended, however, that a false statement made by a person to a police officer investigating an offence, in order to escape prosecution of himself, does not constitute an offence under s. 127(2). Appellant's counsel said that since an accused has a common law right to remain silent and has no obligation to assist the police in establishing that he has committed an offence, the making of a false statement to a police officer in order to circumvent prosecution of himself for an offence is not proscribed by s. 127(2), whatever the position may be with respect to false statements made to a police officer in order to assist a third person to escape detection or prosecution.

In support of his submission counsel for the appellant relied upon the judgment of Judge Waisberg in R. v. Balsdon, 1967 CanLII 226 (ON SC), [1968] 2 C.C.C. 164, [1967] 2 O.R. 653, acquitting the accused of a charge under s. 119(1) (the predecessor of s. 127(2)) of wilfully obstructing the course of justice by informing two police officers that he was not Garnet Balsdon. In that case a police officer had attended at a book store to execute warrants issued against the accused following convictions for unlawful parking, and requiring the accused in default of payment of the fines imposed to be imprisoned. The "clerk" in attendance at the store (who was, in fact, Balsdon) told the officer that Balsdon was not there. Subsequently, another police officer entered the store to serve the warrants previously issued as well as additional warrants. The officer was not satisfied with the "clerk's" answer that he was not Balsdon; upon further investigation the "clerk" admitted that he was, in fact, Balsdon. Judge Waisberg in his reasons for judgment considered a number of authorities, including the Australian case of R. v. Kataja, [1943] V.L.R. 145 at p. 147, in which Mann, C.J., in acquitting the accused of the common law offence of effecting a public mischief (as declared by the Court of Criminal Appeal in R. v. Manley, [1933] 1 K.B. 529) said:

> He told lies in order to cover up the further fact that he himself was the offender. In so doing he acted in a very usual and every-day manner, having regard to the methods of wrongdoers.

In acquitting the accused Judge Waisberg said at p. 169 C.C.C., p. 658 O.R.:

> The principle to be gleaned from the cases is that while a third party may commit an offence by lying on behalf of an offender, the offender himself has no obligation to be truthful about his own criminal conduct. The doctrines nemo tenetur seipsum accusare -- no man can be compelled to criminate himself -- and nemo tenetur prodere seipsum -- no one is bound to betray himself -- have been carefully safeguarded and preserved.

In R. v. Balsdon, supra, the accused confined himself to denying his identity, unlike the appellant in the present case, who falsely stated that he was Vito Miceli. Moreover, the right of the appellant to remain silent in the circumstances has been encroached upon by s. 14(2) of the Highway Traffic Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 202, which reads:

> 14(1) Every operator of a motor vehicle shall carry his licence with him at all times while he is in charge of a motor vehicle and shall produce it when demanded by a constable or by an officer appointed for carrying out the Provisions of this Act:

> (2) Every person who is unable or refuses to produce his licence in accordance with subsection 1 shall, when requested by a constable, give reasonable identification of himself and, for the purposes of this subsection, the correct name and address of such person shall be deemed to be reasonable identification.

R. v. Balsdon, supra, is clearly distinguishable from the present case and it is, therefore, unnecessary to express a concluded opinion whether it was correctly decided on its facts. (See the interesting and critical examination of that case by Professor Ed. Ratushny in an article "Is There Right Against Self-Incrimination In Canada", 19 McGill L.J. 1 (1973), at pp. 16-21.)

I feel bound to say, however, that the right to remain silent does not also confer a right to mislead a police officer investigating a crime by false information simply because the false statements are made by a person to shield himself from prosecution.

In Rice v. Connolly, [1966] 2 Q.B. 414, the appellant was observed by a constable to be acting in a suspicious manner in a neighbourhood where there had been a number of break-ins that night. He refused to give his correct name and address when requested to do so by the constable. He did not, however, make any false statements. In allowing the appellant's appeal from his conviction on a charge of wilfully obstructing a constable in the execution of his duty, Lord Parker said at pp. 419-20:

> Accordingly, the sole question here is whether the defendant had a lawful excuse for refusing to answer the questions put to him. In my judgment he had. It seems to me quite clear that though every citizen has a moral duty or, if you like, a social duty to assist the police, there is no legal duty to that effect, and indeed the whole basis of the common law is the right of the individual to refuse to answer questions put to him by persons in authority, and to refuse to accompany those in authority to any particular place; short, of course, of arrest.
> Mr. Skinner [counsel for the prosecutor respondent] has pointed out that it is undoubtedly an obstruction, and has been so held, for a person questioned by the police to tell a "cock-and-bull" story; to put the police off by giving them false information, and I think he would say: well, what is the real distinction It is a very little way from giving false information to giving no information at all. If that does in fact make it more difficult for the police to carry out their duties, then there is a wilful obstruction.
> In my judgment there is all the difference in the world between deliberately telling a false story--something which on no view a citizen has a right to do--and preserving silence or refusing to answer--something which he has every right to do.

Lord Parker in the above passage does not suggest that a person who by false information misleads a police officer investigating a crime in order to protect himself from detection or prosecution stands in any different position with respect to criminal liability than one who misleads such officer with the motive of protecting another.

In R. v. Field et al. (1964), 48 Cr.App.R. 355, the appellants were convicted of conspiracy to obstruct the course of justice by making false statements to the police in order to conceal the identity of one of the alleged conspirators. Lawton, L.J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal, rejected the argument of the appellants that the offence committed was merely that of acting in concert to obstruct the police and stated that a conspiracy to obstruct the course of justice is different in nature from a conspiracy to obstruct the police in the execution of their duty, but that the obstruction of the police may be the means by which the object of obstructing the course of justice is sought to be achieved.

I do not wish to be taken as holding that all false statements to the police during the investigation of a crime, made by a suspect in order to circumvent a prosecution of himself, are capable of supporting a charge of wilfully attempting to obstruct, pervert, or defeat the course of justice. Clearly, a false denial of guilt would not constitute the offence; to hold otherwise would be indirectly to require the suspected person to admit that he was guilty and nullify the great principle of the common law that an accused has the right to remain silent.

Whether a particular false statement to a police officer investigating a crime made by a suspect from motives of self- protection will attract criminal liability depends on the nature of the false statement and the particular circumstances in which it was made. I limit my judgment to the precise facts of this case. I am of the opinion that in the circumstances the appellant's false statement that he was Vito Miceli supports his conviction on the charge.

I would therefore dismiss the appeal from conviction. The sentence imposed does not reflect any error. I would also dismiss the appeal against the sentence.

REGINA v. ZECK

Ontario Court of Appeal, Houlden, C.J.O., Martin and Houlden, JJ.A.
May 13, 1980

1980 CanLII 2849 (ON CA)

J. J. Grosberg, for accused, appellant.
M. A. MacDonald, for the Crown, respondent.

The judgment of the Court was delivered orally by HOWLAND, C.J.O.:—This is an appeal from the conviction of the appellant on December 28, 1979, of attempting to obstruct the course of justice, and also from the sentence which was imposed on that date of imprisonment for a term of 45 days.

The appellant was charged that on or about September 7, 1979, at the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto in the Judicial District of York, he unlawfully did wilfully attempt to obstruct or pervert the course of justice by removing and destroying parking tags from automobiles previously tagged by police officers on St. Thomas St. contrary to the Criminal Code.

During the late evening of September 7, 1979, Sergeant Jack Lewis of the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force, was driving north on St. Thomas St. when he saw four or five cars on the west side with tags for being illegally parked. He observed the appellant, who was walking north on St. Thomas St., reach out and take a parking tag off a Chevrolet automobile and crumple it up. He then walked to the car behind, which was a Toyota, and again took off the parking tag and made a crunching movement. He had both tickets in his right hand, and when he was asked by the police officer what he was doing he put them back beneath the windshield wiper of the Toyota and made a half-hearted attempt to straighten them out. He gave his name as John Howlett. Constable John Garrow confirmed that he had issued the parking tag in respect of the Chevrolet for parking in a prohibited area. Sergeant David Bowen also gave evidence that when the tags had been removed the owners of the cars would not know that they had been given tags, and would receive summonses in the mail at a slightly increased cost.

Section 127(2) [rep. & sub. 1972, c. 13, s. 8] of the Criminal Code provides that:

> 127(2) Every one who wilfully attempts in any manner other than a manner described in subsection (1) to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years.

The proper interpretation to be given to the words "the course of justice" were considered by this Court in R. v. Spezzano (1977), 34 C.C.C. (2d) 87, 76 D.L.R. (3d) 160, 15 O.R. (2d) 489. There the appellant had given a police officer a false name in order to avoid a charge of driving while disqualified. Martin, J. A., in delivering the judgment of the Court pointed out at p. 91 that the expression "the course of justice" included existing or proposed judicial proceedings, but was not limited to such proceedings, and that it also included attempts by a person to obstruct, pervert or defeat a prosecution which the person contemplates may take place, notwithstanding that no decision to prosecute has been made. In that case Martin, J. A., also drew attention to the broad interpretation that had been given by the Supreme Court of Canada in Kalick v. The King (1920), 35 C.C.C. 159, 65 D.L.R. 104, 61 S.C.R. 175, to the words "the due administration of justice" in connection with a prosecution under s. 157 of the Code. Referring to that decision he stated at p. 92:

> The Court held that the words "the due administration of justice" were not limited to apprehended proceedings in respect of crimes in the strict sense, that is to say, crimes created by Parliament under its exclusive power to legislate in relation to criminal law but extended to proceedings in respect of provincial offences

He then went on to point out at p. 93 that in R. v. Morin (1968), 5 C.R.N.S. 297, Rinfret, J., of the Quebec Queen's Bench (Appeal Side) (with whom Casey and Salvas, JJ., concurred) had held that the same broad meaning must be given to the words "the course of justice" in interpreting the predecessor of s. 127 of the Code as had been given by the Supreme Court of Canada in Kalick v. The King to the words "the administration of justice". In reaching his conclusion Rinfret, J., at p. 303 cited with approval the dicta of Brodeur, J., in Kalick v. The King that the " 'administration of justice' " " 'includes the taking of necessary steps to have a person who has committed an offence brought before the proper tribunal, and punished for his offence. It is a very wide term covering the detection, prosecution and punishment of offenders' ".

We are in agreement that a broad interpretation should be given to the words "the course of justice" in s. 127(2). In our opinion, s. 127(2) applies to steps which are taken to obstruct the normal enforcement by the police of the contravention of a municipal by-law, such as the parking by-law which is in question in this appeal. Accordingly, the appeal as to conviction is dismissed.

With respect to the appeal as to sentence, it should be noted that the appellant is 41 years of age. He is a dentist, who is married and has four children. There was one previous incident in which the appellant had received two convictions for assaulting the police, and a conviction for mischief in respect of private property. In our opinion, there was no error on the part of the trial Judge in imposing a custodial term. The appellant had been dealt with on the previous occasion in a lenient manner and was on probation at the time of the commission of this offence. Counsel for the Crown conceded that the offence which was committed was in the low range for offences involving the obstruction of justice. However, it was a flagrant interference with the police who were carrying out their normal duties. We consider that the sentence of 45 days was too long in the circumstances, and that a sentence of imprisonment for 14 days would be appropriate.

Accordingly, the appeal as to sentence is allowed and the sentence is varied from a term of 45 days to a term of 14 days.

Appeal from conviction dismissed; appeal from sentence allowed.

Case Summary

Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Freedom of expression — Open court principle — Freedom of information — Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act violating

s. 2(b) of Charter substantively by presuming non-disclosure of adjudicative records held by administrative tribunals under "personal information" exemption and procedurally by occasioning delay in accessing adjudicative records — Procedural infringement justified under s. 1 of Charter — Substantive infringement not justified under s. 1 — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 1, 2(b) — Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. F.31.

The applicant brought an application challenging the constitutionality of certain provisions of the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act ("FIPPA") insofar as those provisions apply to "adjudicative records" held by 13 administrative tribunals which hold adjudicative hearings. In particular, the applicant submitted that the presumption of non-disclosure of records under the "personal information" exemption in s. 21(1) of FIPPA violates the open court principle under s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms when applied to adjudicative records held by those tribunals. "Adjudicative records", in the context of this application, meant records that are part of the actual record of the tribunal hearing, not documents that were part of the pre-hearing discovery but that did not get introduced at the hearing itself.

Held, the application should be allowed.

The applicant had public interest standing to bring this application, and was not required to mount its constitutional challenge by applying for judicial review of individual Information and Privacy Commission decisions.

Of the 13 tribunals identified by the applicant, eight did not use the FIPPA process at all. Unless and until the applicant's (or anyone else's) rights were infringed by those eight non-FIPPA applying tribunals, there was nothing further to analyze in respect of them.

The open court principle, which is inextricably tied to the rights guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Charter, applies to administrative tribunals as well as to courts. FIPPA violates s. 2(b) of the Charter in two respect -- substantively by imposing a reverse onus on a request for adjudicative records to which the "personal information" exemption is said to apply; and procedurally by occasioning delay in accessing adjudicative records. The multiple objectives of FIPPA are sufficiently important to warrant overriding a Charter-protected right. There is a rational connection between those objectives and the inclusion of adjudicative tribunals in the Schedule to FIPPA. The substantive violation of s. 2(b) is not justified under s. 1 of the Charter. The reverse onus on requests for personal information does not minimally impair s. 2(b). The deleterious effects of the presumption against disclosure are real and substantial, and outweigh the purely speculative advantage of encouraging access to justice by individuals who might stop using the relevant tribunals if their identities were exposed to the public. A declaration of invalidity [page267] was granted. As for FIPPA's procedural limitations on s. 2(b), the notice requirements, timelines, etc. minimally impair s. 2(b). While those procedural factors may be subject to extension and abuse in individual cases, they are, in their own terms, justifiable as minimal intrusions on the open court principle. That conclusion effectively rendered the proportionality analysis redundant: a minimal impairment of a Charter right is already proportionate to that right.

I. The Constitutional Challenge

[1] This case challenges the application of the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act ("FIPPA")[1] to 13 administrative tribunals,[2] all of which are designated as "institutions" in the Schedule to the FIPPA General Regulation.[3] The claim originally included the Workplace Safety and Insurance Appeals Tribunal ("WSIAT") as a named respondent, but the Toronto Star has abandoned its claim against WSIAT and the application against it is accordingly dismissed.

[2] Among other things, FIPPA sets out terms on which access is granted to documents held by government and wider public sector institutions. The Toronto Star contends that by applying to tribunals that preside over adversarial processes, adjudicate disputes and act judicially or quasi-judicially, FIPPA violates the open courts [page273] principle embedded in s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (the "Charter").[4]

[3] The venerability of the open courts, or openness principle is not in doubt. In the 13th century, Magna Carta confirmed the prohibition against selling writs, or admission tickets to trials, in favour of open public access to court proceedings.[5] The openness principle was reiterated by Sir Matthew Hale in the 17th century, who noted that witnesses must be examined "in the open court, and in the presence of the parties, their attorneys, counsel and all bystanders".[6] In the 18th century, William Blackstone understatedly observed that "the open examination of witnesses . . . is much more conducive to the clearing up of the truth".[7]

[4] The concept of open justice easily made the crossing from England; accordingly, Canadian courts have historically recognized that, "it is of vast importance to the public that the proceedings of courts of justice should be universally known".[8] This has been reinforced in the post-Charter era, with the Supreme Court of Canada emphasizing that public access to legal proceedings includes access by the press:

> Discussion of court cases and constructive criticism of court proceedings is dependent upon the receipt by the public of information as to what transpired in court. Practically speaking, this information can only be obtained from the newspapers or other media.[9]

[5] The question in this application is whether and how this judicial principle applies to contemporary administrative law proceedings. In many ways the 13 tribunals at issue here are stand-ins for a large number of adjudicative tribunals across the province.[10] As former Chief Justice McLachlin describes it, "vast and [page274] unlimited stretches of law and conduct that formerly fell under the jurisdiction of common law courts were swallowed up by these new schemes. . . . More and more, administrative tribunals regulated the problems created by modern society."[11]

[6] All parties acknowledge that administrative hearings governed by the Statutory Powers Procedure Act ("SPPA") are required to be open to the public.[12] In principle, therefore, it is uncontroversial that "[t]he 'open court' principle" -- at least in some version -- "is a cornerstone of accountability for decision-making tribunals and courts".[13]

[7] The present controversy arises with respect to documents filed with administrative tribunals that hold adjudicative hearings. More specifically, the issue posed in this Application challenges the means by which such documents are accessed by the press outside of the adjudicative hearing itself.

[8] The application is restricted even further to those documents that qualify as records of tribunal proceedings. The SPPA contains a list of "records" for the purposes of hearings by tribunals covered by that Act. This list provides a ready definition of the documents to which the present application applies ("Adjudicative Records"). These include:

> (a) any application, complaint, reference or other document, if any, by which the proceeding was commenced;
> (b) the notice of any hearing;
>
> (c) any interlocutory orders made by the tribunal;
>
> (d) all documentary evidence filed with the tribunal, subject to any limitation expressly imposed by any other Act on the extent to or the purposes for which any such documents may be used in evidence in any proceeding;
>
> (e) the transcript, if any, of the oral evidence given at the hearing; and
>
> (f) the decision of the tribunal and the reasons therefor,
> where reasons have been given.[14]

[9] To this definition I would add tribunal dockets or schedules of hearings and registers of actions or proceedings kept by the [page275] adjudicative tribunals. These are included in a similar list of Adjudicative Records published by the Canadian Judicial Council. That list is accompanied by an advisory, which is equally applicable here, as to a number of items that are not included as Adjudicative Records, as follows:

> This definition does not include other records that might be maintained by court staff, but that are not connected with court proceedings, such as license and public land records. It does not include any information that merely pertains to management and administration of the court, such as judicial training programs, scheduling of judges and trials and statistics of judicial activity. Neither does it include any personal note, memorandum, draft and similar document or information that is prepared and used by judges, court officials and other court personnel.[15]

[10] I would also clarify that Adjudicative Records do not include documents exchanged between the parties to a hearing and filed with the tribunal in the pre-hearing stage of proceedings. Counsel for the Attorney General and a number of the intervenors advise that some adjudicative tribunals require parties to file with the tribunal all relevant documents in their possession prior to the hearing. In those situations, the tribunal's file in the given matter may resemble the full pre-trial documentary discovery in civil litigation.

[11] Counsel for the Toronto Star states that the challenge posed here is for access to Adjudicative Records that are part of the actual record of the tribunal hearing. It does not include documents that were part of pre-hearing discovery but that did not get introduced at the hearing itself. The open court principle includes access to "anything that has been made part of the record",[16] but it does not cover documents that did not make it to open court.

[12] While most of the tribunals in issue hold open hearings and make their Adjudicative Records available for inspection during the hearing itself, the Toronto Star has documented the difficulties in obtaining access to tribunal schedules before the hearing has taken place and inspecting or copying Adjudicative Records after the hearing has ended. Many, although not all, of the tribunals in issue take the position that access to those documents is governed by FIPPA.

[13] The Toronto Star submits that FIPPA, which sets out statutory terms on which members of the press or public can obtain copies of all documents held by government, burdens the [page276] right of access and is thereby contrary to the requirement of open hearings. In response, the Attorney General submits that FIPPA is itself a tool to promote access to information held by public and administrative bodies, including tribunals, and in doing so thereby fosters openness.

[14] The Supreme Court of Canada has stated that "[a]ll law and law-makers that touch the people must conform to [the Charter]. Tribunals and commissions charged with deciding legal issues are no exception."[17] What needs to be determined is the effect of FIPPA in this regard. Do its substantive terms that weigh access to documents against privacy protection, and its procedural regime by which documents are requested, vetted and withheld or produced, conform with or undermine the requirement of openness? As the English Court of Appeal has said in its inimitable way, "The rule of law is a fine concept but fine words butter no parsnips. How is the rule of law itself to be policed?"[18]

II. The FIPPA Process

[15] In raising its constitutional challenge, the Toronto Star identifies a series of issues that are occasioned by the terms of FIPPA as applied to administrative tribunals. These include procedural issues which are alleged to lead to undue delay in obtaining Adjudicative Records, and substantive issues which are alleged to exempt many Adjudicative Records (or much of the information contained in Adjudicative Records) from production at all.

a) Procedural issues in FIPPA

[16] The FIPPA process is, as counsel for the Toronto Star describes it, a bureaucratic one. To make a relatively long piece of legislation short, under s. 24(1) a person seeking access to a record -- i.e., a document or information, including an Adjudicative Record -- from an applicable institution must make a formal request, pay a minimal prescribed fee and provide sufficient information for the record to be identified.

[17] The head of the institution has authority to determine whether the request is frivolous (s. 24(1.1)), whether there is sufficient detail (s. 24(2)), forward the request to the relevant agency [page277] holding the record and give written notice thereof (s. 25). Further, the head of the institution is mandated to within 30 days advise the applicant whether or not the request will be granted, or to extend the 30-day time period if necessary (s. 27). Before making a decision, an institution head must give written notice to any person effected by the record requested (s. 28(1)) and give a copy of that notice to the requester (s. 28(4)), then allow representations to be made by each (s. 28(2)(c), 28(4) (b)), and within ten days make a decision about disclosing the record in issue (s. 28(4)(c)). Like all of the timelines under FIPPA, this period can also be extended as the head of the institution deems necessary (s. 28(8.1)).

[18] A person requesting the record or a person affected by the disclosure has a right of appeal to the Information and Privacy Commission ("IPC") (s. 50(1)). The IPC then provides notice of the appeal to the head of the institution from which the record was requested (s. 50(3)). There are time periods set aside for potential mediation of the dispute (s. 51) and the IPC may conduct a review of the head of institution's initial decision (s. 52). After that, the "person who requested access to the record, the head of the institution concerned and any other institution or person informed of the notice of appeal" has an opportunity to make submissions to the IPC (s. 52(13)). Finally, after receiving all applicable submissions, the IPC is authorized to make a decision disposing of the issues on appeal (s. 54(1)) and provide notice of the decision to all relevant parties (s. 54(4)).

[19] The FIPPA process is a potentially lengthy one when played out in full. Although the above is a capsulized summary, counsel for the Toronto Star points out that in all there are some six different notice periods that can become relevant in a given record request, all of which add to the time that it takes for a request to be processed and answered. The evidence in the record of the Toronto Star's specific access requests to different administrative institutions varies from a few days to many months or even years, depending on the nature of the tribunal and the records being sought.

[20] Since the timelines vary greatly from request to request, it is possible to overstate both the expediency and the delay of the process. The Toronto Star understandably stresses the journalistic imperative of timely disclosure and the newsworthiness of the documents sought. It recounts the experiences of one of its reporters, who sought Adjudicative Records from the OLRB but who gave up his appeal to the IPC after eight months without a final decision on what would be produced. It also recounts experiences of its reporters with the CICB, in which one request for Adjudicative Records took 12 weeks to be answered. [page278]

[21] The Attorney General stresses the need to accurately balance the competing imperatives of privacy rights and public access under FIPPA. It emphasizes the experience related by a Toronto Star reporter in which the HRTO responded to a disclosure request within 45 days of its submission. Other incidents narrated in the affidavit material filed before the court reveal a seven-week process for a reporter to obtain Adjudicative Records from the CICB, 32 days from the PEHT and ten days for a reporter to be provided with Adjudicative Records from the LTB. Counsel for the Attorney General concedes that many disclosure packages come with notable redactions and withheld material, but contends that the time lines are generally significantly shorter than the more egregious delays cited by counsel for the Toronto Star.

[22] It is noteworthy that both sides agree that there are a number of tribunals included in this application whose process entails no delay at all. As discussed further below, these tend to be the institutions that have fashioned their own method of handling document requests outside of the FIPPA process. Thus, for example, the OSC posts its docket lists and its unredacted decisions on its website, and allows public access to Adjudicative Records without requiring any FIPPA request at all. The ERT and the OMB do the same, as do the FST and the OCPC except that the names of individuals are typically anonymized (with the exception of police officers, whose names are disclosed by the OCPC).

b) Substantive issues in FIPPA

[23] Separate from the cumbersome procedures, the other aspect of FIPPA emphasized by counsel for the Toronto Star is that it contains a presumption of non-disclosure of many records. That is, it protects privacy by placing the onus on the party seeking disclosure of records, including Adjudicative Records, to justify why they should be disclosed.

[24] The FIPPA regime commences on a premise that simultaneously embraces openness and closure. Section 10(1) provides that "every person has a right of access to a record or a part of a record in the custody or under the control of an institution unless, (a) the record or the part of the record falls within one of the exemptions under sections 12 to 22 . . .". Although the provision is phrased in terms of transparency, the exemptions are anything but minor. Counsel for the Toronto Star identifies one exemption in particular that is so broad as to swallow up the initial mandate to disclose records upon request -- the personal privacy exemption: "A head shall refuse to disclose personal information to any person other than the individual to whom the information relates" (s. 21(1)). [page279]

[25] This prohibition on disclosure of personal information is repeated in Part III of the FIPPA, entitled "Protection of Individual Privacy". Under that general heading, s. 42(1) provides that "[a]n institution shall not disclose personal information in its custody or under its control", except in accordance with a number of listed exceptions. It is fair to say that none of the exceptions to the non-disclosure of personal information exemption in s. 21(1) or s. 42(1), or any of their follow-up sections, pertain to access to Adjudicative Records as a general category.

[26] The trigger phrase "personal information" is described very broadly in s. 2(1) of FIPPA:

"personal information" means recorded information about an identifiable individual, including,

(a) information relating to the race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, sexual orientation or marital or family status of the individual,

(b) information relating to the education or the medical, psychiatric, psychological, criminal or employment history of the individual or information relating to financial transactions in which the individual has been involved,

(c) any identifying number, symbol or other particular assigned to the individual,

(d) the address, telephone number, fingerprints or blood type of the individual,

(e) the personal opinions or views of the individual except where they relate to another individual,

(f) correspondence sent to an institution by the individual that is implicitly orexplicitly of a private or confidential nature, and replies to that correspondence that would reveal the contents of the original correspondence,

(g) the views or opinions of another individual about the individual, and

(h) the individual's name where it appears with other personal information relating to the individual or where the disclosure of the name would reveal other personal information about the individual.

[27] As indicated above, there are exceptions to the exemption from disclosure of any record containing "personal information"; and, again, an institution's head at first appears to maintain wide discretion to decide whether the sought-for document falls within the exceptions to the exemption. Section 21(1)(c) provides that the record can be disclosed where it contains "personal information collected and maintained specifically for the purpose of creating a record available to the general public", while s. 21(1) (f) provides more generally that the record may be disclosed "if the disclosure does not constitute an unjustified invasion of personal privacy". This discretion, however, is circumscribed by a further [page280] list of statutory presumptions that narrow the exceptions to the personal information exemption:

21(3) A disclosure of personal information is presumed to constitute an unjustified invasion of personal privacy where the personal information,

(a) relates to a medical, psychiatric or psychological history, diagnosis, condition, treatment or evaluation;

(b) was compiled and is identifiable as part of an investigation into a possibleviolation of law, except to the extent that disclosure is necessary to prosecute the violation or to continue the investigation;

(c) relates to eligibility for social service or welfare benefits or to the determination of benefit levels;

(d) relates to employment or educational history;

(e) was obtained on a tax return or gathered for the purpose of collecting a tax;

(f) describes an individual's finances, income, assets, liabilities, net worth, bank balances, financial history or activities, or creditworthiness;

(g) consists of personal recommendations or evaluations, character references or personnel evaluations; or

(h) indicates the individual's racial or ethnic origin, sexual orientation or religious or political beliefs or associations.

[28] The evidence collected by the Toronto Star and, indeed, the reported decisions by the IPC regarding production of records, suggests that the personal information exemption is so widely invoked that it has become the rule rather than an exemption to the rule. In effect, decisions about production of records under FIPPA start from the s. 21(1) premise of non-production rather than from the s. 10(1) premise of production.

[29] Adjudicative Records, in particular, are likely to fall within the definition of "personal information", since they almost inevitably contain personal information identifying the parties, were most often compiled in respect of an investigation into a regulatory breach or other violation of the law, and frequently relate to either welfare benefits, employment, education finances, race or sexuality, etc. Moreover, complaints to regulators, pleadings and other primary documents filed with tribunals invariably contain opinions by one person about the issue at hand or the opinion of one person about another, making them "personal information" under s. 2(1) (e) and (g). Differences of opinion are what adjudicated disputes are virtually always about, but their effect is to bring the Adjudicative Records into the s. 21 exemption.

[30] It is worth noting that one potentially important exception to the personal information exemption, s. 23 of FIPPA, appears to [page281] be rarely invoked. A typical comment in IPC decisions is to the effect that "[t]he appellant has not claimed that section 23 [the public interest override] applies in this case, and in my view, it would not apply in any event".[19] That section provides that "[a]n exemption from disclosure of a record . . . does not apply where a compelling public interest in the disclosure of the record clearly outweighs the purpose of the exemption."

[31] Despite its seeming importance to the issues here, the IPC does not consider it to override the s. 21(1) exemption of personal information from disclosure. The reason for this, and presumably for the paucity of cases invoking it, is that s. 23 has been given a very strict reading and narrow ambit of operation. The Divisional Court has interpreted s. 23 as applying where the "public interest" is not only more important than the personal information found in the specific Adjudicative Record, but more important than the protection of personal information at all:

> The two requirements contained in section 23 must be satisfied in order to invoke the application of the so-called "public interest override": there must be a compelling public interest in disclosure; and this compelling interest must clearly outweigh the purpose of the exemption, as distinct from the value of disclosure of the particular record in question.

[32] As the IPC generally puts it, in order to fall within the s. 23 exception to the non-disclosure rule, the requester must establish that there is a "rousing strong interest and attention"[21] in the record sought -- again, an interest that goes beyond an interest in reporting on a case before the administrative body but that "add[s] in some way to the information the public has to make effective use of the means of expressing public opinion or to make political choices".[22] In other words, a requester must demonstrate to the IPC's satisfaction that there is a public interest in the Adjudicative Record not simply to inform the public about the particular case, but for the larger societal purpose of aiding the public in making political choices. [page282]

[33] Even in theory this would eliminate all but the largest and most politically prominent of cases from media access to Adjudicative Records and the details contained therein; in practice, it seems to have reduced the section to negligible use. The minimization of s. 23 is, of course, part and parcel of the expansion of s. 21 and its accompanying sections. Much like an expansive use of exclusionary rules in the law of evidence or deeming provisions in defining "constructive liability", the "personal information" exemption stands as an adaptable device -- a "legal artifice" that "brand[s] as legally irrelevant, information that might otherwise figure significantly in determining a person's [right of access]".[23] With the contraction of s. 23, many decisions under FIPPA embody the idea that the public almost never has a compelling interest in the records, and all that is not already public is kept private.

[34] As a result of FIPPA's aversion to allowing any "personal information" to be disclosed, the LTB (and its predecessor, the Ontario Rental Housing Tribunal),[24] the HRTO[25] and other similar institutions either refuse to produce Adjudicative Records or heavily redact them. This includes dockets and other types of agendas that would help identify the cases in advance of their being heard.[26] Furthermore, the IPC has stated that the requester does not satisfied its onus of proving that the request falls within the s. 21(1)(c) exception for documents collected for the purpose of making them available to the public where "the personal information . . . is collected . . . from the [parties] filing the form for the purpose of adjudicating disputes".[27] Thus, Adjudicative Records do not fit within any exception to the personal information exemption by virtue of having been filed in a public hearing.

[35] In other words, the presumption of non-disclosure, or the reverse onus in respect of the production of the broadly framed definition of "personal information", presents a serious obstacle to disclosure of Adjudicative Records. As counsel for the IPC acknowledged at the hearing of this application, this statutory [page283] approach has led the HRTO and certain other of the 13 tribunals in issue here to refuse most if not all requests for production of records filed with it, including Adjudicative Records, where those records have identifying information. All that is required for a requested record to fall into the non-disclosable category is that the decision maker -- either the head of the institution in the first instance or the IPC on appeal -- be satisfied that the record passes a test set at a rather low bar: "If there is a reasonable expectation that the individual can be identified from the information, then such information qualifies under subsection 2(1) as personal information."[28]

III. Application of FIPPA

[36] FIPPA applies to all branches of provincial government and to all of the 182 public institutions listed in the Schedule thereto.[29] This includes, but is obviously not limited to, a great many adjudicative tribunals. Indeed, a cursory glance at the governing legislation and General Regulation thereunder reveals that FIPPA applies to an exceptionally diverse range of institutions. These span all government ministries, government service providers, universities, hospitals, agencies, boards, commissions, corporations and tribunals. Given the variety of functions carried out by these institutions, it is little wonder that the process established under FIPPA functions well with some and seems dysfunctional with others.

[37] As already discussed, it is important to note that the Toronto Star challenges access to Adjudicative Records only, and not to all documents held by the institutions to which FIPPA applies. This distinction, of course, eliminates Ontario's many non-adjudicative bodies from the ambit of the present analysis. In this application, the Toronto Star does not seek or challenge any records (or the process by which records can be obtained) from public institutions such as government ministries, hospitals, universities, etc. Its focus is strictly on those institutions that act in an adjudicative capacity.

[38] The very fact that on its face FIPPA does not distinguish between Adjudicative Records and non-adjudicative records is indicative of the difficulties inherent in fashioning an all-embracing disclosure regime. As suggested by the Canadian Judicial Council's qualification on the definition of Adjudicative Records set out earlier, there is a significant difference between [page284] granting access to documents introduced by parties to hearings and entered into the evidentiary record and granting access to a given institution's management records.

[39] To take a simple illustration, a media request for access to educational records filed by the parties in a professional negligence case must be analyzed one way, while a media request for access to the educational records of the judge presiding over that trial must be analyzed in an entirely different way. Both types of records may well be in the hands of the court or tribunal qua public institution, but one set of records are Adjudicative Records that form part of an open court record while the other are administrative or personnel records that ordinarily would play no role in the specific judicial process to which the request relates.

[40] This debate -- i.e., whether administrative bodies are part and parcel of government and the information and documents they hold must be treated as part of government business, or are independent decision-makers and the information and documents they hold must be treated as Adjudicative Records -- highlights a dichotomy that lies at the core of the issues in the application. As the House of Lords put it some eight decades ago, openness to the public is the "authentic hallmark of judicial as distinct from administrative procedure".[30] A government personnel committee contemplating hiring a lawyer is not required by the open courts concept to meet in public; a Law Society discipline committee contemplating sanctions against a lawyer is.[31] The former is a public institution conducting its business or administration, while the latter is a public institution conducting an adjudication.

[41] The duality of being an administrative arm of the executive and an independent adjudicative body characterizes many of the institutions at issue here and poses an interpretive problem in applying FIPPA. Counsel for the IPC, which, as noted above, is the body to which FIPPA disclosure decisions can be appealed, concedes that while FIPPA on its face does not address the different character traits of administrative institutions, there is an open question of interpretation as to how and where its privacy mandate applies. Thus, the IPC itself has yet to determine whether the privacy protections contained in Part III of FIPPA apply to Adjudicative Records. That said, institution heads and the IPC routinely apply the s. 21 exemption in response to specific applications for access. [page285]

[42] The Supreme Court of Canada has observed that "[administrative institutions] may be seen as spanning the constitutional divide between the executive and judicial branches of government".[32] Thus, on one hand, it has been said that "[i]t is unrealistic to expect an administrative tribunal such as the [Ontario Labour Relations] Board to abide strictly by the rules applicable to courts of law."[33] On the other hand, it has been observed that the very same board -- the OLRB -- "does not carry on any business", but has the power to "exercise certain functions of a judicial nature".[34] Former Chief Justice Lamer has pointed out that characterizing administrative bodies depends on their function in the circumstances: "the principles for judicial independence . . . are applicable in the case of an administrative tribunal, where the tribunal is functioning as an adjudicative body settling disputes and determining the rights of parties".[35]

[43] As indicated, the express terms of FIPPA draw no distinction between the administrative or "business" functions of governmental bodies and the adjudicative functions of administrative tribunals. Some institutions covered by FIPPA conceive of themselves as part of government and thus "lack [a] constitutional distinction from the executive. They are, in fact, created precisely for the purpose of implementing government policy".[36] Others conceive of themselves as adjudicators rather than administrators and adhere to the notion that they are "expressly created as independent bodies for the purpose of being an alternative to the judicial process".[37]

[44] This distinction, then, translates into the varying approach to openness and other aspects of procedure that is discernable among the large array of institutions named in the schedule to FIPPA. The Supreme Court has indicated that this variety of procedures is an inevitable incident of administrative law: [page286]

> Some administrative tribunals are closer to the executive end of the spectrum: their primary purpose is to develop, or supervise the implementation of, particular government policies. Such tribunals may require little by way of procedural protections. Other tribunals, however, are closer to the judicial end of the spectrum: their primary purpose is to adjudicate disputes through some form of hearing. Tribunals at this end of the spectrum may possess court-like powers and procedures. These powers may bring with them stringent requirements of procedural fairness, including a higher requirement of independence.[38]

[45] Of the 13 institutions specifically put in issue by the Toronto Star, eight do not appear to use the FIPPA process at all.[39] That is, post-hearing requests for access to and copies of Adjudicative Records are handled directly by the tribunal itself without the mechanism of a FIPPA application. Those tribunals have devised their own methodology for assessing the requests. Counsel for the Attorney General and counsel for the IPC support this diversity of approaches. It is their view that FIPPA applies where a person has made an application thereunder, but it does not require any given institution to embrace it as the sole mechanism for access to documents.

[46] This view is similar to that taken by the Federal Court of Appeal, where the decision as to whether to apply the federal equivalent to FIPPA, the Privacy Act, has been left to the institution itself. As the court put it: ". . . once the Agency placed the documents . . . on its Public Record . . . those documents became Publicly Available. As such, the limitation on their disclosure, contained in subsection 8(1) of the Privacy Act was no longer applicable".[40] FIPPA, like the Privacy Act, does not explicitly state under what circumstances it applies to any given institution; the reason for this may well be that the answer eludes any overarching definition.

[47] Simply put, it is inherent to administrative law that procedures -- including the procedures for accessing documents -- invariably "depend upon the nature and the function of the particular tribunal".[41] It is the administrative institution itself that is left to assess not only its own overall character, but the circumstances in which the request arises. [page287]

[48] Leaving it to the institutions to determine whether a FIPPA application for Adjudicative Records is necessary is viewed by the Attorney General and the IPC to be in compliance with FIPPA. Since many agencies "act[page288] in an administrative capacity, when carrying out its . . . regulatory mandate, and in a quasi-judicial, or court-like capacity, when carrying out its adjudicative dispute resolution mandate",[42] the procedures for documentary access may vary not only between institutions but within them, depending on the function at play. As former Chief Justice McLachlin stated in a speech to the Council of Canadian Administrative Tribunals:"We understand . . . that the rule of law does not always call for one right answer in every case."[43]

[49] Accordingly, to the extent that some of the institutions named in the Toronto Star's notice of application bypass the FIPPA regime, there is little more to be said about them here. It is certainly the case that their ability to fashion their own mechanism for public access to Adjudicative Records, and to make their own fine-tuned determinations of the correct balance between openness and privacy, fall within the power of those adjudicative institutions to control their own processes.[44] Like other requirements of natural justice implemented by administrative tribunals, these document access procedures attract deference. This deference arises not just as an acknowledgment of legislative authority,[45] but as an acknowledgment of the constitutionally different roles assigned to courts and administrative bodies.[46]

[50] Of course, any tribunal implementing its own mechanism for access to Adjudicative Records may deny access in response to a request. In the event of a challenge, there would have to be a case-specific analysis of whether the openness principle and s. 2(b) of the Charter was breached and whether a remedy, whether under s. 24(1) of the Charter or otherwise, was applicable under the circumstances. However, the fact that a given tribunal ignores FIPPA in making such a decision on its own raises no larger issue.

[51] I note that counsel for the Attorney General makes the point that the Toronto Star's challenge is, in effect, moot with [page289] respect to the eight tribunals that require no formal application under FIPPA for a request for Adjudicative Records. It is the Attorney General's position that since no FIPPA application was made and denied, there is no evidentiary basis for the present application and the constitutional analysis it demands. Counsel for the Toronto Star, on the other hand, makes the point that the voluntary compliance of the eight tribunals in the face of FIPPA's apparent applicability to those tribunals is not good enough to end the case against them. It is the Toronto Star's position that its constitutional rights, and the constitutional requirement of openness, cannot turn on the discretionary choice of those who administer the specific tribunals from time to time.

[52] Neither side has got it exactly right. The Attorney General states in its factum that with respect to the eight tribunals that bypass FIPPA, "the evidence demonstrates that access to the Adjudicative Records of these tribunals was readily granted to the applicant without a formal FOI [freedom of information] request". The record before me accordingly establishes not that the controversy with respect to those tribunals is moot in the sense that there are insufficient adjudicative facts to consider the issue, and not that the conduct of those tribunals is discretionary and subject to unprompted change; rather, it shows that those tribunals are in compliance with the openness principle.

[53] The Supreme Court of Canada has left little doubt that administrative tribunals are competent to interpret and implement constitutional norms -- "We do not have one Charter for courts and another for administrative tribunals".[47] Unless and until the Toronto Star's (or anyone else's) rights are infringed by the eight non-FIPPA applying tribunals, there is nothing further to analyze in respect of them. One can assume that they have taken it on themselves to implement procedures which comply with their view of what the Charter requires. While it remains to be determined below whether the other tribunals that do apply the FIPPA procedure for post-hearing access to Adjudicative Records are in compliance with their constitutional obligations, there is no evidence (and no real argument) that the ready access to documents that the eight tribunals offer amounts to a breach.

IV. Freedom of Expression

[54] "The open court principle is one of the hallmarks of a democratic society . . . [and] is inextricably tied to the rights [page290] guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Charter."[48] The Supreme Court has declared that this principle includes "guaranteed access to the courts in order to gather information", and that "measures that prevent the media from gathering that information, and from disseminating it to the public, restrict the freedom of the press".[49] Counsel for the Toronto Star correctly indicates that this includes the presumptive right to Adjudicative Records,[50] including exhibits entered into evidence,[51] photocopies of all such records[52] and the ability to disseminate those records by means of broadcast or other publication.[53]

[55] As discussed earlier in these reasons, these principles apply to administrative tribunals as well as to courts. While the source of administrative tribunals' authority is their enabling statute, "[t]he legitimacy of such tribunals' authority . . . can be effected only if their proceedings are open to the public".[54] This open access, and concomitant protection of freedom of the press, is in keeping with those tribunals' obligation "in exercising their statutory functions . . . [to] act consistently with the Charter and its values".[55] This is not optional or discretionary on the part of administrative tribunals. As the Supreme Court has stated, "the protection of Charter guarantees is a fundamental and pervasive obligation, no matter which adjudicative forum is applying it".[56]

[56] The evidence in the record, and even a perusal of the terms of the statute itself, establishes that FIPPA burdens freedom of the press. In coming to this conclusion, it is important to keep in mind that freedom of expression "protects listeners as well as speakers".[57] By extension, the Supreme Court has specifically held that [page291] "[a]ccess to exhibits is a corollary to the open court principle."[58] By further logical extension, the Supreme Court has also observed that "the open court principle gains importance from its clear association with free expression . . . [and that] s. 2(b) [of the Charter] provides that the state must not interfere with an individual's ability to 'inspect and copy public records and documents'".[59] And finally, in case it wasn't already obvious, the Court of Appeal has emphasized that "the right to access exhibits includes the right to make copies".[60]

a) The reverse onus on "personal information"

[57] The very structure of the process that FIPPA puts in place for obtaining records from its designated institutions impinges on the openness principle and s. 2(b) of the Charter, as elaborated by the courts. As reviewed earlier in these reasons, s. 2(1) of FIPPA defines "personal information" in the broadest possible terms, while s. 21(1) (which is reiterated in s. 42(1)) sets out a presumption of non-disclosure of personal information and imposes an onus on the requesting party to justify the disclosure of the record. The IPC in its rulings on disclosure has emphasized that, "In the case of information that qualifies as "personal information" under [FIPPA], there is a strong assumption against disclosure".[61]

[58] As also explained above, these provisions apply not only to records held by the listed institutions as a matter of the business or administration of the institutions but to Adjudicative Records as well -- including evidence filed before tribunals, complaints and other pleadings that form the originating processes before tribunals, dockets and schedules for hearings, transcripts of proceedings, etc. The upshot of these statutory provisions is that the openness principle does not apply as of right to the tribunals governed by the FIPPA process; rather, a person or the press that seeks access to Adjudicative Records bears the onus of establishing that an exception to the non-disclosure of personal information rule applies. Again, this is not an insubstantial onus.

[59] I pause here to note that it is the Attorney General's view that there is nothing inherently wrong with FIPPA's stringent [page292] privacy protection and the reverse onus that ensures this protection. Counsel for the Attorney General submits that s. 2(b) of the Charter does not guarantee a general right of access to information; he observes that in CLA,[62] which he posits as the leading case on point, the Supreme Court held that "s. 2(b) may require disclosure of documents in government hands where it is shown that, without the desired access, meaningful public discussion and criticism on matters of public interest would be substantially impeded".[63] The Attorney General cites a number of cases decided either in Superior Court[64] or by the IPC[65] that rely on CLA as demonstrating that the CLA test is now the accepted basis on which to measure government disclosure obligations.

[60] The cases cited by the Attorney General as following CLA, as well as CLA itself, illustrate that the Attorney General's position misses the mark here. In CLA, the records in question were not produced by the government due to a concern for, inter alia, personal privacy.[66] On the other hand, nothing in CLA contradicts the "general principle that the open court principle trumps desires for anonymity".[67] The key to unravelling this apparent contradiction is in the type of information being requested. As McLachlin C.J.C. described it in CLA, the Criminal Lawyers Association applied to obtain "a 318-page report looking into alleged police misconduct"[68] which contained "records prepared in the course of law enforcement investigations". The request was denied by the Minister of Public Safety and Security partly because the content of the document contained solicitor-client privileged material and partly because it was a law enforcement investigatory record.

[61] The CLA case, in other words, did not deal with Adjudicative Records such as those in issue here; and since the documents were investigative and were not part of a record before an adjudicative tribunal, the open court principle did not apply. The same is true of the other cases referred to by counsel for the Attorney [page293] General in this regard. One of those cases entails a request by a university employee for a psychological report contained in his personnel records held by the university;[69] another entails a request by a reporter for an Auditor General forensic report "directed at the detection of fraud, waste and wrongdoing involving city resources";[70] while a third entails a request for hospital records pertaining to the provision of abortion services.[71] None of them entails a request for Adjudicative Records.

[62] As already indicated, FIPPA does not distinguish between Adjudicative Records and non-adjudicative records. But the open court principle in s. 2(b) of the Charter only applies to Adjudicative Records. This very point lies at the core of the Supreme Court's reasoning in CLA: "Access to documents in government hands is constitutionally protected only where it is . . . compatible with the function of the institution concerned."[72] Government agencies and public administrative bodies that hold investigative reports, personnel records, business and accounting records, and the like other than in an Adjudicative Record, are not subject to the open court principle.[73] They are obliged under CLA to implement transparency only where disclosure of their records is necessary for democratic process.

[63] Adjudicative Records, on the other hand, like court records, are not only entirely compatible with transparency but require it for the sake of the integrity of the administration of justice.[74] The rationale for maintaining confidentiality over records accumulated by law enforcement and forensic examiners at the investigation stage of a complaint or dispute does not, absent some special circumstance, continue into the open hearing or post-hearing stage of proceedings.[75] Thus, while access to government business records, including the content of personnel and investigative audits, is granted or withheld subject to the CLA test of "meaningful public discussion", the question of access to [page294] documents filed in the Adjudicative Record before administrative tribunals must be answered in accordance with the Charter,[76] including s. 2(b) and the open court principle.

[64] Like most reverse onus provisions, one purpose and effect of s. 21(1) of FIPPA and the operation of the exceptions thereto is, simply put, to facilitate the government's case against the party arguing against it.[77] This obviously makes it more difficult for the press and other document requesters to exercise the rights which they otherwise have under the Charter.

[65] This statutory imposition of an onus on the requester to justify the disclosure of Adjudicative Records may or may not be justifiable, but it certainly amounts in the first instance to an infringement on the s. 2(b) Charter right of access to those documents. The Supreme Court has stated emphatically that when it comes to access of the press to Adjudicative Records, "covertness is the exception and openness the rule".[78] In fashioning a regime that prohibits the disclosure of "personal information" unless the press can establish its justification, FIPPA has it the wrong way around.

b) Delay in accessing Adjudicative Records

[66] Counsel for the Toronto Star submits that newsgathering inherently requires timeliness. Any newspaper reader would find it difficult to refute this observation. In fact, it takes only the most cursory understanding of the media to comprehend the adage that "old news is no news".[79] Since time is of the essence to effective journalism, the publication of "stale news . . . cannot rank in importance with the dissemination of contemporary material".[80]

[67] The Alberta Court of Appeal has observed that it is only "contemporaneous access" to relevant materials that "allows the media to fulfill their legitimate role as the eyes and ears of the public".[81] Generally speaking, it is essential in a system that [page295] protects free expression and the press that "the media . . . should not have their right to report on proceedings . . . delayed for any greater period of time than a court believes is absolutely necessary".[82] Just as justice delayed can be justice denied,[83] so reportage delayed can be reportage denied.

[68] The evidence adduced by the Toronto Star demonstrates varying amounts of delay in responding to requests for documents. As detailed earlier in these reasons, those tribunals who utilize the FIPPA process take from ten days to eight months and beyond to provide a requester with a final decision. The most typical time frame for the requests contained in the present evidentiary record are somewhere in the 30- to 45-day range. This is roughly in keeping with what one might expect from a review of the legislation itself, which allows for 30 days (with possible extensions) for a first decision by an institution head, with more time needed for an appeal to the IPC.

[69] Counsel for the Attorney General submits that there is no evidence that any of the delays (or redactions) actually impeded the writing of any stories or reporting on any of the cases mentioned in the record. However, it is the Toronto Star's evidence that for many of these incidents the newsworthiness of the reporter's story has faded by the time the documentary production was made by the given tribunal. In the more frequently litigated area of libel law, it is notoriously difficult to prove a negative such as libel chill or the number of articles not written,[84] and it stands to reason that the same applies with respect to delay. It may be difficult to calculate how many article ideas faded away as the days and weeks passed and the writer waited for a decision on whether an Adjudicative Record would be forthcoming.

[70] As Doherty J.A. has elsewhere put it, "The values promoted by s. 2(b) [of the Charter] are not served by publication when the speaker has lost his audience and the message to be conveyed has lost its purpose."[85] It must be the rare story that is still timely months after the event. Canadian readers, like Canadian voters, [page296] expect that "the most accurate and timely polls [and news reports] will be available".[86] Thus, even if a reporter were "ultimately successful in his challenge . . . the full exercise of his rights would have been compromised by the delay in publication while the challenge was being made".[87]

[71] As with the presumption of non-disclosure in s. 21(1), the delay occasioned by FIPPA procedures may or may not be justifiable -- "[a]n unreasonable delay denies justice",[88] but not all delay is unreasonable. That said, it certainly burdens freedom of the press and amounts in the first instance to an infringement on the s. 2(b) Charter right of free expression.

V. Reasonable Limits on Openness and Expression

[72] When it comes to fundamental Charter guarantees such as the openness principle, freedom of the press and freedom of expression, "any encroachment upon the guarantees demand[s] justification by the state on a stringent basis".[89] Having found that FIPPA violates s. 2(b) of the *Charte*r in two respects -- substantively by imposing a reverse onus on a request for Adjudicative Records, and procedurally by occasioning delay in accessing Adjudicative Records -- it is necessary to turn to s. 1 of the Charter. It is here that the analysis of Charter rights takes on "a more contextual approach and indicate[s] the harms that might be caused to other rights and interests".[90] These include, most notably, the privacy rights of litigants and the administration of justice in administrative tribunals.

[73] In considering whether FIPPA's limits on freedom of expression are reasonable and justifiable in a free and democratic society, the analysis follows the Oakes test.[91] It will therefore consider whether the legislative objective is pressing and substantial, whether the means chosen by the legislature is rationally connected to the objective, whether the legislation minimally impairs [page297] the right of free expression, and whether it is proportional considering the deleterious and salutary effects on the right.

a) Pressing and substantial objective

[74] Counsel for the Toronto Star submits that the Attorney General has difficulty in articulating any objective for FIPPA, let alone a pressing and substantial one. To put it another way, the Toronto Star contends that if there is an identifiable objective to this legislation it is an illegitimate one in that it aims at overriding the openness principle. That is, it is specifically designed to place obstacles in the way of disclosing Adjudicative Records.

[75] In response, counsel for the Attorney General stresses the FIPPA objectives as they apply to administrative tribunals: "to provide a right of access to information while at the same time protecting the privacy of individuals". It is the Attorney General's position that the objective of providing individuals a measure of control over information that is personal to them is itself pressing and substantial. To put it another way, "[t]he ability of individuals to control their personal information is intimately connected to their individual autonomy, dignity and privacy. These are fundamental values that lie at the heart of a democracy."[92]

[76] Courts in other contexts have indicated that contemporary legislation and other state action often exhibits multiple objectives. These objectives, in turn, often take the form of a policy balance between the particular Charter rights of the individual and the rights and interests of others with whom the individual may interact.

[77] As an example, counsel for Justice for Children and Youth makes the forceful point that criminal justice legislation aimed at young persons has long reflected multiple objectives: ensuring privacy and other accommodation measures for youths while fostering fair sentencing and other criminal process measures for the community at large. As a further example, in the context of s. 2(b) of the Charter, a demonstration in a public park may be curtailed with the objective of preserving some use of the public resource for other residents;[93] likewise, hate speech may attract criminal sanctions with the objective of preventing distress to [page298] other individuals and discord in society.[94] All of these combine a rights-oriented objective with a community-oriented objective.

[78] This thinking has been applied by the Supreme Court of Canada to FIPPA itself. In CLA, the court identified the dual objectives of FIPPA by identifying its purpose and effect: "Both openness and confidentiality are protected by Ontario's freedom of information legislation."[95] The Williams Commission Report, on which FIPPA was originally based, endorsed the application of a freedom of information regime, with its built-in balance of the openness principle with privacy concerns, to administrative tribunals, with specific reference to the latitude to be given each tribunal to fashion its own access policy.[96]

[79] I have little hesitation in concluding that the multiple objectives of FIPPA are of sufficient importance, even considering that the law has the effect of infringing s. 2(b) of the Charter. The effort to prevent harm to some people is a pressing and substantial objective for a law that otherwise limits freedom of expression.[97]

b) Rational connection

[80] Neither the Toronto Star nor the Attorney General make much of an argument with respect to the question of whether means chosen by the legislature -- the application of FIPPA to adjudicative tribunals -- is rationally connected to its objectives. Counsel for the Toronto Star is somewhat dismissive of this question, given that he has concluded that there is no valid objective to the legislation. He tacitly concedes that there might be a rational connection between the means and the objective, but since the objective is seen to contradict authoritative case law identifying the openness principle as a constitutional imperative he contends that the rational connection question is of no import.

[81] Counsel for the Attorney General gives the question equally short shrift. He maintains that the inclusion of adjudicative tribunals in the FIPPA regime is rationally connected to the purpose of balancing a right of access against a concern for privacy. Since the Attorney General has submitted that this balancing is [page299] itself a pressing and substantial objective, he submits that all that needs to be demonstrated at this stage is that that objective is logically furthered by the legislation.

[82] I tend to agree with counsel for the Attorney General on this point. Since I have found there to be a valid objective to FIPPA, the only question for the next stage of the Oakes test is to ask a question not of policy but of logic. As it was put originally in Oakes: is there a "rational connection between the fact proved and the ultimate fact presumed"?[98] The question here manifests as an inquiry into whether one can logically perceive a connection between the inclusion of adjudicative tribunals in the Schedule to FIPPA and the balancing that the statute aims to engage. The question virtually answers itself; the rational connection test is met.

c) Minimal impairment

[83] Counsel for the Attorney General observes that the minimal impairment requirement is the heart of a s. 1 analysis; it is here that challenged legislation most often rises and falls. The test is a rather stringent one in the sense that the legislative measure that has already been determined to impair Charter rights must now be seen to impair them minimally. When it comes to legislative measures with multiple, competing objectives that are balanced against each other, the minimal impairment test becomes a difficult one to meet. "[A] particular legislative regime may have a number of goals, and impairing a right minimally in the furtherance of one particular goal may inhibit achieving another goal."[99]

[84] As discussed earlier, the problem with FIPPA is twofold: it substantively infringes s. 2(b) by presuming non-disclosure of a broadly defined version of "personal information, and it procedurally infringes s. 2(b) by causing delay in accessing those Adjudicative Records that it does allow to be disclosed. Given the goal of balancing openness and access with privacy protection, the minimal impairment question must be asked in respect of both forms of rights violation. Does the reverse onus on producing personal information minimally impair the right, and do the timelines and wait periods built into the statute's access to information process minimally impair the right? [page300]

i) Is there minimal impairment in substance?

[85] Counsel for the Toronto Star submits that "[t]he exemptions in FIPPA and the broad definition of 'personal information' are often used to resist, and even prevent, disclosure of Tribunal Adjudicative Records." While this description may be accurate, it suggests that there is something improper about the way in which heads of institutions or the IPC are applying FIPPA. That, however, is not the case. The officials tasked with applying FIPPA are, on my reading of the statute, genuinely applying its terms as enacted. If there is a problem with the way records are disclosed by institutions to which FIPPA applies, the problem is with the statutory terms themselves and not with anyone's manipulation of them.

[86] By way of illustration, in 2005 the IPC had to consider a double request to the predecessor to the LTB for a schedule of "Cases in a Hearing Block". One of the pair of requests sought a pre-hearing schedule of upcoming cases, while the other sought a post-hearing list of cases that had been considered. For the pre-hearing schedule, the IPC cited privacy grounds in authorizing production of a list of cases with all identifying features -- names, addresses and unit numbers -- redacted. This, of course, made the disclosure meaningless in terms of knowing the actual hearings on the upcoming schedule, although the IPC indicated that the identifying information would be available at the hearings themselves since they were required under s. 9(1) of the SPPA to be open to the public.[100]

[87] The IPC then turned its attention to the request for post-hearing information, and again declined to make meaningful production of the tribunal's records. In a key passage of its ruling, the IPC found there to be no distinction between pre-hearing and post-hearing records, despite the fact that the post-hearing records had already been made public during the course of the hearing itself:

> The appellant also argues that the record is not personal information because it is "public information". The fact that information may be contained in a document that is or was available to the public does not mean that it is not personal information. Rather, the issue of public availability arises in the analysis of whether any personal information the record may contain is exempt under section 21(1) of [FIPPA] . . . .[101] [page301]

[88] In other words, while the exemption for personal information was indeed invoked as a basis on which to refuse production of Adjudicative Records, the basis for the refusal was the operation of the statute itself. The presumption of non-disclosure, and the reverse onus on the requester to show that the request falls within an exception to the s. 21(1) personal information exemption, is a feature of FIPPA that must be confronted directly.

[89] In other, non-FIPPA-related contexts, the grounds for issuing a publication ban -- i.e., for overriding the open court principle on a case by case basis -- are contained in what has become known as the Dagenais/ Mentuck test.[102] As the Supreme Court has explained, the openness principle is contained within s. 2(b) of the Charter, and so can only be limited in accordance with s. 1 of the Charter. Any test that seeks to limit a constitutionally entrenched principle must, therefore, incorporate the essential elements of the reasonable limitsanalysis within it.[103] The Dagenais/Mentuck test does this in a way that "mirror[s] the minimal impairment and proportionality steps in the s. 1 analysis set out in R. v. Oakes".[104]Under Dagenais/Mentuck, a publication ban may be issued if the following conditions are met:

> (a) such an order is necessary in order to prevent a serious risk to the proper administration of justice because reasonably alternative measures will not prevent the risk; and
> (b) the salutary effects of the publication ban outweigh the deleterious effects on the rights and interests of the parties and the public, including the effects on the right to free expression, the right of the accused to a fair and public trial, and the efficacy of the administration of justice.[105]

[90] As the test states, the reasons for overriding the openness principle must pose a serious risk, and not just an inconvenience to the parties or the adjudicative body. That said, although the Dagenais/Mentuck analysis has been characterized as a "stringent test", it has also been observed that it should not be "applied mechanistically".[106] As it applies to judicial proceedings, the test has been [page302] "tailored . . . to fit a variety of discretionary actions, such as confidentiality orders, judicial investigative hearings and Crown-initiated applications for publication bans".[107] Thus, the names of police informants can be expunged from public accessibility,[108] and information contained in search warrants and other investigative instruments can be withheld from publication,[109] but only where the specific circumstances show that "the public interest in effective law enforcement and privacy" outweighs the principle of "accountability and the transparency of the legal system".[110]

[91] What is clear from the case law is that it is the openness of the system, and not the privacy or other concerns of law enforcement, regulators, or innocent parties, that takes primacy in this balance. This, then, impacts directly on the onus of proof. In order for an adjudicative system to comply with s. 2(b) of the Charter, "The burden of displacing the general rule of openness lies on the party making the application."[111] As other courts across the country have stated, publicity is the order of things and "any exceptions" -- including those specifically provided by statute -- "must be substantiated on a case by case basis".[112] This onus is necessary "in light of the . . . Charter principles which inform the [Dagenais/Mentuck] test".[113]

[92] I acknowledge, as any court must, that the openness principle and the analysis that accompanies a request to override it, must "tak[e] into account the particular characteristics and circumstances of the . . . proceedings".[114] The judicial considerations of the Dagenais/Mentuck test have tended to arise in the course of criminal prosecutions, which raise unique factors that may not apply to the regulatory contexts of most administrative tribunals. [page303]

[93] A decision about a revealing a police informant's identity in a record supporting a search warrant will obviously entail very different considerations than a decision about revealing a tenant's identity in a record filed in evidence in LTB hearing. The decision-maker contemplating a limitation on the openness principle must take the differing contexts and the statutory objectives of the particular administrative body into account.[115] The particular institution and circumstances of the particular case may require the most stringent application of the Dagenais/Mentuck test or a modified and more relaxed version of the test. There is no "one size fits all" application of the openness principle.

[94] Varied though the contexts and considerations may be, however, the decision must always be a constitutionally justifiable one. That is, it "must be exercised in accordance with the Charter, whether it arises under the common law, as is the case with a publication ban . . . ; is authorized by statute . . . ; or under [civil] rules of court, for example, a confidentiality order".[116] This Charter requirement applies equally to "statutory tribunals exercising judicial or quasi-judicial functions involving adversarial type processes",[117] since "it is a basic principle that proceedings of . . . [such] administrative tribunals should be open to the public, with the ability to be . . . reported on".[118] It is therefore applicable to each of the adjudicative tribunals at issue in this application.

[95] An across-the-board presumption such as that embodied in s. 21 of FIPPA, in which privacy and non-disclosure rather than openness and disclosure is the presumptive rule, cannot qualify as a minimum impairment of s. 2(b) of the Charter. The open court principle is the fundamental one and the personal information and privacy concerns are secondary to it.[119] That principle directs administrative tribunals to protect confidentiality only where a party seeking it establishes that it is necessary to protect important interests.[120] Although the decision-maker may be exercising a statutory discretion taking into account the context on [page304] a case-by-case basis, the onus must remain on the party seeking to keep the information from the public rather than the other way around.

ii) Is there minimal impairment in procedure?

[96] As discussed earlier, the delay and bureaucracy inherent in the FIPPA regime also burdens the exercise of s. 2(b) Charter rights. As noted, freedom of the press is only operational when the press has timely enough access to information to publish to an audience. Untimely disclosure that loses the audience is akin to no disclosure at all.

[97] The question of whether FIPPA minimally impairs the right in this respect is a more difficult one. The Toronto Star contends that the statutory notice and other time periods, and the arrangement in which it is administrative personnel and the IPC rather than tribunal members make the disclosure decisions, violate the right to openness in an unjustifiable way. Counsel for the Toronto Star submits that the tribunals themselves can and often do make disclosure decisions, and that this alternative is a more workable and minimally impairing one than the decision-making regime established by FIPPA.

[98] The Attorney General, on the other hand, views FIPPA as establishing a system that allows administrative tribunals to achieve the appropriate balance between openness and privacy in a manner that fully takes into account each tribunal's mandate and function. Counsel for the Attorney General indicates that administrative tribunals work differently from courts and operate in diverse socio-economic contexts -- specifically, they are less formal in their procedures, often collect large amounts of personal material from litigants in the pre-hearing stage of proceedings, tend to be sparsely staffed and under-resourced, and frequently deal with unrepresented and highly vulnerable litigants. It is the Attorney General's submission that FIPPA's delegation of disclosure decisions to the head of each institution and to the IPC allows this reality to be taken into account.

[99] Moreover, counsel for the Attorney General argues that the result of the Toronto Star's proposal of unregulated access to tribunal records (except directly by each adjudicator) would result in an unwieldly burden on adjudicators. Since the Toronto Star's position closely analogizes adjudicative tribunals to courts, adjudicators in the tribunal system would have to add each disclosure application to their case load. FIPPA's delegation of the task to institution heads and the IPC effectively relieves this pressure. It is the Attorney General's view that FIPPA's structure is workable and sound, and that it establishes a decision-making expertise [page305] that deserves deference as a result of the accumulated knowledge about the privacy considerations at stake and the logistical support it provides to administrative tribunals.

[100] In terms of the expertise of the institution heads and, in particular, the IPC, it is fair to say that the jury is still out. Reading IPC decisions makes one keenly aware that FIPPA does not mandate the IPC to take s. 2(b) of the Charter into account in making disclosure decisions. Thus, one finds decisions made in review of the HRTO that opine: "While the Tribunal makes the argument that there is a compelling public interest in disclosure of the records, it goes on to recognize that this office has not accepted the 'open court principle' as a basis for overriding the exemption in section 21".[121] Similarly, IPC decisions in review of LTB rulings on disclosure tend to circle back onto the statutory requirements rather than to weigh them against a principle of openness:

> Although the appellant's analogy between open court processes and the transparent conduct of hearings by tribunals covered by the SPPA has some merit, they are not identical. For example, section 65(4) of the Act excludes documents prepared and filed for the purposes of proceedings before the Courts from coverage under Ontario's freedom of Information regime; while administrative tribunals, including the Tribunal, are subject to the Act and bound by its access and privacy requirements. Accordingly, while the Tribunal's hearings and procedures must comply with the SPPA, decisions regarding disclosure of personal information contained in records outside of the actual hearings process must be determined in accordance with the requirements of the Act.[122]

[101] I do agree, of course, that institution heads and the IPC have developed a sensitivity to the privacy concerns of litigants before adjudicative tribunals. They have certainly been adept at applying the existing statutory presumption against disclosure of any personal information to the end of protecting their privacy. Indeed, I would say that they have been fully committed to FIPPA's policy of ensuring total privacy, holding back not only pleadings and evidentiary documents from public access, but even schedules of cases making those tribunals inscrutable by the press.

[102] It remains to be seen how this will be tempered once institution heads and the IPC turn their minds more fully to the paramount consideration of openness that the Charter requires. The legislature has delegated the decision-making task to them, but their decisions now must start taking the applicable *Charte*r principles into account. "Deference as respect" may be a formula [page306] embraced by the courts,[123] but this posture must not be driven by ideology.[124] Properly understood, the point is to pay "respectful attention to the reasons offered or which could be offered in support of a decision".[125] Thus, it is equally accurate to say that "[d]eference is earned; it is not a birthright."[126]

[103] With all of that, I am mindful of the submission made at the hearing of this application by counsel for the Ontario Judicial Council. That institution is, of course, well versed in both the open court principle and the privacy interests that can be vested in sensitive adjudicative tribunal proceedings. Counsel admonished the court to be cognizant of the complex task of fashioning a disclosure system for a very diverse body of administrative institutions. Some of these institutions have full-time members that sit in formal hearings dealing with substantial commercial matters (e.g., OSC, FST, OMLC, OMB), others sit in more informal proceedings dealing with highly sensitive matters going to personal autonomy of the participating individuals (e.g., HRTO, CICB, OCPC), while still others hold hearings on social justice and welfare issues for unrepresented and often unsophisticated litigants (e.g., LTB, WSIAT).

[104] In view of this complex and diverse picture, counsel for the Ontario Judicial Council warned me to pay heed to "the law of unintended consequences". That, I must say, is sage advice. Under the circumstances, the Toronto Star's proposal -- that the court strike down FIPPA insofar as it pertains to Adjudicative Records held by the listed quasi-judicial tribunals and replace it with direct access to the tribunals themselves -- might minimally impair the right of openness enshrined in s. 2(b) of the Charter. But I do not know how much collateral damage will be done to the tribunal system in the process. An under-resourced tribunal staffed with part-time adjudicators and little in the way of administrative assistance may find itself overwhelmed in a suddenly FIPPA-free procedural environment. [page307]

[105] Moreover, there is a sense that the Toronto Star is perhaps frustrated by having to deal with a cumbersome, bureaucratic system which can sometimes seem neither user-friendly nor prone to make document requests easy. I sympathize with the desire of journalists and others who make FIPPA applications on a regular basis to cut through the "red tape", as it were. But bureaucracy in and of itself is not a Charter violation. It's just annoying. Legal commentators in the United States have pointed out that, "We have to accept that there's a difference between laws that embody bad policy and laws that a state legislature lacks the power to enact. A law can be bad . . . without being unconstitutional."[127] That message is an apt one under Canada's constitutional system as well.

[106] In any case, the various timelines built into the FIPPA system appear designed to make the system operate fairly. One cannot act judicially in making an access determination without giving notice to affected parties and providing some amount of time for a response. The specific notice and other time periods provided for in FIPPA may or may not be ideal, but there is little evidence that the problems are with FIPPA's terms on their face. Where the evidence in the record shows that there have been inordinate delays, the source of the problems may lie more with the particular administrators or decision makers who extend the FIPPA timelines than with the statutory system itself. Once the reverse onus on personal information is removed, those human delay factors will hopefully be reduced.

[107] The Charter requires public access to Adjudicative Records, which may be tempered on a case-by-case basis by other considerations -- integrity of the administration of justice, safety and security of informants and other third parties, privacy for complainants and other litigants, etc. For an unconstitutional law, "the usual remedy lies under s. 52(1), which provides that the law is of no force or effect to the extent that it is inconsistent with the Charter. . . .Section 24(1), by contrast, is generally used as a remedy, not for unconstitutional laws, but for unconstitutional government acts".[128]

[108] To the extent that an applicant for Adjudicative Records has its rights undermined by an institution head or the IPC excessively extending the FIPPA timelines, the appropriate course of action is not to declare the statute (or any of its provisions) of no [page308] force and effect under s. 52(1). Rather, the Superior Court retains jurisdiction to fashion an "appropriate and just" remedy for the aggrieved rights holder under s. 24(1) of the Charter,[129] or to impose an administrative law remedy.

[109] All of this is to say that much as FIPPA's various notice periods, times for submissions, and potential extensions of those times burden the exercise of s. 2(b) rights when it comes to access to Adjudicative Records, on a systemic basis the impairment is minimal. While there may be individual cases of unjustifiable delay and impairment of rights which could lead to an individual remedy, those cases are left for another day.

d) Proportionality

[110] The final step in the Oakes analysis is to determine whether there is proportionality between the deleterious and the salutary effects of FIPPA's infringing measures.

[111] The deleterious effects of the presumption against disclosure in s. 21(1) and related provisions of FIPPA are real and substantial. As counsel for the Toronto Star points out, emphasizing privacy over openness not only has a negative impact on the press but also affects other stakeholders. Regulators have no way of identifying chronic offenders, reference checks on tenants and others who come before the various tribunals are impossible to carry out. Problematic landlords, police and other actors, including repeat human rights offenders, vexatious litigants and the like cannot be discovered by members of the public who have to engage with them. The public cannot know about upcoming hearings for a number of the tribunals, and the media are unable to engage public debate about cases which they do not know are forthcoming and so do not attend or cover.

[112] In the seminal press freedom case under the Charter, Wilson J. noted that "we cannot ignore the fact that for every litigant concerned about the adverse impact of publicity upon his or her image in the community, there may be another equally concerned about public vindication and community support."[130] As indicated, eight of the tribunals in issue bypass the FIPPA process altogether, and make their documents presumptively available to the public. Other tribunals invoke FIPPA and make documents presumptively unavailable even in the face of parties who may not object to publication. [page309]

[113] Counsel for the Attorney General identifies a number of salutary effects of the reverse onus on disclosing personal information. These include the strong protection of privacy, the support for informality and efficiency by dispensing with the need for lawyers, and the encouragement of use of the administrative tribunal system by vulnerable individuals. While one can certainly appreciate the pragmatic advantages of the system as identified by the Attorney General, these must be seen as outweighed by a process that embodies substantial rather than minimal impairment.

[114] This is especially the case given that speech rights can be characterized as non-instrumental. McLachlin J. (as she then was) has made this point in reviewing the philosophical underpinnings of s. 2(b) of the Charter, to the effect that "freedom of expression may be viewed as more than a means to other ends. Many assert that free expression is an end in itself, a value essential to the sort of society we wish to preserve."[131] Where the Charter right "respect[s] each and every person as an end", it cannot be contested or measured by a law that "merely manipulate[es] them, or some of them, as means".[132] If there is no sociological goal or end to weigh against the salutary features of the impugned legislation, the contest between the deleterious effects and those salutary benefits is really no contest at all.

[115] Moreover, there is no real evidence to support the Attorney General's most strenuous point -- that tenants, human rights plaintiffs, complainants against medical professionals, etc. will likely cease using the relevant tribunals if their identities are exposed to the public. While there is affidavit evidence demonstrating that tribunal litigants are concerned about protecting their privacy, there is little to establish that a change in the s. 21(1) presumption against disclosure would have a chilling effect on tribunal applications.

[116] As already indicated, in matters touching on free expression chilling effects are notoriously difficult to prove. Even taking this difficulty into account, however, it is not possible for me to conclude that the statute's infringement of the openness principle is somehow more than counterbalanced by its potential, if speculative support for access to justice. On the record before me, the salutary effects of the presumption of non-disclosure of personal information in s. 21 of FIPPA do not outweigh the deleterious effects of that measure on the Charter right to openness. [page310]

[117] As for FIPPA's procedural limitations on s. 2(b), I have already found that the notice requirements, timelines and designation of institution heads and the IPC as decision-makers minimally impair the right. While these procedural factors may be subject to extension and abuse in individual cases, they are in their own terms justifiable as minimal intrusions on the openness principle.

[118] Professor Hogg states in his textbook, and the Supreme Court has confirmed, that this effectively renders the proportionality analysis redundant.[133] That is not to deny the overall importance of proportionality, which embodies an analytic approach that has made Canadian law "a global constitutional reference point".[134] But as a general matter, proportionality determines the conditions which make a limitation on a constitutional right justified and therefore permissible.[135] A minimal impairment of a Charter right is already proportionate to that right and is justifiable on those terms.

VI. Standing and Factual Basis for the Application

[119] As a final matter (or, perhaps, as a preliminary, threshold matter), counsel for the Attorney General submits that the Toronto Star has no standing to bring this application and that, in any case, the application should have proceeded by way of judicial review of an IPC decision. Both of these arguments mischaracterize the proceeding; they treat it as a challenge to a particular administrative decision rather than a challenge to a statutory regime authorizing all document access decisions in respect of 13 named tribunals. In my view, this approach has no merit.

[120] As it turns out, this application was really a challenge to the constitutionality of certain provisions of FIPPA. It was not a challenge to the constitutionality of any particular decision or set of decisions by administrative decision-makers implementing FIPPA. Accordingly, no applicant would be in a better position than the Toronto Star -- a newspaper with vast and ongoing [page311] experience in making access to information applications -- to bring the challenge. "[I]t would be strange and, indeed, alarming, if there was no way in which a question of alleged excess of legislative power, a matter traditionally within the scope of the judicial process, could be made the subject of adjudication."[136]

[121] Under current standing rules, the Toronto Star has public interest standing to bring this constitutional application. In considering this question, "the court must consider three factors: (1) whether there is a serious justiciable issue raised; (2) whether the plaintiff has a real stake or a genuine interest in it; and (3) whether, in all the circumstances, the proposed suit is a reasonable and effective way to bring the issue before the courts".[137] The Toronto Star easily passes all three steps in the analysis. It raises serious Charter issues, it has a real stake in that it is a constant user of the FIPPA process for the tribunals in issue and, for that matter, any number of other tribunals across Ontario. The present application is a convenient way to bring issues before the court that pertain to multiple administrative tribunals all authorized by the same piece of legislation.

[122] The Attorney General takes the position that the challenge to the 13 tribunals should be treated like 13 distinct applications, and the Toronto Star must prove that it has standing to challenge each one. Thus, counsel for the Attorney General argues that the case against several of the tribunals be dismissed, since there is no evidence in the record that a Toronto Star reporter submitted a request to them under FIPPA. Counsel for the Toronto Star responds with the observation that requiring 13 different applications, with 13 records of evidence, would be "wasteful, unnecessary, and unproductive and not in the interests of justice to these litigants or the public".[138] It is hard to disagree with that common-sense proposition.

[123] Furthermore, the Toronto Star is a representative applicant for the entire public -- it is the public's right of access to Adjudicative Records that is in issue. In addition, the 13 named tribunals are, in effect, representatives for a large number of tribunals listed in the Schedule to FIPPA that act judicially. Whether at this moment the Toronto Star is seeking documents [page312] from the HRTO, the OLRB, the FST, or the HPARB (the last two of which the Attorney General argues should not be here due to a paucity of evidence) is immaterial. FIPPA applies to many tribunals that act judicially, and they all will be impacted by the present ruling with respect to the s. 21(1) reverse onus on personal information.

[124] By way of brief illustration of the type of standing that the Toronto Star enjoys, a doctor and his patient challenged the prohibition in Quebec's Health Insurance Act, C.Q.L.R., c. A-29 and Hospital Insurance Act, C.Q.L.R., c. A-28 on doctors billing their patients for private services. The Supreme Court of Canada described the standing of the two of them to bring the constitutional challenge, as follows:

> The validity of the prohibition is contested by the appellants, George Zeliotis and Jacques Chaoulli. Over the years, Mr. Zeliotis has experienced a number of health problems and has used medical services that were available in the public system, including heart surgery and a number of operations on his hip . . . Mr. Chaoulli is a physician who has tried unsuccessfully to have his home-delivered medical activities recognized and to obtain a licence to operate an independent private hospital. Mr. Zeliotis and Mr. Chaoulli joined forces to apply to the court by way of motion for a declaration that s. 15 HEIA and s. 11 HOIA are unconstitutional and invalid.[139]

[125] Neither the doctor nor the patient had a current request for private service pending, although both had a history of making such requests. Likewise, the remedy sought by them did not pertain just to them; it pertained to all doctors and all patients seeking payment for private medical services. The Toronto Star and the 13 named tribunals are in parallel positions. The newspaper has a history of doing what it seeks to do with a number of the listed tribunals, and in any case the tribunals are representatives of all of the other similarly situated tribunals. Additionally, the Toronto Star itself is a representative applicant in the sense that its remedy will be every other similarly situated party's remedy.

[126] The Toronto Star may not, right at this moment, have a direct personal interest in obtaining specific Adjudicative Records from all 13 of the tribunals listed in its application (or, for that matter, from all 185 administrative agencies listed in the Schedule to FIPPA). But as a major news outlet, it is certainly not a "mere busybody" that needs to be screened out for the sake of judicial efficiency.[140] It has standing to bring this application. [page313]

[127] Along similar lines, counsel for the Attorney General also contends that the present constitutional challenge should have proceeded as a judicial review application. He submits that in failing to do so, the Toronto Star seeks to bypass the IPC. It is the Attorney General's submission that proceeding in this way violates the rule that parties must exhaust all administrative remedies before moving for a remedy in court.[141] Counsel argues that "only when the administrative process [i.e., the IPC appeal process] has finished or when the administrative process affords no effective remedy can they proceed to court".[142]

[128] There is, in fact, no administrative process that is relevant here. The Toronto Star commenced its application in the way that it did because its challenge goes well beyond any one request for documents. Moreover, no administrative remedy could be forthcoming in this type of constitutional challenge. The Toronto Star seeks to invoke under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 to strike down FIPPA as the enabling legislation under which the institutional heads and the IPC operate. Administrative decision-makers generally have power to apply the Charter and to implement Charter remedies under s. 24(1), depending upon whether they are expressly or impliedly authorized to do so by their governing legislation.[143] But striking down their own enabling statute, or part thereof, is another matter.

[129] There is no reason for the Toronto Star to have proceeded by way of judicial review. That would have been appropriate had the Toronto Star wished to challenge a decision with respect to any one tribunal's Adjudicative Records. A Superior Court application like the present one is the appropriate way to bring a challenge to the provisions of FIPPA itself.

VII. Remedy

[130] FIPPA infringes s. 2(b) of the Charter in two respects: (a) substantively in terms of s. 21 and related sections that contain the presumption of non-disclosure for producing Adjudicative Records containing "personal information" as defined in s. 2(1); and (b) procedurally in terms of the notice provisions, timelines, and authorization for institution heads and the IPC to make [page314] decisions about access to Adjudicative Records. The Attorney General bears the onus under s. 1 of the Charter to justify these infringements.[144] It has met this onus with respect to the procedural infringements, but has failed to meet the onus of justification with respect to the substantive breach.

[131] As the Supreme Court has long pointed out, the key to a Charter remedy is for the court to address the constitutional violation but to "refrain from intruding into the legislative sphere beyond what is necessary".[145] Given my finding that the presumption of non-disclosure, or reverse onus in s. 21 of FIPPA is unconstitutional insofar as it applies to requests for production of Adjudicative Records, FIPPA's application to such requests from adjudicative tribunals is rendered inoperative under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. This raises several follow-on questions, as set out by the Supreme Court:

> Section 52 is engaged when a law is itself held to be unconstitutional, as opposed to simply a particular action taken under it. Once s. 52 is engaged, three questions must be answered. First, what is the extent of the inconsistency? Second, can that inconsistency be dealt with alone, by way of severance or reading in, or are other parts of the legislation inextricably linked to it? Third, should the declaration of invalidity be temporarily suspended?[146]

[132] As indicated, the extent of the inconsistency is limited within the overall scheme of FIPPA. The legislation, with its stringent protections of privacy built into s. 21 and other related sections, applies to government records of all sorts and to institutions that serve the public other than in an adjudicative function. This ruling does not apply to non-adjudicative institutions or to records held by adjudicative tribunals that are not within the definition of Adjudicative Records used throughout these reasons for judgment. The present ruling applies only to requests for Adjudicative Records from the 13 institutions named in this application and, by extension, any other analogous institution listed in the Schedule to FIPPA that operates in an adjudicative capacity and that holds Adjudicative Records.

[133] Since eight of the listed tribunals apparently answer requests for Adjudicative Records directly and do not require requesters to engage the FIPPA process, little or no change is needed for them. Each must examine its procedures to ensure [page315] that the presumption of openness and disclosure required by s. 2(b) of the Charter is adhered to in responding to requests to inspect or copy Adjudicative Records, but nothing about their procedures is otherwise impugned by this ruling. Other tribunals may follow this model and bypass the FIPPA process altogether by dealing with requests for Adjudicative Records directly and in conformity with the openness that the Charter requires.

[134] Counsel for the Toronto Star has argued throughout that the Dagenais/Mentuck test is the appropriate one for any tribunal to apply when a request for Adjudicative Records is submitted to it. Counsel for the Attorney General has responded throughout that Dagenais/Mentuck is too high a test and that while it is appropriate for court records it does not take the varying contexts of administrative tribunals sufficiently into account. The case law demonstrates, however, that there is not just one level of analysis applied under that test, and that Dagenais/Mentuck is indeed flexible enough to be adapted by the various adjudicative tribunals to their own particular contexts and needs. In the Mentuck case itself, Iacobucci J. acknowledged this flexibility. He specifically admonished that in applying the test "the purposes and effects invoked by the parties must be taken into account in a case-specific manner", and went on to comment that, "This test exists to ground the exercise of discretion in a constitutionally sound manner, not to command the same result in every case."[147]

[135] As an example, the Manitoba Court of Appeal has held that the Dagenais/Mentuck test is flexible enough to protect certain Adjudicative Records in a coroner's inquest whose confidentiality was made necessary due to the child protection imperatives of the inquest.[148] The test likewise does not require production of Adjudicative Records submitted at any stage of a proceeding that fall under a category of privilege,[149] and can be applied in modification to "ensure certainty and timeliness, to conserve resources, and to avert the disclosure of untested prejudicial information" that may impact on further proceedings.[150] These concerns to protect the vulnerable, conserve scarce resources, make efficient and timely decisions, enforce privilege and ensure the fairness of [page316] all adjudicative hearings, are all relevant to adjudicative tribunals. Each can adapt the Dagenais/ Mentuck test to its own particular needs in respect of these concerns.

[136] For those tribunals that adhere to the FIPPA regime, the ruling here leaves intact the procedural system established under that legislation. That is, the decision-making authority of the institution heads and, on appeal, the IPC, is not rendered inoperative. Likewise, the various notice provisions and timelines contained in the legislation are upheld, provided they are not unduly extended for any given decision (which, as indicated earlier, would have to be challenged on a case-by-case basis). Once the legislature has the opportunity to re-work FIPPA's substantive grounds for making disclosure decisions so that there is a presumption of openness rather than a presumption of confidentiality, the FIPPA procedures can be utilized.

[137] I would emphasize here what must be obvious to anyone perusing FIPPA: the statute is not a paragon of clarity. I say this not to disparage the drafters, but to point out that it contains numerous interrelated provisions scattered across its several parts, and that the privacy concerns that touch on the production of Adjudicative Records are not conveniently gathered in one provision. They can be found up front in the definition section, in Part II dealing with access to information applications, exemptions from access, and exceptions to the exemptions, and in Part III dealing with the protection of individual privacy. Reversing the s. 21(1) onus with respect to the disclosure of personal information in Adjudicative Records may require some revisiting of large portions of the entire statute.

[138] Again, as a brief example, s. 21(1) contains the basic reverse onus that exempts personal information from the information that an institution head is authorized to disclose. It is followed by a list of specific exceptions to the general exemption in s. 21(1)(a) to (f), which is in turn followed by a list of "criteria re invasion of privacy" in s. 21(2)(a) to (i), which is in turn followed by a list of specific instances in s. 21(3)(a) to (h) where disclosure of personal information is "presumed to constitute an unjustifiable invasion of privacy". Some of these would doubtless survive a s. 2(b) Charter analysis and others would not. Thus, the concern for protecting the very vulnerable and for ensuring less formal and more efficient hearing processes where health matters -- and especially mental health matters -- are at stake would arguably justify the non-publication rule contained in s. 21(3) (a) (information that "relates to a medical, psychiatric or psychological history, diagnosis, condition, treatment or evaluation"); similarly, the concern to safeguard pre-hearing investigative procedures would [page317] likely justify the non-publication rule contained in s. 21(3) (b) (information that "was compiled and is identifiable as part of an investigation into a possible violation of law").

[139] Other factors listed in s. 21(3) -- including the presumption against disclosing anything containing education and employment history (s. 21(3)(d)), personal finances (s. 21(3)(f)), personal recommendations and evaluations (s. 21(3)(g)), etc. -- appear more geared toward saving a person from embarrassment than furthering the objectives of the particular legal process. These would not survive a Charter analysis.[151] It is up to the legislature to re-work any statutory prohibitions on publication in a way that complies with the Supreme Court's analysis of the criteria for statutory publication bans. This will likely have to be done in a way which allows for tribunal-specific determinations of how the openness principle is balanced against privacy concerns. After all, "[t]he analysis under s. 1 of the Charter . . . can only be accomplished by canvassing the nature of the social problem which [a given measure] addresses".[152] In the Supreme Court's words, "Context is the key to understanding the scope and impact of a limit on a Charter right."[153]

[140] For those adjudicative tribunals that rely on the FIPPA process to determine access to Adjudicative Records, the need to revamp a relatively complex piece of legislation in order to make it Charter compliant presents practical difficulties. In effect, it leaves a procedural system intact but with a substantive void to be filled in on the fly by institution heads and the IPC. Requests for Adjudicative Records can continue to be dealt with procedurally in the way they have been until now, except that each institution head in the first instance, and the IPC on appeal, must make their decisions by applying the Dagenais/ Mentuck test in whatever modification the particular tribunal in the particular context of a given request requires.

[141] The concern is that this may put a difficult burden on decision makers to adapt overnight to a new task without substantive statutory guidance. As has been described in other legislative contexts, "moving abruptly from a situation where [the disclosure [page318] process] is regulated to a situation where it is entirely unregulated would be a matter of great concern".[154] The courts should be reluctant to place administrative decision-makers in that situation.

[142] This case therefore calls for some time period in which the invalidity of FIPPA's application to Adjudicative Records is suspended. During oral submissions, counsel for the Attorney General suggested one year. That seems to me to be an appropriate length of time for the relevant portions of FIPPA to be re-worked should the legislature choose to do so. Alternatively, it will provide time for institution heads and the IPC to establish a principled, tribunal-specific and context-specific basis for adapting and implementing the Dagenais/Mentuck test in response to requests under FIPPA for access to Adjudicative Records.

VIII. Disposition

[143] There shall be a declaration that the application of s. 21(1) to (3) and related sections of FIPPA pertaining to the presumption of non-disclosure of "personal information" to Adjudicative Records held by the remaining institutions named in the notice of application infringes s. 2(b) of the Charter and is not justified under s. 1. It is therefore of no force or effect.

[144] The declaration of invalidity of this aspect of FIPPA is suspended for 12 months from the date of this judgment.

Application allowed.

Registrar of Motor Vehicles	Respondent	Andrew Jin, for the Respondent

REASONS FOR JUDGEMENT

MERRITT J.

Issue 1: Privacy

[23] At the LAT Appeal hearing, the Appellant brought a motion for a confidentiality order (the "Confidentiality Motion"). The Appellant sought to keep the record of the LAT Appeal confidential, an order anonymizing the LAT's decision, a publication ban and redaction of the Respondent's submissions. The Respondent took no position on this motion other than opposing the redaction of its submissions. The LAT dismissed the motion with reasons when also dismissing the LAT Appeal.

[24] At the hearing of this appeal, the Respondent again took no position, other than submitting that the dismissal of the Confidentiality Motion is irrelevant to the issue of driving eligibility.

[25] The Appellant submits that Section 204(3) of the HTA prohibits disclosure of his MCR. Section 204(3) provides:

> A report made under section 203 or made to the Registrar in good faith with the intention of reporting under that section, is privileged for the information of the Registrar only and shall not be open to public inspection.

[26] There is no evidence that the Registrar allowed the MCR to be made available to the public. Rather, once the Appellant appealed the Registrar's decision, the MCR and other documents became part of the record before the LAT.

[27] The LAT denied the Appellant's Confidentiality Motion because it found that the Appellant's desire for privacy did not outweigh the public interest in openness in the case before it. The LAT also found that even if the Applicant's personal health information is sensitive, limiting public access to the information was not in the public interest.

[28] The LAT correctly stated that its adjudicative records are generally open to the public and cited Toronto Star v. AG Ontario, 2018 ONSC 2586, 142 O.R. (3d) 266. The LAT also correctly identified that ss. 2(1) of the Tribunal Adjudicative Records Act, 2019, S.O. 2019, c. 7, Sched. 60 (the "TARA") provides that the LAT's adjudicative records be made available to the public. The LAT's adjudicative records include the evidence and submissions in the proceeding: TARA, s. 1(2).

[29] The LAT correctly identified the legal test under s. 2(2) of the TARA which provides that the LAT may order that part or all of an adjudicative record be treated as confidential and not disclosed to the public if intimate financial or personal matters contained in the record are of such a nature that the interest of a person served by avoiding disclosure outweighs the desirability of adhering to the principle that the record be publicly available.

[30] The LAT correctly stated that r. 13.1 of the Licence Appeal Tribunal Rules, 2023 (the "Rules") is consistent with TARA and allows the LAT to restrict public access to the adjudicative record on the same grounds.

[31] The LAT correctly identified the proper legal test under Sherman Estate v. Donovan, 2021 SCC 25, [2021] 2 S.C.R. 75, and that the test is discretionary.

[32] The LAT was correct and made no legal errors in identifying and applying the law on the Confidentiality Motion.

[33] The LAT found that the Appellant's human dignity was not at risk because the Appellant led no evidence that the appeal involved intimate personal matters of such a nature that his interest in avoiding disclosure outweighed the openness principle. The LAT found that there was nothing sensitive about the Appellant or who he is as a person, other than the episode about which his doctors were concerned and the doctor's concern that he should not drive at that time. ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR MANITOBA

Mechanics' liens—Appointment of receiver to draw upon and borrow undrawn balance of proceeds under a mortgage—Whether judge exceeded jurisdiction in ordering that mortgagee, in respect of any moneys advanced by mortgagee to receiver, should have priority over any other registered or unregistered charges or encumbrances—The Mechanics' Liens Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. M80, s. 11(1)—The Queen's Bench Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. C280, s. 59.

The respondent housing co-operative and the respondent holding company (both non-profit corporations, without funds) entered into a contractual relationship with the appellants whereby, inter alia, the first appellant was to construct a student housing project. Title to the project was in the name of the holding company; the housing co-operative was to be the head tenant; the second appellant was to be property manager. In the late summer of 1972 construction was substantially completed, and the first tenants moved into the building. During the winter of 1972/73 a moisture problem developed in the building, which recurred during the winter of 1973/74, resulting in accumulation of ice, water and mould in some of the suites. The owner of the building sought advice of experts who recommended remedial measures, the estimated cost of which amounted to $135,000. The contractor refused to authorize that the work be done at its expense. Proceedings subsequently commenced between the parties but little progress was made.

The construction cost of the building, $2,209,790, was to have been provided from the proceeds of a Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation first mortgage in the principal amount of $1,988,831, all of which had been advanced except for a holdback of $228,897, and from a second mortage in the amount of $220,959, all of which had been advanced. On June 22, 1973, the contractor caused a mechanics' lien to be filed against the property in the amount of $310,440, claimed to be due to it under the contract.

In the summer of 1974, the owner of the property applied to a Queen's Bench judge in chambers for an order appointing a receiver of the balance of the proceeds of the C.M.H.C. mortgage. The order was granted and contained a provision that any moneys paid by the mortgagee "shall upon payment from time to time to the receiver have priority over any and all other charges or encumbrances registered or unregistered affecting the said lands." An appeal was dismissed by the Court of Appeal, and the appellants, with leave, then appealed to this Court. The question to be decided was whether the judge exceeded his jurisdiction in making the said order.

Held: The appeal should be allowed and the application for the order dismissed.

The appointment of the receiver was wrong in law because the provision ordering that any moneys paid by C.M.H.C. to the receiver would have priority over any other registered or unregistered charges or encumbrances ran contrary to s. 11(1) of The Mechanics' Liens Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. M80. Section 11(1) goes a long way in ensuring that once a lien claimant has protected his rights by filing a lien in accordance with the provisions of the Act, the lien is a paramount legal charge not subject to being defeated or eroded in any manner. The inherent jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench, under s. 59 of The Queen s Bench Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. C280, is not such as to empower a judge of that Court to make an order negating the unambiguous expression of the legislative will. The effect of this order was to alter the statutory priorities which a court simply cannot do.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for Manitoba[1], dismissing an appeal from an order of Nitikman J. appointing a receiver. Appeal allowed.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

DICKSON J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for Manitoba affirming an order of Nitikman J. appointing a receiver to draw upon and borrow the undrawn balance of proceeds under a mortgage. The question to be decided is whether the judge exceeded his jurisdiction in ordering that the mortgagee, in respect of any moneys advanced by the mortgagee to the receiver, should have priority over other charges or encumbrances registered or unregistered affecting the lands.

The facts are unusual. In late 1971 College Housing Co-operative Limited (the Housing Cooperative) and College Housing Holdings Incorporated (the Holding Company) entered into contractual relationship whereby inter alia Baxter Student Housing Ltd. (Baxter Housing) was to construct on a "turnkey" basis a four-storey, 192-suite apartment building, known as "Dalhousie Drive Project", to provide housing for students at the University of Manitoba. Title to the project was in the name of the Holding Company; the Housing Co-operative, a students' co-operative, was to be the head tenant; R.C. Baxter Ltd. (R.C. Baxter) was to be property manager. In the late summer of 1972 construction was substantially completed, and the first tenants moved into the building. During the winter of 1972/1973 a moisture problem developed in the building, which recurred during the winter of 1973/1974, resulting in accumulation of ice, water and mould in some of the suites. The owner of the building, the Housing Co-operative, sought advice of experts who recommended certain remedial measures, the estimated cost of which amounted to $135,000. Baxter Housing refused to authorize that the work be done at its expense. Two questions therefore became crucial (i) who would pay for the remedial work and (ii) where would the money come from. On point (i) I should say that in September 1973 the Housing Co-operative and the Holding Company issued a statement of claim against Baxter Housing and R.C. Baxter seeking damages and other relief to which the defendants responded with a counterclaim for $310,440 for balance of construction cost and the defence, in brief, that the project had been completed in accordance with the plans and specifications in a good and workmanlike manner. Those proceedings have not yet been litigated and little progress has been made. The facts material on point (ii) I take to be the following. The Housing Co-operative and the Holding Company are non-profit corporations, without funds. The construction cost of the building, $2,209,790, was to have been provided from the proceeds of a Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation (C.M.H.C.) first mortgage in the principal amount of $1,988,831, all of which has been advanced except for a holdback of $228,897, and from a second mortgage in the principal amount of $220,959, all of which has been advanced. On June 22, 1973, Baxter Housing caused a mechanics' lien to be filed against the property in the amount of $310,440 claimed to be due to it under the contract.

In the summer of 1974, almost a year ago, the plaintiff owner of the property moved before Nitikman J. for an order appointing W.E. Shields or some other fit and proper person as receiver of the balance of the proceeds of the C.M.H.C. mortgage. The notice of motion referred to (i) the dispute between the parties as to the adequacy of the design and construction of the student housing project, (ii) the recommendations of the experts, (iii) the likelihood that if the repairs were not carried out forthwith there was every probability they would not be able to be done before freeze-up, with the result the project would suffer another winter with the moisture problem in the suites with an anticipated loss of goodwill and an increased vacancy rate, (iv) the filing by the defendants of the mechanics' lien and (v) the refusal by C.M.H.C., by reason of the lien, to advance further moneys under the mortgage. Affidavits were filed in support of the motion and the affiants cross-examined, following which Nitikman J. made the order called into question in these proceedings. That order contained the following provision, inserted no doubt in the hope that C.M.H.C., relying thereon, would advance the holdback moneys notwithstanding the mechanics' lien filed:

> 2. AND IT IS FURTHER ORDERED AND DECLARED that any monies paid by the said Central Mortgage & Housing Corporation shall upon payment from time to time to the receiver have priority over any and all other charges or encumbrances registered or unregistered affecting the said lands.

Did the learned chambers judge exceed his jurisdiction in making the order? However politic and expedient the appointment of a receiver may have appeared as a means of tapping the only available source of funds and preventing a stalemate, I am of opinion that the judge had no proper ground in law for making the appointment. The appointment was wrong in law because provision 2 above quoted runs contrary to s. 11(1) of The Mechanics' Liens Act of Manitoba, R.S.M. 1970, c. M80, reading:

> 11(1) The lien created by this Act has priority over all judgments, executions, assignments, attachments, garnishments, and receiving orders, recovered, issued or made after the lien arises, and over all payments or advances made on account of any conveyance or mortgage after notice in writing of the lien to the person making those payments or after registration of the lien as hereinafter provided.

Section 11(1) goes a long way in ensuring that once a lien claimant has protected his rights by filing a lien in accordance with the provisions of the Act, the lien is a paramount legal charge not subject to being defeated or eroded in any manner. See Boake v.

Guild[2], and Rand J. in Earl F. Wakefield Co. v. Oil City Petroleums (Leduc) Ltd. et al.[3], at p. 364. Section 59 of The Queen's Bench Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. C280, it is to be observed, empowers the Court to appoint a receiver "in all cases in which it appears to the Court to be just and convenient so to do" and further provides that "any such order may be made either unconditionally or upon such terms and conditions as the Court thinks fit"; but this cannot afford comfort to the owner because s. 11 of The Mechanics' Liens

Act, in terms, gives a lien created by the Act priority over all receiving orders made after the lien arises. The question whether the receiving order here in question is a receiving order of the kind contemplated in s. 11(1) need not detain us because even if this question be resolved in favour of the validity of the appointment, the closing words of the subsection, in clearest language, give a mechanics' lien priority over all payments or advances made on account of any mortgage. One may escape the first part of the subsection only to be impaled on the second part of the subsection and Mr. Houston, counsel for the owner, concedes as much.

In my opinion the inherent jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench is not such as to empower a judge of that Court to make an order negating the unambiguous expression of the legislative will. The effect of the order made in this case was to alter the statutory priorities which a court simply cannot do.

In the Court of Appeal Matas J.A. per curiam said:

> In any event, I am of the opinion that sec. 11(1), supra, cannot be interpreted, under the circumstances before us, so as to frustrate the jurisdiction of Court of Queen's Bench to appoint a receiver with effective power to carry out his mandate. (Montreal Trust Company et al. v. Churchill Forest Industries (Manitoba) Limited, 1971 CanLII 960 (MB CA), [1971] 4 W.W.R. 542 at p. 546 et seq.) In my view, the order appealed from is not in conflict with The Mechanics' Liens Act, supra, and is in accordance with its intent.

Montreal Trust Company et al. v. Churchill Forest Industries (Manitoba) Limited may well be cited as a paradigm of the exercise of judicial discretion but Chief Justice Freedman, speaking for all his colleagues, was careful to state, p. 547:

> Inherent jurisdiction cannot, of course, be exercised so as to conflict with a statute or Rule. Moreover, because it is a special and extraordinary power, it should be exercised only sparingly and in a clear case.

The case does not stand for the proposition that the Court has a discretion in the application of a statutory imperative, such as that residing in s. 11(1) of The Mechanics'

Liens Act, in circumstances of the nature of those upon which Matas J.A. lays emphasis in the following extracts from his judgment:

> In the case at bar the receiver has been given control of the only money available as a means of breaking the stalemate which has been created by filing of the lien. The objective in having a receiver appointed was not to prevent dissipation of the fund, but to utilize the fund as a sensible and practical way of getting the necessary work done.
>
> There is ample evidence to support a finding that if plaintiffs are prevented from using the only available funds, and are thus prevented from doing the work, there will be an adverse effect on the building and the financial viability of the project will be in jeopardy. It would be fruitless to require plaintiffs to await the result of mechanics' lien or other court action, which would take place some time in the future while the property deteriorated and the financial viability of the project was being seriously affected.

These would be compelling reasons for the appointment of a receiver in the absence of s. 11(1) but, given that subsection, it would seem to me they are considerations which the Court is not entitled to bring into account. Parenthetically, events have proven, as so often appears to be the case, that peripheral skirmishing is wasteful of time and money and justice is better served by getting ahead with trial of substantial issue in the proceedings. Reference was made by Matas J.A. to the case of Winnipeg Supply & Fuel Co. Ltd. v. Genevieve Mortgage Corp. Ltd.[4] In that case the Court of Appeal for Manitoba held that, on an appeal from a judgment at trial in a mechanics' liens action, where a subcontractor's steel shoring supports for a building were essential to hold the building in place and to avoid serious damage, the cost of continuing supply of the supports and of removal would rank in priority to lien claimants. The priority given to the expenditure for an urgent and necessary purpose for the benefit of others was recognized in that case.

It is commonplace to appoint a receiver at the instance of a creditor in order to preserve property pending litigation. We have here the novel situation of an owner of property applying for the appointment of a receiver. The res is not the property but a sum of money to which the owner wishes to have recourse for the purpose of effecting improvements to the property. Until the main litigation has been concluded, it will not be known whether the cost of such improvements will fall upon the owner or upon the contractor and in the meantime the effect of the order of Nitikman J. would be to subordinate the lien of the contractor to any advances under the mortgage made by C.M.H.C. to the receiver. The appointment would permit the receiver to borrow and expend moneys which, in the absence of the moisture difficulties and the litigation ensuing by reason thereof, would be payable to the contractor. None of the authorities to which we have been referred touches upon the appointment of a receiver in such circumstances and with such powers.

Mr. Houston advanced an argument based upon s. 4(1) of The Mechanics Liens Act which reads in part:

> 4.(1) Unless he signs an express agreement to the contrary, any person who performs any work or service upon or in respect of, …a lien for the price of that work, service, …upon the… building, …and the lands occupied thereby or enjoyed therewith, or upon or in respect of which the work or service is performed, …limited, however, in amount to the sum justly due to the person entitled to the lien and to the sum justly owing (excepting as herein provided) by the owner; but no such lien exists under this Act for any claim for less than twenty dollars.

(The italics are mine.)

It was contended that the lien of the contractor cannot go beyond the fair value of the work done, and that although the Manitoba Courts have not made an ultimate finding they have implicitly found that no amount is justly due to the lien claimant. I do not think the record before us bears this out. Explicit in the order of Nitikman J. was a finding of a moisture problem affecting the student housing project but there was no finding, express or implicit, in either of the lower Courts as to responsibility for the problem. An order directing payment to a receiver at this time of the holdback fund with C.M.H.C. would be tantamount to a finding in favour of the owner on the major issue not yet litigated. Mr. Houston contends that s. 4(1) limits the right to lien. In my opinion its only effect is to limit the amount which the lienholder can recover. Unless and until the main action has been tried, the amount, if any, justly due to the contractor will not be known. The interlocutory proceeding taken for the appointment of the receiver was not intended to have, and did not have, the effect of making any determination of this outstanding issue.

The appellant contractor submitted that the order of Nitikman J. was by its nature hypothetical and unenforceable in that C.M.H.C. did not appear in the proceedings and was known not to release funds except on assurance of priority and furthermore was not bound or directed by the order to advance funds to the receiver appointed. The effect which I would give to the express statutory provision, namely, s. 11(1) of The Mechanics' Liens Act makes it unnecessary to consider this additional ground of attack upon the validity of the order.

I would allow the appeal, reverse the decision of the Court of Appeal for Manitoba affirming the order of Nitikman J. and direct that the motion be dismissed with costs in this Court and in the Courts below.

Appeal allowed with costs.

ARTHUR DRYSDALE (DEFENDANT).....APPELLANT

AND

THE DOMINION COAL COMPANY (PLAINTIFFS).....RESPONDENTS.

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF NOVA SCOTIA.

Commissioner of mines—Appeal from decision—Quashing appeal—Final judgment—Estoppel—Mandamus.

Where an appeal from a decision of the Commissioner of Mines for Nova Scotia on an application for a lease of mining land is quashed by the Supreme Court of the province on the ground that it was not a decision from which an appeal could be asserted the judgment of the Supreme Court is final and binding on the applicant and also on the commissioner even if he is not a party to it.

The quashing of the appeal would not, necessarily, be a determination that the decision was not appealable if the grounds stated had not shewn it to be so.

In the present case the quashing of the appeal precluded the commissioner or his successor in office from afterwards claiming that the decision was appealable.

If the commissioner, after such appeal is quashed, refuses to decide upon the application for a lease the applicant may compel him to do so by writ of mandamus.

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, dismissing an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Ritchie ordering the issue of a writ of mandamus commanding the Commissioner of Public Works and Mines of the Province to "take into consideration" an application of the respondent company for a lease of certain lands for mining purposes.

In October, 1893, a lease of certain lands for coal mining purposes was granted by the province to one

John Murray. In October, 1894, a license to search for minerals was granted to the Dominion Coal Co. over lands in the neighbourhood of those leased to Murray and was alleged by the appellant to include a portion of such leased lands. In July, 1897, the company applied for a lease for coal mining of a portion of the lands covered by its license to search, including the parts said to have been leased to Murray. The contention on the part of the company was that the commissioner had never given any decision upon this application, and that he was bound by law to do so. It was this application which the court in Nova Scotia had commanded the commissioner to "take into consideration."

The proceedings on the application of the respondent company are fully set out in the judgment of Mr. Justice Davies.

W. B. A. Ritchie K.C. and Mackay for the appellant. The appellant decided that the application had been disposed of and could not be re-opened. Such decision could have been appealed from and such decision as the commissioner should have given obtained. No appeal having been taken, mandamus will not lie. See Rex v. Justices of Middlesex (1)

THE CHIEF JUSTICE.—I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

SEDGEWICK J.—I concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice Killam.

DAVIES J.—I reluctantly yield to the conclusion that this appeal must be dismissed. I do so reluctantly because, in my opinion, while the decision given by the commissioner in the first instance was defective and uncertain in neglecting to decide expressly upon the application of the respondents for a lease it was rendered certain by the commissioner's second decision of the 21st April, 1900. In this latter decision he affirmed the validity of the lease to Rev. Mr. Murray, and the fact that it was considered by him as the evidence of the contract made by the department with Murray leasing to the latter a piece of land described in the lease. It further decided that the coal company's application could not be granted in its entirety but that the department was prepared to grant to the Dominion Coal Company a lease of so much of the ground described in said application, dated as above (covering respondent's application), as is not covered by the lease granted to said John Murray.

This decision seems to me to have covered everything which, on the application before him, the commissioner was called upon to decide. Of course it might have been couched in more formal language but in view of the questions of overlapping as between Murray's existing lease and respondents' application for one, which were raised on the investigation held by the commissioner, and of the definite and emphatic statement made in his evidence by Mr. Gilpin, the deputy-commissioner, that the only objection to granting the application was the one of its overlapping Murray's lease, I think it was quite clear and definite. I am not therefore surprised that with the evidence of this decision of his predecessor standing as part of the records of his department the present commissioner should have declined re-opening a case which as far as his records showed he was quite justified in considering as closed and settled by his predecessor. I am quite at a loss to understand how this decision came to be set aside by the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. Of course its validity depends upon the conclusion being reached that the first attempted decision of the commissioner was invalid for uncertainty and a nullity. That being conceded I do not understand the grounds upon which the court acted in setting aside the decision of the 21st April. No reasons were given by the learned judges and the assumption in the formal rule quashing the appeal of the Dominion Coal Company on the ground that the decision > was signed by the deputy commissioner and is not a decision of said commissioner from which an appeal can be asserted was, as I understand, admitted in the argument at Bar to be a mistake as the document in question was signed by the commissioner's own name and by himself. Of course the holding of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia that the decision of the commissioner of the 21st of April, 1903, "was not one from which an appeal could be asserted," could be supported on the ground that the commissioner was at the time functus officio having already given his decision. But I do not understand this reason is advanced by either of the litigants or by the court itself and in the absence of any reasons for the judgment we are left in the dark as to the grounds on which it was based. I gather from the judgment of Mr. Justice Townshend in the present appeal that the court looked upon the decision in question merely as an explanation of his first attempted decision and not as a substantive decision. But in view of the fact that the second decision incorporated the first one in its very words and then went on to supply its deficiencies I cannot think that the suggested reason would be held a good one. However the decision setting aside this last decision of the commissioner is final and I feel myself bound by it as did the trial judge in this action. I do not agree with either the trial judge or with Mr. Justice Townshend, who delivered the judgment of the court in banco, that the commissioner was to say yes or no to the application simply. From the evidence before the commissioner it appeared that Murray's lease granted some years before the Dominion Coal Company's application was made might overlap the lands applied for in the latter. Whether it would do so or not depended largely upon the construction of the lease and other facts to be determined. Were the posts and specific distances in the description of the lands leased to control and the reference to the original application for a license to search to be treated as falsa demonstratio, or was the latter line to control the specific distances? These were legal questions on which the commissioner I think had no right to pass. What lands were legally covered by Murray's lease was a question to be determined afterwards by the court in a proper action. No decision of the commissioner could either contract or expand the legal

1904 CanLII 57 (SCC)

DOMINION COAL CO. v. DOMINION COAL CO.

boundaries of Murray's lease. But a simple affirmative answer might well land the department in the position of having granted the same lands to different parties and possibly involve it in an expensive litigation. I conceive therefore that the commissioner might well grant the Dominion Coal Company's application subject to and excepting thereout such lands as might be found and determined to be included in the Murray lease; in other words, bounding it by the lands, whatever they were, described in the Murray lease. Such a decision would leave the respective claims of the parties for adjudication by the proper tribunals and such a decision I would have supposed but for the judgment of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia had been reached and expressed in the document signed by Mr. Commissioner Church of the 21st April, 1900.

I was at first inclined to adopt the appellant's contention that the respondents in applying for a mandamus had mistaken their remedy which was by way of writ of scire facias. But further consideration has convinced me that this is not so. The questions to be determined between the parties here, as I understand them, depend not so much upon whether Murray's lease should have been granted or not as upon the meaning of the description in the lease. What respondents want is a determination of their application for a lease. That they are entitled to have. We are all of opinion that what is called the first decision of Commissioner Church was void for uncertainty. The Supreme Court of Nova Scotia has held, and its decision on the point is final and binding, that the second decision of the commissioner was "not one from which an appeal would lie" and therefore was not a decision at all. There is no other remedy is it appears to me open to the respondents under the circumstances than the one they have taken, and that being the controlling test as to whether an action for a mandamus will lie the question must, I think, be decided in favour of the action lying.

NESBITT J.—I agree with Mr. Justice Killam.

KILLAM J.—The principal contention on the part of the commissioner is that his predecessor in office, long ago, considered the company's application and gave his decision with reference thereto, and that another commissioner is not bound to re-open the matter and decide upon it anew.

Three written documents are relied upon as constituting the decision of the former commissioner.

The document of the 7th April, 1899, purported to express a decision upon a dispute between the Dominion Coal Co. and the Rev. John Murray, relative to the overlapping of Murray's lease by the company's application for a lease. The decision was that Murray's lease was not void or uncertain, and that it be and remain the evidence of the contract between Murray and the Crown.

This did not, upon its face, determine anything regarding the company's application. A reference to the notice of investigation and to the full record does not seem to extend its effect in this respect. It is argued that the necessary result of adjudging Murray's lease good was to preclude the commissioner from granting a lease to the company of the common ground. But it does not appear whether the commissioner found that there was any overlapping, or what he considered he ought to do with reference to the company's application.

The second document was a copy of a letter signed by the deputy-commissioner and sent by him to the company's solicitor, purporting to express what the commissioner considered to be the effect of the prior decision. The company's appeal from a decision of the commissioner as of the date of that letter was quashed, on Murray's motion, upon the ground, as stated in the rule or order of the court, that the letter of February 1st, 1900, signed by the deputy-commissioner is not a decision of said commissioner from which an appeal can be asserted.

The third document was also made the subject of an appeal, which, again, was quashed, on Murray's motion, upon the ground, as set out in the rule or order of the court, that the document of April 21st, 1900, signed by the deputy-commissioner, is not a decision of said commissioner from which an appeal can be asserted.

The appellant, in his factum, states that the reference to the document as signed by the deputy commissioner was an error.

The service upon the commissioner of the statutory notice required for the purpose of initiating the appeal does not appear to me to have the effect of making the commissioner a party to the appeal. It is a notice to the tribunal being appealed from for the purpose of informing it of the appeal and of procuring the transmission of the requisite material. It is a step in carrying the matter from the original tribunal to the appellate court.

But it appears to me that the inferior tribunal must be bound by the judgment of the appellate court in the matter, without being a party thereto.

The quashing of the appeals would not necessarily have determined that there was no appealable decision, were it not for the statement of the grounds. This statement, however, is a binding adjudication which works an estoppel between the parties. See Atkison's Case (1).

DOYLE &c. v. PROVINCIAL COAL CO.

Kelly J.

It was adjudged by the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, as between the parties to the appeal, that the commissioner had not given an appealable decision in the matter. On this ground the company was precluded from exercising its statutory right to appeal from what the commissioner's successor now says was an appealable decision. In that matter, and as between those parties, he should not be permitted to take that position.

The statute did not, in express terms, command the commissioner to give an appealable decision. But it appears to me to have given to the holder of a license to search a right to acquire a lease of a portion of the area covered by the license, upon duly making his application to the commissioner. The commissioner is given jurisdiction to inquire into and decide upon the application, and his decision is subject to appeal to the highest legal tribunal of the province.

It was imperative upon him to exercise the jurisdiction when called upon to do so by a party interested and having the right to make the application. Rex v. Hereford Alts Bower (1); Macdougall v. Paterson (2); Julius v. The Lord Bishop of Oxford (3).

Although the Commissioner is a member of the Executive Council of the Province the Act gave him jurisdiction to decide upon a question of right, and made his decision subject to review by a legal tribunal. It appears to me that, in such a matter, he was not to act as a member of the executive or as the agent of the Crown, but he was given jurisdiction to exercise a judicial function, which a party in the position of the respondent company had a right to call upon him, and the court the power to command him, to exercise.

PRITCHARD v. DOMINION COAL CO.

Killam J.

It is true that, when the decision is given, the remedy is by way of appeal. But until there is a decision there can be no appeal.

I express no opinion upon the questions of the correctness of the decisions in the Nova Scotia court that the documents mentioned were not appealable decisions.

By virtue of the conclusions of the court, the company was not allowed to appeal from them and could not now do so if we considered that the conclusions upon this point were erroneous.

I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

1953 CanLII 146 (ON CA)

ONTARIO
[COURT OF APPEAL]
PICKUP C.J.O. LAIDLAW and ROACH JJ.A.
2nd NOVEMBER 1953.

Customs -- "Review" of Entries by Deputy Minister -- The Customs Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 42, s. 48(2), as re-enacted by 1948, c. 41, s. 5 -- Whether Amendment Retrospective -- Entries Made before Amendment -- Rights of Importers before Amendment of Statute -- The Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 158, s. 19(2)(b).

The provisions of s. 48(2) of The Customs Act, as re-enacted in 1948, do not give an importer a right to have the Deputy Minister review an entry made by the importer before the coming into force of the section in its new form. An importer had no right, before the 1948 re-enactment of the group of sections including s. 48, to appeal on a question of the proper classification of goods already imported into Canada, and the subsection in its new form, if its effect is to give an importer a right of appeal in respect of an erroneous decision of an appraiser as to the classification of goods for duty purposes, gives a wholly new right of appeal, and is therefore not retroactive in operation.

Judgment of CHEVRIER J., [1953] O.R. 546, affirmed.

AN APPEAL by Superior Separator Company of Canada Limited from the judgment of Chevrier J., [1953] O.R. 546, dismissing an application for a mandatory order.

2nd November 1953. The appeal was heard by PICKUP C.J.O. and LAIDLAW and ROACH JJ.A.

G.F. Henderson, for the appellant: Two problems ordinarily arise in customs matters, (1) value for duty purposes, and (2) classification. In this case we are concerned only with the second question. If the units imported by us come under item 409(f) of the tariff there is no duty payable; if, on the other hand, they come under item 427(a) there is a duty of 10 per cent. The customs appraiser classified them under item 427(a), and we consequently paid duty of about $100,000. We now seek a review of this classification by the Deputy Minister under s. 48(2) of The Customs Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 42, as re-enacted by 1948, c. 41, s. 5. [LAIDLAW J.A.: When was the classification made?] Between 17th April 1947 and 14th June 1948--wholly before the 1948 amendment came into force on 30th June 1948.

[PICKUP C.J.O.: Is not this matter properly within the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court?] I submit not, because no jurisdiction in such a matter is given to it by The Exchequer Court Act, now R.S.C. 1952, c. 98, or any other statute. Even if it has jurisdiction, the granting of an order is discretionary. We seek only an opportunity of being heard by the Tariff Board.

The procedure for correcting an erroneous classification is clearly set out in s. 48 of The Customs Act, as re-enacted in 1948. [ROACH J.A.: What was the procedure before the 1948 legislation?] It was contained in s. 54 of the Act, which provided that the rate fixed by the appraiser was subject to appeal to the Tariff Board (then called the Board of Customs), whose decision was subject to approval by the Minister, with a further right of appeal to the Governor in Council. Section 48(2), as re-enacted, provides for a review of the classification by the Deputy Minister, from whom an appeal lies to the Tariff Board. [LAIDLAW J.A.: What part of the old s. 54 enabled an importer to have a ruling by the Board of Customs as to goods already imported?] A prior importation would fall within the wording of subs. 1.

Even if it is to be held, because of the language of s. 54(2), that there was no right of appeal as such, the new s. 48 is clearly intended to be retrospective. There was a right in existence before the 1948 amendment, and numerous appeals were heard and determined (see Appeals 159 and 160, 81 Can. Gaz. 819, and 83 Can. Gaz. 1940). [PICKUP C.J.O.: Does not the fact that the Tariff Board has refused to act in this case possibly indicate that it has come to the conclusion that it was wrong in the earlier cases?] No, because that was not the ground on which the Board refused; it ruled that it could not act because there was no ruling of the Deputy Minister for it to consider.

Although the old s. 54 primarily contemplated declarations as to the future, there is nothing in the wording of subs. 2 that made it obligatory for the Board to act in respect only of future importations. Regardless of this, however, we had a pre-existing right of appeal under s. 125. If the Tariff Board decided that the classification made by an appraiser was wrong this would be a decision that there had been "an erroneous construction of the law" within the meaning of s. 125, and would entitle us to apply for a refund under s. 54; s. 125 by implication contemplates an application for a refund at any time within three years, but not later.

In any event, I rely on the wording of s. 48, and submit that it is clearly retrospective in its terms. As to the word "may" in subs. 2, I refer to s. 35(28) of The Interpretation Act, now R.S.C. 1952, c. 158. Where there is a power coupled with a duty, the word "may" becomes imperative: Julius v. The Lord Bishop of Oxford (1880), 5 App. Cas. 214. The Deputy Minister acts under s. 48 in a judicial capacity, and it cannot have been intended by Parliament that he could refuse to decide, and thereby prevent the Tariff Board from considering the question. I refer also to Rex v. Mitchell et al.; Ex parte Livesey, [1913] 1 K.B. 561 at 566; Canadian Pacific Railway v. The Province of Alberta et al., [1950] S.C.R. 25 at 31, [1950] 2 D.L.R. 405, 64 C.R.T.C. 129. The rights of importers are in question here, and the Deputy Minister is bound to perform his duty. Section 48 must be read with s. 49(1). The Deputy Minister's refusal to review the entries does not constitute a decision, and therefore he has not done what the statute

As to the right to an order of mandamus against an administrative officer, I refer to Rex ex rel. Lee v. Workmen's Compensation Board, 57 B.C.R. 412, [1942] 2 W.W.R. 129, [1942] 2 D.L.R. 665 at 677; Rex v. Electricty Commissioners; Ex parte London Electricity Joint Company (1920), Limited et al., [1924] 1 K.B. 171 at 194.

As to both retroactivity and the word "may", I rely on Cameron et ex. v. Wait (1873), 3 O.A.R. 175 at 193, followed by O'Halloran J.A. in Rex ex rel. Lee v. Workmen's Compensation Board, supra. I also refer to 31 Halsbury, 2nd ed. 1938, p. 529; Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 9th ed. 1946, p. 249; Regina v. Thomas et al., [1892] 1 Q.B. 426; Minister of National Revenue v. Wrights' Canadian Ropes, Limited, [1947] A.C. 109 at 123, [1947] 1 D.L.R. 721, [1947] 1 W.W.R. 214, [1947] C.T.C. 1; Rex v. The Justices of the North Riding of Yorkshire (1823), 2 B. & C. 286 at 291, 107 E.R. 390; Regina v. The Mayor, etc., of Monmouth; Regina v. The Mayor, etc., of Bolton (1870), L.R. 5 Q.B. 251 at 256.

[PICKUP C.J.O.: Would not your argument mean that any importer could say he wanted to go before the Deputy Minister?] I submit that is the meaning of the legislation. [ROACH J.A.: I suppose one purpose of the amendment was to limit the number of appeals to the Tariff Board.] My submission is that the Deputy Minister, in exercising his powers under s. 48(2), acts in a judicial capacity, that he has no right to refuse to decide, and that mandamus will therefore lie to him if he refuses to perform his duty: The Minister of Finance of British Columbia v. The King, [1935] S.C.R. 278 at 284, [1935] 3 D.L.R. 316; Drysdale v. The Dominion Coal Company (1903), 34 S.C.R. 328 at 336.

Since we had, before the 1948 amendment, a right to appeal to the Tariff Board, the amendment should not be so construed as to deprive is of that right. All rules of construction are merely presumptions, and not inflexible rules of law, and all must give way to the intention of the legislature, if that intention is apparent. If it can be avoided, a statute will not be construed so as to take away existing rights: Craies on Statute Law, 5th ed. 1952, p. 8; Moon v. Durden (1848), 2 Exch. 22 at 43, 154 E.R. 389; Pardo v. Bingham (1868), L.R. 4 Ch. 735 at 739; Gardner v. Lucas et al. (1878), 3 App. Cas. 582; Attorney-General v. Theobald (1890), 24 Q.B.D. 557 at 560.

[LAIDLAW J.A.: I cannot see that s. 54, as it was before the amendment, gave you any right to go to the Tariff Board in such circumstances as these.] I submit it did. In any event, apart altogether from the wording of the section, the actual practice established by the Board is shown in Appeals 159 and 160, referred to earlier. If the practice established before the enactment of s. 48(2) gave us a right, it is reasonable to infer that Parliament did not intend to deprive us of that right, and s. 48(2) should be so construed: The Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 158, s. 19(1)(c), (2)(b).

W.R. Jackett, Q.C. (D.S. Maxwell, with him), for the Attorney General of Canada, respondent: A great deal of the appellant's argument is based on a misconception of The Customs Act. These rights of appeal are not conditions precedent to obtaining refunds. Not every classification problem comes before the Tariff Board. Nothing in the Act deprives the ordinary Courts of jurisdiction to deal with these questions, except in some isolated cases which the statute specifies.

There are Dominion customs appraisers, appraisers who have jurisdiction in all ports, and appraisers with jurisdiction in one port only: s. 22 of the Act. The usual practice is that goods cannot be brought into Canada unless the duty is first paid. If there is any question at the time of importation the duty should be paid under protest and appropriate steps should be taken to get a refund. The Exchequer Court and the Supreme Court of Canada have jurisdiction and a petition of right would lie, and this would be a more expeditious procedure. In this case, however, the appellant would be met with the argument that it paid the duties voluntarily.

1953 CanLII 146 (ON CA)

The Act as it was before 1948 contained no provision for review of a specific decision of an appraiser in respect of classification, except by the Court. Under s. 41 of the Act goods could be revalued after importation and payment of duty: Weddel Limited v. The King; Watt & Scott (Toronto) Limited v. The King; Tees & Persse Limited v. The King, [1946] S.C.R. 499, [1946] 3 D.L.R. 145. I refer also to ss. 43, 48, 52 and 54(1). The effect of the Act is to impose taxation, and taxes are not usually imposed retroactively. [ROACH J.A.: If the Tariff Board could exercise its powers under s. 54 so as to affect goods already imported the Minister of Finance would never know the state of the country's finances.] No; such an interpretation would be contrary to our whole system of budgets. Section 125 merely imposes a limit on the refunds that can be obtained I refer also to s. 112. My submission is that except in special cases, where there were express provisions making the appraiser's decision final, it was for the Courts to decide as to both classification and the amount of duty.

The provision for review in the amended s. 48(2) was in effect provision for a new right of appeal, and could have no application to importations made before the coming into force of the amendment: Re the Jurisdiction of the Tariff Board of Canada, [1934] S.C.R. 538, [1934] 4 D.L.R. 193. Even if the review does not constitute a new right of appeal, the ordinary rule is against interpreting statutes as retrospective: Upper Canada College v. Smith, 61 S.C.R. 413, 57 D.L.R. 648, [1921] 1 W.W.R. 1154. If the appellant had had any right of appeal before the amendment, it would not have been taken away by the change in the statute: The Colonial Sugar Refining Company, Limited v. Irving, [1905] A.C. 369.

The new s. 48(2) does not impose a duty on the Deputy Minister to review. No duty can be implied unless the power is conferred to be used for the benefit of persons specifically pointed out and with regard to whom the legislature has supplied a definition of the conditions under which they are entitled to call for the exercise of the power: Julius v. The Lord Bishop of Oxford (1880), 5 App. Cas. 214. There is here no definition of the circumstances in which an importer is entitled to ask the Deputy Minister to exercise his power; compare s. 47 as it was before 1948. No duty has been expressly imposed on the Deputy Minister to exercise his power of review under the subsection: McHugh v. Union Bank of Canada, [1913] A.C. 299, 10 D.L.R. 562, 3 W.W.R. 1052, C.R. [1913] A.C. 179. The Deputy Minister has a discretion to enable an importer to go to the Tariff Board (by exercising his power of review) or to leave the matter to be decided by the Courts. The jurisdiction of the Courts to determine questions of liability to tax is not ousted by the provision for an appeal or series of appeals to other tribunals: Municipal District of Sugar City No. 5 v. Bennett & White (Calgary) Limited, [1950] S.C.R. 450, [1950] 3 D.L.R. 81, [1950] C.T.C. 410, and on appeal sub nom. Bennett & White (Calgary) Ld. v. Municipal District of Sugar City No. 5, [1951] A.C. 786, [1951] 4 D.L.R. 129, [1951] C.T.C. 219, 3 W.W.R. (N.S.) 111.

Mandamus will not lie in this case. It is well settled that mandamus will not be granted if there is any other appropriate remedy.

G.F. Henderson, in reply: The respondent says that the Exchequer Court has jurisdiction, but does not point to any provision giving it that jurisdiction. Until the Tariff Board adjudicates the Exchequer Court will not act, because until then there is no debt owing: Wilson v. The King (1952), 13 Fox Pat. C. 19, 17 C.P.R. 71. The Crown is expressly given a right to sue for duties payable by s. 112 of The Customs Act, but there is no corresponding section for importers. The jurisdiction, if it exists at all, must be found in s. 18 of The Exchequer Court Act, and I submit that section is not wide enough to apply.

The granting of a mandamus is not obligatory but discretionary, and if it is the expeditious way of dealing with the matter the writ will be granted: Regina v. Thomas et al., [1892] 1 Q.B. 426 at 430; Rex en rel. Lee v. Workmen's Compensation Board, 57 B.C.R. 412, [1942] 2 W.W.R. 129, [1942] 2 D.L.R. 665 at 678.

1953 CanLII 146 (ON CA)

The rule laid down in Julius v. The Lord Bishop of Oxford (1880), 5 App. Cas. 214, should be read in the light of the decision in Rex v. Mitchell et al.; Ex parte Livesey, [1913] 1 K.B. 561.

Cur. adv. vult.

27th November 1953. The judgment of the Court was delivered by PICKUP C.J.O.:-- This is an appeal by Superior Separator Company of Canada Limited from an order of Chevrier J. dated 14th May 1953, whereby he dismissed an application made to him by the appellant in Weekly Court at Ottawa for an order of mandamus requiring the Deputy Minister of National Revenue for Customs and Excise to review the decision of an appraiser of the Department of National Revenue for Customs and Excise in respect of the entry into Canada of certain farmhand hydraulic loaders and attachments which entered Canada in 1947 and 1948, the last entry in question being on 14th June 1948.

The Customs Act R.S.C. 1927, c. 42, was amended in 1948 by c. 41 of the statutes of that year which came into force on 30th June 1948, after the latest of the importations in question. Sections 48 and 49 of the statute as so amended read:

"48. (1) If, upon any entry or in connection with any entry, it appears to any Dominion Customs Appraiser that any goods have been erroneously classified or appraised or allowed entry at an erroneous rate or valuation by any appraiser or collector acting as such, or that any of the foregoing provisions of this Act respecting the classification or value at which goods shall be entered for duty have not been complied with, such appraiser may make a fresh appraisal or valuation, and may direct an amended entry and payment of additional duty on such goods, or a refund of the whole or a part of the duty paid, as the case requires, subject to review by the Deputy Minister.

1953 CanLII 146 (ON CA)

"(2) The Deputy Minister may review the decision of any appraiser as to the tariff classification of any goods or the value for duty of any goods.

"49. (1) An importer may, by notice in writing filed with the Secretary of the Board, within sixty days of the decision, appeal to the Tariff Board from any decision of the Deputy Minister "(i) as to tariff classification or value for duty;

"(ii) under subsection three of section forty-seven; or

"(iii) as to whether any drawback of Customs duties is payable under section twelve of the Customs Tariff or as to the rate of drawback so payable.

"(2) On any such appeal the Tariff Board may make any such order, or finding of fact, as the nature of the matter may require, and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, may declare

"(i) the rate of duty that shall be applicable to the class of goods respecting which appeal has been made, or applicable to the specific goods only;

"(ii) the value for duty of the class of goods or of the specific goods; or

"(iii) that such goods are exempt from duty; and any such order, finding or declaration of the Board shall have force and effect as if the same had been sanctioned by statute, unless appeal be taken as hereinafter provided.

"(3) An importer or the Deputy Minister may, upon leave being obtained from the Exchequer Court of Canada or a judge thereof upon application made within thirty days after the making of the finding or order sought to be appealed (or within such further time as the court or judge may allow), appeal to the said court upon any question which in the opinion of the said court or judge is a question of law.

1953 CanLII 146 (ON CA)

"(4) The appellant shall give seven clear day's notice of his application for leave to appeal to the Board and to the respondent, and the Board and the respondent shall have the right to be heard by counsel or otherwise, upon the application or upon the appeal, or both.

"(5) Where leave to appeal is granted, the appellant shall, within sixty days of the granting of the leave, deposit with the Registrar of the said Court the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars as security for costs, and thereupon the Registrar shall set the appeal down for hearing at such time and place as the court may direct, and shall notify the Board, the appellant and the respondent accordingly.

"(6) Any order or judgment of the Exchequer Court made on any such appeal may be appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada in like manner as a judgment of the said court, and the provisions of the Exchequer Court Act as to appeals shall apply." The application made by the appellant to the learned judge in Weekly Court was to require the Deputy Minister to exercise the power of review conferred upon him by s. 48(2) as amended in 1948. The learned judge appealed from refused so to order on the ground that the importations were prior to the effective date of the amendment and no order for mandamus should issue in respect of matters which had arisen anteriorly. He expressed no opinion as to whether or not mandamus would lie against the Deputy Minister in respect of decisions made by an appraiser since the effective date of the amendment.

After the amendment to s. 48 the appellant applied to the Deputy Minister to review the classification of the loaders in question, claiming that they had been wrongly classified for duty purposes by the appraiser and that if they had been correctly classified they would not have been subject to duty. The Deputy Minister declined to review the decision of the appraiser. The appellant claims that by refusing a review under s. 48(2) the Deputy Minister has deprived the appellant of an appeal to the Tariff Board, under s. 49, from the decision of the Deputy Minister, contemplated by s. 48(2).

Counsel for the appellant contends that the learned judge in

1953 CanLII 146 (ON CA)

Weekly Court erred in law in not interpreting the amendment made in 1948 as being retroactive so as to permit the appellant to exercise a right of appeal under ss. 48 and 49, as amended, in respect of importations prior to the effective date of the amendment. He argues that before the amendment the appellant had a right of appeal in respect of an erroneous classification for duty purposes decided by an appraiser, and that the new sections relate to a procedural matter and not to substantive matter. He contends that the interpretation given to these sections by the learned judge in Weekly Court has the effect of depriving the appellant of an existing right of appeal, and that the statute should not be so construed. These contentions on behalf of the appellant require consideration of what rights the appellant had, before the amendment, in respect of error in classification of goods for duty purposes.

The statute of 1948 repealed ss. 46 to 54 of The Customs Act as they previously existed, and substituted therefor new sections numbered 46 to 50.

Section 46 so repealed need not be considered. Section 47 related to standards of qualities for sugar and made the decision of the appraiser final and conclusive "unless upon appeal to the Deputy Minister of National Revenue for Customs and Excise within thirty days, such decision is, with the approval of the Minister, changed". This section further provided that the decision of the Deputy Minister, with the approval of the Minister, should be final.

Section 48, prior to the amendment of 1948, read as follows: "If, upon any entry or in connection with any entry, it appears to any Dominion appraiser or to the Board of Customs that any goods have been erroneously appraised, or allowed entry at an erroneous valuation by any appraiser or collector acting as such, or that any of the foregoing provisions of this Act respecting the value at which goods shall be entered for duty have not been complied with, such Dominion appraiser or such Board may make a fresh appraisement or valuation, and may direct, under the valuation or appraisement so made, an amended entry and payment of the additional duty, if any, on such goods, or a refund of a part of the duty paid, as the case requires, subject, in case of dissatisfaction on the part of the importer, to such further inquiry and appraisement as in such case hereinafter provided for."

Sections 49, 50 and 51 related to powers conferred upon appraisers and do not affect the question under consideration.

Section 52 provided as follows:

"Except as in this Act otherwise provided, if the importer, owner, consignee or agent, having complied with the requirements of this Act, is dissatisfied with the appraisement made of any such goods by the appraiser, hereinbefore mentioned he may, within six days, give notice in writing to the collector of such dissatisfaction; on the receipt of which notice the collector shall at once notify such importer, owner, consignee or agent, to select one disinterested and experienced person familiar with the character and value of the goods in question, and the collector shall select a second person of similar knowledge, and notify such importer, owner, consignee or agent of such appointment.

"2. The persons so selected, together with a third selected by the Minister from among the Dominion appraiser, shall examine and appraise the goods in accordance with the provisions of this Act, and the decision of such persons, or of a majority of them if they are not unanimous, shall be reported to the collector and shall be final and conclusive, and the duty shall be levied and collected accordingly.

"3. Such decision shall in no way apply to any case, except that submitted for the consideration of such appraisers.

"4. Every person who acts as an appraiser under this section, except a Dominion appraiser selected by the Minister as aforesaid, shall take an oath, before a collector or a justice of the peace, to act without fear, favour or partiality, and to appraise the goods with reference to which he is called on to act, in accordance with the laws imposing duties of Customs in Canada."

1953 CanLII 146 (ON CA)

It will be observed that ss. 48 and 52 related only to appraisement or valuation and not to classification of goods for duty purposes.

Section 53 related to remuneration of valuators and need not be considered here, but s. 54 requires consideration. It read as follows:

"Whenever any difference arises or whenever any doubt exists as to whether any or what rate of duty is payable on any class of goods, and there is no previous decision upon the question by any competent tribunal, binding throughout Canada, the Board of Customs may declare the rate payable on the class of goods in question, or that such goods are exempt from duty, subject in each case to an appeal within sixty days from the date of such declaration, by any person interested, to the Governor in Council; and any such declaration of the Board of Customs when approved by the Minister after the expiration of sixty days from the date thereof, or any such declaration when made by any order in council upon appeal, shall have force and effect as if the same had been sanctioned by statute.

"2. Such declaration or order in council may state a day upon which it is to come into effect, and shall in that case only have effect upon and after the day so named: Provided that no such declaration or order in council shall be deemed to affect the liability for duty of, or the rate of duty applicable to, any goods imported previous to the time when it comes into effect.

"3. Every order in council made under this section shall be published in the Canada Gazette."

From these sections counsel for the appellant argues that prior to the amendment in 1948 an importer had a right of appeal to the Board of Customs under s. 54 where a difference arose or doubt existed as to whether or what rate of duty was payable on any class of goods, and that the amendment in 1948 merely changed the procedure in relation to that right of appeal. He relies upon the general principle of law that a statute relating to procedure only, as distinct from a statute dealing with a substantive right, should be construed as having retroactive effect. He also relies upon s. 19(2) of The Interpretation Act, now R.S.C. 1952, c. 158, which provides:

1953 CanLII 146 (ON CA)

"Where other provisions are substituted for those so repealed or revoked, then, unless a contrary intention appears, ...

"(b) all proceedings taken under the Act, enactment or regulation so repealed or revoked, shall be taken up and continued under and in conformity with the provisions so substituted, so far as consistently may be."

In agreement with the view expressed by the learned judge in Weekly Court, I am of the opinion that immediately prior to the amendment in 1948 the appellant had no right of appeal to the Board of Customs on a question of classification, with regard to the importations in question. The appellant could have asked the Board of Customs to act under s. 54, as it then stood, on the basis of a difference having arisen or a doubt existing as to whether any or what duty was payable on the class of goods in question, but I do not think any declaration made by the Board of Customs under s. 54 could have affected past importations in respect of which duty had been paid. Subsection 2 of s. 54 expressly provided that a declaration contemplated by that section "may state a day upon which it is to come into effect and shall in that case only have effect upon and after the day so named". The section, in my opinion, contemplated a declaration which was to have the force of statute but which would have future effect only. It would, I think, be contrary to the general scheme of The Customs Act to interpret s. 54 as opening up past classifications of goods for customs purposes. The duties must be paid an importation, and while there were provisions in the nature of a right of appeal in relation to appraisement or valuation for duty, there was no provision in the statute providing for an appeal or any other remedy, in respect of past importations, where a collector of customs collected on importation duties based upon an erroneous classification of the goods. This does not mean that an importer had no remedy if the Crown had collected duties which it had no legal right to collect, but I do not think the remedy was provided for by The Customs Act. I am therefore of the opinion that the construction placed upon the amendment in question by the learned judge in Weekly Court has not the effect of extinguishing an existing right of the appellant, and if its effect is to give to an importer an appeal in respect of an erroneous decision of an appraiser as to the classification of goods for duty purposes, such appeal is one which did not exist before, and the amendment is not an amendment relating to a procedural matter.

I am not intending to express any opinion as to whether the amended ss. 48 and 49 give any right of appeal at all to an importer in respect of an erroneous classification of goods, except an appeal to the Tariff Board from the decision of the Deputy Minister, where he sees fit to review a decision of an appraiser. The appellant contends that in s. 48(2) the word "may" should be construed as "shall", so as to constitute by ss. 48 and 49 a chain of procedure under which an appeal is given to an importer from any erroneous classification or valuation for duty determined by an appraiser. I leave that question for determination by the Court when it is necessary to decide it. I do not consider it necessary in this case.

I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

> 1. The applicant has statutorily been constituted as an agent of the Crown; and
>
> 2. Its powers under the Crop Insurance Act [SS 1983-84, c C-47.2] may only be exercised as an agent of the Crown; and
>
> 3. All of its property, both real and personal, including all monies acquired and administered by it are by the Crop Insurance Act deemed to be the property of the Crown; and
> 4. Where, by virtue of the express provisions of s. 19(6) of said the Proceedings against the Crown Act [RSS 1978, c P-27], no attachment "shall be issued out of any court for enforcing payment by the Crown of money";

then, in my view, if the Crown is not subject to attachment, it follows that an agent of the Crown whose powers may only be exercised as an agent of the Crown and whose property, both real and personal, is, as noted, deemed to be the property of the Crown, is also not subject to having the monies acquired and administered by it, as such agent attached.

[28] As observed by Mr. Justice Addy of the Federal Court (Trial Division) in Re Public Service Alliance of Canada, Local 660 and Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, [1975 CanLII 2254 (FC), [1976] 2 FC 145, 66 DLR (3d) 760 (FCTD)] at p. 761:

> "It seems clear that corporations that are, in the performance of their duties, acting solely as delegates or agents of the Crown enjoy as such the same prerogatives and immunities as the Crown itself. See ..."
> [Emphasis in original]

[38] The defendants rely on Canada (Attorney General) v Saskatchewan Water Corp., 1993 CanLII 9138 (SK CA), [1993] 7 WWR 1 (Sask CA), for the proposition that Crown immunity does not attach to agents of the Crown. However, the case does not stand for that proposition. In particular, the Court at para. 11 indicated:

> [11] ... Wittal [(1988), 1988 CanLII 5072 (SK CA), 51 DLR (4th) 641] (as now elucidated by Professor Wade's commentary) holds that to determine whether the Crown immunity preserved by s. 17 attaches to a particular governmental person or agency one looks not only at who the person or agency is but at what function or power the person or agency is exercising at the critical time. If it is a function or power of the Crown, immunity attaches. If it is a function or power conferred by statute upon the person himself or the agency itself, immunity does not attach.
> [Emphasis added]

[39] The proper approach to determining whether Crown immunity attaches is explained in the text by Peter W. Hogg, Patrick J. Monahan & Wade K. Wright, Liability of the Crown, 4th ed (Toronto: Thomson Reuters, 2011). The relevant selections from that book indicate:

> At common law, a prohibitory injunction is available against a Crown servant to restrain an unlawful act. For example, in Nireaha Tamaki v. Baker (1901) [[1901] AC 561 (PC, NZ)], the Privy Council held that an injunction would lie to restrain a Crown officer from acting outside his statutory powers in selling land to which the plaintiff claimed title. In Rattenbury v. Land Settlement Board (1929) [1928 CanLII 42 (SCC), [1929] SCR 52], the Supreme Court of Canada held that an injunction would lie against the Land Settlement Board, although it was an agent of the Crown, to restrain the Board from levying an ultra vires tax on the plaintiff. In Conseil des Ports Nationaux v. Langelier (1969) [1968 CanLII 51 (SCC), [1969] SCR 60], the Supreme Court of Canada held that an injunction would lie against the National Harbours Board, although it was an agent of the Crown, to restrain the Board from committing a tort.
>
> The principle underlying these cases is that an individual Crown servant or a corporate Crown agent whose act is unauthorized by statute or the prerogative is personally liable for that act to the same extent as a private individual would be liable. When an injunction is sought against a Crown servant (or a corporate Crown agent) no issue is raised as to whether the Crown itself can be enjoined, for the Crown servant is personally liable when he or she acts without legal justification. That is why, at common law, an injunction may be obtained against a Crown servant in those jurisdictions where the Crown itself is not liable to be enjoined.
> [Emphasis added]

[40] Looking at the proposed counterclaim, the defendants do not allege that SCIC was unauthorized by statute to act as it has. The defendants, likewise, do not plead that SCIC has acted outside of its statutory powers or that the claim is brought to restrain SCIC from committing a tort. The acts complained of by the defendants are that SCIC should operate their programs in a different manner than it does.

[41] In short, I find that the defendants' requested relief that the Court order SCIC to process the defendants' SCIC benefits for the years 2020-2024, the related relief of set-off regarding the 2020-2024 processing of SCIC benefits and the request that the Court direct SCIC to take certain actions regarding reinstatement of crop insurance are barred by s. 17 of the PAC Act.

[42] As for the defendants' request for a writ of mandamus, it is unclear why the defendants bring this request through a counterclaim, as opposed to seeking to judicially review the plaintiff's decision not to consider the defendants' internal AgriStability appeal.

[43] The Court of Appeal in MacPhee v Box, 1936 CanLII 141 (SK CA), [1936] 2 WWR 129 (CanLII) (Sask CA) [MacPhee], indicated:

> [18] In the second place it is doubtful to my mind if relief by way of mandamus can properly be granted against the mining recorder in an action of this kind, for what the plaintiffs are really seeking in the portion of their prayer quoted above is an order against him as a public official to compel him to do what they allege to be his duty. The usual and proper way to obtain such a form of relief is through application to a competent Court for a prerogative writ of mandamus as was done in Seguin's [1922 CanLII 749 (UK JCPC), [1922] 1 WWR 1169 case [PC]]. See also 9 Halsbury, 2nd ed., p. 752; Robertson's Civil Proceedings by and against the Crown (1908), pp. 111 et seq.; Reg. v. Holt (1890) 24 Q.B.D. 178, 59 L.J.Q.B. 113; Drysdale v. Dominion Coal Co. (1904) 1904 CanLII 57 (SCC), 34 S.C.R. 328. In this province such an application may be made either to a Judge of the Court of King's Bench or to this Court under Crown Practice Rules numbers 20 to 31 inclusive.
> [19] The kind of mandamus obtainable in an action is, according to modern authority, altogether distinguishable from that which must be pursued by a prerogative writ. The former was first made available to litigants under sec. 68 of The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, ch. 128, which has since been superseded in England by Marginal Rule 719, the counterpart of which is to be found in our King's Bench Rules, numbers 494, 495 and 496. It has been held repeatedly in England that the mandamus spoken of in Marginal Rule 719 "is not the prerogative mandamus but only a mandamus which may be granted to direct the performance of some act, of something to be done which is the result of an action where an action will lie." Glossop v. Heston & Isleworth Local Board (1879) 12 Ch. D. 102, 49 L.J. Ch. 89, per Brett, L.J., at 122. The same view was taken in Baxter v. London County Council (1890) 63 L.T. 767; Smith v. Chorley District Council, [1897] 1 Q.B. 678, 66 L.J.Q.B. 427; and Rex v. Wilts and Berks Canal Co.; Ex parte Berkshire County Council, [1912] 3 K.B. 623, 82 L.J.K.B. 3.
> [20] The same has also been held by the Courts in Ontario in respect of the corresponding provisions and the practice in that province. Thus in Rich v. Melancthon Board of Health (1912), 1912 CanLII 573 (ON SCDC), 26 O.L.R. 48 (Ont. Div. Ct.), Middleton, J., after distinguishing the mandamus referred to in the rules from the prerogative writ of that name, goes on to say at p. 53:
> > "The mandamus which may be awarded in an action is either in the nature of the old equitable mandatory injunction, or is merely ancillary to the enforcement of a legal right for which an action might be maintained at law."

v.

The Queen, the Postmaster General, Lawrence F. Reid, A. E. Green and Marc Savoie (Defendants)

Trial Division, Decary J.—Campbellton, January 14; Ottawa, July 17, 1981.

Prerogative writs — Declaration — Postmaster decided that flyers submitted by the plaintiff for delivery were non-mailable matter on account of the text which was critical of the Post Office — Post Office Act gives the Postmaster General the power to decide what is non-mailable matter and the right to delegate such power — Whether such discretionary power is restricted to mail that is the object of a regulation issued under the Act — Application for a declaration that the defendants have a public duty to accept for delivery all mail which complies with the Act and Regulations, and a declaration that the defendants have a duty to accept for delivery the particular flyer, is allowed — Post Office Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. P-14, ss. 2, 3(1), 5(1)(e),(p), 5(4), 6(e),(h),(j),(g), 7(1)(a),(b) — Third Class Mail Regulations, SOR/78-899, ss. 2, 3(1) — Prohibited Mail Regulations, C.R.C. 1978, Vol. XIV, c. 1259, ss. 2, 3 — Canadian Bill of Rights, S.C. 1960, c. 44 [R.S.C. 1970, Appendix III], ss. 1, 2.

The plaintiff seeks a declaration that the defendants have a public duty to accept for delivery all mail which complies with the Post Office Act and Regulations and a further declaration that the defendants have a duty to accept for delivery the particular item which the plaintiff submitted to the defendants for mailing. The plaintiff wished to mail a flyer which met all physical requirements of the Regulations, but its text was critical of the Post Office. The Postmaster exercised his discretion and decided that the flyers were non-mailable matter on account of their text. Paragraph 5(1)(p) of the Post Office Act gives the Postmaster General the power to decide what is non-mailable matter and subsection 5(4) gives the Postmaster General the right to delegate such power to assistant deputy postmasters general. Mailable matter is defined as any thing that by the Act or Regulations may be sent by post. The question is whether the flyers could be the object of the exercise of discretion under section 5 of the Act on account of their text, or whether such an exercise of discretion was unreasonable or a breach of the duty to act fairly.

Held, the defendants have a public duty to accept for delivery all mail which complies with the Post Office Act and Regulations. Further, the defendants have a duty to accept for delivery the particular item which the plaintiff submitted for c.

La Reine, le ministre des Postes, Lawrence F. Reid, A. E. Green et Marc Savoie (Défendeurs)

Division de première instance, le juge Decary—Campbellton, 14 janvier; Ottawa, 17 juillet 1981.

Brefs de prérogative — Jugement déclaratoire — Le maître de poste a décidé que les circulaires d'annonce que le demandeur avait présentées pour être transmises par la poste étaient des objets non transmissibles en raison du texte qui critiquait le bureau de poste — La Loi sur les postes confère au ministre des Postes le pouvoir de décider ce qui n'est pas transmissible et le droit de déléguer ce pouvoir — Il échet d'examiner si ce pouvoir discrétionnaire se limite aux envois qui font l'objet de règlements pris en application de la Loi — Est accueillie la demande visant à l'obtention d'un jugement déclaratoire portant que les défendeurs ont le devoir, d'ordre public, d'accepter, pour être transmis par la poste, tous les envois qui sont conformes à la Loi et à ses Règlements d'application, et d'un autre jugement déclaratoire portant que les défendeurs ont le devoir d'accepter, pour être transmise par la poste, la circulaire d'annonce particulière — Loi sur les postes, S.R.C. 1970, c. P-14, art. 2, 3(1), 5(1)(e),(p), 5(4), 6(e),(h),(j),(g), 7(1)(a),(b) — Règlement sur les objets de la troisième classe, DORS/78-899, art. 2, 3(1) — Règlement sur les objets interdits, C.R.C. 1978, Vol. XIV, c. 1259, art. 2, 3 — Déclaration canadienne des droits, S.C. 1960, c. 44 [S.R.C. 1970, Appendice III], art. 1, 2.

Le demandeur sollicite un jugement déclaratoire portant que les défendeurs ont le devoir, d'ordre public, d'accepter, pour être transmis par la poste, tous les envois qui sont conformes à la Loi sur les postes et à ses Règlements d'application ainsi qu'un autre jugement déclaratoire portant que les défendeurs ont le devoir d'accepter l'envoi particulier que le demandeur a présenté aux défendeurs pour expédition par la poste. Le demandeur désirait envoyer par la poste une circulaire d'annonce qui remplissait toutes les conditions matérielles des Règlements, mais dont le texte critiquait le bureau de poste. Se prévalant de son pouvoir discrétionnaire, le maître de poste a décidé que les circulaires d'annonce étaient des objets non transmissibles en raison de leur contenu. L'alinéa 5(1)p) de la Loi sur les postes confère au ministre des Postes le pouvoir de décider de ce qu'est un objet non transmissible, et le paragraphe 5(4) l'autorise à déléguer ce pouvoir aux sous-ministres adjoints des Postes. L'expression objet transmissible est définie comme comprenant tout ce qui, d'après la Loi et les Règlements, peut être envoyé par la poste. Il échet d'examiner si les circulaires d'annonce peuvent faire l'objet de l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire prévu à l'article 5 de la Loi en raison de leur contenu, ou si un tel exercice était déraisonnable ou constituait un manquement au devoir d'agir équitablement.

Arrêt: les défendeurs ont le devoir, d'ordre public, d'accepter, pour être transmis par la poste, tous les envois qui sont conformes à la Loi sur les postes et à ses Règlements d'application. En outre, les défendeurs ont le devoir d'accepter, pour être mailing. The definition of "mailable matter" indicates that it is only the Act or the Regulations that should define what is mailable, not the discretion of the Postmaster General or his designate. The legislator having enumerated in the definition and in the regulation section what is a mailable and a non-mailable matter, has in so doing fettered the discretion as it cannot be exercised except if it relates to items in the Act or in the Regulations. Had Parliament intended for the Postmaster General to have an absolute unfettered discretion to interrupt the mails or to refuse to accept mail because he did not agree with the contents of the mail, there would have been provided specific legislation permitting such actions. There being no such specific authority, it does appear that the legislator intended that all matters were mailable unless there were specific restrictions by way of regulation. Through the passage of the Prohibited Mail Regulations these have defined what is a non-mailable matter for the Act as well as the Regulations. Nowhere in the Act or Regulations is there the authority to refuse to accept mail because the Postmaster General or his designate does not approve of the purport of the mailing. Unless there is a specific regulation permitting the Postmaster General to refuse to permit the mail to go through, it is not to be inferred from the language that it is permitted to refuse the use of the mails. There are enabling words which permit the plaintiff to mail the flyer in question and, as a result, those words must be read as being compulsory. The Regulations in no way provide authority for the Postmaster General to refuse to accept third class mail because of the contents. The power to decide what is a letter given the Postmaster General at paragraph 5(1)(p) of the Act is only one of making a regulation as to what is a letter, a mailable matter and a non mailable matter, and cannot be exercised unless through the medium of regulations.

transmis par la poste. L'envoi particulier que le demandeur a présenté pour expédition par la poste. Il ressort de la définition d'«objet transmissible» qu'il appartient exclusivement à la Loi ou aux Règlements de définir ce qui est transmissible, et que cette définition ne relève pas du pouvoir discrétionnaire du ministre des Postes ni de la personne qu'il désigne. En prévoyant, dans la définition et dans l'article portant autorisation d'établir des règlements, ce qu'est un objet transmissible et ce qu'est un objet non transmissible, le législateur a limité le pouvoir discrétionnaire puisqu'il ne peut être exercé que relativement à des envois prévus par la Loi ou les Règlements. Si le Parlement avait voulu donner au ministre des Postes la liberté absolue d'interrompre l'acheminement du courrier ou de refuser d'accepter des envois parce qu'il n'était pas d'accord avec leur contenu, une autorisation expresse de le faire aurait été prévue dans la législation. Étant donné qu'il n'existe aucun pouvoir précis à ce sujet, il semblerait que le législateur ait voulu que tous les envois soient transmissibles, à moins de restrictions précises prévues par règlement. Le Règlement sur les objets interdits définit ce qu'est un objet non transmissible aux fins de la Loi ainsi que du Règlement. Nulle part dans la Loi ni dans le Règlement est prévu le pouvoir de refuser d'accepter des envois parce que le ministre des Postes ou la personne qu'il a désignée n'est pas d'accord avec le motif de l'envoi. A moins d'un règlement précis permettant au ministre des Postes de refuser de permettre à un envoi d'être acheminé par la poste, on ne doit pas interpréter le texte comme permettant de refuser à quelqu'un de se servir de la poste. Il existe des dispositions autorisant le demandeur à envoyer par la poste la circulaire d'annonce en question et, par conséquent, ces dispositions doivent être interprétées comme obligatoires. Aucune disposition des Règlements n'autorise le ministre des Postes à refuser d'accepter des objets de la troisième classe à cause de leur contenu. Le pouvoir de décider ce qu'est une lettre, conféré au ministre des Postes à l'alinéa 5(1)p) de la Loi, est seulement le pouvoir d'établir un règlement relativement à ce qu'est une lettre, un objet transmissible et un objet non transmissible, et ce pouvoir ne peut être exercé que par règlements.

The following are the reasons for judgment rendered in English by DECARY J.: The issue as I understand this matter*, is whether the exercise of discretionary power given the Postmaster General by the provisions of the Post Office Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. P-14, is restricted or not to the mail that is the object of a regulation issued under the authority of the Act and to the mail that is unlawful by virtue of the Act itself.

Before stating the facts that gave rise to the action seeking a declaration that the defendants have a public duty to accept for delivery all mail which complies with the Post Office Act and Regulations and a further declaration that the defendant, the Queen, and her servants have a duty to accept for delivery the particular item which the plaintiff submitted to the defendants for mailing, I believe that the pivotal sections of the Act and of the Regulations should be quoted and commented upon.

First, subsection 3(1) of the Post Office Act states:

3. (1) There shall be a department of the Government of Canada called the Post Office Department over which the Postmaster General shall preside

The purpose of this clause is patent: there shall exist a Post Office and an overall manager

The next section to consider is, in my view, this one:

5. (1) Subject to this Act, the Postmaster General shall administer, superintend and manage the Canada Post Office, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may

(p) decide in any particular case what is a letter, mailable matter or non-mailable matter;

If there were no Regulations, only these provisions of the Act, then the Postmaster General would be vested with an unfettered discretion to decide what is mailable and unmailable matter.

* The notes submitted by counsel for plaintiff, Mr. Pink, have been used to a great extent

Ce qui suit est la version française des motifs du jugement rendus par

LE JUGE DECARY: Si je comprends bien, la question qui se pose en l'espèce* est de savoir si l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire conféré au ministre des Postes par les dispositions de la Loi sur les postes, S.R.C. 1970, c. P-14, se limite ou non aux envois qui font l'objet d'un règlement pris en application de la Loi et aux envois que la Loi déclare illégaux.

Avant d'énoncer les faits qui ont donné naissance à la présente action qui tend à obtenir un jugement déclaratoire portant que les défendeurs ont le devoir, d'ordre public, d'accepter, pour être transmis par la poste, tous les envois qui sont conformes à la Loi sur les postes et à ses Règlements d'application ainsi qu'à obtenir un autre jugement déclaratoire portant que la défenderesse, la Reine, et ses employés ont le devoir d'accepter, pour être transmis par la poste, l'envoi particulier que le demandeur a présenté aux défendeurs pour expédition par la poste, je crois qu'il convient de citer et de commenter les articles importants de la Loi et des Règlements.

Premièrement, le paragraphe 3(1) de la Loi sur les postes prévoit:

3. (1) Est établi un ministère du gouvernement du Canada, appelé ministère des Postes, ayant à sa tête le ministre des Postes.

L'objet de cet article est évident: on crée un ministère des Postes avec un directeur général.

Le prochain article qu'il convient d'examiner est, selon moi, le suivant:

5. (1) Sous réserve de la présente loi, le ministre des Postes doit administrer, surveiller et gérer le poste au Canada et, sans restreindre la généralité de ce qui précède, peut

p) décider, dans tout cas particulier, ce qu'est une lettre, un objet transmissible ou un objet non transmissible,

S'il y avait seulement ces dispositions de la Loi, sans Règlements d'application, alors le ministre des Postes aurait la liberté absolue de décider ce qui est transmissible et ce qui ne l'est pas.

* J'ai employé en grande partie les notes soumises par l'avocat du demandeur, Me Pink.

DAVID NORMAN, Q.C., and RAY DIXON (Third Party Counsel), for the respondent.

This case was heard on February 19, 1981, at Fredericton, N.B., before HUGHES, C.J.N.B., RYAN and STRATTON, JJ.A., of the New Brunswick Court of Appeal.

On April 16, 1981, HUGHES, C.J.N.B., delivered the following judgment for the Court of Appeal:

1 HUGHES, C.J.N.B.: By an order of certification dated June 14, 1974, the appellant (Local 140), was certified by the respondent (the Board), under the Industrial Relations Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. I-4 (the Act), as the bargaining agent for a unit of employees of La Co-operative de Caraquet Ltee, the third party in this appeal. In June 1980, Local 140 applied to the Board for an order amending the order of certification dated June 14, 1974, to have office staff added to the bargaining unit. The Board held a hearing with respect to the application and by an order dated June 20, 1980, amended the bargaining unit as described in the original order of certification to include office staff, but expected therefrom a manager, an assistant manager, an accountant/secretary and those excluded by the Industrial Relations Act.

2 Local 140, being dissatisfied with the exclusion of the accountant/secretary from the bargaining unit, applied to the Board on September 4, 1980, pursuant to s. 131(1) of the Act, to reconsider its decision with the objective of having struck from the exclusions from the bargaining unit the position of accountant/secretary. The application submitted by Local 140 set forth the grounds upon which it relied in support of a reconsideration, requested a hearing of the application by the Board, and undertook to attend a hearing for this purpose.

3 The Board, without holding a hearing, issued its decision on the application, which is dated September 18, 1980, which, after reciting the nature of the application for reconsideration, states:

And WHEREAS the Board having considered the representations made in the said application by the applicant;

Now, therefore, pursuant to section 64(2)(d) of the regulations under the Industrial Relations Act, the Industrial Relations Board does hereby dismiss the application for reconsideration of a decision and does hereby confirm its decision dated June 20, 1980, granting the application of Local 140, Union Canadienne de L'Industrie des Pêches et des Travailleurs Affiliés, to include the classification of "Office Staff" in the bargaining unit. The certification order I.R.B. 1-89, dated the 14th day of June, 1974, would now read ALL PERSONS EMPLOYED BY LA COOPERATIVE DE CARAQUET LIMITEE, CARAQUET, NEW BRUNSWICK, SAVE AND EXCEPT THE MANAGER, ASSISTANT MANAGER, AN ACCOUNTANT/SECRETARY AND THOSE EXCLUDED BY THE INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS ACT.

4 Local 140 then applied to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench under order 62 of the Rules of Court for an order of certiorari to quash the Board's decision or order dated September 18, 1980, as well as for an order of mandamus to compel the Board to reconsider its application on the following grounds:

1. There was a denial of natural justice in that the Board did not give the applicant an opportunity to present evidence with respect to its application.

2. There was a violation of the Industrial Relations Act section 121(3) which gives a party to an application the right to present evidence.

3. The Board rule 63 is ultra vires of the Board insofar as it purports to confer on the Board the jurisdiction to dismiss an application without giving the parties an opportunity to call evidence.

4. If the Board rules are effective the decision of the Board dismissing the application is a nullity in that it did not set forth reasons for its decision contrary to its own rules.

5 The learned judge of the court of Queen's Bench dismissed the application, [See 33 N.B.R.(2d) 656; 80 A.P.R. 656.] and from that decision Local 140 has appealed to this court against such dismissal on the same grounds as were relied upon in the court of first instance.

1981 CanLII 3556 (NB CA)

6 Section 131(1) of the Act empowers the Board to reconsider its own decisions. It reads as follows:

> 131(1) Nothing in section 128 or 129 shall be deemed to preclude the Board from reconsidering any decision, determination, interim order, order, direction, declaration or ruling made by it and the Board may at any time, if it considers it advisable to do so, upon application made by any employee, employer, employers' organization, trade union, council of trade unions, or other person, or of its own motion, reconsider any decision, determination, interim order, order, direction, declaration or ruling made by it and vary or revoke any such decision, determination, interim order, order, direction, declaration or ruling.

7 The regulations made under the Act include sections dealing with applications or complaints and reconsideration of decisions. These are sections 63 and 64 which read as follows:

> Dismissal without a hearing
>
> 63.(1) Where an application or complaint does not, in the opinion of the Board, make out a prima facie case for the remedy requested, the Board may dismiss the application or complaint without a hearing and it shall in its decision state the reason for the dismissal.
>
> (2) The applicant or complainant may within ten days after he is served with the decision of the Board under subsection (1) request the Board to review its decision in form 39.
>
> (3) A request for review under this section shall contain a concise statement of the facts and reasons upon which the applicant relies.
>
> (4) Upon a request for review being filed, the Board may,
>
> (a) direct that the application or complaint be reopened and proceeded with by the Board in accordance with the provisions applicable thereto;
>
> (b) direct the Chief Executive Officer to serve the applicant and any other person who in the opinion of the Board may be affected by the application or complaint with a notice of hearing in form 81 to show cause why the application or complaint should be re-opened; or

1981 CanLII 3556 (NB CA)

(c) confirm its decision dismissing the application or complaint.

Reconsideration of a decision

64.(1) An application made under section 132 [now 131] of the Act other than an application within section 37(4) or section 63 of these rules, shall be made in quadruplicate in form 39.

(2) Upon an application being filed under subsection (1), the Board may

(a) direct the Chief Executive Officer to serve the applicant and any other person who in the opinion of the Board may be affected by the application with a notice of hearing in form 81 to show cause why the matter of the application should be re-opened; or

(b) direct that the matter be proceeded with in the manner and form prescribed in section 34 and 35 so far as the provisions may be applicable thereto; or

(c) direct that the matter be re-opened and proceeded with by the Board in accordance with the provisions applicable thereto; or

(d) confirm its decision dismissing the application.

8 On this appeal, counsel for Local 140 relies almost entirely on s. 121(3) of the Act to support his contention that the Board exceeded or abused its jurisdiction in dismissing the application for reconsideration by Local 140 without giving it an opportunity to present evidence and to make representations to the Board. The subsection reads as follows:

121.(3) The Board shall determine its own procedure but shall in every case, except as otherwise provided in this Act, give full opportunity to all interested parties to any proceeding to present evidence and to make representations, and the Board may make rules governing its procedure and the exercise of its powers and prescribing such forms as are deemed advisable.

9 It was submitted by counsel for Local 140 that both s. 63 and s. 64 of the rules were applicable where the Board confirmed its decision and dismissed its application and that the Board was required by s. 63 to state in its decision the reasons for dismissing the application, which it did not do.

10 In my opinion s. 63 and s. 64 of the rules deal with different situations and are mutually exclusive. Section 63 has no application to a reconsideration of a decision made by the Board. Section 64, on the other hand, is concerned with the reconsideration of decisions made by the Board under s. 131 of the Act and has no application to jurisdictional disputes under s. 47(4) of the rules or to applications or complaints under s. 63.

11 In the instant case the application by Local 140 was made under s. 64, being an application for the reconsideration of a decision of the Board contained in an order of certification dated June 20, 1980.

12 The question raised on this appeal is whether the Board, in dismissing the application for reconsideration, denied Local 140 natural justice by not affording it a hearing of the application to enable it to adduce evidence and made further submissions.

13 Counsel for Local 140 in effect contends that the Board is required by s. 121(3) of the Act to give full opportunity to all parties to present evidence and make representations to the Board, not only where the Board considers it advisable to reconsider a previous decision, but also before the Board decides whether "it is desirable to do so", and that failure on the part of the Board to give an applicant a full opportunity to present evidence and make representations in both situations deprives the applicant of a legal right given by s. 121(3) of the Act and thereby deprives the applicant of natural justice.

14 In my opinion, the legislature did not intend such a result. Had it done so it would not have included in s. 131(1) of the Act the words "if it considers it advisable to do so". That section empowers the Board to reconsider any decision it has made "if it considers it advisable to do so, upon application made by any ... trade union, ... or on its own motion, reconsider any decision ... made by it and vary ... any such decision ...".

15 Where the Board receives an application for reconsideration of one of its decisions, it is empowered to deal with it. The Board presumably knows from its records of the previous proceedings why it decided as it did and would first decide from the application whether there were adequate grounds for reconsideration and then decide whether it was advisable to proceed further with the application. It is only "if it considers it advisable to do so" that it would conduct a proceeding which might lead to a variation or a revocation of its decision. If it decides to proceed with the matter, it is required to direct service on "the applicant and any other person who in the opinion of the Board may be affected by the application with a notice of the hearing" as required by s. 64(2)(a) of the rule.

16 Where the Board, having received an application to reconsider a decision does not consider it advisable to do so, it may "confirm its decision dismissing the application", as an alternative to reconsidering it.

17 Counsel for Local 140 submitted that while the language of s. 131(1) of the Act is permissive, it imposes a duty upon the Board to exercise the power of reconsideration when called upon to do so. In support of that submission he cited Drysdale v. Dominion Coal Co. (1904), 34 S.C.R. 328; Julius v. The Lord Bishop of Oxford (1880), 5 App. Cas. 214; and Labour Relations Board v. The Queen on rel. of F. W. Woolworth Co. Ltd. et al., [1956] S.C.R. 82. In the last mentioned case Locke, J., who delivered the judgment of the court, commented at p. 86:

> The language of s. 5, in so far as it affects this aspect of the matter, reads:-
> 5. The Board shall have power to make orders: - ...
>
> (i) rescinding or amending any order or decision of the Board.
>
> While this language is permissive in form, it imposed, in my opinion, a duty upon the Board to exercise this power when called upon to do sdo by a party interested and having the right to make the application (Drysdale

v. Dominion Coal Company: Killam J.). Enabling words are always compulsory where they are words to effectuate a legal right (Julius v. Lord Bishop of Oxford: Lord Blackburn).

18 In my opinion s. 131(1) does not confer a legal right on anyone to require the Board to reconsider one of its decisions. Rather it confers a power on the Board to do so "if it considers it advisable to do so". Those words would not have been inserted in the section if the legislature intended to confer a legal right to a reconsideration since they are inconsistent with the conferring of such a right.

19 In R. v. O.L.R.B., Ex. parte Mok Mapney Hotels Ltd. (1970), 13 D.L.R.(3d) 289 (Ont. C.A.), the Ontario Labour Relations Board had proceeded with a hearing of an application of a trade union and certified it. The Board later entertained, but refused, an application for reconsideration made by objecting employees and by the employer. It was held that a denial of natural justice would have to be brought home to the Board before there could be a successful resort to certiorari, or a case made out that the objecting employees had been misled by another party to that party's advantage. Neither position could be made out. Laskin, J., who delivered the judgment of the Court of Appeal reversing the decision of the trial judge, said at pp. 295, 296:

> This court therefore holds that neither the employer nor the objecting employees can successfully complain of the denial of natural justice in respect of the proceedings which culminated in the certification order of November 25, 1968. Nothing new of any untoward and compelling character occurred thereafter to oblige the Board in reconsidering its decision, as it did on the request of the objecting employees and the employer, to come to the conclusion that it should either revise it or set it aside and rehear the original application for certification. Section 79(1) of the Labour Relations Act, so far as relevant to the point under discussion, declares "the Board may at any time, if it considers it advisable to do so, reconsider any decision, order, direction, declaration or ruling made by it and vary or revoke any such decision, order, direction, declaration or ruling". This provision leaves the widest discretion to the Board on whether it will even agree to reconsider a previous decision; it says nothing about the duty of the Board to come to a particular conclusion if it does agree to reconsider.

No complaint is made in the present case of any denial of natural justice in dealing with the application for reconsideration. It does not appear that an oral hearing must be given on such an application, but whether or not it must be given if requested, no such request was made. The Board, as already pointed out, did entertain the applications for reconsideration and dealt with them but without favourable result to the applicants.

If, as is the case on the view taken both by Addy, J., and by this court, no proper objection on certiorari lies to the original certification proceeding, it is difficult to understand how, without any change of facts save that the Board has been made aware of certain matters which were previously unknown to it, the Board is chargeable with a denial of natural justice in refusing to accede to the request that it reopen a decision made in an unimpeachable proceeding. This court cannot review the merits of the Board's decision made upon a reconsideration application. Addy, J., appears to have been of the view that the court may supervise the exercise of the power given to the Board to reconsider previous decisions. If that be so, we do not agree with that view.

In the result, the appeal must be allowed and the order of Addy, J., must be set aside and in its place an order should go dismissing the application for certiorari.

20 The appellant did not produce for the court the record of the proceedings which resulted in the Board's order of certification dated June 20, 1980, nor of the meeting at which the Board dismissed the appellant's application to reconsider. Counsel for the Board, however, in his factum made the following statement which was not disputed on the hearing of this appeal.

13. The appellant's third ground is based again on its allegation that the appellant was not given the right to be heard on the matter in respect of which it applied to have the Board reconsider.

14. In response, it is reiterated that the appellant was at the hearing of June 20, 1980, given the opportunity to adduce evidence on the matter, and that it took full advantage of this opportunity. It is certainly not accurate or fair for the appellant to say it was not given the opportunity to be heard. In substance, the appellant is really complaining that it did not receive a second opportunity to be heard. There was therefore no failure to apply any principle contained in the Gill Lumber case cited by the appellant.

21 The Nick Mooney Hotels Ltd. decision (supra), did not actually deal with the issue raised in the instant case since in that case there was no application for a hearing as there was here. Such a request does not, however, in my opinion, preclude the Board from disposing of the application "if it considers it advisable to do so", such being an exception within s. 121(3) of the Act.

22 In my opinion the Board in the instant case acted within its jurisdiction when, after deciding it was not advisable to reconsider its decision, dismissed the application.

23 Since I think no right of the applicant has been violated, I would dismiss the appeal, but as this is a new issue on the interpretation of the Act, I would make no order as to costs.

Appeal dismissed.

The following are the reasons for order rendered in English by

JEROME A.C.J.: This application under paragraph 42(1)(a) of the Access to Information Act [S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 111, Schedule 1] came on for hearing at Ottawa, Ontario, on November 27, 1985. The facts are not in dispute and are contained in a Statement of Agreed Facts dated July 15, 1985, which reads, in part:

1. On May 23, 1984, the Employment and Immigration Commission received a request pursuant to the Privacy Act from D.F., a Canadian Citizen, requesting as follows:

"I request full access to and disclosure of the immigration file relating to my sponsorship of my wife's application for permanent residence status in Canada. The Canadian Immigration Commission file number at the Vancouver office for the part of this file held there is 5133-15-6763. The Canadian Consulate General, Immigration Affairs, file number for that part of this file held in Seattle is 6054-B0138-5657. My wife's name is P.F."

2. By letter dated July 13, 1984, the said D.F. was given all personal information relating to him. Personal information relating to P.F. was exempted from disclosure pursuant to section 26 of the Privacy Act.

3. On May 23, 1984, the Employment and Immigration Commission received a request pursuant to the Privacy Act from P.F. requesting as follows:

"I request full access to and disclosure of the immigration file and record. The Canadian Immigration Commission file number at the Vancouver office for the part of this file held there is 5133-15-6763. The Canadian Consulate General, Immigration Affairs, file number for the part of this file held in Seattle is 6054-B0138-5657. Ce qui suit est la version française des motifs de l'ordonnance rendus par LE JUGE EN CHEF ADJOINT JEROME: La présente demande, fondée sur l'alinéa 42(1)a) de la Loi sur l'accès à l'information [S.C. 1980-81-82-83, chap. 111, annexe 1], a été entendue à Ottawa (Ontario), le 27 novembre 1985. Les faits non contestés sont décrits dans un exposé conjoint des faits en date du 15 juillet 1985 qui indique notamment:

[TRADUCTION] 1. Le 23 mai 1984, la Commission de l'emploi et de l'immigration a reçu de D.F., citoyen canadien, une demande fondée sur la Loi sur la protection des renseignements personnels et énonçant ce qui suit:

2. Par lettre en date du 13 juillet 1984, on a communiqué audit D.F. tous les renseignements personnels le concernant. En vertu de l'article 26 de la Loi sur la protection des renseignements personnels, on a refusé de communiquer les renseignements personnels concernant P.F.

3. Le 23 mai 1984, la Commission de l'emploi et de l'immigration a reçu de P.F. la demande suivante fondée sur la Loi sur la protection des renseignements personnels:

application for permanent residence, and the issues of my marital status in Canada, and whether I have been previously married in the Philippines."

4. By letter dated July 13, 1984, P.F. was denied access to the personal information requested by her on the basis that she was not a Canadian Citizen or Permanent Resident as required by subsection 12(1) of the Privacy Act.

5. On May 23, 1984, the Employment and Immigration Commission received a request pursuant to the Access to Information Act from D.F. requesting as follows:

"The record of which and to which access is requested is the immigration file relating to my sponsorship of the application for permanent residence by my wife, P.F. The Canadian Immigration Commission file number at the Vancouver office for the part of the record there is 5133-15-6763. The Canadian Consulate General, Immigration Affairs, file number for the part of the record being held by that office in Seattle is 6054-B0138-5657. Access is requested to the whole of the record at these offices, including all correspondence, memoranda, and all other documentary material relating to myself, my sponsorship of my wife's application, the related immigration matters, and the allegation being made by the Canadian Immigration Commission that my marriage to my wife is defective or void in some way due to her alleged previous marriage."

6. By letter dated July 13, 1984, the said D.F. was notified that the information he requested constituted personal information which should be accessed under the Privacy Act, and that, since he had submitted a request under the Privacy Act, he would receive all personal information to which he was entitled in response to his Privacy Act request.

7. On may 23, 1984, the Employment and Immigration Commission received a request pursuant to the Access to Information Act from the Complainant, Gerald G. Goldstein. That request is the request referred to in the Affidavit of Douglas W. McGibbon.

8. The said Gerald G. Goldstein is a Barrister and Solicitor practicing in the Province of British Columbia who represents the said P.F.

Together with his request for access, the complainant submitted a document signed by P.F. consenting to the release to the complainant of documents and information relating to her immigration matters. On July 13, 1984 the respondent informed the complainant that the information which he sought could not be obtained under the Access to Information Act because it was personal information about another person. A complaint was lodged with the Information Commissioner who, following an investigation, recommended that the information be released. The respondent subsequently provided the complainant with access to documents consisting of 5 pages, but refused to d'immigration, à ma demande de résidente permanente, à ma situation familiale au Canada, et à la question de savoir si j'ai été auparavant mariée aux Philippines."

4. Par lettre en date du 13 juillet 1984, P.F. s'est vu refuser la communication des renseignements personnels qu'elle avait demandés pour le motif qu'elle n'était ni citoyenne canadienne ni résidente permanente comme l'exige le paragraphe 12(1) de la Loi sur la protection des renseignements personnels.

5. Le 23 mai 1984, la Commission de l'emploi et de l'immigration a reçu de D.F. la demande suivante fondée sur la Loi sur l'accès à l'information:

"Le document auquel on veut avoir accès est le dossier d'immigration concernant mon parrainage de la demande de résidence permanente présentée par ma femme, P.F. La partie du dossier de la Commission de l'immigration du Canada conservée au bureau de Vancouver porte le numéro 5133-15-6763. La partie du dossier du Consulat général du Canada, Affaires de l'immigration, conservée par ce bureau à Seattle porte le numéro 6054-B0138-5657. Je demande qu'on me communique tout le dossier se trouvant à ces bureaux, y compris la correspondance, les notes de service et tout autre document relatif à moi-même, à mon parrainage de la demande de ma femme, aux questions d'immigration connexes et à l'allégation de la Commission de l'immigration du Canada selon laquelle mon mariage avec ma femme est entaché de nullité en raison de son présumé mariage antérieur."

6. Par lettre en date du 13 juillet 1984, on a informé ledit D.F. que les renseignements qu'il avait demandés constituaient des renseignements personnels qui devraient lui être communiqués en vertu de la Loi sur la protection des renseignements personnels et que, puisqu'il avait soumis une demande en vertu de celle-ci, il recevrait tous les renseignements personnels auxquels il avait droit en réponse à sa demande fondée sur ladite Loi.

7. Le 23 mai 1984, la Commission de l'emploi et de l'immigration a reçu du plaignant Gerald G. Goldstein une demande fondée sur la Loi sur l'accès à l'information. Cette demande est mentionnée dans l'affidavit de Douglas W. McGibbon.

8. Ledit Gerald G. Goldstein est un avocat qui exerce sa profession en Colombie-Britannique et qui représente ladite P.F.

En même temps que sa demande de communication, le plaignant a soumis un document signé par P.F. aux termes duquel celle-ci consent à ce que les documents et renseignements relatifs à ses affaires d'immigration lui soient communiqués. Le 13 juillet 1984, l'intimé a informé le plaignant qu'il ne pouvait, sur le fondement de la Loi sur l'accès à l'information, obtenir les renseignements qu'il avait demandés parce qu'il s'agissait de renseignements personnels concernant une autre personne. Une plainte a été déposée auprès du Commissaire à l'information qui, à l'issue d'une enquête, a recommandé que les renseignements soient communiqués. L'intimé a par la suite permis au plai-disclose in excess of 200 pages of documents. The applicant seeks a review of that refusal under paragraph 42(1)(a) of the Access to Information Act:

> 42. (1) The Information Commissioner may
>
> (a) apply to the Court, within the time limits prescribed by section 41, for a review of any refusal to disclose a record requested under this Act or a part thereof in respect of which an investigation has been carried out by the Information Commissioner, if the Commissioner has the consent of the person who requested access to the record;
>
> (b) appear before the Court on behalf of any person who has applied for a review under section 41; or
> (c) with leave of the Court, appear as a party to any review applied for under section 41 or 44.

Section 48 of the Access to Information Act places upon the respondent the burden of establishing that she is authorized to refuse to disclose the record requested.

> 48. In any proceedings before the Court arising from an application under section 41 or 42, the burden of establishing that the head of a government institution is authorized to refuse to disclose a record requested under this Act or a part thereof shall be on the government institution concerned.

Counsel for the respondent argues that such authority exists under section 19 of the Act:

> 19. (1) Subject to subsection (2), the head of a government institution shall refuse to disclose any record requested under this Act that contains personal information as defined in section 3 of the Privacy Act.
>
> (2) The head of a government institution may disclose any record requested under this Act that contains personal information if
>
> (a) the individual to whom it relates consents to the disclosure;
>
> (b) the information is publicly available; or
> (c) the disclosure is in accordance with section 8 of the Privacy Act.

It is not disputed that the record in issue contains personal information as defined in section 3 of the Privacy Act [S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 111, Schedule II] nor that the individual to whom that information relates has consented to its disclosure. Nevertheless, counsel contends that since subsection 19(2) provides that the head of a government institution may disclose personal information, it establishes with equal force a discretion not to disclose even though the conditions of subsection 19(2) have been met.

gnant d'avoir accès à des documents comprenant 5 pages, mais il a refusé de lui communiquer plus de 200 autres pages. Le requérant se fonde sur l'alinéa 42(1)a) de la Loi sur l'accès à l'information pour exercer un recours en révision de ce refus:

> 42. (1) Le Commissaire à l'information a qualité pour:
>
> a) exercer lui-même, à l'issue de son enquête et dans les délais prévus à l'article 41, le recours en révision pour refus de communication totale ou partielle d'un document, avec le consentement de la personne qui avait demandé le document;
>
> b) comparaître devant la Cour au nom de la personne qui a exercé un recours devant la Cour en vertu de l'article 41;
> c) comparaître, avec l'autorisation de la Cour, comme partie à une instance engagée en vertu des articles 41 ou 44.

En vertu de l'article 48 de la Loi sur l'accès à l'information, il incombe à l'intimé d'établir le bien-fondé du refus de communication du document demandé:

> 48. Dans les procédures découlant des recours prévus aux articles 41 ou 42, la charge d'établir le bien-fondé du refus de communication totale ou partielle d'un document incombe à l'institution fédérale concernée.

L'avocate de l'intimé fait valoir qu'une telle autorisation existe en vertu de l'article 19 de la Loi:

> 19. (1) Sous réserve du paragraphe (2), le responsable d'une institution fédérale est tenu de refuser la communication de documents contenant les renseignements personnels visés à l'article 3 de la Loi sur la protection des renseignements personnels.
>
> (2) Le responsable d'une institution fédérale peut donner communication de documents contenant des renseignements personnels dans les cas où:
>
> a) l'individu qu'ils concernent y consent;
>
> b) le public y a accès;
> c) la communication est conforme à l'article 8 de la Loi sur la protection des renseignements personnels.

Il n'est pas contesté que le document litigieux contient des renseignements personnels au sens de l'article 3 de la Loi sur la protection des renseignements personnels [S.C. 1980-81-82-83, chap. 111, annexe II], ni que l'individu qu'ils concernent a consenti à leur communication. L'avocate de l'intimé soutient toutefois que puisque le paragraphe 19(2) prévoit que le responsable d'une institution fédérale peut donner communication de renseignements personnels, il établit du même coup le pouvoir discrétionnaire de refuser de communiquer lors même que les conditions du paragraphe 19(2) seraient remplies.

1986 CanLII 6836 (FC)

I reject the argument for two reasons: first, as a question of law, it is contrary to principles of statutory interpretation; second, it represents an approach that runs directly against the very purpose for which this legislation was enacted, as stated in the express provisions of the statute and confirmed in jurisprudence.

In terms of statutory interpretation, when legislators intend to create an obligation to do something, they use the word "shall". When they intend instead to establish a discretion or a right to do it, they use the word "may". Had the legislators intended here to repose residual discretion in the head of the government institution not to disclose information, even though the conditions of section 19(2) had been met, that appropriate and precise language would have been used. Of course, the Act does not establish the discretion not to disclose in such circumstances (in which case the respondent's argument might have had merit). The language chosen expresses the intent to establish a discretion to release personal information under certain circumstances. Those conditions having been fulfilled, it becomes tantamount to an obligation upon the head of the government institution to do so, especially where the purpose for which the statute was enacted is, as here, to create a right of access in the public. In support of the argument to the contrary, counsel for the respondent relied upon the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Maple Lodge Farms Ltd. v. Government of Canada, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 2. However, in the judgment in the Federal Court of Appeal [[1981] 1 F.C. 500], delivered by Le Dain J., and affirmed in the Supreme Court of Canada, the following significant passage appears [at page 508]:

> This is not a case for application of the principle recognized in Julius v. The Righ Rev. the Lord Bishop of Oxford (1879-80) 5 App. Cas. 214 and referred to in The Labour Relations Board of Saskatchewan v. The Queen on the relation of F.W. Woolworth Co. Ltd., [1956] S.C.R. 82 at page 87, that permissive words may be construed as creating a duty where they confer a power the exercise of which is necessary to effectuate a right.

It is my view, of course, that the present matter is precisely such a case and I therefore turn to the following passages of the two decisions referred to above. In Julius v. Oxford (Bishop of) (1880), 5

Je rejette cet argument pour deux raisons: premièrement, du point du droit, il va à l'encontre des principes d'interprétation des lois; deuxièmement, il contredit le but même pour lequel la législation a été édictée, ainsi qu'il est dit dans les dispositions expresses de la Loi et confirmé dans la jurisprudence.

Pour ce qui est de l'interprétation des lois, lorsque le législateur a l'intention de créer une obligation de faire, il emploie le mot «shall» (doit). Par contre, s'il veut établir un pouvoir discrétionnaire ou un droit de faire, il emploie le mot «may» (peut). Si le législateur avait voulu en l'espèce investir le responsable d'une institution fédérale du pouvoir discrétionnaire de ne pas donner communication de renseignements, même si les conditions du paragraphe 19(2) ont été remplies, il aurait employé ce langage approprié et explicite. Bien entendu, la Loi n'établit pas le pouvoir discrétionnaire de ne pas communiquer de renseignements dans ces circonstances (auquel cas l'argument de l'intimé pourrait être fondé). Il ressort du langage choisi l'intention d'établir le pouvoir discrétionnaire de donner, dans certains cas, communication de renseignements personnels. C'est dire que, une fois ces conditions remplies, le responsable de l'institution fédérale est tenu de communiquer ces renseignements surtout lorsque le but pour lequel la Loi a été édictée est, comme en l'espèce, de conférer au public le droit d'y avoir accès. A l'appui de l'argument contraire, l'avocate de l'intimé s'est appuyée sur l'arrêt de la Cour suprême du Canada Maple Lodge Farms Ltd c. Gouvernement du Canada, [1982] 2 R.C.S. 2. Voici toutefois un passage important qui figure dans l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel fédérale [[1981] 1 C.F. 500, à la page 508] rendu par le juge Le Dain et confirmé par la Cour suprême du Canada:

> La présente affaire ne donne pas lieu à l'application du principe reconnu dans l'affaire Julius c. The Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Oxford (1879-80) 5 App. Cas. 214, et mentionné dans l'affaire The Labour Relations Board of Saskatchewan c. La Reine ex rel. F.W. Woolworth Co. Ltd., [1956] R.C.S. 82, à la page 87, selon lequel des termes accordant une faculté peuvent s'interpréter comme créant un devoir s'ils confèrent un pouvoir dont l'exercice est nécessaire pour donner effet à un droit.

Bien entendu, j'estime que c'est précisément le cas en l'espèce, et j'aborde donc les passages suivants des deux décisions mentionnées ci-dessus. Dans Julius v. Oxford (Bishop of) (1880), 5 App. Cas.

App. Cas. 214 (H.L.), Lord Blackburn states at pages 242-243:

> But there are cases in which the authority or power given is not to do a judicial act, and yet there is a duty on the donee to exercise the power if it appears to be given to the donee for the purpose of making good a right, and he is called upon by those who have that right to exercise the power for their benefit.

And in Labour Relations Board v. The Queen ex rel. F.W. Woolworth Company Limited and Agnes Slabick and Saskatchewan Joint Board, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, [1956] S.C.R. 82, Locke J. states at page 86:

> The language of s. 5, in so far as it affects this aspect of the matter, reads:
>
> 5. The board shall have power to make orders
>
> .....
>
> (i) rescinding or amending any order or decision of the board.
> While this language is permissive in form, it imposes, in my opinion, a duty upon the Board to exercise this power when called upon to do so by a party interested and having the right to make the application (Drysdale v. Dominion Coal Company ((1904) 34 Can. S.C.R. 328 at 336); Killam J.). Enabling words are always compulsory where they are words to effectuate a legal right (Julius v. Lord Bishop of Oxford ((1880) 5 A.C. 214 at 243); Lord Blackburn).

Turning then to the purpose of the legislation, it is perhaps appropriate to return once again to the language I used in Maislin Industries Limited v. Minister for Industry, Trade and Commerce, [1984] 1 F.C. 939 [at pages 942 and 943]:

> It should be emphasized however, that since the basic principle of these statutes is to codify the right of public access to Government information two things follow: first, that such public access ought not be frustrated by the courts except upon the clearest grounds so that doubt ought to be resolved in favour of disclosure; second, the burden of persuasion must rest upon the party resisting disclosure whether, as in this case, it is the private corporation or citizen, or in other circumstances, the Government. It is appropriate to quote subsection 2(1):
> 2. (1) The purpose of this Act is to extend the present laws of Canada to provide a right of access to information in records under the control of a government institution in accordance with the principles that government information should be available to the public, that necessary exceptions to the right of access should be limited and specific and that decisions on the disclosure of government information should be reviewed independently of government.

That interpretation is reinforced on the specific language of section 4:

214 (H.L.), lord Blackburn s'est prononcé en ces termes aux pages 242 et 243:

> [TRADUCTION] Mais il existe des cas où il ne s'agit pas d'exercer un acte judiciaire en vertu de l'autorité ou du pouvoir conféré, et pourtant la personne désignée est tenue d'exercer ce pouvoir s'il appert qu'elle en est investie dans le but de faire valoir un droit et que les titulaires de ce droit lui demandent de l'exercer dans leur intérêt.

Et dans l'affaire Labour Relations Board v. The Queen ex rel. F.W. Woolworth Company Limited and Agnes Slabick and Saskatchewan Joint Board, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, [1956] R.C.S. 82, le juge Locke a déclaré à la page 86:

> [TRADUCTION] La partie de l'art. 5 qui concerne cet aspect de la question est ainsi rédigée:—
>
> 5. La Commission a le pouvoir de rendre des ordonnances
>
> .....
>
> (i) annulant ou modifiant toute ordonnance ou décision du Conseil.
> Bien que le texte soit rédigé dans une forme qui comporte autorisation, à mon avis il impose à la commission l'obligation d'exercer ce pouvoir lorsqu'une partie intéressée et ayant le droit de faire la requête le lui en fait la demande (Drysdale v. Dominion Coal Company (1904) 34 Can. R.C.S. 328, à la p. 336); le juge Killam). Les dispositions portant autorisation sont toujours obligatoires lorsqu'elles ont pour objet de reconnaître un droit (Julius c. Lord Bishop of Oxford ((1880) 5 A.C. 214, à la p. 243); le lord Blackburn).

Pour ce qui est du but de la Loi, il convient peut-être de revenir encore une fois aux propos que j'ai tenus dans l'affaire Maislin Industries Limited c. Ministre de l'Industrie et du Commerce, [1984] 1 C.F. 939 [aux pages 942 et 943]:

> Il faut cependant souligner que, puisque le principe de base de ces lois est de codifier le droit du public à l'accès aux documents du gouvernement, deux conséquences en découlent d'abord, les tribunaux ne doivent pas entraver ce droit sauf pour les motifs les plus évidents, de sorte qu'en cas de doute, il faut permettre la communication, deuxièmement, le fardeau de convaincre la cour doit incomber à la partie qui s'oppose à la communication, qu'il s'agisse, comme en l'espèce, d'une société privée ou d'un citoyen ou, dans d'autres cas, du gouvernement. Il convient de citer le paragraphe 2(1):
> 2. (1) La présente loi a pour objet d'élargir l'accès aux documents de l'administration fédérale en consacrant le principe du droit du public à leur communication, les exceptions indispensables à ce droit étant précises et limitées et les décisions quant à la communication étant susceptibles de recours indépendants du pouvoir exécutif.

Cette interprétation se trouve renforcée par la disposition expresse de l'article 4:

1986 CanLII 6836 (FC)

4. (1) Subject to this Act, but notwithstanding any other Act of Parliament, every person who is

(a) a Canadian citizen, or

(b) a permanent resident within the meaning of the Immigration Act, 1976, has a right to and shall, on request, be given access to any record under the control of a government institution.

To repeat, the purpose of the Access to Information Act is to codify the right of access to information held by the government. It is not to codify the government's right of refusal. Access should be the normal course. Exemptions should be exceptional and must be confined to those specifically set out in the statute. In the present case, the applicant was quite properly informed that the information sought could not be obtained except by a Canadian citizen or a resident and could not involve disclosure of personal information about another person without their consent. Once these conditions were met, and they were here, the information should have been disclosed.

The application must therefore succeed. An order will go pursuant to section 49 of the Act ordering the respondent to disclose the records in issue to the complainant, Gerald G. Goldstein. The applicant should have her costs of this application.

4. (1) Sous réserve de la présente loi mais nonobstant toute autre loi du Parlement, ont droit à l'accès aux documents des institutions fédérales et peuvent se les faire communiquer sur demande

a) les citoyens canadiens, ou

b) les résidents permanents au sens de la Loi sur l'immigration de 1976.

Je le répète, la Loi sur l'accès à l'information vise à codifier le droit d'accès aux renseignements détenus par le gouvernement. Il ne s'agit pas de codifier le droit du gouvernement de refuser cet accès. L'accès devrait être la règle, et les exemptions qui constituent l'exception doivent être expressément prévues par la Loi. En l'espèce, c'est à juste titre qu'on a informé le requérant que les renseignements demandés ne pouvaient être obtenus que par un citoyen canadien ou un résident, et ne pouvaient donner lieu à la communication de renseignements personnels concernant une autre personne sans son consentement. Une fois ces conditions remplies, et c'est le cas en l'espèce, on aurait dû communiquer les renseignements en question.

La demande doit donc être accueillie. Il sera rendu, en vertu de l'article 49 de la Loi, une ordonnance enjoignant à l'intimé de communiquer les documents litigieux au plaignant Gerald G. Goldstein. Le requérant devrait avoir droit à ses dépens de la présente requête.

Courts -- Charter of Rights -- Independent tribunal -- Provincial Court judge declined jurisdiction on ground Provincial Court (Criminal Division) not an independent tribunal -- Whether or not judge of Provincial Court (Criminal Division) an independent tribunal.

Constitutional law -- Charter of Rights -- Courts -- Independent tribunal -- Jurisdiction declined on ground Provincial Court (Criminal Division) not an independent tribunal -- Whether or not judge of Provincial Court (Criminal Division) an independent tribunal -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 11(d) -- Constitution Act, 1982, s. 52(1) -- Provincial Courts Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 398 -- Public Service Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 418 -- Public Service Superannuation Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 419 -- Provincial Courts Amendment Act, 1983, 1983 (Ont.), c. 18, s. 1 -- Provincial Judges and Masters Statute Law Amendment Act, 1983, 1983 (Ont.), c. 78, s. 2(2) -- Courts of Justice Act, 1984, 1984 (Ont.), c. 11.

A judge of the Provincial Court (Criminal Division), sitting on the Crown's appeal against the sentence imposed on the appellant following conviction for careless driving, declined to hear the appeal pending determination by a superior court as to whether the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) was an independent tribunal within the meaning of s. 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Among the several reasons advanced by counsel in support of the contention that the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) was not an independent tribunal were the nature of the tenure of provincial court judges, particularly those holding office under a post-retirement reappointment, the manner in which their salaries and pensions were fixed and provided for, and the extent to which they were dependent for certain advantages and benefits on the discretion of the executive government. The Ontario Court of Appeal proceeded on the basis that the provincial court judge had in effect decided that as a matter of law the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) as an institution was not independent. It allowed the appeal, holding that both the Provincial Court Judge and the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) were independent, and remitted the matter to the Provincial Court Judge to determine whether the sentence imposed was a fit and proper sentence.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed and the constitutional question answered as follows: A judge of the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) of Ontario is an independent tribunal within the meaning of s. 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The concepts of "independence" and "impartiality" found in s. 11(d) of the Charter, although obviously related, are separate and distinct values or requirements. Impartiality refers to a state of mind or attitude of the tribunal in relation to the issues and the parties in a particular case. "Independence" reflects or embodies the traditional constitutional value of judicial independence and connotes not only a state of mind but also a status or relationship to others--particularly to the executive branch of government--that rests on objective conditions or guarantees. Judicial independence involves both individual and institutional relationships: the individual independence of a judge as reflected in such matters as security of tenure and the institutional independence of the court as reflected in its institutional or administrative relationships to the executive and legislative branches of government.

The test for independence for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter should be, as for impartiality, whether the tribunal may be reasonably perceived as independent. This perception must be a perception of whether the tribunal enjoys the essential objective conditions or guarantees of judicial independence and not a perception of how it will in fact act regardless of whether it enjoys such conditions or guarantees.

It would not be feasible to apply the most rigorous and elaborate conditions of judicial independence to the constitutional requirement of independence in s. 11(d) of the Charter, which may have to be applied to a variety of tribunals. The essential conditions of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) must bear some reasonable relationship to the variety of legislative and constitutional provisions in Canada governing matters which bear on the judicial independence of tribunals trying persons charged with an offence. It is the essence of the security afforded by the essential conditions of judicial independence that is appropriate for application under s. 11(d) of the Charter and not any particular legislative or constitutional formula by which it may be provided or guaranteed. Section 11(d) cannot be construed and applied so as to accord provincial court judges the same constitutional guarantees of security of tenure and security of salary and pension as superior court judges for that construction would, in effect, amend the judicature provisions of the Constitution. The standard of judicial independence cannot be a standard of uniform provisions but rather must reflect what is common to the various approaches to the essential conditions of judicial independence in Canada.

Security of tenure, because of the importance traditionally attached to it, is the first of the essential conditions of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter. The essentials of such security are that a judge be removable only for cause, and that cause be subject to independent review and determination by a process at which the judge affected is afforded a full opportunity to be heard. The essence of security of tenure for purposes of s. 11(d) is a tenure, whether until an age of retirement, for a fixed term, or for a specific adjudicative task, that is secure against interference by the Executive or other appointing authority in a discretionary or arbitrary manner.

Notwithstanding the importance of tradition as an objective condition tending to ensure the independence in fact of a tribunal, a provincial court judge who held office during pleasure under a post-retirement reappointment prior to the amendment in 1983 to s. 5(4) of the Provincial Courts Act was not an independent tribunal. The reasonable perception was that by providing for two classes of tenure the Legislature had deliberately, in the case of one category of judges, reserved to the Executive the right to terminate the holding of office without the necessity of any particular jurisdiction and without any inhibition or restraint arising from perceived tradition.

The Provincial Court Judge who declined jurisdiction did not hold office under a post-retirement reappointment. The fact that certain judges may have held office during pleasure at that time could not impair or destroy the independence of the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) as a whole. The objection would have to be taken to the status of the particular judge constituting the tribunal.

The second essential condition of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter is financial security--security of salary or other remuneration, and, where appropriate, security of pension. The essence of such security is that the right to salary and pension should be established by law and not be subject to arbitrary interference by the Executive in a manner that could affect judicial independence. In the case of pension, the essential distinction is between a right to pension and a pension that depends on the grace or favour of the Executive. Although it may be theoretically preferable that judicial salaries should be fixed by the legislature rather than the executive government and should be made a charge on the consolidated revenue fund rather than requiring annual appropriation, neither of these features should be regarded as essential to the financial security that may be reasonably perceived as sufficient for independence under s. 11(d) of the Charter. The right to salary of a provincial court judge is established by law, and there is no way in which the Executive could interfere with that right in a manner to affect the independence of the individual judge. It is impossible that the legislature would refuse to vote the annual appropriation in order to attempt to exercise some control or influence over a class of judges as a whole. The fact that the provisions respecting the pensions and other benefits of civil servants were made applicable to provincial court judges did not impair the independence of the latter. The provisions established a right to pension and other benefits which could not be interfered with by the Executive on a discretionary or arbitrary basis.

The third essential condition of judicial independence is the institutional independence of the tribunal with respect to matters of administration bearing directly on the exercise of its judicial function. Judicial control over such matters as assignment of judges, sittings of the court and court lists has been considered the essential or minimum requirement for institutional independence. Although an increased measure of administrative autonomy or independence for the courts may be desirable it cannot be regarded as essential for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter.

While it may be desirable that discretionary benefits or advantages such as leave of absence with pay and permission to engage in extra-judicial employment, to the extent they should exist at all, should be under the control of the judiciary rather than the Executive, their control by the Executive does not touch one of the essential conditions of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter. It would not, moreover, be reasonable to apprehend that a provincial court judge would be influenced by the possible desire for one of these benefits or advantages to be less than independent in his or her adjudication.

HEARD: By Written Submissions

OVERVIEW

[1] Dilipkanth Chandrarajah (the "applicant") was involved in an automobile accident on August 24, 2019 and sought benefits pursuant to the Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule – Effective September 1, 2010 (the "Schedule"). The applicant was denied benefits by Economical Insurance (the "respondent").

[2] The applicant passed away on June 3, 2020 due to causes unrelated to the accident.

[3] On February 25, 2022, the applicant's counsel applied to the Licence Appeal Tribunal – Automobile Accident Benefits Service (the "Tribunal") for resolution of the dispute. There is no indication on the Application by an Injured Person for Auto Insurance Dispute Resolution under the Insurance Act that the applicant is deceased.

[4] At the start of the case conference held on December 20, 2022, the applicant's counsel informed the respondent and the Tribunal that the applicant is deceased and that the applicant's spouse would be in attendance on behalf of the applicant. Neither the applicant's counsel nor the respondent had any documentation in their possession regarding the applicant's will, estate, or named beneficiary.

[5] The applicant's counsel requested to adjourn the case conference to allow time to gather the necessary documentation. The Tribunal denied the adjournment request as the applicant passed away on June 3, 2020, and the application was submitted on February 25, 2022, which means that the applicant's counsel had had more than nine (9) months to request the documentation from the applicant's family.

[6] The application was subsequently scheduled to proceed to a written hearing on September 8, 2023. Although no estate trustee was appointed to act on behalf of the deceased applicant, the applicant's counsel filed written submissions and evidence as well as reply submissions for the hearing. The respondent filed responding submissions and evidence.

ISSUES

[7] The issues in dispute are:

1. Is the applicant entitled to physiotherapy services proposed by Gibson Wellness Centre, as follows:

    i. $7,041.67, in a treatment plan/OCF-18 ("treatment plan") submitted January 8, 2020 and denied February 26, 2020;

ii. $6,141.80, in a treatment plan submitted January 15, 2020 and denied February 26, 2020; and

iii. $6,702.67, in a treatment plan submitted May 7, 2020 and denied May 26, 2020?

2. Is the respondent liable to pay an award under s. 10 of Regulation 664 because it unreasonably withheld or delayed payments to the applicant?

3. Is the applicant entitled to interest on any overdue payment of benefits?

[8] The respondent also introduced in its written hearing submissions a claim for costs against the applicant.

RESULT

[9] For the reasons that follow, I find that:

1. The application was not properly constituted and is an irremediable nullity.

2. It is unnecessary for me to consider the deceased applicant's entitlement to the disputed treatment plans, interest, and an award as neither the applicant nor an estate trustee acting on his behalf pursued this claim for accident benefits. To continue the application in the circumstances would be an abuse of process.

3. The respondent is not entitled to costs.

[10] The application is dismissed.

ANALYSIS

Procedural Issue

[11] In its written hearing submissions, the respondent raised a procedural issue. The respondent submits that since the applicant is deceased and that no estate trustee has been appointed, the application is not legally viable as there is no authority on which it can proceed. Further, the respondent argues that, in the circumstances, the application was not properly commenced. As such, the respondent requests that the application be dismissed on the basis that it is vexatious.

[12] The respondent relies on Kanthasamy Karthigesu v. Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company, 2016 ONFSCDRS 269 (CanLII), Jamil Toma v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co., 2014 ONFSCDRS 171 (CanLII) [Toma], The Estate of Delia Arnold v. Cumis General Insurance Company, 2017 ONFSCDRS 336 (CanLII), and Paata Chechelashvili v. Jevco Insurance Company, 2016 ONFSCDRS 189 (CanLII).

[13] In response, the applicant's counsel submits that this issue cannot be considered as it was not addressed at the case conference, and that raising this issue at this stage is indicative that the respondent is acting in bad faith. The applicant's counsel further submits that dismissing the application would be highly prejudicial to the deceased applicant and asserts that this is a very sensitive matter for the applicant's surviving spouse. The applicant's counsel also denies that the application was not properly commenced and submits that it was filed to protect the limitation period.

[14] In the circumstances, I am prepared to consider the procedural issue raised by the respondent. I find that it falls within my discretion to determine whether to consider the procedural issue raised by the respondent. It is well established that the Tribunal has the power to determine its own procedures and practices and may for that purpose make orders with respect to the procedures and practices in a particular proceeding. Further, the Tribunal may make such orders or gives such direction in proceedings before it as it considers proper to prevent abuse of its processes [see: Statutory Powers Procedure Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. S.22 ("SPPA"), ss. 23(1) and s. 25.0.1].

The application was not properly constituted, and it is an irremediable nullity [15] I find that the respondent has demonstrated, on a balance of probabilities, that the application was not properly constituted, and that it is an irremediable nullity.

[16] In Toma, an application for arbitration was commenced by a deceased insured's counsel. While the insured's widow attended the pre-hearing discussion, it was agreed that the arbitration process could not go forward until an administrator or representative of the insured's estate was appointed. The insured's counsel later advised that the insured's family had not taken any steps to have an estate trustee appointed and that they had no plans to do so. The insurer sought to have the application dismissed.

[17] The arbitrator found that the insured's claims had become vexatious as there was no legally viable way of pursuing them, and he indicated as follows on page 2 of the decision:

> Mr. Toma has been deceased for more than two years. A deceased person cannot pursue accident benefits. A legally appointed representative, either an executor or an estate trustee can "stand in the shoes" of the deceased and pursue a claim for accident benefits. No such person exists in this claim, nor, apparently, are there any plans to appoint a trustee. There is some question in my mind as to whether the dispute resolution process was properly commenced, given the lack of an executor or estate trustee.

[18] Similarly, in Michael Wentzel v. RBC General Insurance Company, 2013 ONFSCDRS 33 (CanLII) [Wentzel], an application was commenced by the insured's representative after the insured passed away, without an estate trustee having been appointed. The insurer moved to dismiss the application as a nullity because of the insured's death and sought costs against the insured's representative for commencing an unauthorized proceeding. There was no evidence that anyone had undertaken to administer the insured's estate. The arbitrator concluded that the application had not properly been constituted and was an irremediable nullity and dismissed the application. The arbitrator also awarded costs against the insured's representative, which was upheld on appeal.

[19] While I am not bound by decisions rendered by arbitrators of the Financial Services Commission of Ontario, I find the Toma and Wentzel decisions to be persuasive, and I subscribe to the same opinion.

[20] In the present case, I find that the applicant's counsel commenced the application without the applicant's authority. It is well established that a deceased person has no authority to pursue a claim for accident benefits. Rather, a lawfully authorized representative must be appointed to act on behalf of the deceased person. While it is unclear who, if anyone has been instructing the applicant's counsel with respect to this application, given that the applicant passed away prior to the commencement of this application, in the absence of a lawfully authorized representative such as an estate trustee, there is no legally viable way for pursuing this application.

[21] Although the applicant's counsel argues that she commenced the application to protect the limitation period, no explanation was provided as to why no estate trustee was appointed between June 3, 2020 (date of death) and February 25, 2022 (date of application). Further, there is no evidence that any steps were taken during this 632-day period to appoint an estate trustee to act on behalf of the applicant. Considering that the applicant passed away prior to the commencement of this application, in the absence of an estate trustee, the applicant's counsel has not demonstrated that she was authorized to commence the application.

[22] I further find that the applicant's counsel has failed to demonstrate that any person is authorized to pursue this application and to act on behalf of the deceased applicant. As previously indicated, at the case conference, an issue was raised regarding whether the applicant's spouse was lawfully authorized to act on behalf of the deceased applicant. Despite discussions to that effect, no explanation has been provided regarding the steps taken, if any, to appoint an estate trustee to represent the applicant in this application between December 20, 2022 (date of case conference) and September 8, 2023 (date of written hearing). Further, there is no evidence to support that during this 262-day period that the applicant's spouse, or any person, has been appointed to be an estate trustee and to represent the applicant in this application.

[23] I am also satisfied that the applicant's spouse opted not to pursue appointment as an estate trustee. While I appreciate the applicant's counsel's comment that this application is a very sensitive matter for the applicant's surviving spouse, I cannot ignore the fact that the applicant's spouse had 1192 days, specifically from June 3, 2020 to September 8, 2023, to take steps to seek appointment as an estate trustee. Despite having the opportunity to do so, there is no evidence that she took any steps to pursue the appointment.

[24] Accordingly, I find that the application was not properly constituted and that it is an irremediable nullity.

Disputed Treatment Plans, Interest, and Award

[25] I find that it is unnecessary for me to consider the disputed treatment plans, interest, and an award as the respondent has demonstrated, on a balance of probabilities, that there is no authority on which this application can proceed. I further find that to continue the application would be an abuse of process.

[26] Pursuant to s. 280 of the Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.8, an insured person may apply to the Tribunal to resolve a dispute in respect to their entitlement to statutory accident benefits.

[27] Further, in Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, 2003 SCC 63 (CanLII), the Supreme Court of Canada relied on Canam Enterprises Inc. v. Coles (2000), 2000 CanLII 8514 (ONCA) approved by 2002 SCC 63, and held as follows at paragraph 37:

> The doctrine of abuse of process engages the inherent power of the court to prevent the misuse of its procedure, in a way that would be manifestly unfair to a party to the litigation before it or would in some other way bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[28] Here, neither the deceased applicant nor an estate trustee caused the application to be commenced, and no person has standing before the Tribunal to move the application forward. While I appreciate that the applicant's counsel filed written hearing submissions and evidence on the applicant's behalf, there is no evidence to support that the applicant's counsel had standing to do so.

[29] Accordingly, it is unnecessary for me to consider the deceased applicant's entitlement to the disputed treatment plans, interest, and an award. As no estate trustee has been appointed, no person is authorized to pursue the deceased applicant's claim for accident benefits at the Tribunal. To continue the application in the circumstances would be an abuse of process.

Costs

[30] Pursuant to Rule 19.1 of the Licence Appeal Tribunal Rules, 2023, costs may be ordered where a party has acted unreasonably, frivolously, vexatiously, or in bad faith.

[31] In its written hearing submissions, the respondent sought costs against the deceased applicant in the amount of $1,000.00. The respondent submits that the application is vexatious and should never had been commenced given that no estate trustee was appointed. The respondent argues that at the very least, the application should have been withdrawn. The respondent indicates that it has incurred legal costs to defend the application against a party that does not have any legal standing or existence.

[32] The applicant's counsel did not respond to the respondent's request for costs in the reply submissions, despite having the opportunity to do so. As such, the applicant's counsel's position is unknown.

[33] It is well established that the test to award costs represents a high bar. I find that the respondent has not demonstrated that the applicant's conduct attracts costs and I note that neither the deceased applicant nor an estate trustee acting on his behalf pursued this application. While I acknowledge that the respondent has been inconvenienced as a result of the applicant's counsel's actions, I have not been directed to any authority to support that the Tribunal has the power to make an order for costs against a legal representative.

[34] Accordingly, I decline to make an order for costs against the deceased applicant.

ORDER

[35] For the reasons outlined above, I find that:

1. The application was not properly constituted and is an irremediable nullity.

2. It is unnecessary for me to consider the deceased applicant's entitlement to the disputed treatment plans, interest, and an award as neither the applicant nor an estate trustee acting on his behalf pursued this claim for accident benefits. To continue the application in the circumstances would be an abuse of process.

3. The respondent is not entitled to costs.

[36] The application is dismissed.

RE: THE REGIONAL MUNICIPALITY OF HALTON v. DAVOOD REZAIZADEH, FARGOL REZAIZADEH, FARNOOSH REZAIZADEH, FARNEZ REZAIZADEH and KOBRA FATHI

HEARD: August 4, 2004

and, provided the facts entitle the plaintiff to judgment, judgment can be obtained. But it is to the pleading that one must look for the facts to establish liability.

[18] In the claim, the plaintiff states that Farnoosh was present at "various meetings" where her mother, the defendant Kobra Fathi declared herself to be the sole support parent and where she (Farnoosh) remained silent and failed to correct the misinformation provided to the Region and to the Halton Housing Authority by the mother. The "failure to correct" is stated to be the equivalent of making a false representation to the plaintiff. I disagree. The plaintiff's counsel relied on the case of Sidhu Estate v. Bains, 1996 CanLII 3332 (BC CA), [1996] B.C.J. No. 1246 to establish that silence in the face of a false representation can lead to liability for deceit. In the Sidhu Estate case, the B.C. Court of Appeal found that all the elements of a successful claim in deceit were proven against the defendant Bains who had remained silent at the time false information had been communicated to induce an executor to invest estate monies in a company in which the defendant had an interest. Bains was a director, shareholder and president of the company. The directors and shareholders intended the company to be listed on the VSE. The defendant attended a meeting with the estate executor where false statements were made particularly with respect to the extent of Bain's investment in the company. Bains remained silent when these false representations, designed to induce investment by the executor, were made. Liability was found.

[19] While I do not dispute that silence in the face of a false representation by another (as in the Sidhu Estate case) can lead to liability for deceit, it is not clear in this case that the silence of the daughter, Farnoosh, at meetings when her mother made false representations would be tantamount to misrepresentation by Farnoosh because of a failure to correct. As a practical matter, her situation as a child (albeit an adult child) is very different from a person who as shareholder, director and president of a corporation stays silent in the face of false representations designed to induce investment by an investor. I am not prepared to find that the silence of the defendant Farnoosh Rezaizadeh is sufficient to amount to false or negligent misrepresentation. There would have to be facts asserted (other than the relationship of mother and daughter) that would establish that the plaintiff could reasonably construe silence as a misrepresentation. Secondly, the times and dates of the meetings at which Farnoosh attended and remained silent are not pleaded. If the meetings happened after the plaintiff had set the level of income and rent subsidy, how can there be detrimental reliance? An essential component of the tort of deceit is that the false representation occurs before the reliance. The pleading does not establish that the dates of Farnoosh's failure to correct preceded the decision to grant relief.

[20] I have concluded that the statement of claim does not entitle the plaintiff to judgment against the defendant Farnoosh Rezaizadeh.

[21] With respect to the defendant Farnez Rezaizadeh, although the plaintiff alleges in the statement of claim that Farnez was present at various meetings where Kobra Fathi describes herself as the sole support parent, silence by Farnez is not enough to make her liable for deceit for the reasons stated above re Farnoosh. Secondly, the times and dates of the meetings at which Farnez attended and remained silent are not pleaded. If the meetings happened after the plaintiff had set the level of income and rent subsidy, there can be no detrimental reliance. The pleading does not establish that the dates of Farnez's failure to correct preceded the decision to grant rent and income subsidy.

[22] I have concluded that the statement of claim does not entitle the plaintiff to judgment against the defendant Farnez Rezaizadeh.

[23] With respect to the defendant Fargol, in the statement of claim, the plaintiff alleges her presence at meetings where she was silent during her mother's the insured person, or any other person, or as a result of wilful misrepresentation or fraud.

[4] The insurer must give notice within 12 months after the payment is made otherwise the person ceases to be liable. The 12-month requirement does not apply if the benefit was paid as a result of wilful misrepresentation or fraud.

[5] The Tribunal has adopted the Black's Law Dictionary definition of "misrepresentation" as "any manifestation of words or other conduct by one person to another that, under the circumstances, amounts to an assertion not in accordance with the facts." The Tribunal has held that remaining silent or failing to report can constitute wilful misrepresentation. I agree with this interpretation and apply it here.

[6] The onus is on the applicant to establish that the respondent obtained an IRB by wilful misrepresentation or fraud. I find it has failed to meet its onus.

[7] It submits that the respondent received IRB payments from July 6, 2018 to May 19, 2019, but returned to work in September 2018 and did not notify the applicant of his return to work. The applicant submits it only discovered that the respondent had returned to work when he attended for an IE Assessment in August 2019 and reported same to the assessor.

[8] On August 20, 2019, the applicant advised the respondent that he was not entitled to IRB's based on the conclusions from the multidisciplinary reports that stated the respondent did not suffer a substantial inability to perform the essential task of this pre-accident employment. The applicant submits it sent five notices for repayment from August 20, 2019 to December 7, 2020, but it is unclear whether they were sent to the respondent's previous address, the respondent's prior counsel or where they were directed to.

[9] The applicant testified it acknowledges that the respondent sent his former counsel his first paystub, dated September 22, 2018, on September 27, 2018. However, it asserts that the paystub and work information were not forwarded to the applicant by the respondent's counsel. Therefore, by continuing to accept IRB payments and by not directly sending the applicant the respondent's paystub, this inaction constitutes misrepresentation by way of silence or a failure to report.

[10] The respondent argues that at the time of the accident he hired a lawyer to represent him with his case. Once he started working on DATE, he immediately notified his lawyer and submitted his first paystub to his counsel to be sent over to the applicant in order to stop IRB payments.

[11] As payments continued to be direct deposited into his bank account after he returned to work, the respondent testified that he contacted his lawyer regarding the payments and was told, "…it was fine and not to worry about it." He further testified that he also called Kristy Lynne, the adjuster on file from TD General Insurance Company ("TD") to see why he was continuing to receive payments and was told that, "I could not speak directly to them, as we signed a contract with Diamond and Diamond". The respondent testified that he was told Kristy Lynne the is only authorized to speak to the respondent's counsel from Diamond and Diamond directly.

despite his or her prior misconduct, he or she now meets the good character requirement. The applicable law concerning the process was discussed before the Tribunal below.

[34] Mr. Mundulai simply does not accept this approach. He insisted upon acting on his own view of the applicable law and procedure despite very clear efforts by the Society and the Tribunal to bring home to Mr. Mundulai the impact of the steps that he proposed. The Society fulfilled its duty to consider Mr. Mundulai's application. The hearing of Mr. Mundulai's motion to quash the Notice of Referral ended in a consent to dismissal of his licence application, the consequences of which were brought home to Mr. Mundulai in clear and plain language. Until Mr. Mundulai applies again, there is no duty on the Society to conduct a further hearing into Mr. Mundulai's application. It had been dismissed.

BIANCA TERESA D'ERRICO

Applicant

and

ATTORNEY GENERAL OF CANADA

the Board's reasons do not allow this Court to understand why the Board made the decision it did on the basis of the medical evidence before it.

[12] In support of her submission that the reasons of the Board showed adequate justification, counsel for the Attorney General cited Newfoundland and Labrador Nurses' Union v. Newfoundland and Labrador (Treasury Board), 2011 SCC 62, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 708. In that case, a labour arbitrator simply offered a conclusion with little, if any, analysis on the basis of a limited record.

[13] In my view, in these circumstances Newfoundland Nurses is distinguishable. It is one thing for an administrative decision-maker to issue sparse reasons to sophisticated parties who regularly engage in labour arbitration and, thus, are familiar with the legal and factual landscape. It is quite another to issue adverse reasons of this sort to a person like Ms. D'Errico, on a record that calls for explanation.

F. Remedy

[14] Ms. D'Errico asks this Court to quash the Board's decision and grant her disability benefits. In effect, this is the remedy of certiorari and mandamus.

[15] Normally, in situations such as these, the Court grants certiorari and remits the matter to the Board for reconsideration. It is for the Board to decide the merits of cases, not this Court.

[16] Normally, this Court awards mandamus only where the outcome of the case on the merits is a foregone conclusion – in other words the evidence can lead only to one result. However, there are exceptions in the authorities: LeBon v. Canada (Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness), 2013 FCA 55 and the so-called "directed verdict" cases referred to; see also Wihksne v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 FCA 356, Canada (Attorney General) v. Richard, 2008 FCA 69 and Canada (Minister of Human Resources Development) v. Tait, 2006 FCA 380 where this Court has issued directions on particular issues in conjunction with a remittal for re-decision. One recognized exception is where there has been substantial delay and the additional delay caused by remitting the matter to the administrative decision-maker for re-decision threatens to bring the administration of justice into disrepute: Pointon v. British Columbia (Superintendent of Motor Vehicles), 2002 BCCA 516; Norgard v. Anmore (Village), 2009 BCSC 823 at paragraph 46; LeBon, supra at paragraph 14. In such circumstances, the Court exceptionally may direct that a certain result be reached.

[17] The word "exceptionally" recognizes that administrative tribunals should be allowed another chance to decide the merits of the matter and not have the reviewing court do it for them. But in certain cases, the circumstances support resort to the latter option.

[18] Here, the threshold of exceptionality is met. The delay is substantial – despite the fact that this is an administrative regime intended to provide rapid determinations, Ms. D'Errico applied for benefits some six years ago. If we remit this matter for re-decision and if a party then applies for judicial review, a further two years could pass, bringing the total to eight years. As we shall see, the record shows the prejudice that would be caused by further delay and there is sparse evidence in support of the outcome reached by the Board. Finally, Ms. D'Errico is not guilty of any unreasonable delay.

[19] In my view, the nature of the benefits within this regulatory scheme also factors into our discretion. These are benefits meant to address a very serious condition, one that prevents the earning of meaningful income to sustain oneself. Parliament could not have intended the final disposition of disability benefits in these circumstances to take eight years.

[20] Overall, as a majority of the Supreme Court recognized in a different context, "remitting the issue to the tribunal may undermine the goal of expedient and cost-efficient decision making, which often motivates the creation of specialized administrative tribunals in the first place": Alberta Teachers' Association, supra at paragraph 55.

Attorney General of Canada and The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Respondents) (Respondents)

Indexed as: Apotex Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General) (C.A.)

Court of Appeal, Mahoney, Robertson and McDonald JJ.A.—Ottawa, August 31, September 1 and October 22, 1993.

Food and drugs — Appeal and cross-appeal from Trial Division decision granting mandamus and denying prohibition with respect to generic drug notice of compliance (NOC) — Under Food and Drugs Act, "new drugs" must meet health and safety requirements — NOC granted if drug found effective, safe — Scientific safety and efficacy conditions met — Apotex having vested right to NOC despite Minister's failure to render decision pending enactment of Patent Act Amendment Act, 1992 (Bill C-91) — Narrow scope of ministerial discretion — Pending legislative policy irrelevant consideration.

Patents — Bill C-91 enacted to protect innovator pharmaceutical companies' distribution and sales rights to patented drugs — Patented Medicines Regulations prohibiting issuance of NOCs in respect of patent-linked drugs — NOCs, patent rights linked, not mutually dependent — Mandamus not intended to facilitate patent infringement — Regulations not procedural per se — Generic drug manufacturer's vested right to NOC not divested by Bill C-91, Regulations, ss. 5(1),(2).

Judicial review — Prerogative writs — Mandamus — Generic drug manufacturer seeking mandamus to compel Minister to issue notice of compliance — Case law on requirements for mandamus — Available where duty to act not owing at time application filed — Delay for seeking legal advice not bar to mandamus — Court having discretion to invoke balance of convenience test as ground for refusing mandamus — Criteria for exercise of discretion — No legal basis to deny mandamus herein on ground of balance of convenience.

Federal Court jurisdiction — Appeal Division — Jurisdiction under Federal Court Act, s. 18 not ousted by paramountcy provision in Bill C-91 (Patent Act Amendment Act, 1992) — Patent Act, s. 55.2(5) not privative clause insulating Minister, legislation from judicial review.

These were an appeal and a cross-appeal from a decision by Dubé J. allowing an application for mandamus to issue a notice of compliance (NOC) with respect to Apotex's generic version of the drug enalapril and denying the appellants' application for prohibition. The Patent Act Amendment Act, 1992 (Bill C-91), which was given Royal Assent on February 4, 1993, was enacted in order to protect innovator pharmaceutical companies' distribution and sales rights to patented drugs. Bill C-91 came into force on February 15, 1993 with the exception of the new section 55.2 of the Patent Act which, together with the Patented Medicines Regulations, were not brought into effect until March 12, 1993. Under the Food and Drugs Act (FDA), the Minister of National Health and Welfare must ensure that new drugs meet health and safety requirements. The manufacturer of a new drug must file a New Drug Submission (NDS) setting out the drug's qualities, ingredients and methods of manufacture and purification. The respondent, Apotex, after filing a NDS in respect of its generic drug Apo-Enalapril, sought an order of mandamus to compel the Minister to issue a notice of compliance with respect to that drug. Apotex's NDS was incomplete when it filed its mandamus application; nevertheless, by February 3, 1993, the new drug met all of the scientific safety and efficacy conditions required for a NOC to issue.

Although the NDS had cleared the scientific and regulatory review process, the Department's ADM and DM decided to seek legal advice regarding the authority of the Minister or his ADM to issue the NOC in view of the impending passage of Bill C-91. The appellant, Merck, also forwarded a number of legal opinions to the Minister and then sought prohibition to prevent the Minister from issuing the notice of compliance. The Trial Judge ruled that the Minister did not possess the broad discretion to justify his refusal to issue the NOC and that the delay in issuing it was not warranted. He also rejected the argument that to issue mandamus when a new regulatory regime was pending would "frustrate the will of Parliament". This appeal raised a number of issues, namely: 1) the principles governing mandamus and the question of prematurity; 2) whether Apotex had a vested right to a NOC by March 12, 1993; 3) the balance of convenience; 4) whether Apotex's vested right to a NOC was divested by Bill C-91 and the Patented Medicines Regulations and 5) the jurisdiction of the Court. By cross-appeal, the Minister argued that the Trial Judge erred in finding the delay in issuing the NOC to be unwarranted.

Held, the appeal and cross-appeal should be dismissed.

1) Several principal requirements must be satisfied before mandamus will issue. First, there must be a public legal duty to act owed to the applicant. Generally, mandamus cannot issue with respect to a duty owed to the Crown. The Minister had a duty to act which was owed to Apotex. Merck's submission, that the Minister owed no duty to Apotex at the time it commenced its judicial review application on December 22, 1992 or on the hearing date, was partly correct. An order of mandamus will not lie to compel an officer to act in a specified manner if he is under no obligation to act as of the hearing date, but that rule was not valid if applied as of the date that the application for mandamus was filed. While it is open to a respondent to pursue dismissal of an application where the duty to perform has yet to arise, in the absence of compelling reasons, an application for mandamus should not be defeated on the ground that it was initiated prematurely. Provided that the conditions precedent to the exercise of the duty have been satisfied at the time of the hearing, the application should be assessed on its merits.

2) If a decision-maker has an unfettered discretion which he has not exercised as of the date a new law takes effect, the applicant cannot successfully assert either a vested right or even the right to have the decision-maker render a decision. A "vested right" must be distinguished from a "mere hope or expectation". The scope of a decision-maker's discretion is directly contingent upon the characterization of various considerations as "relevant or irrelevant" to its exercise. The Food and Drug Regulations restrict the factors to be considered by the Minister in the proper exercise of his discretion to those concerning a drug's safety and efficacy. They neither expressly nor implicitly contemplate the broad scope of ministerial discretion advocated by Merck. It cannot be said that the time needed to enable a decision-maker to seek and obtain legal advice in any decision-making process is of itself a basis for denying mandamus. That self-imposed obligation cannot of itself deprive Apotex of its right to mandamus. In the absence of intervening legislation, the "legal advice" issue would not have arisen. The legal advice sought herein had no bearing on the exercise of the Minister's narrowly circumscribed discretion. Moreover, to deny mandamus because of legal concerns generated by a party adverse in interest (Merck) would be to judicially condone what might be regarded as a tactical manoeuvre intended to obfuscate and delay the decision-making process. Pending legislative policy was not a consideration relevant to the exercise of the Minister's discretion. It could not be said that, in the exercise of his statutory power under the Food and Drug Regulations, the Minister was entitled to have regard to the provisions of Bill C-91 after enactment but prior to proclamation. Apotex had a vested right to the NOC notwithstanding the Minister's failure to render a decision by March 12, 1993.

3) The case law on mandamus reveals a number of techniques resorted to by courts in balancing competing interests. Any inclination to engage in a balancing of interests must be measured strictly against the rule of law. Having regard to the relevant jurisprudence, it had to be concluded that this Court possesses discretion to refuse mandamus on the ground of balance of convenience. The cases demonstrate three factual patterns in which the balance of convenience test has been implicitly acknowledged. First, there are those cases where the administrative cost or chaos that would result from granting such relief is obvious and unacceptable. The second ground for denying mandamus appears to arise in instances where potential public health and safety risks are perceived to outweigh an individual's right to pursue personal or economic interests. In this case, there was no issue with respect to administrative chaos or public health and safety. The third line of authority attempts to establish a principle by which it can be determined whether a property owner has acquired a vested right to a building permit pending approval of a by-law amendment. That principle is of no relevance to this case nor to the issue of the Court's discretion to refuse mandamus on the ground of balance of convenience. There was no legal basis upon which the "balance of convenience" test could be applied to deny Apotex the relief sought.

4) The Patented Medicines Regulations prohibit the issuance of NOCs in respect of "patent-linked" drugs. Subsections 5(1) and (2) thereof refer to NDSs filed before March 12, 1993. While NOCs and patent rights are linked, they have never been mutually dependent. Practically speaking, Merck is seeking an interlocutory injunction against Apotex with respect to possible patent infringement without having to satisfy the conditions precedent imposed at law to the granting of such relief. An order in the nature of mandamus cannot be viewed as an instrument which "facilitates" patent infringement. The Patented Medicines Regulations are not procedural regulations per se. The imposition of a criterion that a NOC cannot issue with respect to a patent-linked NDS is clearly a substantive change in the law and hence subject to the rules of statutory construction applicable to legislation purporting to affect vested rights. Subsections 5(1) and (2) do not manifestly seek to divest persons of acquired rights; they are at best ambiguous. While Parliament has the authority to pass retroactive legislation, thereby divesting persons of an acquired right, vested rights could not be divested by the Patented Medicines Regulations unless the enabling legislation, that is the Patent Act or Bill C-91, implicitly or explicitly authorize such encroachments. Bill C-91 contains no provision specifically authorizing regulations to interfere with existing or vested rights except as to compulsory licences granted after December 20, 1991.

5) The jurisdiction of this Court was not "ousted" by the paramountcy provision in Bill C-91. Subsection 55.2(5) of the Patent Act could not be said to be paramount to section 18 of the Federal Court Act and could not be construed as a privative clause insulating the Minister and the relevant legislation from judicial review.

Application Under S. 140 of the Provincial Offences Act

WHITAKER J.

Nature of the Proceeding

[1] The applicants are the subject of prosecutions for provincial regulatory offences. In response they assert aboriginal title over lands in which the offences were committed.

[2] The applicants seek a writ of prohibition to stay the proceedings in the inferior courts, and directing that the constitutional question be litigated with the representative action styled as Amikwabi et al. v. Attorney General of Canada, Ontario et al.

[3] The applicants seek an order in the nature of mandamus directing the consultation and accommodation be carried out between the Crown and the applicants.

Background

[4] The applicants are all charged with various hunting and fishing offences arising from activity in various parts of the province.

[5] The applicants known as the Sarazin applicants, those being Daniel Sarazin, Thomas Kohoko, Bruce Meness, Joseph Chartrand, Robert Lavalley, Vincent Lavallee and Shawn Johnson, were all charged in Pembroke, Ontario on various dates from 2001 to 2011. The Bidal applicants, of which there were 31, were charged in North Bay, Sudbury and Sturgeon Falls between 2005 and 2011.

[6] The Gauthier applicants were charged in Sudbury in May 2013.

[7] The Gauthier trial was scheduled to begin on September 18, 2014; however, the hearing date was adjourned at the request of the applicants on September 3, 2014, with the service of constitutional question. The Gauthier applicants asserted that they would be bringing an application for a writ of prohibition in the Superior Court.

[8] The Supreme Court of Canada issued a decision in Tsilhqot'in Nation v. British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 257 ("Tsilhqot'in"), on June 26, 2014. On September 19, 2014, counsel for the applicants served a notice of application dated September 13, 2014, returnable on December 5, 2014. The notice of application indicated that the applicants were bringing a representative action asserting Algonquin aboriginal title based on Tsilhqot'in. On the basis of this title claim, the applicants seek an interim order staying the Sarazin, Bidal and Gauthier prosecutions in order that an application dealing with all of these matters is brought to the Superior Court. The applicants also seek an order mandating that the province consult with them and accommodate their concerns about their claim for title.

Courts Jurisdiction

[9] The writ of prohibition and the mandamus order are prerogative remedies within the jurisdiction of the Superior Court. The applicants seek these remedies for the purpose of compelling the Ontario Court of Justice to refrain from attempting to exercise jurisdiction. The writ of prohibition is to compel courts generally entrusted with judicial duties, to keep within the limits of their jurisdiction. See Clifford and O'Sullivan (1921), 2 A.C. 570 (U.K. H.O.L.), and McDonald (Re) (1957), 1957 CanLII 374 (ON SC), 11 D.L.R. (2d) 655.

[10] A writ of prohibition is an extreme measure, a remedy that is sparingly applied: R. v. Hamlink (Re) (1910), 1912 CanLII 705 (ON SC), 26 O.L.R. 381, and Canada Metal Co. Ltd. v. The Queen (1976), 1975 CanLII 531 (ON CA), 8 O.R. 2d 773.

[11] A writ of mandamus is a command issued by the Superior Court directing the fulfillment of some statutory or other public duty to which the applicant has a strict legal right. See: Apotex Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1993 CanLII 3004 (FCA), [1994] 1 F.C. 742 ("Apotex").

[12] The applicants bring their application pursuant to s. 140(1) of the Provincial Offences Act, R.S.O. 1990, Ch. P.33, which states:

> 140(1) On application, the Superior Court of Justice may by order grant any relief in respect of matters arising under this Act, that the applicant would be entitled to in an application for an order in the nature of mandamus, prohibition or certiorari.

Positions of the Parties

[13] The applicants argue that the Superior Court exercises exclusive jurisdiction over the provision of declaratory relief and, for this reason, has the authority to declare indigenous title.

Inferior courts have no inherent or statutory jurisdiction to declare indigenous title. The applicants rely on R. v. Caron, 2011 SCC 5, [2011] 1 S.C.R. 78, for this proposition. They submit that judicial economy would not be served if they must mount the same constitutional challenge in each separate case. For this submission, the applicants rely on the comment of Perell J. at para. 105 in Kelly v. Canada (Attorney General), 2013 ONSC 1220, [2013] 3 C.N.L.R. 333:

> Claims to constitutional aboriginal rights may be adjudicated in the context of a defence to prosecutions for regulatory offences: [citations omitted], but the preferable way to adjudicate claims to aboriginal rights is in civil proceedings where all the proper and necessary parties are before the court.

[14] The respondent Crown argues that the Ontario Court of Justice does have the jurisdiction to consider and determine aboriginal rights issues and, for this reason, a writ of prohibition is unwarranted. As noted earlier, prohibition and mandamus are discretionary remedies which should be awarded in extraordinary circumstances where an inferior court has exceeded its jurisdiction or breached procedural fairness: London (City) v. Young, 64 Admin. L.R. (4th) 149, paras. 14 and 41. This is not the case here.

[15] The Ontario Court of Justice has not, at this point, declined jurisdiction at the request of the applicants. For this reason, there is no basis upon which this Court should exercise its discretion to issue prohibition and mandamus.

[16] In R. v. Sparrow, 1990 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1075 ("Sparrow"), the Supreme Court set out an analysis for the consideration of aboriginal rights in the context of regulatory prosecutions.

[17] Under Sparrow, unless the Crown is able to prove the elements of an offence, the onus then falls on the defendants to prove that they were exercising their community's aboriginal or treaty rights, and that the legislation under which they were charged infringes that right.

[18] In this case, the onus switches back to the Crown to justify the infringement - which is a relevant factor at this stage.

[19] In Paul v. British Columbia, 2003 SCC 55, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 585, Bastarache J. held at para. 36 that s. 35 "is not, any more than the Charter, 'some holy grail which only judicial initiates of the superior courts may touch.'"

[20] Generally speaking, constitutional arguments are better served when seen to be properly considered during a trial, rather than an application. The Superior Court has on a number of occasions refused to determine applications for extraordinary remedies and has instead returned the matters to the Provincial Court for adjudication, for purposes of building a record. In R v. Sarazin, 2010 ONCA 439 ("Sarazin"), the Sarazin defendants in this case appealed a decision refusing their application for a prohibition order staying the prosecutions against them at the Ontario Court of Justice on similar grounds. The Court of Appeal held at para. 4:

> It is well established in Canadian law that where an accused person raises constitutional issues, claims of aboriginal right; inter-jurisdictional immunity or rule of law issues by way of defence to a charge, the proper place to advance those defences is in the court having jurisdiction to entertain the charges. If there is any merit to grounds 1 to 4, they are matters properly raised by way of defence to the charges against the appellants in the court having jurisdiction to entertain those charges, namely, the Ontario Court of Justice. If the appellants are dissatisfied with the result in the Ontario Court of Justice, they have recourse to any statutory rights of appeal afforded from conviction.

[21] The Crown opposes the applicants' claim for title and points out that the applicants are not members of a single aboriginal community, but are instead individuals of diverse origins. For this reason, even if the applicants succeeded in their title claim, the provincial laws still apply to them subject to the Sparrow justification analysis. In the applicants' submission, the Apotex requirements for an order in the nature of mandamus are fulfilled here. The Crown is under a public legal duty to consult in good faith with any aboriginal groups asserting title to the land about the proposed uses of the land. In the present case, the applicants have asserted indigenous title where the hunt took place, and have styled themselves as a hunting party.

[22] Prior to the establishment of title by court declaration or agreement, the Crown is required to consult in good faith with any aboriginal groups asserting title to the land. If the Crown fails to discharge its duty to consult, various remedies are available including injunctive relief, damages, or an order that consultation or accommodation be carried out. See Tsilhqot'in and Rio Tinto Alcan Inc. v. Carrier Sekani Tribal Council, 2010 SCC 43, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 650.

[23] As noted earlier, the applicants for a mandamus order must establish that they have demanded very specifically the things sought - and that their demands have been refused.

[24] With respect to the issue of the mandamus order, the applicants come from diverse backgrounds which is inconsistent with the assertion of aboriginal title. There has been no demand made to the Ontario Court of Justice. There has been no refusal of any command that might have been made.

[25] The Crown takes the position that this application is malicious and vexatious, is the latest in a series of applications which have led to delays, and the applicants have planned to bring an Algonquin title claim since 2004. The abandoned 2012 class action asserted both a title claim and a breach of the Crown's duty to consult. In Sarazin, the Ontario Court of Appeal told counsel for the applicants that the Ontario Court of Justice is the proper forum in which to determine the applicants' aboriginal rights and that prohibition is not available in this case. Notwithstanding this direction, the applicants have brought this application.

[26] In conclusion, the prerogative writs that are being sought by the applicants in this matter are extraordinary remedies and should only be granted in exceptional circumstances. With respect to the first issue, whether the regulatory offences should be stayed pending resolution on the aboriginal claim for title, the Ontario Court of Appeal in R. v. Cook, 2010 ONSC 675, [2010] 2 C.N.L.R. 251, and other authorities, have made it very clear that the appropriate place to bring these applications is the Ontario Court of Justice. Secondly, with respect to the request for a writ of mandamus, there has been no request made of the Ontario Court of Justice to deal with these matters that has been refused by that court. This means that any duty to consult has not yet been engaged and, for that reason, the request fails.

[27] The applications are dismissed.

[28] The parties may make submissions as to costs on no more than two sheets of paper within 14 days of the date of this decision.

1957 CanLII 374 (ON SC)

RE McDONALD AND THE COURT OF GENERAL SESSIONS OF THE PEACE FOR THE COUNTY OF YORK

Ontario High Court, Ferguson J. May 31, 1957.

Malcolm Robb, Q.C., for applicant.

Walter M. Martin, Q.C., for His Honour the County Court Judge.

FERGUSON J.:—This is a motion to prohibit His Honour Judge Ian Macdonell or any other Judge of the County Court of the County of York from proceeding further with the trial of the accused upon an indictment, charging the accused with the possession of drugs, until at least 10 days following the delivery to him or his counsel of the notes of evidence of the trial of the accused on a charge of conspiracy which, in part at least, involved the same circumstances out of which the charge of possession arises.

The prisoner, Edwin McDonald, was acquitted on the indictment for conspiracy on April 17th. The trial on the indictment for possession came on before Macdonell Co.Ct.J. in the Court of General Sessions of the Peace on May 8th. Counsel for the prisoner requested an adjournment until after he obtained a transcript of evidence taken on the conspiracy trial. This was refused, His Honour directing the trial to proceed on the afternoon of the same day. Before the afternoon sittings His Honour was served with the notice of motion for prohibition. When Court opened counsel for the prisoner did not appear. The Judge then proceeded to characterize the prohibition proceeding in language which, presumably, he thought it deserved.

In Re Holmes & Rex (1912), 21 Can. C.C. 11, 9 D.L.R. 284, 27 O.L.R. 492, it was held that it was improper for an inferior Court to proceed further knowing that a motion to prohibit it had been launched. The judgment in that case was brought to His Honour's attention whereupon the trial was adjourned and the accused remanded in custody.

That a County Court Judge may be prohibited by order of the superior Court whenever he exceeds jurisdiction when sitting in the County Court or Division Court or Court of General Sessions of the Peace is too plain to need authority. There are innumerable cases of prohibition of County Court Judges. An example of the prohibition of a County Court Judge is to be found in Petrie Mfg. Co. v. Wright (1920), 57 D.L.R. 562, 49 O.L.R. 481, and an example of the prohibition of a Judge of the Court of General Sessions in Belgo-Canadian Pulp & Paper

Co. v. Court of Sessions of the Peace of Three Rivers (1919), 33 Can. C.C. 310, 54 D.L.R. 597, per Lemieux C.J. at p. 318 Can. C.C., p. 604 D.L.R.

Prohibition is not only the means whereby a superior Court prevents inferior Courts that is Courts of limited jurisdiction, from exercising or attempting to assert a jurisdiction which they do not possess, but it is also the means whereby a superior Court prevents such Courts from proceeding in a manner so vicious as to violate some fundamental principle of justice: Gross v. Allan (1806), 26 U.C.Q.B. 123 at p. 126; Mayor of London v. Cox (1867), L.R. 2 H.L. 239 at p. 276. In 1 Hale, 3rd ed., p. 69, the principle is stated. "An order of prohibition may be granted to restrain, and an order of certiorari may be granted to bring up and quash the decision of, a person or body exercising judicial or quasi-judicial functions if he or it fails in its duty to act in good faith, and to listen fairly to both sides, and to give fair opportunity to the parties in the controversy adequately to present their case and to correct or contradict any relevant statement prejudicial to their view."

Having regard to the fact that the Crown, having failed on its first attempt to convict the accused, has decided to proceed with a substantive charge which was pending against the accused when the charge of conspiracy was tried and that the substantive charge arises out of the same circumstances and it involves very serious consequences for the accused if he is convicted; and having regard to the fact that Crown counsel seems to have thought that there was some merit in the request for an adjournment and did not press for the case to proceed, and had himself thought it necessary to procure substantial extracts from the evidence from the conspiracy trial, the proposition urged by defence counsel that his client was being deprived of the right to make full answer and defence was not beyond the range of controversy. The applicant does not contend that the County Court Judge did not have jurisdiction to enter upon the trial. He urges, however, that the Judge proceeded in a manner which violated the prisoner's fundamental right to make full answer and defence and therefore seeks to invoke the second branch of the principle I have mentioned. He argues with great force that the refusal of the adjournment amounted to a denial of natural justice — a refusal to make full answer and defence and cites the judgment of Gale J. in Re Ontario Labour Relations Bd., Re Toronto Newspaper Guild, Local 87 & American Newspaper Guild (C.I.O.) & Globe Printing Co., 100 Can. C.C. 301, [1951], 3 D.L.R. 162, O.R. 135; [affd] [1952], 2 D.L.R. 302

O.R. 345, 102 Can. C.C. 318; affd [1953], 3 D.L.R. 561, 2 S.C.R. 18, 106 Can. C.C. 225]. That was an application for an order of certiorari involving the Labour Relations Board and the question was whether the Board had disregarded the essentials of justice. Cole J. said (p. 310 Can. C.C., p. 170 D.L.R.): "That a person who has been deprived of what is vaguely described as 'natural justice' is entitled to relief by way of certiorari is established in authorities too numerous to mention."

In that case Cole J. quashed the certificate of the Labour Relations Board on certiorari because of its refusal to permit cross-examination of a Union official on a statement made by him.

In R. v. Forgell (1907), 12 Can. C.C. 324, 15 O.L.R. 300, a motion for habeas corpus with certiorari in aid, Anglin J., when he was a Judge of this Court, expressed in emphatic language his disapproval of a Magistrate's conduct in forcing an accused on without giving him an opportunity to prepare his defence. The Magistrate in that case exercised his authority arbitrarily and unfairly by going on with the case the day after the charge was laid. Anglin J. held the accused was entitled to an adjournment, in those circumstances as of right — not upon terms, unconditionally. He said (at p. 332 Can. C.C., p. 307 O.L.R.): "To refuse to grant such adjournment was in fact and deed to deny him that opportunity to make full answer and defence' which the Code says he shall have. The distinction between pressing on proceedings so that the defendant has no reasonable opportunity to make his defence and refusing to hear a defence which he offers to make is more apparent than real."

In R. v. Hains, 114 Can. C.C. 244, [1956] O.W.N. 170, Spence J. on certiorari quashed a conviction on the ground that a County Court Judge had deprived himself of jurisdiction by reason of bias and what obviously was a refusal to grant a fair opportunity to defend.

In considering the position of the County Court Judge when the case, which was admittedly within his jurisdiction at the outset, came before him, one must start with fundamentals. The first of these laid down in varying language in many cases, is cogently stated in the dissenting judgment of Osler J.A. in St. Louis Point Co. v. Anderson (1891), 18 O.A.R. 401 at p. 409: The Judge of an inferior Court (who has jurisdiction) may misconstrue a statute or document, or otherwise misdecide the law as freely and with as high an immunity from correction, except upon appeal, as any other Judge". In the same case he pointed out that a question of fact is not reviewable on a motion for prohibition, except perhaps on very strong grounds. Although this was said in a dissenting judgment, the soundness of this excerpt has never been doubted.

If an inferior Court has jurisdiction, prohibition will not be granted for irregularities in practice: R. v. Hendink (1912), 19 Can. C.C. 403 at p. 512, 5 D.L.R. 733 at p. 747, 26 O.L.R. 351 at p. 399; and where the Judge of an inferior Court is given a discretion, he will not be restrained by prohibition from exercising his discretion: Green v. Elliot (1860), 26 E.C.Q.B. 123.

The argument of counsel for the accused is that the refusal of the adjournment amounted to a denial of natural justice, a denial of the statutory right to make full answer and defence, that what was done goes beyond a mere matter of irregularity of practice, but, in any case, His Honour has not exercised his discretion judicially.

On a motion for prohibition the applicant must make it clearly to appear that the inferior Court has lost jurisdiction. It has been said that prohibition will not be granted unless it is made clearly to appear that the inferior Court, in no view of the facts, has jurisdiction: Re English v. Mulholland (1882), 9 P.R. (Ont.) 146 at p. 148, and where the superior Court is in doubt prohibition may be refused: R. v. Hendink, 19 Can. C.C. at p. 514, 5 D.L.R. at pp. 748-9, 26 O.L.R. at p. 401.

I am by no means sure that Judge Macdonell was denying the accused opportunity to make full answer and defence. I should have thought that all His Honour was doing was saying: "You can make your full answer and defence now without prejudice to your case." His Honour made it clear that he was not convinced that counsel could derive any benefit from the transcript of the evidence in the conspiracy case which was not then available to the accused beyond that obtainable from sources then available to him. That was a matter for His Honour to decide in his discretion. In deciding on an application for adjournment a Judge is not deciding a point of law on which his jurisdiction depends, but deciding a point of fact and exercising his discretion accordingly. To show error in his conclusion is to retry the case. Where jurisdiction depends on a question of fact it has been held not to be competent for a superior Court Judge to interfere on a motion for prohibition: Re Jenkins v. Miller (1883), 10 P.R. (Ont.) 95.

As I have pointed out, in Long Point v. Anderson, Osler J.A. suggested that the superior Court might interfere with the finding of fact "on very strong grounds", and it seems to me that Anglin J. proceeded on that basis to quash the Magistrate's decision in R. v. Parrell, and Spence J. did the same thing in R. v. Heins. I cannot agree that strong grounds exist in this case.

I must, therefore, dismiss this motion.

Firstly, the question of whether there should be an adjournment was within the jurisdiction of the County Court Judge to decide. It was a question of fact whether the accused's case would be prejudiced if the case then proceeded.

Secondly, the ruling made was discretionary.

Thirdly, I am not satisfied that the trial Judge deprived himself of jurisdiction or that the accused was deprived of the opportunity to make full answer and defence.

The motion will be dismissed with costs, if demanded.

Motion dismissed.

THE SHERIFF OF THE REGIONAL MUNICIPALITY OF YORK, ENFORCEMENT OFFICE OF THE SUPERIOR COURT OF JUSTICE (NEWMARKET) AND ROHAN SALMON	Robert B. Lawson and Chantelle Blom for the Respondent The Sheriff of the Regional Municipality of York Melissa Miller for the Respondent Rohan Salmon

Respondents))))) HEARD: July 2, 2019 and January 14, 2020

BY THE COURT:

Introduction

[1] The applicant, Sunrise North Senior Living Ltd ("Sunrise"), seeks an order in the nature of mandamus compelling the Sheriff of the Regional Municipality of York (the "Sheriff") to comply with an order requiring the eviction of the respondent Rohan Salmon from a unit in a retirement home operated by Sunrise.

[2] In November 2017, the Landlord and Tenant Board (the "Board") made an eviction order that was to take effect on May 31, 2018. To date, Mr. Salmon has not moved out and the Sheriff has refused to enforce the eviction order because of health and safety concerns.

[3] For the reasons below, we grant an order in the nature of mandamus requiring the Sheriff to deliver vacant possession to Sunrise of the unit occupied by Mr. Salmon. However, given the unique circumstances of this case, the Sheriff is given until March 31, 2020 to comply with the order.

Background facts and procedural history

The parties

[4] Sunrise operates a retirement home located in Richmond Hill. Retirement homes in Ontario are governed by the Retirement Homes Act, 2010, S.O. 2010, c. 11.

[5] Mr. Salmon is 50 years old. Mr. Salmon has been living at the Sunrise retirement home for over 15 years. He was seriously injured in a car accident over 16 years ago. There is some dispute in the evidence over whether he is paraplegic or quadriplegic, but there is no dispute that the accident has left him with significant physical impairments. Mr. Salmon is also morbidly obese. He requires extensive care and assistance in his daily life, including a lift for his transfers, personal support workers for his personal care and hygiene needs, and assistance with all household tasks. There is no issue about Mr. Salmon's capacity to make decisions about his own care; he is capable and has no difficulties communicating verbally and in writing.

[6] As detailed below, the Sheriff is responsible for enforcing eviction orders made under the Residential Tenancies Act, 2006, S.O. 2006, c. 17. As explained in the Sheriff's evidence on this application, in Ontario the Sheriff is no longer a specific person. Instead, duties assigned to the "Sheriff" in various statutes are performed by authorized Enforcement Officers within Court Enforcement Offices of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Proceedings before the Landlord and Tenant Board

[7] In July 2017, Sunrise applied to the Board to terminate Mr. Salmon's tenancy due to the non-payment of rent. According to Sunrise, up to that point Mr. Salmon had a long history of not paying his rent and Sunrise made the application to the Board as a "last resort" after years of attempting to negotiate a resolution.

[8] Mr. Salmon was represented by counsel throughout the Board proceedings and these proceedings.

[9] Before the matter went to a hearing before the Board, Mr. Salmon and Sunrise reached a settlement. On November 3, 2017, the Board issued a consent order reflecting the terms of the settlement, which were as follows:

a. The tenancy between Sunrise and Mr. Salmon was terminated;

b. Mr. Salmon was to move out of his unit by May 31, 2018;

c. Sunrise would not seek payment of Mr. Salmon's unpaid arrears, which at that point exceeded $18,000;

d. Mr. Salmon was to pay a daily rate of $202.96 for the remainder of the tenancy on the 15th of every month. If Mr. Salmon failed to make these payments, Sunrise could move without notice to the Board for an earlier eviction;

e. The Sheriff was to give vacant possession of the unit to Sunrise on or after June 1, 2018;

f. If the unit was not vacated on or before May 31, 2018, starting on June 1, 2018, Sunrise could file the Board's order with the Sheriff for enforcement; and

g. Sunrise was to undertake good faith efforts to assist Mr. Salmon in identifying adequate alternative housing.

[10] It appears that Mr. Salmon did not initially pay the daily rate agreed to under the Board's consent order. In December 2017, Sunrise applied to the Board for relief. On March 7, 2018, the Board issued an order in which it found that Mr. Salmon did not meet his payment obligations and required him to move out on April 23, 2018.

[11] Mr. Salmon and Sunrise then reached an agreement to reinstate the consent order that required Mr. Salmon to move out of his unit by May 31, 2018. The Board issued an order on April 23, 2018, that reflects this agreement.

[12] Mr. Salmon never appealed the Board's eviction order.

[13] Mr. Salmon did not move out of his unit at Sunrise on May 31, 2018, as required under the eviction order.

Sunrise's efforts to enforce the eviction order and the Sheriff's response [14] Given that Mr. Salmon did not move out of the unit, on June 11, 2018, Sunrise filed the Board's eviction order with the Newmarket Court Enforcement Office for enforcement by the Sheriff. As part of the process, Sunrise was required to provide information about any special circumstances relevant to the eviction. Sunrise advised the Court Enforcement Office about Mr. Salmon's health circumstances, including that he is a paraplegic with severe obesity, that he requires a mechanical lift to be transferred from his bed, and that he requires the ongoing care of service providers.

[15] Following Sunrise's filing of the eviction order with the Court Enforcement Office, Enforcement Officers took a number of steps to assess how they would conduct the eviction. They attended Mr. Salmon's unit to serve him with the eviction order. At that time, Mr. Salmon advised that he would not willingly leave his unit and that he had no place to go. Enforcement Officers also met with the York Regional Police who advised that their role "would be limited to keeping the peace, and that they would not forcibly remove or apprehend Mr. Salmon … if he refused to leave". Based on these consultations with the police and its own internal assessment, the Court Enforcement Office concluded that "there was no safe place for Mr. Salmon to be moved in light of his underlying physical challenges and associated daily care needs".

[16] In the circumstances, the Court Enforcement Office requested that Sunrise apply to the Superior Court of Justice to obtain directions on how to carry out the eviction pursuant to Rule 60.17 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194.

Justice Bale's decisions

[17] Sunrise brought an application for directions to the Superior Court in Newmarket on September 21, 2018. The application was before Bale J. The Sheriff and Mr. Salmon were respondents on the application.

[18] On September 21, 2018, the application judge made an order based on the consent of the parties that included the following terms:

a. The Sheriff "is authorized to take such steps as are reasonably required to evict" Mr. Salmon "and provide vacant possession" of the unit to Sunrise on November 30, 2018.

b. The parties could re-apply to the application judge if they required further directions on four days notice.

c. The March of Dimes, Centre for Independent Living and A Place for Mom were to provide information to Mr. Salmon's lawyer about when Mr. Salmon placed his name on their waiting lists and when he could reasonably expect to be accommodated. This information was then to be provided to Sunrise and the Sheriff.

d. The Local Health Integration Network (the "LHIN") was to provide Mr. Salmon with "information relating to the options available for patients with the needs of Mr. Salmon", and that information was to be shared with Sunrise and the Sheriff.

[19] In his brief endorsement, the application judge also stated that "it is the expectation of the court that Mr. Salmon, through counsel, will pursue alternate accommodations, over and above that available through the organizations" listed in the order.

[20] Despite this order, Mr. Salmon did not identify a place where he was to be moved to and the Sheriff did not enforce the eviction order by November 30, 2018.

[21] On January 8, 2019, Bale J. issued a further endorsement in this matter based on the written submissions of the parties. In his decision, he found that he did not have jurisdiction to make the order sought by Sunrise because Rule 60.17 of the Rules of Civil Procedure does not contemplate a freestanding application for directions but, rather, a “motion” for directions in the proceeding in which the order was originally made. He also held that a motion for directions was not the appropriate procedure for Sunrise to seek the enforcement of the eviction order.

[22] Despite finding that he did not have jurisdiction over this matter, the motion judge made findings in relation to the efforts made by Mr. Salmon to comply with the September 21, 2018 order to find alternative housing:

> [11] In response to my request for further submissions, Ms. Miller, on behalf of Mr. Salmon, advised that she had been informed by each facility to which he has applied that they are unable to provide information with respect to his place on their list. They have no way of knowing when a place will become available, and when one does, they have to interview the next person on the list to determine whether the placement is appropriate. Ms. Miller also advised that she had spoken with the Central LHIN manager and had been told that they could not provide any information as to what facilities may be available and appropriate for Mr. Salmon, because he has not applied for long-term care. The reason that he has not applied is that he believes long-term care facilities to be inappropriate for him, given his relative youth, and mental acuity. She reports that Mr. Salmon is frustrated and depressed at his inability to find an appropriate placement.

[23] The motion judge went on to describe the Sheriff's responsibilities:

> [20] The law applying in this case is clear. Sunrise is entitled to possession of the rental unit, and has been so entitled since June 1, 2018. Pursuant to s. 141(1) of the Courts of Justice Act and s. 85 of the Residential Tenancies Act, 2006, the sheriff is required to enforce the eviction order, in the same manner as a writ of possession, and has been required to do so since the order was filed with her on June 11, 2018.
> [21] With absolutely no disrespect to Mr. Salmon, and while I have sympathy for the position in which he finds himself, having no right to remain at Sunrise and nowhere to go (he says), he is, in effect, a homeless paraplegic. I am confident that in Ontario in 2018 (and now 2019) there is some place, or places, to which the sheriff may safely take such a person, upon carrying out an eviction order. It is, in my view, the public duty of the sheriff to determine what that place or places are, and to carry out the eviction.

[24] Finally, the motion judge held that an application to enforce the eviction order should be brought to the Divisional Court by way of an application for judicial review:

> [22] Sunrise has not asked the court to order the sheriff to fulfill her public duty by enforcing the eviction order, and in any event, my view is that such an order is not available on a motion for directions under rule 60.17. If the sheriff continues to delay in enforcing the order, Sunrise's remedy would be an application to the Divisional Court for judicial review, pursuant to s. 2 of the Judicial Review Procedure Act. However, it is my expectation that the sheriff will now proceed to enforce the eviction order, without requiring the applicant to engage in further, and unnecessary, litigation.

Justice Charney's decision

[25] Following Bale J.'s January 8, 2019 decision, the Court Enforcement Office took additional steps to find a suitable place to which Mr. Salmon could be taken upon his eviction. They contacted a number of organizations and shelters in the York Region and the Greater Toronto Area, and concluded that there was nowhere they could take him because Mr. Salmon's consent would be needed for admission or because the places they had contacted were not able to accommodate Mr. Salmon's medical needs.

[26] The Court Enforcement Office also contacted the LHIN, which informed them that it could facilitate Mr. Salmon's admission to a long-term care home, even on a temporary or urgent basis, but that Mr. Salmon's consent would be required for admission. In addition, the Enforcement Office identified a number of retirement homes that had vacancies and that could accommodate Mr. Salmon. Again, admission to a retirement home would require Mr. Salmon's consent.

[27] The Enforcement Office shared the information it obtained about the availability of long-term care homes and retirement homes with Mr. Salmon. In response, his counsel advised that Mr. Salmon would never consent to placement in a long-term care home and that the retirement homes identified were "not appropriate".

[28] On March 12, 2019, the Enforcement Office ultimately advised Sunrise that they would not carry out the eviction unless Mr. Salmon consented to be moved to alternative accommodations. The Sheriff also raised an issue about the eviction order expiring on the one-year anniversary of its being filed with the Court, which was June 11, 2018.

[29] Sunrise then brought an urgent application for judicial review before a single judge in Newmarket. The application was heard by Charney J. on April 26, 2019.

[30] In a decision released on April 29, 2019, Charney J. granted a one-year extension of the eviction order, starting from the date of his decision. The extension was without prejudice to Sunrise's ability at a later date to argue that the order does not expire. Having renewed the eviction order, the application judge went on to find that the matter was no longer urgent, and that it should be heard by a full panel of the Divisional Court. The matter was transferred to Toronto so that it could be heard more expeditiously.

Adjournment of July 2, 2019 hearing

[31] The application for judicial review came before this panel on July 2, 2019.

[32] At the beginning of the hearing, the panel heard initial submissions from Ms. Miller, counsel for Mr. Salmon, and from Sunrise. However, rather than continuing with the full hearing of the application, the panel then encouraged the parties to try to resolve the matter. The parties were then able to reach agreement on a process that was meant to lead Mr. Salmon to identify and move to suitable alternative accommodations, failing which the matter was to come back for a hearing before the panel at a later date. The agreement of the parties was reflected in an order of this Court, which included the following terms:

a. By July 16, 2019, Mr. Salmon was to provide consent to Sunrise and the Sheriff disclosing his personal health information for purposes of inquiring into potential new accommodations on his behalf.

b. By July 16, 2019, Mr. Salmon was to provide Sunrise and the Sheriff with copies of his applications to The March of Dimes, Centre for Independent Living and A Place for Mom.

c. By July 16, 2019, Mr. Salmon was to serve Sunrise and the Sheriff with the medical records relevant to his search for new accommodations.

d. By July 16, 2019, Mr. Salmon was to advise the parties of the parameters he was using to identify potential new accommodations.

e. By July 16, 2019, Mr. Salmon was to provide the list of parameters to his LHIN caseworker. Mr. Salmon was to ask his LHIN caseworker to inquire into all long-term care homes that can reasonably accommodate his parameters. If a long-term care home could not meet his parameters, Mr. Salmon was to ask his LHIN caseworker to advise which long-term care homes, if any, can come closest to accommodating his parameters.

f. By July 30, 2019, the Sheriff and Sunrise were to provide Mr. Salmon with a list of potential new accommodations. Sunrise and the Sheriff were permitted to update the list from time to time.

g. Mr. Salmon was to continue reasonable efforts, independent of Sunrise and the Sheriff, to identify and pursue potential new accommodations.

[33] In addition to the terms above, the order also required Mr. Salmon to report regularly on his communications with potential new accommodations, to provide details about why he found potential new accommodations not suitable and to report on his communications with his LHIN caseworker about potential accommodations in a long-term care home.

[34] Paragraph 10 of the order also provided that:

> If Mr. Salmon maintains that long-term care home is not a suitable destination, he is to complete a medical assessment and to serve the report of the medical assessor regarding his eligibility for admission to a long-term care home by no later than 30 days after the assessment.

[35] Finally, Mr. Salmon was to advise the Sheriff where he was to be moved by November 30, 2019. In the event Mr. Salmon failed to do so, the matter was to come back before this panel on a date to be arranged with the Court for early 2020, and a schedule was set for the parties to deliver their materials. Mr. Salmon's materials were due on December 17, 2019.

Events since July 2, 2019

[36] Unfortunately, following the July 2, 2019 order, Mr. Salmon did not identify a place where he was to be moved, and the matter came back before the panel on January 14, 2020.

[37] In advance of the hearing, Sunrise and the Sheriff filed supplementary materials, outlining what has occurred since July 2, 2019. Mr. Salmon did not file additional materials.

[38] Based on the evidence filed by the parties, it appears that Sunrise and the Sheriff met their obligations under the order made July 2, 2019. Mr. Salmon met some, but not all, of his obligations.

[39] Mr. Salmon did provide a list of parameters he is using to search for new accommodations. He is seeking a 500 square feet suite or a space with a layout that can accommodate specified equipment. Counsel for Sunrise points out that the list includes some equipment that Mr. Salmon does not currently have in his unit and that he did not include his budget as part of his parameters.

[40] While Mr. Salmon provided a copy of his application to The March of Dimes, he did not provide copies of his applications to either the Centre for Independent Living or A Place for Mom.

[41] With respect to the option of moving to a long-term care home, it appears that Mr. Salmon maintained his objection to this option throughout most of the time leading to this hearing despite the requirement in the July 2, 2019 order that he explore this option with the LHIN:

a. In a letter dated July 15, 2019, counsel for Sunrise asked counsel for Mr. Salmon to advise of his inquiries with his LHIN caseworker about the long-term care homes that could accommodate his parameters. In response, in correspondence of the same date, Mr. Salmon's lawyer stated:

> I'm not sure how many other ways I can say that there is no discussion of LTC facilities if there is no consent for same. That's how it works. So no specific options were discussed. That part of the order is now satisfied in my view. Further compliance is not possible as long as my client has not provided his consent to be placed in LTC.

b. In a letter dated July 15, 2019, the LHIN described a meeting it had with Mr. Salmon. In the letter, the LHIN indicated that Mr. Salmon's caseworker could assist him with the admission process to a long-term care home, but that "Mr. Salmon declined to apply for admission…"

c. On August 21, 2019, the LHIN provided Mr. Salmon with a list of 14 long-term care homes that may be able to accommodate him, and encouraged him to take a virtual tour of the facilities. In the same correspondence, the LHIN indicated that it could not assess Mr. Salmon's suitability for the homes without his consent.

d. In correspondence dated August 29, 2019, Mr. Salmon's lawyer again advised Sunrise's lawyer that Mr. Salmon was not consenting to be placed on a long-term care home list, and that the assessment process could therefore not begin.

e. In October 2019, Sunrise's counsel and the Sheriff's counsel contacted this panel, seeking direction on the basis that Mr. Salmon was not meeting his obligations under our order of July 2, 2019. On October 18, 2019, the panel made a written direction that included a requirement that Mr. Salmon was expected to comply with all of the terms of the order in good faith.

f. On November 5, 2019, Mr. Salmon's lawyer wrote to the panel with the following information:

> I can further advise that my client has now made an application with the CLHIN for the sole purpose of inquiring about long-term care options to comply with the Order. His intention remains clear that he does not wish to be placed into long-term care, but he will advise what options exist. This confirms the advice of the CHLIN that an application to long-term care does not equate to admission to long-term care, which still requires his consent.

g. Finally, on November 25, 2019, Mr. Salmon's lawyer advised counsel for Sunrise and the Sheriff that her client advised her "that he did formally apply for long-term care and is waiting to hear back on suitable accommodation". She also advised that Mr. Salmon was on his way to the hospital due to an infection and that he would not be able to meet the November 30th deadline.

[42] With respect to the option of moving to another retirement home, both Sunrise and the Sheriff provided Mr. Salmon's lawyer with lists of retirement homes that appeared to meet Mr. Salmon's needs and that had vacancies or upcoming vacancies. Mr. Salmon's lawyer provided some emails her client had sent to a number of retirement homes, including some of the retirement homes identified by Sunrise and the Sheriff. However, it is hard to accept that these emails represent a serious effort to find a suitable place. For example:

a. The criteria identified in the emails are higher than what Mr. Salmon has in his current unit. For instance, his email makes reference to three lifts, when he currently only has one, and to needing space for items he currently does not have, such as a power wheelchair and rehab arm-bike.

b. Mr. Salmon's budget is unclear, arguably making it sound like he has a lower budget than he has. At Sunrise, his rent is $6,000 per month and he pays separately for support workers. However, his emails to retirement homes suggest that he has a ceiling of $6,000 per month for his rent and for his support workers.

c. There is no evidence of follow up. For example, one retirement home said that they may be able to accommodate his needs, but there is no follow up correspondence from Mr. Salmon.

[43] Mr. Salmon also did not comply with the requirement that he undergo a medical examination to determine his suitability for a long-term care home. As reviewed above, the July 2, 2019 order required him to undergo a medical examination if he maintained his position that long-term care was not suitable for him. In its October 2019 correspondence, Sunrise advised that Mr. Salmon had still not undergone a medical assessment. In our subsequent direction, the panel required that Mr. Salmon undergo a medical assessment by no later than November 15, 2019, and as stated above that he "comply with the terms of the Order in good faith". Despite this direction, it appears that Mr. Salmon did not undergo a medical examination. Instead, at the hearing before us, his counsel argued that he was not required to undergo the medical examination because he had applied for long-term care. Up until the November 5th communication from Mr. Salmon's counsel, Mr. Salmon had made it clear to Sunrise and the Sheriff that he was only applying for long-term care to comply with the order. However, since it is plain that he had no intention of actually consenting to a placement, it is hard to see that Mr. Salmon's refusal to undergo a medical assessment to determine his suitability for long-term care was made in good in faith.

[44] Finally, and most significantly, Mr. Salmon did not advise where he was to be moved by the November 30, 2019 deadline. As indicated above, his lawyer did advise Sunrise and the Sheriff that he would not be able to comply with this term of the order due to his hospital admission in late November. However, Mr. Salmon returned to the Sunrise retirement home in early December, and nevertheless did not comply with this aspect of the order after that date nor did he provide an explanation for not doing so.

[45] Besides Mr. Salmon's failure to comply with the July 2nd order, Sunrise's evidence is that Mr. Salmon has not paid the full amount of rent owed since that time. Mr. Salmon maintains that three of the cheques he provided to Sunrise were misplaced. Even if this were true, it could be easily remedied with replacement cheques, which he has not provided. In addition, without going into detail or deciding who is in the wrong, it is evident from Sunrise's evidence that relations between Mr. Salmon and Sunrise's staff continue to deteriorate. There are significant disagreements over the scope of services Mr. Salmon is to receive while he is still at Sunrise, and Sunrise's staff have complained that Mr. Salmon is rude and has threatened them.

Adjournment request

[46] At the beginning of the hearing on January 14, 2020, Mr. Salmon's lawyer requested an adjournment. She advised that Mr. Salmon was in the hospital and that she had not been able to get instructions from him over the past seven weeks. She indicated that the latest medical information she had received was from Mr. Salmon's sister on the Friday before the hearing, who indicated that Mr. Salmon was in the hospital due to internal bleeding. Mr. Salmon's lawyer indicated that she was unable to serve responding materials because of Mr. Salmon's unavailability due to medical issues.

[47] Both Sunrise and the Sheriff opposed the adjournment. Sunrise provided an affidavit that indicated that Mr. Salmon was hospitalized between November 25 and December 3, 2019, and again since December 31, 2019. This suggests that Mr. Salmon was at home for most of December and, yet, in that time period, he took no steps to comply with the requirement that he advise where he was to be moved nor with the deadline for providing responding materials by December 14, 2019.

[48] After hearing submissions from the parties, we denied the request for an adjournment. For the sake of completeness, we take the opportunity to explain here the reasons for denying the adjournment.

[49] There is no doubt that Mr. Salmon has serious health issues and challenges. In the normal course, the Court would grant an adjournment request in circumstances where one of the parties is hospitalized and has not had an opportunity to instruct counsel. However, in this case there has already been an almost two year delay since the eviction order was made. In the interim, Mr. Salmon's rent payments have been sporadic, and Sunrise and Mr. Salmon now disagree on many issues related to the services Mr. Salmon is to receive while he remains at Sunrise.

[50] The application is brought against the Sheriff to compel the enforcement of the eviction order. While Mr. Salmon certainly has an interest in the application, the relief Sunrise seeks on the application is not directly against him.

[51] In seeking the adjournment, Mr. Salmon's lawyer argued that Mr. Salmon should have an opportunity to file materials in response to the supplementary materials filed by Sunrise and the Sheriff. The materials filed by Sunrise and the Sheriff address what has occurred since July 2, 2019. This information is only marginally relevant to the issue of whether Sunrise is entitled to an order in the nature of mandamus requiring the Sheriff to enforce Mr. Salmon's eviction. We granted the adjournment on July 2, 2019 because it was evident to us that it would be preferable for this matter to be resolved consensually, without further court intervention. That is why we granted that adjournment to give Mr. Salmon the opportunity to voluntarily find and choose an alternative place to live. However, ultimately, Sunrise's entitlement to the relief it seeks does not depend on what efforts Mr. Salmon has made or not made to find an alternative place to live.

[52] As seen below, while we find that Sunrise is entitled to the order it seeks, we have taken Mr. Salmon's current circumstances into consideration in setting the date by which the eviction order is to be enforced.

Jurisdiction of the Court

[53] Pursuant to section 2(1) of the Judicial Review Procedure Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. J.1, this Court has the power to make an order in the nature of mandamus on an application for judicial review.

Analysis

[54] The issue raised on this application is whether the Court should make an order in the nature of mandamus requiring the Sheriff to enforce the Board's eviction order.

[55] The remedy of mandamus "compels an individual to perform a statutory duty imposed on him or her": Zaki v. Ontario (Director, Disability Support Program, 2017 ONSC 1324 (Div. Ct.), at para. 45.

[56] The parties agree that the test for mandamus is the eight-part test articulated by the Federal Court of Appeal in Apotex v. Canada (Attorney General), 1993 CanLII 3004 (FCA), [1994] 1 FC 742 (C.A.), at para. 55. This test has been consistently adopted and applied by all levels of court in Canada, including in Ontario: National Farmers Union - Ontario v. Ontario, 2013 ONSC 6452, at para. 79. The eight parts of the test are as follows:

a. The party against whom the order is made must have a public legal duty to act;

b. The duty must be owed to the applicant;

c. The applicant must have a clear right to the performance of that duty;

d. Where the duty sought to be enforced is discretionary, certain rules apply;

e. There is no other adequate alternative remedy available to the applicant;

f. The order sought will be of some practical value or effect;

g. There is no equitable bar to the relief sought; and

h. The balance of convenience favours granting an order in the nature of mandamus.

[57] Sunrise argues that it has met the requirements for mandamus, and that the Court should exercise its discretion and make an order requiring the Sheriff to enforce the eviction order.

[58] The Sheriff agrees that the first four parts of the test are met, but argues that Sunrise has not met the last four parts of the test. Mr. Salmon's lawyer supports the argument made by the Sheriff, and emphasizes that the balance of convenience favours her client.

[59] We are satisfied that the eight-part test is met and that an order in the nature of mandamus should be made requiring the Sheriff to carry out the eviction.

[60] Despite the respondents' concession that the first four parts of the test are met, our analysis addresses each part of the test with emphasis on the last four parts.

The Sheriff has a legal duty to act

[61] The statutory regime that governs evictions and the powers of the Sheriff make clear that the Sheriff has a duty to enforce eviction orders made by the Board.

[62] Section 85 of the Residential Tenancies Act, 2006 provides that an "order evicting a person shall have the same effect, and shall be enforced in the same manner as a writ of possession".

[63] Section 141(1) of the Courts of Justice Ac, R.S.O., c. C.43*,* states that "orders of a court arising out of a civil proceeding and enforceable in Ontario shall be directed to a sheriff for enforcement".

[64] As held by Bale J. in his decision of January 8, 2019, in combination these two provisions make clear that the sheriff "is required to enforce the eviction order, in the same manner as a writ of possession…"

The duty is owed to the applicant

[65] The eviction order was issued in favour of Sunrise. Sunrise filed the eviction order with the Sheriff's office. The purpose of enforcement is to provide Sunrise with vacant possession of the unit.

The applicant has a clear right to performance of the duty

[66] Pursuant to Apotex, this part of the test requires Sunrise to demonstrate that:

a. It has met all of the conditions precedent giving rise to the duty; and

b. There was (i) a prior demand for performance of the duty, (ii) a reasonable time to comply with the demand unless refused outright, and (iii) a subsequent refusal which can be either express or implied.

[67] In this case, the only condition precedent to the Sheriff's duty to enforce the eviction order was that Sunrise file the order with the Sheriff's office, which it did.

[68] Sunrise has made repeated requests that the Sheriff enforce the order; the initial request was made in June of 2018, which is over 18 months ago; and the Sheriff's office has taken the position that it will not effect the eviction unless Mr. Salmon consents to be moved to a specific retirement home, long-term care home or other location.

[69] Therefore, we are satisfied that Sunrise has established that it has a clear right to the performance of the duty.

The duty is not discretionary [70] The Sheriff does not have the discretion to decide not to enforce the eviction orders.

[71] In Central Guaranty Trust Co. v. McRae (1993), 1993 CanLII 8542 (ON SC), 13 O.R. (3d) 295 (Sup. Ct.), at para. 12, the Superior Court held that the Sheriff has a duty to enforce validly made writs of possession and no discretion not to do so:

> A writ of possession is an order of the court. It is granted only after a Judge or master has made a judicial determination which includes consideration of the rights of the occupants. A Sheriff is an officer of the court, sworn to uphold the law. Refusal by a law enforcement officer to enforce an order of the court can only serve to undermine respect for the judicial system and bring the administration of justice into disrepute. A Sheriff, therefore, has no discretion to refuse to execute a writ of possession.

[72] The same principle clearly applies to the Sheriff's obligation to enforce an eviction order made by the Board, given that section 85 of the Residential Tenancies Act provides that an eviction order is to be enforced in the same manner as a writ of possession.

There are no adequate alternative remedies

[73] The Sheriff argues that Sunrise must exhaust other remedies before seeking mandamus, and that, in this case, Sunrise ought first to seek a contempt order against Mr. Salmon.

[74] We reject this argument.

[75] The record before us does not suggest that a contempt order would serve a practical purpose. Despite the eviction order to which Mr. Salmon consented which was made almost two years ago, he has taken few steps to find alternative accommodations and he has not voluntarily made arrangements to move out of the unit.

[76] The Sheriff suggests that a contempt order could be enforced through escalating fines. Again, this is unsatisfactory because it would lead to further delay in implementing the eviction order. Significantly, economic sanctions would have the effect of depriving Sunrise of potential rent while Mr. Salmon remains in the unit and of depriving Mr. Salmon of funds he will likely need to relocate to other accommodations.

[77] More importantly, the legislature has created a clear enforcement mechanism to deal with eviction orders by allowing landlords to seek enforcement by the Sheriff. Requiring landlords to first bring contempt proceedings defeats the legislative scheme and would have the effect of dragging out what should be a fairly efficient process once the eviction order is made and appeal rights are exhausted.

The order sought will have some practical value or effect

[78] The Sheriff argues that an order compelling the Enforcement Office to carry out the eviction order will have no practical value for two reasons. First, the order would be redundant because section 141(1) of the Courts of Justice Act already compels the Sheriff to enforce eviction orders. Second, the police have already advised that they will not assist in evicting Mr. Salmon unless there is a place to which he can be safely taken.

[79] On the first issue, while the Enforcement Office acknowledges the Sheriff's statutory obligation, Enforcement Officers have not yet fulfilled that obligation. Mandamus is available to require compliance with a statutory obligation. A court order will therefore not be redundant, but will require the Sheriff to comply with its obligations despite its perceived impediments to doing so.

[80] On the second issue, while there is evidence that the police would not assist the sheriff with the eviction last year, there is no evidence that the police will not assist in the face of a court order requiring the Sheriff to fulfill this statutory duty. In fact, we note that in the affidavit filed on behalf of the Sheriff in response to this application, the affiant states that the York Regional Police "could not provide assurance that they would remove the tenant if he refused to leave without a court order directing them".

[81] Section 21(1) of the Execution Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. E.24, provides that, when acting under a writ of possession, the Sheriff "may use reasonable force to enter and take possession of the land and premises referred to in the writ". Section 141(2) of the Courts of Justice Act gives the Sheriff the authority to "require a police officer to accompany the sheriff in the execution of the order".

[82] The Sheriff relies on the decision in Canada Post Corporation v. Doe et al., 2018 ONSC 7283, at para. 15-20, where Hainey J. of this Court found that the court does not have the power to direct the police to enforce an order arising out of a civil proceeding. That case arose out of a labour dispute between Canada Post and one of its unions. Canada Post was seeking an order from the Court compelling the police to enforce injunctions that had been granted against protesters.

[83] The circumstances in this case and the order sought by Sunrise are different. Sunrise does not seek an order against the police, but against the Sheriff who has a clear statutory duty to enforce the eviction order. If mandamus is granted, the Sheriff will be responsible for figuring out how to implement the order and what assistance, if any, will be required from the police. At this point, it would be premature for this Court to assume that Mr. Salmon will not be more cooperative in the face of an order from this Court or that the police will not assist in enforcing the Court's order.

[84] In Friends of the Oldman River Society v. Canada (Minister of Transport), 1992 CanLII 110 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 3, at para. 109, the Supreme Court of Canada held as follows:

> Prerogative relief should only be refused on the ground of futility in those few instances where the issuance of a prerogative writ would be effectively nugatory. For example, a case where the order could not possibly be implemented, such as an order of prohibition to a tribunal if nothing is left for it to do that can be prohibited… [emphasis added]

[85] This is not such a case. The evidence before us does not establish that an order from this Court would have no utility or effect.

There is no equitable bar to mandamus

[86] The Sheriff and Mr. Salmon argue that, as between Sunrise and Mr. Salmon, the equities favour Mr. Salmon. In our view, weighing the interests of the parties is relevant to the balance of convenience, but not to whether there is an equitable bar to the relief sought.

[87] In considering whether there is an equitable bar to the relief sought, the Court is concerned with whether the applicant, in this case Sunrise, comes to the Court with clean hands: Zaki, at para. 92; Khalil v. Canada (Secretary of State), 1999 CanLII 9360 (FCA), [1999] 4 F.C. 661 (C.A.), at para. 15.

[88] Based on the record before us, there is no doubt that Sunrise has acted fairly and appropriately throughout these proceedings. Initially, in the proceedings before the Board, Sunrise consented to an order that provided Mr. Salmon with a generous period of time for finding alternative accommodations, while foregoing significant arrears in rent. More than two years have elapsed since that order was made. In the interim, while Sunrise has pursued its right to enforcement of the eviction order, the record before this Court makes clear that Sunrise has worked cooperatively with Mr. Salmon and the Sheriff in trying to find alternative accommodations for Mr. Salmon.

[89] Under the circumstances, we see no equitable bar to granting the relief sought.

The balance of convenience favours granting the order

[90] The Sheriff and Mr. Salmon argue that the balance of convenience favours not granting mandamus because Sunrise's interests are only economic, whereas Mr. Salmon's interests, and by association the Sheriff's interests, are matters of health and safety.

[91] In Apotex, at para. 118, the Federal Court of Appeal stated that "denying mandamus appears to arise in instances where potential health and safety risks to the public are perceived to outweigh an individual's right to pursue personal or economic interests". At the same time, at paras. 124-125, the Court also recognized that, in weighing the balance of convenience, the Court's discretion to refuse mandamus should only be exercised in the "clearest of circumstances", given the public interest in upholding the rule of law.

[92] Therefore, in balancing the relevant interests in this case, the Court is not only to consider the relative interests of Sunrise and Mr. Salmon, but also the public interest in ensuring that eviction orders are complied with and enforced.

[93] With respect to Sunrise's interest, by this point, its interests are not just economic. It is evident that the relationship between the parties has deteriorated to such a point that it is difficult for Sunrise and its employees to deal with Mr. Salmon while he remains in the unit.

[94] With respect to Mr. Salmon's interests, neither the Sheriff nor Mr. Salmon have established that complying with the order will inevitably endanger Mr. Salmon's health and safety and that there are no alternatives other than leaving Mr. Salmon in his unit at the retirement home.

[95] First, based on the evidence available since July 2, 2019 and reviewed above, it is evident that there are retirement homes within the general geographic area identified by Mr. Salmon that have vacancies and that can accommodate his needs. It is also evident that there may be long-term care homes that can accommodate Mr. Salmon on an urgent, short-term or long-term basis, but that Mr. Salmon has made only limited efforts to explore this option. This is not a case in which there is nowhere, other than Sunrise, that can accommodate Mr. Salmon. The only impediment to these options appears to be Mr. Salmon's consent.

[96] Second, while it is clear from the record that Mr. Salmon has serious disabilities and health needs, the evidence on the application does not establish that he cannot be moved safely nor does it establish that there is nowhere where he can be accommodated on a temporary basis. Mr. Salmon has been moved to and from the hospital from time to time. Therefore, he clearly can be moved. In addition, while the Sheriff's affiant states that the Enforcement Office has explored temporary options, very little evidence is provided on this point. This cannot be the first time the Enforcement Office has faced a case in which an individual with significant health issues has refused to move in the face of an eviction order. Therefore, based on the record before us, we are not prepared to find that Mr. Salmon cannot be moved safely to another location, even without his consent.

[97] With respect to the public interest, there is no doubt that this is a difficult situation. There is a long-outstanding order requiring Mr. Salmon to vacate his unit at the Sunrise residence. While Mr. Salmon has significant health issues and limitations, the evidence before us plainly demonstrates that there are alternatives available to Mr. Salmon that are within his budget. The evidence before us also suggests that he has acted unreasonably by failing to cooperate in the search for an alternative home. There is no doubt that this places the Sheriff in a difficult situation. However, this does not give the Sheriff an excuse to abdicate a clear statutory duty. There is a clear public interest in ensuring that valid eviction orders are enforced.

[98] Weighing Mr. Salmon's interests, Sunrise's interests and the public interest, it is evident that the eviction order should be enforced. Otherwise, the Court would be sanctioning Mr. Salmon's deliberate non-compliance with a valid eviction order that has been in place for over two years.

Additional issues raised by Mr. Salmon

[99] While not pressed at the hearing, Mr. Salmon raised two issues in his factum that we address briefly here.

[100] First, he seems to argue that the original eviction orders made by the Board were unfair or improper. However, these orders were never appealed. They are valid orders, and the only issue appropriately raised on this application is their enforcement. Any attack on their validity is an impermissible collateral attack: Ontario (Human Rights Commission) v. Ontario, [2000] O.J. No. 2419 (Sup. Ct.), at para. 13.

[101] Second, Mr. Salmon also argues that, in enforcing the eviction order, the Sheriff must comply with the Human Rights Code, R.S.O. 1990, c. H.19. Again, this issue was not pressed by Mr. Salmon's counsel at the hearing. However, we note that compliance with the Human Rights Code cannot mean that Sunrise is not entitled to the enforcement of a validly made eviction order. As the evidence above demonstrates, both Sunrise and the Sheriff have worked together for almost two years to assist Mr. Salmon in finding alternative accommodations.

Appropriate remedy

[102] For the reasons above, we have concluded that Sunrise is entitled to an order in the nature of mandamus requiring the Sheriff to carry out the eviction order. The only remaining issue is whether we can and, if so, should include directions as to how the Sheriff is to carry out the order.

[103] During the hearing, counsel for Sunrise and the Sheriff conceded that the Court likely has no authority to compel Mr. Salmon to be placed in a specific long-term care home or retirement home. Indeed, section 7 of the Long-Term Care Homes Act, 2007, S.O. 2007, c. 8, requires a resident to consent to an assessment for admission or to be cared for in a long-term care home, and section 46(1) provides that consent for admission "must be given voluntarily". In addition, section 53(1) of the Retirement Homes Act, 2010 requires residents and retirement homes to enter into an agreement before a resident can start living at the retirement home. We were provided with no authority that would allow this Court to bypass this requirement. Indeed, Mr. Salmon is capable and, as such, if his consent is needed, he cannot be compelled by this Court to consent. In any event, the Court cannot compel a third party retirement home or long-term care home to accept Mr. Salmon. Furthermore, the Court is not in a position to assess which specific retirement home, or long-term care home, may be suitable for Mr. Salmon.

[104] In any event, we note that in North Vancouver (District) v. Canada, [1978] F.C.J. No. 619 (T.D.), at para. 38, the Federal Court issued a mandamus order, finding that the harbour authority in that case had a statutory duty to address unlawfully moored houseboats, but that it was not up to the Court to dictate how that duty was to be fulfilled. In our view, the same point is equally applicable here.

[105] While Sunrise and the Sheriff have worked hard and cooperatively to find an alternative home for Mr. Salmon, the Sheriff's responsibility is ultimately not to find a permanent home for him but to carry out the eviction order. This may mean that Mr. Salmon has to be brought to a temporary location. Where Mr. Salmon is to be taken will be for the Sheriff to determine. As mentioned above, this cannot be the first time the Sheriff has been faced with an eviction involving a resident with serious health issues who is reluctant to move.

[106] While we are satisfied that an order compelling the Sheriff to perform its statutory duty to evict Mr. Salmon is appropriate in this case and while we find that it would not be appropriate for the Court to give directions on how the order is to be carried out, we wish to ensure that the parties are given sufficient time to implement the order.

[107] At the time of the hearing, Mr. Salmon was in the hospital. He should be given time to return from the hospital, and an opportunity, in the face of this decision, to finally find and consent to alternative accommodations. As mentioned above, toward the end of November, his lawyer indicated that her client had finally applied for long-term care. Working with his LHIN caseworker, based on the Sheriff's evidence about the availability of urgent and short term long-term care, we are confident that Mr. Salmon should be able to find accommodations, even in the short term, and thereby have control over where he is to be taken. Alternatively, given that there are retirement homes with vacancies that can accommodate his needs, he should be able to make arrangements with a retirement home.

[108] At the same time, in the event that Mr. Salmon does not do so, the Sheriff will require some time to identify a temporary location where Mr. Salmon can be taken.

[109] Accordingly, while we grant the mandamus order, we find that it is appropriate that the Sheriff be given until March 31, 2020 to comply with the order. In the meantime, we remind Mr. Salmon that he is required by the eviction order to continue paying rent to Sunrise.

Costs

[110] At the conclusion of the hearing, we requested that the parties confer on the issue of costs to see if they could reach an agreement. Counsel for Sunrise and the Sheriff indicated that they had reached agreement as between their clients. They agreed that the successful party was to receive $35,000 in costs. Counsel for Mr. Salmon indicated that she acts pro bono for Mr. Salmon and that she is not seeking costs and argues that no costs should be awarded against Mr. Salmon.

[111] With respect to costs payable by the Sheriff to Sunrise, we find that $20,000 in costs is appropriate in this case. While the Court would normally accede to the agreement made between the parties, $35,000 is far in excess of the costs that would normally be awarded on an application for judicial review. In accordance with the Court of Appeal's decision in Boucher v. Public Accountants Council for the Province of Ontario (2004), 71 OR (ed) 291 (C.A.), at para. 26, the prevailing principle in awarding costs is "to fix an amount that is fair and reasonable for the unsuccessful party to pay in the particular proceeding". In this case, we note that the Sheriff is a public official whose representatives were trying to deal with what could be described as an impossible situation. Any additional costs incurred by Sunrise were not attributable to the Sheriff's conduct, but rather to Mr. Salmon's circumstances and reluctance to fully engage in efforts to find alternative accommodations. In these unique circumstances, we find that it is appropriate to reduce the amount agreed to by the parties, and to limit the costs payable by the Sheriff to Sunrise to $20,000, all inclusive.

[112] We accept the submission made by Mr. Salmon's counsel, and order that there shall be no costs payable by or to Mr. Salmon.

Conclusion

[113] For the reasons above, this Court makes the following order:

a. An order in the nature of mandamus is granted directing the Sheriff to enforce the Board's eviction order and to deliver vacant possession of the premises to Sunrise by no later than March 31, 2020; and

b. The Sheriff is to pay costs to Sunrise in the amount of $20,000 within 30 days.

BY THE COURT:

Overview

[1] This is an application for judicial review relating to a refusal by the Chief Electoral Officer of Ontario (the "Respondent" or the "CEO") to pay three quarterly per-vote subsidies to the New Blue Party of Ontario ("New Blue") following the 2022 provincial general election.

[26] The Applicants' suggestion that s. 32.1 of the EFA is "mechanical" and "unequivocal" is undermined by its over ten pages of interpretive arguments in its factum. In any event, the CEO has the statutory authority to decide all questions that come before him, including the appropriate interpretation of the EFA. His decision on that issue is entitled to deference by this court. The purpose of an order of mandamus is to compel the decision-maker to make a decision that it has failed or refused to make. Mandamus thus lies only if no decision has yet been made: Canada (Attorney General) v. Iris Technologies Inc., 2021 FCA 244, 192 C.P.R. (4th) 171, at para. 5.

[27] As noted above, the CEO determined that New Blue was not eligible to receive any payment and gave reasons for it. The CEO interpreted the subsection as requiring the calculation to be based on the results of the 2018 election, which was the most recent election prior to 2022 Q2. This is repeatedly referred to as a "decision" in the Applicants' pleading.

[28] We conclude therefore that the CEO rendered a reviewable decision when he wrote to New Blue informing it that it was ineligible for the quarterly subsidies covered by s. 32.1(2.1) of the EFA. There was no refusal to perform a public duty and no clear right to the performance of a duty to make the payments as required to meet the test for mandamus: Apotex v. Canada (Attorney General), 1993 CanLII 3004 (FCA), [1994] 1 F.C. 742 (C.A.), 162 N.R. 177, aff'd 1994 CanLII 47 (SCC), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 1100 ("Apotex").

[29] The Applicants rely on three mandamus cases to support their reframed application:

a. Sunrise North Senior Living Ltd. v. Sheriff (Regional Municipality of York), 2020 ONSC 469, 443 D.L.R. (4th) 458 (Div. Ct.) ("Sunrise") where mandamus was ordered to compel the sheriff who had refused to evict a tenant pursuant to an order of the Landlord and Tenant Board;

b. Yassin v. Canada (Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness), 2018 FC 423 ("Yassin") where mandamus was ordered to compel the Minister to render a decision on a request for ministerial relief; and

c. 407 ETR Concession Company Limited v. Ontario (Registrar of Motor Vehicles) (2005), 2005 CanLII 49963 (ON SCDC), 82 O.R. (3d) 703 (Div. Ct.) ("407 ETR") where the Registrar of Motor Vehicles refused to validate or issue vehicle permits to individuals who failed to pay tolls and administrative fees owed to 407 ETR.

[30] In Sunrise, at para. 56, the court sets out the eight-part test for mandamus articulated in Apotex which is not in dispute here. In both Sunrise and Yassin, the relevant decision-makers had failed to carry out an order or to render a decision and are therefore distinguishable.

[31] 407 ETR rests on the now-outdated concept of jurisdictional questions. At para. 54, the court states: "It is the court's function to ensure the public body does not make decisions based on a misapprehension of jurisdiction." As set out above, Vavilov has now established that there is now only a very limited category of preliminary or jurisdictional question that escapes the uniform reasonableness standard.

[32] We conclude that the test for mandamus is not met. The CEO's decision to deny New Blue the payments it is seeking must be reviewed on a reasonableness standard, to which we now turn.

The CEO's Decision was Reasonable

PRESENT: The Honourable Madam Justice St-Louis

BETWEEN:

Mohamed Ibrahim YASSIN

and

THE MINISTER OF PUBLIC SAFETY AND EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

Respondent

JUDGMENT AND REASONS

I. Nature of the matter

[1] This is an application by Mr. Mohamed Ibrahim Yassin, pursuant to subsection 72(1) of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, SC 2001, c 27 [IRPA], whereby he seeks judicial review of the Respondent's [also the Minister] failure to render a decision with respect to his application for ministerial relief under subsection 42.1(1) of the IRPA.

[2] Mr. Yassin requests an order in the nature of mandamus compelling the Respondent to provide a final answer, "approved" or "refused" to his application within the updated timeline he presented to the Court at the hearing.

[3] For the reasons exposed hereinafter, the Court will grant Mr. Yassin's application and will issue the order in the form of a mandamus.

II. Background

[4] Mr. Yassin is a citizen of Somalia who initiated the process to obtain Canadian permanent residence in Canada on behalf of himself, his wife and four dependent children.

[5] In 2008, Mr. Yassin first applied for Quebec Selection Certificates under the Investor program. In November 2009, each member of the family received their Quebec Selection Certificate, and in April 2010, they applied for Canadian permanent resident status.

[6] On April 23, 2015, the visa officer sent Mr. Yassin a procedural fairness letter stating there were reasonable grounds to believe he was, or had been, a member of an inadmissible class of persons described in paragraph 35(l)(b) of the IRPA, due to his role as a senior official in the designated regime of President Siad Barre from June 1977 until July 1979.

[7] On June 8, 2015, Mr. Yassin's counsel responded to the procedural fairness letter. First, he argued that Mr. Yassin did not fall within the scope of paragraph 35(1)(b) of the IRPA and secondly, he requested the granting of ministerial relief pursuant to subsection 42.1(1) of the IRPA, and submitted that it would not be contrary to Canada's national interests to grant Mr. Yassin permanent residency. The visa officer did not then forward the ministerial relief request to the Ministerial Relief Unit [MRU], responsible for these applications.

[8] On December 10, 2015, the Canada Border Services Agency Liaison Officer and First Secretary [Liaison Officer] wrote to Mr. Yassin's counsel. The Liaison Officer then stated essentially that he did not doubt the good faith of counsel's arguments or the fact that Mr. Yassin would not have been involved in President Barre's faults, but stressed that the law was clear and that Mr. Yassin fell into its ambit. The Liaison Officer offered Mr. Yassin the possibility of raising humanitarian grounds under section 25 of the IRPA, but on December 13, 2015, he wrote again to rekindle this offer and confirm he would be soon issuing the official refusal letter.

[9] On December 15, 2015, Mr. Yassin's counsel wrote to the Liaison Officer, and reminded him of that he had presented a request for ministerial relief and relevant submissions back in June 2015.

[10] On December 20, 2015, the Liaison Officer sent Mr. Yassin's counsel an email confirming that he would be sending the request for ministerial relief to the MRU for processing. The Liaison Officer attached to his email the letter addressed to Mr. Yassin confirming that his application for admission to Canada was refused.

[11] Between March and August 2017, Mr. Yassin's counsel wrote to the Respondent and to the MRU requesting processing of the file, initially within a 90 days delay. The Respondent essentially replied that he was unable to accede to his request for processing within the requested delay and to provide a specific timeframe. On August 30, 2017, Mr. Yassin filed his application for leave and judicial review, seeking an order in the nature of a mandamus from the Court.

III. Issue

[12] The Court must decide if Mr. Yassin is entitled to a mandamus order with respect to the pending request for ministerial relief.

IV. Analysis

A. Legal test for a mandamus

[13] As stated in Douze v Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2010 FC 1337 (Douze), the following criteria must be satisfied for a mandamus order to be issued (Apotex Inc v Canada [Attorney General], 1993 CanLII 3004 (FCA), [1994] 1 FCR 742, 162 NR 177 [FCA] conf by Apotex Inc v Canada, 1994 CanLII 47 (SCC), [1994] 3 SCR 1100, 176 NR 1 [Apotex], Tameh v Canada [Minister of Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness], 2017 FC 288 [Tameh]):

> 1. There must be a public legal duty to act…
>
> 2. The duty must be owed to the applicant…
>
> 3. There is a clear right to performance of that duty, in particular:
>
> > (a) the applicant has satisfied all conditions precedent giving rise to the duty…
> >
> > (b) there was (i) a prior demand for performance of the duty; (ii) a reasonable time to comply with the demand unless refused outright; and (iii) a subsequent refusal which can be either expressed or implied, e.g. unreasonable delay…
>
> 4. Where the duty sought to be enforced is discretionary, the following rules apply: [omitted]
>
> 5. No other adequate remedy is available to the applicant...
>
> 6. The order sought will be of some practical value or effect…
>
> 7. The Court in the exercise of its discretion finds no equitable bar to the relief sought…
>
> 8. On a "balance of convenience" an order in the nature of mandamus should (or should not) issue.

B. Criteria at issue in these proceedings

[14] In this case, the Respondent does not challenge criteria 1, 2, 3 (a), 3(b)(i) and 5 and do not address the criterion 4.

[15] Mr. Yassin filed affidavit evidence from himself and from his former counsel, Me Jean-François Harvey.

[16] He essentially asserts that all the mandamus criteria are met and, most notably, that the delay is unreasonable and not properly justified by the Minister.

[17] Relevant to this application, the Minister adduced affidavits from Ms. Julie Bossé to outline the processing of ministerial relief, the recent progress achieved related to the processing of these applications, the Applicant's immigration history and his ministerial relief application.

[18] The Minister essentially responds that (1) Mr. Yassin has no clear right to the performance of the duty; (2) the order sought will not have some practical value or effect; (3) there is an equitable bar to the relief sough; and (4) the balance of convenience does not favour the order of mandamus.

C. Mr. Yassin has a clear right to the performance of the duty

[19] On this point, Mr. Yassin submits that this criterion is met as the delay is unreasonable and unjustified and the timelines cannot be open-ended, as confirmed by the Chief Justice in the Tameh decision.

[20] The Minister responds that (1) there is no evidence that the Minister refused to perform his duty; (2) the short timeframes outlined by Mr. Yassin in his demands were unreasonable and unrealistic given the specific nature of an application for ministerial relief and the in-depth analysis it requires; and (3) Mr. Yassin has not met his burden to prove that the delay in processing his application for relief is unreasonable.

[21] As in most of the case law cited by the parties, the main issue revolves around the determination of whether or not the delay experienced, thus far, has been unreasonable.

[22] The Court determined that three requirements must be met in order for a delay to be considered unreasonable: (1) the delay in question must have been longer than the nature of the process required, prima facie; (2) the applicant and his counsel must not be responsible for the delay; and (3) the authority responsible for the delay must not have provided a satisfactory justification (Conille v Canada (Attorney General), 2003 FCT 613 [Conille] at para 33).

[23] The parties now agree that the computation of the delay starts on June 8, 2015, when Mr. Yassin first requested ministerial relief, and about two years and 10 months have thus elapsed since that date.

[24] It is not disputed that the Applicant and his counsel are not responsible for the delay.

[25] Mr. Yassin submitted case law in support of his assertion that the current delay is unreasonable (Esmaeili-Tarki v Canada (Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness), 2010 FC 697 [Esmaeili-Tarki]; Tameh; Douze).

[26] The Respondent argues that Mr. Yassin has no right to a decision on his application for a ministerial relief because the delay is not prima facie unreasonable. As a general rule, the Respondent submits that delays of less than three years have not been found by the Court to be unreasonable, and also refers to the decisions in Tameh, Esmaeili and Douze.

[27] Furthermore, the Respondent submits he has provided a satisfactory justification for the delay when responding to Mr. Yassin, as “Ministerial relief applications require an in-depth review of a voluminous amount of information and submissions, entailing a complex assessment of many factors. While these applications are generally prioritized for processing in accordance with their year of receipt, other factors such as changes in jurisprudence or legislation, court-mandated timelines, and re-determination orders may also impact file prioritization” (Minister’s Letter dated April 24, 2017, Application Record of the Applicant at p 75).

[28] The Respondent also submits that the evidence adduced show (1) the MRU has taken important measures to improve the efficiency in processing ministerial relief applications by creating the MRU section, adopting new regulations, creating a guide, creating a streamlined application form; (2) significant progress was made in the processing of ministerial relief as per Ms. Julie Bossé's affidavits so that as of January 9, 2018, the pending inventory stood at 277, from 321 in March 2017, and there were approximately 238 applications made prior to Mr. Yassin's.

[29] However, the Court notes that (1) in the Douze case, a delay of less than 3 years was deemed unreasonable in the circumstances, even if the recommendation had already been completed; (2) in the Tameh case, the first 4 years' delay, between 2008 and 2012, was considered to be at the outer limit of what is reasonable (paragraph 8); while (3) in the Esmaeili-Tarki case, a 5-year delay was found unreasonable.

[30] This case law is not entirely conclusive. However, the delays considered occurred before the adoption of the aforementioned new measures described by the Respondent as justification for the delay and, paradoxically, as destined to increase the efficiency of the MRU processing. Furthermore, in Douze a delay of less than three years was considered unreasonable even though the recommendation to the Minister had already been issued, while in this case, said recommendation has not yet been issued.

[31] In fact, it appears nothing at all has been yet done on Mr. Yassin's case since June 8, 2015, and the justification advanced by the Respondent does not assist in understanding why that is so. Furthermore, in Douze and in Esmaeili-Tarki, the Court did not accept as justification for the delay the "many levels of assessment and review" involved nor the institutional reorganization.

[32] Hence, the Court finds the delay unreasonable.

D. The order sought will have some practical value or effect

[33] The Court is satisfied that the order will have some practical value or effect to Mr. Yassin and his family.

E. There is no equitable bar to the relief sough

[34] The Respondent confirmed, in his further memorandum, that the requirement to respect the application queue is not an equitable bar to a mandamus.

F. The balance of convenience favours granting the order of mandamus.

Finally, as to the balance of convenience criteria, the Court finds it favours the Applicant, particularly given the fact that nothing has been submitted to establish that the previous mandamus orders from the Court have in fact created administrative chaos.

G. Processing timeframe submitted by the Applicant

[35] As previously mentioned, at the hearing, Mr. Yassin submitted an updated timeframe for the processing of his application for ministerial relief, almost identical to the one ordered by the Chief Justice in Tameh, and the Court is satisfied that the suggested timeframe is appropriate.

JUDGMENT in IMM-3758-17

THIS COURT'S JUDGMENT is that:

1. The application is granted.
2. The parties shall complete the steps described below within the following timeframes:

    a) Mr. Yassin will have 30 days from the date of this Order to file additional materials and submissions to the MRU to update his file.
    b) Within 120 days thereafter, the CBSA will disclose its proposed draft Ministerial Relief recommendation to Mr. Yassin.
    c) Mr. Yassin will then have 30 days from the date of disclosure of the draft recommendation to provide any further submissions or materials to the MRU.

d) The President of the CBSA will then provide the draft recommendation, together with Mr. Yassin's submissions, to the Minister within 60 days of the receipt of those submissions. Alternatively, in the event that the CBSA's amendments to the recommendation in response to Mr. Yassin's submissions necessitate further disclosure to him, the CBSA will provide an updated recommendation to Mr. Yassin within 45 days of the receipt of such additional submissions. In the latter scenario, Mr. Yassin will then have 30 days to provide any submissions to the CBSA in response to the updated recommendation; and the President of the CBSA would then have 60 days after the receipt of Mr. Yassin's final submissions to provide the recommendation and Mr. Yassin's submissions to the Minister.

e) Within 60 days of receipt of the recommendation and submissions from the President of the CBSA, the Minister will render a decision on Mr. Yassin's application.

f) The Court will retain jurisdiction to deal with any extension or other issues that arise which affect the Court's order.

407 ETR Concession Company Limited v. Registrar of Motor Vehicles
[Indexed as: 407 ETR Concession Co. v. Ontario (Registrar of Motor Vehicles)]

82 O.R. (3d) 703

Ontario Superior Court of Justice, Divisional Court, Carnwath, Lax and Swinton JJ.
November 7, 2005 *
 This judgment was recently brought to the attention of the editors.

Administrative law -- Extraordinary remedies -- Mandamus -- Toll road concession operator giving notice to Registrar of Motor Vehicles of failures to pay tolls -- Registrar having statutory duty to refuse to validate vehicle permit in case of non-payment -- Statutory scheme not providing for review of process by Registrar to ensure that individuals were not wrongly denied plate renewal -- Preconditions existing for order of mandamus requiring Registrar to refuse to validate permits where Registrar had refused to act.

The applicant was the operator of a toll road concession, with the power under the Highway 407 Act, 1998, S.O. 1998, c. 28 to establish, collect and enforce the payment of tolls, fees and interest.

The road in question was an all-electronic, open- access toll road. Persons who used the highway were identified either by the use of cameras that identified licence plates, or through the use of scanners to identify transponders. Where a vehicle was driven on the highway, an obligation to pay a toll and any related fee and interest was imposed upon the person in whose name the plate portion of the vehicle was issued or, if there was a transponder, upon the person to whom the transponder was registered. If tolls, fees and interest were not paid within 90 days of the day a person received Notice of Failure to Pay under s. 16 of the Act, and if the applicant gave notice to the respondent Registrar of Motor Vehicles of that fact, then under s. 22(4) of the Act, the respondent "shall, at the next opportunity, refuse to validate the vehicle permit issued to the person who received the notice of failure to pay under section 16 and refuse to issue a vehicle permit to that person". Section 10 of O. Reg. 138/00 under the Act provides for periodic audits by an independent auditor. In 2004, the Ministry withdrew its approval of the independent auditor on the basis that the auditor was also the applicant's external auditor, and was therefore not independent. The applicant objected, and the decision to withdraw approval was the subject of arbitration between the parties. In the meantime, the auditor continued to perform audits. The applicant sent a number of Notices to Pay to customers who had not paid for the use of the highway and asked the respondent to act in accordance with s. 22(4) and deny plates to the persons in question. The respondent refused to do so until he was satisfied that the applicant had complied with the Act and Regulation and that there would be no wrongful denials of permit validations. The applicant brought an application for judicial review, seeking an order in the nature of mandamus compelling the respondent to refuse to validate or issue plate renewals in response to the Notices.

Held, the application should be granted. [page704]

The Act placed the onus on the user of the road to dispute the obligation to pay, rather than on the applicant to prove an entitlement to pay before delivering an invoice or a s. 16 notice. The Act did not require the applicant to satisfy the respondent that the user was accurately identified; nor did it give the respondent any role in determining whether that was the case. The legislature recognized that there would be instances where plates were misread and notices under s. 16 were improperly delivered, and left this to be determined in the dispute resolution process described in ss. 17 to 21 of the Act. The respondent had no role in this process and no authority to act as a monitor of the enforcement process. Section 22(4) of the Act used mandatory language that did not afford the respondent any discretion. The Regulation imposed additional requirements on the applicant that were designed to provide additional safeguards to the public, but it did not alter the statutory scheme and did not give the respondent the powers he claimed to have. The withdrawal of approval of the auditor was the subject of a dispute that would be determined by arbitration. The Concession and Ground Lease Agreement under which the applicant operated imposed a requirement of continuing performance on the parties to the Agreement and, consistent with that Agreement, the auditor had continued to deliver reports. The respondent had the power to request additional compliance audits, but had not done so. The jurisdictional requirements for mandamus were met.

The respondent's determination of whether alleged conditions precedent to the exercise of his statutory duty had been met was not a finding of fact to which deference had to be granted. A public body's discretion does not extend to defining the limits of its own power. The court's function is to ensure the public body does not make decisions based on a misapprehension of jurisdiction.

While the court had a residual discretion to refuse mandamus, there was no basis for exercising that discretion. The alternative remedies suggested by the respondent -- collection of tolls through collection agencies or court proceedings -- were impracticable. The use of collection agencies would result in a significant percentage loss of tolls collected, and court proceedings would choke the court system. The "public interest in good government" did not support the denial of mandamus on the basis that the public interest was not advanced by allowing the applicant to wrongly place individuals into plate denial". The process established by the Act and Regulation was in the public interest as it provided an effective method of dealing with scofflaws who refused to pay their share, and also provided a dispute mechanism for those tolls imposed in error.

[1] BY THE COURT:-- The applicant, 407 ETR Concession Company Limited ("407 ETR"), applies for judicial review seeking an order in the nature of mandamus compelling the Registrar of Motor Vehicles (the "Registrar") to refuse to validate or issue vehicle permits for those persons who have failed to pay tolls and administrative fees owed to 407 ETR (as listed in Revised Schedule "A" to the Notice of Application). The application requires an understanding of the Highway 407 Act, 1998, S.O. 1998, c. 28 (the "Act") and O. Reg. 138/00 passed under the Act (the "Regulation").

[2] For mandamus to issue, 407 ETR must overcome the following submissions of the Registrar:

(a) There are pre-conditions in the Act of which the Registrar must be satisfied before denying permit validation or issue.

(b) There are pre-conditions in the Regulation of which the Registrar must be satisfied before denying permit validation or issue.

(c) The Ministry of Transportation's withdrawal of its approval of the independent auditor appointed under the Regulation relieves the Registrar from his statutory duty.

(d) The refusal of the Registrar to act requires the court to apply a "standard of review" analysis to his decision. [page706]

(e) The court should exercise its residual discretion. and refuse mandamus.

Background Facts

[3] 407 ETR is the private operator of the Highway 407 toll road concession, pursuant to the authority of the Act and a 99- year Concession and Ground Lease Agreement with the Province of Ontario. Highway 407 is the world's first all-electronic, open-access toll road. Persons who use the highway are identified either by the use of cameras that identify licence plates or through the use of scanners to identify the use of a toll device called a "transponder".

[4] When the highway was first opened in 1997, it was operated by a Crown corporation. In May 1999, the province privatized Highway 407, and 407 ETR became the operator of the highway. The Act defines 407 ETR as the "owner" with the statutory power to establish, collect and enforce the payment of tolls, fees and interest in respect of Highway 407 (s. 14).

[5] When a vehicle is driven on Highway 407, an obligation to pay a toll and any related fee and interest payable under the Act is imposed upon the person in whose name the plate portion of the vehicle is issued or, if there is a transponder, upon the person to whom the transponder is registered (s. 13(1)). Photographic or electronic evidence of the use of Highway 407 is proof, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, of the obligation to pay a toll (s. 13(2)). Section 13(3) of the Act deals with enforcement, stating:

> 13(3) Sections 16 to 25 apply to the enforcement and collection of tolls and related fees and interest payable under this Act by a person described in subsection (1) but do not apply to the enforcement and collection of such tolls, fees and interest if,
>
> (a) the person is responsible for the payment of such tolls, fees and interest under clause (1)(b); and
> (b) the toll device that was affixed to the vehicle in question was obtained without providing information identifying the plate portion of a vehicle permit.

[6] A toll or fee is due and payable on the day that an invoice for these amounts is mailed, delivered or otherwise sent to the person responsible for payment, and interest begins to accrue and is payable 35 days after the invoice is mailed (s. 15). Pursuant to s. 16, the owner may send a notice of failure to pay a toll to the invoiced user if payment is not made within 35 days after the day it is payable. Subsection 16(2) sets out the content of the notice, which must include information that the person may [page707] dispute the matter on the grounds set out in s. 17(1) of the Act, and that if the amount owing is not paid within 90 days of the receipt of the notice, the Registrar may refuse to validate the person's vehicle permit or refuse to issue a vehicle permit to the person.

[7] A dispute is determined in the first instance by 407 ETR. If the dispute is unsuccessful, the owner must give notice to the person of the right to appeal to a dispute arbitrator on the grounds set out in s. 17(1) (see s. 17(6)). Sections 18 through 19 deal with appeals.

[8] If a toll, related fees and interest are not paid within 90 days of the day a person receives a Notice of Failure to Pay under s. 16, 407 ETR may give notice to the Registrar of that fact and must also inform the person who received the Notice of Failure to Pay of the fact that notice has been provided to the Registrar under s. 22 of the Act (ss. 22(1) and (3)). Subsections 22(4) through (7) deal with the Registrar and read:

> 22(4) If the Registrar of Motor Vehicles receives notice under subsection (1), he or she shall, at the next opportunity, refuse to validate the vehicle permit issued to the person who received the notice of failure to pay under section 16 and refuse to issue a vehicle permit to that person.
> (5) The Registrar of Motor Vehicles may act under subsection (4) even though the person who received the notice of failure to pay under section 16 has disputed his or her obligation to pay under section 17 or has appealed a decision of the owner under section 19.

(6) If notice has been given to the Registrar of Motor Vehicles under subsection (1) and the toll and related fees and interest are subsequently paid, the owner shall immediately notify the Registrar of the payment.

(7) If the Registrar of Motor Vehicles is notified by the owner that the toll, fees and interest have been paid or is notified by the dispute arbitrator that the person is not responsible for paying the toll, fees and interest, the Registrar shall,

(a) validate any vehicle permit that he or she refused to validate under subsection (4);

(b) issue a vehicle permit to a person if it was refused under subsection (4).

[9] After privatization in May 1999, the Registrar acted on s. 22 notices and refused to issue or validate vehicle permits to those who owed a debt to 407 ETR until the debt was paid. However, with the increasing popularity of the highway, 407 ETR was unable to deal effectively with customer service inquiries; as well, the computer system, sold as part of the privatization, lacked the capacity to generate information required to support customer service issues. Moreover, the billing and enforcement systems [page708] were generating erroneous plate denial requests. Some initiatives were implemented to resolve these issues, but as licence plate denial was in effect, this attracted further customer complaints, which could not be resolved due to inadequate staffing and customer service infrastructure.

[10] On February 24, 2000, 407 ETR and the Ministry of Transportation (the "Ministry") entered into a Temporary Suspension Agreement, in which they agreed to suspend temporarily the operation of licence plate denial while the customer service issues were being addressed, without prejudice to the rights of either side under the Act. Pursuant to the agreement, 407 ETR undertook not to submit any new requests for plate denial to the Registrar until certain customer service and dispute resolution initiatives were implemented. In addition, 407 ETR withdrew all s. 22 notices already forwarded to the Registrar.

[11] On the same day, the Ministry filed O. Reg. 138/00 (the "Regulation") to implement certain changes to the licence plate denial process. Part of the regulation dealt with the sending of notices (ss. 1-5). Under the heading "Additional Procedures for the Owner in Enforcing Payment of Tolls", new obligations were imposed on 407 ETR with respect to confirming customer addresses (s. 6) and appeal procedures (s. 7). In addition, s. 8 imposed an obligation on 407 ETR to send a certificate signed by a senior company official, at the time of sending a s. 22 notice of failure to pay to the Registrar, which includes the following assurances:

(a) the tolls and related fees and interest that are the subject of the notice have not been paid or been deemed, by subsection 17(7) of the Act, to have been paid;

(b) the notice of failure to pay required by s. 16 of the Act in respect of such tolls, fees and interest was sent in accordance with the Act, this Regulation and the terms and conditions of any agreement between the owner and the Crown in right of Ontario; and

(c) the notice being sent under subsection 22(1) of the Act with the certificate is being sent in accordance with this Act, this Regulation and the terms and conditions of any agreement between the owner and the Crown in right of Ontario.

[12] In addition, the owner is to advise the Registrar if a person could not be considered to have received a failure to pay notice under s. 16 of the Act (s. 9). The owner is also required to withdraw any s. 22 notices sent to the Registrar if there was an error [page709] in the Notice of Failure to Pay or if the tolls, fees and interest have been paid or deemed to have been paid.

[13] Finally, s. 10 of the Regulation provides for periodic audits by an independent auditor. It reads as follows:

> 10(1) The owner shall appoint a chartered accountant or certified general accountant who is approved by the Ministry of Transportation as an independent auditor to conduct audits of the owner and to submit the reports of the audits to the owner and to the Registrar of Motor Vehicles.
>
> (2) The independent auditor shall review the owner's compliance, with respect to the enforcement of tolls, fees and interest, with the Act, this Regulation, the terms and conditions of any agreement between the owner and the Crown in right of Ontario and the terms and conditions of any agreement between the owner, the dispute arbitrator and the Crown in right of Ontario.
>
> (3) The independent auditor shall conduct random audits of the owner, at least once every three months, and shall also conduct an audit of the owner at any time if the Registrar of Motor Vehicles, believing on reasonable grounds that there may have been a lack of compliance as described in subsection
> (2), requests an additional audit.
>
> (4) Upon request, the owner shall provide the independent auditor with a certificate, and the supporting documentation, prepared under section 8.
> (5) The fees and expenses of the independent auditor shall be paid by the owner.

[14] In accordance with the Temporary Suspension Agreement, 407 ETR implemented customer service and dispute resolution initiatives. In the period after the agreement was made, 407 ETR and the Ministry held meetings and corresponded on many occasions with respect to the reinstatement of licence plate denial.

[15] In 2001, the Ministry approved the appointment of Arthur Andersen LLP as the independent auditor on two conditions:
first, the accountants performing the audits would not reside on the premises of 407 ETR, and second, the particular accountants performing the audit would not be engaged in any other audit capacity with 407 ETR. These conditions were imposed because Arthur Andersen was the co-auditor of the financial statements of 407 ETR. The Ministry's approval was continued on the same conditions with respect to Deloitte & Touche LLP after it acquired Arthur Andersen LLP in June, 2002. There is no evidence that these conditions have not been fulfilled.

[16] On November 1, 2002, 407 ETR began issuing s. 16 notices of a failure to pay to customers who had not paid for the use of Highway 407. Then on August 7, 2003, 407 ETR sent ten s. 22 [page710] Notices and the certificate required by the Regulation to the Registrar and asked that the Registrar act in accordance with s. 22(4) and deny the plates. Each of the ten was among the most flagrant abusers of the open access system. Although not required to do so, 407 ETR requested that the independent auditor examine each of the ten accounts in order to ensure the required compliance with the Act, the Regulation and the applicable agreements. The Registrar was informed that the auditor had done this and had concluded that 407 ETR was in compliance with its obligations. 407 ETR also undertook other quality control procedures when it first began to submit plate denial notices, such as calling each customer to ensure that he or she had actually been on Highway 407.

[17] While correspondence was received from the Deputy Minister stating that the province had not agreed to re-instate plate denial, no reply was received from the Registrar. 407 ETR continued to send s. 22 notices to the Registrar, along with audit reports. Those reports were based on an examination of each of the s. 22 notices by the auditor. In a letter to the Registrar dated November 12, 2003, Ken Walker of 407 ETR indicated that the s. 22 notices targeted the most flagrant abusers of Highway 407.

[18] On December 15, 2003, the Registrar, Frank D'Onofrio, wrote to 407 ETR, stating that it was a pre-condition to a notice being sent under s. 22(1) of the Act that the amounts in it are outstanding as of the date the notice is sent and that 407 ETR has procedurally complied with the Act and the Regulation. He went on to say:

> In order to independently determine whether 407 ETR is able to meet all of the requirements of the legislation and the regulations pertaining to the plate denial process, I will shortly be initiating a review of the 407 ETR's systems and processes including the information related to the notices sent to the Registrar.
>
> Until I am satisfied that 407 ETR has complied with all of the requirements of the Highway 407 Act, 1998 and Ontario Regulation 138/00, I will not be in a position to satisfy myself that I have jurisdiction to carry out the requested refusal to validate the vehicle permits of those persons persuant [sic] to a notice sent to me under s. 22(1) of the Highway 407 Act, 1998.

[19] 407 ETR made a direct demand that the Registrar act on January 12, 2004. The Registrar refused to act in a letter dated January 19, 2004, where he stated that:

> . . . prior to acting under s. 22(4) of the Highway 407 Act I believe under the circumstances that I am obliged to make reasonable inquiries to satisfy myself that the notice and requirements precedent to my suspending drivers' licences, have been complied with. [page711]
>
> Accordingly, I am not yet in a position to refuse to validate vehicle permits pursuant to the Highway 407 Act.

[20] On the same date, the Ministry, acting through Bruce McCuaig, Assistant Deputy Minister, withdrew its approval of Deloitte & Touche as the independent auditor, stating,

> We understand that Deloitte & Touche are 407 ETR's external auditors. Clearly, Deloitte & Touche is not independent as required under the Regulation.

[21] 407 ETR objected and the dispute over the Ministry's decision to withdraw its approval is to be the subject of arbitration between the parties under the Ground Lease Agreement. 407 ETR has continued to use Deloitte & Touche to perform audits, based on a sampling of accounts since January 2004. The audit of 407 ETR's enforcement systems and processes is presently a process audit that involves sampling a number of items so as to provide a confidence level for the auditor that the error rate in the population does not exceed a certain error rate. In his sampling, the auditor compares the Notice of Failure to Pay and the s. 22 notice to see that it reflects the same account as that on the regular invoice. While the auditor has been using a 90 per cent confidence level and a 3 per cent error rate, the Registrar and the Ministry, in discussions with 407 ETR, have sought a higher confidence level and a lower error rate.

[22] In a chart of audits prepared by the auditor between August 2003 and July 2004, each of the audits reflected in the chart actually achieved confidence levels at or higher than 95 per cent and error rates at or lower then 1.5 per cent. In each audit, the auditor has stated:

2556 In our opinion 407 ETR Concession Company Limited is in compliance, in all material respects, with the criteria established by the above Acts, Regulation, agreements and interpretation with regard to the issuance of Section 22 Notices as at [the relevant date of the audit].

[23] Although the Registrar has the authority pursuant to s. 10(3) of the Regulation to request an additional independent audit on reasonable grounds, he has never exercised this power.

The Law of Mandamus

[24] 407 ETR seeks mandamus. There are four jurisdictional requirements for mandamus, as described by Laidlaw J.A. in Karavos v. Toronto (City), 1947 CanLII 326 (ON CA), [1948] 3 D.L.R. 294, [1948] O.W.N. 17 (C.A.), at p. 297 D.L.R., p. 3 (QL): [page712]

(1) The applicant must demonstrate "a clear legal right to have the thing sought by it done, and done in the manner and by the person sought to be coerced".

(2) The duty must be due and incumbent on the official at the time the relief is sought.

(3) The duty must be purely ministerial in nature -- in other words, "plainly incumbent upon an officer by operation of law or by virtue of his office, and concerning which he possesses no discretionary powers".

(4) There must be a demand and a refusal to perform the act which the applicant seeks to have ordered.

[25] In this case, the court must determine whether 407 ETR has met the requirements for mandamus and whether the court should exercise its discretion to grant the remedy sought.

(a) The alleged pre-conditions in the Act

[26] The Registrar submits that the Act, and in particular, s. 13, imposes an obligation on 407 ETR to ensure a match between an invoice sent to a user and the licence plate that actually travelled on the highway, so that users are not incorrectly denied a licence plate renewal.

[27] As noted above, the purpose of the Act was to privatize the operation of Highway 407 and, given its open-access character, to provide the owner an effective method of toll collection. The legislature recognized that plate denial is a necessary feature of an open-access toll highway given the exceptionally large number of transactions, the small balances and the cost of other means of debt collection. Contrary to the submissions of the Registrar, the Act places the onus on the user to dispute the obligation to pay, rather than on the owner to prove an entitlement to pay before delivering an invoice or a s. 16 notice.

[28] Section 13 of the Act imposes a mandatory obligation to pay on the highway user, who is identified either by licence plate or by transponder. Under s. 15, a toll or fee is payable on the day an invoice is mailed, delivered or sent to the person described in s. 13. The Act does not require the owner to satisfy the Registrar the user is accurately identified. Neither does the Act give the Registrar any function to perform in the operation of these sections.

[29] Sections 16 to 25 of the Act describe the process by which tolls and other charges are collected and enforced. They place the [page713] onus for disputing payment and proving that the debt is not owed on the recipient of the s. 16 Notice of Failure to Pay. The Act is explicit that a recipient of the notice is expected to pay the charge (or have his or her licence plate renewal denied) even if a dispute is pending. If the dispute is successful, the Act requires 407 ETR to reimburse the recipient of the notice with interest. There is a right to appeal the determination of a dispute to an independent dispute arbitrator appointed by the Lieutenant- Governor-in-Council (s. 18). These sections of the Act provide a comprehensive code of dispute resolution and do not involve the Registrar.

[30] The Act provides that a person may dispute the obligation to pay if the person who has received notice under s. 16 is not the person responsible for the payment of the toll under s. 13. By including this as a statutory ground of dispute, the legislature recognized there would be instances where plates are misread and notices under s. 16 are improperly delivered. The legislature has left this to be determined in the dispute resolution process described in ss. 17 to 21. The Registrar has no role in this process.

[31] Further, the dispute resolution process provides safeguards and remedies that satisfy the Registrar's concerns. These include the payment without prejudice provision in s. 17(3); the lengthy notice period of 90 days before a s. 22 notice may be sent to the Registrar (ss. 22(1) and (3)); the requirement that the owner respond within 30 days to a notice of dispute or forfeit its entitlement to be paid (s. 17(7)); and the owner's obligation under s. 22(6) to immediately notify the Registrar of payment, if a s. 22 notice has been previously sent.

[32] Under s. 22(5), the Registrar has the power to refuse to issue or renew a vehicle permit notwithstanding a dispute or appeal. The legislature could have limited or suspended the Registrar's power until the determination of a dispute or appeal. By removing the Registrar from this process and allowing him to act despite a dispute or appeal, the legislature recognized, as with erroneous invoices and s. 16 notices, that there could also be erroneous plate denials. In this event, the Registrar's only role upon being notified of an error or of payment is to rectify this by validating or issuing a vehicle permit that he had refused.

[33] The Act imposes statutory requirements on 407 ETR and on the Registrar as part of the licence plate denial scheme, but the Registrar has no authority to act as a monitor of the enforcement process. The Act prescribes a limited and strictly administrative role for the Registrar. Only s. 22, and [page714] specifically s. 22(4) and (5), prescribe the statutory duty and power of the Registrar.

[34] Subsection 22(4) of the Act uses mandatory language that does not afford the Registrar any discretion. Once the Registrar receives a notice under subsection (1), he or she "shall, at the next opportunity" refuse to validate a vehicle permit or to issue a vehicle permit to the person named in the notice.

[35] The golden rule of literal construction provides that a statute be interpreted in a manner consistent with the plain meaning of its terms (R. v. McIntosh, 1995 CanLII 124 (SCC), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 686, [1995] S.C.J. No. 16, at para. 18). Moreover, s. 29(2) of the Interpretation Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.11 provides:

> 29(2) In the English version of an Act, the word "shall" shall be construed as imperative and the word "may" as permissive.

[36] We find s. 22(4) of the Act obliges the Registrar to act when he receives a notice under s. 22(1). However, s. 65(b) of the Act permits the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council to pass regulations "respecting additional procedures to be used by the owner for enforcing payment of tolls on Highway 407". Regulation 138/00 has added further procedures with respect to enforcement, to which we now turn.

(b) The alleged pre-conditions in the Regulation

[37] The Regulation requires 407 ETR:

(1) To provide the Registrar with a certificate of compliance with the Act prepared by a senior corporate officer (s. 8);

(2) To notify the Registrar at any time of an error in the s. 16 notice or of payment (s. 9); and

(3) To appoint an independent auditor satisfactory to the Ministry of Transportation (s. 10).

[38] The Registrar submits the Regulation was intended to reduce erroneous plate denials by giving him the right to examine the owner's compliance with the Act and Regulation. He submits that as an "end user" of the compliance certificate required by s. 8 and the audit reports required by s. 10(3), the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council intended the Registrar to have an oversight role, in order to safeguard the public from erroneous plate denial. The Registrar submits he has a discretion to "go behind" the compliance certificate and require a "proper" audit report that virtually guarantees the recipient of the s. 16 notice is the actual user of the highway. [page715]

[39] We accept that the Regulation intends to provide greater scrutiny of the collection and enforcement process under the Act, with a view to minimizing erroneous plate denial. We reject the submission that the Regulation gives the Registrar the discretions he purports to exercise.

[40] Section 9 of the Regulation requires 407 ETR to advise the Registrar at any time if a person ought not to have received a notice under s. 16 of the Act due to error, payment, or 407 ETR's failure to comply with the Act and Regulation. At the same time, the owner must withdraw the s. 22 notice and request that the Registrar "not take the actions he or she would otherwise be required to take under subsection 22(4)". By this section, the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council has placed the onus on 407 ETR to withdraw an improper s. 22 notice. This is consistent with the general scheme of plate denial and consistent with the intention of the Act that the mere delivery of the s. 22 notice triggers the Registrar's duty to act. The Registrar must act unless the s. 22 notice is withdrawn. This is consistent with the mandatory language of "shall" in s. 22(4).

[41] Section 8 of the Regulation requires 407 ETR to deliver to the Registrar with the s. 22 notice, a certificate from a senior corporate officer stating that the owner has complied with its duties under the Act. Thus, the Regulation augments the statutory pre-condition of notice under s. 22(1). Section 8 prescribes the context of the certificate of compliance, which is to be "in a form satisfactory to the Registrar". The discretion is limited to the "form" of the certificate; the use of such language in this context reinforces the lack of any broader discretion given to the Registrar by this section. The Registrar takes no issue with the form of certificates that 407 ETR has delivered since August 7, 2003, but submits that, as the recipient of the certificate, he is entitled to have some degree of confidence that the certificate is accurate. The Regulation does not give him this authority. Instead, it contemplates in s. 10 that an independent auditor will monitor accuracy through regular and random audits, performed at least quarterly.

[42] The auditor's function under s. 10(2) is to review 407 ETR's compliance with "the enforcement of tolls, fees and interest". It follows that no audit can be conducted until the company has actually sent invoices, s. 16 notices and s. 22 notices. Clearly, the audits are to be conducted within an operational licence plate denial scheme. The content of the audit report and methodology of the auditor cannot therefore be a pre-condition to the Registrar's duty under s. 22(4) as he contends. The Regulation explicitly requires the independent auditor, not the Registrar, to perform this role. [page716]

[43] The Regulation does not give the Registrar authority to impose his standards on an independent auditor. This would defeat the intent of an independent audit. If it were intended that audit standards were to be left to the subjective discretion of individual Registrars, different language would have been used. Further, unlike s. 8(1) where the Registrar is given limited discretion to be satisfied of the form of the certificate of compliance, s. 10 has no similar language.

[44] The Registrar's duty to act is distinct from the obligation imposed by s. 10(3) of the Regulation with respect to quarterly reports from an independent auditor. The Registrar is given the authority to request at any time an additional audit if, on reasonable grounds, he believes 407 ETR is not in compliance with s. 10(2). He has never exercised this power.

> (c) The Ministry of Transportation's withdrawal of its approval of the independent auditor

[45] The Registrar has a duty to refuse to issue and renew vehicle permits upon receipt of s. 22(1) notices and s. 8 certificates of compliance from 407 ETR. Did this change after January 19, 2004, when the Ministry of Transportation withdrew approval of the independent auditor?

[46] The withdrawal of approval is the subject of a dispute that will be determined by arbitration. The Registrar argues, however, that the appointment of an independent auditor is a condition precedent to the exercise of his statutory duty. Since there no longer is one, the argument runs, he is not obliged to deny plate renewal or issue. This is not an answer to the notices delivered before January 19, 2004. Notices delivered after January 19, 2004, remain valid because there is no statutory language connecting the receipt of a quarterly audit report with the Registrar's statutory duty described in s. 22(4). If 407 ETR fails to comply with the independent audit requirements, it is the province, as opposed to the Registrar, that may initiate a dispute under the Concession and Ground Lease Agreement. This is precisely what happened.

[47] Article 25 of the Highway 407 Concession and Ground Lease Agreement deals with dispute resolution. Article 25.12(a) provides:

25.12 Continuing Performance

> (a) At all times, notwithstanding the existence of any dispute, the Grantor and the Concessionaire shall continue to perform their respective obligations in accordance with the provisions of this Agreement without prejudice to the right to contest, dispute and [page717] challenge the relevant matter in accordance with the provisions of this Agreement. For example, in the event of a dispute with respect to the reasonableness of any Approval by the Grantor, the Concessionaire shall comply with such decision but shall have the right to submit the question of reasonableness to the Arbitrator pursuant to this Article 25.

[48] Article 25.12 imposes a requirement of continuing performance on the parties to the Agreement. Consistent with this provision, the independent auditor has continued to deliver quarterly reports. In our view, this is contemplated by the Regulation and by the Agreement. Otherwise, there would be no audit reports pending the determination of the dispute, although the Regulation requires them.

[49] Finally, as a matter of statutory interpretation, regulations are a form of subordinate legislation. The provisions of the Regulation dealing with the independent audit do not derogate from the mandatory intention expressed by the legislature in s. 22(4) of the Act. To the extent of any conflict, the statutory provision prevails. The Registrar's interpretation of the statutory scheme and of his powers relies primarily on the alleged intention of the legislature and the Regulation. Since this intention cannot be reconciled with the explicit mandatory language of s. 22(4), his interpretation cannot prevail. (See Ruth Sullivan, Driedger on the Construction of Statutes, 3rd ed. (Toronto: Butterworths, 1994) at pp. 185-56, 246.)

[50] In summary, we reject the Registrar's argument that the Regulation grants him a "significant role" by making him the recipient of a compliance certificate and the audit report. There is no language granting additional powers to the Registrar other than the right to be satisfied with the form of the compliance certificate and to request an additional audit if he reasonably believes there has been a lack of compliance.

[51] The Regulation imposes additional requirements on 407 ETR that are designed to provide additional safeguards to the public, but they do not alter the statutory scheme, nor cloak the Registrar with the powers he claims to have under the Regulation. The Act and Regulation are explicit in defining only two requirements for triggering the Registrar's duty to act: delivery of a notice under s. 22(1) of the Act and delivery of a certificate from a senior corporate officer under s. 8 of the Regulation.

[52] For the foregoing reasons, we find the jurisdictional requirements for mandamus as set out in para. 24 above, have been met. [page718]

(d) Does the refusal of the Registrar to act require a "standard of review" analysis?

[53] The Registrar submits that his determination of whether alleged conditions precedent to the exercise of his statutory duty have been met, is a finding of fact to which deference must be granted. We reject this submission. As far back as 1968, the Inquiry into Civil Rights conducted by former Chief Justice McRuer stated the law as follows:

> Where a statute provides that a tribunal has power to make a decision, if facts, A, B aud C exist, a court, on judicial review of a purported exercise of power by the tribunal, may determine whether the facts existed or not. If the court finds that the facts existed, the decision of the tribunal will be upheld as authorized. If the court finds that the facts did not exist, the decision will be quashed. The power of the tribunal to decide never arose and its purported exercise was unauthorized.

Royal Commission: Inquiry into Civil Rights (Commissioner: Honourable James Chalmers McRuer, LL.D), vol. 1 (1968) at p. 250.

[54] The question of whether pre-conditions exist before a public official must carry out an action directed by a statute is not governed by "findings of fact" made by that official. A public body's discretion does not extend to defining the limits of its own power. It is the court's function to ensure the public body does not make decisions based on a misapprehension of jurisdiction.

[55] Thus, where the Ontario Energy Board issued a gas distribution ruling, two major gas distributors appealed, alleging lack of jurisdiction in the Board. The Ontario Court of Appeal agreed with the Divisional Court that the standard of review was correctness. The Board's view of its jurisdiction to issue the disputed ruling was accorded no deference and the standard of correctness was applied. Enbridge Gas Distribution Inc. v. Ontario Energy Board (2005), 2005 CanLII 250 (ON CA), 74 O.R. (3d) 147, [2005] O.J. No. 33 (C.A.).

[56] The law does not permit the Registrar to ascribe to himself certain discretionary powers and then to conduct an analysis of the pragmatic and functional approach to shield his action from judicial scrutiny. To describe his actions as "findings of fact" adds nothing. The pragmatic and functional analysis is never engaged.

Should the Court Exercise its Residual Discretion and Refuse Mandamus?

[57] The Registrar is correct in submitting the court has a residual discretion to refuse mandamus. Judicial Review Procedure Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. J.1, s. 2(1). [page719]

[58] In exercising that discretion, the court can decide whether, and what sort of, a remedy should be granted. But the court does not, any more than the government, have the power to suspend the operation of a public statute that is fully enforced by operation of law. Algonquin Wildlands League v. Ontario (Minister of Natural Resources), [1998] O.J. No. 419, 110 O.A.C. 201 (Div. Ct.), vard on other points in 1998 CanLII 5756 (ON CA), [1998] O.J. No. 4331, 117 O.A.C. 174 (C.A.).

[59] The Registrar further submits the court may consider:

(a) the existence of alternative remedies;

(b) the public interest in good government;

(c) the balance of convenience; and

(d) the potential consequences of the order.

The Registrar derives these principles from a reading of Apotex Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1993 CanLII 3004 (FCA), [1993] F.C.J. No. 1098, [1994] 1 F.C. 742 (C.A.), affd 1994 CanLII 47 (SCC), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 1100, [1994] S.C.J. No. 113. While the above categories may not be set out in Apotex exactly as submitted by the Registrar, we are content to use them for purposes of our analysis.

(a) The existence of alternative remedies

[60] The Registrar submits the owner can achieve collection of tolls by other means, i.e., collection agencies or court proceedings. We reject this submission. The use of collection agencies would result in a significant percentage loss of tolls collected; we take judicial notice of the fact that collection agencies seldom, if ever, act without fee. Court proceedings would choke the court system, particularly Small Claims Court. Between November 1, 2002 and June 30, 2004, 531,350 s. 16 notices were issued. It does not take a febrile imagination to conclude court action is not a useful alternative.

(b) Public interest in good government

[61] The Registrar submits the public interest is not advanced by allowing 407 ETR to "wrongly place individuals into plate denial". We reject the suggestion that the owner is "allowed" to wrongly place individuals into plate denial. The Act and Regulation recognize there will inevitably be errors underlying the issue of a certain number of toll notices. In its wisdom, the government has placed the onus of disputing the toll notices on the recipient of the notice, with the penalty of plate denial [page720] applied until the dispute process is complete. We find this process is in the public interest for two reasons: it provides an effective method of dealing with scofflaws who refuse to pay their share and also provides a dispute mechanism for those tolls imposed in error.

[62] The residual discretion to refuse mandamus is an answer to the Registrar's in terrorem submission that, were we to accept the owner's arguments, the Registrar would be forced into plate denial, even where the owner had flagrantly ignored the requirements of the Act and Regulation. Were such to happen, the residual discretion is available to the court to respond by refusing mandamus in the name of the public interest and good government.

(c) The balance of convenience

[63] The Registrar made no submissions on this head. Since we take the view the Registrar had no discretion to refuse plate denial, the balance of convenience does not involve the owner and the plate holders, as alleged by the Registrar. If the balance of convenience has any application, which we doubt, it would be between the Registrar and the owner. The balance of convenience clearly favours the owner.

(d) The potential consequences of the order

[64] The Registrar made no submissions on this head. We find the potential consequences of the order are those envisaged by the legislature when it passed the Act and Regulation -- that is, an effective method by which to collect the tolls from users unwilling to pay and a dispute mechanism to relieve from payment those tolls issued in error.

[65] For the foregoing reasons, we order as follows:

> We order the Registrar to comply with his statutory obligation to refuse to validate or issue vehicle permits for those persons, as listed in the Revised Schedule "A" to the Notice of Application, who have failed to pay tolls and administrative fees owed to 407 ETR and with respect to whom a s. 22 Notice and Certificate under the Act have been delivered to the Registrar.

[66] The parties have 30 days to make brief written submissions as to costs.

Application granted.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

LAIDLAW J.A.:—This is an appeal by the Corporation of the City of Toronto and its Inspector of Buildings, Kenneth S. Gillies, from an order made by Barlow J. in Chambers on September 9, 1947, upon a motion by way of originating notice (specific parts of the order in appeal as follows:

"1. It is Ordered that the said Kenneth Stevenson Gillies, Inspector of Buildings for The City of Toronto, do forthwith proceed with and complete the examination of the Plaintiff's plans and specifications for the addition to and the alteration or repair of premises number 113 Carlton Street, Toronto, and being premises known as 'Atalanta Hotel' filed with the said Kenneth Stevenson Gillies.

"2. AND IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the said Defendants Kenneth Stevenson Gillies as such Inspector and as Commissioner of Buildings and The Corporation of The City of Toronto do forthwith hereafter issue to the Plaintiff the necessary building permit for the said additions, alterations and repairs provided the said plans and specifications be found to comply or are made to comply with the requirements of By-law 9868 of The Corporation of The City of Toronto and Amendments thereto in the case of an existing hotel of ordinary construction."

Ont. C.A. KAPLAN v. TORONTO AND GILLIES. Latchford J.A.

The only material filed in support of the motion is an affidavit of the respondent, and it is of importance to refer in some detail to the contents of it. After stating that he is the owner of the lands and premises at the north-west corner of Carlton and Jarvis Sts., Toronto, and that he operates in the said premises a hotel business under the name of Atalanta Hotel, the respondent says that he purchased the property about a year before, and that for many years prior to the purchase a hotel had been operated on the premises under the same name. A description of the premises and of the accommodation provided in them is set forth. He says that he decided to remodel the premises and to increase the size of them, and states in para. 4 of the affidavit "For that purpose I employed William S. Hall an engineer practising his profession in Toronto and familiar with such matters, to prepare for me the necessary plans and specifications for the said alterations and additions, and to obtain for me the necessary permit for the purpose". Paragraph 5 of the affidavit proceeds as follows: "Pursuant to my instructions, the said Hall prepared the said plans and specifications and submitted same to the defendant Gillies who is the Commissioner of Buildings for his Co-defendant, and I am informed by the said Hall and verily believe, that the said plans and specifications were prepared so as to comply with the requirements of By-law 16653 of the defendant The Corporation of The City of Toronto." That by-law was passed on July 24, 1946, "to amend By-law 9868 respecting additions to hotels", and in the affidavit of the respondent he quotes the requirements as contained in the amending by-law relating to the increase in size of "any existing hotel of ordinary construction". He next produces as an exhibit to his affidavit a notice dated March 21, 1947 from Mr.

Commissioner of Buildings. That notice, under the heading "Examiner's Notice" and directed to the applicant is, in part, as follows:

"Application, plans and specifications for the work referred to above do not conform with the By-laws of the City of Toronto, as follows:—

"This Department has been advised by the Liquor Licence Board of Ontario that the premises at the above address is not a standard hotel. Therefore, I must advise that every such building proposed to be used or altered for use as an hotel is required by By-law No. 9868 to be built of fire-resisting construction throughout.

"Further examination of your plans cannot be proceeded with until same have been altered to comply with the requirements of By-law No. 9868."

The respondent then deposes that after that notice from the Commissioner of Buildings was received by him, he had his solicitor interview the Commissioner. He outlines further efforts to obtain a permit and states that the Inspector of Buildings continues to refuse to grant one to him. He produces as an exhibit a copy of By-law No. 9868, and he refers particularly to the definition therein of "hotel". He also produces as exhibits to his affidavit a copy of a plan of the building as it was at the time the affidavit was made and a copy of the plan of the proposed alterations and additions thereto. Finally, he says: "I am desirous that a mandatory order be granted by this Court directing the Defendant Gillies to proceed with the examination of the said plans and to grant a permit for the said alterations and additions, provided same are found to comply with the requirements of said By-law in the case of an existing Hotel or directing the Defendant The Corporation of The City of Toronto to have the Defendant Gillies proceed accordingly."

In answer to the motion there are two affidavits made by the Commissioner of Buildings. In the one first made, dated July 25, 1947, it is set forth, inter alia, that By-law No. 9868 was approved by an order of the Ontario Municipal Board pursuant to a statutory enactment of the Ontario Legislature passed in 1939 and being c. 72, s. 5. He quotes s. 7 (1) of c. 34 of the by-law as it was before the amendment was made thereto by By-law No. 16863 dated July 24, 1946. He points out the changes made by the amendment. The Commissioner of Buildings then states that he does not consider that the building owned by the applicant at the south-west corner of Jarvis and Carlton Sts. in the City of Toronto constitutes an existing hotel, and he gives his reason for that opinion. He proposes to express a further view that all of the buildings owned by the applicant are not comprised in his hotel but only part thereof, and that, in either view, as expressed, the applicant's plans would have to provide for existing buildings being made fire-resisting. In para. 9 of the affidavit the Commissioner of Buildings states that while he has not examined the plans in detail, it is apparent to him that the provisions for exits as required by By-law No. 10653 are most inadequate, and he sets out objections to the plans.

Ont. C.A. KARAVOS & TORONTO AND GELDER. LACOUR C.J.A.

The second affidavit, made by the Commissioner of Buildings on August 21, 1947, to supplement the first one made by him, does not contain material to which I need make particular reference.

It is well to refer at the outset to certain fundamental and well-understood rules and principles relating to the remedy by mandamus. It is properly called and recognized as an extraordinary one, and it is not granted by the Court if an applicant for it has any other adequate remedy. The object and purpose of it is to supply the want of other legal remedies. It is appropriate to overcome the inaction or misconduct of persons charged with the performance of duties of a public nature. The complaining party must, however, clearly establish the right which it is sought to protect, and an order is never granted in doubtful cases: Hich's Extraordinary Legal Remedies, 3rd ed., p. 12, art. 9. I do not attempt an exhaustive summary of the principles upon which the Court proceeds on an application for mandamus, but I shall briefly state certain of them bearing particularly on the case presently under consideration. Before the remedy can be given "the applicant for it must show (1) 'a clear legal right to have the thing sought by it done, and done in the manner and by the person sought to be compelled'": High op. cit., p. 13, art. 9; p. 15, art. 10, (2) "The duty whose performance it is sought to coerce by mandamus must be actually due and incumbent upon the officer at the time of seeking the relief, and the writ will not lie to compel the doing of an act which he is not yet under obligation to perform": ibid., supra, p. 44, art. 26. (3) That duty must be purely ministerial in nature. "Plainly incumbent upon an officer by operation of law or by virtue of his office, and concerning which he possesses no discretionary powers": ibid., supra, p. 92, art. 30. (4) There must be a demand and refusal to perform the act which it is sought to coerce by legal remedy: ibid., supra, p. 18, art. 13.

The work of remodelling the premises by the alterations and additions as proposed by the respondent, is undoubtedly within the scope and application of the provisions of By-law No. 9805. That by-law expressly provides, in c. 4, s. 2, that: "No such work shall be commenced and no person shall proceed with any such work until a permit therefor has been first obtained from the Inspector of Buildings." The procedure to be followed and the requirements which must be fulfilled before a permit can be obtained plainly appear from the provisions of the by-law. I summarize them from ss. 3 and 4, c. 1, thereof as follows: (1) There must be an application for a permit, typewritten on official forms, in duplicate; (2) the information required to complete the application forms must be given clearly and fully by the applicant and must include the probable cost of the proposed work; (3) the correctness of the information supplied in the application must be verified by a statutory declaration; (4) drawings, including stress sheets when required, and specifications, sufficient to enable the Inspector of Buildings to obtain full and complete information as to the extent and character of the proposed work, must be submitted, in duplicate, by the applicant; (5) a block plan, showing certain specific information, must also be submitted, in triplicate, by the applicant; (6) in addition to the block plan, the applicant must submit a plan of survey, in duplicate, certified by an Ontario Land Surveyor, and showing certain information also specified in the by-law.

KARAVOS v. TORONTO AND HILLIS.
LAIDLAW J.A.

When those requirements of the by-law have been fulfilled, it becomes the duty of the Inspector of Buildings to examine the application, drawings, specifications and block plan or survey. That duty is an imperative one in such circumstances and is not attended with the exercise of an element of discretion. It is therefore for performance, and a refusal to perform it in compliance with a demand made upon him to do so would, no doubt, entitle an applicant to the aid of the Court by a mandamus directed to the Inspector of Buildings, but I can find nothing in the by-law imposing an obligation on the Inspector of Buildings to make examination of plans or specifications or of any one or more of the documents required from the applicant for a permit unless and until all of them have been furnished together with the application in the form and manner specified in the by-law. I think that there is no duty on the Inspector of Buildings to make the examination contemplated by the by-law until the application and all specified documents required in connection therewith have been supplied in complete and proper form. It is then and then only that a duty is actually incumbent on the Inspector of Buildings and due for performance by him. It may be that in practice the Inspector of Buildings sometimes, and possibly frequently, makes an examination of plans before an application for a permit is fully completed in accordance with the by-laws. There is no material before the Court to show whether that is or is not a fact but, even if it were so, it does not establish a legal obligation or duty on the part of the Inspector of Buildings to make an examination. The applicant for a permit has no legal right to have an examination made by the Inspector of Buildings before he has fully complied with the requirements of the by-law as above described. There is no material whatever before the Court showing or even suggesting that the applicant has complied with the prescribed requirements. He deposes only that he employed "an engineer practising his profession in Toronto and familiar with such matters, to prepare for me the necessary plans and specifications for the said alterations and additions, and to obtain for me the necessary permit for the purposes", and that he was informed by that engineer and believes the specifications were prepared so as to comply with the requirements of By-law No. 10633. The applicant has not put himself in a position to demand as of right an examination of the plans submitted to the Inspector of Buildings and therefore, he cannot be granted a mandamus directed to that officer to proceed with such examination: Dunn v. Windsor Bd. of Education (1883), 6 O.R. 126; Re Tp. Clerk of Raphaeson (1866), 12 U.C.Q.B. 623; Re Williams and Brampton (1908), 17 O.L.R. 398; Re Clarke and Clare (1908), 12 O.W.R. 1277; Frankel v. Winnipeg (1912), 6 D.L.R. 219 at p. 225, 23 Man. R. 296; Cave et al. Ellerby v. Winnipeg, [1930] 4 D.L.R. 205, 38 Man. R. 621; Re Hamilton Dairies Ltd. and Dundas (1927), 31 O.W.N. 183 at p. 184.

It is perfectly plain from s. 7, of c. 1, that there is no legal duty on the Inspector of Buildings to issue a building permit as sought by the respondent until "the application, drawings, specifications and block plan or survey conform to the requirements of By-law No. 9868". Indeed it is made abundantly plain by s. 4 of the same chapter of the by-law that the Inspector of Buildings is forbidden to issue a permit before that time. That section provides: "If the matters mentioned in any application for a permit, or if the drawings, specifications, or block plan or survey submitted with the application indicate to the Inspector of Buildings that the work proposed to be done will not comply in all respects with the provisions of this by-law he shall not issue a permit therefor, and no permit shall be issued until the application, drawings, specifications and block plan are made to conform to the requirements of this By-law".

Mandamus does not lie against the Inspector of Buildings to do an act prohibited by law, and it cannot be presumed that the condition precedent to his right and duty to issue a permit have been satisfied. Even if one assumes that the drawings submitted to the Inspector of Buildings conform to the requirements of the by-law and again it is to be noted that the application merely states that he was informed by his engineer that they do so—there is nothing to indicate that the Inspector of Buildings was given any opportunity or asked to examine an application in the prescribed form for a permit or information required to be given therein, or specifications, or block plan or survey, to decide whether in his judgment they or any of them conformed to the requirements of the by-law. There is nothing before the Court to show that such documents or any of them have been prepared for such an examination. It is essential that all the documents enumerated in the by-law shall conform to the requirements of the by-law, and the conformity thereto only of the plans and specifications only is not sufficient in law to establish a right to a permit or a duty on the part of the Inspector of Buildings to issue one. Therefore, the order in appeal, in para. 2 thereof, is in error in directing the issue of a permit "provided the said plans and specifications be found to comply or are made to comply with the requirements of By-law 9868 of The Corporation of the City of Toronto and Amendments thereto in the case of an existing hotel of ordinary construction". Moreover, that order cannot stand because it improperly anticipates a breach of duty on the part of the Inspector of Buildings. In High on Inj., p. 44, art. 36, (see also p. 17, art. 12), it is correctly stated that "the courts decline to grant the relief in anticipation of a supposed future omission or refusal of a public officer to discharge his duty, since it is to be presumed that all officers will properly discharge their official duties as they arise and at the time when such duties become incumbent upon them".

The reasons for my judgment, as expressed, make it unnecessary to consider or decide the question in controversy between the parties as to whether the premises of the applicant are within the definition of the word "hotel" in By-law No. 9868 or whether the provisions in By-law No. 16653 relating to "any existing hotel" are presently applicable thereto. Likewise I need not consider or determine the question raised during the hearing of the appeal as to the validity of By-law No. 16653.

Counsel for the appellants in their notice of appeal and at the hearing objected to the joinder of the Corporation of the

1947 CanLII 326 (ON CA)

City of Toronto at the proceedings. Although it now becomes unnecessary for me to discuss or decide that question, it is one of practice which might arise from time to time, and I therefore direct attention to Halsb. op. cit., p. 429, art. 441, where it is stated: "As regards the joinder of parties respondent in writs of mandamus, the first general principle to be observed is that the writ should run to the person or body whose duty it is to perform the act required. It will not, therefore, lie to one person to command another to do the required act. Nor is it the practice to make any other persons parties respondent than the officer whose conduct is called in question."

I would allow this appeal with costs and reverse the order in appeal. In place thereof, the motion made to Barlow J. in Chambers should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal allowed.

these Applicants are asking for relief that is not available at this point in time.

[29] Section 5.1 of the Fill By-law expressly gives the Town discretion to impose conditions on an applicant, both before and after Fill Permit's issuance.

[30] Section 5.3 of the Fill By-law states that the General Manager (for the Town) shall issue a Fill Permit when "all other permits, agreements and documentation have been received to the satisfaction of the Town".

[31] It is clear from the evidence that the Applicants have not responded to the various outstanding matters. The General Manager has not been satisfied as section 5.3 requires.

[32] The issue of when prematurity will bar a mandamus remedy was considered in Apotex Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1993 CanLII 3004 (FCA), [1993] F.C.J. No. 1098. That court stated that there must be a compelling reason to dismiss an application for mandamus because it is premature. The court provides the following guidance on when it is appropriate. Quoting from Karavos v. Toronto (City), 1947 CanLII 326 (ON CA), [1948] 3 D.L.R. 294 (Ont. C.A.) at p. 207, the court in Apotex states that the party seeking the relief must have a "a clear legal right to have the thing sought by it done in the manner and by the person sought to be coerced". Further, at para. 51, the court stated that "[a]n order of mandamus will not lie to compel an officer to act in a specified manner if he or she is not under an obligation to act as of the hearing date."

[33] At this point in time, the Applicants do not have "a clear legal right" to have the Fill Permit issued and the Town is "not under an obligation" to issue this Fill Permit.

[34] I appreciate that the Applicants refuse to pay the Fee that the Town requests because they say that it is a tax. The Town disputes this position. The Applicants want a court ruling on whether the Fee is a tax or not. They say that the court should provide this ruling even though a mandamus order cannot issue in these circumstances. To proceed as requested would fragment the process between the parties. The evidence in this dispute will continue to evolve as the Applicants continue to fulfill the outstanding matters that the Town requested. The issue is best resolved on a full record before the court.

[35] Aside from the Fee, there is no evidence that the Applicants have refused to comply with the outstanding matters. The outstanding matters must be fulfilled to the General Manager's satisfaction.

[36] Counsel for the Town confirmed in court that the Fee issue can be left for the court to decide, but only when all other matters are resolved in accordance with the Fill By-law.

[37] In conclusion, this application is premature and is dismissed. This is without prejudice to the Applicants' right to bring a new application in the future.

[38] If the parties cannot agree on costs, they shall agree on a timetable for exchange of brief written cost submissions and file them with the court by July 23, 2018.

C markets education savings plans to investors through retail dealers, known as enrollment directors, such as B. An enrollment director's agreement that took effect in 1998 governed the relationship between C and B. The term of the contract was three years. The applicable provision provided that the contract would automatically renew at the end of the three-year term unless one of the parties gave six months' written notice to the contrary.

H was another enrollment director and was a competitor of B. H wanted to capture B's lucrative niche market and previously approached B to propose a merger of their agencies on numerous occasions. He also actively encouraged C to force the merger. B had refused to participate in such a merger. C appointed H as the provincial trading officer ("PTO") to review its enrollment directors for compliance with securities laws after the Alberta Securities Commission raised concerns about compliance issues among C's enrollment directors. The role required H to conduct audits of C's enrollment directors. B objected to having H, a competitor, review his confidential business records.

During C's discussions with the Commission about compliance, it was clear that C was considering a restructuring of its agencies in Alberta that involved B. In June 2000, C outlined its plans to the Commission and they included B working for H's agency. None of this was known by B. C repeatedly misled B by telling him that H, as PTO, was under an obligation to treat the information confidentially. It also responded equivocally when B asked in August 2000 whether the merger was a "done deal". When B continued to refuse to allow H to audit his records, C threatened to terminate the 1998 Agreement and in May 2001 gave notice of non-renewal under the Agreement. At the expiry of the contract term, B lost the value in his business in his assembled workforce. The majority of his sales agents were successfully solicited by H's agency.

B sued C and H. The trial judge found C was in breach of the implied term of good faith, H had intentionally induced breach of contract, and both C and H were liable for civil conspiracy. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and dismissed B's lawsuit.

Held: The appeal with respect to C should be allowed and the appeal with respect to H dismissed. The trial judge's assessment of damages should be varied to $87,000 plus interest.

Canadian common law in relation to good faith performance of contracts is piecemeal, unsettled and unclear. Two incremental steps are in order to make the common law more coherent and more just. The first step is to acknowledge that good faith contractual performance is a general organizing principle of the common law of contract which underpins and informs the various rules in which the common law, in various situations and types of relationships, recognizes obligations of good faith contractual performance. The second step is to recognize, as a further manifestation of this organizing principle of good faith, that there is a common law duty which applies to all contracts to act honestly in the performance of contractual obligations. Taking these two steps will put in place a duty that is just, that accords with the reasonable expectations of commercial parties and that is sufficiently precise that it will enhance rather than detract from commercial certainty.

There is an organizing principle of good faith that parties generally must perform their contractual duties honestly and reasonably and not capriciously or arbitrarily. An organizing principle states in general terms a requirement of justice from which more specific legal doctrines may be derived. An organizing principle therefore is not a free-standing rule, but rather a standard that underpins and is manifested in more specific legal doctrines and may be given different weight in different situations. It is a standard that helps to understand and develop the law in a coherent and principled way.

The organizing principle of good faith exemplifies the notion that, in carrying out his or her own performance of the contract, a contracting party should have appropriate regard to the legitimate contractual interests of the contracting partner. While "appropriate regard" for the other party's interests will vary depending on the context of the contractual relationship, it does not require acting to serve those interests in all cases. It merely requires that a party not seek to undermine those interests in bad faith. This general principle has strong conceptual differences from the much higher obligations of a fiduciary. Unlike fiduciary duties, good faith performance does not engage duties of loyalty to the other contracting party or a duty to put the interests of the other contracting party first.

This organizing principle of good faith manifests itself through the existing doctrines about the types of situations and relationships in which the law requires, in certain respects, honest, candid, forthright or reasonable contractual performance. Generally, claims of good faith will not succeed if they do not fall within these existing doctrines. However, this list is not closed. The application of the organizing principle of good faith to particular situations should be developed where the existing law is found to be wanting and where the development may occur incrementally in a way that is consistent with the structure of the common law of contract and gives due weight to the importance of private ordering and certainty in commercial affairs.

The approach of recognizing an overarching organizing principle but accepting the existing law as the primary guide to future development is appropriate in the development of the doctrine of good faith. Good faith may be invoked in widely varying contexts and this calls for a highly context-specific understanding of what honesty and reasonableness in performance require so as to give appropriate consideration to the legitimate interests of both contracting parties.

The principle of good faith must be applied in a manner that is consistent with the fundamental commitments of the common law of contract which generally places great weight on the freedom of contracting parties to pursue their individual self-interest. In commerce, a party may sometimes cause loss to another — even intentionally — in the legitimate pursuit of economic self-interest. Doing so is not necessarily contrary to good faith and in some cases has actually been encouraged by the courts on the basis of economic efficiency. The development of the principle of good faith must be clear not to veer into a form of ad hoc judicial moralism or "palm tree" justice. In particular, the organizing principle of good faith should not be used as a pretext for scrutinizing the motives of contracting parties.

The objection to C's conduct in this case does not fit within any of the existing situations or relationships in which duties of good faith have been found to exist. It is appropriate to recognize a new common law duty that applies to all contracts as a manifestation of the general organizing principle of good faith: a duty of honest performance, which requires the parties to be honest with each other in relation to the performance of their contractual obligations.

Under this new general duty of honesty in contractual performance, parties must not lie or otherwise knowingly mislead each other about matters directly linked to the performance of the contract. This does not impose a duty of loyalty or of disclosure or require a party to forego advantages flowing from the contract; it is a simple requirement not to lie or mislead the other party about one's contractual performance. Recognizing a duty of honest performance flowing directly from the common law organizing principle of good faith is a modest, incremental step.

This new duty of honest performance is a general doctrine of contract law that imposes as a contractual duty a minimum standard of honesty in contractual performance. It operates irrespective of the intentions of the parties, and is to this extent analogous to equitable doctrines which impose limits on the freedom of contract, such as the doctrine of unconscionability.

However, the precise content of honest performance will vary with context and the parties should be free in some contexts to relax the requirements of the doctrine so long as they respect its minimum core requirements.

The duty of honest performance should not be confused with a duty of disclosure or of fiduciary loyalty. A party to a contract has no general duty to subordinate his or her interest to that of the other party. However, contracting parties must be able to rely on a minimum standard of honesty from their contracting partner in relation to performing the contract as a reassurance that if the contract does not work out, they will have a fair opportunity to protect their interests.

In this case, the trial judge did not make a reversible error by adjudicating the issue of good faith. C breached the 1998 Agreement when it failed to act honestly with B in exercising the non-renewal clause. The trial judge concluded that C acted dishonestly with B throughout the period leading up to its exercise of the non-renewal clause, both with respect to its own intentions and with respect to H's role as PTO. The trial judge's detailed findings amply support this overall conclusion.

C is liable for damages calculated on the basis of what B's economic position would have been had C fulfilled its duty. While the trial judge did not assess damages on that basis given the different findings in relation to liability, the trial judge made findings that permit this Court to do so. These findings permit damages to be assessed on the basis that if C had performed the contract honestly, B would have been able to retain the value of his business rather than see it, in effect, expropriated and turned over to H. It is clear from the findings of the trial judge and from the record that the value of the business around the time of non-renewal was $87,000. B is entitled to damages in the amount of $87,000. The Court of Appeal was correct in finding that there could be no liability for inducing breach of contract or unlawful means conspiracy. As such, it follows that the claims against H were rightly dismissed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Contracts — Breach — Performance — Duty of honest performance — Clause in winter maintenance agreement permitting unilateral termination of contract without cause upon 10 days' notice — Contract terminated by condominium corporations with required notice to contractor — Contractor suing for breach of contract — Trial judge finding that statements and conduct by condominium corporations actively deceived contractor and led it to believe contract would not be terminated — Trial judge awarding damages for breach of contract — Whether exercise of termination clause constituted breach of duty of honest performance.

In 2012, a group of condominium corporations ("Baycrest") entered into a two-year winter maintenance contract and into a separate summer maintenance contract with C.M. Callow Inc. ("Callow"). Pursuant to clause 9 of the winter maintenance contract, Baycrest was entitled to terminate that agreement if Callow failed to give satisfactory service in accordance with its terms. Clause 9 also provided that if, for any other reason, Callow's services were no longer required, Baycrest could terminate the contract upon giving 10 days' written notice.

In early 2013, Baycrest decided to terminate the winter maintenance agreement but chose not to inform Callow of its decision at that time. Throughout the spring and summer of 2013, Callow had discussions with Baycrest regarding a renewal of the winter maintenance agreement. Following those discussions, Callow thought that it was likely to get a two-year renewal of the winter maintenance contract and that Baycrest was satisfied with its services. During the summer of 2013, Callow performed work above and beyond the summer maintenance contract at no charge, which it hoped would act as an incentive for Baycrest to renew the winter maintenance agreement.

Baycrest informed Callow of its decision to terminate the winter maintenance agreement in September 2013. Callow filed a statement of claim for breach of contract, alleging that Baycrest acted in bad faith. The trial judge held that the organizing principle of good faith performance and the duty of honest performance were engaged. She was satisfied that Baycrest actively deceived Callow from the time the termination decision was made to September 2013, and found that Baycrest acted in bad faith by withholding that information to ensure Callow performed the summer maintenance contract and by continuing to represent that the contract was not in danger despite knowing that Callow was taking on extra tasks to bolster the chances of the winter maintenance contract being renewed. She awarded damages to Callow in order to place it in the same position as if the breach had not occurred. The Court of Appeal set aside the judgment at first instance, holding that the trial judge erred by improperly expanding the duty of honest performance beyond the terms of the winter maintenance agreement. Further, it held that any deception in the communications during the summer of 2013 related to a new contract not yet in existence, namely the renewal that Callow hoped to negotiate, and therefore was not directly linked to the performance of the winter contract.

Held (Côté J. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed and the judgment of the trial judge reinstated.

Per Wagner C.J. and Abella, Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ.: The duty to act honestly in the performance of the contract precluded the active deception by Baycrest by which it knowingly misled Callow into believing that the winter maintenance agreement would not be terminated. By exercising the termination clause dishonestly, it breached the duty of honesty on a matter directly linked to the performance of the contract, even if the 10-day notice period was satisfied. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal should not have interfered with the conclusions of the trial judge.

The duty of honest performance in contract, formulated in Bhasin v. Hrynew, 2014 SCC 71, [2014] 3 S.C.R. 494, applies to all contracts and requires that parties must not lie or otherwise knowingly mislead each other about matters directly linked to the performance of the contract. In determining whether dishonesty is connected to a given contract, the relevant question is whether a right under that contract was exercised, or an obligation under that contract was performed, dishonestly. While the duty of honest performance is not to be equated with a positive obligation of disclosure, in circumstances where a contracting party lies to or knowingly misleads another, a lack of a positive obligation of disclosure does not preclude an obligation to correct a false impression created through that party's own actions.

The organizing principle of good faith recognized in Bhasin is not a free-standing rule, but instead manifests itself through existing good faith doctrines. While the duty of honest performance and the duty to exercise discretionary powers in good faith are distinct, like each of the different manifestations of the organizing principle, they should not be thought of as disconnected from one another. The duty of honest performance shares a common methodology with the duty to exercise contractual discretionary powers in good faith by fixing on the wrongful exercise of a contractual prerogative. Each of the specific legal doctrines derived from the organizing principle rest on a requirement of justice that a contracting party have appropriate regard to the legitimate contractual interests of their counterparty. They need not subvert their own interests to those of the counterparty by acting as a fiduciary or in a selfless manner. This requirement of justice reflects the notion that the bargain, the rights and obligations agreed to, is the first source of fairness between parties to a contract. Those rights and obligations must be exercised and performed honestly and reasonably and not capriciously or arbitrarily where recognized by law.

The duty of honesty as contractual doctrine has a limiting function on the exercise of an otherwise complete and clear right since the duty, irrespective of the intention of the parties, applies to the performance of all contracts, and by extension, to all contractual obligations and rights. Instead of constraining the decision to terminate in and of itself, the duty of honest performance attracts damages where the manner in which the right was exercised was dishonest. This focus on the manner in which the termination right was exercised should not be confused with whether the right could be exercised. No contractual right, including a termination right, can be exercised dishonestly and, as such, contrary to the requirements of good faith.

The requirements of honesty in performance can go further than prohibiting outright lies. Whether or not a party has knowingly misled its counterparty is a highly fact-specific determination, and can include lies, half-truths, omissions, and even silence, depending on the circumstances. One can mislead through action, by saying something directly to its counterparty, or through inaction, by failing to correct a misapprehension caused by one's own misleading conduct.

The duty of honest performance is a contract law doctrine, not a tort and therefore a nexus with the contractual relationship is required. A breach must be directly linked to the performance of the contract. The framework for abuse of rights in Quebec is useful to illustrate the required direct link between dishonesty and performance from Bhasin. Authorities from Quebec serve as persuasive authority and comparison between the common law and civil law as they evolve in Canada is a particularly useful and familiar exercise for the Court. Like in the Quebec civil law, no contractual right may be exercised dishonestly and therefore contrary to the requirements of good faith. The direct link exists when the party performs their obligation or exercises their right under the contract dishonestly. While the duty of honest performance has similarities with civil fraud and estoppel, it is not subsumed by them. Unlike estoppel and civil fraud, the duty of honest performance does not require a defendant to intend that the plaintiff rely on their representation or false statement.

The duty of honest performance attracts damages according to the ordinary contractual measure. The ordinary approach is to award contractual damages corresponding to the expectation interest. That is, damages should put the injured party in the position that it would have been in had the duty been performed. Although reliance damages, which are the ordinary measure of damages in tort, and expectation damages will be the same in many if not most cases, they are conceptually distinct, and there is no basis to hold that a breach of the duty of honest performance should in general be compensated by way of reliance damages.

In the instant case, Baycrest knowingly misled Callow in the manner in which it exercised clause 9 of the winter maintenance agreement and this wrongful exercise of the termination clause amounts to a breach of contract. Even though Baycrest had what was, on its face, an unfettered right to terminate the winter maintenance agreement on 10 days' notice, the right had to be exercised in keeping with the duty to act honestly. Baycrest's deception was directly linked to this contract, because its exercise of the termination clause was dishonest. It may not have had a free-standing obligation to disclose its intention to terminate, but it nonetheless had an obligation to refrain from misleading Callow in the exercise of that clause. Baycrest had to refrain from false representations in anticipation of the notice period. If someone is led to believe that their counterparty is content with their work and their ongoing contract is likely to be renewed, it is reasonable for that person to infer that the ongoing contract is in good standing and will not be terminated early. Having failed to correct Callow's misapprehension that arose due to these false representations, Baycrest breached its duty of good faith in the exercise of its right of termination. Damages thus flow for the consequential loss of opportunity. While damages are to be measured against a defendant's least onerous means of performance, the least onerous means of performance in this case would have been to correct the misrepresentation once Baycrest knew Callow had drawn a false inference. Had it done so, Callow would have had the opportunity to secure another contract for the upcoming winter.

Per Moldaver, Brown and Rowe JJ.: As a universally applicable minimum standard, all contracts must be performed honestly. Contracting parties may therefore not lie to, or otherwise knowingly mislead, each other about matters directly linked to performance. If a plaintiff suffers loss in reliance on its counterparty's misleading conduct, the duty of honest performance serves to make the plaintiff whole. It does not, however, impose a duty of loyalty or of disclosure or require a party to forego advantages flowing from the contract. The dividing line between (1) actively misleading conduct, and (2) permissible non-disclosure has been clearly demarcated by cases addressing misrepresentation and the same settled principles apply to the duty of honest performance, although it also applies (unlike misrepresentation) to representations made after contract formation.

There is, in the context of misrepresentation, a rich law accepting that sometimes silence or half-truths amount to a statement. Although contracting parties have no duty to disclose material information, a contracting party may not create a misleading picture about its contractual performance by relying on half-truths or partial disclosure. Representations need not take the form of an express statement. So long as it is clearly communicated, it may comprise other acts or conduct on the part of the defendant. The entire context, which includes the nature of the parties' relationship, is to be considered in determining, objectively, whether the defendant made a representation to the plaintiff. The question is whether the defendant's active conduct contributed to a misapprehension that could be corrected only by disclosing additional information. Contracting parties are required to correct representations that are subsequently rendered false, or which the representor later discovers were erroneous. The question of whether a representation has been made is a question of mixed fact and law, subject to appellate review only for palpable and overriding error.

The legal aim in remedying a breach of contract is to give the innocent party the full benefit of the bargain by placing it in the position it would have occupied had the contract been performed. But the justification for awarding expectation damages does not apply to breach of the duty of honest performance. In such cases, the issue is not that the defendant has failed to perform the contract, thereby defeating the plaintiff's expectations. It is, rather, that the defendant has performed the contract, but has also caused the plaintiff loss by making dishonest extra-contractual misrepresentations concerning that performance, upon which the plaintiff relied to its detriment. The plaintiff's complaint is not lost value of performance, but detrimental reliance on dishonest misrepresentations. The interest being protected is not an expectation interest, but a reliance interest. And just as these are unrelated interests, an expectation measure of damage is unrelated to the breach of the duty of honest performance.

Much like estoppel and civil fraud, the duty of honest performance vindicates the plaintiff's reliance interest. A contracting party that breaches this duty will be liable to compensate its counterparty for any foreseeable losses suffered in reliance on the misleading representations. The duty of honest performance is not subsumed by estoppel and civil fraud; rather, it protects the reliance interest in a distinct and broader manner since the defendant may be held liable even where it does not intend for the plaintiff to rely on the misleading representation. Irrespective of the defendant's intention, all a plaintiff need show is that, but for its reliance on the misleading representation, it would not have sustained the loss.

Disposing of the present case is a simple matter of applying the Court's decision in Bhasin; Callow's claim should be resolved by applying only the duty of honest performance. There is no basis for disturbing the trial judge's conclusions. Baycrest's conduct did not fall on the side of innocent non-disclosure. The trial judge found that active communications between the parties deceived Callow. Baycrest identifies no palpable and overriding error to justify overturning these conclusions. The proper measure of damages represents the loss Callow suffered in reliance on Baycrest's misleading representations.

The majority relies on the civilian concept of "abuse of rights" in its analysis. In so doing, it departs from the Court's accepted practice in respect of comparative legal analysis. The principles that apply to this appeal are determinative and settled. Canada's common law and civil law systems have adopted very different approaches to the place of good faith in contract law. The majority's reliance on the civilian doctrine of abuse of a right distorts the analysis in Bhasin and elides the distinction between honest performance and good faith in the exercise of a contractual discretion.

Courts should draw on external legal concepts only where domestic law does not provide an answer or where it is necessary to modify or otherwise develop an existing legal rule. Courts may also look to the experience of other legal systems in considering whether a potential solution to a legal problem will result in negative consequences, or to observe that a domestic legal concept mirrors one found in another system. Even where comparative analysis is appropriate, it must be undertaken with care and circumspection. The golden rule in using concepts from one of Canada's legal systems to modify the other is that the proposed solution must be able to completely and coherently integrate into the adopting system's structure.

Per Côté J. (dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed. Callow's recourse cannot be based on a breach of the duty of honest performance. Although Baycrest's conduct may not be laudable, it does not fall within the category of active dishonesty prohibited by that duty.

The duty of honest performance is described in Bhasin as a simple requirement not to lie or knowingly mislead about matters directly linked to performance of the contract. The requirement that parties not lie is straightforward; however, the kind of conduct covered by the requirement that they not otherwise knowingly mislead each other is not. The law imposes neither a duty of loyalty or of disclosure nor a requirement to forego advantages flowing from the contract on a contracting party. Absent a duty to disclose, it is far from obvious when exactly one's silence will knowingly mislead the other contracting party or at what point a permissible silence turns into a non-permissible silence that may constitute a breach of contract. In any event, the duty of honest performance should remain clear and easy to apply.

The obligations flowing from the duty of honest performance are negative obligations. Extending the duty beyond that scope would detract from certainty in commercial dealings. Therefore, silence cannot be considered dishonest within the meaning of Bhasin unless there is a positive obligation to speak. Such an obligation does not arise simply because a party to a contract realizes that his counterparty is operating under a mistaken belief. Absent a duty of disclosure, a party to a contract has no obligation to correct his counterparty's mistaken belief unless the party's active conduct has materially contributed to it. What constitutes a material contribution will obviously depend upon the context, which includes the nature of the parties' relationship as well as the relevant provisions of the contract. Parties that prefer not to disclose certain information — which they are entitled not to do — are not required to adopt a new line of conduct in their contractual relationship simply because they chose silence over speech.

In the context of a right to terminate a contract without cause, a party that intends to end an agreement does not have to convey hints in order to alert his counterparty that their business relationship is in danger. No obligation to speak arises when a party becomes aware of his counterparty's mistaken belief that the contract will not be terminated unless the party has taken positive action that materially contributed to that belief. If one party leads another to believe that their contract will be renewed, it follows that the other party can reasonably expect their business relationship to be extended rather than terminated. But an inference to that effect cannot be drawn in the abstract. In order to infer that one party, through discussions about renewal, led the other party to think that there was no risk their existing agreement would be terminated, the inference-drawing process must obviously take into account the nature of the risk at stake and what was actually communicated during those discussions. Otherwise, the inference would entail a palpable and overriding error that would be subject to appellate review.

In the present case, Baycrest bargained for a right to terminate its winter agreement for any reason and at any time upon giving 10 days' notice. In her assessment of Baycrest's conduct, the trial judge did not ask herself if Baycrest lied or otherwise knowingly misled Callow about the exercise of its right to terminate the winter agreement for any other reason than unsatisfactory services. She wrongfully insisted on addressing alleged performance issues despite the fact that the winter agreement could be terminated even if Callow's services were satisfactory. The trial judge also did not consider that the active deception had to be directly linked to the performance of the contract. It is clear that the representations she found had been made by Baycrest were not directly linked to the performance of the winter agreement. The trial judge's misunderstanding of the applicable legal principles vitiated the fact-finding process.

Grosvenor et al. v. The Corporation of the Township of East Luther Grand Valley [Indexed as: Grosvenor v. East Luther Grand Valley (Township)]

84 O.R. (3d) 346

Court of Appeal for Ontario,
Sharpe, Blair and MacFarland JJ.A.
January 29, 2007

Municipal law -- By-laws -- Validity -- Bad faith -- Principle that generous deference should be accorded exercise of statutory powers by municipality not precluding judicial intervention where municipality acts in bad faith -- Good faith still constituting central foundation for validity of municipal by-law enacted in conformity with municipality's power -- Application judge finding that municipality passed by-law designating former railway right-of- way as "highway" in order to bring it within exception to municipality's obligation to fence under Line Fences Act and thus to avoid expense of fencing -- Application judge concluding that municipality acted in bad faith and that by-law was illegal -- Application judge not being improperly interventionist in quashing by-law û Line Fences Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. L.17.

The municipality purchased a stretch of abandoned railway right-of-way which was subsequently used and developed as a multi-purpose trailway. The respondents were concerned about the lack of fencing dividing and protecting their lands from the trailway, and submitted a demand for fencing to the municipality under the Line Fences Act. Section 20(1)(c) of that Act provides that a municipality acquiring lands formerly used as part of a railway line is responsible for constructing, keeping up and repairing the fences that mark the lateral boundaries of the acquired land. The municipality responded by passing a by-law designating the trailway as a "highway", thus bringing it within an exception to a municipality's obligation to fence under the Line Fences Act. The by-law was passed without notice to anyone and given first, second and third reading at one sitting at the end of a Council meeting. The respondents applied to quash the by-law. The application was granted. The application judge found that the by-law was passed to avoid the municipality's obligation to fence and to pay the cost of fencing. He concluded that the by-law was enacted in bad faith and was therefore illegal. The municipality appealed.

Held, the appeal should be dismissed.

The principle that courts should afford generous deference to municipalities in the exercise of their statutory powers on behalf of electors does not preclude judicial intervention where a municipality acts in bad faith. Good faith remains a central foundation for the validity of a municipal by-law enacted in conformity with a municipality's power. A by-law is enacted in bad faith where the council acted unreasonably and arbitrarily and without the degree of fairness, openness and impartiality required of a municipal government. The application judge recognized that his role was not to second guess what the Council had done; rather, his findings led him to the conclusion that the municipality had acted for a collateral purpose and that the process followed had not been characterized by the frankness, openness, impartiality and regard for the rights of the respondents that was required of a municipality in the circumstances. His findings, and the inferences he drew from them, were all supportable on the record. [page347]

The respondent Society, an Alberta environmental group, brought applications for certiorari and mandamus in the Federal Court seeking to compel the federal departments of Transport and Fisheries and Oceans to conduct an environmental assessment, pursuant to the federal Environmental Assessment and Review Process Guidelines Order, in respect of a dam constructed on the Oldman River by the province of Alberta -- a project which affects several federal interests, in particular navigable waters, fisheries, Indians and Indian lands. The Guidelines Order was established under s. 6 of the federal Department of the Environment Act and requires all federal departments and agencies that have a decision-making authority for any proposal (i.e., any initiative, undertaking or activity) that may have an environmental effect on an area of federal responsibility to initially screen such proposal to determine whether it may give rise to any potentially adverse environmental effects. The province had itself conducted extensive environmental studies over the years which took into account public views, including the views of Indian bands and environmental groups, and, in September 1987, had obtained from the Minister of Transport an approval for the work under s. 5 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. This section provides that no work is to be built in navigable waters without the prior approval of the Minister. In assessing Alberta's application, the Minister considered only the project's effect on navigation and no assessment under the Guidelines Order was made. Respondent's attempts to stop the project in the Alberta courts failed and both the federal Ministers of the Environment and of Fisheries and Oceans declined requests to subject the project to the Guidelines Order. The contract for the construction of the dam was awarded in 1988 and the project was 40 per cent complete when the respondent commenced its action in the Federal Court in April 1989. The Trial Division dismissed the applications. On appeal, the Court of Appeal reversed the judgment, quashed the approval under s. 5 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and ordered the Ministers of Transport and of Fisheries and Oceans to comply with the Guidelines Order. This appeal raises the constitutional and statutory validity of the Guidelines Order as well as its nature and applicability. It also raises the question whether the motions judge properly exercised his discretion in deciding not to grant the remedy sought on grounds of unreasonable delay and futility.

Held (Stevenson J. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed, with the exception that there should be no order in the nature of mandamus directing the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to comply with the Guidelines Order.

Statutory Validity of the Guidelines Order

The Guidelines Order was validly enacted pursuant to s. 6 of the Department of the Environment Act, and is mandatory in nature. When one reads s. 6 as a whole, rather than focusing on the word "guidelines" in isolation, it is clear that Parliament has elected to adopt a regulatory scheme that is "law", and amenable to enforcement through prerogative relief. The "guidelines" are not merely authorized by statute but must be formally enacted by "order" with the approval of the Governor in Council. That is in striking contrast with the usual internal ministerial policy guidelines intended for the control of public servants under the minister's authority.

The Guidelines Order, which requires the decision maker to take socio-economic considerations into account in the environmental impact assessment, does not go beyond what is authorized by the Department of the Environment Act. The concept of "environmental quality" in s. 6 of the Act is not confined to the biophysical environment alone. The environment is a diffuse subject matter and, subject to the constitutional imperatives, the potential consequences for a community's livelihood, health and other social matters from environmental change, are integral to decision making on matters affecting environmental quality.

The Guidelines Order is consistent with the Navigable Waters Protection Act. There is nothing in the Act which explicitly or implicitly precludes the Minister of Transport from taking into consideration any matters other than marine navigation in exercising his power of approval under s. 5 of the Act. The Minister's duty under the Order is supplemental to his responsibility under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and he cannot resort to an excessively narrow interpretation of his existing statutory powers to avoid compliance with the Order. There is also no conflict between the requirement for an initial assessment "as early in the planning process as possible and before irrevocable decisions are taken" in s. 3 of the Guidelines Order, and the remedial power under s. 6(4) of the Act to grant approval after the commencement of construction. That power is an exception to the general rule in s. 5 of the Act requiring approval prior to construction, and in exercising his discretion to grant approval after commencement, the Minister is not precluded from applying the Order.

Applicability of the Guidelines Order

The scope of the Guidelines Order is not restricted to "new federal projects, programs and activities"; the Order is not engaged every time a project may have an environmental effect on an area of federal jurisdiction. However, there must first be a "proposal" which requires an "initiative, undertaking or activity for which the Government of Canada has a decision making responsibility". The proper construction to be placed on the term "responsibility" is that the federal government, having entered the field in a subject matter assigned to it under s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867, must have an affirmative regulatory duty pursuant to an Act of Parliament which relates to the proposed initiative, undertaking or activity. "Responsibility" within the definition of "proposal" means a legal duty or obligation and should not be read as connoting matters falling generally within federal jurisdiction. Once such a duty exists, it is a matter of identifying the "initiating department" assigned responsibility for its performance, for it then becomes the "decision making authority" for the proposal and thus responsible for initiating the process under the Guidelines Order.

The Oldman River Dam project falls within the ambit of the Guidelines Order. The project qualifies as a proposal for which the Minister of Transport alone is the "initiating department" under s. 2 of the Order. The Navigable Waters Protection Act, in particular s. 5, places an affirmative regulatory duty on the Minister of Transport. Under that Act there is a legislatively entrenched regulatory scheme in place in which the approval of the Minister is required before any work that substantially interferes with navigation may be placed in, upon, over or under, through or across any navigable water.

The Guidelines Order does not apply to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, however, because there is no equivalent regulatory scheme under the Fisheries Act which is applicable to this project. The discretionary power to request or not to request information to assist a Minister in the exercise of a legislative function does not constitute a "decision making responsibility" within the meaning of the Order. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans under s. 37 of the Fisheries Act has only been given a limited ad hoc legislative power which does not constitute an affirmative regulatory duty.

The scope of assessment under the Guidelines Order is not confined to the particular head of power under which the Government of Canada has a decision-making responsibility within the meaning of the term "proposal". Under the Order, the initiating department which has been given authority to embark on an assessment must consider the environmental effect on all areas of federal jurisdiction. The Minister of Transport, in his capacity of decision maker under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, must thus consider the environmental impact of the dam on such areas of federal jurisdiction as navigable waters, fisheries, Indians and Indian lands.

Crown Immunity

Per Lamer C.J. and La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin and Iacobucci JJ.: The Crown in right of Alberta is bound by the Navigable Waters Protection Act by necessary implication. The proprietary right the province may have in the bed of the Oldman River is subject to the public right of navigation, legislative jurisdiction over which has been exclusively vested in Parliament. Alberta requires statutory authorization from Parliament to erect any obstruction that substantially interferes with navigation in the Oldman River, and the Navigable Waters Protection Act is the means by which it must be obtained. The Crown in right of Alberta is bound by the Act, for it is the only practicable procedure available for getting approval. The purpose of the Act would be wholly frustrated if the province was not bound by the Act. The provinces are among the bodies that are likely to engage in projects that may interfere with navigation. Were the Crown in right of a province permitted to undermine the integrity of the essential navigational networks in Canadian waters, the legislative purpose of the Navigable Waters Protection Act would effectively be emasculated.

Per Stevenson J. (dissenting): The province of Alberta is not bound by the Navigable Waters Protection Act. The Crown is not bound by legislation unless it is mentioned or referred to in the legislation. Here, there are no words in the Act "expressly binding" the Crown and no clear intention to bind "is manifest from the very terms of the statute". As well, the failure to include the Crown would not wholly frustrate the purpose of the Act or produce an absurdity. There are many non-governmental agencies whose activities are subject to the Act and there is thus no emasculation of the Act. If the Crown interferes with a public right of navigation, that wrong is remediable by action. There is no significant benefit in approval under the Act. Tort actions may still lie.

Constitutional Validity of the Guidelines Order

The "environment" is not an independent matter of legislation under the Constitution Act, 1867. Understood in its generic sense, it encompasses the physical, economic and social environment and touches upon several of the heads of power assigned to the respective levels of government. While both levels may act in relation to the environment, the exercise of legislative power affecting environmental concerns must be linked to an appropriate head of power. Local projects will generally fall within provincial responsibility, but federal participation will be required if, as in this case, the project impinges on an area of federal jurisdiction.

The Guidelines Order is intra vires Parliament. The Order does not attempt to regulate the environmental effects of matters within the control of the province but merely makes environmental impact assessment an essential component of federal decision making. The Order is in pith and substance nothing more than an instrument that regulates the manner in which federal institutions must administer their multifarious duties and functions. In essence, the Order has two fundamental aspects. First, there is the substance of the Order dealing with environmental impact assessment to facilitate decision making under the federal head of power through which a proposal is regulated. This aspect of the Order can be sustained on the basis that it is legislation in relation to the relevant subject matters enumerated in s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867. The second aspect of the Order is its procedural or organizational element that coordinates the process of assessment, which can in any given case touch upon several areas of federal responsibility, under the auspices of a designated decision maker (the "initiating department"). This facet of the Order has as its object the regulation of the institutions and agencies of the Government of Canada as to the manner in which they perform their administrative functions and duties. This is unquestionably intra vires Parliament. It may be viewed either as an adjunct of the particular legislative powers involved, or, in any event, be justifiable under the residuary power in s. 91.

The Guidelines Order cannot be used as a colourable device to invade areas of provincial jurisdiction which are unconnected to the relevant heads of federal power. The "initiating department" is only given a mandate to examine matters directly related to the areas of federal responsibility potentially affected. Any intrusion under the Order into provincial matters is merely incidental to the pith and substance of the legislation.

Discretion

Per Lamer C.J. and La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin and Iacobucci JJ.: The Federal Court of Appeal did not err in interfering with the motions judge's discretion not to grant the remedies sought on the grounds of unreasonable delay and futility. Respondent made a sustained effort, through legal proceedings in the Alberta courts and through correspondence with federal departments, to challenge the legality of the process followed by the province to build the dam and the acquiescence of the appellant Ministers, and there is no evidence that Alberta has suffered any prejudice from any delay in taking the present action. Despite ongoing legal proceedings, the construction of the dam continued. The province was not prepared to accede to an environmental impact assessment under the Order until it had exhausted all legal avenues. The motions judge did not weigh these considerations adequately, giving the Court of Appeal no choice but to intervene. Futility was also not a proper ground to refuse a remedy in the present circumstances. Prerogative relief should only be refused on that ground in those few instances where the issuance of a prerogative writ would be effectively nugatory. It is not obvious in this case that the implementation of the Order even at this late stage will not have some influence over the mitigative measures that may be taken to ameliorate any deleterious environmental impact from the dam on an area of federal jurisdiction.

Per Stevenson J. (dissenting): The Federal Court of Appeal erred in interfering with the motions judge's discretion to refuse the prerogative remedy. The court was clearly wrong in overruling his conclusion on the question of delay. The common law has always imposed a duty on an applicant to act promptly in seeking prerogative relief. Given the enormity of the project and the interests at stake, it was unreasonable for the respondent Society to wait 14 months before challenging the Minister of Transport's approval. It is impossible to conclude that Alberta was not prejudiced by the delay. The legal proceedings in the Alberta courts brought by the respondent and others need not have been taken into account by the motions judge. These proceedings were separate and distinct from the relief sought in this case and were irrelevant to the issues at hand. The present action centres on the constitutionality and applicability of the Guidelines Order. It raises new and different issues. In determining whether he should exercise his discretion against the respondent, the motions judge was obliged to look only at those factors which he considered were directly connected to the application before him. Interference with his exercise of discretion is not warranted unless it can be said with certainty that he was wrong in doing what he did. The test has not been met in this case.

Costs

Per Lamer C.J. and La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin and Iacobucci JJ.: It is a proper case for awarding costs on a solicitor-client basis to the respondent, given the Society's circumstances and the fact that the federal Ministers were joined as appellants even though they did earlier not seek leave to appeal to this Court.

Per Stevenson J. (dissenting): The appellants should not be called upon to pay costs on a solicitor and client basis. There is no justification in departing from our own general rule that a successful party should recover costs on the usual party and party basis. Public interest groups must be prepared to abide by the same principles as apply to other litigants and be prepared to accept some responsibility for the costs.

Civil procedure -- Evidence -- Preservation of evidence -- Insured claiming that infant was injured in motor vehicle accident -- Insurer denying that injury was caused by motor vehicle accident on basis of expert opinions -- Court not having jurisdiction to grant order under Rule 36 of Rules of Civil Procedure for videotaped examination of those experts under oath in order to preserve their evidence in case they were unable to testify in action which infant might commence when he reached his majority -- Rule 36.01 not conferring any power on court to order preservation of evidence prior to commencement of proceeding -- Section 146 of Courts of Justice Act not applying to confer such power -- Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43, s. 146 -- Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, rule 36.01.

The father of a child who suffered a significant brain and skull injury put his automobile insurer on notice that the child was injured in a motor vehicle accident. The child's mother had originally claimed that the child was injured when he fell down a stairway while strapped in his car seat. The insurer retained three experts to opine on the cause of the child's injuries. The experts concluded that the injuries were probably caused by a fall down the stairs, and not by a motor vehicle accident. The two-year limitation period for a claim for the recovery of damages occasioned by a motor vehicle did not begin to run until the child reached his majority in 2019. Accordingly, in order to preserve the evidence of the three experts in case they were unable to testify in any action which the child might commence, the insurer brought an application for an order requiring the videotaped examination under oath of those experts. The application judge granted the application, relying on the combined effect of ss. 1, 95, 96, 101 and 146 of the Courts of Justice Act and Rules 14 and 36 of the Ontario Rules of Civil Procedure. The insured appealed. [page672]

Held, the appeal should be allowed.

Rule 14 of the Rules of Civil Procedure and ss. 1, 95, 96 and 101 of the Courts of Justice Act had no application to the circumstances of this case. Rule 36.01 does not confer any power on the court to order the preservation of evidence prior to the commencement of a proceeding, which is defined in rule 1.03(1) as an action or application. The use of the word "party" throughout Rule 36 clearly indicates that it applies only where an action has been commenced and one of the parties to the action wishes to preserve the evidence of a witness for use at trial, usually in circumstances where the proposed witness is ill or of advanced years. As no action had been commenced on behalf of the child, rule 36.01 conferred no power on the application judge to grant the impugned order. Section 146 of the Courts of Justice Act was of no assistance to the insurer. Section 146 does not confer jurisdiction, but refers to procedural lacunae where jurisdiction has otherwise been conferred. That rule 36.01 does not apply where no proceeding has been commenced is not a procedural gap. The absence of statutory authority enabling the court to act prior to the commencement of a proceeding is not a matter of procedure. It indicates the intention of the Civil Rules Committee to confine the application of the rule to situations where a proceeding has been commenced.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

BORINS J.A.: -- I

[1] This appeal arises from what Echlin J. characterized as a "unique application". It raises the question of whether Rule 36 of [page673] the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, which permits a party who intends to introduce transcript or videotape evidence of a person at trial may, with the leave of the court, examine the person under oath before the trial in circumstances where no proceeding has been commenced. The application judge found that it did. With respect, I disagree. For the reasons that follow, I would allow the appeal. II

[2] This appeal arises from rather unusual circumstances. On April 17, 2002, Ajeevan Sivakumar was rushed to hospital. He was five and a half months old. He had sustained significant injury to the right parieto-occipital region of his brain and skull that required surgical repair. When the child initially presented for medical care, his mother, Ahilaverni Sivakumar, gave the history that he had fallen down a stairway while strapped in his car seat. However, approximately six weeks later, she stated that this was not the way in which her son had been injured. Rather, she claimed the injuries occurred when he was restrained in his car seat in the rear of a vehicle she had been driving when she lost control of it and hit a tree.

[3] As the child's father, Murugesu Sivakumar, was the owner of the vehicle that was insured by the respondent, on June 6, 2002, the law firm representing the Sivakumar family put the insurer on notice. In part, its letter read:

On appeal from the judgment of Justice Norman D. Dyson of the Superior Court of Justice dated January 30, 2003.

GOUDGE J.A.:

[1] Pursuant to the right given to him by s. 25 of the Retail Sales Tax Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. R.31 (the "RSTA"), the appellant Peter Cheong sought to appeal to the Superior Court of Justice from the assessment made against him for retail sales tax. Section 25(2) of the RSTA provides that the appeal is instituted by filing a notice of appeal with the court, paying the court fee, and serving a copy of the notice of appeal on the provincial Minister of Finance, who is responsible for administering the RSTA.

[2] Section 25(1) provides inter alia that no appeal shall be instituted after the expiration of ninety days from the day the Minister mailed the notice confirming the assessment to the person objecting to it. In this case, the appellant served the Minister with a copy of the notice of appeal on the ninety-first day. He then sought an order extending the time for service. For his part, the Minister brought a cross-motion to strike the appeal as being out of time. The motions judge dismissed the appellant's motion and allowed that of the Minister.

[3] This is the appeal from that order. The central issue is whether the court has jurisdiction to extend time in these circumstances. For the reasons that follow, I conclude that it does not. I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

BACKGROUND

[4] The relevant facts are not in dispute. The appellant was the president and a director and shareholder of a corporation which carried on business as Scarborough Town Hyundai from September 1, 1992 until July 7, 1995, when it filed for bankruptcy.

[5] In February 1995, the corporation received a notice of assessment for retail sales tax that it had collected but not remitted. It filed no notice of objection to this assessment but, because of its subsequent bankruptcy, the Minister recovered nothing from the corporation.

[6] As a result, by notice of assessment dated April 15, 1997, the appellant was assessed as director of the corporation for the retail sales tax collected by the corporation but not remitted during the period from September 1, 1992 to July 7, 1995. Including penalty and interest, the assessment totalled $138,234.45.

[7] The appellant's counsel filed a notice of objection to this assessment dated October 2, 1997 in which he raised the due diligence defence available to him under the RSTA.

[8] In a separate proceeding in the Ontario Court of Justice in August 1998, the appellant was found guilty under s. 42 of the RSTA of having "directed, authorized, assented to, acquiesced in or participated in" the corporation's failure to remit retail sales tax.

[9] Four years after he had filed his objection, and after his counsel had repeatedly sought to have the objection dealt with, the appellant received a letter from the Minister dated on October 17, 2001 confirming that no change would be made in his assessment. The letter, which was copied to counsel, advised the appellant that he had ninety days to appeal to the Superior Court of Justice and set out the steps required to institute that appeal.

[10] The appellant sought to exercise his right to appeal. He filed a notice of appeal with the Superior Court and paid the required fee on January 15, 2002. He served the copy of the notice of appeal by registered mail on the Minister on January 16, 2002, the ninety-first day after October 17, 2001.

[11] When the Minister refused to consent to an extension of time for service, the appellant brought his motion. The Minister then brought his cross-motion.

[12] The motions judge issued his reasons for dismissing the appeal on January 30, 2003. He found that the time for service should not be extended because the appellant had no reasonable chance of success on the appeal and, secondly, in any event, under the RSTA the court had no jurisdiction to extend time for service.

[13] The appellant contests both findings. He argues that, assuming the court can do so, this is a proper case to extend the time for service. The more important issue is whether the court has jurisdiction to extend the time for service and, on that score, the appellant says that the motions judge was wrong in his interpretation of the RSTA, most particularly in his failure to advert to s. 29. On this issue, the appellant was supported by the intervener, McKerlie-Millen Inc., whose submissions were helpful in addressing the legislative history of the relevant sections of the RSTA.

[14] Given my conclusion on jurisdiction, it is unnecessary to finally decide whether the motions judge should have extended the time for service of the notice of appeal if the court had the power to do so. Suffice it to say that the appellant has a sympathetic case. He has raised a detailed due diligence defence to the assessment. It is unclear whether that defence was adjudicated upon in the provincial court proceedings. Nothing suggests that the Minister would suffer any prejudice by extending the time for service by one day. The fact that the Minister took some four years to respond to the appellant's original objection, despite the prodding of counsel, takes the edge off any assertion that strict timeliness is an essential component of the process for contesting assessments.

[15] However, the primary issue in this appeal is not whether the court should extend the time for service of the notice of appeal, but whether it has the jurisdiction to do so.

[16] The relevant sections of the RSTA are central to the determination of this issue.

[17] The first of these are ss. 24(1) and (4), which provide for the initial objection to an assessment for retail sales tax and the Minister's obligation to respond. They read as follows:

> 24. (1) A person who objects to an assessment made against the person under section 18, subsection 19(1) of section 20 or to a statement under section 20 that is served on the person may, within 180 days from the day of mailing of the statement or notice of assessment, serve on the Minister a notice of objection in the form approved by the Minister.
>
> (4) Upon receipt of the notice of objection, the Minister shall with all due dispatch reconsider the assessment or statement objected to and vacate, confirm or vary the assessment or statement, or reassess or serve a fresh statement, and the Minister shall thereupon notify the person making the objection of his or her action in writing.

[18] The provisions governing an appeal from the Minister's notification under s. 24(4) are ss. 25, 26 and 27. For the purposes of this case, the critical subsections, beginning with the cornerstone provided by s. 25(1), are the following:

> 25. (1) When the Minister has given the notification required by subsection 24(4), the person who has served a notice of objection under that section may appeal to the Superior Court of Justice to have the assessment or statement so objected to vacated or varied, but no appeal under this section shall be instituted after the expiration of ninety days from the day notice has been mailed to such person under subsection 24 (4).
>
> (2) An appeal to the Superior Court of Justice shall be instituted by,
>
> (a) filing a notice of appeal with the court in the form approved by the Minister;
>
> (b) paying a fee to the court in the same amount and manner as the fee payable under regulations made under the Administration of Justice Act on the issue of a statement of claim; and
>
> (c) serving on the Minister a copy of the notice of appeal as filed.
>

(3) A notice of appeal shall be served on the Minister by being sent by registered mail addressed to the Minister.

(5) The time within which a notice of objection or a notice of appeal is to be served may be extended by the Minister if application for extension is made,

(b) in respect of a notice of appeal, before the expiration of the time allowed under subsection (1) of this section for the service of the notice of appeal.

26. The Minister shall with all due dispatch serve on the person appealing and file in the court a reply to the notice of appeal admitting or denying the facts alleged and containing a statement of such further allegations of fact and all statutory provisions and reasons as he or she intends to rely on, and where the Minister has failed to serve the reply within 180 days from the date of service upon him or her of the notice of appeal, the appellant may, upon twenty-one days notice to the Minister, bring a motion before a judge of the Superior Court of Justice for an order requiring the reply to be served within such time as the judge shall order, and the judge may, if he or she considers it proper in the circumstances, also order that, upon failure by the Minister to serve the reply in the time specified in the order, the assessment or statement with respect to which the appeal is taken shall be vacated and any tax paid pursuant to such assessment, or any refund disallowed pursuant to such statement, shall be repaid or refunded to the appellant, but nothing in this section revives an appeal that is void or affects a statement or assessment that has become valid and binding under subsection 18 (8), subsection 19(3) or subsection 20(9).

27. (1) Upon the filing of the material referred to in section 26 with the Superior Court of Justice, the matter shall be deemed to be an action in the court.

[19] Finally, the section relied on most heavily by the appellant is s. 29:

29. The practice and procedure of the Superior Court of Justice, including the right of appeal and the practice and procedure relating to appeals, apply to every matter deemed to be an action under section 25, and every judgment and order given or made in every such action may be enforced in the same manner and by the like process as a judgment or order given or made in an action commenced in the court.

[20] These various sections of the RSTA put a number of points beyond argument.

[21] First, s. 25(1) gives a right of appeal only if the appeal is instituted within ninety days of the mailing of the Minister's response under s. 24(4). Meeting this limitation period is a condition of the right of appeal. By seeking an extension of time, the appellant acknowledges as much.

[22] Second, s. 25(2) makes clear that serving a copy of the notice of appeal on the Minister is a part of instituting the appeal. The appeal cannot be instituted without that service. Section 25(3) provides that service is by registered mail. Hence, unless proper service is effected within ninety days, the appeal is not instituted within the ninety day limitation period and is barred.

[23] Third, the legislature has explicitly addressed the issue of extending time to serve a notice of appeal. Section 25(5)(b) gives the Minister the power to extend that time provided the extension is sought within the ninety days.

[24] There is no provision in the RSTA which expressly gives the court jurisdiction to extend the time for service after the ninety days have run. However, the appellant, supported by the intervener, argues that s. 29 does so implicitly. The argument has two steps. The appellant says that s. 29 engages the practice and procedure of the court as found in the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194 and the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c.C.43 once the appellant has taken the steps required by s. 25(2) to institute an appeal, even if those steps are taken after the ninety day limitation period has expired. The appellant then argues that the Rules and the Courts of Justice Act give the court the power to relieve against the statutory limitation period by extending the time for serving a notice of appeal.

[25] In my view, both steps in this argument are flawed.

[26] First, I think that when s. 29 is read in the context of ss. 25, 26 and 27 of the RSTA, it is clear that the practice and procedure of the Superior Court apply only upon completion of the steps called for by both ss. 25 and 26. That is, the appellant must file the notice of appeal, pay the necessary fee and serve the notice of appeal as required by s. 25. And the Minister must then serve and file his reply as required by s. 26. Short of this, the practice and procedure of the Superior Court can offer no help to the appellant.

[27] The logic of the statutory language mandates this result. Section 29 requires that a matter be deemed to be an action before the practice and procedure of the Superior Court can apply to it. Section 27 is the only provision under which a matter can be deemed an action. Section 27 states that this deeming can occur only on the filing of the Minister's reply. Indeed, the legislature amended this section of the RSTA in 1975 to delay the point at which a matter is deemed an action until the Minister has filed his reply under s. 26. Before this amendment, a matter was deemed an action upon the completion of the steps required of the appellant under s. 25.

[28] However, the appellant argues that because s. 29 makes the practice and procedure of the Superior Court applicable to every matter deemed to be an action under s. 25, only the steps to be taken by the appellant must occur before the remedial power in the Rules and the Courts of Justice Act can be resorted to. The difficulty with this proposition is that s. 25 does not deem a matter to be an action. The legislature cannot therefore have intended that the phrase "under s. 25" in s. 29 be coupled with the deeming phrase that immediately precedes it. Rather, "under s. 25" must only identify the matter to which the practice and procedure of the Superior Court will apply once the matter is deemed to be an action. In other words, the court's practice and procedure applies to every matter under s. 25 once it is deemed to be an action. Because of s. 27, this necessitates that the steps required by both ss. 25 and 26 be completed before resort can be had to the court's practice and procedure.

[29] The appellant also argues that the explicit inclusion of "the right of appeal" in "the practice and procedure" made applicable by s. 29 must mean that the practice and procedure applies to the right of appeal itself, including its limitation period. However, the flaw in this proposition is that "the right of appeal" in s. 29 cannot refer to the right of appeal from an RSTA assessment. There is nothing in the practice and procedure of the Superior Court that provides for the right of appeal from an assessment. Rather, that right of appeal is accorded by s. 25(1) of the RSTA if the ninety day limitation period is complied with. Therefore, the right of appeal referred to in s. 29 must refer to the right of appeal from the Superior Court. Section 29's reference to "the right of appeal" thus has no bearing on the appellant's argument.

[30] The cases cited by the appellant do not support a conclusion that s. 29 of the RSTA allows the appellant access to the court's practices and procedure to extend the time to serve the notice of appeal after the statutory limitation period has expired. Unlike Molson Ontario Breweries v. Ontario (Minister of Finance), [1985] O.J. No. 295 (S.C.O.) and Helou (c.o.b Your Choice Pizza & Wings) v. Ontario (Minister of Finance), [2002] O.J. No. 3973 (S.C.), (leave to appeal to the Divisional Court granted [2002] O.J. No. 4556), this is not a case where estoppel can be raised against the Minister. And, unlike K.C. v. College of Physical Therapists of Alberta, 1998 ABCA 213 (CanLII), [1998] A.J. No. 99 (C.A) at para. 12 in this case, the statutory right of appeal in s. 25(1) of the RSTA is clearly conditional on the appeal being instituted within the ninety day limitation period.

[31] The inability of the court to relieve against the ninety day limitation period that results from this statutory interpretation may seem to carry draconian results. Indeed, as Iacobucci and Major JJ. wrote in their dissenting opinion in Novak v. Bond, 1999 CanLII 685 (SCC), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 808 at para. 8: "Almost all applications of limitations statutes will seem harsh. But their finality should not obscure their value."

[32] However, the circumstances of this particular limitation period may at least soften that sense of harshness. The ninety days provided by s. 25(1) of the RSTA are triggered by a clear event, namely the Minister's response under s. 24(4) to the objection to the assessment. The person required to comply with the limitation period will already have set out his or her concerns with the assessment in the objection previously filed pursuant to s. 24(1). And, as in this case, the person may well have legal assistance by the time the limitation period starts to run.

[33] Thus, I think that, taken in context, the meaning of s. 29 of the RSTA is clear. The practice and procedure of the Superior Court is available to an appellant only once the steps required by both ss. 25 and 26 are properly completed and the matter is therefore deemed an action. That practice and procedure is not available at the s. 25 stage to assist an appellant to extend the time for service of the notice of appeal after the ninety day limitation period in s. 25(1) has expired. At that point, the right to appeal is gone. Thus, the appellant in this case cannot look to the practice and procedure of the Superior Court for relief from the statutory limitation period set out in s. 25(1) of the RSTA.

[34] The second step in the appellant's argument is also flawed. Even if the practice and procedure of the Superior Court could be engaged prior to the filing of the Minister's reply under s. 26 of the RSTA, nothing in the Rules of Civil Procedure or the Courts of Justice Act empowers the court to extend the statutory limitation period clearly set out in s. 25(1).

[35] The rule dealing with extension of time is rule 3.02. It gives the court discretion to extend time, but only time prescribed by the Rules. This rule does not permit the court to extend a limitation period prescribed by statute. See Murphy v. Welch; Stoddart v. Watson, 1993 CanLII 59 (SCC), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 1069 at para. 15.

[36] Nor do ss. 11 or 146 of the Courts of Justice Act do so. Section 11 gives the Superior Court of Justice all the jurisdiction historically exercised by courts of common law and equity. Section 146 provides that any jurisdiction which the court has shall be exercised consistent with the due administration of justice in the absence of any express provision for its exercise. Neither section confers jurisdiction on the court to override a clearly expressed statutory limitation period such as that found in s. 25(1) of the RSTA. See Dickson J. in College Housing Co-operative Ltd. v. Baxter Student Housing Ltd., 1975 CanLII 164 (SCC), [1976] 2 S.C.R. 475 at p. 480.

[37] Thus, I conclude that both steps in the appellant's argument are misconceived. Section 29 of the RSTA simply does not give the court jurisdiction to extend the time for service of the notice of appeal in the circumstances of this case. The court does not have the power to relieve against the limitation period in s. 25(1) of the RSTA.

[38] The motions judge was correct to find that he had no jurisdiction. The appeal is dismissed. However, we are unsympathetic to the Minister's request for costs given that his successful complaint about the appellant being one day late comes in a case where he took some four years to discharge his duty to respond "with all due dispatch" to the appellant's original objection. There will be no order as to costs.

On appeal from the order of Justice E. Llana Nakonechny of the Superior Court of Justice, dated September 15, 2020, with reasons reported at 2020 ONSC 5552.

Coroza J.A.:

I. OVERVIEW

[1] The appellant appeals from the dismissal of her motion (the "Motion"), in which she sought an order dismissing, on jurisdictional grounds, the respondent's application for relief arising from the breakdown of their marriage (the "Application"). Before the motion judge, the appellant argued: i) that Ontario lacked jurisdiction to hear the Application and ii) in the alternative, that the city of Kunming, in the province of Yunnan, People's Republic of China was the more appropriate forum for the dispute. The motion judge rejected both arguments, concluding that Ontario had jurisdiction and that the appellant had not met her burden of showing that China was the "clearly more appropriate" forum for the case.

[2] For the reasons that follow, I would not interfere with the motion judge's finding that Ontario has jurisdiction to hear the dispute. However, I conclude that the motion judge erred in reaching the conclusion that China was not the "clearly more appropriate" forum for resolving the respondent's property and support claims.

[3] At its core, this litigation relates to assets located in China and the respondent's post-separation interest in them, if any. The respondent purportedly waived his interest in the assets by entering into three written agreements in China. These agreements have not been set aside. Since these documents were executed and witnessed in China, the Chinese courts are in a far better position to deal with their applicability. Respectfully, the motion judge ignored this very important factor in analyzing the doctrine of forum non conveniens.[1] Instead, the motion judge focused on the fact that the respondent was pursuing a trust claim interest in a single property in Ontario: a property worth a small fraction of the appellant's overall assets. In my view, the failure to consider the parties' domestic agreements as central to the forum non conveniens analysis was an error in principle justifying intervention by this court.

II. BACKGROUND

[4] In 2003, the appellant and the respondent met in China. In 2012, they married in the city of Kunming, Yunnan Province, China.

[5] The appellant is a Chinese citizen. She previously held Canadian permanent resident status, until it expired in March 2019. This status was not renewed. The respondent is a Canadian citizen.

[6] The appellant provided evidence during the Motion demonstrating that, between the date of marriage in 2012 and the date of divorce in 2018 (approximately 6 years), she was in Canada for a total of approximately 300 days (less than 10 months in total). She conceded during questioning that some visits to Toronto, Ontario in 2015 may not have appeared in the evidence filed by the parties.

[7] Both parties were previously married and have children from those marriages. They do not have any children together.

[8] The parties do not agree on their date of separation. The appellant claims that the parties separated in April 2016, after a physical altercation in their home. For his part, the respondent claims that the parties continued to reside together as a couple both in China and Toronto until at least March 2018.

[9] In March 2018, the parties obtained a divorce certificate in China. As discussed in further detail below, the respondent disputes the validity of this divorce.

(1) The Parties' Assets and Debts

[10] The respondent claims that he and the appellant contributed work and resources to a series of family companies that are located in China. He suggests that the appellant leveraged assets from certain family businesses to borrow funds to purchase real estate in her name alone.

[11] The appellant states that she owned corporations and real property in China before and during the marriage. She denies that the respondent made any financial contributions to her assets.

[12] The respondent claims that the parties shared two matrimonial homes located in Toronto. In 2012, just prior to the marriage, the appellant purchased a property at 220 Elmwood Avenue (the "Elmwood Property"), in her name alone. She claims that she purchased the Elmwood Property for her son to reside in while he attended school in Canada. In May 2016, the Elmwood Property was sold, and the proceeds were used to purchase property at 33 Bevdale Road, Toronto (the "Bevdale Property"), also in the appellant's name alone. The respondent claims he found the Bevdale Property and worked with a real estate agent to arrange the purchase. He states that the parties were not separated at this time.

[13] The appellant has a Royal Bank of Canada account in Toronto, in her name alone, which she used to pay the expenses for the Elmwood and Bevdale Properties. The respondent argues that he made contributions to this account that were used to pay for the mortgage, taxes, utilities, and other expenses for the Bevdale Property.

(2) The Marital Assets Agreement, Letter of Commitment, and Repayment Agreement

[14] On March 11, 2014, the parties signed a Marital Assets Agreement addressing five Chinese properties the appellant purchased in her name alone. This Agreement confirms that the respondent has no entitlements to the properties.

[15] On May 12, 2015, the respondent also signed a Letter of Commitment clarifying that he lacked any interest in 41 specified investment properties. These properties are all located in China.

[16] In 2019, after the divorce, the parties negotiated the terms of a repayment agreement for a 2,000,000 RMB[2] loan made to the appellant by the respondent, his mother, sister, and brother-in-law. The repayment amount is 6,000,000 RMB, which the appellant claims includes interest and an "equitable voluntary payment" by her to the respondent, representing his "monetary interest" in their relationship. The respondent argues that the repayment agreement is unrelated to any division of marital property. The Marital Assets Agreement, Letter of Commitment, and loan repayment agreement were all executed and witnessed in China, in the Chinese language and in Chinese currency.

(3) The Divorce Agreement and the Supplementary Agreement

[17] On March 26, 2018, the parties applied for a divorce in Kunming. They attended together at the Kunming City Ministry of Civil Affairs Marriage Registry and brought a handwritten document stating their intention to divorce as well as their agreement that i) there will be no disputes in relation to the children and ii) all issues related to property, debts, and liabilities had been resolved through private negotiation.

[18] The registrar required a typed document, so the respondent typed a document with the same terms as the handwritten document (the "Divorce Agreement"). Both parties signed the document, added their fingerprints, and obtained a divorce certificate.

[19] The appellant claims this divorce certificate is valid and reflects the parties' agreement. The respondent states that the appellant misled him, assuring him that this was not a real divorce.

[20] The appellant states that on March 26, 2018, the parties signed a Supplementary Agreement to the Divorce Agreement. In this document, the respondent waived his rights to any of the appellant's assets. It states that all property in either party's name belongs to the appellant, except for a car and a debt owing by the respondent, which he would retain.

[21] The appellant argues that the Supplementary Agreement reflects the parties' negotiations and the fact that the respondent made no contributions to her corporations or real estate.

[22] The respondent asserts that he does not recall executing the Supplementary Agreement. He claims he was unaware of the Supplementary Agreement's existence until December 2019. He admits that the signature on the document resembles his but claims the appellant would ask him to sign blank documents in case his signature was needed while he was absent. The respondent contests the validity of the divorce obtained in China as well as the Supplementary Agreement.

III. PROCEDURAL HISTORY

(1) The Application

[23] In February 2020, the respondent commenced an Application for various relief, including: i) a declaration that the Chinese divorce not be recognized or enforced in Ontario; ii) a declaration setting aside the Supplementary Agreement; and iii) a declaration that Ontario has jurisdiction to determine the outstanding property and support issues between the parties. The outstanding property and support issues included claims for equalization, spousal support, and the respondent's claim of a resulting and/or constructive trust over the Bevdale Property, based on the allegation that the appellant was unjustly enriched by his contributions to the Bevdale Property.

[24] The appellant refused to attorn to the jurisdiction of the court. Instead, she brought a motion for an order: i) dismissing the respondent's Application and ii) declaring that the city of Kunming, in Yunnan Province, China, is the more appropriate forum to determine any outstanding issues between the parties arising from the breakdown of their marriage.

(2) The motion judge's reasons

[25] In her reasons, the motion judge framed the issues on the Motion as: i) whether an Ontario court had jurisdiction to determine the respondent's property and spousal support claims and ii) if the court had jurisdiction, whether Ontario was the appropriate forum to determine the issues.

(a) The motion judge finds Ontario has jurisdiction

[26] The motion judge noted that she was not asked to determine the validity of the Chinese divorce. She acknowledged that there is a presumption in favour of recognizing the validity of foreign divorces, and that it is rare for a Canadian court to refuse to recognize a divorce properly obtained under the laws of another jurisdiction. While the divorce's validity would impact the respondent's spousal support claim, it would not impact the equalization and trust claims made under s. 15 of the Family Law Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. F.3 ("FLA"), which the motion judge considered next. In considering these claims, the motion judge recognized that, absent a statutory rule, an Ontario court may take jurisdiction simpliciter over the case if there is a real and substantial connection between the forum and the subject matter or the parties to the dispute: Club Resorts Ltd. v. Van Breda, 2012 SCC 17, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 572.

[27] The motion judge concluded that Ontario had jurisdiction to hear the respondent's equalization and property division claims. In her view, the following factors provided Ontario with a real and substantial connection to the dispute:

- The respondent is a Canadian citizen who primarily resided in Canada during the marriage and since separation (on either separation date put forward by the parties);

- The respondent claims a beneficial interest in an Ontario property. The parties and their children resided in the Elmwood and Bevdale Properties as their family homes during the marriage;

- The appellant regularly visited Ontario each year and obtained permanent resident status. In her application for this status, she expressed a desire to make Canada her home;

- There may be unfairness to the respondent if Ontario does not assume jurisdiction. Expert evidence, adduced by the respondent yet untested by cross-examination, suggested that the respondent is out of time to make his claim for property division in China; and

- Although there are relevant documents and witnesses in both China and Ontario, the documents relevant to the trust claim would primarily be in Ontario, as would some evidence relevant to determining the date of separation.

(b) The motion judge finds Ontario is the more appropriate forum

[28] The motion judge then went on to address the appellant's argument that if the court found that Ontario had jurisdiction, it should nevertheless decline to exercise jurisdiction on grounds of forum non conveniens because China was clearly the more appropriate forum. The motion judge disagreed and referenced the following considerations:

- All the witnesses and evidence relating to the respondent's trust claim would be in Ontario, except for the appellant's evidence;

- The "natural forum" for a claim to an interest in an Ontario property is Ontario;

- The appellant would be able to present her case in Ontario without significant difficulty. While Chinese documents and currency values would need to be translated and converted for purposes of a claim in Ontario, the parties were able to do this for purposes of the Motion and the proceeding unfolded without disruption;

- If the respondent is successful in asking an Ontario court not to recognize or enforce the Chinese divorce, he could then proceed with his spousal support claim. Certain relevant documents and witnesses would be in Ontario as the respondent spent more time here than in China; and

- If the court declined jurisdiction, the respondent may be out of time to pursue a claim for division of marital property in China, as demonstrated by the conflicting expert evidence. This would represent the loss of a legitimate juridical advantage.

[29] Accordingly, the motion judge dismissed the Motion, permitting the respondent to proceed with his claims in Ontario.

IV. GROUNDS OF APPEAL

[30] The appellant raises the following issues on appeal in her factum:

1. Is there a real and substantial connection between the parties, the matrimonial claims being litigated, and Ontario?

2. Is Yunnan Province, China the more appropriate forum to determine the claims raised in the respondent's Application?

3. Should this court strike out all or part of the respondent's Application, leaving only the trust claims concerning the Bevdale Property to proceed in Ontario?

V. THE LEGAL FRAMEWORK

[31] Both parties agree that in the absence of a statutory rule, the common law conflicts rule of Canadian private international law — the "real and substantial connection" test — determines whether jurisdiction exists in Ontario's courts. It is not disputed that the motion judge properly referenced Van Breda and identified that a real and substantial connection must be established primarily on the basis of objective factors that connect the legal situation or the subject matter of the litigation with the forum. The parties also agree that the motion judge properly recognized that, even when an Ontario court assumes jurisdiction, if the defendant (or respondent in the Application) establishes that another forum is clearly more appropriate for disposing of the litigation, then the court can decline to exercise jurisdiction on the grounds of forum non conveniens: see Van Breda, at para. 108.

VI. DISCUSSION

(1) Is there a real and substantial connection between the parties, the matrimonial claims being litigated, and Ontario?

[32] The appellant argues that the motion judge erred in ignoring or misapprehending the facts in concluding that there was a real and substantial connection between this matter and Ontario.

[33] In her factum, the appellant contends that the material before the motion judge suggests that the respondent worked in China and that his affidavit did not establish that he lived in Canada. She, on the other hand, does not live in or carry on business in Ontario; the appellant's business is "based entirely in China", and the respondent's employment and business activities during the "material times" were entirely in China. Furthermore, the appellant argues that her only connection to Ontario is a single encumbered piece of real property (the Bevdale Property) and a bank account; by contrast, the appellant owns many assets and owes significant debts in China.

[34] Absent palpable and overriding error or an extricable error of law warranting correctness review, deference ought to be afforded to the motion judge. In my view, the appellant has not identified any extricable errors of law or palpable and overriding error in the motion judge's analysis on the question of whether Ontario has jurisdiction.

[35] The motion judge found that the respondent was a Canadian citizen and that he resided primarily in Canada during the marriage and post separation. I do not accept the appellant's submission that the motion judge misapprehended the evidence on this point and that there was not a "shred" of evidence that the respondent lived primarily in Canada. The respondent presented proof of Canadian citizenship and the respondent's passport and driver's licence all indicated that he lived at the Elmwood and Bevdale Properties. Furthermore, there was evidence before the motion judge that he made payments towards the carrying costs of maintaining the properties in Ontario. In my view, the motion judge did not err in finding that the respondent resided primarily in Canada.

[36] In Wang v. Lin, 2013 ONCA 33, 358 D.L.R. (4th) 452, this court accepted that in the context of marriage breakdown the presumptive connecting factors are necessarily different from those identified in Van Breda, which was a tort case. This court noted that the list of presumptive connecting factors is not closed and the location of the "real home" or "ordinary residence" should be a presumptive connecting factor: Wang, at paras. 46-47; see also Knowles v. Lindstrom, 2014 ONCA 116, 118 O.R. (3d) 763, at para. 27, leave to appeal refused, [2014] S.C.C.A. No. 161. Therefore, the respondent's ordinary place of residence was a significant factor to consider in determining jurisdiction.

[37] Furthermore, the motion judge noted that part of the respondent's claim is an assertion that he has an equitable interest in the Bevdale Property. The location of that property is in Ontario. This court has held that the location of a property is also a presumptive connecting factor sufficient to establish jurisdiction simpliciter: Knowles, at paras. 21, 24.

[38] As this court explained in Knowles, a single presumptive connecting factor, in the absence of any rebuttal of that presumption by the appellant, is sufficient to establish jurisdiction under the Van Breda analysis: Knowles, at para. 24. In this case, the motion judge identified that the appellant was a Canadian citizen, ordinarily resident in Canada, and that he was advancing a claim on property located in Ontario.

[39] I would defer to the motion judge's conclusion that there was a sufficient connection to Ontario to establish jurisdiction simpliciter.

(2) Is Yunnan Province, China the more appropriate forum to determine the claims raised in the respondent's Application?

[40] After finding that the Ontario court had jurisdiction, the motion judge then considered the appellant's argument that she should decline to exercise that jurisdiction under the forum non conveniens doctrine because China was "clearly more appropriate" for determining the issues in the case. The burden was on the appellant to show why jurisdiction should not be exercised: Van Breda, at para. 103.

[41] The motion judge's conclusion on the forum non conveniens issue is properly viewed as an exercise in judicial discretion and this court will defer to that assessment, absent an error in principle, a material misapprehension of the evidence, or if, in the circumstances, the exercise of that discretion is unreasonable: Knowles, at para. 40.

[42] In essence, the doctrine focuses on the circumstances of the case, and its purpose is to ensure that both parties are treated fairly and that the process for resolving their litigation is efficient: Van Breda, at para. 105. The factors that come into play in considering the question of forum non conveniens depend on the context and may include the locations of parties and witnesses, the cost of transferring the case to another place, the impact of a transfer on the case or a related case, the possibility of conflicting judgments, problems relating to recognition or enforcement of judgments, and the relative strengths of the connections of the parties: Van Breda, at para. 110.

[43] Loss of juridical advantage to one or the other of the parties is also a relevant consideration: Knowles, at para. 43. Even then, however, comity and an attitude of respect for the courts and legal systems of other countries may be in order: Van Breda, at para. 112. A court must not lean too instinctively in favour of its own jurisdiction: Van Breda, at para. 112.

[44] In my view, the motion judge erred in principle in her analysis on the issue of forum non conveniens. I find this for several reasons.

[45] First, the motion judge ignored a very important factor – the existence of three signed agreements waiving the respondent's entitlement to the assets and properties in China. The Divorce Agreement, dated March 26, 2018 (translated), says, "the [appellant and respondent] acknowledged that issues pertaining to assets, financial claims and debts have been resolved on their own through negotiations." The appellant claims that several key agreements have come out of the parties' private negotiations, including:

- The Supplementary Agreement to the Divorce Agreement, dated March 26, 2018, which states that the respondent will "move out and waive rights to any property or assets" (English translation). It further stipulates that "[a]ll corporation or company's share's [sic] and personal assets" under either the respondent or appellant's name belong to the appellant, including the real estate property in Canada purchased by the appellant before the marriage (English translation).
- The Marital Assets Agreement, dated March 11, 2014, which states that the five properties in China being purchased are in the appellant's name and the parties agree that she alone owns them and the respondent has no interest in them.
- The Letter of Commitment, dated May 12, 2015, which states that the respondent makes the "sincere promise to forego ownership in 41 properties" he co-owned with the appellant (English translation).

[46] As this court stated recently in Krebs v. Cote, 2021 ONCA 467, 459 D.L.R. (4th) 730, at para. 19, "[p]arties should be encouraged to enter agreements to define their rights and obligations. Jurisprudential shoals upon which an agreement may founder unnecessarily do not advance that goal."

[47] To this end, under Ontario law, there is a high bar to set aside a domestic contract that complies with the enforceability requirements of s. 55(1) of the FLA: namely, that it is made in writing, signed by the parties and witnessed.

[48] In this case, to proceed with his claims for equalization or an interest in the properties covered by the agreements, the respondent would first have to seek to set those agreements aside. The respondent would also have to address the appellant's position that there was a loan repayment agreement executed in 2019 that settled some of the matrimonial claims. In Ontario, of course, a claim for equalization or support under the FLA would engage the factors set out at s. 56(4) of the Act for setting aside a domestic agreement.

[49] Section 56(4) of the FLA provides that,

> A court may, on application, set aside a domestic contract or a provision in it,
>
> (a) if a party failed to disclose to the other significant assets, or significant debts or other liabilities, existing when the domestic contract was made;
>
> (b) if a party did not understand the nature or consequences of the domestic contract; or
> (c) otherwise in accordance with the law of contract.

[50] There was also evidence before the motion judge that similar provisions exist in China to set aside unfair contracts. The opinion letter tendered by the appellant on the Motion states that, according to Article 54 of the Contract Law of People's Republic of China, a valid contract can be set aside where there is a significant misunderstanding, or when one party uses fraudulent or coercive means or takes advantage of the other party while they are in a vulnerable state, not unlike Ontario.

[51] In this way, the preliminary question of whether the agreements could be set aside, was in my view central to assessing the more appropriate forum. Respectfully, the motion judge erred in considering the respondent's claims in the Bevdale Property – and his potential entitlements to share in some way (whether by way of equalization or a direct property interest) in the appellant's Chinese properties – without considering the question of setting aside the divorce and/or the agreements about property. With the agreements as the proper focus, and given that the agreements were all executed and witnessed in China, in the Chinese language, it becomes clear that China is the most appropriate forum for the dispute.

[52] Second, the motion judge's reasons state that the natural forum for the claim to the Bevdale Property is here in Ontario. As set out above, the location of the property is a factor that carries considerable weight on the jurisdiction inquiry. However, the motion judge's focus on the Bevdale Property overwhelmed her analysis of forum non conveniens. In this case, the far more valuable property interests are in China and are governed by contracts in China; there are multiple agreements between the parties that are, as mentioned, written in the Chinese language and in Chinese currency. These agreements concern multi-million-dollar business interests and properties there. In contrast, the Bevdale Property is worth considerably less. The Bevdale Property should not have been the focal point of the analysis and it certainly was not the natural forum for the division of property claim viewed as a whole.

[53] Third, the motion judge held that the respondent was not claiming any property interest in properties or corporations located in China, only in the monetary payment that would occur after the equalization calculation based on properties or corporations in China. However, this factor assumes that an equalization payment would be the only remedy under Chinese law. There was no evidence that equalization rather than distribution of properties would be the remedy in China and the motion judge engaged in speculation that this would be the case.

[54] Finally, the motion judge erred in her analysis in terms of the respondent's loss of a legitimate juridical advantage. The motion judge identified the juridical advantage as the respondent's ability to pursue his claim for property division in Ontario because he may be out of time in China. On the Motion, the respondent produced an opinion from a lawyer stating that, in China, where a man and woman are divorced by joint divorce and the parties have a change of mind over the issue of property division, they have one year from the date of the divorce to request to modify or revoke the property division agreement. The respondent's legal opinion concludes that, based on this rule, litigation concerning division of property by joint divorce needs to be filed within one year.

[55] For her part, the appellant disagreed that the respondent was out of time in China. She also produced an expert opinion that stated that the respondent could seek redress in a Chinese court to amend or void the Supplementary Agreement if he could demonstrate that he was under a serious misunderstanding, or there was an appearance of unfairness, or that he was defrauded, coerced or taken advantage of while in a vulnerable state that caused him to erroneously express his intention. Faced with this conflicting evidence, the motion judge nevertheless held that if Ontario declined jurisdiction, the respondent could lose a legitimate juridical advantage because he was out of time in China.

[56] I acknowledge that there is some support for the respondent's position that an expired limitation period in the other jurisdiction would make Ontario the more juridically advantageous forum for him as plaintiff, and that a juridical advantage to a plaintiff in Ontario weighs against staying the proceedings: see Garcia v. Tahoe Resources Inc., 2017 BCCA 39, 407 D.L.R. (4th) 651, at para. 91, leave to appeal refused, [2017] S.C.C.A. No. 94.

[57] However, some courts have ruled that the plaintiff's failure to bring a claim within the time limit "militates against attaching any weight to the juridical advantage factor because, in some circumstances, a plaintiff could successfully oppose a defendant's forum non conveniens application in one jurisdiction by simply allowing the limitation period to expire in the other jurisdiction": Tahoe, at para. 91. It seems, then, that "the weight attached to the juridical advantage factor when considering the expiration of a limitation period in another jurisdiction is a case-specific inquiry that turns on the facts": Tahoe, at para. 92.

[58] In this case, the motion judge held that the limitation period weighed in the respondent's favour. There was no case-specific inquiry in reaching that conclusion. As noted, this case involves the potential expiry of a limitation period; the respondent's evidence on this point does not lead to this conclusion with any certainty. The motion judge did not resolve an inconsistency between the facts of the case and the facts relied upon by the respondent's expert opinion. The opinion regarding the one-year time limit concerned parties who "change their mind" over property division. The respondent's evidence, however, was that he was misled in terms of the Divorce Agreement and was not aware of the existence of a Supplementary Agreement. He did not argue that he had changed his mind about the agreements. On that evidence, it becomes less clear that the respondent is, in fact, out of time in China.

[59] Furthermore, the respondent testified during questioning that he has never thought of going to court in China to deal with property division. This fact does not help the respondent claim the juridical advantage of an Ontario action: see Hurst v. Société Nationale de L'Amiante, 2008 ONCA 573, 93 O.R. (3d) 338, at paras. 51-52.

[60] In summary, the motion judge erred in principle in her analysis under forum non conveniens. In my view, the appellant has demonstrated that the balance tips heavily in favour of China as the "clearly more appropriate" forum for resolving the parties' property issues and the motion judge should have declined to exercise jurisdiction. Accordingly, I would allow this ground of appeal.

(3) Should this court strike out all or part of the respondent's Application, leaving only the trust claims concerning the Bevdale

[61] The appellant also argued that this court should consider severing the respondent's trust claim over the Bevdale Property, allowing it to proceed in Ontario while striking the remainder of the claims.

[62] As I have already decided that China is the more appropriate forum to hear the claims arising from the parties' marital breakdown, this issue is now moot.

[63] However, I do make the following observations. Severing the specific claims in relation to the Bevdale Property appears to be contrary to some of the factors identified by the Supreme Court of Canada as relevant to the forum non conveniens analysis in Van Breda, at paras. 105, 110, including a desire to avoid a multiplicity of legal proceedings and avoiding conflicting decisions in different courts.

[64] Severance of the trust claim is also potentially problematic because this court has made clear that claims of unjust enrichment are rarely appropriate to address financial issues after the breakdown of a marriage and a court would, in all likelihood, find that equalization of all net family properties under the legislation would provide a full remedy to any unfairness that would otherwise arise from different contributions to family assets: McNamee v. McNamee, 2011 ONCA 533, 106 O.R. (3d) 401, at para. 66; Martin v. Sansome, 2014 ONCA 14, 118 O.R. (3d) 522, at para. 64.

VII. CONCLUSION

[65] For these reasons, I would allow the appeal and stay the respondent's Application.

[66] I would award the appellant her costs of the appeal in the agreed amount of $13,000 inclusive of disbursements and applicable taxes.

[1] I note that in a recent Superior Court decision, Kore Meals LLC v. Freshii Development LLC, 2021 ONSC 2896, 156 O.R. (3d) 311, E.M. Morgan J. observed that the world of videoconference hearings may have implications for the relevance of forum non conveniens. I leave that issue for another day. In the present case, where the competing forums involve different languages and different time zones, the choice of forum remains relevant.

Introduction

[1] Under what circumstances may a party in Family Court obtain transcripts of court proceedings? That is the issue raised by this motion.

Background

[2] The respondent, R.N., is the mother of three children in respect of whom the applicant ("Society") sought a protection finding. The respondent and moving party, G.N., is the husband of R.N. and the father of the children.

[3] In September 2000, the Society obtained a temporary supervision order pursuant to which the two youngest children were placed in the care and custody of R.N., and G.N. was not to reside with those children or have contact with them except as arranged and supervised by the Society in its discretion. According to paragraph 4 of a final order made in November 2000, the Society was concerned that G.N. address "outstanding issues of substance use and domestic violence which pose significant risk to the children."

[4] From what I am able to determine, the parties again were before the court a number of times in 2001 and 2002. In December 2001, a six-month supervision order was made. The concerns of the Society regarding G.N. were much the same. For example, paragraph 1(4) of the order required G.N. to "attend at group counselling to address anger management." In June 2002, this supervisory order was terminated and there have been no further protection proceedings.

[5] On March 9, 2004, G.N. brought the within motion. He asks for an order directing the preparation of two transcripts. The notice of motion states that he requires the following:

> (a) the transcripts of evidence heard in Family Court on October 11, 2000;
> (b) the transcripts of evidence[1] heard in Family Court on July 17, 2001.

[6] In his supporting affidavit, G.N. deposes that his request for the transcripts was denied. He explains his need for the transcripts in this way:

> I need these transcripts because I am preparing to file a lawsuit against the Children's Aid Society and they will be important for me to build my case. I need to prove to the court that my family has been wrongly accused and instead of helping to keep our family together, Children's Aid Society broke our family apart.

[7] The proceeding on October 11, 2000 was a case conference. All parties were present and represented by counsel. That case conference produced an order by which the protection application of the Society in respect of the third and oldest child was withdrawn on consent.

[8] The proceeding on July 17, 2001 was a case conference that, according to the endorsement of the presiding judge, "on the consent of all parties . . . was deemed to also be a settlement conference."

[9] Perhaps I should point out that Mr. Hallett is representing G.N. only as duty counsel and the respondent, R.N., is not involved in the motion.

Discussion

Courts of Justice Act

[10] The Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43 is silent on the matter of transcripts. However, the general jurisdiction found in s. 146 is relevant:

> 146. Jurisdiction conferred on a court, a judge or a justice of the peace shall, in the absence of express provision for procedures for its exercise in any Act, regulation or rule, be exercised in any manner consistent with the due administration of justice.

[11] I do not think it can be doubted that I have the inherent jurisdiction to order that transcripts be produced of any proceedings in this court. There being no statutory or other provision on point, the only requirement is that I must exercise this jurisdiction in a "manner consistent with the due administration of justice."

Child and Family Services Act

[12] The only references to transcripts in the Child and Family Services Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.11 are found in s. 45(10) and s. 50(1)(b) and they are not helpful. Section 45(10) reads:

> 45(10) No person except a party or a party's solicitor shall be given a copy of a transcript of the hearing, unless the court orders otherwise.

[13] "Hearing," in s. 45(10), means a hearing under Part III – Child Protection. The transcripts sought at bar are in respect of conferences, not a hearing.

[14] Section 50(1) provides, in part:

> 50(1) Despite anything in the Evidence Act, in any proceeding under this Part [Part III – Child Protection],
>
> (a) the court may consider the past conduct of a person toward any child . . .; and
>
> (b) any oral or written statement or report that the court considers relevant to the proceeding, including a transcript . . . in an earlier civil or criminal proceeding, is admissible into evidence.

[15] Section 50(1) is not applicable to this motion.

Family Law Rules – settlement and case conferences

[16] Rule 17 of the Family Law Rules deals with conferences. Regarding settlement conferences, rule 17(23) stipulates:

> 17(23) No brief or evidence prepared for a settlement conference and no statement made at a settlement conference shall be disclosed to any other judge, except in,
>
> (a) an agreement reached at a settlement conference; or
> (b) an order.

[17] "Any other judge," in rule 17(23), refers, I should think, to a judge in an ongoing protection proceeding. "Order," in rule 17(23)(b), is not restricted to one made at a settlement conference, otherwise it would say so, as it does in rule 17(23)(a) regarding "an agreement."

[18] Rule 17(22.1) addresses the destruction of settlement conference briefs:

> 17(22.1) A settlement conference brief that does not form part of the continuing record shall be returned, at the end of the conference, to the party who filed it, or shall be destroyed by the court staff immediately after the conference.[2]

[19] The confidentiality usually associated with settlement conferences is limited. It is directed towards preventing prejudice to a party in an ongoing proceeding. Many things filed or said at a settlement conference would lead to the appearance of prejudice if known to a judge presiding over a motion in, or a hearing of, the proceeding. This type of prejudice is not present here, for the child protection application is completed.

[20] As for case conferences, there is nothing in rule 17 which would make them immune from transcription at the request of a party to the case conference.

[21] Rule 17, therefore, is not a bar to the within motion.

may the relief sought be granted on a motion?

[22] Rule 14(1) of the Family Law Rules states:

> 14(1) A person who wants any of the following may make a motion:
>
> 1. A temporary order for a claim made in an application.
>
> 2. Directions on how to carry on the case.
> 3. A change in an order or agreement (but not a change in a final order in a child protection case that is reviewable under section 64 of the Child and Family Services Act).

[23] Ms. McGregor submits that the relief sought in this motion is not enumerated in rule 14(1) and, thus, is not available. I do not read rule 14(1) so restrictively. Instead, the rule sets out three situations in which one may bring a motion, without suggesting that they are a closed list.

is there a legitimate need for the transcripts?

[24] Ours is not a secretive justice system. Generally, those who need to know are entitled to know. Transcripts of proceedings in Family Court should be made available to anyone who was a party to those proceedings upon proof, firstly, of a legitimate need for them and, secondly, that their probative value outweighs their possible harm. Obviously, the cost of transcription must be borne by the requesting party.

[25] In this motion, I am unable to ascertain whether G.N. has a legitimate need for the transcripts. As he has not indicated how the transcripts will help him to “build” his planned lawsuit against the Society (his bald statement that they will is not enough), I cannot ascertain their probative value or their possible harm, if any.

Conclusion

[26] The motion is lacking in proof of legitimate need, probative value and possible harm and, accordingly, is dismissed. If costs are a problem, I may be spoken to.

[1] I do not expect that evidence, in the true meaning of that term, was actually heard on October 11th or July 17th, because, as will soon be seen, those court attendances were conferences. I assume that what G.N. is referring to are the statements of the parties, the submissions of counsel and any comments by the presiding judge made on those occasions.

[2] Rule 17(22) provides that a settlement conference brief "does not form part of the continuing record unless the court orders otherwise at the settlement conference."

Reasons for Judgment released on 15 July 1996

CIVIL PROCEDURE — General — Procedure where rules are silent — Importation from rules of another court — Rules of another court may not ordinarily be imported, but statutory direction (in section 146 of Courts of Justice Act) to exercise power in manner consistent with due administration of justice may allow court to be guided by practice of other court.

CIVIL PROCEDURE — Pre-trial disclosure — Document disclosure — Access to documents — Relevance — Request for information about mother's long-gone former boyfriend was irrelevant to issues in current custody-and-access dispute.

CIVIL PROCEDURE — Pre-trial disclosure — Document disclosure — Disclosure from non-parties — Notice to non-parties and court's power to screen material before ordering disclosure — Principles in The Queen v. O'Connor (S.C.C., 1995) applied to civil proceedings (in particular, custody and access dispute in family law).

CIVIL PROCEDURE — Pre-trial disclosure — Medical examination — Grounds — Relevance — Analysis of hair samples to test for drug use — In dispute over custody of and access to children, drug habits of certain parties would be relevant to court's decision about children's best interests and would thus meet test of relevance in section 105 of Courts of Justice Act. — Court ordered relevant party to submit to test of hair samples.

EVIDENCE — Proof of parentage — Blood tests — Tissue testing — Testing hair samples for drug use — Where parties to custody and access dispute sought court order requiring submission to testing of hair samples, motions judge rules that parties could not invoke section 10 (blood testing) of Children's Law Reform Act because this provision was limited to (a) determinations of child's paternity, which was never in issue in this case; and (b) "blood" tests, which, by implication, excluded other types of tissue, such as hair samples.

In a custody and access dispute, the third parties made a motion for pre-trial disclosure

(a) to have the mother and former boyfriend submit hair samples for tests to d etermine the extent of their recent drug use;

(b) for production of the medical and youth court records of the boyfriend; an d

(c) for production of any information about the boyfriend in the control of the local children's aid society.

The applicant mother was not opposed to the test of hair samples, so long as the respondent also submitted to such testing and provided that the third parties paid for the tests.

The request for the test was originally framed in the context of the ordinary rule for pre-trial disclosure, with some analogy to the statutory provisions for blood tests in cases of disputed paternity. Despite an earlier report, the most recent evidence indicated that the mother's former boyfriend was no longer involved with the mother and would not be interacting with the children in any way.

Held:— Motion for hair tests allowed. Motion for disclosure of information about the mother's former boyfriend dismissed. The cost of the tests to be borne by the third parties, but otherwise, each party to bear own costs.

Rule 23 (pre-trial disclosure) of the Rules of the Ontario Court (Provincial Division) in Family Matters should not be used for such an intrusive procedure as blood testing or hair testing for drugs. And the provisions of the Children's Law Reform Act, with their specific mention of "blood" tests for the express purpose of determining paternity would be a proper instance of the application of the maxim "Expressio unius exclusio alterius", thereby precluding any extension to testing of hair samples.

Section 105 (medical examination) of the Courts of Justice Act, however, would be available for the purpose sought by the third parties. A corresponding provision in British Columbia (where there is no specific statutory authority for ordering blood tests) has been used not only for blood tests but tests of other tissue samples. In this case where all parties have claimed custody of the children or as much access as possible, the parents' drug habits would be relevant to a determination of the children's best interests and would thus meet the test of relevance in section 105.

The Rules of the Ontario Court (Provincial Division) in Family Matters say nothing of implementing section 105. The Rules of Civil Procedure, on the other hand, do cover medical examinations very adequately, but the importation of the rules of one court into those of another is ordinarily prohibited. Section 146 of the Courts of Justice Act, however, directs that, in the absence of express provision for procedures for the exercise a court's jurisdiction, the court may resort to a course of procedure that is consistent with the due administration of justice. Thus, for the limited purposes of this motion, the exercise of this court's jurisdiction under section 105 of the Courts of Justice Act in the manner provided in the Rules of Civil Procedure would in fact be consistent with the due administration of justice.

Pre-trial disclosure, as set out in the rules of court, must relate to the disclosure of facts relevant to the issues in the proceeding. In this case, the mother's former boyfriend was not to be involved with the children as a parent or with the mother and any information sought about him would therefore be irrelevant. Requests for information on him would amount to a fishing expedition into the life of a non-party and a non-participant. In addition, any information on his alleged youth court record was confidential under the Young Offenders Act and, to obtain such information, one had to follow the procedure specified under that Act. Even if a proper motion had been brought under that Act, it would be dismissed for the same reasons.

In a motion for disclosure from non-parties about non-parties, the procedure set out on The Queen v. O'Connor (S.C.C., 1995) should be followed, even in civil cases. Although non-parties may be summoned to appear at trial, they need not be summoned to appear at the motion. But the notice of motion and all materials in support of the motion should be served on those non-parties to give them a chance to appear and signify their opposition to any order for disclosure. And to guard against fishing expeditions, the notice of motion should be specific in terms of the information that is sought, including specific time periods and the relevance of the information.

SUPERIOR COURT OF JUSTICE – ONTARIO

DIVISIONAL COURT

RE: 9383859 Canada Ltd, Applicant

AND:

The Court of Appeal for Ontario and the Attorney General of Ontario, Respondents

BEFORE: Schabas J.

COUNSEL: Sandeep Singh, acting in person for the Applicant.

Josh Hunter, counsel for the Ministry of the Attorney General

HEARD: In writing

ENDORSEMENT ON RULE 2.1.01

This proceeding

[1] On August 25, 2023, Sandeep Singh, on behalf of the applicant, filed an application for judicial review in this Court. In his email accompanying the notice, Mr. Singh accurately advised the Court that the applicant sought to review a decision by the Executive Legal Officer ("ELO") of the Court of Appeal delisting the applicant's appeal in 9383859 Canada Ltd. v. Navartnam, Kubeskaram et al., COA-22-CV-0453.

[2] Following receipt of the notice of application, on August 29, 2023, the Court notified the applicant that it was "considering making an order staying or dismissing this proceeding under Rule 2.1.01 of the Rules of Civil Procedure because it appears on its face to be frivolous or vexatious or otherwise an abuse of the process of the court" and required the applicant to provide written submissions.

[3] The applicant then provided a brief factum largely repeating what is contained in the notice of application for judicial review. The applicant also helpfully provided some additional information about the appeal, including correspondence relating to the delisting of the appeal. The court also received a brief submission from the Ministry of the Attorney General for Ontario.

Background

[4] On July 31, 2023, the parties to the appeal, including the appellant, received an email from a Records Coordinator at the Court of Appeal advising that the appeal listed to be heard on September 14 was "delisted, as security for costs has not been paid." That email also referred to a motion that had been scheduled to be heard on August 14, 2023, but had to be rescheduled to September 18, 2023, to allow Mr. Singh to file materials and attend as he was not available "due to a family emergency." An earlier email from the Records Coordinator discloses that the motion set for August 14, 2023, was brought by the respondent to have the appeal dismissed.

[5] Mr. Singh objected to his appeal, which had been perfected, being delisted. A counsel in the Office of the ELO of the Court of Appeal then confirmed, in a letter dated August 16, 2023, that the appeal had been delisted because Mr. Singh had "not complied with Justice Miller's order dated February 27, 2023, which required [him] to pay security for costs" by March 8, 2023. Miller J.A.'s order was upheld by a panel of the Court of Appeal in July, 2023. The letter also confirmed that the respondent's motion would proceed on September 18, 2023.

[6] The applicant, in the meantime, is now seeking leave to appeal the security for costs decision to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Analysis

[7] The dismissal of a proceeding under Rule 2.1.01 is a blunt instrument, which should not be used lightly. It is reserved for the "clearest of cases, where the hallmarks of frivolous, vexatious or abusive litigation are plainly evident on the face of the pleading": Khan v. Krylov & Company LLP, 2017 ONCA 625 at para. 12. A "frivolous" proceeding is one "lacking a legal basis or legal merit; not serious; not reasonably purposeful": Currie v. Halton Regional Police Services Board, 2003 CanLII 7815 (ON CA) at para. 14.

[8] In the notice of application for judicial review and the applicant's factum, the primary complaint of the applicant is that the ELO delisted the appeal in the absence of a judge's order. As the factum states, the ELO "violated the Rules of Civil Procedure and deny [sic] the constitutional rights of the Applicant, by de-listing the Appeal of the Applicant, without an Order from a Honourable Judge."

[9] I am satisfied that this complaint lacks a legal basis and legal merit, and is not reasonably purposeful, for several reasons.

[10] First, decisions of the Court of Appeal are not subject to judicial review by the Divisional Court. The Court of Appeal is a "superior court of record": Courts of Justice Act, RSO 1990, c. C.43, ss. 2(1). Any review of its conduct must be by way of appeal or a motion to reconsider, if available. The Divisional Court, over which the Court of Appeal exercises appellate jurisdiction, has no jurisdiction to judicially review decisions of a "superior court of record", but only those of an "inferior court": Judicial Review Procedure Act, RSO 1990, c. J.1, s. 1.

[11] Second, the applicant provides no authority in support of the proposition that the ELO does not have the power to "delist" and that only a judge can do so. This is not surprising as the law goes the other way. As was observed in Valente v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 673, at paras. 47-49, the "assignment of judges, sittings of the court, and court lists" is part of the administration of the court controlled by judges, not the executive branch of government. Indeed, control over lists is seen as a basic or "minimum requirement" of the institutional aspect of judicial independence.

[12] This control over lists by the judiciary is also found in s. 75(1) of the Courts of Justice Act. Section s. 76 of the Courts of Justice Act then provides that court staff "shall act at the direction of the chief justice of the court." There is no rule of court requiring a judge's order to list or delist an appeal for hearing. Scheduling of matters is usually delegated to administrative staff who may list and delist cases. If a litigant takes issue with the listing or delisting of their case by an administrator, their remedy is to seek direction from a judge of the court in which the proceeding is taking place. The applicant has not done so. The application to this court, therefore, is an inappropriate and collateral attack on proceedings that are ongoing in the Court of Appeal.

[13] Third, the decision to delist in this case follows directly from an order of the Court of Appeal, as the applicant was ordered to post security for costs by March 8, 2023. Rule 56.05 of the Rules of Civil Procedure provides that, until security for costs is posted, the party required to post those costs is not entitled to take any further step in the proceeding other than to appeal the order. The applicant appealed the order unsuccessfully to a panel and has now sought leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. However, his application for leave does not stay Miller J.A.'s order. Accordingly, as the applicant cannot proceed with the appeal because it has failed to comply with a court order, the matter was delisted. Viewed this way, the ELO's action delisting the appeal was required in order to comply with Justice Miller's order.

[14] Finally, the applicant, which is a corporation, alleges that the delisting of the appeal denies its constitutional rights. However, Mr. Singh has not specified any constitutional right that has been infringed by the delisting, nor has he provided any particulars of how any right was infringed.

[15] Pursuant to Rule 2.1.01, the application for judicial review is dismissed.

LEGAL UPDATE COMMITTEE

Editor's Note

In Aroma Franchise Company Inc. v Aroma Espresso Bar Canada Inc., an Ontario Superior Court judge set aside an award based on reasonable apprehension of bias because the arbitrator had not disclosed a subsequent retainer in an unrelated arbitration by the law firm acting for the successful party. The decision attracted significant scrutiny in Canadian arbitration circles. The underlying case is not a construction law matter but was of particular interest to the College given the relative prevalence of arbitration agreements in construction contracts and the relatively small pool of highly qualified and experienced Canadian construction law arbitrators. The Canadian construction law bar is also comparatively small, and one often encounters the same counsel on multiple matters. To what extent would these arbitrators and counsel be restricted from taking on multiple arbitration retainers? The temperature may have been taken down somewhat by the Ontario Court of Appeal's reversal of the application judge's decision to disqualify the arbitrator in Aroma as detailed in our first case comment by Catriona Otto-Johnston and Chase Salembier. However, the issue may not be settled as a leave application to the Supreme Court of Canada is pending.

Our second case comment also concerns an important decision in the world of arbitration from one of our provincial appellate courts. Corbin Devlin reviews the Alberta Court of Appeal's decision in Husky v Technip, where the court declined to compel a non-party beneficiary to a contract to arbitrate a dispute pursuant to an arbitration agreement to which they were not privy. As Corbin demonstrates, the Court's reasoning was based on lack of clarity in the contract as to whether the non-party beneficiary had bound themselves to arbitration and declined to deny their access to the courts in the face of this ambiguity. The author suggests that the result may have been different with more precise drafting, a suggestion which bears monitoring in future cases.

Our next case comment is also from the Alberta Court of Appeal and demonstrates the importance of understanding the specific requirements of provincial lien statutes and practices. Catriona Otto-Johnston reviews the history of a lengthy lien proceeding arising from an insolvency, Chandos Construction Ltd. v Deloitte Restructuring Inc. Briefly, the Court of Appeal ruled that in these circumstances where the lien had been vacated by posting of security with the court the Prompt Payment and Construction Lien Act permitted the lien to be perfected by the terms of a court order and that it was therefore unnecessary for the lien claimant to have issued a statement of claim within the limitation period provided by the Alberta Limitations Act. Although the Court's decision turned on the specific wording of the court order at issue, which was not in the usual template form, it is interesting to contrast these requirements with other jurisdictions with more stringent requirements. Under Ontario's Construction Act, for example, a lien must always be perfected with a statement of claim (your own or by sheltering under someone else's) and the time periods to preserve and perfect liens are always governed by the Construction Act and not the general limitations statute. One of the lessons here is that there is no substitute for local knowledge and expertise, particularly when it comes to liens.

In our fourth case comment, Brendan Bowles and Isa Dookie discuss the potential for a lawyer's personal liability for costs when that lawyer has either subjective knowledge that a lien is improper or is reckless or wilfully blind to the defects of the lien yet preserves or perfects it anyway. While the Court declined to award costs against counsel personally in 2708320 Ontario Ltd. cob Viceroy Homes v. Jia Development Inc (which decision was appealed, with the Court holding leave was required to appeal and denying said leave in JIA Development Inc. v. 2708320 Ontario Ltd. (Viceroy Homes), this decision stands as a good reminder to construction counsel across the country that diligence must be exercised when representing clients with liens.

We conclude this issue with a "how to" guide for calling on a bond to satisfy judgment obtained for a lien. Dan Fridmar and Jacob McClelland provide a step-by-step reference for this seldom-used procedure. While the checklist is specific to Ontario rules and procedures, it provides a helpful starting point for other jurisdictions as well. We suggest readers make note of this commentary for future reference, when you or others in your office are asked: "How do I seek payment of my client's judgment from a lien bond?".

With these five comments, we conclude Legal Update #170, our first edition of 2025. Brendan, Catriona and the rest of the Legal Update Committee look forward to bringing you interesting and helpful content throughout the year. As always, we welcome submissions for the next issue and encourage you to reach out with any suggestions or pieces. In this respect, while this issue focuses on case comments, we also welcome noteworthy submissions on statutory developments or contract issues.

The Aroma of Bias: Ontario Court of Appeal Clarifies an Arbitrator's Duty to Disclose New Mandates

In November 2024, the Ontario Court of Appeal released the eagerly awaited decision of Aroma Franchise Company Inc. v Aroma Espresso Bar Canada Inc., 2024 ONCA 839 ("Aroma"), which dealt with the appeal of a decision setting aside an arbitral award on the basis of finding a reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of an arbitrator due to the arbitrator's failure to disclose his appointment by counsel on an unrelated matter.

In doing so, the Ontario Court of Appeal clarifies the duty of disclosure for arbitrators and discusses the relationship between disclosure and the existence of a reasonable apprehension of bias. This decision is significant to arbitrators and counsel with an arbitration practice, providing important guidance on the disclosure obligations of arbitrators who are appointed for multiple matters by the same party or counsel, as well as when a reasonable apprehension of bias may be found where an arbitrator does not disclose the fact that they have been retained for a separate and unrelated mandate.

We note that leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada has been sought. Leave to appeal to Canada's highest court is granted sparingly, however this case has attracted intense national interest. The leave decision is eagerly anticipated by the Canadian arbitration bar, and if granted, the eventual Supreme Court of Canada decision will be closely scrutinized.

Background

The background of this decision involves a franchise dispute between a master franchisee, Aroma Espresso Bar Canada Inc. ("Aroma Canada") and the franchisor, Aroma Franchise Company Inc. ("Aroma Franchise") relating to an alleged wrongful termination of a Master Franchise Agreement (the "Agreement").

The Agreement contained an arbitration agreement requiring that the dispute be submitted to arbitration before a sole arbitrator. With respect to the appointment of the sole arbitrator, the parties were required to "jointly select one (1) neutral arbitrator" who "has no prior social, business or professional relationships with either party". The arbitration was governed by the International Commercial Arbitration Act, 2017 which incorporates the UNCITRAL Model Law on International Arbitration (the "Model Law").

Following the delivery of a notice of request to arbitrate, counsel for the parties engaged in dialogue to identify an arbitrator. The parties proposed and rejected three potential arbitrators, including on the basis that one of the candidates had a number of previous appointments by the law firm representing Aroma Canada. The parties ultimately agreed to an arbitrator (the "Arbitrator") who had not previously acted as a mediator or arbitrator for either party and who confirmed that he had no conflicts and met the criteria for appointment.

The arbitration between the parties (the "Arbitration") occurred over a period of more than two years and ultimately culminated in an award finding that Aroma Franchise had wrongfully terminated the Agreement and awarding substantial damages to Aroma Canada as a result. The Arbitrator issued the final award of the arbitration (the "Final Award") on January 12, 2022 via an email to counsel for the parties.

However, in sending out the Final Award to the parties, the Arbitrator inadvertently copied another lawyer from Aroma Canada's law firm who had not been involved in the Arbitration. In subsequent correspondence, Aroma Franchise learned that approximately 17 months after the Arbitration began, the lead lawyer for Aroma Canada had engaged the Arbitrator to serve as arbitrator for a separate dispute involving another client of their firm (the "Second Arbitration"). The Second Arbitration involved different parties and issues from those involved in the Arbitration. The Second Arbitration also involved the lawyer who had been inadvertently copied by the Arbitrator when sending out the Final Award. Throughout the Arbitration, Aroma Franchise had been unaware that the Arbitrator had been involved in the Second Arbitration as the Arbitrator had not disclosed that he been approached, or had agreed, to conduct the Second Arbitration.

Upon learning of the Arbitrator's involvement in the Second Arbitration, Aroma Franchise brought an application to the Superior Court to set aside the Final Award, as well as ancillary awards of interest and costs the Arbitrator made in October 2022, on the basis that there was a reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of the Arbitrator, the Arbitrator had exceeded his jurisdiction, and the Arbitrator gave inadequate reasons.

The Ontario Superior Court's Decision

In March 2023, the Ontario Superior Court of Justice granted Aroma Franchise's application to set aside the Final Award and costs and interest awards and directed a new arbitration be conducted before a different arbitrator. The lower court concluded that the Arbitrator was required to disclose that he had been engaged for the Second Arbitration and that the Arbitrator's failure to provide such disclosure gave rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias, fatally tainting the result of the Arbitration.

In reaching these conclusions, the lower court placed considerable emphasis on the parties' expectations regarding disclosure derived from the correspondence exchanged between counsel for the parties before the Arbitrator was approached and then appointed. In that correspondence, counsel explained their own relationships with potential arbitrators and asked certain questions about opposing counsel's relationships. This correspondence between the parties was never provided to the Arbitrator nor was he ever made aware of the expectations said to flow from it. Nevertheless, the lower court found that, based on this correspondence as well as the provisions of the arbitration agreement between the parties, it was clearly important to both parties that the selected arbitrator be neutral and not have a professional or personal relationship with either party or their counsel and that this would remain important throughout the Arbitration.

Although the parties did not adopt the IBA Guidelines on Conflicts of Interest in International Arbitration (the "IBA Guidelines") to govern the disclosure regime for the Arbitration, the lower court cited and heavily relied on them in coming to its decision. The IBA Guidelines list specific situations which may warrant disclosure or disqualification of an arbitrator, including potentially disclosing appointments made by the same party or the same counsel appearing before an arbitrator while the case is ongoing.

In concluding that a reasonable apprehension of bias had tainted the Arbitration, the lower court emphasized the expectations of the parties and the relevant circumstances – including that the Second Arbitration was hidden from Aroma Franchise for approximately 15 months while the Arbitration was ongoing and that the Second Arbitration was only discovered due to the inadvertent copying of unrelated counsel on an email by the Arbitrator.

Aroma Canada appealed the decision to the Ontario Court of Appeal, challenging the finding that disclosure was required by the Arbitrator and that a reasonable apprehension of bias arose as a result of the Arbitrator's non-disclosure. In the meantime, the decision by the Ontario Superior Court of Justice was significant to the arbitration sphere by signalling that increased disclosure by arbitrators for unrelated mandates for the same lawyers or law firms may be necessary.

The Court of Appeal Decision

In a unanimous decision, the Court of Appeal set aside the decision and found that the lower court erred in law in finding that the Arbitrator had breached his duty to disclose that he was appointed to the Second Arbitration and that a reasonable apprehension of bias arose in the circumstances. In doing so, the Court of Appeal first considered the issue of whether disclosure was warranted, followed by an analysis of whether a reasonable apprehension of bias could be established.

The Duty to Disclose

In considering the issue of whether the Arbitrator should have disclosed the existence of the Second Arbitration, the Court of Appeal confirmed that required disclosure turns on the legal regime governing the arbitration. The Court considered the specific regime governing the Arbitration, being the Model Law. In particular, Article 12(1) of the Model Law sets out the applicable duty of disclosure by an arbitrator as follows:

> When a person is approached in connection with his possible appointment as an arbitrator, he shall disclose any circumstances likely to give rise to justifiable doubts as to his impartiality or independence. An arbitrator, from the time of his > appointment and through the arbitral proceedings, shall without delay disclose any such circumstances to the parties unless they have already been informed of them by him.

The Court agreed with persuasive UK common law authority that the Model Law test dictating when an arbitrator must make disclosure is an objective one – like the test for disclosure prescribed by the common law. The question is whether relevant circumstances would likely give rise to justifiable doubts about the impartiality of the arbitrator from the perspective of a "fair-minded and informed observer", rather than the subjective perspective of the parties.

The Court reasoned that, unlike the Model Law, the IBA Guidelines are not a legal standard, and while the parties easily could have, the parties did not adopt the IBA Guidelines as the governing disclosure regime for the Arbitration. While recognizing that the standard for disclosure in the IBA Guidelines may be instructive, the Court clarified that the IBA Guidelines are not determinative, and in fact, they differed from the Model Law by implementing a subjective framework.

The Court of Appeal determined that the lower court failed to apply an objective test, as required by the Model Law, and instead erroneously applied a subjective test pursuant to the IBA Guidelines. In doing so, the lower court improperly relied upon the parties' subjective expectations as derived from their pre-appointment correspondence, although such correspondence was never shared with the Arbitrator. The Court confirmed that the unshared expectations and views of the parties could not inform the question of whether the Arbitrator had a duty to disclose, as the applicable test is an objective one which requires consideration of what was communicated to and known by the Arbitrator.

In applying an objective test, the Court held that the Arbitrator did not have a duty to disclose the existence of the Second Arbitration given that the Second Arbitration did not involve either of the parties to the Arbitration nor did it have any meaningful overlap of issues. Accordingly, the Arbitrator had not breached the legal duty of disclosure.

It should be noted that in reaching this conclusion, the Court of Appeal also distinguished the circumstances from the UK decisions relied on by Aroma Franchise where the impugned arbitrators had accepted multiple appointments from the same party in relation to multiple claims concerning the same or overlapping subject matter, or where the arbitrator had accepted but not disclosed multiple appointments as arbitrator and multiple retainers as an expert or co-counsel to the law firm.

Reasonable Apprehension of Bias

The Court of Appeal then turned to the issue of bias and found that the lower court erred in determining that a reasonable apprehension of bias existed in the circumstances.

The Court of Appeal first discussed the relationship between a failure to disclose and reasonable apprehension of bias, holding that a finding that there was a breach of the legal duty of disclosure is germane to, although not determinative of, the inquiry of whether there is a reasonable apprehension of bias. The Court of Appeal observed that the test for disqualifying an arbitrator on grounds of bias imposed a higher threshold than the test for disclosure under the Model Law, given that Article 12(2) is limited to circumstances which "do" give rise to justifiable doubts, while the duty of disclosure under Article 12(1) of the Model Law applies to circumstances that are "likely" to give rise to justifiable doubts. The legal duty to disclose was said to cover a wider array of circumstances than those that, in the end, will justify disqualification of an arbitrator or setting aside an award for reasonable apprehension of bias. In the present case, given that the Court had determined that the Arbitrator's failure to disclose his appointment in the Second Arbitration did not breach the duty of disclosure, the path from the Arbitrator's non-disclosure to a reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of the Arbitrator disappeared.

The Court then considered whether any other basis could be established for finding a reasonable apprehension of bias, and in doing so, helpfully discussed the relevant tests and principles governing reasonable apprehension of bias. The Court emphasized that the test for disqualification of an arbitrator on the grounds of a reasonable apprehension of bias is an objective one and considers the relevant circumstances from the standpoint of a fair-minded and informed observer. The Court recognized that Article 12(2) of the Model Law permits a challenge to an arbitrator or an award that was made "if circumstances exist that give rise to justifiable doubts as to [the arbitrator's] impartiality or independence". The Court reasoned that "justifiable doubts" regarding an arbitrator's impartiality under Article 12(2) of the Model Law is equivalent to a reasonable apprehension of bias under the common law. The Court recognized that the appropriate test is: "what would an informed person, viewing the matter realistically and practically – and having thought the matter through – conclude. Would he think that it is more likely than not that the [arbitrator], whether consciously or unconsciously, would not decide fairly" (paras 128-129).

The Court further determined that arbitrators benefitted from the same strong presumption of impartiality as judges in Canada. The Court recognized that failing to impose this presumption to privately appointed arbitrators would undermine the integrity of the arbitration system. Accordingly, it was held that the objective test for reasonable apprehension of bias must be applied against the backdrop of a strong presumption of impartiality.

The Court recognized that the objective nature of the test is context sensitive and fact-specific and reasoned that a fair-minded and informed person would consider the facts and circumstances which were objectively known and would therefore focus on what was communicated to the Arbitrator. In the circumstances, given that the correspondence between counsel for the parties regarding the selection of arbitrators was not shared with the Arbitrator, such information comprised the subjective views of the parties and was improper to consider. The Court determined that the lower court erred in considering the expectations of the parties which had not been shared with the Arbitrator in the analysis of reasonable apprehension of bias. In the Court of Appeal's view, the lower court not only treated the parties' subjective views as relevant, but as determinative, which was a change to the objective test and an error of law.

2025 CanLIIDocs 1181

The Court confirmed that a failure of an arbitrator to disclose according to an expectation of the parties that was not shared with the arbitrator does not raise or confirm the existence of a reasonable apprehension of bias. The Arbitrator's failure to disclose his selection in a subsequent matter therefore did not give rise to bias on his part. The Court concluded that, applying the standard of a reasonable apprehension of bias objectively, the presumption of impartiality on the part of the Arbitrator was not displaced by his acceptance of a retainer to arbitrate a second matter that did not involve any of the parties to the Arbitration nor any overlapping issues of significance. As a result, the Court of Appeal concluded there was no reasonable apprehension of bias in the circumstances.

The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and set aside the lower court's decision quashing the Arbitrator's award on the basis of a reasonable apprehension of bias.

Takeaways

The Court of Appeal's decision in Aroma clarifies that multiple appointments of an arbitrator may not automatically give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias, nor will it necessarily mandate disclosure by the arbitrator. The Court's conclusion is likely to be well-received by arbitrators and counsel in the construction law sphere, where a limited number of arbitrators with necessary expertise and experience may be able to adjudicate certain disputes and where multiple appointments of sought-after arbitrators by law firms is not uncommon. As aptly stated by the Court of Appeal: "High stakes arbitrations often involve arbitrators who are in high demand, sophisticated parties, and experienced lawyers. This gives rise to the prospect that an arbitrator might have had prior engagements or be asked to undertake future ones, in which the parties or lawyers have some involvement" (para 4).

The Ontario Court of Appeal's decision illustrates that the choice of rules governing the arbitration will inform the scope of the disclosure obligations. For international arbitrations using the Model Law, the Court of Appeal's decision can be relied on to ensure an objective test for disclosure and bias is implemented, thereby avoiding the problems and potential unfairness associated with relying on correspondence and expectations which are not communicated and are unknown to an arbitrator. A different result, such as the one reached by the lower court, may be determined where parties select the IBA Guidelines as the legal regime governing disclosure obligations for an arbitration.

It is cautioned that, even where objective tests are applied, the Court of Appeal's decision in Aroma does not establish that an arbitrator's failure to disclose subsequent appointments will never give rise to breach of the duty to disclose or to a reasonable apprehension of bias. Rather, the Court of Appeal's reasoning indicates that the facts and circumstances objectively known, including what is communicated to arbitrators, will inform the respective tests. Accordingly, if a party is concerned that an arbitrator may take on subsequent matters with one of the parties during the course of the arbitration, those concerns should be disclosed to the arbitrator and opposing counsel prior to the potential engagement, so as to objectively inform the duty to disclose and potentially give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias in the absence of such disclosure. Practically, arbitrators may also remain well-advised to err on the side of disclosure, particularly where there are overlapping parties and issues.

2025 CanLIIDocs 1181

Finally, the Court of Appeal's decision in Aroma is notable for also clarifying that private arbitrators enjoy the same strong presumption of impartiality as judges. To establish a reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of an arbitrator, a party will need to rebut this strong presumption.

In closing, while arbitration counsel and arbitrators alike will no doubt be keeping a watchful eye to see whether the Supreme Court of Canada grants leave to appeal, in the meantime, prudent practice suggests that disclosure is always the safest course of action.

Case Comment – Update on Appeal of Husky Oil Operations Limited v Technip Stone & Webster Process Technology Inc, 2024 ABCA 369

Can a third-party beneficiary of a contract litigate contractual warranties in its favour when the contract requires "all disputes" under the contract to be arbitrated? This topic was reviewed in Legal Update #165 in relation to the King's Bench decision in Husky Oil Operations Limited v Technip Stone & Webster Process Technology Inc, 2023 ABKB 545. That decision was subsequently overturned, but the decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal has left open the possibility that a contract may indeed, with the right language, bind a non-party to mandatory arbitration.

Husky (the project owner) sued a subcontractor to enforce warranties contained in the subcontract between the general contractor and subcontractor. The warranties were for the express benefit of Husky as the owner of the property. The defendant subcontractor applied to strike Husky's claim based on a mandatory arbitration clause in the subcontract.

In the first instance, the applications judge agreed with Husky, concluding the contract could not impose an arbitration burden on a non-signatory. On appeal to the Court of King's Bench (a hearing de novo), Justice Lema allowed the appeal and struck the claims in contract. Interpreting the terms of the subcontract, Justice Lema found that Husky was bound to arbitrate, referencing the express subcontract provision that all warranties are for the benefit of both the general contractor and Husky, as well as a broad subcontract provision requiring "all disputes" to be resolved by arbitration. Justice Lema concluded that benefit of the warranty provisions came with the limitation that any related dispute must be resolved by arbitration ("…by seeking to enforce its warranty right, Husky effectively signed on to the accompanying arbitration mechanism and, by extension, became a party to it.")

The King's Bench decision resulted in Husky's contractual claims being struck from its Statement of Claim (i.e. the claims to enforce Husky's warranty rights under the subcontract). The limitation period to arbitrate had passed, so Husky was left with no contractual remedy.

On further appeal to the Alberta Court of Appeal, Husky argued in effect that "it never agreed to arbitrate and so should not be forced into arbitration and out of the courts." The Court of Appeal agreed with the chambers judge that whether Husky was "subject to the [sub]contract's arbitration judge's provisions" is a question of mixed law and fact, appropriate for determination on affidavit evidence upon a stay application.

The Court of Appeal emphasized "[t]he doctrine of privity stands for the proposition that a contract cannot, as a general rule, confer rights or impose obligations on any person except the parties to it," referencing London Drugs Ltd v Kuehne & Nagel International Ltd, [1992] 3 SCR 299. However, the Court of Appeal recognized that a "principled exception" applies where non-parties seek to rely on contractual provisions made for their benefit.

In the result, Husky's appeal was allowed. The Court of Appeal found that a "required threshold" of clarity was not met in this case for the non-party to be bound by the subcontract; the requirement for Husky to arbitrate was not "manifest." As the subcontract did not expressly state that Husky must pursue the warranty claim by arbitration, it was inappropriate to deprive Husky of access to the courts. Relying on principles of contract interpretation to determine that a non-party is bound by an arbitration clause is not permissible because "contract interpretation considers in part 'circumstances known to the parties at the time of formation of the contract' and determines 'the intent of the parties and the scope of their understanding'," referencing Sattva Capital Corp v Creston Moly Corp, 2014 SCC 53. A non-party cannot be bound by a contract interpretation that depends on circumstances, intentions and understandings of which the non-party is unaware.

This may not be the last word on the topic. The Court of Appeal expressly declined to decide "whether imposing an obligation to arbitrate, absent the advance consent of the affected party, is possible." Yet the Court's reasoning implies that a non-party can be bound to arbitrate with sufficiently "clear and explicit" language, including "at minimum" an express statement that (e.g.) the non-party beneficiary seeking to rely on subcontract warranty provisions is bound to arbitrate. We would expect that some parties will act on this decision by introducing or tightening provisions to expressly require non-party beneficiaries of warranty provisions to arbitrate any dispute.

A Statement of Claim by any Other Name...What Constitutes a Commencement Document in Lien Enforcement Proceedings? A Comment on Chandos Construction Ltd. v Deloitte Restructuring Inc., 2024 ABCA 403

Introduction

In December 2024, the Alberta Court of Appeal released its decision in Chandos Construction Ltd. v Deloitte Restructuring Inc., 2024 ABCA 403 [Deloitte ABCA], reversing the decision of the Chambers Justice, which affirmed, for different reasons, a decision of the Applications Judge finding that Deloitte, in its capacity as trustee for the insolvent contractor, Capital Steel ("CS"), failed to commence proceedings for a remedial order within the applicable limitation period.

While both lower courts found in favour of Chandos, meaning the lien registered on behalf of CS by Deloitte ceased to exist, the Court of Appeal allowed Deloitte's appeal, finding that Deloitte had sought a remedial order within the meaning of the Limitations Act, and that the consent order used to remove the lien on deposit of security constituted a commencement document for lien enforcement proceedings under the Prompt Payment and Construction Lien Act ("PPCLA"). As a result, Deloitte's lien did not expire, and the matter was remitted to the Applications Judge to determine validity and quantum of the lien.

This decision comes after years of protracted litigation between the parties over what amounts to a comparably small amount of money at issue. It is a reminder to all that attention to deadlines and proper calculation of limitation periods can avoid lengthy, expensive disputes over procedural issues.

Background

Chandos was the contractor on a condominium development, and CS was its subcontractor. In September 2016, CS became insolvent. Deloitte was appointed as bankruptcy trustee for CS. In October 2016, Deloitte filed a builders' lien on behalf of CS. In November 2016, Chandos obtained a s.48 Order, by consent, removing the lien and depositing security in its place, thereby commencing the "lien action". No further steps were taken in the lien action until September 2021, nearly five years later. In the meantime, much was taking place in the bankruptcy action.

2025 CanLIIDocs 1181

The Bankruptcy Proceedings

In March 2017, Deloitte applied in the bankruptcy action for a determination as to whether Chandos was entitled to rely on a provision of its subcontract with CS which provided that in the event CS went bankrupt, it forfeited 10% of the subcontract price to Chandos. Deloitte also sought a direction that if Chandos was not entitled to rely on this provision, the lien security be paid to Deloitte. Deloitte did not include a declaration of lien validity as part of its application.

The Justice in the bankruptcy proceedings found that Chandos was able to rely on the contractual provision in question. Deloitte appealed the decision, and in January 2019, the Court of Appeal reversed the Justice's decision.[1] Chandos appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, and in 2020, the Supreme Court of Canada affirmed the Court of Appeal's decision.[2]

The Lien Action – Lower Court Decisions

In September 2021, Deloitte applied before an Applications Judge in the lien action to have its lien declared valid and for release of the security to Deloitte. Chandos cross-applied for return of its security, citing Deloitte's failure to commence an action to enforce the lien within the applicable limitation period. In response, Deloitte argued that its application in the bankruptcy proceeding constituted a "request for a remedial order" under the Limitations Act and stated that this application was brought within the corresponding limitation period. Deloitte also argued that the limitation period was suspended pending the Supreme Court of Canada's decision on the enforceability of the contractual set off provision, suggesting that Deloitte would not know whether it had suffered an injury until the Supreme Court of Canada handed down its decision.

Notably, the lien was secured off prior to implementation of the template s.48 Order, and the Consent Order at issue was silent on how, and when, the issues between the parties would be determined, simply saying "the determination of the issues between the parties is adjourned sine die". The Applications Judge said that the bankruptcy application might meet the definition of a remedial order under the Limitations Act, but the matter before him was not for a remedial order requested in the bankruptcy proceeding, and Deloitte did not pursue that application in the bankruptcy proceeding.[3] Rather, Deloitte filed a lien validity application in the lien action. Further, the Applications Judge disagreed that the limitation period was stayed pending release of the Supreme Court of Canada's decision, finding that Deloitte's limitation period began to run once the Court of Appeal issued its decision confirming Chandos' inability to rely on the subcontract provision at issue in the bankruptcy proceedings.

Deloitte appealed the Application Judge's decision to a Justice in Chambers, which was an appeal de novo. Deloitte attempted to introduce as evidence in the appeal certain statements that Chandos had made and positions it had taken in the bankruptcy proceedings, arguing these were relevant to the lien action. Chandos took the position that the bankruptcy proceedings were not properly before the court in the lien action and were irrelevant. The Chambers Justice agreed with Chandos on this point, finding that the lien action and the bankruptcy proceedings are legally and procedurally distinct. However, the Chambers Justice did say that if Deloitte had pointed to evidence it relied on when deciding when, how or whether to commence an action in accordance with the requirements of the lien legislation, that might be different. As it was, there was nothing before the Court to suggest Chandos did or said anything that influenced Deloitte's consideration of whether to comply with the Builders' Lien Act (the "BLA", as it then was). In fact, the Court pointed out that Deloitte had no intention of ever issuing pleadings in accordance with the BLA.

On appeal to the Chambers Justice, Deloitte argued that it was not required to commence any action at all in order to pursue its lien claim. In making this argument, Deloitte relied on the template s.48 Order, despite the fact that it was not used by the parties in the lien action. Deloitte argued that because the template order reflects a number of different ways to pursue a lien claim, not restricted to filing a Statement of Claim, it supports the argument that a Statement of Claim is not always necessary, and failing to file one is not necessarily fatal to a lien claim. The Chambers Justice was not persuaded by this argument, finding that the template s. 48 Order actually reflects how seriously the Order takes the requirements of the BLA, not that the BLA requirements do not strictly apply. The Chambers Justice dismissed Deloitte's appeal, finding that Deloitte was required to commence an action to preserve the lien, and having failed to do so, the lien was extinguished.[4] Given this conclusion, the Chambers Justice said it was unnecessary to determine when the limitation period had commenced.

The Lien Action – Court of Appeal Decision

In December 2024, the Court of Appeal released its decision allowing Deloitte's appeal of the Chambers Justice's decision. The issue before the Court was whether Deloitte, on behalf of CS, was barred from enforcing its lien due to expiration of the limitation period.

In coming to its conclusion, the Court of Appeal noted that under s.43 of the BLA (which remains the same in the PPCLA), a lien "ceases to exist unless…"an action is commenced under this Act" to realize on the lien" within 180 days of registration, but that where security is paid into court in place of the lien, s.44 expressly provides that "the limitation period in s.43 does not apply. Instead, the general limitation period in the Limitations Act comes into play".[5] Turning to s.3 of the Limitations Act and the test for when a limitation period commences, the Court of Appeal noted that the "first two components of the test are clear", since CS (Deloitte) "knew of its "injury", that is the amounts potentially unpaid on its subcontract, no later than the date it filed its lien. It also knew that Chandos was the party to whom that injury was attributable. The remaining issue was when the injury, assuming liability, warranted bringing a proceeding."[6]

4 Chandos Construction Ltd v Deloitte Restructuring Inc, 2023 ABKB 349.

5 Deloitte ABCA at para 12.

The Court of Appeal aptly noted that "…commencement of the limitation period does not depend on the plaintiff's assurance or belief that the claim will ultimately be successful", and as such, the dispute over the enforceability of the subcontract provision did not "delay commencement of the limitation period until that issue was resolved".[7] Deloitte also advanced arguments regarding its knowledge of the value of its claim vis a vis commencement of the limitation period, which were rejected by the Court of Appeal, given that "…limitation statutes are triggered by discoverability of facts, not knowledge about questions of law" and "…it is not necessary for the quantum of the claim to be crystallized before the limitation period starts to run".[8]

Ultimately, the Court of Appeal found that the limitation period for Deloitte to commence an action on the lien was "no later than the date the lien was filed", being October 26, 2016.[9] At that time, CS (Deloitte) knew it had suffered an injury that, assuming Chandos was liable, warranted proceedings. As a result, Deloitte was required to seek a remedial order no later than October 26, 2018. Deloitte argued it had done so by commencing the lien action by filing of the s.48 Consent Order on November 8, 2016, and also by bringing the application in the bankruptcy proceedings directing that the security be paid to Deloitte.

In response, Chandos cited s.49 of the BLA (which remains unchanged in the PPCLA), that says proceedings to enforce a lien "shall be commenced by a statement of claim", Chandos argued that this requirement is mandatory, and having failed to file a Statement of Claim, Deloitte's claim was statute-barred. The Court of Appeal disagreed, acknowledging that while s.49 of the BLA is mandatory, it does not necessarily follow that failure to comply with it is fatal or incurable. Instead, the Court said that the question is whether "any incurable prejudice arises from the defect".[10] The wording of the Consent Order at issue was important, since (unlike the template s.48 order) it specified that it would be the commencement document for the lien enforcement action. The Court held that the Consent Order went beyond simply depositing security in place of the lands, but actually "contemplated resolution in the action it started of all issues respecting the validity and quantum of the lien".[11]

The Court of Appeal went on to discuss the template s.48 Order and how it recognizes that when security is substituted in place of the lien, the commencement document might be something other than a Statement of Claim, such as a Statement of the Plaintiff's Claim or Originating Application. As noted by the Court of Appeal, "this provision of the order therefore appears to contemplate that lien enforcement proceedings could be commenced by a document other than a statement of claim, notwithstanding the requirement in s. 49 that "Proceedings to enforce a lien shall be commenced by a statement of claim".[12] As a result, the Court found that the Consent Order was "effectively a proceeding for a remedial order that satisfied the requirements of the Limitations Act", and that using an Order to commence the action instead of a Statement of Claim was "at most a procedural irregularity but not a nullity".[13] Having reached this conclusion, it was not necessary for the Court of Appeal to decide whether Deloitte's application in the bankruptcy proceedings could be considered a proceeding in which a remedial order was sought.

Accordingly, the Court held that Deloitte's claim was commenced in time by filing of the s.48 Consent Order, and the matter was remitted to the lower court to determine the issues of lien validity and quantum.

Last but not Least: An Interesting Footnote Regarding the Template Section 48 Order

Although the template s.48 Order was not the form of Order at issue in Deloitte ABCA, the Court of Appeal included interesting commentary in obiter, which appears, without expressly saying so, to touch on the decision in Lesenko v Wild Rose Ready Mix Ltd., 2024 ABKB 333 ("Lesenko"), which this author discussed in detail in Legal Update #168. Specifically, in the June 2024 decision of the Chambers Justice in Lesenko, the Court held that the 180-day deadline for a lien claimant to commence an action to enforce its lien, when included in a Consent Order, violated both the PPCLA and the Limitations Act, and as such was unenforceable. The Lesenko decision was somewhat confounding, given that the template s.48 Order, which includes the 180-day deadline, had been approved by the Courts and widely used throughout Alberta since 2017. In fact, not only was it "approved by" the Courts, the Court of Appeal in Deloitte ABCA refers to the template as being "published by the Court".[14]

Interestingly, in a footnote to its decision, the Court of Appeal says that including a deadline to commence an action to enforce a lien in a consent Order is entirely appropriate and enforceable, and that "a consent order is still an order of the court, not a contract".[15] These comments are in direct contrast to the findings of the Chambers Justice in Lesenko.

The Lesenko decision raised much discussion amongst construction lawyers in Alberta, causing some to strike the 180-day deadline from the template Order and ultimately leading to variances in practice when removing liens under s.48 of the PPCLA; one of the very things the template Order was designed to avoid. While the Lesenko decision was not appealed, the Court of Appeal's comments in obiter in Deloitte ABCA provide helpful guidance and comfort that use of the template Order, including the procedural deadline to commence an action, is acceptable and enforceable, even where the matter goes by consent. As per the Court of Appeal (and despite what the lower Court found in Lesenko), a consent Order is not a contract and "…there is no reason why the court cannot make a procedural order setting a deadline within which steps must be taken".[16]

Takeaway

The Court of Appeal's discussion in Deloitte ABCA, together with the earlier decisions rendered in this litigation, are a good reminder that words matter, even when drafting what appear to be routine Consent Orders, and to keep limitation periods (and associated deadlines) front of mind. Further, it should not be assumed that an Order, whether by consent or otherwise, whereby security is deposited in place of a lien, and which technically commenced a court action, will negate the requirement to file a commencement document. Strictly speaking, the PPCLA requires lien enforcement proceedings to be commenced by way of Statement of Claim. Despite the Court of Appeal's decision in Deloitte ABCA, a lien claimant would be wise to commence its action by Statement of Claim within the applicable limitation period.

Lawyer liability and appealing costs orders under the Construction Act: Viceroy Homes

Ontario's Construction Act provides that a court can impose costs liability on a lawyer in certain circumstances. When are lawyers personally liable for preserving or perfecting a lien? Should a lawyer be liable if they register a lien which they objectively should have known was without foundation or wilfully exaggerated? Or must a lawyer subjectively know the lien was bad to be liable? Can a lawyer be liable where they recklessly, or with wilful blindness disregard facts establishing that they are preserving and perfecting a bad lien? Good questions, however, there is surprisingly little caselaw in Ontario addressing these issues.

These questions were recently answered by the Ontario Superior Court in Viceroy Homes.[1] In Viceroy Homes v. Jia Development Inc, 2024 ONSC 1608, (the "Superior Court Decision"), Associate Justice Wiebe held that the test for lawyers' liability for preserving or perfecting a bad lien is subjective. The Superior Court Decision was appealed. In JIA Development Inc. v. 2708320 Ontario Ltd. (Viceroy Homes), 2024 ONSC 6519 (the "Divisional Court Decision"), the Divisional Court held that leave was required to appeal the Superior Court's decision on costs pursuant to s. 86(1) of the Construction Act. The Divisional Court denied leave.

KEY TAKEAWAYS

(1) For a lawyer (or other representative) who preserves or perfects a lien to be held personally liable for costs under s. 86(1)(b)(i) of the Construction Act, the lawyer must subjectively know that the lien is without foundation, frivolous, vexatious, an abuse of process or for a wilfully exaggerated amount at the time of preservation or perfection, or have been reckless or wilfully blind to the defects in the lien.

(2) Leave is required to appeal a costs order made under s. 86 of the Construction Act.

THE VICEROY HOMES CASES

The underlying lien claim

Viceroy Homes instructed their lawyers to register a claim for lien in the amount of $3,310,000 for 39 days of work. Viceroy's principal provided their lawyers with a copy of a signed contract for $20 million in work to be done within eight months in which Viceroy was exposed to liquidated damages of $50,000 per day of delay. But the contract also stated that construction costs were not to exceed $500,000 until a collateral transaction concerning the project lands was finalized; that transaction was never completed, so the condition remained unfulfilled.

Viceroy's lawyers received from Viceroy a breakdown of the $3.3 million in work it allegedly performed for the defendants. The lawyers questioned why the price of the work exceeded the $500,000 cap when the condition was not fulfilled, and Viceroy's principal explained that there had been a subsequent unsigned agreement for a higher cap and that Viceroy had been instructed by the defendants to perform the work. Viceroy did not supply any further supporting documents before the lien was preserved. Viceroy's principal only showed Viceroy's lawyers chat messages between him and the defendant's principal on his phone.

Viceroy's lawyers sent to Viceroy's principal an authorization and direction form with the draft lien attached. He signed and returned the form, and the lawyers registered the claim for lien.

After preserving Viceroy's lien, Viceroy's lawyers pursued Viceroy's principal for supporting documents to substantiate the lien before perfecting it. Viceroy's lawyers requested, amongst other documents, contracts, correspondence, invoices, pictures, and videos. Viceroy's principal repeatedly promised he would provide the supporting evidence but delayed in doing so. He met with one of Viceroy's lawyers at a coffee shop and showed her videos, pictures of the work, and chat messages with the defendant's principal on his phone. He promised to send these recordings and more, but he did not follow through.

Faced with the impending deadline to perfect the lien, Viceroy's lawyers proceeded to prepare a statement of claim and send the claim to Viceroy's principal who reviewed it and gave comments which were incorporated into the claim. The lawyers again asked for Viceroy's supporting documentation but Viceroy's principal failed to provide it. With time running out, the lawyers had the statement of claim issued and, at Viceroy's principal's instruction, served the claim on the defendants.

Shortly after, Viceroy's lawyers received a letter from one of the defendants' counsel saying that the work Viceroy claimed it had done had not been done at all. The defendants said Viceroy's claim for lien was frivolous, vexatious, and abusive. They demanded that the lien be discharged, otherwise the defendant would initiate a cross-examination under s. 40 of the Act.

Viceroy's lawyers sought Viceroy's instructions on the letter. Viceroy's principal denied the allegations, insisted that he would provide proof of the claim, and said he was willing to attend cross-examination. The lawyers again sought from Viceroy documentary corroboration of its claim. In response, Viceroy's principal sent materials receipts, a signed subcontract, and chat messages with a would-be project manager.

Viceroy's principal was eventually cross-examined, after the cross-examination had been postponed twice at his request. On cross-examination, it came to light that the defendants were right – Viceroy had not done large parts of the work described on Viceroy's claim for lien.

Viceroy's lawyers advised Viceroy that some of its lien, at the very least, was indefensible. The lawyers emphasized the importance of delivering corroborating evidence and answering the undertakings to support the remainder of the lien. Viceroy's principal promised to provide that.

The defendants then gave Viceroy's lawyers notice of a motion to discharge Viceroy's lien. After further attempts to obtain supporting documentation from Viceroy's principal, it became clear to Viceroy's lawyers that Viceroy could not substantiate its lien. The lawyers strongly advised Viceroy to voluntarily discharge the lien before the defendants' motion or they would take themselves off the record. Viceroy did not give instructions to voluntarily discharge the lien, so Viceroy's lawyers removed themselves from the record before the defendants' discharge motion was heard.

Associate Justice Wiebe heard the motion. Viceroy was now unrepresented and did not attend the hearing of the motion, which proceeded uncontested. The associate justice held that Viceroy's lien was indeed frivolous, vexatious and an abuse of process. He ordered that the lien be discharged. He then ordered that Viceroy's principal should pay the defendants' costs on a substantial indemnity basis along with Viceroy.

The defendants' motion for costs against the lien claimant's lawyers

The defendants then brought a motion for the court to order that Viceroy's lawyers pay costs to the defendants pursuant to s. 86 of the Act. They argued that Viceroy's lawyers should have known the lien was frivolous because of the high value of the lien for the short duration of work, because Viceroy exceeded the $500,000 cap stated in the signed contract, and because of the paucity of supporting documentary evidence provided by Viceroy to their lawyers at the time of preserving and perfecting the lien. The lawyers, the defendants argued, had a duty as a gatekeeper to avoid registering bad liens, and they failed in that duty.

The statutory language

The motion decision revolved around the language of s. 86(1)(b)(i) of the Act:

> "Costs
>
> 86 (1) Subject to subsection (2), any order as to the costs in an action, application, motion or any other step in a proceeding under this Act is in the discretion of the court, and an order as to costs may be made against,…
>
> (b) a person who represented a party to the action, application or motion, where the person,
>
> (i) knowingly participated in the preservation or perfection of a lien, or represented a party at the trial of an action, where it is clear that the claim for > a lien is without foundation, is frivolous, vexatious or an abuse of process, or is for a wilfully exaggerated amount, or that the lien has expired,…"

2025 CanLIIDocs 1181

>
> (Underlining added)[2]

The Superior Court Decision

Associate Justice Wiebe held that no order for costs should be made against Viceroy's lawyers because:

(a) For costs to be ordered against the lawyers, they must have actual knowledge or be reckless or willfully blind to the baselessness of Viceroy's lien.[3]

(b) There was no evidence that the lawyers subjectively knew the Viceroy lien was baseless when it was preserved and perfected, and that point was not disputed.[4]

(c) There was simply nothing that indicated a high risk that the Viceroy lien was groundless.[5]

The Appeal to the Divisional Court

The defendants appealed. They argued that:

1. Leave was not required to appeal the Superior Court Decision on costs. They argued that s. 86 of the Construction Act made the entitlement to costs a substantive issue, not interlocutory. They relied on s. 71 of the Construction Act, which provides that an appeal lies to the Divisional Court from a judgment under that Act, to argue that they could appeal the decision as of right.

2. The lien claimant's lawyers had a duty as a gatekeeper to determine whether their client's lien was valid, and they failed to do so. They argued that Viceroy's lawyers ought to have known the lien was frivolous and without foundation and that Associate Justice Wiebe was wrong in holding that s. 86 required the lawyers to subjectively know the lien was bad to be personally liable for costs for registering a frivolous, baseless or exaggerated lien.

LawPro counsel argued for Viceroy's lawyers that leave was required to appeal the Superior Court Decision because s. 133(b) of the Courts of Justice Act stipulates that leave is required to appeal discretionary costs orders. By the express words of s. 86, the order was a discretionary costs order. Section 71 of the Construction Act, LawPro counsel argued, was not inconsistent with s. 133 of the Courts of Justice Act because s. 133 dealt specifically with costs orders while s. 71 related to appealing judgments to the Divisional Court, generally.

On the substantive issue, LawPro counsel argued that the test for lien representatives' liability under s. 86(1)(b)(i) was subjective for three reasons:

1. The language "knowingly participated" in s. 86(1)(b)(i), in its entire context, could only be reasonably construed as subjective knowledge;

2. The caselaw on s. 86; and

3. Good policy and the wider law on balancing lawyers' duty to their clients and to the court.

The Divisional Court's decision

Justice O'Brien gave the judgment of the Divisional Court, with Justices McSweeny and Davies concurring.

The Divisional Court agreed with LawPro counsel – leave was required.

Section 133(b) requires leave to appeal the discretionary costs order and nothing in the Construction Act is inconsistent with that provision. Section 71 of the Construction Act relates to a "judgment" and Rule 1.03 of the Rules of Civil Procedure defines a judgment as "a decision that finally disposes of an application or action on its merits." The Divisional Court held that the costs order did not constitute a judgment because it was an order that followed the result in the lien proceeding and not a separate action or application.[6]

Further, s. 71 of the Construction Act does not address costs, whereas the Courts of Justice Act expressly requires leave be obtained from an order only as to costs that are in the discretion of the court. Subsection 86(1) of the Construction Act states that costs under that provision are "in the discretion of the court."[7]

COMMENTS

Lawyers' liability when registering liens

Associate Justice Wiebe's decision in Viceroy Homes expands upon Master Albert's decision in Fletcher,[8] heretofore the leading case on lien representatives' liability when preserving and perfecting liens.

The Superior Court Decision in Viceroy Homes makes it clear that the standard for liability of lien representatives when preserving and perfecting liens is not mere negligence. Negligence involves an objective standard, but s. 86(1)(b)(i) imports a subjective test.

Lawyers should take note, however, that while actual knowledge that a lien is baseless or wilfully exaggerated is an essential precondition to a costs order against a lawyer for preserving or perfecting that lien,[9] actual knowledge could be imputed if the lawyer is reckless or wilfully blind to major issues with the lien. Recklessness or wilful blindness requires a level of knowledge that is the moral equivalent of actual knowledge. While such conduct is well beyond mere negligence or laziness underlying a failure to inquire, Associate Justice Wiebe said recklessness and wilful blindness involves knowledge of an actual risk that is at the level of a "clear probability" and then a failure to act to avoid the risk or make inquiries.[10]

Associate Justice Wiebe's comments on recklessness and wilful blindness are the first commentary in Ontario jurisprudence on the applicability of the judicial concepts of recklessness and wilful blindness to a costs determination under section 86(1)(b)(i). Counsel undertaking a retainer for a lien claimant will need to be mindful that they do not "turn a blind eye" to facts that would lead the lawyer to understand that the lien is without foundation or exaggerated. Otherwise, counsel risk liability for costs due to such reckless or wilfully blind conduct.

The authors believe that the Superior Court Decision is consistent with good policy. It aligns with the general principle that an order of costs should be made against a lawyer rarely and only where serious misconduct has been shown.[11] As Master Albert observed previously, putting lawyers at risk of costs orders against them personally would have a chilling effect on the lawyer-client relationship; the presumption is that the lawyer followed the client's instructions.[12]

Lawyers could be liable to their clients for failing to preserve the client's lien rights in time. There are strict statutory deadlines for preserving and perfecting liens. To preserve their client's rights in time, lawyers may sometimes have to register liens without the benefit of perfect information.

However, it would be a mistake to conclude that Viceroy Homes had diminished the lawyer's gatekeeping role. Lawyers should require supporting documentation from their clients at the earliest opportunity, then assess the validity of the lien with reasonable diligence and promptness and advise their clients accordingly. If a client has misled their lawyer into registering a bad lien, the lawyer should advise the client that the lien may have to be voluntarily discharged, or the lawyer may have to take steps to remove themselves from the record. If a lawyer becomes aware of facts that, unless ignored, would lead them to conclude that their client has misled them into registering a bad lien, it is time to contact their insurer, or risk exposure to liability for costs arising from reckless disregard of a lien they would know to be without foundation but for their wilful blindness. These are all elements of the important gatekeeping role of a lawyer acting for a lien claimant.

Leave to appeal costs orders

The Divisional Court Decision now makes it clear that leave is required to appeal costs orders made under s. 86 of the Act. Although only s. 86(1)(b)(i) was at issue in Viceroy Homes, the Divisional Court's ruling, in our view, will apply to all costs orders made under s. 86 because, by the express words of that section, s. 86 orders are in the discretion of the court. Section 133(b) of the Courts of Justice Act stipulates that leave is required to appeal all discretionary costs orders. The Divisional Court Decision also reinforces the position that a costs order is not a substantive "judgment".

In the authors' view the Divisional Court's ruling requiring leave to appeal is a reasonable limit on the right to appeal a discretionary costs order made under section 86 of the Construction Act. It would be odd if an action brought under the Construction Act was the only type of proceeding in Ontario Superior Court which allows discretionary costs orders to be appealed as of right. We believe this finding should be understood as confined to discretionary costs orders made under section 86, and that this decision does not undermine precedent where the Court of Appeal has applied a broader definition of "judgment" for the purposes of section 71 of the Construction Act in different context than a discretionary costs order.[13]

CONCLUSION

The Superior Court Decision and the Divisional Court Decision in Viceroy Homes will be useful precedent on making and appealing costs orders against lien representatives going forward. We can expect that in future cases the issue will be to what extent counsel has recklessly disregarded or wilfully blinded themselves to facts that show that they are preserving, perfecting, or representing a lien claimant at trial, with a bad lien. Even though Viceroy Homes solidifies a subjective standard for lawyer liability when registering liens, lawyers should remain vigilant – an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of the cure.

Calling on a Lien Bond – A Handy Reference Guide for Construction Lawyers in Ontario (and a helpful starting point for lawyers across Canada)

It is not uncommon for a construction lien to be vacated in accordance with Section 44 of the Act by the issuance and posting of a Financial Guarantee Bond – Form 15.1 or equivalent form (a "Lien Bond"). This Lien Bond typically sets out the following information:

1) The surety who guarantees the bond;
2) The principal who issues the bond (typically the party vacating the construction lien); and
3) The obligee under the bond. If a Lien Bond is posted to vacate a construction lien, the form requires that the obligee under the bond be the Accountant of the Superior Court of Justice of Ontario (the "Accountant").

As one may recall, the purpose of vacating any construction lien is to replace the security attaching to the premises or holdback against which the lien is secured with the security posted in Court. The ultimate purpose in replacing this security is that – following a determination and judgment under the lien – the lien claimant may satisfy that judgment by looking to payment from said security. Where the security posted is cash, the procedure is simple: request release of the funds from the Court. Obtaining payment from a Lien Bond is a bit more complex. As a result, the authors have prepared a summary of the steps involved in calling on a Lien Bond, which can be used as a quick reference for anyone needing to do so:

1) Obtain Judgment: depending on whether the lien claimant secures judgment following a trial or other summary disposition, if you expect you might need to call on the Lien Bond to satisfy your judgment, the first step in receiving payment from a Lien Bond is ensuring that the draft Judgment to be signed by a Judge or Associate Judge (as the case may be) contains the following paragraphs directing payment from the Lien Bond:

> THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS AND DIRECTS the Accountant of the Superior Court of Justice (the "Accountant") to make a demand for payment for [the amount Ordered with respect to the principal judgment of the lien and any costs] in the total sum of $_____ (the "Principal and Costs") from the Financial Guarantee Bond obtained by [the principal] from [the surety] (the "Surety") and issued as Bond No. _____in the sum of $_____ (the "Bond"), which was posted by [the principal] with the Accountant as permitted by the Order of the Honourable [Judge or Associate Judge], dated _____, 20__ into the Accountant's file no. _____ (the "Bond Demand").

> THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS AND DIRECTS that, once the Surety remits payment of the Principal and Costs Judgment from the Bond to the Accountant pursuant to the Bond Demand, the Accountant shall release payment of such monies to [the lien claimant or the lien claimant's legal representative in trust, as the case may be].

Once the Judgment is signed by the respective Judge/Associate Judge, the lien claimant must ensure that the Judgment is issued and entered. If the lien claimant does not receive an original, wet-ink copy of Judgment and instead receives a digital copy by E-Mail or fax, they will have to obtain a notarial certificate that certifies: 1) that the Judgment is indeed a true copy of the Judgment issued by the Court; 2) by whom, when, and how the Judgment was received by the lien claimant; and 3) appending a copy of the E-Mail, CaseLines page, fax, or other method in which the electronic copy of the Judgment was received.

2) Contacting the Accountant: the next step will depend on whether the lien claimant obtained Judgment by consent or following a contested disposition (trial, summary judgment, etc.). If the Judgment was obtained by consent, the Judgment must contain language confirming that the provisions of Rule 72.03(2)(c)(ii) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194 (the "Rules") are struck. If, however, the Judgment was obtained following a contested disposition, in accordance with Rule 72.03(2)(c)(ii) of the Rules, the lien claimant must ensure that the time to appeal the Judgment has expired. In accordance with Sections 71(1) and (2) of the Act, an appeal under a Judgment for a construction lien lies to the Divisional Court and must be made within fifteen (15) days of the date of the Judgment (unless the parties agree otherwise or the appealing party brings a motion to extend the time to a single judge of the Divisional Court).

Once the appeal deadline is expired (and if no motion to extend this deadline is brought by any party), the lien claimant must prepare a package in accordance with Rule 72.03(2)(c)(ii) of the Rules to be filed with the Accountant containing the following:

> a) a Letter with a written request for payment out of court, detailing that the payment must be made in accordance with the Judgment and reflective of the inserted language pertaining to making a claim for payment from the Surety in accordance with the terms of the Lien Bond;
>
> b) the original or notarized copy of the Judgment as set out above; and
> c) an Affidavit confirming that the time prescribed for the appeal of the Judgment has expired and that no appeal is pending.

This package may be served delivered to the Accountant personally or by courier. The lien claimant would also benefit from contacting the Accountant simultaneously by E-

2025 CanLIIDocs 1181

Mail or fax with electronic copies of the documents enclosed in the package to ensure that the Accountant is expecting same and for ease of communication and coordination with the Accountant while payment is awaited.

If the Accountant takes issue with the wording of the Judgment and requires an amendment, the authors recommend moving for an Order to amend the Judgment, nunc pro tunc. The Court has the authority to issue such an Order under Rule 59.06 and Rule 54.05 of the Rules. Additionally, if the Court is willing to waive the need for the moving party to prepare and file motion materials, pursuant to Rule 37.01 and 2.03 of the Rules, the moving party may simply file a draft Order for the Court's consideration. It is also advisable to have the Accountant approve the draft Order amending the Judgment before proceeding with these steps.

3) Optional – Contacting the Surety: Pursuant to the terms of the Judgment and the Lien Bond, the Surety may only accept a demand of payment under the Judgment from the Accountant. However, it is prudent to assist the Accountant in expediting this process by contacting the Surety and letting them know that a request is imminent. To identify the contact person, you can search Government websites to identify the various sureties and their attorneys for service. Contacting the Surety may also assist in obtaining the precise contact person who deals with payment in such circumstances (adjusters or otherwise), whose contact information may then be shared with the Accountant to expedite payment from the Lien Bond.

4) Coordination between the Accountant and the Surety: Once the Accountant accepts the lien claimant's package as set out above, the Accountant will take direct steps in coordinating with the Surety in obtaining payment. The timing and duration of this process is entirely dependent on the Surety, and there is no limit or time as to how long it may take. It may be prudent to follow up every few days or once a week with the Accountant with a friendly reminder and request for an update/status of the Surety's payment. Politeness in communicating with the Accountant is strongly encouraged.

5) Receiving payment from the Accountant: Once the Accountant receives payment from the Surety, the Accountant will proceed to release said funds to the party identified in the Judgment. Presently, the Accountant's preferred form of payment is through wire transfer or electronic funds transfer. As such, if the lien claimant wishes to receive the funds directly, they must provide this information to the Accountant in the letter initially requesting the funds. Alternatively, if the lien claimant is agreeable to having their legal representative receive the funds in trust, the lien claimant must ensure that the Judgment clearly directs the Accountant to do so. If any portions of the Judgment are unclear to the Accountant, the lien claimant may have to return to the Judge/Associate Judge signing the Judgment to make such necessary revisions or amendments. Accordingly, it is important to have the correct information in the Judgment at the time it is obtained.

2025 CanLIIDocs 1181

The authors' intention in providing the above summary is to provide a helpful reference guide for lawyers who find themselves in the somewhat rare position of calling on a Lien Bond in Ontario.

on appeal from the court of appeal for british columbia

Constitutional law -- Charter of Rights -- Freedom of expression -- Interlocutory injunction against secondary picketing -- Application based on common law rule against inducing breach of contract -- Whether injunction offending Charter right to freedom of expression -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 1, 2(b), 32(1) -- Constitution Act, 1982, s. 52(1).

Appellant was the federally certified bargaining agent for the locked out employees of Purolator, an Ontario based courier. Prior to the lockout, respondent made deliveries for Purolator in its area and afterwards, for Supercourier, a company connected with Purolator. Appellant applied to the British Columbia Labour Relations Board for a declaration that respondent and Supercourier were allies of Purolator in their dispute with appellant. Such a finding would have rendered the picketing of respondent's business premises lawful, and consequently would have affected its business in that its collective agreement provided that its employees' refusal to cross a lawful picket line was not a violation of the agreement or grounds for disciplinary action or discharge. When the Board declined to hear the application for want of jurisdiction, the labour relations of the appellant being within federal jurisdiction, the legality of appellant's proposed picketing then fell for determination under the common law because the Canada Labour Code was silent on the issue. No picketing occurred at respondent's premises as respondent was granted a quia timet injunction which was upheld on appeal. At issue here is whether secondary picketing in a labour dispute is protected as freedom of expression under s. 2(b) of the Charter and accordingly not the proper subject of an injunction to restrain it.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Dickson C.J. and Estey, McIntyre, Chouinard and Le Dain JJ: All picketing involves some form of expression and enjoys Charter protection unless some action on the part of the picketers alters its nature and removes it from Charter protection. Charter protection of this freedom does not encompass violence, threats of violence or other unlawful acts. The picketing at issue, although intended to bring about economic pressure and to induce the common law tort of breach of contract, was protected by the Charter.

The Charter applies to the common law. The language of s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 clearly includes the common law and a construction of that section that would exclude the common law from the Charter's application would be wholly unrealistic.

The Charter does not apply to private litigation completely divorced from any connection with government. Section 32 specifies that the Charter applies to the legislative, executive and administrative branches of government: their actions are subject to the Charter whether invoked in public or private litigation. An order of the Court, however, cannot be equated with government action for the purposes of Charter application notwithstanding political theory. The Courts, while bound by the Charter, act as neutral arbiters and to regard a court order as an element of government action necessary to invoke the Charter would unduly widen the scope of the Charter's application to virtually all litigation.

Although government action is generally dependant on statutory authority, it may rely as well on the common law as in the case of the prerogative. The Charter will apply to the common law where the common law is the basis for some governmental action which is alleged to have infringed a guaranteed right or freedom.

It is difficult and probably dangerous to attempt to define with narrow precision that element of government intervention necessary to bring the Charter into play by private litigants in private litigation. It would seem that the Charter would apply to delegated legislation such as regulations, orders in council, possibly municipal by-laws and by-laws and regulations of other creatures of Parliament and the legislatures. Where government action of such nature is present, and where a private litigant relies on it to cause an infringement of the Charter rights of another, the Charter applies. Where, however, a private party sues another relying on the common law and where no government action is relied upon to support the action, the Charter will not apply.

The Charter did not apply to the case at bar. This litigation was between purely private parties and did not involve any exercise of or reliance on governmental action which would invoke the Charter. The application for the injunction was supported in this Court solely on the basis of the common law tort of inducing a breach of contract. Had the Charter applied, s. 1 of the Charter would have been effective to justify the granting of the injunction.

Per Beetz J.: For reasons stated by the majority of the British Columbia Court of Appeal, the picketing enjoined here would not have been a form of expression and consequently no question of infringement of s. 2(b) of the Charter could arise. The reasons of McIntyre J. were otherwise agreed with.

Per Wilson J.: On a s. 1 analysis the purpose and objectives of a common law principle must be ascertained through an objective approach in the same way as the purposes and objectives of an impugned piece of legislation are ascertained. Two distinct questions must be answered in this case. First, does the tort of inducing breach of contract represent a reasonable limit under s. 1 on freedom of expression in the labour relations context? Second, if the tort represents a reasonable limit under s. 1, should injunctive relief be granted in this case? If the tort does not survive the first question, the conduct is not wrongful and no injunction can issue. If the tort survives the first question, the facts must be considered to see whether the other requirements for the award of an interlocutory injunction are present, i.e., whether the balance of convenience favours the plaintiff. The reasons of McIntyre J. were otherwise agreed with.

Appellant's and respondent's separation was marked by a protracted series of court battles. Appellant was awarded custody of the couple's three daughters and respondent was granted access subject to court imposed restrictions arising from appellant's objection to his religious activity with the children. Respondent was ordered not to discuss the Jehovah's Witness religion with the children, take them to any religious services, canvassing or meetings, or expose them to religious discussions with third parties without appellant's prior consent. Organized religion was not important to appellant although she wanted the children to be raised within the United Church.

The two older daughters liked their father but came to dislike his religious instruction to the extent that it was damaging his relationship with them and was contributing to the stress the children were experiencing in adjusting to their parents' separation.

The trial judge also made orders for the distribution of property and for costs. The respondent's interest in the matrimonial home was ordered transferred to the appellant because any remaining interest in the house, after respondent paid what was already owing to appellant, was to be transferred in the form of lump sum maintenance. Respondent was found responsible for debts incurred by the appellant for the support of herself and the children pending maintenance and for a debt made to a family corporation. Costs were awarded on a solicitor-client basis against respondent, his lawyer and a religious society not a party to the proceedings.

Respondent appealed. The Court of Appeal set aside the limitations on religious discussion and attendance, on the ground that it was in the best interests of the children that they come to know their non-custodial parent fully, including his religious beliefs, unless the evidence established the existence of or the potential for real harm or the child did not consent to being subject to the access parent's views or practices. The Court of Appeal also altered the division of property and the awards of costs made by the trial judge. Appellant appealed these rulings to this Court.

Four constitutional questions queried (1) whether ss. 16(8) and 17(5) of the Divorce Act (requiring that judicial decisions regarding custody and access be made "in the best interests of the child") denied the Charter guarantees of freedom of religion, of expression and of association (s. 2(a), (b), and (d)), and if so, (2) were they justified under s. 1; (3) whether ss. 16(8) and 17(5) violated the equality guarantee of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (s. 15(1)), and (4) if so, were they justified under s. 1. The Court considered the requirements of the "best interests of the child" and whether this standard infringed the guarantees of freedom of religion and expression under the Charter. A main consideration was unrestricted access by a non-custodial parent and the conditions necessary to curtail that access.

Held (L'Heureux-Dubé J. dissenting in the result): The appeal should be allowed in part.

The issues should be decided as follows:

1. The test regarding access is the best interests of the child (L'Heureux-Dubé J., La Forest and Gonthier JJ., and Iacobucci and Cory JJ.). McLachlin J. suggests that in cases such as this harm is usually an important element in determining the best interests of the child. Sopinka J. would recognize a threshold element of harm.

2. Sections 16(8) and 17(5) of the Divorce Act do not violate ss. 2(a), (b), (d) or 15(1) of the Charter. L'Heureux-Dubé J. (and La Forest and Gonthier JJ.) found the Charter to be inapplicable. McLachlin J. found the impugned legislation did not violate the Charter. Cory and Iacobucci JJ. agreed that there was no Charter violation. Sopinka J. found that the Charter applied and could only be overridden in limited circumstances.

3. The restrictions on access should be removed (L'Heureux-Dubé J. and La Forest and Gonthier JJ. dissenting).

4. The judgment dealing with property and financial matters and the award of costs should be varied (L'Heureux-Dubé J. dissenting).

Best Interest of the Child, Charter Considerations and Access

Per L'Heureux-Dubé J.: The power of the custodial parent is not a "right" with independent value granted by courts for the benefit of the parent. Rather, the child has a right to a parent who will look after his or her best interests and the custodial parent a duty to ensure, protect and promote the child's best interests. That duty includes the sole and primary responsibility to oversee all aspects of day-to-day life and long-term well-being, as well as major decisions with respect to education, religion, health and well-being. The non-custodial parent retains certain residual rights over the child as one of his or her two natural guardians.

Child placement decisions should safeguard the child's need for continuity of relationships, reflect the child's (not the adult's) sense of time, and take into account the law's inability to supervise interpersonal relationships and the limits of knowledge to make long-range predictions. This need for continuity generally requires that the custodial parent have the autonomy to raise the child as he or she sees fit without interference with that authority by the state or the non-custodial parent. A custody award is a matter of whose decisions to prefer, as opposed to which decisions to prefer. Courts cannot make the necessary day-to-day decisions which affect the best interests of the child. Once a court has determined who is the appropriate custodial parent, it must presume that that parent will act in the best interests of the child.

Decisions are made according to the best interests of the child without the benefit of a presumption in favour of either parent. The Act envisages contact between the child and each of his or her parents as a worthy goal which should be in the best interests of the child. Maximum contact, however, is not an unbridled objective and must be curtailed wherever the welfare of the child requires it.

The right to access is limited in scope and is conditioned and governed by the best interests of the child. The legislation makes it quite explicit that only the best interests of the child as it is comprehensively understood should be considered in custody and access orders. The role of the access parent is that of a very interested observer, giving love and support to the child in the background. He or she has the right to know but not the right to be consulted. Access rights recognize that the best interests of the child normally require that the relationship developed with both parents prior to the divorce or separation be continued and fostered. The right to access and the circumstances in which it takes place must be perceived from the vantage point of the child. Wherever the relationship to the non-custodial parent conflicts with the best interests of the child, the furtherance and protection of the child's best interests must take priority over the desires and interests of the parent.

As the ultimate goal of access is the continuation of a relationship which is of significance and support to the child, access must be crafted to preserve and promote that which is healthy and helpful in that relationship so that it may survive to achieve its purpose. Sources of ongoing conflict which threaten to damage or prevent the continuation of a meaningful relationship should be removed or mitigated. Notwithstanding a general concern about the vulnerability of access rights to the caprices of a vengeful custodial parent, courts should not be too quick to presume that the access concerns of the custodial parent are unrelated to the best interests of the child. Courts should also not be blind to issues, such as financial support, which form part of the broader context in which these rights are exercised. The access parent has no obligation to exercise those rights and cannot be forced to comply with such an order even if that contact has been determined to be in the child's best interest.

Where there is a genuine problem with access, the non-custodial parent is not without recourse in any case. This stems from the statutory directive to facilitate access where it is in the child's best interests and the role of the judge as the arbiter of those interests in the case of a dispute between the parents. Generally, courts will grant liberal access to the non-custodial parent and usually this is consistent with the best interests of the child. Parents will also normally respect their children's wishes and best interests with regard to access. When disagreements between parents do reach the courts, the judge must always draw the line in favour of the best interests of the child, from a child-centred perspective.

The best interests of the child cannot be equated with the mere absence of harm: it encompasses a myriad of considerations. Courts must attempt to balance such considerations as the age, physical and emotional constitution and psychology of both the child and his or her parents and the particular milieu in which the child will live. One of the most significant factors in many cases will be the relationship that the child entertains with his or her parents. Since custody and access decisions are pre-eminently exercises in discretion, the wide latitude under the best interests test permits courts to respond to the spectrum of factors which can both positively and negatively affect a child. What may constitute stressful or damaging circumstances for one child may not necessarily have the same effect on another.

The most common presumption now governing the best interests test is the primary caregiver presumption. It explicitly restores the values of commitment and demonstrated ability to nurture the child and recognizes the obligations and supports the authority of the parent engaged in day to day tasks of childrearing.

The order of the trial judge is not subject to the Charter. Even if it were, the best interests test is nevertheless value neutral and does not, on its face, violate any Charter right. Its objective, the protection of a vulnerable segment of society, is completely consonant with the Charter's values. Broad judicial discretion is crucial to the proper implementation of the legislative objective of securing the best interests of the child. Such discretion in a legislative provision does not of itself give rise to an inference of Charter infringement. It cannot be considered in the absence of an examination of the legislative objectives and must be rationally tied to those objectives.

The standard for finding a legislative provision unconstitutional because of vagueness is high. The provisions need only permit the framing of an intelligible legal debate with respect to the objectives contained in the legislation. The best interests test is not so uncertain as to be incapable of guiding a consideration of the factors relevant to custody and access determinations. The fact that it must be applied to the facts of each case does not militate in favour of its unconstitutionality.

The vagueness of a legislative provision cannot be examined in the abstract but must be considered within the context of the particular legislative objectives in question, bearing in mind that some objectives will require a panoply of judicial remedies for their meaningful fulfilment. Among the factors with which courts should be concerned when the vagueness of a law is at issue are: (a) the need for flexibility and the interpretive role of the courts, (b) the impossibility of achieving absolute certainty, a standard of intelligibility being more appropriate and (c) the possibility that many varying judicial interpretations of a given disposition may exist and perhaps coexist.

The custodial parent need not show harm in order to restrict access to the children by the non-custodial parent. There is no rationale for defining the best interests of the child with the absence of harm. Nothing in the Act mandates or even suggests that "real danger of significant harm to the child" be the sole consideration in matters of custody and access. Indeed, the harm test would require courts to ignore the very factors which are set out in the Act and invert the basic focus of the inquiry into custody and access. The welfare of children is put at considerable risk if the prospect of harm becomes the sole prerequisite for restrictions on access. The best interests of the child is not simply the right to be free of demonstrable harm; it is the positive right to the best possible arrangements in the circumstances of the parties. The harm test cannot meet the legal system's primary goal in divorce situations -- minimizing the adverse effects of children. This goal requires a vision of the best interests of the child that is more than neutral to the conditions under which custody and access occur. Judges must exercise their discretion to prevent harm to the child rather than merely identify or establish its presence after the damage is done.

Expert evidence should not be routinely required to establish the best interests of the child. Expert testimony, while helpful in some circumstances, is often inconclusive and contradictory because such assessments are both speculative and may be affected by the professional values and biases of the assessors themselves. Experts are not always better placed than parents to assess the needs of the child. The person involved in day to day care may observe changes in the child that could go unnoticed by anyone else and normally has the best vantage point from which to assess the interests of the child. The custodial parent, therefore, will often provide the most reliable and complete source of information to the judge on the needs and interests of that child. The importance of the evidence of children in custody and access disputes, too, must be emphasized.

Restrictions on access do not necessarily prevent children from coming to know their parents in meaningful ways. Interpreting the goal of maximum contact as requiring unrestricted access may defeat the Act's objective if the pre-eminence of unlimited "knowledge" results in the ultimate destruction of the relationship. In this case, the purpose of the restrictions was to ensure that the children will continue to know their father "at all".

Freedom of religion and freedom of expression are public in nature and encompass the freedom of the individual from state compulsion or restraints. The state's role in custody and access decisions does not transform the essentially private character of parent-child interchanges into activity subject to Charter scrutiny. Legitimate questions may arise about the role of the state, and hence the application of the Charter in regulating other aspects of family law. A valid purpose can hardly be served, however, by importing the discourse of freedom of expression and religion into orders made in the resolution of custody and access disputes. Once the best interests test itself has been found to accord with Charter values, the trial judge's order itself is not subject to further constitutional review, as the necessary state infringement of religious rights required to sustain a Charter challenge is not present. The principles enunciated in Dolphin Delivery apply as custody and access matters are essentially private in nature and there exists no state action to be impugned.

Decisions regarding custody and access must not be based on the parents' faith. The religion of the parties, however, may be relevant as one of the circumstances to be assessed in the determination of the best interests of the child. Where there is conflict over religion, the court is not engaged in adjudicating a "war of religion" and the religious beliefs of the parties themselves are not on trial. Rather, it is the manner in which such beliefs are practised together with the impact and effect they have on the child which must be considered. In all cases where the effects of religious practices are at issue, the best interests of the child must prevail.

Ordinarily, the exposure of a child to different religions or beliefs may be of value to the child. Where religion becomes a source of conflict between the parents or is the very cause of the marriage breakdown, it is generally not in the best interests of the child and may in some circumstances be very detrimental for the child to be drawn into the controversy over religious matters. Where there is conflict over religion, courts must secure the longstanding authority of the custodial parent to make decisions over religious activities. This ensures that stress occasioned by such issues does not become a continuing and ultimately destructive feature in the life of the child after divorce.

Freedom of religion is not an absolute value. Here, powerful competing interests must also be recognized, not the least of which, in addition to the best interests of the children, are the freedoms of expression and religion of the children themselves.

Respondent's religious beliefs and practices and his general rights of access were not threatened. The restrictions were aimed at reducing the area of conflict which had arisen on account of the respondent's behaviour with his children during access and the effects of that behaviour on their best interests. Much of the stress the children were experiencing was related to their resistance to becoming involved in their father's religious practices. The restrictions were to further the best interests of these children by removing the source of conflict, particularly as the ultimate purpose of the restrictions was to preserve the relationship between the respondent and his children. Evidence supported the conclusion that the respondent would not respect the wishes of the children without an order to do so.

Per La Forest and Gonthier JJ.: Agreement was expressed for the reasons of L'Heureux-Dubé J. holding that access be determined on the basis of what is in the best interests of the child and for her resolution of the constitutional issue.

Per Iacobucci and Cory JJ.: The best interests of the child standard does not violate in ss. 2(a), (b), (d) and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms substantially for the reasons given by L'Heureux-Dubé and McLachlin JJ. No opinion was expressed on the questions of whether a Charter infringement, if found, would be so trivial as not to warrant Charter protection and of whether or not the Charter applies to judicial orders made in custody or access proceedings.

For many of the reasons advanced by L'Heureux-Dubé J., access to children should be determined on the basis of what is in the best interests of the child. Expert evidence, while sometimes helpful, is not always necessary to establish the best interests of the child; that question can be determined normally from the evidence of parties themselves and the testimony, where appropriate, of the children concerned.

The matters of the children's attending religious services with the respondent and accompanying him on his proselytizing activities were resolved by the respondent's undertaking to respect his children's wishes in this regard. The order forbidding the respondent from discussing his religion was not supported by a proper application of the best interests of the child test. Indeed, curtailment of explanatory or discursive conversations between a parent and his or her child should only be rarely ordered.

Per McLachlin J.: The Divorce Act mandates that, on matters of access, the ultimate test in all cases is the best interest of the child. This is a positive test, encompassing a wide variety of factors, including the desirability of maximizing contact between the child and each parent if compatible with the best interests of the child. The custodial parent has no "right" to limit access. The judge must consider all factors relevant to determining what is in the child's best interests. The risk of harm to the child, while not the ultimate legal test, may also be a factor to be considered. This is particularly so where the issue is the quality of access -- what the access parent may say or do with the child. In such cases, it will generally be relevant to consider whether the conduct in question poses a risk of harm to the child which outweighs the benefits of a free and open relationship which permits the child to know the access parent as he or she is. The judge must act not on his or her personal views but on the evidence.

The legislative provision for the "best interests of the child" does not limit and therefore does not violate the Charter right to religious and expressive freedom. Religious expression not in the best interests of the child is not protected by the Charter because the guarantee of freedom of religion is not absolute and does not extend to religious activity which harms or interferes with the parallel rights of other people. Conduct not in the best interests of the child, even absent the risk of harm, amounts to an "injury" or intrusion on the rights of others and is clearly not protected by this Charter guarantee. "Injure" in this context is a broad concept. To deprive a child of what a court has found to be in his or her best interests is to "injure", in the sense of not doing what is best for the child. A child's vulnerability heightens the need for protection and any error should be made in favour of the child's best interests and not in favour of the exercise of the alleged parental right. An additional factor which may come into play in the case of older children is the "parallel right" of others to hold and manifest beliefs and opinions of their own.

The ambit of freedom of expression is broader than that of freedom of conscience and religion because even harmful expression may be protected. Some forms of harmful expression, however, are not constitutionally protected: violence or threats of violence or a direct attack on the physical integrity and liberty of another. Criminal conduct is an indication, although not a conclusive one, that expressive conduct is constitutionally unprotected.

A prima facie case for protection under the guarantee of freedom of expression can be made out here. The expression challenged does not take the form of the non-protected categories of expression. The harm done, if any, is of a psychological nature.

A purposive approach to Charter interpretation requires that associated rights -- religious freedom and freedom of expression -- be interpreted in a consistent and coherent manner. The ambit of a particular right or freedom, moreover, cannot be defined in the abstract but rather should be defined in the context of the particular activity in question.

The teaching of religious beliefs and practices to one's children, while it has an expressive aspect, is predominantly religious. In seeking to reconcile the rights of freedom of religion and freedom of expression in this context, it is the religious aspect which must dominate. Reading the two guarantees together, the limits of the guarantee of freedom of expression should govern in the context of religious instruction of children.

The custodial parent does not have the "right" to determine limits on access. The only question to be considered, where limitation of access is in issue, is what is in the best interests of the child. The custodial parent's obligation to make certain basic decisions as to how the child is educated (which may extend to religious matters) does not automatically mean that religious contacts with the access parent of a different faith are to be excluded. The failure of the child to consent to instruction on the part of the access parent does not necessarily preclude such instruction's being in the child's best interests.

The benefits which might enure to the children from coming to know their father as he was -- as a devoutly religious man devoted to the Jehovah's Witness faith -- were not considered at trial and no reference was made to Parliament's instruction that a child have as much contact with both parents as is compatible with his or her best interests. The question of whether there was any evidence of a risk of harm to the children which might offset the benefit of full access to their father's values, including those related to religion, was not adequately considered. While access may be limited in some circumstances on grounds unrelated to harm, where the issue is whether entirely lawful discussions and activities between the access parent and the child should be curtailed, the judge should enquire into whether the conduct poses a risk of harming the child. The evidence did not establish that harm was being caused to the children.

The order restricting respondent's access was unnecessary given his undertaking and the order enjoining him from preventing blood transfusions was unnecessary from a practical point of view. Parents should not make disparaging comments about the other parent's religion, but the matter might best be left to the parents' good sense.

Per Sopinka J.: While the "best interests of the child" test is the ultimate determination in deciding issues of custody and access, it must be reconciled with the Charter. General language in a statute which, in its breadth, potentially confers the power to override Charter values must be interpreted to respect those values. Here, the best interests test must be interpreted to allow the Charter right to freedom of religious expression to be overridden only if its exercise would occasion consequences that involve more than inconvenience, upset or disruption to the child and incidentally to the custodial parent.

The long-term value to a child of a meaningful relationship with both parents is a policy that is affirmed in the Divorce Act. Each parent, therefore, can engage in those activities which contribute to identify the parent for what he or she really is. The access parent is not expected to act out a part or assume a phony lifestyle during access periods. The policy favouring activities that promote a meaningful relationship is not displaced unless there is a substantial risk of harm to the child.

The best interests of a child are more aptly served by a law which recognizes the right of that child to a meaningful post-divorce relationship with both parents. The "rights" must be distributed between the custodial and the access parent so as to encourage such a relationship. The traditional notion of guardianship giving the custodial parent the absolute right to exercise full control over the child, even when the other parent is exercising his or her right of access, is at odds with this concept.

"Harm", in this context, connotes an adverse effect on the child's upbringing that is more than transitory. The impugned exercise by the access parent must be shown to create a substantial risk that the child's physical, psychological or moral well-being will be adversely affected. Exposure to new experiences and ideas may upset children and cause them considerable discomfort but these experiences are not necessarily in the long-term best interests of the child. Similarly, conflict between parents on many matters including religion is not uncommon, but in itself cannot be assumed to be harmful unless it produces a prolonged acrimonious atmosphere.

Risk of substantial harm must be shown if religious expression is to be restricted in applying the best interests of the child test. The statutory test in s. 16(10) of the Divorce Act does not constitute a limitation on freedom of religious expression. This freedom does not extend to protect conduct which is harmful to others. However, the concept of harm should not be expanded to reach the conclusion that anything which is not in the best interests of the children is injurious within the meaning of s. 2(b) and thus not protected by the Charter.

Financial Considerations and Costs

Per McLachlin J.: A judge, to fix lump sum maintenance, must fix it in a sum certain with reference to the principles applicable to such an award. The goal of conveying the entire interest in the matrimonial home to the wife did not support an award of lump sum maintenance; more was required. There was ample basis here for an order under s. 51 of the Family Relations Act awarding appellant a greater portion of the family assets because respondent, for a considerable time, paid little or nothing for the support of the family. The debts incurred during this period can serve as a consideration supporting reduction of respondent's interest in the family property. The equity in the home was not substantial and respondent was permitted to retain other assets.

The trial judge, in effecting a de facto reapportionment of the interest in the family assets to do justice, as was permitted on the facts and the law, did not expressly allude to the factors for reallocation. This omission should not result in a new trial being ordered because of the length and cost of the current litigation. The result achieved by the trial judge should be endorsed because the evidence was capable of supporting an order for reallocation of the parties' interest in the family assets to the extent required to give the appellant the entire interest in the matrimonial home.

The money owed by the family's jewelry corporation was not, in law, a debt for which respondent was personally liable. Only the corporation was liable. The debt appellant incurred to support herself and the children before she applied for maintenance is similarly unenforceable against respondent as a debt, although it could be taken into consideration in an order for reduction of his interest in the family assets.

Solicitor-client costs are generally awarded only where there has been reprehensible, scandalous or outrageous conduct on the part of one of the parties. The facts that an application has little merit and that part of the cost of the litigation may have been paid for by others do not justify awarding solicitor-client costs.

No order for costs should have been made against respondent's barrister. Costs are awarded as compensation for the successful party, not to punish a lawyer. Any member of the legal profession might be subject to a compensatory order for costs if it is shown that repetitive and irrelevant material, and excessive motions and applications, characterized the proceedings in which he or she was involved, and that the lawyer acted in bad faith in encouraging this abuse and delay. The courts have jurisdiction to make such an award, often under statute and as part of their inherent jurisdiction to control abuse of process and contempt of court. The proceedings here, despite their length and acrimonious progress, did not fall within these characterizations. Courts, moreover, must be extremely cautious in awarding costs personally against a lawyer, given the duties upon a lawyer to guard confidentiality of instructions and to bring forward with courage even unpopular causes. A lawyer should not be placed in a situation where his or her fear of an adverse order of costs may conflict with these fundamental duties of his or her profession.

Since the Society did not appear as a party, the costs awarded against it must be taken to be the equivalent of an award for the tort of maintenance. A person must intervene "officiously or improperly" to be liable for the tort of maintenance. Provision of financial assistance to a litigant by a non-party will not always constitute maintenance. Funding by a relative or out of charity must be distinguished from cases where a person wilfully and improperly stirs up litigation and strife. The society's support was "out of charity and religious sympathy" and so did not constitute maintenance. It did not put forward respondent in an attempt to escape liability for costs. Its interest in the constitutional issue was insufficient to distinguish it from interveners who appear on constitutional cases and who have never been liable for costs.

Per La Forest and Gonthier JJ.: The reasons of McLachlin J. were agreed with on the property and monetary issues and on the principles governing costs.

Per Iacobucci and Cory JJ.: The reasons of McLachlin J. were agreed with on the property, monetary and costs issues.

Per L'Heureux-Dubé J. (dissenting): The reasons of the trial judge on the issues of maintenance, division of property and costs were agreed with.

evidence. Ms. Temoin submits that once a person's capacity is properly raised in a proceeding, an order for a medical examination is justified if the evidence supports a reasonable apprehension that the person lacks capacity. She also complains the threshold set by the chambers judge is impractical as it is circular. It requires the applicant to establish incompetence before an order for medical proof of that incompetence can be made.

[59] I do not find these arguments persuasive as they fail to recognize the significance of personal autonomy and the serious consequences of an order for committeeship or the intrusive nature of compelling an individual to undergo medical examination against his or her will. As well, a less onerous test has the potential to invite unwarranted harassment and abuse by individuals who bring proceedings under the Patients Property Act for self-serving motives.

[60] There is considerable support for a high evidentiary threshold in these circumstances. The analysis must begin with the premise that Mr. Martin enjoys the benefit of the presumption of capability. The decisions of this Court in McNeal and Kartsonas affirm the significance of losing personal autonomy to a committee. The Supreme Court in Re Eve advocated a cautionary approach to exercising parens patriae jurisdiction, and emphasized it must be used for the benefit of the person in need of protection, and not to benefit others. That Court has also repeatedly affirmed that the common law should be informed and guided by the values set out in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms: R.W.D.S.U. v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., 1986 CanLII 5 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 573 at 603, 33 D.L.R. (4th) 174; Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto (1995), 1995 CanLII 59 (SCC), 126 D.L.R. (4th) 129 at 155 (S.C.C.); R.W.D.S.U., Local 558 v. Pepsi-Cola Canada Beverages (West) Ltd., 2002 SCC 8 at paras. 18 and 21, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 156. Ms. Temoin's application unquestionably implicates principles of liberty, autonomy and equality, and Charter values are thus inescapably engaged. Those values are given meaning by requiring a level of proof that is commensurate with both the importance of the individual interests and the seriousness of the intervention at stake.

[61] Ultimately, the exercise of the parens patriae power is discretionary, and will be governed by the facts of the individual case. Thus, flexibility is required and I decline to endorse one evidentiary standard for all cases of this nature. It is, however, beyond dispute that the applicant must present evidence establishing a serious question to be tried, both with respect to the individual's capacity and his or her need for protection. In this case, I am satisfied the chambers judge made no error in requiring prima facie evidence of incompetence and a compelling need for protection before she would exercise her parens patriae jurisdiction to make the order sought by Ms. Temoin.

[62] Ms. Temoin also argued the court's general inherent jurisdiction would permit the order she sought and would require a less stringent evidentiary test, since this jurisdiction is a "residual source of powers the court may draw upon as necessary whenever it is just or equitable to do so": Caron at para. 24. She pointed to several cases in which she maintained the courts have exercised inherent jurisdiction to order litigants to undergo medical examinations: Kujawa v. Kujawa (1990),

Respondent had been employed by appellant as a "radio time salesman" for three and a half years when he was dismissed on the ground that his performance was inadequate. Respondent filed a complaint and an adjudicator appointed by the Minister of Labour under s. 61.5(6) of the Canada Labour Code held that respondent had been unjustly dismissed. Based on s. 61.5(9)(c) of the Code, the adjudicator made an initial order imposing on appellant an obligation to give respondent a letter of recommendation certifying (1) that he had been employed by the radio station from June 1980 to January 20, 1984; (2) the sales quotas he had been set and the amount of sales he actually made during this period; and (3) that an adjudicator had held that he was unjustly dismissed. The order specifically indicated the amounts to be shown as sales quotas and as sales actually made. A second order prohibited appellant from answering a request for information about respondent except by sending the letter of recommendation. The Federal Court of Appeal dismissed an application by appellant to review and set aside the adjudicator's decision. The purpose of the appeal at bar is to determine whether s. 61.5(9)(c) of the Code authorizes an adjudicator to make such orders; and in particular, whether the orders infringed appellant's freedom of expression guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Held (Beetz J. dissenting and Lamer J. dissenting in part): The appeal should be dismissed. The orders infringe s. 2(b) of the Charter but are justifiable under s. 1.

The Charter applies to orders made by the adjudicator. The adjudicator is a creature of statute. He is appointed pursuant to a legislative provision and derives all his powers from statute. The Constitution is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with its provisions is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect. It is thus impossible to interpret legislation conferring discretion as conferring a power to infringe the Charter, unless, of course, that power is expressly conferred or necessarily implied. Such an interpretation would require this Court to declare the legislation to be of no force or effect, unless it could be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. It follows that an adjudicator, who exercises delegated powers, does not have the power to make an order that would result in an infringement of the Charter.

The word "like" in the English version of s. 61.5(9)(c) of the Canada Labour Code does not have the effect of limiting the powers conferred on the adjudicator by allowing him to make only orders similar to the orders expressly mentioned in paras. (a) and (b) of that subsection. Interpreting this provision in this way would mean applying the ejusdem generis rule. It is impossible to apply this rule in the case at bar since one of the conditions essential for its application -- the presence of a common characteristic or common genus -- has not been met. The interpretation according to which the word "like" in the English version of para. (c) does not have the effect of limiting the general power conferred on the adjudicator is also more consistent with the general scheme of the Code, and in particular with the purpose of Division V.7, which is to give non-unionized employees a means of challenging a dismissal they feel to be unjust and at the same time to equip the adjudicator with the powers necessary to remedy the consequences of such a dismissal.

Per Dickson C.J. and Wilson, La Forest and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ.: The adjudicator's orders were reasonable in the administrative law sense. Administrative law unreasonableness, as a preliminary standard of review, should not impose a more onerous standard upon government than would Charter review. While patent unreasonableness is important to maintain for questions untouched by the Charter, such as review of determinations of fact, in the realm of value inquiry the courts should have recourse to this standard only in the clearest of cases in which a decision could not be justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

The adjudicator's first order infringed s. 2(b) of the Charter but is saved under s. 1.

The adjudicator's second order also infringed s. 2(b) of the Charter. It was an attempt to prevent the appellant from expressing its opinion as to the respondent's qualifications beyond the facts set out in the letter. But this order, too, was justifiable under s. 1. First, the objective was of sufficient importance to warrant overriding appellant's freedom of expression. Like the first order, the objective of the second order was to counteract the effects of the unjust dismissal by enhancing the ability of the employee to seek new employment without being lied about by the previous employer. The adjudicator's remedy was a legislatively-sanctioned attempt to remedy the unequal balance of power that normally exists between an employer and employee. The governmental objective, in a general sense, was that of protection of a particularly vulnerable group, or members thereof. To constitutionally protect freedom of expression in this case would be tantamount to condoning the continuation of an abuse of an already unequal relationship. Second, the means chosen were reasonable. Like the first order, the second order was rationally linked to the objective. With the proven history of promoting a fabricated version of the quality of respondent's service and the concern that the employer would continue to treat him unfairly if he went back to work for the employer, it was rational for the adjudicator to attach a rider to the order for a reference letter so as to ensure that the employer's representatives did not subvert the effect of the letter by unjustifiably maligning its previous employee in the guise of giving a reference. Further, no less intrusive measure could have been taken and still achieved the objective with any likelihood. Monetary compensation would not have been an acceptable substitute because it would only have been compensation for the economic, not the personal, effects of unemployment. Labour should not be treated as a commodity and every day without work as exhaustively reducible to some pecuniary value. The letter was tightly and carefully designed to reflect only a very narrow range of facts which were not really contested. The appellant was not forced to state opinions which were not its own. The prohibition was also very circumscribed. It was triggered only in cases when the appellant was contacted for a reference and there was no requirement to send the letter to anyone other then prospective employers. In short, the adjudicator went no further than was necessary to achieve the objective. Finally, the effects of the measures were not so deleterious as to outweigh the objective of the measures. The objective in this case was a very important one, especially in light of Canada's international treaty commitment to protect the right to work in its various dimensions. For purposes of this final stage of the proportionality inquiry, the fact that a value has the status of an international human right, either in customary international law under a treaty to which Canada is a State Party, should generally be indicative of a high degree of importance attached to that objective.

Per Lamer J. (dissenting in part): The adjudicator did not exceed his jurisdiction by ordering appellant to give respondent a letter of recommendation with a specified content. Apart from the Charter, the only limitation imposed by s. 61.5(9)(c) is that the order must be designed to "remedy or counteract any consequence of the dismissal". That is the case here. The order prevents appellant's decision to dismiss respondent from having negative consequences for the latter's chances of finding new employment. Ordering an employer to give a former employee a letter of recommendation containing only objective facts that are not in dispute is not as such unreasonable and there is nothing to indicate that the adjudicator was pursuing an improper objective or acting in bad faith or in a discriminatory manner.

However, the adjudicator exceeded his jurisdiction by prohibiting appellant from answering a request for information about respondent other than by sending the letter of recommendation. Though the order is also meant to remedy or counteract the consequences of the dismissal, its effect, by prohibiting appellant from adding any comments whatever, is to create circumstances in which the letter could be seen as the expression of appellant's opinions. This type of penalty is totalitarian and as such alien to the tradition of free nations like Canada. Parliament therefore cannot have intended to authorize such an unreasonable use of the discretion conferred by it. The adjudicator lost this jurisdiction when he made a patently unreasonable order.

The first order limits appellant's freedom of expression but this limitation, which is prescribed by law -- the order made by the adjudicator is only an exercise of the discretion conferred on him by statute -- can be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. The purpose of the order is clearly, as required by the Code, to counteract the consequences of the unjust dismissal. Such an objective is sufficiently important to warrant a limitation on freedom of expression. It is essential for the legislator to provide mechanisms to restore equilibrium in employer/employee relations so the employee will not be subject to arbitrary action by the employer. Additionally, the means chosen to attain the objective are reasonable in the circumstances. The order is fair and was carefully designed. The purpose of the letter of recommendation is to correct the false impression given by the fact of the dismissal and it contains only facts that are not in dispute. It is rationally connected to the dismissal since in certain cases it is the only way of effectively remedying the consequences of the dismissal. Finally, the consequences of the order are proportional to the objective sought. The latter is important in our society. The limitation on freedom of expression is not what could be described as very serious. It does not abolish that freedom, but simply limits its exercise by requiring the employer to write something determined in advance.

Per Beetz J. (dissenting): Except for the attestation relating to the unjust dismissal, the first order violated the appellant's freedoms of opinion and of expression and could not be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. This order forced the employer to write, as if they were his own, statements of facts in which, rightly or wrongly, he may not believe, or which he may ultimately find or think to be inaccurate, misleading or false. In short, the order may force the appellant to lie. To order the affirmation of facts, apart from belief in their veracity by the person who is ordered to affirm them constitutes a prima facie violation of the freedoms of opinion and expression. Such a violation was totalitarian in nature and could never be justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

The second order, coupled with the first, also violated the former employer's freedoms of opinion and of expression in a manner which was not justified under s. 1 of the Charter. The sending of the letter as drafted by the adjudicator, coupled with the prohibition to say or write anything else could lead to the implication that the former employer had no further comment to make upon the performance of the respondent and that, accordingly, the letter reflected the opinion of the former employer. In any event, the second order was disproportionate and unreasonable. One should view with extreme suspicion an administrative order or even a judicial order which has the effect of preventing the litigants from commenting upon and even criticizing the rulings of the deciding board or court.

Further, in cases of unjust dismissal, the issuance by an adjudicator of a blanket and perpetual prohibition against a former employer to write or say anything to a prospective employer but what the adjudicator has dictated in the letter of recommendation can lead to absurd and even counter-productive results. The adjudicator cannot foresee all the possible types of exchanges which are susceptible to occur between former and prospective employers. The absurdity which results from the adjudicator's second order is sufficient to warrant its reversal. If it is disproportionate and unreasonable from a practical point of view, then it has to be unreasonable from an administrative law point of view and it is difficult to conceive how it could be reasonable within the meaning of s. 1 of the Charter.

Constitutional law -- Judicial independence -- Financial security of federally appointed judges -- Pensions -- Federal legislation requiring superior court judges to contribute to pension --Whether federal legislation plan violated s. 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 -- Judges Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. J-1 as amended, s. 29.1.

Civil rights -- Equality before the law -- Federal legislation requiring superior court judges to contribute to pension plan -- Legislative distinction on the basis of the appointment date of judges -- Higher contributions required from judges appointed after the date of first reading of the bill -- Whether federal legislation violated s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights -- Judges Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. J-1 as amended, s. 29.1.

Respondent, a Quebec Superior Court judge appointed on July 24, 1975, challenged the constitutional validity of s. 29.1 of the Judges Act. This section was introduced in Parliament on February 17, 1975 and was enacted December 20, 1975. Section 29.1(1) provided that judges appointed before February 17, 1975 would contribute one and one-half per cent of their salary toward the cost of pensions, while s. 29.1(2) provided that judges appointed after February 16, 1975 would contribute six and one-half per cent prior to January 1, 1977, and seven per cent thereafter. Prior to the enactment of s. 29.1, superior court judges were not required to contribute to their pension plan. The Federal Court, at trial and on appeal, accepted respondent's allegation, but for different reasons, that s. 29.1 violated s. 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 but rejected his argument that s. 29.1 was inoperative in that it violated his right to equality before the law recognized by s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights. This appeal is to determine whether s. 29.1 of the Judges Act infringes (1) s. 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and (2) s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Held (Beetz and McIntyre JJ. dissenting in part): The appeal should be allowed.

(1) Section 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867

Per curiam: The principle of judicial independence is fundamental to our Constitution. The role of our courts as resolver of disputes, interpreter of the law and defender of the Constitution, requires that they be completely separate in authority and function from all other participants in the justice system, in particular, from the executive and the legislative branches of government. One of the essential components of the principle of judicial independence is financial security. In the present case, the scheme for contributory pensions established in s. 29.1 of the Judges Act does not interfere with the independence of superior court judges. All s. 29.1 does is treat judges, pursuant to the constitutional obligation imposed by s. 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, in accordance with standard, widely used and generally accepted pension schemes in Canada. Canadian judges are Canadian citizens and must bear their fair share of the financial burden of administering the country. Parliament's power to fix the salaries and pensions of superior court judges, however, is not unlimited. If there were any hint that a federal law dealing with these matters was enacted for an improper or colourable purpose, or if there were discriminatory treatment of judges vis-à-vis other citizens, then serious issues relating to judicial independence would arise and the law might well be held to be ultra vires of s. 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867. There is no suggestion of any of these considerations in the present appeal.

There is no "federalism" limitation on Parliament's capacity to change the basis of superior court judges' pensions from non-contributory to contributory. Provincial legislatures under s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867 have no jurisdiction with respect to these pensions. Section 100 explicitly subtracts them from provincial jurisdiction respecting the administration of justice. This section states clearly that the salaries and pensions of superior court judges shall be fixed and provided by the Parliament of Canada.

Further, Parliament's ability to implement a widely used and accepted latter-day pension model is not constrained by the words of s. 100. The word "pensions" is not limited to the type of pensions known and in existence for the judiciary in 1867 and the word "provided" does not impose on Parliament an obligation to pay the full cost of judicial pensions.

Finally, although it might well be unconstitutional in most contexts for Parliament to direct how judges are to spend their salaries, the word "pensions" in s. 100 specifically authorizes Parliament to deal with this subject matter. In exercising that jurisdiction Parliament must legislate with respect to both the quantum and the scheme of judicial pensions. The 1975 law enacting s. 29.1 of the Judges Act dealt with the scheme. There can be no objection here to Parliament's action since the scheme chosen was a widely used and accepted one and since it was introduced in conjunction with a substantial increase in judicial salaries and other benefits in 1975.

(2) Section 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights

Per Dickson C.J. and Estey and Lamer JJ.: Section 29.1 of the Judges Act does not violate s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights. Once it is accepted that the general substance of the law is consistent with a valid federal objective--here, to provide for remuneration of s. 96 judges--and that it is not discriminatory for Parliament to draw some line between present incumbents and future appointees, the cases under the Canadian Bill of Rights do not permit the courts to be overly critical in reviewing the precise line drawn by Parliament. Some line is fair and is not discriminatory. Thus, while from the respondent's perspective a line drawn on the date of passage of the bill would have been preferable, it cannot be said that the choice of the date of first reading as the cut-off date was contrary to the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Per Beetz and McIntyre JJ. (dissenting): The forms of discrimination prohibited by s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights are not limited to the specifically mentioned grounds such as race, national origin, colour, religion or sex. This Court is also not bound by the Diceyan concept of equality nor is it prevented from adopting a more egalitarian approach.

A legislation passed by Parliament does not offend against the principle of equality before the law if passed in pursuance of a valid federal objective. The question which must be resolved in each case is whether an inequality that may be created by legislation affecting a special class is arbitrary, capricious or unnecessary, or whether it is rationally based and acceptable as a necessary variation from the general principle of the universal application of law to meet special conditions and to attain a necessary and desirable social objective. Where variation from the principle of universal application of the law is justified, the principle cannot be tampered with to a degree or to an extent which goes beyond what is necessary to reach a desirable social objective. This test, including its element of proportionality, clearly extends to the manner or means chosen to achieve a valid federal objective, particularly where this manner or these means introduce the very inequality complained of. This manner or these means must then be carefully scrutinized by the courts and they must be struck down whenever they do not meet the test.

In the case at bar, s. 29.1(2) of the Judges Act is inconsistent with s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights. The policy decision reflected in s. 29.1 of the Judges Act is that judges' pension plans should be on a contributory basis in order to reduce the financial burden on future taxpayers. Parliament chose to phase in the contributory requirement, by requiring contributions at the higher rate only from newly appointed judges so that, through the attrition of senior appointees as a result of death or resignation, the whole body of the judiciary would eventually participate in the contributory scheme. However, in choosing the date of first reading of the bill as the cut-off date to implement the phasing-in feature of the federal legislation, the new measure "grandfathered" certain incumbent superior court judges, but did not "grandfather" them all. A small minority of them--those appointed after February 16, 1975 but before December 20, 1975--were not grandfathered. Applying the test to s. 29.1, it cannot be said that the distinction between incumbent judges, which resulted from the selection of the date of first reading as the cut-off point, was necessary to achieve the federal objective. No rational motives were advanced or appear to exist for the selection of that date as the cut-off point which, with its discriminatory effect, is entirely arbitrary and capricious.

In the Matter of a Reference to the Court of Appeal pursuant to The Constitutional Questions Act, R.S.O. 1970, Chapter 79, by Order in Council No. 2089/79, respecting The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO.

Constitutional law—Courts—Landlords and tenants—Provincial commission empowered to evict tenants and to enforce obligations of landlords and tenants—Whether or not grant of powers to Commission ultra vires—The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, 1979 (Ont.), c. 78—British North America Act, R.S.C 1970, s. 96.

The Ontario Legislature enacted The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, to come into effect on proclamation. The Act contained a legislative code to govern landlords and tenants and established the Residential Tenancy Commission to oversee and enforce the newly enunciated rights and obligations. The Executive Council, responding to questions concerning the authority of the Legislature to make orders evicting tenants from residential premises and to require landlords and tenants to comply with obligations imposed under the Act, referred two questions dealing with those issues to the Ontario Court of Appeal. That Court concluded that it was not within the legislative authority of Ontario to make eviction orders and compliance orders as provided in The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979. This Court was only concerned with the constitutional validity of two powers, the subject matter of the reference, and not with the soundness of the overall legislative scheme.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Royal Commission Reports and Reports of Parliamentary Committees made prior to the passing of a statute were admissible to show the factual context and purpose of the legislation. The practice adopted in the Anti-Inflation Reference of giving timely directions establishing the extraneous materials to be admitted should be followed. Material relevant to the issues before the Court and not inherently unreliable or offending against public policy should be admissible, subject to the provisio that such extrinsic materials are not available for the purpose of aiding in statutory construction.

Section 96 of the British North America Act limited provincial competence to make appointments to a tribunal exercising s. 96 judicial powers and implicitly limited provincial competence to endow a provincial tribunal with such powers. That section, however, could no longer be construed as a bar to a province seeking to vest an administrative tribunal with ancillary "judicial" powers formerly exercised by s. 96 courts, subject to the qualification that the judicial function not be isolated from the rest of the administrative structure of the legislation.

The test was to be formulated in three steps. The first involved consideration, in light of the historical conditions existing in 1867, of the particular power or jurisdiction conferred upon the tribunal. The matter ended there if the power was not broadly conformable to the jurisdiction formerly exercised by s. 96 courts. If, however, the power were identical or analogous to a power exercised by a s. 96 court at Confederation it became necessary to proceed to step two. The second step involved consideration of the function within its institutional setting to determine whether the function was still "judicial". The subject matter rather than the apparatus of adjudication was determinative and only if the power could still be characterized as judicial was it necessary to proceed to the third step—a review of the tribunal's function as a whole in order to appraise the impugned function in its entire institutional context. A provincial scheme was only invalid where the adjudicative function was a sole or central function of the tribunal so that it could be said to be operating like a s. 96 court.

Applying step one the Court found that the powers conferred on the Commission were in broad conformity with those historically exercised by the s. 96 courts before and after Confederation. The argument that the power to order eviction had been conferred before Confederation on County Court judges as persona designata, and that that power and by analogy the power to make orders of compliance were therefore outside the superior or county court structure, went too far. The jurisdiction over overholding tenants in pre-Confederation legislation was merely a modification of the traditional jurisdiction on ejectment exercised by the superior courts. The County Court judges acting under the over-holding tenants provisions were acting qua judge rather than as persona designata. The submission that the Commission's jurisdiction was analogous to that exercis-able by courts of summary jurisdiction rather than by s. 96 courts was misconceived. Provinces could not avoid the limitations of s. 96 by taking a function of a s. 96 court, simplifying procedural matters, and then transferring the jurisdiction to a non s. 96 tribunal.

Proceeding to step two the Court found that the impugned power to order eviction or compliance, viewed in its institutional setting, remained essentially a "judicial power" exercised in all cases in the context of a lis between parties. The Commission in deciding contractual and property rights as between individual landlords and tenants also determined rights other than those relating to land and property. Each case involved analysis of law, an application of law to the facts, and a judicial decision and subsequent order.

The third step examined the inter-relationship between the impugned "judicial" powers and other powers under the Act. The central function of the Commission was the resolution of disputes, in the final form by a judicial form of hearing between landlords and tenants. The Commission's other functions were either ancillary to this central function, or were separate and distinct from it and bore no relation to it. There was no broad legislative scheme to subsume the Commission's judicial functions. The whole of s. 96 court's jurisdiction in a certain area, however limited, was transferred to provincially appointed officials.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR NEW BRUNSWICK

Constitutional law—Proposal to establish unified criminal court—Transfer of criminal jurisdiction to new court—Judges provincially appointed—Inferior court transformed into a superior court—Whether proposal constitutional—Constitution Act, 1867, R.S.C 1970, Appendix II, ss. 91(2), 92(14), 96.

Appeal—Reference—Abstract questions—Whether the Court should answer referred questions—Judicature Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. J-2 as amended, s. 23(1).

The Lieutenant-Governor in Council of New Brunswick referred three questions to the Court of Appeal to determine the constitutional validity of a proposal to establish a unified criminal court in the province. The new court, which would exercise complete criminal jurisdiction, would replace the present Provincial Court and its judges would be provincially appointed. Parliament would be requested to amend the Criminal Code and other federal statutes to confer jurisdiction in criminal matters upon the new court. The Court of Appeal answered the three questions in the affirmative. Hence this appeal to determine whether s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 bars the proposal.

Held: The appeal should be allowed and the three questions answered in the negative.

Parliament can no more give away federal constitutional powers than a province can usurp them. Here, what was being contemplated was the complete obliteration of superior court criminal law jurisdiction. The effect of this proposal to transfer the present superior court criminal jurisdiction over indictable offences to a provincial court would be to deprive the Governor General of his power under s. 96 to appoint the judges who try indictable offences in New Brunswick. This is contrary to s. 96. This section bars Parliament and the provincial legislatures from altering the constitutional scheme envisaged by the judicature sections of the Constitution Act, 1867 which guarantee the independence of the superior courts from both levels of government. The result would be the same if the new court was given concurrent criminal jurisdiction with the superior court, since s. 96 is an insuperable obstacle to any attempt to transform an inferior court into a superior court.

on appeal from the court of appeal for british columbia

Constitutional law -- Courts -- Transfer of superior court powers to inferior tribunal -- Youth courts granted exclusive jurisdiction to try youths for ex facie contempt of superior courts -- Whether exclusive grant of jurisdiction constitutional -- Constitution Act, 1867, s. 96 -- Young Offenders Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. Y-1, s. 47(2).

The appellant, a young person, contravened an injunction of the British Columbia Supreme Court prohibiting protest activities interfering with the respondent's logging operations in the Clayoquot Sound area of Vancouver Island. He was charged with contempt of court and, at trial, made an application to be tried in youth court pursuant to s. 47(2) of the Young Offenders Act. This section states that exclusive jurisdiction over ex facie contempt of court committed by a young person is transferred to the youth court. The application was dismissed and the appellant was later convicted and sentenced to 45 days' imprisonment and a fine. He appealed his conviction on the ground that the British Columbia Supreme Court had no jurisdiction to try him. The Court of Appeal upheld the conviction. The court found s. 47(2) unconstitutional, concluding that the contempt power is within the core jurisdiction of the superior courts and that it is beyond the jurisdiction of Parliament to remove any part of it from those courts. The main issue in this appeal is whether Parliament, pursuant to its criminal law power, can confer upon youth courts the exclusive power to try youths for contempt ex facie of superior courts.

Held (L'Heureux-Dubé, McLachlin, Iacobucci and Major JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Lamer C.J. and La Forest, Sopinka, Gonthier and Cory JJ.: This Court's approval of the Young Offenders Act in Reference re Young Offenders Act does not preclude a separate analysis of whether a particular provision of that Act meets constitutional requirements. That case left open the specific question of whether individual provisions of the Young Offenders Act may offend s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 even though the overall scheme of the Young Offenders Act does not. To determine the validity of the transfer of power in question in this case, a two-stage analysis is required: first, using the Residential Tenancies test, the Court must decide whether the grant of jurisdiction is permissible; second, if it is, it must decide whether the superior court's jurisdiction can be ousted. The second stage of the analysis only arises when the core or inherent jurisdiction of superior courts is affected. That jurisdiction is integral to their operations and no part of it can be removed by either level of government in the absence of a constitutional amendment.

The history of contempt of court, academic commentary, and the overall scheme of the Criminal Code and the Young Offenders Act all reinforce the view that criminal contempt of court has distinct characteristics from other crimes. The dispute is one between the individual and the court itself. Ex facie criminal contempt of superior courts committed by youths has some aspects of a crime and some aspects of a sui generis court power. To reflect both these aspects, the jurisdiction transferred by s. 47(2) of the Young Offenders Act should be characterized as the power to punish youths for ex facie contempt of a superior court. Once s. 47(2) is properly characterized, the three-part test outlined in the Residential Tenancies case shows that this power or jurisdiction may be constitutionally given to an inferior court. Although the power to punish youths for ex facie contempt of superior courts was within the jurisdiction of superior courts at Confederation and this power obviously remains judicial in nature even in its new institutional setting, when one considers the institutional function of the youth courts, a transfer of this power is permissible. The policy objectives of the youth court system are clear and laudable. Our society wishes to establish different treatment for youths accused of criminal offences than for adults. Youth courts have an expertise in providing procedural protections appropriate for youths and in deciding punishments for convicted young offenders. The power to punish youths for ex facie contempt of superior courts is merely ancillary to these primary functions. Accordingly, granting jurisdiction to punish youths for ex facie contempt of superior courts does not infringe s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

This jurisdiction, however, cannot be granted to the youth court to the exclusion of provincial superior courts. Although the inherent jurisdiction of superior courts is difficult to define, there is no doubt that the power to punish for all forms of contempt is within that jurisdiction. The rule of law requires a judicial system that can ensure that its orders are enforced and its process respected. The provincial superior court is the only court of general jurisdiction in Canada. To remove the power to punish contempt ex facie by youths would maim the institution which is at the heart of our judicial system. Such an alteration is impermissible in Canada in the absence of a constitutional amendment. Thus, in light of its importance to the very existence of a superior court, no aspect of the contempt power may be removed from a superior court without infringing our Constitution and the principle of the rule of law recognized both in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867 and in all our conventions of governance. It will, in most instances, be preferable for the youth court to try and punish a youth in ex facie contempt of a superior court, but the provincial superior court's jurisdiction cannot be ousted. It will always be for the superior court to elect whether to hold contempt proceedings against a youth in order to exert control over its process, or to defer to the youth court. In addition, in cases where the youth court does proceed against a youth for contempt ex facie of a superior court, the provincial superior court retains its supervisory power to ensure that the lower court's disposition of the matter is correct.

Section 47(2) of the Young Offenders Act is therefore unconstitutional to the extent that it purports to confer exclusive jurisdiction on the youth court and to deprive a superior court of general jurisdiction of its ex facie contempt power. Section 47(2) is valid to the extent that it confers jurisdiction on the youth court. The section should be read down accordingly. Section 47(2) is thus inoperative to deprive the superior court of its jurisdiction to convict the appellant of contempt in this case.

Per L'Heureux-Dubé, McLachlin, Iacobucci and Major JJ. (dissenting): The three-step test outlined in Residential Tenancies is the appropriate approach in determining whether a transfer of power from a s. 96 court to an inferior court is valid. The test permits only incidental derogations of powers from s. 96 courts, and then only to the extent that the judicial nature of such powers is transformed by the administrative context in which they are exercised. By focusing on the function of the power in the administrative context rather than the nature of the power conferred, this test provides sufficient flexibility to equip administrative tribunals with the powers they need to do their work, while preserving the constitutional position of the s. 96 courts. There is no need for an additional condition that the transfer not involve any aspect of the "core" inherent powers of the superior court. The proposed "core test" needlessly derogates from the functional approach of the Residential Tenancies test, making a shift toward a more categorical approach. This new test would amount to an important new fetter on the ability of Parliament and the provincial legislatures to create effective tribunals to ensure compliance with regulatory schemes.

The conferral of exclusive power over ex facie contempt of the court committed by juveniles on the youth court, and its removal from s. 96 courts, brings this case directly within the ambit of the Residential Tenancies test. There is nothing exceptional in the exclusive nature of the transfer of the s. 96 power to the inferior tribunal. If an administrative scheme is to operate effectively with a minimum of procedural confusion, it is typically essential that the tribunal have exclusive power to decide the matters at issue.

Further, the inherent power of superior courts to regulate their process does not preclude elected bodies from enacting legislation affecting that process. The court's inherent powers exist to complement the statutory assignment of specific powers, not override or replace them. Courts must conform to the rule of law and, while they can exercise more power in the control of their process than is expressly provided by statute, they must generally abide by the dictates of the legislature. It follows that Parliament and the legislatures can legislate to limit and define the superior courts' inherent powers, including their powers over contempt, provided that the legislation is not otherwise unconstitutional. Parliament may thus enact s. 47(2) of the Young Offenders Act, provided that the conditions of the Residential Tenancies test are met.

The functional approach of the Residential Tenancies test is adequate to protect the s. 96 courts. Transfers of s. 96 jurisdiction to inferior tribunals have not ousted the power of the superior courts. These courts still have their rights of review of inferior tribunals' decisions and ensure that the law is followed and fair process maintained. Moreover, the facts of this case do not support the contention that powers essential to the proper functioning of s. 96 courts are in danger of being eroded. What is essential to maintaining the authority of a court is that consequences attach to the disobedience of its order, not the source of those consequences. Ex facie contempt of court is generally prosecuted, like any other crime, by the Attorney General, who gathers the evidence and presents the case to the court, and the youth court is just as able to protect the validity and efficacy of a superior court order as is the superior court. If the youth court errs, or fails to proceed where it should, it is subject to the corrective power of the superior court on judicial review or of the Court of Appeal on appeal. The superior court itself may initiate proceedings by referring a charge of ex facie contempt of court to the youth court. More importantly, the residual inherent jurisdiction of the superior courts to take such measures as may be required to preserve their process guarantees that the process of the superior courts will not be undermined by a transfer of juvenile contempt of court ex facie to the youth courts. Should the administration of justice require that a particular case be tried in superior court, that court possesses the inherent power to hold such a trial. Where the use of a legislative provision or rule of court would itself amount to an abuse of the court's process, the court may invoke its inherent jurisdiction to ensure that justice is done. Section 47(2) of the Young Offenders Act is no exception. That section, however, poses no threat to the authority of the superior courts. In leaving the power to try youths for in facie contempt of court with the superior courts, Parliament has carefully considered and weighed what is necessary to permit the superior courts to preserve their authority.

Parliament's transfer of contempt of court ex facie by youths from the s. 96 superior courts to the youth courts is valid. The test for transfer laid down in Residential Tenancies is met and this test alone suffices to determine this appeal. The power was historically possessed by s. 96 courts, it is judicial, and it is merely ancillary to the larger role of the youth courts in relation to the special problems and needs of young offenders. Since the constitutionality of s. 47(2) of the Young Offenders Act has not been successfully challenged, it follows that the appellant should have been tried in youth court. His conviction in superior court should be set aside and the charges remitted to youth court for trial.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR QUEBEC

Constitutional law — Professions Tribunal — Writs of evocation — Privative clauses — Express general exclusion of the supervisory authority of the Superior Court in respect of jurisdiction and law — Power to determine limits of jurisdiction without appeal or review — Whether a s. 96 court created — British North America Act, art. 96 — Professional Code, R.S.Q. 1977, c. C-26, arts. 162, 163, 164, 169, 175, 193, 194, 195 — Code of Civil Procedure, arts. 33, 846.

The appellant obtained two writs of evocation from a judge of the Superior Court of Quebec from two decisions of the Professions Tribunal quashing a decision of a Discipline Committee of a professional corporation on the ground that that body had acted beyond its authority. The Superior Court held that the wide powers conferred upon the Professions Tribunal—powers encompassing review of law or fact and jurisdiction—offended s. 96 of the B.N.A. Act because the question whether a body has exceeded its jurisdiction fell within the superintending and reforming power belonging solely to a superior court whose members are appointed by the Governor General in Council. That decision was reversed by a majority of the Quebec Court of Appeal. Hence the appeal to this Court.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

The Professions Tribunal is given no function other than that of a general tribunal of appeal in respect of all professions covered by the Professional Code and it was, therefore, impossible to see its final appellate jurisdiction as part of an institutional arrangement by way of a regulatory scheme for governance of the various professions.

Where a provincial legislature purports to insulate one of its statutory tribunals from any curial review of its adjudicative functions, and where that insulation encompassing jurisdiction, the legislation must be struck down as unconstitutional because it constitutes, in effect, a s. 96 court. It is unquestioned that privative clauses, when properly framed, may effectively oust judicial review on questions of law and on other issues not touching jurisdiction. However, given that s. 96 is in the British North America Act and that it would make a mockery of it to treat it in non-functional formal terms as a mere appointing power, there is nothing that is more the hallmark of a superior court than the vesting of power in a provincial statutory tribunal to determine the limits of its jurisdiction without appeal or other review. Consequently, a provincially-constituted statutory tribunal could not constitutionally be immunized from review of decisions on questions of jurisdiction.

The present case was no different in principle from the Farrah case, 1978 CanLII 195 (SCC), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 638, when regard is had to ss. 175, 194 and 195 of the Professional Code. In both cases there was a purported exclusion of the reviewing authority of any court, whether by appeal or by evocation.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Courts — Jurisdiction — Provincial superior courts — Power to declare federal statute ultra vires — Nature of exclusive powers of Federal Court (Trial Division) to grant injunctive and declaratory relief — Constitutional Act, 1867, ss. 91(2), 91(27), 92(15), 96, 100, 101 — Federal Court Act, R.S.C. 1970 (2nd Supp.), c. 10, ss. 2, 17. 18.

Combines — Provincial law society — Advertising restrictions — Whether or not Combines Investigation Act applicable to restrictions — Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23, ss. 2, 8. 17(1), 32.

Civil rights — Freedom of speech — Law society restrictions as to advertising — Whether restrictions imposed under valid provincial law — Whether restrictions on member's right to advertise a violation of right to freedom of speech — Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970. c. C-23. ss. 2, 8, 17(1), 32 — Legal Professions Act, R.S.B.C. 1960, c. 214 (now Barristers and Solicitors Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 26), ss. 1, 2(3), 36, 36A, 37, 43, 48(b), 62.

The Law Society of British Columbia initiated steps to discipline Jabour, a member who had advertised his practice contrary to the Society's rules, for "conduct unbecoming a member". In the B.C. Supreme Court, Jabour sought: 1) a declaration that the Law Society's rulings and orders were null and void because they offended the Combines Investigation Act and infringed upon Jabour's freedom of speech; and 2) an interlocutory injunction restraining the Law Society from proceeding pending the Court's determination of the issues raised. The request for the interlocutory injunction was rejected. The Law Society's Discipline Committee found Jabour guilty and recommended suspension of his licence to practice. Jabour, however, successfully sought an order enjoining the Law Society from considering the Committee's report pending disposition of the Court action. The order was sustained on appeal.

The Law Society started an action in the British Columbia Supreme Court after it received a notice of investigation under the Combines Investigation Act. The action sought: 1) an injunction preventing the Director from continuing with the inquiry relating to the Law Society and 2) declarations that the Combines Investigation Act did not apply to the Law Society, and if it did, that that Act was ultra vires Parliament to that extent.

 Held: The appeals should be dismissed.

The British Columbia courts have jurisdiction to entertain the claims for declarations relating to the applicability of the Combines Investigation Act to the Society and its members. Although Parliament might establish a court for the better administration of the laws of Canada, it lacks the constitutional authority to strip the provincial superior courts of the power to declare a federal statute beyond Parliament's competence. These courts occupy a position of prime importance in the constitutional pattern of this country and their power to consider the constitutionality of federal statutes is fundamental to the federal system established by the Constitution. Section 101 cannot justify such an exclusion of authority. Moreover, the British Columbia courts have jurisdiction to entertain a plea for injunction on these proceedings instituted under the Combines Investigation Act because it is a remedy ancillary to the court's principal determination and a part of the court's inherent general jurisdiction.

Section 32 of the Combines Investigation Act did not apply to the Law Society in the circumstances of this appeal. The Benchers' disciplining Jabour for advertising was authorized by the Legal Professions Act. That Act caused the discipline committee to be established, authorized disciplinary action for "conduct unbecoming a member of the society", and broadly defined that conduct to include "any matter, conduct or thing ... deemed in the judgment of the Benchers to be contrary to the best interests of the public or of the legal profession." The Benchers, in agreeing that Jabour was guilty of professional misconduct, did not conspire contrary to s. 32(1) of the Combines Investigation Act. Rather, they were discharging their duties under a valid provincial act. Where a federal statute can be properly interpreted so as not to interfere with a provincial statute, that interpretation is to be applied in preference to other constructions that would bring about a conflict between the two statutes. The defence, created by s. 32(6), dealing with conspiracy in relation to service or standards of competence reasonably necessary to protect the public in the practice of a profession, did not expand the charging section or otherwise fundamentally change the plain meaning of the section's main operating provision. It was not necessary to consider whether the Combines Investigation Act was intra vires Parliament.

Appellant's right to freedom of speech was not violated by the Bencher's ruling. This freedom, absent constitutional entrenchment placing it beyond the reach of Parliament or the Legislature, can be curtailed by valid statute law. The ethical, moral and financial aspects of a trade or profession can be regulated by a province within its boundaries. The Benchers' ruling here was exercised under valid provincial law and the fact that it reduced a member's right to freedom of economic speech (advertising) did not invalidate this otherwise validly delegated power.

on appeal from the appeal division of the nova scotia supreme court

Constitutional law -- Courts -- Jurisdiction -- Employment law -- Provincial tribunal affirming decision requiring employee's reinstatement and the retroactive payment of wages -- Whether or not power of provincial official and tribunal to hear and determine disputes and to make orders contravening s. 96 and hence ultra vires -- Constitution Act, 1867, s. 96 -- Labour Standards Code, S.N.S. 1972, c. 10, s. 67A(2), (3).

The appellant Yeomans had been continuously employed by respondent Sobeys for ten years prior to his dismissal. He had been warned orally on at least three occasions about his shortcomings but had been given no written notice of them. Yeomans complained to the Director of Labour Standards for Nova Scotia that he had been dismissed "without just cause" within the meaning of s. 67A of the Labour Standards Code. The Director ordered Yeomans to be reinstated and to be paid lost wages stemming from the unjust dismissal. This decision was upheld by the Labour Standards Tribunal. The Appeal Division of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court allowed Sobeys' appeal holding s. 67A(2) and (3) unconstitutional because they conferred a s. 96 power on a provincially-appointed tribunal.

The constitutional questions raised on this appeal were (1) whether the province had legislative jurisdiction to empower the Director of Labour Standards and the Labour Standards Tribunal to hear and determine disputes with respect to, and make orders enforcing, s. 67A of the Labour Standards Code in light of s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867; and (2) whether s. 67A(2) and (3) of the Labour Standards Code were ultra vires the province as contravening s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

Held: The appeal should be allowed; the first constitutional question should be answered in the affirmative and the second in the negative.

Per Dickson C.J. and McIntyre, Lamer and Wilson JJ.: Although the Labour Standards Tribunal exercises a jurisdiction broadly conformable to that of s. 96 courts at the time of Confederation, and although in doing so it performs a judicial function, it does so as a necessarily incidental aspect of the broader policy goal of providing minimum standards of protection for non-unionized employees.

The jurisdiction in this case should be characterized as in relation to unjust dismissal. Characterizations of s. 67A as being in relation to employer/employee relations, labour standards or the mandatory performance of an employment contract should be rejected.

Characterization should be determined with reference to the different purposes served by the three stages of the test developed in Re Residential Tenancies Act, 1979. The first stage of that test involves a search for "broad conformity" with the powers of s. 96 courts at the time of Confederation. A relatively strict approach to characterization is necessary at this stage in order to prevent the possibility of large accretions of jurisdiction in the inferior courts which would in turn defeat the purpose of s. 96. Jurisdiction over the remedy, however, is too narrow. The nature of the dispute should be the guide for the application of the historical test.

If the jurisdiction was exclusive to the superior courts at Confederation, the inquiry must pass to the second and third stages of the test. If the jurisdiction is shared, the legislation under challenge may, in some circumstances, be held valid by the historical test. Jurisdiction need not be entirely or even generally concurrent, for the nature of the inferior-superior court distinction necessarily means that the former's jurisdiction will be subject to a geographical or pecuniary limit. Only if the jurisdiction of the inferior courts is broadly co-extensive with the superior courts will the history of shared jurisdiction validate the contemporary scheme under the historical test.

Pre-Confederation jurisdiction refers to pre-1867 jurisdiction and not to jurisdiction in a particular province immediately prior to that province's joining confederation. The test of 1867 jurisdiction must include an examination of the jurisdiction in all four original confederating provinces, and if this results in a tie, the jurisdiction in the United Kingdom. A tie existed here. Jurisdiction over unjust dismissal in the United Kingdom in 1867 was therefore examined and found to be the preserve of courts equivalent to Canada's superior, district and county courts. This jurisdiction, accordingly, cannot be conferred on provincially-appointed tribunals today.

In the second stage of the Residential Tenancies test, where the issue of whether or not a function is judicial is considered, the nature of the question which the tribunal is called upon to decide is determinative. A distinction must be drawn between the roles of the Director and the Tribunal. The former does not perform a judicial function even though he deals with private disputes between parties; the latter does.

The third stage of the test examines the `context' in which this power is exercised. It is exercised in the context of a comprehensive scheme for the protection of non-unionised workers. The policy of promoting such protection is a response to changed social conditions since Confederation and is implemented in an administrative as opposed to a court context. Although the Tribunal does carry out a judicial function with regard to s. 67A and many other aspects of the Code, that function is necessarily incidental to the implementation of broader policy goals the Code is designed to achieve.

Per Beetz, La Forest and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ.: The Labour Standards Code's judicial component bears no relationship to the contractual issues assigned to the s. 96 courts in 1867. Its labour relations standards transcend the relationship between the parties and apply independently of any contractual arrangement that may exist. The enforcement mechanisms are essentially conciliatory procedures. The Director and tribunal members are knowledgeable in, and are governed by the dynamics of, labour relations rather than legal norms. There is no requirement that they be legally trained. An appeal from the Director to the Tribunal does not involve a lis between the complainant and the alleged contravenor notwithstanding its judicial component. Labour standards legislation is an integral part of the modern concept of labour relations and the power to enforce these standards, by use of techniques appropriate to the subject-matter, should be vested in specialized bodies by the province. It is inappropriate that the regular enforcement of these standards be by action in s. 96 courts, let alone part of the protected jurisdiction of these courts.

Since the administration and enforcement of modern legislation respecting labour standards form no part of the protected jurisdiction of a s. 96 court, considerations as to the precise nature of the historical inquiry into some aspect of a s. 96 court's jurisdiction were not of immediate relevance. However, it should be noted that the question to consider is whether a tribunal's jurisdiction "broadly" conforms to that of a s. 96 court at Confederation. This is not precisely definable. The experience, not only of the original provinces, but that of other provinces and England, at the time of Confederation, is relevant. Mechanistic assessments should be avoided as well as consideration of a situation peculiar to a province.

Case Summary

Insurance — Automobile insurance — Statutory accident benefits — Claim of bad faith conduct by insurer in relation to insured's entitlement to statutory accident benefits falling within jurisdiction of Licence Appeal Tribunal under s. 280(2) of Insurance Act — Prohibition in s. 280(3) of Act on court proceeding applying to claim — Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.8, s. 280.

The plaintiff sued the defendant insurer for bad faith in its handling of her claim for statutory accident benefits, seeking punitive and exemplary damages. She claimed that, for about three years after she was seriously injured in a motor vehicle accident, the defendant did not advise her or her parents that her injuries could qualify as a catastrophic impairment or inform them of the benefits that could be available for such an impairment. The defendant moved successfully to strike out the statement of claim. The motion judge held that the claim was "in respect of an insured person's entitlement to statutory accident benefits or in respect of the amount of statutory accident benefits to which an insured person is entitled" and was therefore a claim over which the Licence Appeal Tribunal had exclusive jurisdiction under s. 280(2) of the Insurance Act, and that a court proceeding was prohibited under s. 280(3) of the Act. The plaintiff appealed, arguing that an insurer's duty of good faith is independent of and in addition to its duty to pay the benefits to which an insured person is entitled, and that a breach of the duty of good faith gives rise to a stand-alone action for bad faith which is unrelated to SABS entitlement.

Held, the appeal should be dismissed.

The SABs dispute resolution provisions capture a broad range of disputes, including disputes about how an insurer handled a SABs claim. The purpose of the provisions, the expansive language used and the extent of the powers given to the LAT all support that interpretation. Neither the legal characterization of the cause of action asserted against the insurer nor the relief claimed determines whether a claim falls within the scope of the dispute resolution provisions. If the dispute relates to the insurer's compliance with obligations to the insured concerning SABs, the timeliness of performance of those obligations, and/or the manner in which they were administered, it falls within the broad reach of the dispute resolution provisions, and within the jurisdiction of the LAT. At their core, the facts alleged in the plaintiff's statement of claim were about the defendant's failure to provide the benefits to which she was entitled, its delay in providing benefits, its withholding of benefits, and its conduct in handling the claim for benefits and dealing with the plaintiff and her family. The action, viewed with an eye to its essential character, was a dispute in respect of her entitlement to SABs and their amount. The action was barred by s. 280(3) of the Act.

APPEAL from the judgment of Ramsay J., [2018] O.J. No. 1195, 2018 ONSC 1512 striking out a statement of claim.

J. Patrick Brown and Michael Warfe, for appellant.

Lisa Armstrong, Julianne Brimfield and Mark A. Gelowitz, for respondent.

The judgment of the court was delivered by ZARNETT J.A.: —

[1] The Statutory Accident Benefits ("SABs") dispute resolution provisions of s. 280 of the Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.8, which came into force on April 1, 2016, give the Licence Appeal Tribunal ("LAT") jurisdiction to resolve certain disputes and prohibit bringing proceedings in respect of those disputes in court.[1] This appeal raises the question of whether claims for an insurer's bad faith conduct fall outside of those provisions.[2]

[2] The appellant, Morgan Stegenga, was seriously injured in a motor vehicle accident. She claimed SABs from her insurer, the respondent Economical Mutual Insurance Company. In light of the way Economical Mutual handled her claim, she brought an action against it alleging bad faith and claiming punitive and exemplary damages, among other things.

[3] Economical Mutual successfully moved to strike out Ms. Stegenga's statement of claim and obtained a determination, as a matter of law, that the LAT has exclusive jurisdiction to decide Ms. Stegenga's claim at first instance. [page68]

[4] The motion judge held that Ms. Stegenga's claim fell within the SABs dispute resolution provisions because it was "in respect of an insured person's entitlement to statutory accident benefits or in respect of the amount of statutory accident benefits to which an insured person is entitled": s. 280(1). It was therefore a claim over which the LAT has exclusive jurisdiction and one which may not be brought in court: s. 280(2), (3). In the motion judge's view, both s. 280 of the Act and this court's decisions under the prior version of the Act's dispute resolution provisions required that conclusion, even though Ms. Stegenga's lawsuit asserted and sought damages for bad faith stemming from Economical Mutual's administration of her SABs claim.

[5] Ms. Stegenga appeals. She argues that this is the first case to consider whether an action for bad faith administration of a SABs claim comes within the current s. 280, amended since the cases the motion judge relied on were decided. She argues that the principles of statutory interpretation, case law that has emphasized the standalone nature of a cause of action for bad faith, the nature of the relief claimed, and sensible policy considerations, all lead to the conclusion that s. 280 does not apply.

[6] For the following reasons, I conclude that s. 280 does apply. Interpreted in light of the principles of statutory interpretation, s. 280 grants the LAT jurisdiction over Ms. Stegenga's claim, and prohibits the claim from proceeding as an action in court, notwithstanding that the action alleges bad faith and the remedies the LAT can grant are different from those a court could. This result is a consequence of the policy choice the legislature made in enacting s. 280. I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

THE FACTS

[7] Economical Mutual brought its motion under rule 21.01(1) (a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194. On such a motion, the facts alleged in Ms. Stegenga's statement of claim are taken to be true. The facts set out below come from that statement of claim.

[8] In November 2011, when she was 15 years old, Ms. Stegenga was a passenger in a motor vehicle that was involved in a serious collision. She suffered significant injuries, including a head injury with a Glasgow Coma Scale ("GCS") score of 6, necessitating a period of intubation and treatment in a Pediatric Critical Care Unit. She also suffered multiple rib fractures, pulmonary contusions, fractures to her right clavicle, scapula and pelvic rami, as well as other injuries. These injuries were accompanied by, among other things, a loss of cognitive ability; personality, behaviour and psychological changes; and [page69] anxiety, depression and chronic pain. As a result, Ms. Stegenga experienced a decline in her academic performance. She has struggled to maintain her grades, focus on school work and complete assignments.

[9] Ms. Stegenga was insured by Economical Mutual under an automobile insurance policy it issued to her father.

[10] In January 2012, Ms. Stegenga's mother applied on her behalf to the respondent for SABs. Pertinent medical information was provided by Ms. Stegenga's pediatrician.

[11] For a period of about three years, Economical Mutual did not advise Ms. Stegenga or her parents that her injuries could qualify as a catastrophic impairment or inform them of the benefits that could be available for such an impairment. Economical Mutual also did not -- provide them with the application form required to make a determination about catastrophic impairment;

-- take steps to interview Ms. Stegenga or her parents regarding the nature and extent of her injuries or their effect on her daily life;

-- arrange to have her assessed by a health practitioner;

-- assign a case manager to assist with her care and rehabilitation, or advise her that she was entitled to a case manager;

-- obtain her hospital and clinical records for over two years, or respond appropriately to such records when eventually provided to them;

-- respond to requests to authorize a neurologic psychoeducational assessment; and
-- provide accurate benefit statements to Ms. Stegenga and her parents (those provided misrepresented both the nature of her injuries as non-catastrophic and the applicable policy limits available to her).

[12] In February 2015, Economical Mutual advised that based on Ms. Stegenga's GCS score, it now accepted that she had suffered a catastrophic impairment as a result of the collision. However, over the next year, Economical Mutual continued to provide benefit statements that described her injuries as non-catastrophic.

[13] Ms. Stegenga alleges that Economical Mutual breached the duties it owed to her because it acted wilfully and negligently in breach of its contract with her and in breach of its duty of good faith. The claim recites 56 particulars of Economical [page70] Mutual's alleged breaches, which may be grouped into several categories:

-- failing to inform Ms. Stegenga and her family of her rights and entitlements to benefits under the Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule -- Effective September 1, 2010, O. Reg. 34/10 (the "SABs Schedule");

-- while it knew or ought to have known that Ms. Stegenga suffered a catastrophic injury, failing to ensure she had the proper information, forms, examinations, assessments, treatment, care and a case manager;

-- failing to take steps to investigate Ms. Stegenga's medical condition and her entitlement to benefits, and not properly considering information provided to it on those topics;

-- preventing Ms. Stegenga from accessing benefits and withholding, delaying or denying benefits based on inaccurate and irrelevant considerations;

-- sending Ms. Stegenga and her family confusing, misleading and contradictory correspondence about her entitlement to benefits, misrepresenting her benefits, withholding information and failing to make disclosure, knowing that Ms. Stegenga would not receive the treatment, care and benefits she required and to which she was entitled; and

-- failing to follow reasonable standards for the handling of Ms. Stegenga's claim for benefits.

[14] As noted, the statement of claim refers to Ms. Stegenga's entitlement to SABs and to the fact that SABs were not, or were inadequately, provided. It states that, because of Economical Mutual's conduct, and reliance on its misleading representations, she did not "receive the care, treatment, and benefits to which she was entitled and should have received". Ms. Stegenga also pleads that although she provided all forms, information and medical documentation requested by Economical Mutual, Economical Mutual "did not provide the benefits to which [Ms. Stegenga] was legally entitled".

[15] The statement of claim alleges that Economical Mutual's conduct prolonged Ms. Stegenga's suffering, and caused new difficulties and impairments she would not otherwise have experienced, as well as emotional, psychological and financial distress. Damages, including punitive, aggravated and exemplary damages, are claimed. [page71]

THE MOTION JUDGE'S DECISION

[16] Economical Mutual moved under Rule 21 to strike the statement of claim, seeking the determination of a question of law: whether the appellant's claim is barred by s. 280(1) and (3) of the Insurance Act. The motion judge defined the question as whether a claim for negligent, fraudulent or bad faith administration of accident benefits is a claim falling within s. 280(1), that is, whether it is a dispute "in respect of an insured person's entitlement to statutory accident benefits or in respect of the amount of statutory accident benefits to which an insured person is entitled".

[17] The motion judge reasoned that the words "in respect of" in s. 280(1) import a connection in a very broad sense. He considered the dispute resolution provisions to be designed to provide a cost-efficient and fair mechanism for resolving disputes between insurers and insureds in respect of SABs, by mandating that disputes be heard at first instance by the LAT. To determine whether the dispute fell within the LAT's jurisdiction and therefore outside that of the courts, the motion judge instructed himself to look to the facts giving rise to the dispute rather than the legal characterization of the wrong, citing Weber v. Ontario Hydro, 1995 CanLII 108 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 929, [1995] S.C.J. No. 59, at para. 49. He cited this court's decision in Arsenault v. Dumfries Mutual Insurance Co. (2002), 2002 CanLII 23580 (ON CA), 57 O.R. (3d) 625, [2002] O.J. No. 4 (C.A.), which was decided under the dispute resolution provisions of the Act before the 2016 amendments, as standing for the proposition that those provisions apply if a refusal of accident benefits is an essential part of a claim, regardless of whether bad faith in administering a claim may be an independent tort in the context of accident benefits. He concluded [at para. 14] that s. 280 is "intended to deprive a claimant of resort to the court at first instance whenever the claim is based on denial of accident benefits, no matter how the denial is characterized in legal terms".

THE APPELLANT'S POSITION

[18] Although the statement of claim seeks damages for breach of contract, negligence, misrepresentation and infliction of mental distress, Ms. Stegenga's argument on appeal focuses on her action as one for bad faith relating to the administration of her SABs claim. She argues that an insurer's duty of good faith is independent of and in addition to its duty to pay the benefits to which an insured person is entitled, a point she argues follows from the Supreme Court's decision in Whiten v. Pilot Insurance Co., [2002] 1 S.C.R. 595, [2002] S.C.J. No. 19, 2002 SCC 18, at para. 79. [page72] A breach of the duty of good faith gives rise to a standalone action for bad faith in which aggravated, exemplary and punitive damages are available.

[19] Ms. Stegenga submits that nothing in the Insurance Act deprives the Superior Court of jurisdiction to deal with such a claim or confers jurisdiction on the LAT to do so, for interrelated reasons. Her standalone bad faith claim is not for benefits entitlement, and the LAT cannot award aggravated, exemplary or punitive damages. The cases by which the motion judge considered himself bound, including Arsenault, are distinguishable because they did not involve true bad faith claims: they were claims for indemnity under the insurance contract and dealt with entitlement issues. The motion judge's conclusion that the LAT has exclusive jurisdiction over Ms. Stegenga's claim effectively insulates insurers from claims involving a breach of their duty of good faith in relation to claims for SABs, a result she contends should be avoided.

ANALYSIS

[20] This appeal requires me to consider three issues:

(1) What is the breadth of the SABs dispute resolution provisions in the Insurance Act that prohibit recourse to the court and empower the LAT to resolve disputes?

(2) Does a bad faith claim against an insurer, seeking relief such as punitive damages, fall outside the scope of the dispute resolution provisions?

(3) What effect do the conclusions under issues 1 and 2 have on Ms. Stegenga's claim?

[21] As I explain, the SABs dispute resolution provisions capture a broad range of disputes, including disputes about how an insurer handled a SABs claim. The purpose of the provisions, the expansive language used and the extent of the powers given to the LAT all support this interpretation.

[22] Neither the legal characterization of the cause of action asserted against the insurer nor the relief claimed determines whether a claim falls within the scope of the dispute resolution provisions. If the dispute relates to the insurer's compliance with obligations to the insured concerning SABs, the timeliness of performance of those obligations and/or the manner in which they were administered, it falls within the broad reach of the dispute resolution provisions, and within the jurisdiction of the LAT. The prohibition on court proceedings will apply. [page73]

[23] In this case, these conclusions apply to bar Ms. Stegenga's action.

The Statutory Scheme

[24] Subsection 280(1) of the Insurance Act describes the disputes to which the dispute resolution process it mandates applies. It provides:

> 280(1) This section applies with respect to the resolution of disputes in respect of an insured person's entitlement to statutory accident benefits or in respect of the amount of statutory accident benefits to which an insured person is entitled.

[25] Subsection 280(2) goes on to confer jurisdiction on the LAT to resolve the disputes described in s. 280(1):

> (2) The insured person or the insurer may apply to the Licence Appeal Tribunal to resolve a dispute described in subsection (1).

[26] Subsection 280(3) then places a limit on what proceedings may be brought in court, prohibiting proceedings at first instance if they are with respect to a dispute described in s. 280(1), that is, a dispute that falls within the jurisdiction of the LAT:

> (3) No person may bring a proceeding in any court with respect to a dispute described in subsection (1), other than an appeal from a decision of the Licence Appeal Tribunal or an application for judicial review.

[27] Further guidance on what falls within the jurisdiction of the LAT and therefore outside that of the court at first instance is contained in the balance of s. 280 and the relevant regulations.

[28] Subsection 280(4) provides that a dispute shall be resolved in accordance with the SABs Schedule. Subsections (5) and (6) provide that the powers of the LAT and the orders it may make may be provided for by regulation, and may include the power to make orders "to pay amounts even if those amounts are not costs or amounts to which a party is entitled under the [SABs Schedule]": s. 280(6)2.

[29] Both the SABs Schedule and the regulations envisaged by the Act contemplate the LAT making determinations about how an insurer has handled a claim and granting relief beyond the payment of SABs when payments have been "unreasonably withheld or delayed". Section 3(8) of the SABs Schedule provides:

> (8) If in a dispute described in subsection 280(1) of the Act, the Licence Appeal Tribunal finds that an expense was not incurred because the insurer unreasonably withheld or delayed payment of a benefit in respect of the expense, the Licence Appeal Tribunal may, for the purpose of determining an insured person's entitlement to the benefit, deem the expense to have been incurred.

(Emphasis added) [page74]

[30] And s. 10 of Automobile Insurance, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 664 provides:

> 10. If the Licence Appeal Tribunal finds that an insurer has unreasonably withheld or delayed payments, the Licence Appeal Tribunal, in addition to awarding the benefits and interest to which an insured person is entitled under the Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule, may award a lump sum of up to 50 per cent of the amount to which the person was entitled at the time of the award together with interest on all amounts then owing to the insured (including unpaid interest) at the rate of 2 per cent per month, compounded monthly, from the time the benefits first became payable under the Schedule.

(Emphasis added)

Issue 1: The broad scope of the SABs dispute resolution provisions

[31] The breadth of s. 280 of the Insurance Act is a question of statutory interpretation. The modern approach to statutory interpretation requires the court to consider the words of a statute "in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament": Belwood Lake Cottagers Ass'n Inc. v. Ontario (Environment and Climate Change), [2019] O.J. No. 485, 2019 ONCA 70, at para. 39, citing Montréal (City) v. 2952-1366 Québec Inc., [2005] 3 S.C.R. 141, [2005] S.C.J. No. 63, 2005 SCC 62, at paras. 9-12; and Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re) (1998), 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), 36 O.R. (3d) 418, [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, [1998] S.C.J. No. 2, at para. 21. Reading a statutory provision in its entire context requires the court to consider the history of the provision and its place in the overall scheme of the act, among other things: Belwood, at para. 41.

[32] More specific principles of interpretation apply in some cases. Ms. Stegenga argues that as the Superior Court is a court of general jurisdiction, it has jurisdiction over all matters of substantive law in civil claims unless that jurisdiction is taken away by clear and unequivocal legislative language*: TeleZone Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General)* (2008), 94 O.R. (3d) 19, [2008] O.J. No. 5291, 2008 ONCA 892, affd Canada (Attorney General) v. TeleZone Inc., [2010] 3 S.C.R. 585, [2010] S.C.J. No. 62, 2010 SCC 62, at paras. 3, 6.

[33] It is conceded that the Act does, by clear and unequivocal language, take away some jurisdiction from the court and confer it on the LAT. The Act's express directions that "[n]o person may bring a proceeding in any court with respect to a dispute . . ." (s. 280(3)) and that "[t]he insured person or the insurer may apply to the [LAT] to resolve a dispute . . ." (s. 280(2)) leave no doubt about that. The issue is the breadth of the subject matter [page75] carved out of the court's jurisdiction and given to the LAT to resolve.

[34] Ms. Stegenga essentially argues that the words "disputes in respect of an insured person's entitlement to statutory accident benefits or in respect of the amount of statutory accident benefits to which an insured person is entitled" only capture disputes about whether or not a benefit should be paid, that is, claims for a benefit itself, or disputes about whether a benefit was paid in an incorrect amount, that is, claims for the further amount that should be paid or for the excess amount that should not have been paid. She argues that the legislature used the terms "entitlement" and "amount" to limit the scope of s. 280(1). Had the legislature drafted the provision to cover "any dispute in respect of statutory accident benefits", for example, its reach would be broader.

[35] In my view, this argument reads the section too narrowly. Several indicators of legislative meaning, which I outline below, lead to the conclusion that a dispute in respect of an insured person's entitlement to SABs or the amount of an insured person's SABs entitlement embraces more than a claim for the payment of a benefit not paid or paid in an incorrect amount, and extends to the way the claim was handled.

(i) Legislative purpose

[36] The current version of s. 280 of the Act came into force on April 1, 2016. The previous version provided for mandatory mediation of disputes in respect of any entitlement to or the amount of an entitlement to SABs, and gave an insured person an option of then proceeding to court or arbitration for the resolution of such a dispute if mediation failed, but within a two-year limitation period: Insurance Act, ss. 279-283, as they appeared on March 31, 2016.[3]

[37] The pre-April 2016 provisions were described as a "mandatory scheme" and "complete code for dealing with disputes between an insured person and an insurer concerning SABs issues" (para. 34, emphasis omitted): Ayr Farmers Mutual Insurance Co. v. Wright (2016), 134 O.R. (3d) 427, [2016] O.J. No. 5556, 2016 ONCA 789, at paras. 4, 16, 34. The amendments enacted in [page76] April 2016 -- giving the LAT jurisdiction (subject to appeal or judicial review) over the same disputes that were previously subject to mandatory mediation, and prohibiting proceedings in court -- do not detract from the legislature's intention that the provisions continue to constitute a complete code for the resolution of disputes in respect of an insured person's entitlement to SABs or in respect of the amount of SABs to which an insured person is entitled.

[38] The purpose of the amendments that led to the current s. 280 has been described as reducing both insurance rates and insurance fraud, and speeding up dispute resolution, in large part by providing an efficient, fair and accessible mechanism for resolving disputes: "Fighting Fraud and Reducing Automobile Insurance Rates Act, 2014", 1st reading, Ontario, Legislative Assembly, Official Report of Debates (Hansard), 41st Parl., 1st Sess., No. 8 (July 15, 2014) at 1510 (Hon. Charles Sousa); see, also, 2014 Ontario Automobile Insurance Dispute Resolution System Review, Final Report, by The Hon. J. Douglas Cunningham (Toronto: February 25, 2014), at pp. 2-3, 13, 31-33, the report that formed the basis for the amendments to the dispute resolution provisions. The amendments removing disputes from the courts and empowering the LAT to deal with them are among the "cornerstones" of the legislation passed to effect the above purpose: Hon. Charles Sousa, at 1510.

[39] The purpose of the current s. 280 has two important implications. First, the purpose of reducing insurance rates by providing for efficient dispute resolution through the LAT would not be served by an overly restrictive reading of the LAT's jurisdiction and the corresponding limit on the court's jurisdiction. The legislature must be taken to have considered the importance of its objectives of efficiency and cost reduction to outweigh the loss of insured individuals' access to the courts and to the full range of remedies available there.

[40] Second, while the legislature's intention that the dispute resolution provisions continue to be a complete code does not, on its own, determine which disputes fall within it, it does suggest that the legislature did not intend the same, similar, or overlapping issues to be adjudicated in more than one forum.

(ii) The use of expansive language in s. 280(1)

[41] The entry point to the SABs dispute resolution provisions is s. 280(1), which contains expansive language.

[42] As the motion judge correctly noted, the phrase "in respect of" connotes the broadest possible connection between two subject matters: Arsenault, at para. 16, citing R. v. Nowegijick, 1983 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1983] 1 S.C.R. 29, [1983] S.C.J. No. 5, at p. 39 S.C.R. In s. 280(1), that [page77] phrase connects "dispute" to "entitlement" to statutory accident benefits or their amount.

[43] The ordinary meaning of the noun "dispute" is broad. It has been described as a "conflict or controversy", a "disagreement or argument" and a "controversy; a debate": Black's Law Dictionary, 11th ed.; Concise Oxford English Dictionary, 12th ed.; Canadian Oxford Dictionary, 2nd ed.

[44] "Entitlement" is a term of wide meaning, referring to "a right to do or receive something": Concise Oxford English Dictionary, 12th ed. It embraces the content of the insured's right to receive SABs (i.e., what SABs an insured person has a right to receive), when they have a right to receive those SABs, and the manner of performance by the insurer they have a right to receive.

[45] Taken together, the words of s. 280(1) cover a wide array of disagreements connected in some way to the SABs to which an insured person was or is entitled. Viewed in the context of the purpose and history of the dispute resolution provisions, those words include disagreements about when the insurer's obligation to provide SABs should be or should have been performed, and how the obligation to provide them should be or should have been performed.

(iii) The LAT's jurisdiction

[46] The balance of s. 280 informs the proper interpretation of the s. 280(1) reference to disputes in respect of entitlement to SABs or their amount. These provisions elaborate on the jurisdiction given to the LAT, and therefore on what falls within s. 280(1). The jurisdiction given to the LAT over those disputes is co-extensive with that removed from the court: s. 280(2), (3).

[47] The jurisdiction given to the LAT includes making determinations about the manner in which an insurer has administered a claim for SABs. Subsection 280(4) states that the LAT shall resolve disputes in accordance with the SABs Schedule. The SABs Schedule gives the LAT the power, for the purpose of making an award of benefits, to deem an expense to have been incurred if that expense was not incurred because an insurer unreasonably withheld or delayed payment of benefits in respect of the expense: s. 3(8). Determining whether a benefit was unreasonably withheld or delayed necessarily involves determining both what benefits were due and when, and whether the insurer's conduct that led to it not providing the benefit or providing it later than it should have was unreasonable.

[48] Similarly, s. 280(5) and (6) of the Act contemplate the LAT exercising power under other regulations. Subsection 280(6) 2 allows the regulations to authorize the LAT to award [page78] amounts beyond those for which the SABs Schedule provides. The regulations in turn allow the LAT to make, in addition to an award of the benefits and interest to which the insured is entitled under the SABs Schedule, an award (known as a "special award") of up to 50 per cent of the benefits to which the insured is otherwise entitled, and interest at a higher rate, if it finds the insurer unreasonably withheld or delayed the payment of benefits: Automobile Insurance, s. 10. The LAT's powers contemplate an enquiry into and determination of what and when benefits should have been paid, and into whether any delay or failure to pay was reasonable, that is, into the manner in which the insurer has dealt with the claim and performed its SABs-related obligations.

[49] The LAT's jurisprudence shows that it enters into such enquiries and makes such determinations. In 17-006757 v. Aviva Insurance Canada, 2018 CanLII 81949 (Ont. L.A.T.), the LAT found the insurer to have unreasonably delayed payment of benefits: 17-006757, at para. 32. In making a special award, the LAT considered the insured's entitlement to the benefits claimed, the insurer's delay in approving payments without apparent explanation, its near total disregard of the correspondence from the insured's legal representatives and medical practitioners, its failure to reassess the claim when new information became available, its ignoring the claim for a period of time and its imprudent, stubborn, inflexible and unyielding stance with respect to the benefits claimed: 17-006757, at paras. 36-37.

[50] This is consistent with the approach taken to special awards under the prior version of the Act. Jurisdiction to make a special award was vested in an arbitrator of the Financial Services Commission of Ontario: Insurance Act, s. 282(10) as it appeared on March 31, 2016. The operative language permitting such an award was nearly identical to the regulation now empowering the LAT to do so; that is, it required the insurer to have unreasonably withheld or delayed the payment of benefits. The approach to making special awards under the prior version of the Act required the arbitrator to determine the benefits owing to the insured person, and whether the insurer unreasonably withheld or delayed payments. Factors relevant to fixing the amount of a special award included the amount of benefits unreasonably withheld or delayed, the length of the delay and any failure to respect procedural and other protections for the insured. Bad faith was not required but was relevant if shown, as was the vulnerability of the insured if known to the insurer: Personal Insurance Co. v. Hoang, [2014] O.J. No. 1383, 2014 ONSC 81 (Div. Ct.), at paras. 64-65. [page79]

(iv) Differences in remedial powers do not affect the result

[51] The appellant points out that the remedies the LAT can grant, such as a special award, are different from what a court may award. For example, even if the LAT finds a delay or withholding of benefits that was unreasonable, and in making that determination finds conduct that would at common law amount to bad faith, it could not grant consequential or punitive damages as a court might.[4] The appellant submits that finding that s. 280 bars Ms. Stegenga's claim effectively insulates insurers from claims involving the breach of the duty of good faith in the SABs context, and from the punitive and deterrent effect of the court's remedial powers.

[52] In my view, this remedial difference does not bear on the issue of what types of disputes are captured by the grant of authority to the LAT and the parallel prohibition on court proceedings. The legislature made a choice as to what disputes would be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the LAT, and what remedial powers the LAT would have. That was a policy choice it was entitled to make. The Insurance Act and its regulations form a comprehensive scheme for the regulation of insurers and insurance. The legislature must be taken to have armed the LAT with the remedial powers it considered appropriate to deal with improper insurer behaviour, knowing those remedial powers were different from the court's.

(v) Conclusion on the meaning of the dispute resolution provisions

[53] Disagreements between an insurer and insured about the SABs the insured should receive, their amount, the timeliness of their provision, and the conduct and process of the insurer in providing them (that is, the handling or administration of the claim) constitute disputes in respect of the insured person's entitlement to SABs or their amount. Put in terms applicable here, an insured person could properly be said to have a dispute falling within s. 280(1) if a benefit the insured considers ought to have been paid or provided was not, or if it was paid or provided but only well after the insured considers it should have been [page80] because of what the insured considers to have been the insurer's inappropriate handling of the claim. These are matters the legislature has empowered the LAT to decide, and has taken away from the court.

Issue 2: A bad faith claim does not automatically fall outside the reach of s. 280

[54] The appellant argues that since bad faith is a standalone cause of action, her claim falls beyond the reach of s. 280. I agree that bad faith can be characterized as a cause of action which is available to a person insured by an insurance contract but is independent of and distinct from a claim for payment or indemnity under the insurance contract. However, it does not follow that this automatically takes the subject matter of a claim, even when characterized as one for bad faith, outside of s. 280.

[55] The following descriptions of the nature of an action for bad faith (all from cases that do not deal with SABs) are useful to analyze the appellant's submission:

(a) An insurer is under a duty of good faith and fair dealing. A breach of the duty of good faith is independent of and in addition to the breach of a contractual duty to pay the insured's loss. It is an actionable wrong, which can support a claim for punitive damages: Whiten, at para. 79.

(b) "A breach of the duty to act fairly and in good faith gives rise to a separate cause of action that is distinct from the cause of action founded on the express terms of the policy and that is not restricted by the limits in the policy. Hence it may result in an award of consequential damages distinct from the proceeds payable under the policy": Ferme Gérald Laplante & Fils Ltée v. Grenville Patron Mutual Fire Insurance Co. (2002), 2002 CanLII 45070 (ON CA), 61 O.R. (3d) 481, [2002] O.J. No. 3588 (C.A.), at para. 78.

(c) Statutory conditions in an insurance contract imposing limitation periods for "a claim under [this] contract" or an action "under this contract . . . in respect of the loss or damage to person or property" do not apply to a bad faith claim. A bad faith claim is not a claim for indemnity under the contract: Dundas v. Zurich Canada (2012), 109 O.R. (3d) 521, [2012] O.J. No. 1321, 2012 ONCA 181, at paras. 46-49.

[56] In my view, the nature of a bad faith cause of action does not automatically take a claim so denominated outside the reach of s. 280. Section 280 is not limited to claims for breach of a contractual duty to pay SABs, nor to claims under an insurance contract. As [page81] explained above, s. 280 also embraces disputes about the manner in which a claim was handled or administered.

[57] Alleging bad faith did not automatically take a claim out of the ambit of the pre-April 2016 SABs dispute resolution provisions. In Arsenault, Abella J.A. (as she then was) held that a claim alleging bad faith in the termination of benefits was still subject to the limitation period in former s. 281(5), for two reasons. First, assuming that bad faith could form an independent basis for a claim (as was subsequently confirmed in Whiten), Abella J.A. reasoned that the claim fell within the subject matter of the SABs dispute resolution code in the Act, including its limitation period, because the claim required a determination as to whether the insurer's termination of benefits was improper: Arsenault, at para. 18. Second, looking at the substance of the claim, rather than its pleaded legal characterization, Abella J.A. also reasoned that the claim was for a determination that the insurer ought not to have terminated benefits when it did. On that basis, it also fell with the dispute resolution code: Arsenault, at para. 19.

[58] This court reached a similar result in Mader v. South Easthope Mutual Insurance Co. (2014), 123 O.R. (3d) 120, [2014] O.J. No. 4906, 2014 ONCA 714. The insured in that case framed her claims for income replacement benefits and damages as flowing not only from a breach of contract, but also from a breach of the duty of good faith and a conspiracy, and argued that the latter claims were not subject to the mandatory mediation requirement in the previous s. 281(2) of the Act. However, Hourigan J.A. concluded that the claim still fell within the Act's previous dispute resolution code, because "[t] he claims asserted by the appellant all flow from the denial of benefits" and essentially "amount to nothing more than a claim that the appellant was wrongly denied benefits to which she believes that she is entitled to receive": Mader, at para. 49. This was precisely the type of claim contemplated for resolution by the Act's former SABs dispute resolution procedure.

[59] I do not accept Ms. Stegenga's submission that the reasoning in these cases is inconsistent with or displaced by the decision in Dundas. The bad faith claim in Dundas was not covered by the statutory condition imposing a time limit on claims because the condition applied only to claims under the policy.[5] As noted, s. 280 is not similarly limited. [page82]

[60] In my view, the amendments to the Act following Arsenault and Mader do not affect their continued applicability. The language considered in those cases, "[d]isputes in respect of any insured person's entitlement to statutory accident benefits or in respect of the amount of statutory accident benefits to which an insured person is entitled", remains virtually the same.[6] The legislature preserved that language in the face of the broad interpretation the courts had given to it, of which the legislature is presumed to have been aware: ATCO Gas & Pipelines Ltd. v. Alberta (Energy & Utilities Board), [2006] 1 S.C.R. 140, [2006] S.C.J. No. 4, 2006 SCC 4, at para. 59; Ruth Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes, 6th ed. (Toronto: LexisNexis, 2014), at p. 205. Only the consequences of a dispute coming within that definition have changed. Court proceedings were previously available following mandatory mediation, and within a certain limitation period; now they are not. That consideration does not prevail over the fact that the operative language remains the same. Arsenault and Mader continue to be applicable to the current s. 280(1).

[61] It is not the type of legal claim, whether bad faith or otherwise, which determines whether s.280 applies. As I explain below, it is the nature and subject matter of the dispute, assessed on the basis of the facts that give rise to it, that are determinative.

Issue 3: Application to the appellant's claim

[62] The approach taken by the Supreme Court in Weber v. Ontario Hydro, supra, applies to determine whether the Act has removed a dispute from the court's jurisdiction in favour of the LAT's jurisdiction. In Weber, McLachlin J. (as she then was) held that the facts giving rise to a dispute, rather than the legal characterization of a dispute, determined whether that dispute had been removed from the court's jurisdiction by the mandatory arbitration clause in s. 45(1) of the former Labour Relations Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. L.2: Weber, at para. 49. If the legal characterization of the claim were determinative, clever pleading could defeat the [page83] object of the legislature's prohibition on parallel court proceedings: Weber, at para. 49.

[63] As in Weber, the wording of the Insurance Act removing jurisdiction from the court and conferring it on the LAT indicates that the facts giving rise to the dispute determine which forum has jurisdiction over the dispute. In Weber, McLachlin J. noted that the mandatory arbitration provision in the Labour Relations Act "refers to 'all differences between the parties arising from the interpretation, application, administration or alleged violation of the agreement'": Weber, at para. 45 [emphasis in original]. She reasoned that the word "differences" denoted the dispute between the parties, rather than the type of legal claim one party might be able to bring against another. The legislature intended to exclude all proceedings arising from disputes of a certain character between the parties, "however those proceedings may be framed": Weber, at para. 45. The same reasoning applies here: s. 280 of the Insurance Act is not framed in terms of legal characterizations, but refers directly to disputes.

[64] At their core, the facts alleged in Ms. Stegenga's statement of claim are about the insurer's failure to provide the benefits to which Ms. Stegenga was entitled; the insurer's delay in providing benefits, its withholding of benefits, and the circumstances in which that occurred; and the insurer's conduct and process in handling the claim for benefits and dealing with Ms. Stegenga and her family, all of which caused or contributed to Ms. Stegenga not receiving "the care, treatment, and benefits to which she was entitled and should have received". These facts demonstrate that Ms. Stegenga's action, "viewed with an eye to its essential character", is a dispute "in respect of" her entitlement to SABs and their amount: Weber, at para. 67. It falls within s. 280.

[65] Ms. Stegenga's entitlement to benefits and the insurer's non-provision of benefits recurs as a theme in her pleading. If the court action were allowed to proceed, the benefits to which Ms. Stegenga was entitled, their amount and when they ought to have been provided would have to be determined as a predicate to determining whether the insurer's withholding or delay in providing benefits -- its handling of the claim -- gave rise to an actionable wrong such as bad faith. Those same determinations would have to be made in order to decide whether the insurer made actionable misleading statements. But those predicate determinations are within the LAT's jurisdiction. In intending to enact a cost-effective and efficient dispute resolution scheme, the legislature did not intend both the LAT and the court to determine the same questions on the path to granting different relief. [page84]

[66] It does not matter that the LAT would look at the facts through the lens of unreasonableness, while a court would do so through the lens of bad faith. It is not the legal characterization of the claim but the facts giving rise to the dispute that are determinative.

[67] The facts giving rise to Ms. Stegenga's dispute with the insurer relate to her entitlement to benefits or to the amount of her entitlement, as those terms are used in s. 280(1): they are connected to the category of SABs to which she was entitled, and to the proper amount of her entitlement, and they relate to the insurer's handling of the claim. Because these matters are covered by the broad language in s. 280(1), they are within the LAT's jurisdiction under s. 280(2), and are thus within the ambit of the s. 280(3) prohibition on court proceedings. The LAT is specifically empowered to grant relief for claims like Ms. Stegenga's; the court is barred from doing so.

CONCLUSION

[68] In my view, the motion judge reached the correct conclusion. Ms. Stegenga's action is barred by the dispute resolution provisions of the Insurance Act. I would dismiss the appeal.

[69] The respondent is entitled to the costs of the appeal in the sum of $7,500, inclusive of disbursements and applicable taxes.

Appeal dismissed.

Notes

1 Appeals from or applications for judicial review of LAT decisions can be brought in court: s. 280(3).

2 Whether claims for extracontractual damages such as punitive damages fall outside of those provisions was the subject of some commentary shortly after they came into force: see Philippa G. Samworth, "AABS and SABS: The Evolving World of Ontario Statutory Accident Benefits in 2016" (2017), 46 Advoc. Q 1.

3 The prior version of s. 280(1), defining the scope of the dispute resolution provisions' application, read as follows: "Disputes in respect of any insured person's entitlement to statutory accident benefits or in respect of the amount of statutory accident benefits to which an insured person is entitled shall be resolved in accordance with sections 280 to 283 and the Statutory Accident Benefits Schedule": Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.8, s. 279(1) as it appeared on March 31, 2016.

4 Prior to the 2016 amendments, a court hearing a SABs entitlement dispute could also grant damages for mental distress to the SABs claimant: McQueen v. Echelon General Insurance Co. (2011), 107 O.R. (3d) 780, [2011] O.J. No. 4563, 2011 ONCA 649, at paras. 19, 65, 75.

5 Ms. Stegenga relies on three other cases that are similarly distinguishable: L'Espérance v. Economical Mutual Insurance Group (2014), 122 O.R. (3d) 773, [2014] O.J. No. 5135, 2014 ONSC 6293 (S.C.J.); Johnston v. Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Co., [2006] O.J. No. 3037, 2006 CarswellOnt 4528 (S.C.J.); and St. Denis v. TD Insurance Home and Auto Liberty Insurance Co. of Canada (2005), 2005 CanLII 37593 (ON SC), 80 O.R. (3d) 706, [2005] O.J. No. 4441 (S.C.J.). They are not SABs claims. Further, like Dundas, they involve limitation periods that are only applicable to claims "under" or "under or by virtue of" the relevant insurance policy: L'Espérance, at paras. 14, 25; Johnston, at paras. 2, 32; St. Denis, at para. 17.

2780 6 The word "any" has been changed to "an": see Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.8, s. 279(1), as it appeared on March 31, 2016.

products is bad for one's health. This argument cannot succeed. It comes down to the assertion that, by obeying a law, one is communicating one's support for the message inherent in the purpose underlying the law. If this proposition is accepted, then compliance with virtually any law becomes a form of expression. I adopt the assertion of the Crown that freedom of expression guarantees our right to express disagreement with government regulation; it does not guarantee the right to be free from government regulation with which we disagree.

I cannot accept the argument that observance of this Act, whatever its intended purpose, somehow conscripts the appellants into a campaign to educate the public about the health hazards associated with smoking. The Act does not change the law-abiding pharmacist into a spokesperson for those who think that pharmacists and other health care professionals should not appear to endorse tobacco products. Nothing in the Act prevents an individual pharmacist or any group of pharmacists from, for example, putting up signs stating that they no longer sell tobacco products because they are prohibited from doing so by legislation which they feel is unnecessary and will result in increased costs of pharmaceutical products and reduced hours of service.

In my opinion, s.4 of the Act neither compels the appellants to communicate any message regarding the consumption or sale of tobacco products, nor constrains them from expressing their opinions on the subject. It simply prohibits them from selling such products in an accredited pharmacy. In the court below, Boland J. concluded her comprehensive reasons with the following observation:

> The applicants are still free to express whatever opinions they may have with regard to the consumption or sale of tobacco.

The appellants are free to speak their minds on the topic of the sale of tobacco products in pharmacies. They may speak their minds when and how they wish to do so. The appellant

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR QUEBEC

Administrative law — Judicial review — Standard of review — Disciplinary council — Lawyer challenging constitutionality of council's decision — Proper approach to judicial review of discretionary administrative decisions engaging Charter protections — Whether framework developed in R. v. Oakes appropriate to determine if discretionary administrative decisions comply with Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Law of professions — Discipline — Barristers and solicitors — Lawyer writing private letter to judge and criticizing him — Disciplinary council finding lawyer in breach of duty to behave with objectivity, moderation and dignity and reprimanding him — Whether council properly balanced relevant Charter values with statutory objectives — Whether decision reasonable — Code of ethics of advocates, R.R.Q. 1981, c. B-1, r. 1, art. 2.03.

D appeared before a judge of the Superior Court of Quebec on behalf of a client. In the course of D's argument, the judge criticized D. In his written reasons rejecting D's application, the judge levied further criticism, accusing D of using bombastic rhetoric and hyperbole, of engaging in idle quibbling, of being impudent and of doing nothing to help his client discharge his burden. D then wrote a private letter to the judge calling him loathsome, arrogant and fundamentally unjust, and accusing him of hiding behind his status like a coward, of having a chronic inability to master any social skills, of being pedantic, aggressive and petty, and of having a propensity to use his court to launch ugly, vulgar and mean personal attacks.

The Assistant Syndic of the Barreau du Québec filed a complaint against D based on that letter alleging that D had violated art. 2.03 of the Code of ethics of advocates, which states that the conduct of advocates "must bear the stamp of objectivity, moderation and dignity". The Disciplinary Council of the Barreau du Québec found that the letter was likely to offend, rude and insulting, that the statements had little expressive value, and that the judge's conduct, which resulted in a reprimand from the Canadian Judicial Council, could not be relied on as justification for it. The Council rejected D's argument that art. 2.03 violated s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, finding that the limitation on freedom of expression was reasonable. Based on the seriousness of D's conduct, the Council reprimanded D and suspended his ability to practice law for 21 days. On appeal to the Tribunal des professions, D abandoned his constitutional challenge to the specific provision, arguing instead that the sanction itself violated his freedom of expression. The Tribunal found that D had exceeded the objectivity, moderation and dignity expected of him and that the decision to sanction D was a minimal restriction on his freedom of expression. On judicial review, the Superior Court of Quebec upheld the decision of the Tribunal.

Before the Quebec Court of Appeal, D no longer appealed the actual sanction of 21 days, challenging only the decision to reprimand him as a violation of the Charter. The Court of Appeal applied a full Oakes analysis under s. 1 of the Charter and upheld the reprimand. It found that D's letter had limited importance compared to the values underlying freedom of expression, that the Council's decision had a rational connection to the important objective of protecting the public and that the effects of the decision were proportionate to its objectives.

Held: The appeal from the result should be dismissed.

To determine whether administrative decision-makers have exercised their statutory discretion in accordance with Charter protections, the review should be in accordance with an administrative law approach, not a s. 1 Oakes analysis. The standard of review is reasonableness.

In assessing whether a law violates the Charter, we are balancing the government's pressing and substantial objectives against the extent to which they interfere with the Charter right at issue. If the law interferes with the right no more than is reasonably necessary to achieve the objectives, it will be found to be proportionate, and, therefore, a reasonable limit under s. 1. But in assessing whether an adjudicated decision violates the Charter, we are engaged in balancing somewhat different but related considerations, namely, has the decision-maker disproportionately, and therefore unreasonably, limited a Charter right. In both cases, we are looking for whether there is an appropriate balance between rights and objectives, and the purpose of both exercises is to ensure that the rights at issue are not unreasonably limited.

There is nothing in the administrative law approach which is inherently inconsistent with the strong protection of the Charter's guarantees and values. An administrative law approach recognizes that administrative decision-makers are both bound by fundamental values and empowered to adjudicate them, and that administrative discretion is exercised in light of constitutional guarantees and the values they reflect. An administrative decision-maker exercising a discretionary power under his or her home statute, has, by virtue of expertise and specialization, particular familiarity with the competing considerations at play in weighing Charter values and will generally be in the best position to consider the impact of the relevant Charter guarantee on the specific facts of the case. Under a robust conception of administrative law, discretion is exercised in light of constitutional guarantees and the values they reflect.

When applying Charter values in the exercise of statutory discretion, an administrative decision-maker must balance Charter values with the statutory objectives by asking how the Charter value at issue will best be protected in light of those objectives. This is at the core of the proportionality exercise, and requires the decision-maker to balance the severity of the interference of the Charter protection with the statutory objectives.

On judicial review, the question becomes whether, in assessing the impact of the relevant Charter protection and given the nature of the decision and the statutory and factual contexts, the decision reflects a proportionate balancing of the Charter rights and values at play. Though this judicial review is conducted within the administrative framework, there is nonetheless conceptual harmony between a reasonableness review and the Oakes framework, since both contemplate giving a "margin of appreciation", or deference, to administrative and legislative bodies in balancing Charter values against broader objectives. In the Charter context, the reasonableness analysis is one that centres on proportionality, that is, on ensuring that the decision interferes with the relevant Charter guarantee no more than is necessary given the statutory objectives. If the decision is disproportionately impairing of the guarantee, it is unreasonable. If, on the other hand, it reflects a proper balance of the mandate with Charter protection, it is a reasonable one. But both decision-makers and reviewing courts must remain conscious of the fundamental importance of Charter values in the analysis.

Here, the decision to suspend D for 21 days was not before the Court. The only issue was whether the Council's decision to reprimand D reflected a proportionate balancing of the lawyer's expressive rights with its statutory mandate to ensure that lawyers behave with "objectivity, moderation and dignity" in accordance with art. 2.03 of the Code of ethics. In dealing with the appropriate boundaries of civility for a lawyer, the severity of the conduct must be interpreted in light of the expressive rights guaranteed by the Charter, and, in particular, the public benefit in ensuring the right of lawyers to express themselves about the justice system in general and judges in particular. We are, in other words, balancing the fundamental importance of open, and even forceful, criticism of our public institutions with the need to ensure civility in the profession. Disciplinary bodies must therefore demonstrate that they have given due regard to the importance of the expressive rights at issue, both in light of an individual lawyer's right to expression and the public's interest in open discussion. As with all disciplinary decisions, this balancing is a fact-dependent and discretionary exercise.

Proper respect for these expressive rights may involve disciplinary bodies tolerating a degree of discordant criticism. The fact that a lawyer is criticizing a judge, a tenured and independent participant in the justice system, may raise, not lower, the threshold for limiting a lawyer's expressive rights under the Charter. This does not, however, argue for an unlimited right on the part of lawyers to breach the legitimate public expectation that they will behave with civility. Lawyers potentially face criticisms and pressures on a daily basis. They are expected by the public, on whose behalf they serve, to endure them with civility and dignity. This is not always easy where the lawyer feels he or she has been unfairly provoked, as in this case. But it is precisely when a lawyer's equilibrium is unduly tested that he or she is particularly called upon to behave with transcendent civility. On the other hand, lawyers should not be expected to behave like verbal eunuchs. They not only have a right to speak their minds freely, they arguably have a duty to do so. But they are constrained by their profession to do so with dignified restraint.

A reprimand for a lawyer does not automatically flow from criticizing a judge or the judicial system. Such criticism, even when it is expressed vigorously, can be constructive. However in the context of disciplinary hearings, such criticism will be measured against the public's reasonable expectations of a lawyer's professionalism. As the Disciplinary Council found, D's letter was outside those expectations. His displeasure with the judge was justifiable, but the extent of the response was not.

In light of the excessive degree of vituperation in the letter's context and tone, the Council's decision that D's letter warranted a reprimand represented a proportional balancing of D's expressive rights with the statutory objective of ensuring that lawyers behave with "objectivity, moderation and dignity". The decision is, as a result, a reasonable one.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR SASKATCHEWAN

Labour—Mandamus—Right of employees to seek decertification of union— Union's failure to conclude collective agreement—Whether right affected by moral and financial help from employer—Duty of Labour Board—Trade Union Act, R.S.S. 1953, c. 259, ss. 3, 5, 14, 26.

The intervenant union was, in January, 1953, certified as bargaining agent for the employees of the respondent company but failed to conclude a collective agreement. In June, 1953, an application for decertification made by some employees, claiming to be a majority, was dismissed as premature by the appellant, the Labour Relations Board. A second application, made in December, 1953, by 13 out of the 19 employees of the company, was also rejected on the grounds that it (1) was an application of the employees in form only, being in reality made on behalf of the company and (2) was not shown to be supported by a majority of the employees. The company joined the employees in their application before the Court of Appeal for a writ of mandamus which was ordered issued directing the Board to proceed to determine the application for decertification. The Board appealed to this Court.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

It was conclusively established by the evidence that the application had been made and supported by a majority of the employees.

The rights of employees, under s. 3 of the Trade Union Act, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing are not forfeited if the employees receive help from their employer in asserting those rights. The evidence furthermore directly contradicted the statement that the employees had received financial help from their employer.

In view of the union's failure to negotiate an agreement with the employer, the right of the employees to choose another representative was not suspended nor affected.

Although the language in s. 5 of the Act, by which the Board was given power to rescind or amend its orders or decisions, was permissive, it imposed a duty upon the Board to exercise this power when properly called upon to do so. (Drysdale v. Dominion Coal Co. (34 Can. S.C.R. 336) and Julius v. Lord Bishop of Oxford (5 A.C. 243) referred to).

The rejection of the application was made on grounds which were wholly irrelevant and amounted to a refusal on the part of the Board to perform its duties under the Act to deal with the statutory rights of the employees, which were not affected by any disputes between the employer and the union.

APPEAL from the judgment of the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan [1], Martin C.J.A. and Culliton J.A. dissenting, ordering the Labour Relations Board to consider an application for decertification.

F. A. Brewin, Q.C. and R. C. Carter for the appellant.

E. D. Noonan, Q.C. for the respondent F. W. Woolworth Co. Ltd.

G. Taylor for the intervenant.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by:—

LOCKE J.:—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan [2], directing that a peremptory writ of mandamus do issue directed to the appellant, the Labour Relations Board of that province, ordering it to proceed to determine the application of the respondents, employees of the F. W. Woolworth Company Limited in the City of Weyburn, for the decertification of the Saskatchewan Joint Board, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union (hereinafter referred to as the union) as their bargaining agents. The Chief Justice of Saskatchewan and Culliton, J.A. dissented and would have dismissed the application. The respondent company joined with its said employees in applying to the Court of Appeal for the writ. The union was permitted to intervene in the appeal to this Court.

The Saskatchewan Labour Relations Board is a body composed of seven members appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council under the provisions of the Trade Union Act (c. 259, R.S.S. 1953). S. 3 of that Act declares the rights of employees (a term defined in s. 2) to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing and that the representatives selected for that purpose shall be the exclusive representatives of all employees in the unit of employees for such purpose. By s. 5 the Board is given power to make orders determining what trade union, if any, represents the majority of employees in an appropriate unit of employees and requiring an employer to bargain collectively. Among other powers vested in the Board by this section is that of rescinding or amending any of its own orders or decisions. S. 6 provides that in determining what trade union, if any, represents a majority of employees in an appropriate unit the Board may, in its discretion, direct a vote to be taken by secret ballot of all employees eligible to vote to determine the question. Other sections of the Act declare that certain specified acts shall constitute unfair labour practices on the part of any employer or employers agent, these including the failure or refusal to bargain collectively with the representatives elected or appointed by a trade union representing the majority of the employees in an appropriate unit, and penalties are prescribed for the commission of any such practice. S. 17 provides that there shall be no appeal from any order or decision of the Board under the Act and that its orders shall not be reviewable by any court of law or by any certiorari, mandamus, prohibition, injunction or other proceeding whatever.

On January 13, 1953, on the application of the respondent union, the Board made an order finding that the employees of the respondent company at Weyburn, except the Manager and Assistant Manager, constituted an appropriate unit of employees for the purpose of bargaining collectively and that the applicant represented the majority of such employees and directed the respondent company to bargain collectively with the duly appointed or elected representatives of the union in respect to the employees in the unit.

On June 9, 1953, nine of the employees of the respondent company, asserting that they were the majority of the employees, applied to the Board for an order to rescind the order of January 13, 1953, on the ground that the union was not supported by a majority of the employees in the store. This application came on for hearing before the Board on July 21, 1953 and, being opposed by the union, was dismissed on the ground that the application was premature.

On December 9, 1953 a second application was filed with the Board to rescind the order of January 13, 1953 by thirteen of nineteen employees of the respondent company at Weyburn, the grounds for the application being the same as those advanced in support of the application made in the previous June. While the employees were residents of Weyburn, the application was first heard on January 5, 1954 at Saskatoon, and adjourned at the request of the union to Regina where a hearing was held and evidence taken viva voce on February 9 and 10, 1954. The Board reserved its decision which was subsequently delivered on March 9, 1954 dismissing the application.

Three of the seven members of the Board agreed with the reasons for the decision delivered by the Chairman. Three other members disagreeing would have directed the taking of a vote under the powers given to the Board by s. 6 to determine the wishes of the majority of the employees.

The reasons for the decision of the majority were: firstly, that the application was that of the employees in form only, being in reality made on behalf of the company, and secondly, that it was not shown to be supported by a majority of the employees.

As pointed out in the reasons for judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Gordon, no attempt was made in the Court of Appeal to support the second of these grounds, it being common ground that the majority of the employees had supported the application, and no attempt was made to support that finding on the argument before us. On this aspect of the matter, it may be added that the fact that the application was made and supported by a majority of the employees, as that term is defined in s. 2(5) of the Act, was conclusively established by the evidence.

As to the first of the grounds upon which the decision of the majority was based, the reasons delivered by the Chairman commenced with the following statement:—

> In the light of the evidence adduced the majority of the Board is satisfied that but for the moral and financial help of the employer neither of the two applications for decertification would ever have been brought.

As this statement indicates, the majority of the Board misconceived the nature of the rights given to the employees by s. 3 of the Act, they being of the opinion that if, in endeavouring to assert those rights, they received help from their employer those rights were forfeited. It is also not irrelevant to point out that all of the evidence referred to directly contradicts the statement that the employees received financial help from their employer in making either of the applications, even if doing so would have affected the employees' rights. I do not know what the expression "moral help" was intended to convey. If it was intended to indicate that the employer was sympathetic to the desire of the majority of its employees to rid themselves of an unsatisfactory bargaining representative, I am quite unable to understand how that fact could affect the employees' rights.

As I have pointed out, s. 3 vests in employees the right to' bargain collectively with their employer through representatives of their own choosing. S. 26 declares that where a collective bargaining agreement has been entered into it is to remain in force for a period of one year from its effective date and thereafter from year to year unless terminated in the manner prescribed by that section. A trade union claiming to represent a majority of employees other than the union which has negotiated the agreement may, not less than thirty nor more than sixty days before the expiry of the agreement, apply to the Board for an order determining it to be the trade union representing the majority of the employees in the unit.

The Act does not otherwise define the time or restrict the manner in which the rights given to the employees by s. 3 may be exercised.

The union, for reasons which are irrelevant in determining the rights of the employees, had failed to negotiate an agreement with the employer and the right of the employees to choose another representative was thus neither suspended nor affected.

The language of s. 5, in so far as it affects this aspect of the matter, reads:—

> 5. The board shall have power to make orders:—
>
> . . . . . .
>
> (i) rescinding or amending any order or decision of the board.

While this language is permissive in form, it imposed, in my opinion, a duty upon the Board to exercise this power when called upon to do so by a party interested and having the right to make the application (Drysdale v. Dominion Coal Company [3] : Killam J.). Enabling words are always compulsory where they are words to effectuate a legal right (Julius v. Lord Bishop of Oxford [4]: Lord Blackburn).

By s. 14 of the Act the Board, subject to the approval of the Lieutenant Governor in Council, may make such rules and regulations not inconsistent with the Act as are necessary to carry out its provisions according to their true intent. The rules made pursuant to this power are in the record and contain nothing defining the time within which the rights of the employees given by s. 3 may be exercised. The right of the employees to choose a new bargaining representative in circumstances such as existed in the present case must, no doubt, be exercised in a reasonable manner. If, after the order of January 13, 1953 was made, the employees had applied to substitute some other bargaining representative for the union before that body had had a reasonable opportunity to negotiate a collective agreement with the employer, the Board could undoubtedly, in my opinion, defer consideration of the matter until a reasonable time to effect that object had elapsed and no court could properly intervene. This, however, is not such a case and the application was not rejected on any such ground. The application with which we are concerned was not made until some eleven months had elapsed after the order sought to be rescinded had been made. The majority of the employees clearly did not wish this union to bargain on their behalf, for reasons which need not be enquired into, being entirely the concern of the employees themselves. It was the duty of the Board to hear the employees' application and to give effect to their statutory rights. While the Board considered the application, it was rejected upon grounds which were wholly irrelevant.

In my opinion, the manner in which the employees' application was dealt with amounted to a refusal on the part of the Board to perform the duties cast upon it by the sections of the Trade Union Act to which I have referred.

The majority of the Board, concerning themselves with what they considered to be the merits of the various disputes between the employer and the union, appear to have lost sight of the fact that their duty was to deal with the statutory rights of the employees, which were not affected by the fact that there had been such disputes.

I would dismiss this appeal with costs to be paid by the appellant to the respondents, except that the appellant should be paid by the respondents its costs of the day on the adjournment of this appeal on February 16, 1955. There should be no costs to or against the intervenant.

SUPREME COURT OF NEW BRUNSWICK.

(APPELLATE DIVISION.)

N.B.
1935.
Sept. 10.

EX PARTE ALGERNON McSWEENEY.

Before BAXTER, C.J., GRIMMER and LEBLANC, JJ.

1935 CanLII 483 (NB CA)

1935. June 18. J. E. H. Teed, K.C., and T. T. Goodwin, K.C., for the Board of Assessors of the City of Moncton, to show cause against an order nisi for mandamus.

Writ of mandamus is discretionary and is not granted merely because the applicant requests it, even though there is some public right in which the applicant might be interested and which he might desire the Court to enforce. The Queen v. The Church Wardens of All Saints et al. (1876), 1 App. Cas. 611. If the motive of the applicant is spite or revenge mandamus will be refused. Ex parte Swim (1921), 49 N.B.R. 207.

G. F. G. Bridges, for applicant, contra.

As to good faith see: Ex parte Gallagher (1912), 44 N.B.R. 545. This application was made in good faith and the fact that the City treasury was enriched by $6,000 is evidence of that. In order to show improper motive, some affidavit should have been produced to show animosity on the part of the applicant towards the T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited. If discretion has been wrongfully exercised, this Court can and will interfere.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

1935. September 10. The following judgments were now delivered:

BAXTER, C.J.:—In June Term a rule nisi was granted ordering the City of Moncton to shew cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to the Board of Assessors of the City of Moncton and the City Council of the City of Moncton, commanding the Board of Assessors of the City of Moncton—

"(a) To properly assess the T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited for the years 1933 and 1934 on income earned during the years 1932 and 1933 as provided in the City of Moncton Assessment Act.

(b) Or to employ a Chartered Accountant on the recommendation of the City Council of the said City of Moncton for the purpose of verifying the tax returns made by the said T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited in the years 1933 and 1934 as to income earned in the years 1932 and 1933 and purporting to be made under the City of Moncton Assessment Act, and to proceed to properly assess the said T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited for the years 1933 and 1934 on income earned during the years 1932 and 1933 if the said Company has shown a taxable income for the said years, and commanding the said City Council to recommend a Chartered Accountant to the said Board of Assessors of the City of Moncton for the purpose of verifying the said tax returns of the said T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited made in the years 1933 and 1934 as to income earned in the years 1932 and 1933, in accordance with the provisions of Section 29 of the City of Moncton Assessment Act."

Baxter, C.J.

If a mandamus were granted it would only direct the City Council and the assessors to proceed according to law. "The Court does not by mandamus direct either justices or any public body or anybody else upon whom a duty is cast, how and in what manner they are to perform their duty. They simply direct them by mandamus to perform their duty." Per Channell, J., in Rex v. Justices of Kingston; Ex parte Dwyer (1902), 86 L.T., at p. 691. On the first branch of the rule, therefore, were we to make it absolute, the direction would have to be to the assessors to make an assessment but not to make it in respect of any particular thing or in any specific manner. But the assessors, whether they have acted rightly or wrongly, have already made an assessment against the Company and by virtue of the powers contained in sec. 31 of the Moncton Assessment Act have amended that assessment by making a supplementary levy in respect of income. There is, therefore, an existing assessment against the Company. In Ex parte Nash (1850), 15 Q.B. 92, at p. 95, Lord Campbell, C.J., says with reference to mandamus: "We grant it when that has not been done which a statute orders to be done; but not for the purpose of undoing what has been done. We may, upon an application for a mandamus, entertain the question whether a corporation, not having affixed its seal, be bound to do so; but not the question whether, when they have affixed it, they have been right in doing so". In the present case the applicant might have applied to quash the assessment on certiorari, but he did not do so. The assessors' answer to the writ of mandamus would be that they had already made an assessment and that would, I think, be sufficient.

The other branch of the rule applied for is that the Board of Assessors be directed to employ a chartered accountant on the recommendation of the City Council for the purpose of verifying the tax returns of the Company as to income earned in the years 1932 and 1933. This raises the question of whether or not sec. 29 of the Assessment Act vests a discretion in the City Council or whether an absolute duty is imposed, where a taxpayer has made a statutory declaration of his belief that any return made pursuant to the Act is substantially incorrect. The material portion of sec. 29 is as follows:

"Should any Assessor or taxpayer have reason to believe that any return made pursuant to this Act is substantially incorrect and makes a statutory declaration of such belief, the Assessors, on the recommendation of the City Council shall, thereupon for the purpose of verifying any such return employ a chartered accountant; and for the purpose of such verification the books and papers of the taxpayer shall be open to the examining officer, or shall be produced for the purpose upon a summons, which the Assessor or examining officer is hereby authorized to issue."

There is no doubt that, if the City Council makes a recommendation, there is an absolute duty upon the assessors to employ a chartered accountant for the purposes specified, but the question remains whether there is any such absolute duty cast upon the council to make the recommendation. There is no language used which, so far as I can see, imposes a duty upon the City Council and I think as a matter of common sense that it would be most remarkable if that body were obliged by law in every case where a taxpayer filed a statutory declaration of his belief to incur the expense, which might be considerable, of an investigation into some other taxpayer's affairs. Surely it can not be contended that this is to be of universal application and if it is not, then there must be a discretion vested in the Council. If discretion exists, mandamus will not go.

The words of the section confer a power. One applicant in asking its exercise may furnish in his statutory declaration reasons for his belief. Another may limit his statement to his belief without giving any reasons which are not required by the section. Under such circumstances are we to conclude that the filing of a complaint automatically puts the machinery of investigation in motion and that the City Council has no discretion in the matter? What is the object of interposing the City Council as a body which must make a recommendation before the assessors can act? And why must the recommendation of the City Council be obtained even though the complaint is made by one of the assessors? Surely it must be that that body, vested as it is with the "administration of the fiscal, prudential and municipal affairs" of the city (1890, ch. 6, sec. 4) has some discretion as to whether the city should be put to the cost of every investigation which is demanded. But it is said that the City Council have not exercised a proper discretion in this instance. I agree that the matter is one of considerable public importance. It is evident that the applicant seeks to raise the question as to the liability of the Eaton Company to taxation upon its mail order business the goods for which are supplied from its depot in Moncton. Nevertheless if discretion exists it is not for us to criticize its exercise. We cannot command the City Council to exercise its discretion in a particular way. The King v. The Army Council; Ex parte Ravenscroft, [1917] 2 K.B. 504, at p. 510, 86 L.J.K.B. 1087, 117 L.T. 306, per Viscount Reading, C.J., and to the same effect per Ridley, J., at pp. 512-3. The case, to my mind, falls squarely within the decision of Julius v. Oxford (1880), 5 App. Cas. 214, where at p. 244 Lord Blackburn says: "The enabling words are construed as compulsory whenever the object of the power is to effectuate a legal right". No legal right to anything has been shown in the applicant here. He may have an interest, but it is an interest in common with all the taxpayers of the city the administration of whose fiscal affairs is vested in the City Council. When the test of Lord Penzance (p. 233) is applied: Does the nature of the subject exclude the intention of conferring a discretion? I am of opinion that the answer must be in the negative.

The rule must therefore be discharged.

LEBLANC, J.:—This is an application for a writ of mandamus to issue directed to the Board of Assessors of the City of Moncton and to the City Council of the City of Moncton to command the Board of Assessors of the City of Moncton—

1935 CanLII 483 (NB CA)

(a) To properly assess the T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited, for the years 1933 and 1934 on income earned during the years 1932 and 1933, as provided in the City of Moncton Assessment Act.

(b) Or to employ a chartered accountant on the recommendation of the City Council of the said City of Moncton for the purpose of verifying the tax returns made by the said T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited in the years 1933 and 1934 as to income earned in the years 1932 and 1933 and purporting to be made under the City of Moncton Assessment Act, and to proceed to properly assess the said T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited for the years 1933 and 1934 on income earned during the years 1932 and 1933 if the said company has shown a taxable income for the said years.

The matter comes before this Court upon a rule nisi granted by this Court on the 5th day of June last.

On the 11th day of March, A.D. 1935, Algernon E. McSweeney, acting under the provisions of sec. 29 of the City of Moncton Assessment Act, being 11 George V. (1921), ch. 56, filed with the Board of Assessors of the City of Moncton a statutory declaration setting out that he did reasonable grounds for believing and did believe that the said T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited had filed with the said Board of Assessors returns for the years 1930 to 1934 inclusive covering income earned for the years 1929 to 1933 inclusive purporting to be made under the said Moncton Assessment Act, which returns were substantially incorrect as to income. He demanded of the said Board of Assessors that they employ a chartered accountant in accordance with the provisions of the said sec. 29 of the City of Moncton Assessment Act for the purpose of verifying the returns of the said T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited for the years 1930 to 1934 inclusive as to income, and that the said Board obtain the recommendation of the City Council for that purpose and proceed to assess the said T. Eaton

Co. (Maritimes) Limited on income for the years in question if an income were earned.

Mr. McSweeney appeared before the City Council of the City of Moncton at the regular meeting of the Council when the Mayor and Aldermen were present on the 11th day of March, A.D. 1935, and addressed the City Council demanding that the said Board of Assessors should employ a chartered accountant to verify the returns as to the income of the said T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited filed with the said Board for the said years and that the City Council proceed at once to recommend a chartered accountant.

The City Council referred the matter to the Finance Committee. After a good deal of discussion and after Mr. McSweeney had appeared again before the Council urging it to instruct the Board of Assessors to employ an accountant to examine the books of the T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited, the City Council adopted, by a majority of its members, the resolution of the Finance Committee refusing to instruct the Board of Assessors to employ any accountant for the purpose aforesaid.

During the progress of the deliberations the T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited paid to the City of Moncton on the 11th day of May, 1935, the sum of $6,616.98, which it was willing to treat as assessable for the years 1933 and 1934.

The money thus paid by the T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited was so paid for what it contends is taxable upon its retail trade in the City of Moncton. The Company maintains that its income on the mail orders of goods shipped from Moncton is not subject to taxation. It bases this contention upon some understanding it had with the Chairman of the Board of Assessors some time in 1918. There is no legislation on the point. All taxes in Moncton are assessable under the Assessment Act and the T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited has not been exempted by law from taxation.

In his solemn declaration of the 15th of February last, presented to the City Council in March, Mr. McSweeney gives the source of his information and the reason for his belief. The information was obtained from the reports of the auditors employed by the Price Spreads Committee of the House of Commons regarding the business of T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited.

Counsel for the City of Moncton took the ground that the application was not made in good faith and urged the fact that other concerns in the City of Moncton were escaping taxation in the same way as the T. Eaton Co. (Maritimes) Limited. It is fair to assume that the counsel for the City took his instructions from his clients, the City Council. They can complain only with very bad grace if Mr. McSweeney has not gone after all the tax-evaders at the one time, assuming that their counsel's contention is correct.

Mr. McSweeney has complied with the requirements of the Act and nothing has been put forward to sustain the contention of bad faith. The serious point is whether or not the City Council of the City of Moncton has any discretion in the matter. If they have, the matter is settled by the House of Lords in Julius v. Oxford (1880), 5 App. Cas. 214.

What construction must be placed upon sec. 29 of the City of Moncton Assessment Act of 1921? What does it mean? Does it confer upon the City Council a discretion with which a Court can not interfere?

The section reads in part as follows: (29) "Should any Assessor or taxpayer have reason to believe that any return made pursuant to this Act is substantially incorrect and makes a statutory declaration of such belief, the Assessors, on the recommendation of the City Council shall, thereupon for the purpose of verifying any such return employ a chartered accountant, etc."

The relation between the City Council and the Assessors rather excludes the thought that the word "shall" becomes necessary in the Act in order to make the servants carry out the instructions of their masters. It lends colour to the claim that by implication the word "shall" applies to the City Council, they being the ones who must set the machinery in motion; and that sec. 44 of the LeBlanc, J.

Act giving in express terms discretion to the City Council to relieve any person, either wholly or partially, from the payment of any taxes under certain conditions, it shuts out the idea of any discretion in the matter of tax exemptions in sec. 29.

However, if such a construction must be placed upon that section it means that any taxpayer of the City of Moncton, who ever he may be, can force the City Council in every case to instruct the Assessors to employ an accountant. I do not think that such a situation was ever contemplated by the Legislature. The City Council is left with the last word in the matter as to whether or not an accountant should be employed.

But, it may be urged that Mr. McSweeney having supplemented the strict requirements of the Act by giving the source of his information; and a very substantial amount of taxes being at stake and in view of the City Solicitor's written opinions in the matter, the City Council should have complied with Mr. McSweeney's demands.

That is only another way of stating that a majority of the City Council were wrong in the exercise of their discretion. But the Court is not concerned with that. Once the Council is given a discretion it prevents all interference by the Court. The Council, not the Court, is given that discretion.

I think the application must be refused.

GRIMMER, J.:—I concur in the results.

January 16, 1952.

CAMPBELL, J. — This is an application, by originating notice of motion in chambers (K.B.R. 182 [i]) pursuant to The King's Bench Act, RSM, 1940, ch. 44, sec. 57 and part of sec. 58, and K.B. RR. 15 and 556, for an order of mandamus requiring the Manitoba Labour Board (hereinafter called the board) to certify the applicant as the bargaining agent for certain employees of the Manitoba Sugar Company Limited (hereinafter called the company) to wit, "all the engineers and firemen employed by the Company under The Manitoba Labor Relations Act [1948, ch. 27] or for such other order as may seem just."

The business agent of the intervener union was in court but chose not to be represented by counsel and took no part in the proceedings. Counsel for the applicant union admitted that its members were also members of the intervener union. All counsel agreed that there was a subsisting agreement between the company and the intervener union and the applicants were presently members of it.

The facts are not disputed. The background of the application may be found by setting down in full (1) the decision of the board; (2) the minority decision of the board; and (3) the certificate of dismissal dated March 14, 1951. They are as follows (I have numbered the paragraphs for convenience of reference):

"I. THE DECISION OF THE BOARD.

"(1) This application for certification as a craft union covering five employees being Engineers and Firemen all five of whom are members of the Applicant Union was made under Section 8 of The Manitoba Labor Relations Act, which reads:

"'8. When a group of employees of an employer belong to a craft or group exercising technical skills, by reason of which they are distinguishable from employees as a whole and the majority of the group are members of one trade union pertaining to such craft or other skills, the trade union may apply to the board subject to the provisions of section 7, and shall be entitled to be certified as the bargaining agent of the employees in the group if the group is otherwise appropriate as a unit for collective bargaining.'

"(2) The application was opposed by the Employer and also by the Intervening Union who are the present certified bargaining agents on the grounds that the five employees involved were employed in a composite capacity the whole year round and were only called upon to exercise their craft or technical skill approximately 68 days each year during the campaign season; the balance of the year being employed like the rest of the plant employees at other work than operating Engineers and Firemen.

"(3) Following a hearing at which all parties involved presented their respective viewpoints the Board decided to dismiss the Application for the following reasons:

"If it was the intention of the Legislature, as claimed by the applicant that the use of the words: 'Shall be entitled' in Section 8, Manitoba Labor Relations Act, to be obligatory, they would have said so explicitly and would not have used the closing words of the section: 'If the group is otherwise appropriate as a unit for collective bargaining.'

"(4) Furthermore they would not have placed any qualification on Section 8 as they did, by enacting Section 9, which gives the Board discretionary powers to determine:

"(A) 'Whether the unit in respect of which the application is made is appropriate for collective bargaining.'

"(5) Neither in our opinion would the Legislature have given the Board power as given in Section 9 to:

"'(I) alter the description of, and

"'(II) include additional classes of employees in,

"'or (III) exclude classes of employees from, the unit.'

"(6) In view of the above reasons and also considering Section 2 (3) of the Act which gives the Board power to determine whether the Unit appropriate for collective bargaining shall be an employer unit, craft unit, technical unit, plant unit or any other unit.

"(7) The Board is of the opinion that a bargaining unit is appropriate if the interests of the employees therein are capable of being adequately represented by a common group of bargaining representatives.

"(8) The Board is of the further opinion that the present certified Agent is capable of adequately representing the five employees, members of the applicant union who are employed in a composite capacity the full year like the other plant employees, and who like the other plant employees are only called upon in the course of their composite employment to exercise their craft or technical skill for approximately 68 days out of a full year's employment.

"(9) Having taken all the factors into consideration plus the mutuality of interest amongst the group and the efficient operation of the plant the application is accordingly dismissed.

[Five members of the board.]

"II. Minority Decision of Board.

"The facts in this case are not in dispute.

"The Company has erected and now operates a beet-sugar processing plant at Fort Garry in Manitoba. The active period of operation, locally called the 'campaign,' commences when harvested beets start to reach the plant, and continues day and night, seven days a week, until the harvest is processed. During this period, the group for which the applicant seeks certification operates the high-pressure steam plant which is the heart of the process. Other specialists perform their particular functions, and hundreds of 'campaign workers' fill out the working force.

"Just as soon as the processing season is ended, the campaign workers are discharged and the key personnel, including the operating engineer group, commence the rehabilitation of the plant. All the machinery is examined, much of it being dismantled, and 'work groups' busy themselves on this and on miscellaneous work till the next campaign season opens.

"In the off-season, operating engineers work side by side with men possessing entirely different skills, and are engaged on work bearing no relationship whatever to their classification.

"The applicant argues that the distinct 'craft' character of the operating engineers' work during the campaign entitles it to separate certification. The company and the intervener take the common ground that the miscellaneous type of work performed by all the permanent staff during the off-season makes the whole group a minimum appropriate bargaining unit and that it would be contrary to the intent of the Act, to the welfare of the company and to the well-being of the permanent staff to have a separate certification for the operating engineers. The parties objecting to the application contrast the 68 days of campaign (during which it is conceded the engineers are engaged on their craft) with the 297 days during which they are indistinguishable from the rest of the permanent staff. They also urge that, if the operating engineers were not prepared to engage in the miscellaneous, non-craft work during the off-season, they would not be taken on staff at all.

"It was agreed at the hearing that in other plants, particularly those in more Southern areas, where a greater pool of operating engineers exists, there is a complete close down for the greater part of the year. The peculiar location and other characteristics of the Fort Garry plant have led the Company to adopt a different plan, holding the nucleus of skilled personnel the whole year.

"The application has been filed under Section 8. It is not disputed that, during the campaign, the employees in the applicant group belong to a craft (and are engaged in performance of duties peculiar to that craft) by reason of which they are distinguishable from the employees as a whole, or that a majority of the group are members of one trade union pertaining to such craft. The trade union pertaining to the craft has applied to the Board, and its application conforms to the provisions of section 7.

"The Board has, on other occasions, noted the mandatory nature of the wording of Section 8. Whereas the Board may, according to Section 9, certify an applicant union where the circumstances commend themselves to the Board, craft unions enjoy a peculiar status and, in the circumstances relating to this application, the union 'shall be entitled to be certified as the bargaining agent of the employees in the group if the group is otherwise appropriate as a unit for collective bargaining.'

"In practice, the Board has never felt it had the right to ponder on whether the certification of a non-craft union, or of any union for a non-craft unit, is in the best interests of the employer and of the employees. For all practical purposes, this Board in common with all other Labor Boards across Canada has read the 'may' of Section 9 (or parallel provisions in the other Acts) as mandatory.

"This is the course dictated by caution and common sense. No Board could foresee whether the outcome of any particular certification will, in the long run, benefit any particular group of employees. All the Board can do is to administer the Act according to its wording, and leave the future to the parties whose status has been established. The situation then becomes the responsibility of the employer and of the certified bargaining agent.

"Keeping this in mind, and conceding that 'shall' could not be less obligatory than 'may,' I cannot conceive how certification can be logically or legally denied the applicant in this case. For this reason, I dissent from the Board decision to reject the application and because of the quite important considerations involved take the unusual step of recording my dissent.

[Two members of the board.]

"III. CERTIFICATION OF DISMISSAL.

"Whereas:

"1. On February 5th, 1951, the Applicant filed an application with the Board seeking certification, under Section 8 of the Act, as Bargaining Agent for all the engineers and firemen of the Employer;

"2. On March 7th, 1951, the Board heard all interested parties by submission and oral argument to the application;

"3. After considering material filed and argument made, the Board was of the opinion that, under the circumstances of the case, it would not be expedient to certify the applicant in respect of the group applied for, because while the group is distinguishable from the other permanent employees during the 'campaign,' (lasting about 10 weeks annually), nevertheless, during the balance of the year the employees are not distinguishable from the balance of the year-round staff.

"Therefore the Manitoba Labor Board dismisses the application, and * * *."

(The italics are mine.)

The matter of status of a union as a legal entity and for a limited purpose, to take proceedings in its own name, was referred to by counsel for the applicant in opening his argument. He submitted that a representation order under K.B.R. 58 was unnecessary but, should he be wrong in this view, he requested that his right be reserved for further argument. Counsel for the respondent and the company both argued that the applicant was not a legal entity and, therefore, had no status. In reply, counsel for the applicant dealt with it briefly and again requested, and was granted, the right to have a further opportunity, if necessary, to argue the matter. I am of opinion counsel need not develop the matter further than he did. In any event, I feel obliged to examine and deal with those aspects of the problem which affect the present application by motion.

The Trade Unions Act, RSC, 1927, ch. 202, does not apply because sec. 5 provides that:

> " * * * this Act shall not apply to any trade union not registered under the Act."

Counsel admits the applicant is not registered.

K.B.R. 58 reads as follows:

> "Where there are numerous persons having the same interest, one or more may sue or be sued, or may be authorized by the court to defend, on behalf of, or for the benefit of, all."

I am of opinion that:

(1) Decisions under P.C. 1003 are distinguishable in that under P.C. 1003 trades unions act through their elected representatives and not through the union itself, and that for that reason a representation order would be necessary.

(2) Under The Manitoba Labor Relations Act, 1948, ch. 27, this principle is reversed and the union speaks as a union and not through its officers and, therefore, a representation order is not necessary.

I hold that a representation order is not necessary in this case.

But there still remains to be decided what is the status of a union as a legal entity when it comes into court. The answer is not easy. This is the first case of its kind in Manitoba and the law in Canada on the subject is in an uncertain state.

For the purpose of this decision I am of opinion that actions in contract and tort, by a voluntary unincorporated association, or a union, not registered under the Trade Unions Act of Canada, by reason of the dissimilar attributes and origin, must be distinguished from an application for an order under The Manitoba Labor Relations Act.

Similar proceedings under similar statutes in other provinces have brought different conclusions.

Still dealing with the matter of status of a union as a legal entity, I will deal with one phase of the submission of counsel for the company that British Columbia had two statutes, viz., the Trade-unions Act, RSBC, 1936, ch. 289, and the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act, 1947, ch. 44, and it was by reason of these two statutes that the Court of Appeal in British Columbia came to its decision in In re Patterson and Nanaimo Dry Cleaning & Laundry Workers Union [1947] 2 WWR 510, 63 BCR 493, followed in British Columbia in Vancouver Machinery Depot Ltd. v. United Steelworkers of America [1948] 2 WWR 325, at 328, and later followed in Ontario in Re Int. Nickel Co. of Canada Ltd.; Shedden v. Kopinak [1949] OR 765, at 777.

1952 CanLII 408 (MB KB)

1952 CanLII 408 (MB KB)

With this submission I cannot agree. I quote from the judgment of O'Halloran, J.A. in the Patterson case, supra, at p. 512 (WWR):

> "In my judgment the trade union involved here is a legal entity upon the principle that legislation of the British Columbia legislature, like the Trade-unions Act, RSBC, 1936, ch. 289, and Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act, 1947, supra, has recognized trade unions as statutory entities possessing a legal existence apart from their members. It is true the trade union here has not been formally incorporated under any Act of the legislature which relates to the incorporation of an association or group of people. But the legislature, by conferring upon it rights, immunities and powers, and imposing upon it duties and obligations enforceable by penalties against it as a trade union, has recognized its legal status as a statutory entity distinct from its members."

I read this paragraph in his judgment as citing examples of statutes in British Columbia that give a status to trade unions under a statute.

I am of opinion that the Court of Appeal of British Columbia considered the one statute only, viz., the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act, 1947. This view is confirmed by an examination of the other statute—the Trade-unions Act. This latter statute appears to me to deal with (1) liability of trade unions for torts; (2) exempting trade unions from liability for communicating certain information and employing fair arguments to induce workmen not to renew contracts; and (3) exempting trade unions for publishing certain information respecting strikes. It is patent that this statute can have no application to the subject-matter in the Patterson case, and I interpret that judgment accordingly.

But the problem does not end there. In Ontario the decision in Re Int. Nickel Co. of Canada; Shedden v. Kopinak, supra, at 777, agrees fully with the decisions in the Patterson case, supra, and the Vancouver Machinery Depot case, supra. Also in Ontario, on the other hand, is the decision in Can. Seamen's Union v. Canada Labour Relations Board and Branch Lines Ltd. [1951] OR 178, at 184-5. This was a case under The Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, 1948, ch. 54 (Dom.) (the Manitoba Act is substantially the same). There the learned trial judge considered the Patterson case and the Vancouver Machinery Depot case, both of which were decided under the British Columbia statute and neither of which he thought "applicable to the case at bar." No reference is made, in the report of this case, to the prior decision of Re Int. Nickel Co. Ltd.; Shedden v. Kopinak, supra. Three points are decided in the Can. Seamen's Union case that require examination. I quote from the judgment, pp. 183-4:

> "(1) It must therefore be found that the applicant is not a legal entity and has no right to bring the present proceeding unless it is given a status to bring the proceeding by reason of the terms of The Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act."

Here the applicant had been "decertified" as bargaining agent and the court was "satisfied that there was some evidence before the Board upon which it could make the order."

As to (1): The ratio decidendi under this heading seems to be that the Can. Seamen's Union disqualified itself as a trade union and thereby lost its status.

> (2) "In ss. 47, 52 and 61 the Act speaks of 'trade union or employers' organization.' If a trade union is to be found to be a legal entity under the Act, then likewise an employers' organization should be found to be a legal entity:" [1951] OR at 185.

As to (2): Whether or not employers' organizations are presently as well known as trade union organizations is not in issue. They can be if they so desire and, if and when they do, "the Board" will be obliged to recognize them. The statute provides for and defines them. See The Manitoba Labor Relations Act, supra, sec. 2 (1) (k), and sec. 46 (1).

(3) The definition of "corporation" as taken from The Interpretation Act, RSC, 1927, ch. 1.

1952 CanLII 408 (MB KB)

As to (3): Where the interpretation section of the statute defines "trade union" (The Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, sec. 2 [1] [r], The Labour Relations Act, RSO, 1950, ch. 194, sec. 1 [1] [i]) and confers powers and rights upon it, then recourse to the Interpretation Act in an attempt to override the interpretations in a particular statute is not only unnecessary but improper. (The Manitoba Labor Relations Act, by sec. 2 [1] [r] defines it also.)

For these reasons I distinguish the Can. Seamen's Union case, supra, and follow the two B.C. cases and the Int. Nickel case, supra, on the point of status as a legal entity.

I find, accordingly, that the appellant is given a status as a legal entity to take proceedings in court in the instant case and, for want of a better term, it is a "quasi persona juridica."

The merits of the application fail to be decided under two headings:

(1) The Manitoba Labor Relations Act, and the decision and minority decision of the board;

(2) Is mandamus applicable?

The history of The Manitoba Labor Relations Act may be stated briefly. The Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (Dom.) was passed by the House of Commons of Canada on June 17, 1948 (assented to June 30, 1948) with few changes from the bill as introduced. The province of Manitoba passed an Act based on the first reading of the bill and it is substantially the same as the Dominion Act.

It is not disputed that the applicant members are certified under The Steam Boiler and Pressure Plant Act, RSM, 1940, ch. 199, and have been granted local union charter No. 827 (Ex. 3A) pursuant to the constitution of the International Union of Operating Engineers (Ex. 3). Counsel for the applicant, the board and the company disagree in the interpretation of secs. 8 and 9.

In view of my finding as to status, I need only deal particularly with the following sections: Secs. 2 (3), 8, 9 and 59. Sec. 2 (3) reads as follows:

> "2. (3) For the purposes of this Act, a 'unit' means a group of employees and 'appropriate for collective bargaining' with reference to a unit, means a unit that is appropriate for such purposes whether it be an employer unit, craft unit, > technical unit, plant unit, or any other unit and whether or not the employees therein are employed by one or more employer."

1952 CanLII 408 (MB KB)

Sec. 8 is set out in the majority decision, supra.

Sec. 2 (3) defines "unit" and "appropriate for collective bargaining." Sec. 8 has a double requirement, i.e., (1) belong to a craft or group requiring technical skills; (2) is otherwise appropriate as a unit for collective bargaining. If these conditions precedent are fulfilled, then the unit *"shall be entitled to be certified * * * if * * * otherwise appropriate * * ."

In order to receive and consider an application under sec. 8, the board had to decide that the applicant members belonged to a craft by reason of which they were distinguishable from the employees as a whole; that the majority of the applicant members were in good standing in a trade union pertaining to such craft and the applicant was otherwise appropriate as a unit for collective bargaining.

The applicant union satisfied these requirements for the following reasons:

(1) Its members were certificated under The Steam Boiler and Pressure Plant Act, supra.

(2) They constituted a majority of Local 827.

(3) They were more than one in number (sec. 2 [h] and [j]). That constituted entitlement to be certified, if otherwise appropriate.

Along with sec. 8 must be read sec. 9 (1):

> " * * * the Board shall determine whether the unit in respect of which the application is made is appropriate for collective bargaining * * *."

No mention is made in the decision or the certificate of dismissal as to its inappropriateness. I cannot envisage reasons for such a finding. The board did determine by necessary implication that the applicant was appropriate for collective bargaining but declined certification on other grounds which I will discuss later.

Sec. 9 (1) (a) (i) (ii) (iii) and sec. 9 (1) (b) were not invoked and do not apply to this case. They might apply, for example, in a craft union case if more than one craft union were involved. Re sec. 9 (2) (a) and (b), I am of opinion that it was unnecessary to refer to or invoke this subsection.

1952 CanLII 408 (MB KB)

Finally, the words following sec. 9 (2) (b)—"the board may certify the trade union as the bargaining agent of the employees in the unit." In the matter of interpreting the word "may" as meaning "shall," there is no dearth of authority.

Perusal of the cases on the old use of "shall and may" and the newer use of "may" carry along with the power the duty to exercise it when the authority is applied for by a party interested and having a right to make the application to effectuate a legal right: Julius v. Oxford (Bishop) (1880) 5 App Cas 214, 49 LJQB 577, Lord Blackburn at 242 and 244, Lord Cairns at 215; Sheffield Corpn. v. Luxford [1929] 2 KB 180, 98 LJKB 512, Talbot, J. for the court at 184, top; Re Zwicker (1939) 13 MPR 415, at 425. See also Williams v. Moody Bible Institute of Chicago [1937] 2 WWR 316; Ex parte Atty.-Gen.; In re Goodspeed (1903) 36 NBR 91; Ex parte Gilbert (1873) 14 NBR 231; Short on Informations, p. 254, and authorities there cited.

In the light of these interpretations of secs. 8 and 9 of the statute, I will now consider the decision of the board. In pars. (4) and (5) of the decision, the board says it has the right to determine under sec. 9 (1) "whether the unit * * * is appropriate for collective bargaining." If the board means by this "that the discretion must be exercised without taking into account any reason which is not a legal one," then I agree. For example, the applicant might fail to qualify under this Act or its members might be improperly certificated under The Steam Boiler and Pressure Plant Act, or impeached on other grounds, or otherwise mala fide. But none of these factors is present here. In my opinion the board erred in par. (6) in its understanding of sec. 2 (3), which is an interpretation or definition section; also it is in error in pars. (7) and (8) of its decision—the question of policy is not here in issue and is extraneous to it. Finally, the board in par. (9) of its decision uses the expressions "mutuality of interest" and "efficient operation." In this regard three points appear to have escaped the attention of the board and counsel in argument before me:

(1) The "campaign season" is the main object and sole purpose for the existence of the company. The other activities for the remainder of the year are incidental to that main object.

(2) The "campaign season," lasting approximately 75 days, operating 24 hours each day, is the equivalent of 225 days of 8 hours each, or 40 weeks of 44 hours each.

(3) Without certificated engineers the company could not operate.

In the result, the board acted upon factors in this case that should not have been taken into consideration, e.g., the small number comprising the group; the intervener union being already certified as bargaining agent; the employer might not want a second union in its plant, even though a craft union.

With respect, these are matters outside the scope of the board by which it considered itself entitled to refuse certification, interpreting the word "may" in sec. 9 (2) as permissive. I find "may" is used in an enabling sense and that it was imperative that the board certify the applicant as bargaining agent. The word "may" in this section is permissive, however, when the applicant is irresponsible, subversive, or otherwise acting mala fide, which is not suggested here.

The board refused to certify the applicant and we now consider the powers of the board and the powers of the court to review.

Sec. 59 (1) [as amended by 1950, ch. 31, sec. 6]:

> "If in any proceeding before the board or otherwise in the course of administration of this Act a question arises under this Act as to whether
>
> * * *
>
> "(f) a group of employees is a unit appropriate for collective bargaining;
>
> "(g) an employee belongs to a craft or group exercising technical skills;
>
> * * *
> "the board shall decide the question and its decision shall be final and conclusive for all the purposes of this Act."

In view of my finding, supra, the board did find affirmatively under pars. (f) and (g) of sec. 59 (1) but refused certification on other grounds. It is necessary then to consider the final words of the section—"its decision shall be final and conclusive for all the purposes of this Act." One of the most recent decisions on a similar section using similar words is in Rex v. Labour Relations Board, 29 MPR 66, [1951] 4 DLR 227 (N.S.). Sec. 58 of the Nova Scotia Act, 1947, ch. 3, provides that " * * * the decision or order of the Board shall be final and conclusive and not open to question, or review." It was there held, inter alia, that "the privative provisions of sec. 58 were not apt enough to oust the court from reviewing this question of jurisdiction." As to the jurisdiction of courts to review, see Kuchma v. Tache R.M., [1945] SCR 234, at 239 (affirming [1944] 1 WWR 321, 51 Man R 314, at 321). This was a decision upon sec. 473 of The Municipal Act, RSM, 1940, ch. 141, which reads in part as follows:

> " * * * when so approved shall be valid, binding and conclusive, and its validity shall not thereafter be questioned in any court or any proceedings unless the minister * * *

> "It has always been the function of the courts to pass upon questions of jurisdiction, good faith and public interest, and legislatures pass this and similar legislation in the expectation that the courts will continue to pass upon * * * such questions."

Also see Rex v. Northumberland Compensation Tribunal; Ex parte Shaw [1951] 1 KB 711.

Is mandamus applicable?

The modern use of mandamus may be illustrated by two recent cases in England: Rex v. Dunsheath; Ex parte Meredith [1951] 1 KB 127: Rex v. Minister of Labour and National Service; Ex parte Manning (1951) 95 Sol J 238.

These two cases indicate the present scope and limitations of mandamus. By this order of mandamus the courts can impose the rule of law on every department, tribunal, body or person charged with the performance of a public duty and failing to perform it. It is irrelevant for the issue of the order whether the duty requires the exercise of administrative discretion or the determination of a question by judicial process or a process analogous to it. The scope of mandamus and the persons to whom it issues, and the functions which they exercise, can hardly be wider, but the remedy is subject to a serious limitation: It is only available where the party complained of fails to discharge the public duty which he is obliged to perform, or performs it in such an illegal or perfunctory manner that there is in fact no performance. Mandamus thus deals only with the negative aspect of non-performance of a public duty, but normally does not enable the courts to control the positive aspect of wrongful exercise of duty.

The conditions on which mandamus is available are, in the words of Lord Goddard, C.J., in the Dunsheath case, supra, that the duty which the officer failed to perform (1) is in the nature of a public duty; (2) specially affecting the rights of an individual; and (3) that there is no more appropriate remedy.

See Can. Bar Review, vol. 29, pp. 472-3.

1952 CanLII 428 (MB CA)

The most recent Canadian case is In re United Steelworkers of America and B.C. Labour Relations Board (1951) 3 WWR (NS) 272, in which a limited mandamus was granted. Also re mandamus, see In re Commercial Taxi and Highway Traffic Board [1950] 2 WWR 289 (Alta.), affirmed (1951) 1 WWR (NS) 465. The case of In re Companies Act; Poizer v. Ward [1947] 1 WWR 807, 55 Man R 214, reversed [1947] 2 WWR 193, 55 Man R 214, at 218, is distinguished on the facts.

I find that mandamus is the appropriate remedy and the board should have certified the applicant as bargaining agent. An order of mandamus will issue accordingly.

Costs to be spoken to.

APPELLANT;

AND

THE HONOURABLE MAURICE DUPLESSIS (Defendant)

RESPONDENT

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, APPEAL SIDE, PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

PRESENT: Kerwin C.J. and Taschereau, Rand, Locke, Cartwright, Fauteux, Abbott, Martland and Judson JJ.

Crown-Officers of the Crown-Powers and responsibilities-Prime Minister and Attorney-General-Quebec Liquor Commission-Cancellation of licence to sell liquor-T7rhether made at instigation of Prime Minister and Attorney-General-The Alcoholic Liquor Act, R.S.Q.

1941, c. 255-The Attorney-General's Department Act, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 46-The Executive Power Act, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 7.

Licences-Cancellation-Motives of cancellation---Done on instigation of Prime Minister and Attorney-General-Whether liability in damages-Whether notice under art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure required.

The plaintiff, the proprietor of a restaurant in Montreal and the holder of a licence to sell intoxicating liquor, sued the defendant personally for damages arising out of the cancellation of his licence by the Quebec Liquor Commission. He alleged that the licence had been arbitrarily cancelled at the instigation of the defendant who, without legal powers in the matter, had given orders to the Commission to cancel it before its expiration. This was done, it was alleged, to punish the plaintiff, a member of the Witnesses of Jehovah, because he had acted as bailsman for a large number of members of his sect charged with the violation of municipal by-laws in connection with the distribution of literature. The trial judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for part of the damages claimed. The defendant appealed and the plaintiff, seeking an increase in the amount of damages, cross-appealed. The Court of Appeal dismissed the action and the cross-appeal.

Held (Taschereau, Cartwright and Fauteux JJ. dissenting) : The action should be maintained and the amount awarded at trial should be increased by $25,000. By wrongfully and without legal justification causing the cancellation of the permit, the defendant became liable for damages under art. 1053 of the Civil Code.

Per Kerwin C.J.: The trial judge correctly decided that the defendant ordered the Commission to cancel the licence, and no satisfactory reason has been advanced for the Court of Appeal setting aside that finding of fact.

Per Kerwin C.J. and Locke and Martland JJ.: There was ample evidence to sustain the finding of the trial judge that the cancellation of the permit was the result of an order given by the defendant to the manager of the Commission. There was, therefore, a relationship of cause and effect between the defendant's acts and the cancellation of the permit.

The defendant was not acting in the exercise of any of his official powers. There was no authority in the Attorney-General's Department Act, the Executive Power Act, or the Alcoholic Liquor Act enabling the defendant to direct the cancellation of a permit under the Alcoholic Liquor Act. The intent and purpose of that Act placed complete control over the liquor traffic in the hands of an independent commission.

Cancellation of a permit by the Commission, at the request or upon the direction of a third party, as was done in this case, was not a proper and valid exercise of the powers conferred upon the Commission by s. 35 of the Act.

The defendant was not entitled to the protection provided by art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure since what he did was not "done by him in the exercise of his functions". To interfere with the administration of the Commission by causing the cancellation of a liquor permit was entirely outside his legal functions. It involved the exercise of powers which in law he did not possess at all. His position was not altered by the fact that he thought it was his right and duty to act as he did.

2830 Per Rand J.: To deny or revoke a permit because a citizen exercises an unchallangeable right totally irrelevant to the sale of liquor in a restaurant is beyond the scope of the discretion conferred upon the Commission by the Alcoholic Liquor Act. What was done here was not competent to the Commission and a fortiori to the government or the defendant. The act of the defendant, through the instrumentality of the Commission, brought about a breach of an implied public statutory duty toward the plaintiff. There was no immunity in the defendant from an action for damages. He was under no duty in relation to the plaintiff and his act was an intrusion upon the functions of a statutory body. His liability was, there-fore, engaged. There can be no question of good faith when an act is done with an improper intent and for a purpose alien to the very statute under which the act is purported to be done. There was no need for giving a notice of action as required by art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as the act done by the defendant was quite beyond the scope of any function or duty committed to him so far so that it was one done exclusively in a private capacity however much, in fact, the influence of public office and power may have carried over into it.

Per Abbott J.: The cancellation of the licence was made solely because of the plaintiff's association with the Witnesses of Jehovah and with the object and purpose of preventing him from continuing to furnish bail for members of that sect. This cancellation was made with the express authorization and upon the order of the defendant. In purporting to authorize and instruct the Commission to cancel the licence the defendant was acting, as he was bound to know, without any legal authority whatsoever. A public officer is responsible for acts done by him without legal justification. The defendant was not entitled to avail himself of the exceptional provision of art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure since the act complained of was not "done by him in the exercise of his functions" but was an act done when he had gone outside his functions to perform it. Before a public officer can be held to be acting "in the exercise of his functions" within the meaning of art. 88, it must be established that at the time he performed the act complained of such public officer had reasonable ground for believing that such act was within his legal authority to perform.

Per Taschereau J., dissenting: The action cannot succeed because -the plaintiff did not give the notice required by art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the defendant who was a public officer performing his functions. The failure to fulfil this condition precedent was a total bar to the claim. That failure may be raised by exception to the form or in the written plea to the action, and the words "no judgment may be rendered" indicate that the Court may raise the point propio motu. Even if what was said by the defendant affected the decision taken by the Commission, the defendant remained, nevertheless, a public officer acting in the performance of his duties. He was surely a public officer, and it is clear that he did not act in his personal quality. It was as legal adviser of the Commission and also as a public officer entrusted with the task of preventing disorders and as protector of the peace in the province, that he was consulted. It was the Attorney-General, acting in the performance of his functions, who was required to give his directives to a govern-mental branch. It is a fallacious principle to hold that an error, committed by a public officer in doing an act connected with the object of his functions, strips that act of its official character and that its author must then be considered as having acted outside the scope of his duties.

Per Cartwright J., dissenting: The loss suffered by the plaintiff was damnum sine injuria. Whether the defendant directed or merely approved the cancellation of the licence, he cannot be answerable in damages since the act of the Commission in cancelling the licence was not an actionable wrong. The Courts below have found, on ample evidence, that the defendant and the manager of the Commission acted throughout in the honest belief that they were fulfilling their duty to the province. On the true construction of the Alcoholic Liquor Act, the Legislature, except in certain specified circumstances which are not present in the case at bar, has not laid down any rules as to the grounds on which the Commission may decide to cancel a permit; that decision is committed to the unfettered discretion of the Commission and its function in making the decision is administrative and not judicial or quasi-judicial. Consequently, the Commission was not bound to give the plaintiff an opportunity to be heard and the Court cannot be called upon to determine whether there existed sufficient grounds for its decision. Even if the function of the Commission was quasi-judicial and its order should be set aside for failure to hear the plaintiff, it is doubtful whether any action for damages would lie.

Per Fauteux J., dissenting : The right to exercise the discretion with respect to the cancellation of the permit, which under the Alcoholic Liquor Act was exclusively that of the Commission, was abdicated by it in favour of the defendant when he made the decision executed by the Commission. The cancellation being illegal, imputable to the defendant, and damageable for the plaintiff, the latter was entitled to succeed on an action under art. 1053 of the Civil Code.

As the notice required by art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure was not given, the action, however, could not be maintained. The failure to give notice, when it should be given, imports nullity and limits the very jurisdiction of the Court. In the present case, the defendant was entitled to the notice since the illegality reproached was committed "in the exercise of his functions". The meaning of this expression in art. 88 was not subject to the limitations attending expressions more or less identical appearing in art. 1054 of the Civil Code. The latter article deals with responsibility whereas art. 88 deals with procedure. Article 88 has its source in s. 8 of An Act for the Protection of Justices of the Peace, Cons. Stat. L.C., c. 101, which provided that the officer "shall be entitled" to the protection of the statute although "he has exceeded his powers or jurisdiction, and has acted clearly contrary to law". That section peremptorily establishes that, in pari materia, a public officer was not considered as having ceased to act within the exercise of his functions by the sole fact that the act committed by him might constitute an abuse of power or excess of jurisdiction, or even a violation of the law. An illegality is assumed under art. 88. The jurisprudence of the province, which has been settled for many years, is to the effect that the incidence of good or bad faith has no bearing on the right to the notice.

The illegality committed by the defendant did not amount to an offence known under the penal law or a delict under art. 1053 of the Civil Code. He did not use his functions to commit this illegality. He did not commit it on the occasion of his functions, but committed it because ,of his functions. His good faith has not been doubted, and on this fact there was a concurrent finding in the Courts below.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Constitutional law — Courts — Access to justice — Court hearing fees — Province enacting regulations establishing graduated court hearing fees — Regulations containing exemption provision from fees for persons who are "indigent" or "impoverished" — Whether province can establish hearing fee scheme under its administration of justice power pursuant to s. 92(14) of Constitution Act, 1867 — Whether regulations imposing hearing fees denying some people access to courts infringing core jurisdiction of s. 96 superior courts — Whether provincial hearing fee scheme constitutionally valid — Constitution Act, 1867, ss. 92(14), 96 — Court Rules Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 80 — Supreme Court Rules, B.C. Reg. 221/90, as amended by B.C. Reg. 10/96 and B.C. Reg. 75/98 — Supreme Court Civil Rules, B.C. Reg. 168/2009, r. 20-5(1).

This case began as a family action. V and D were involved in a custody dispute. V went to court to have these issues resolved. In order to get a trial date, she had to undertake in advance to pay a court hearing fee. At the outset of the trial, V asked the judge to relieve her from paying the hearing fee. The judge reserved his decision on this request until the end of the trial. The parties were not represented by lawyers, and the hearing took 10 days. The hearing fee amounted to some $3,600 — almost the net monthly income of the family. After legal fees had depleted her savings, V could not afford the hearing fee.

Aware that there was some authority for the proposition that hearing fees are unconstitutional, the judge invited submissions and interventions on the subject from outside parties and stayed V's obligation to pay the hearing fee. Ultimately, the B.C. branch of the Canadian Bar Association ("CBA"), the Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia ("Trial Lawyers") and the Attorney General of British Columbia (the "Province") intervened.

The Supreme Court Rules, which were in place at the time this case began, were replaced in 2010 by the Supreme Court Civil Rules. The constitutionality of the hearing fees set out in both rules of court is challenged. The current hearing fees escalate from no fee for the first three days of trial, to $500 for days four to ten, to $800 for each day over ten. Rule 20-5(1) of the Supreme Court Civil Rules provides for an exemption from hearing fees if the court finds that a person is "impoverished". The exemption in place at the time of the trial provided that a judge could waive all fees for a person who is "indigent".

The trial judge in this case ruled that the hearing fee provision was unconstitutional. The Court of Appeal agreed that the scheme could not stand as it is, but held that if the exemption provision were expanded by reading in the words "or in need", it would pass constitutional muster. The Trial Lawyers and CBA appeal the remedy to this Court. The Province cross-appeals on the issue of the constitutionality of the hearing fees.

Held (Rothstein J. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed and the cross-appeal dismissed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and LeBel, Abella, Moldaver and Karakatsanis JJ.: Levying hearing fees is a permissible exercise of the Province's jurisdiction under s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867; however, that power is not unlimited. It must be exercised in a manner that is consistent with s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the requirements that flow by necessary implication from s. 96. Section 96 restricts the legislative competence of provincial legislatures and Parliament; neither level of government can enact legislation that removes part of the core or inherent jurisdiction of the superior courts. The historic task of the superior courts is to resolve disputes between individuals and decide questions of private and public law. Measures that prevent people from coming to the courts to have those issues resolved are at odds with this basic judicial function. Therefore, hearing fees that deny people access to the courts infringe the core jurisdiction of the superior courts and impermissibly impinge on s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

The connection between access to justice and s. 96 is further supported by considerations relating to the rule of law. The s. 96 function and the rule of law are inextricably intertwined. As access to justice is fundamental to the rule of law, it is natural that s. 96 provide some degree of constitutional protection for access to justice. Concerns about the rule of law in this case are not abstract or theoretical. If people cannot bring legitimate issues to court, laws will not be given effect, and the balance between the state's power to make and enforce laws and the courts' responsibility to rule on citizen challenges to them may be skewed.

Section 92(14), read in the context of the Constitution as a whole, does not give the provinces the power to administer justice in a way that denies the right of Canadians to access courts of superior jurisdiction. Any attempt to do so will run afoul of the constitutional protection for the superior courts found in s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

Hearing fees are unconstitutional when they deprive litigants of access to the superior courts. That point is reached when the hearing fees in question cause undue hardship to the litigant who seeks the adjudication of the superior court. A hearing fee scheme that does not exempt impoverished people clearly oversteps the constitutional minimum. But providing exemptions only to the truly impoverished may set the access bar too high. A fee that is so high that it requires litigants who are not impoverished to sacrifice reasonable expenses in order to bring a claim may, absent adequate exemptions, be unconstitutional because it subjects litigants to undue hardship, thereby effectively preventing access to the courts. It is the role of the provincial legislatures to devise a constitutionally compliant hearing fee scheme. But as a general rule, hearing fees must be coupled with an exemption that allows judges to waive the fees for people who cannot, by reason of their financial situation, bring non-frivolous or non-vexatious litigation to court. A hearing fee scheme can include an exemption for the truly impoverished, but the hearing fees must be set at an amount such that anyone who is not impoverished can afford them. Higher fees must be coupled with enough judicial discretion to waive hearing fees in any case where they would effectively prevent access to the courts because they require litigants to forgo reasonable expenses in order to bring claims.

The hearing fee scheme at issue in this case places an undue hardship on litigants and impedes the right of British Columbians to bring legitimate cases to court and is unconstitutional. The current exemptions do not provide sufficient discretion to the trial judge to exempt litigants from having to pay hearing fees in appropriate circumstances.

V is excused from paying the hearing fee. The hearing fee scheme prevents access to the courts in a manner inconsistent with s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the underlying principle of the rule of law. It therefore falls outside the Province's jurisdiction under s. 92(14) to administer justice.

The proper remedy is to declare the hearing fee scheme as it stands unconstitutional and leave it to the Legislature or the Lieutenant Governor-in-Council to enact new provisions, should they choose to do so. "Reading in" is a remedy sparingly used, and available only where it is clear the legislature, faced with a ruling of unconstitutionality, would have made the change proposed. This condition is not met here. Further, modifying the exemption as suggested might still not cover all litigants who cannot afford the hearing fee and other provisions might be required in order to avoid the onerous or undignified process of proving that one falls within the exception.

Per Cromwell J.: This case can be resolved on administrative law grounds and it is unnecessary to address the broader constitutional issues. There is a common law right of reasonable access to civil justice. This right of reasonable access may only be abrogated by clear statutory language. This common law right is preserved by the Court Rules Act. The common law right of access to civil justice allows court fees, but only if there is an exemption to ensure that no person is prevented from making an arguable claim or defence because he or she lacks the resources to carry on the proceeding. This is a flexible standard: whether a person has the ability to pay the fees depends not only on wealth and income, but also on the amount of their reasonable, necessary expenses and the magnitude of the fees. If the hearing fee exemptions cannot be interpreted to ensure that the common law right of access is not defeated, then the fees are ultra vires the Court Rules Act.

Here, the trial judge found as a fact that the hearing fees are unaffordable and therefore limit access for litigants who do not fall within the exemptions for the indigent and the impoverished. The plain meaning of the exemption, referring to persons who are "impoverished" and "indigent" cannot be interpreted to cover people of modest means who are prevented from having a trial because of the hearing fees. The hearing fees do not meet the common law standard preserved by the Court Rules Act. The exemptions under the Court Rules Act cannot be interpreted in a way that is consistent with the common law right of access to civil justice which is preserved by the Court Rules Act. Thus, the fees are ultra vires the regulation-making authority conferred by the Court Rules Act.

Per Rothstein J. (dissenting): The British Columbia hearing fee scheme does not offend any constitutional right. There is no express constitutional right to access the civil courts without hearing fees. Section 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867 entrusts the administration of justice in the provinces to provincial legislatures. It is well established that provinces have the power under s. 92(14) to enact laws that prescribe conditions on access to the courts. Legislatures must balance a number of important values, including providing access to courts and ensuring that those same courts are adequately funded. They are accountable to voters for the choices they make. Absent a violation of the Charter and within the bounds of their constitutional jurisdiction, provincial legislatures have leeway to make policy decisions regarding the allocation of funding and the recovery of costs.

The hearing fee scheme in this case cannot be struck down on the basis of a novel reading of s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Section 96 protects the core jurisdiction of superior courts that is integral to their operations; however, it does not follow that legislation that places conditions on access to superior courts removes or infringes upon an aspect of their core jurisdiction. This Court has previously established a three-part test for determining whether legislation impermissibly removes an aspect of the core jurisdiction of superior courts. The majority does not apply this test because no aspect of the core jurisdiction of superior courts is removed by legislation that merely places limits on access to superior courts. In the absence of any demonstrated destruction of the core powers of the superior courts, there is no such removal sufficient to find a violation of s. 96. Instead, the majority significantly expands what is meant by the "core jurisdiction" of the superior courts beyond what is contemplated in the text or this Court's jurisprudence on the scope of s. 96. The hearing fees are a financing mechanism and do not go to the very existence of the court as a judicial body or limit the types of powers it may exercise.

The unwritten principle of the rule of law does not support the striking down of legislation otherwise properly within provincial jurisdiction. The majority uses the rule of law to support reading a general constitutional right to access the superior courts into s. 96. Section 96 requires that the existence and core jurisdiction of superior courts be preserved, but this does not, necessarily imply the general right of access to superior courts described by the majority. So long as the courts maintain their character as judicial bodies and exercise the core functions of courts, the demands of the Constitution are satisfied. In using an unwritten principle to support expanding the ambit of s. 96 to such an extent, the majority subverts the structure of the Constitution and jeopardizes the primacy of the written text. This purported constitutional right to access the courts circumvents the careful checks and balances built into the structure of the Charter. Unlike Charter rights, rights read into s. 96 are not subject to s. 1 justification or the s. 33 notwithstanding clause.

This Court has clearly and persuasively cautioned against using the rule of law to strike down legislation. To circumvent this caution, the majority characterizes the rule of law as a limitation on the jurisdiction of provinces under s. 92(14). Dressing the rule of law in division-of-powers clothing does not disguise the fact that the rule of law, an unwritten principle, cannot be used to support striking down the hearing fee scheme. Reading the unwritten principle of the rule of law too broadly would also render many of our written constitutional rights redundant and, in doing so, undermine the delimitation of those rights chosen by our constitutional framers. Provisions such as ss. 11(d) and 24(1) of the Charter would be unnecessary if the Constitution already contained a more general right to access superior courts. The rule of law is a vague and fundamentally disputed concept. To rely on this nebulous principle to invalidate legislation based on its content introduces uncertainty into constitutional law and undermines our system of positive law.

Even if there were a constitutional basis upon which to challenge the British Columbia hearing fee scheme, it would not be unconstitutional. The majority's approach to determining whether hearing fees prevent litigants from accessing the courts overlooks some important contextual considerations. In particular, the majority does not account for measures that offset the burden of hearing fees or eliminate them altogether. When these measures are taken into consideration, there is no indication that the hearing fees at issue would prevent litigants from bringing meritorious legal claims.

[30] Section 96 therefore restricts the legislative competence of provincial legislatures and Parliament — neither level of government can enact legislation that abolishes the superior courts or removes part of their core or inherent jurisdiction: MacMillan Bloedel, at para. 37; Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3 ("Provincial Judges Reference"), at para. 88.

[31] It is not suggested that legislating hearing fees that prevent people from accessing the courts would abolish or destroy the existence of the courts. The question is rather whether legislating hearing fees that prevent people from accessing the courts infringes on the core jurisdiction of the superior courts.

[32] The historic task of the superior courts is to resolve disputes between individuals and decide questions of private and public law. Measures that prevent people from coming to the courts to have those issues resolved are at odds with this basic judicial function. The resolution of these disputes and resulting determination of issues of private and public law, viewed in the institutional context of the Canadian justice system, are central to what the superior courts do. Indeed, it is their very book of business. To prevent this business being done strikes at the core of the jurisdiction of the superior courts protected by s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. As a result, hearing fees that deny people access to the courts infringe the core jurisdiction of the superior courts.

[33] The jurisprudence under s. 96 supports this conclusion. The cases decided under s. 96 have been concerned either with legislation that purports to transfer an aspect of the core jurisdiction of the superior court to another decision-making body or with privative clauses that would bar judicial review: Re Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, 1981 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1981] 1 S.C.R. 714; MacMillan Bloedel; Crevier v. Attorney General of Quebec, 1981 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 220. The thread throughout these cases is that laws may impinge on the core jurisdiction of the superior courts by denying access to the powers traditionally exercised by those courts.

[34] In Residential Tenancies, the law at issue unconstitutionally denied access to the superior courts by requiring that a certain class of cases be decided by an administrative tribunal. In Crevier, the law at issue unconstitutionally denied access to the superior courts by imposing a privative clause excluding the supervisory jurisdiction of the superior courts. In MacMillan Bloedel, the legislation at issue unconstitutionally barred access to the superior courts for a segment of society — young persons — by conferring an exclusive power on youth courts to try youths for contempt in the face of superior courts. This Court, per Lamer C.J., relied on Crevier, concluding that "[it] establishes . . . that powers which are 'hallmarks of superior courts' cannot be removed from those courts" (MacMillan Bloedel, at para. 35).

[35] Here, the legislation at issue bars access to the superior courts in yet another way — by imposing hearing fees that prevent some individuals from having their private and public law disputes resolved by the courts of superior jurisdiction — the hallmark of what superior courts exist to do. As in MacMillan Bloedel, a segment of society is effectively denied the ability to bring their matter before the superior court.

[36] It follows that the province's power to impose hearing fees cannot deny people the right to have their disputes resolved in the superior courts. To do so would be to impermissibly impinge on s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Rather, the province's powers under s. 92(14) must be exercised in a manner that is consistent with the right of individuals to bring their cases to the superior courts and have them resolved there.

[37] This is consistent with the approach adopted by Major J. in Imperial Tobacco. The legislation here at issue — the imposition of hearing fees — must conform not only to the express terms of the Constitution, but to the "requirements . . . that flow by necessary implication from those terms" (para. 66). The right of Canadians to access the superior courts flows by necessary implication from the express terms of s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 as we have seen. It follows that the province does not have the power under s. 92(14) to enact legislation that prevents people from accessing the courts.

[38] While this suffices to resolve the fundamental issue of principle in this appeal, the connection between s. 96 and access to justice is further supported by considerations relating to the rule of law. This Court affirmed that access to the courts is essential to the rule of law in B.C.G.E.U. v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1988 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 214. As Dickson C.J. put it, "[t]here cannot be a rule of law without access, otherwise the rule of law is replaced by a rule of men and women who decide who shall and who shall not have access to justice" (p. 230). The Court adopted, at p. 230, the B.C. Court of Appeal's statement of the law ((1985), 1985 CanLII 143 (BC CA), 20 D.L.R. (4th) 399, at p. 406):

> . . . access to the courts is under the rule of law one of the foundational pillars protecting the rights and freedoms of our citizens. . . . Any action that interferes with such access by any person or groups of persons will rally the court's powers to ensure the citizen of his or her day in court. Here, the action causing interference happens to be picketing. As we have already indicated, interference from whatever source falls into the same category. [Emphasis added.]

As stated more recently in Hryniak v. Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 87, per Karakatsanis J., "without an accessible public forum for the adjudication of disputes, the rule of law is threatened and the development of the common law undermined" (para. 26).

[39] The s. 96 judicial function and the rule of law are inextricably intertwined. As Lamer C.J. stated in MacMillan Bloedel, "[i]n the constitutional arrangements passed on to us by the British and recognized by the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, the provincial superior courts are the foundation of the rule of law itself" (para. 37). The very rationale for the provision is said to be "the maintenance of the rule of law through the protection of the judicial role": Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 88. As access to justice is fundamental to the rule of law, and the rule of law is fostered by the continued existence of the s. 96 courts, it is only natural that s. 96 provide some degree of constitutional protection for access to justice.

[40] In the context of legislation which effectively denies people the right to take their cases to court, concerns about the maintenance of the rule of law are not abstract or theoretical. If people cannot challenge government actions in court, individuals cannot hold the state to account — the government will be, or be seen to be, above the law. If people cannot bring legitimate issues to court, the creation and maintenance of positive laws will be hampered, as laws will not be given effect. And the balance between the state's power to make and enforce laws and the courts' responsibility to rule on citizen challenges to them may be skewed: Christie v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2005 BCCA 631, 262 D.L.R. (4th) 51, at paras. 68-9, per Newbury J.A.

[41] This Court's decision in Christie does not undermine the proposition that access to the courts is fundamental to our constitutional arrangements. The Court in Christie — a case concerning a 7 percent surcharge on legal services — proceeded on the premise of a fundamental right to access the courts, but held that not "every limit on access to the courts is automatically unconstitutional" (para. 17). In the present case, the hearing fee requirement has the potential to bar litigants with legitimate claims from the courts. The tax at issue in Christie, on the evidence and arguments adduced, was not shown to have a similar impact.

[42] Nor does the argument that legislatures generally have the right to determine the cost of government services undermine the proposition that laws cannot prevent citizens from accessing the superior courts. (Indeed, the Attorney General does not assert such a proposition.) The right of the province to impose hearing fees is limited by constitutional constraints. In defining those constraints, the Court does not impermissibly venture into territory that is the exclusive turf of the legislature. Rather, the Court is ensuring that the Constitution is respected.

[43] I conclude that s. 92(14), read in the context of the Constitution as a whole, does not give the provinces the power to administer justice in a way that denies the right of Canadians to access courts of superior jurisdiction. Any attempt to do so will run afoul of the constitutional protection for the superior courts found in s. 96.

C. When Do Hearing Fees Become Unconstitutional?

[44] The remaining question is how to determine when hearing fees deny access to superior courts.

[45] Litigants with ample resources will not be denied access to the superior courts by hearing fees. Even litigants with modest resources are often capable of arranging their finances so that, with reasonable sacrifices, they may access the courts. However, when hearing fees deprive litigants of access to the superior courts, they infringe the basic right of citizens to bring their cases to court. That point is reached when the hearing fees in question cause undue hardship to the litigant who seeks the adjudication of the superior court.

[46] A hearing fee scheme that does not exempt impoverished people clearly oversteps the constitutional minimum — as tacitly recognized by the exemption in the B.C. scheme at issue here. But providing exemptions only to the truly impoverished may set the access bar too high. A fee that is so high that it requires litigants who are not impoverished to sacrifice reasonable expenses in order to bring a claim may, absent adequate exemptions, be unconstitutional because it subjects litigants to undue hardship, thereby effectively preventing access to the courts.

[47] Of course, hearing fees that prevent litigants from bringing frivolous or vexatious claims do not offend the Constitution. There is no constitutional right to bring frivolous or vexatious cases, and measures that deter such cases may actually increase efficiency and overall access to justice.

[48] It is the role of the provincial legislatures to devise a constitutionally compliant hearing fee scheme. But as a general rule, hearing fees must be coupled with an exemption that allows judges to waive the fees for people who cannot, by reason of their financial situation, bring non-frivolous or non-vexatious litigation to court. A hearing fee scheme can include an exemption for the truly impoverished, but the hearing fees must be set at an amount such that anyone who is not impoverished can afford them. Higher fees must be coupled with enough judicial discretion to waive hearing fees in any case where they would effectively prevent access to the courts because they require litigants to forgo reasonable expenses in order to bring claims. This is in keeping with a long tradition in the common law of providing exemptions for classes of people who might be prevented from accessing the courts — a tradition that goes back to the Statute of Henry VII, 11 Hen. 7, c. 12, of 1495, which provided relief for people who could not afford court fees.

On a fee waiver request made by Godwin Diogu in respect of the filing of a Notice of Appeal from the judgment of Justice Michael A. Penny of the Superior Court of Justice, dated January 31, 2017, with reasons reported at 2017 ONSC 708.

Brown J.A.:

OVERVIEW

[1] Ensuring that litigants enjoy access to public courts to resolve their civil legal disputes is fundamental to our country's constitutional arrangements: Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 59, [2014] 3 S.C.R. 31, at paras. 32 and 41.

[2] At the same time, courts require money to operate. In Ontario, filing fees provide some of the court's operating revenue. In the case of most civil appeals brought to the Court of Appeal for Ontario, an appellant must pay $220 on the filing of a notice of appeal and $405 to perfect the appeal: Superior Court of Justice and Court of Appeal – Fees, O. Reg. 293/92, ss. 1(3) and (5).

[3] Those fees are quite modest in amount, given the services received by the litigant in return. However, for some, even such modest amounts are beyond their financial means. To address this concern, the Administration of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. A.6 (the "AJA"), creates a mechanism by which civil filing fees can be waived "so that individuals who might otherwise be denied access to justice because of their financial circumstances can be excused from paying fees": s. 4.1.

[4] Under the fee waiver regime, two different routes are available to a person to request a fee waiver for an appeal in this court: (i) a request to the court registrar; and (ii) a request to a judge: AJA, ss. 4.3 and 4.4.

[5] In the present case, Godwin Diogu has followed the second route, requesting a fee waiver from a judge in respect of his notice of appeal from the order of Penny J., dated January 31, 2017. For the reasons that follow I find that Mr. Diogu is not entitled to a fee waiver.

THE FEE WAIVER REGIME

[6] A new fee waiver regime came into force in November 2016. Below, I describe the procedural requirements for each of the two fee waiver request routes.

(1) The first route: a request to the court registrar

[7] First, the person can make a written request for a fee waiver to the court's registrar using a form provided by the Ministry of the Attorney General: AJA, s. 4.3(1). The request must be accompanied by proof of the person's income and, in some cases, proof of the spouse's income: Fee Waiver, O. Reg. 2/05, s. 2.1. The registrar must then review the request, together with the accompanying proof of income, to determine whether the person meets the prescribed financial conditions that entitle him or her to a fee waiver.

[8] A person meets the prescribed financial conditions if he or she falls into one of three categories:

(i) the primary source of the person's gross annual household income is one of several identified government benefit programs – e.g. Ontario Works, Old Age Security, Canada Pension Plan, and some others;

(ii) Legal Aid Ontario has approved the person's application to receive legal aid services in respect of the proceeding; or,

(iii) The person meets the financial criteria stipulated by the regulation: O. Reg. 2/05, s. 2(1).

[9] The stipulated financial criteria require a person to demonstrate that his or her gross annual household income, the value of the household's liquid assets, and the household's net worth all fall below certain dollar amounts set out in the regulation: O. Reg. 2/05, s. 2(2).

[10] If the registrar determines the person meets the prescribed financial conditions, the registrar shall give the person a fee waiver certificate: AJA, s. 4.3(4).

(2) The second route: a request to a judge

[11] The second way a person can request a fee waiver is by making a written request, using a prescribed form, to a judge of the court: AJA, s. 4.4. Before the request is put before a judge, the registrar must review it. If the registrar determines the person has met the prescribed financial conditions, the registrar shall issue a fee waiver certificate: AJA, s. 4.4(4).

[12] If the registrar determines the person does not meet the prescribed financial conditions, the registrar then forwards the request to a judge. In reviewing the request, a judge must determine whether the person has met two conditions:

(i) The person lacks the financial means to pay fees relating to the proceeding; and

(ii) Commencing or continuing the proceeding is not frivolous, vexatious or otherwise an abuse of the process of the court: AJA, ss. 4.4(5) and (7).

[13] If the judge is of the opinion the person meets those two conditions, then the judge shall make an order directing the registrar to give the person a fee waiver certificate: AJA, s. 4.4(5).

[14] Two practical questions arise about fee waiver requests made to a judge.

[15] First, what criteria does a judge use to determine whether the person "lacks the financial means to pay fees relating to the proceeding"? Although a judge will consider all the circumstances concerning a person's financial means, as part of that review a judge certainly will look at the financial criteria used on fee waiver applications to the registrar – i.e. whether: (i) the primary source of the person's gross annual household income is one of several identified government benefit programs; (ii) the person has applied for and received approval for Legal Aid; or (iii) the person's income, liquid assets and net worth fall below the dollar amounts specified in the regulation.

[16] Second, what information must a fee waiver applicant include with a request to a judge? A fee waiver request to a judge first passes through the hands of the registrar. Since the registrar must determine whether the request meets the financial conditions prescribed by the regulation, it follows that an application to a judge for a fee waiver must, at a minimum, include the same information as would a fee waiver request to the registrar – i.e. information showing that the three financial criteria to satisfy a fee waiver are met: (i) the primary source of the person's gross annual household income is one of several identified government benefit programs; (ii) the person has applied for and received approval for Legal Aid; or (iii) the person's income, liquid assets and net worth fall below the dollar amounts specified in the regulation. The Ministry form for a request to a judge assists an applicant in organizing such information.

[17] A fee waiver request to a judge may contain additional information about the applicant's "financial means," and the Ministry form contains a page for "additional financial information."

[18] An applicant for a fee waiver must appreciate that as a result of the changes which came into force in November 2016, he or she can no longer simply file an affidavit stating the applicant lacks the financial means to pay the court filing fees. Financial information must be filed. It is important that any person who applies to a judge for a fee waiver take the time and care to assemble and place before the judge relevant financial documentation about his or her financial means. I say this because the decision of the judge on a fee waiver request is final: AJA, s. 4.4(9). The rules of court do not apply to a fee waiver request made to a judge, so the decision made by the single judge will not be reviewable by a full panel of the court: AJA, s. 4.8.

THE FEE WAIVER REQUEST IN THE PRESENT CASE

[19] In the present case, Godwin Diogu requests a fee waiver in respect of his notice of appeal from the order of Penny J. In that proceeding by the Attorney General of Ontario under the Civil Remedies Act, 2001, S.O. 2001, c. 28, the application judge granted an application for the forfeiture of CDN $25,610 and US $80 on the basis the funds were either the proceeds of unlawful activity or an instrument of illegal activity. Mr. Diogu took the position that the funds were owned either by himself or Mr. Chidi Chinagrooom. The motion judge did not accept his evidence.

[20] Mr. Diogu wishes to appeal that judgment on several grounds: (i) the seized funds were not the proceeds of crime; (ii) the judgment was based on the improper application of the facts and law and, therefore, was wrong; and (iii) “further reasons to be provided”.

[21] The registrar has referred Mr. Diogu’s fee waiver request to me for consideration.

[22] Mr. Diogu has provided some information about his financial means in his affidavit. He states that he is “presently unemployed because [his] work authorization application is pending.” He lives with his wife and lists their net annual household income from employment at $11,000, but he attached 2016 T4s for his wife that show only about $175 in employment income. He lists their household assets as zero; he did not file any documentation about bank accounts or any other asset.

[23] I must assess the statements in Mr. Diogu’s fee waiver affidavit in light of other information about his financial means contained in the application judge’s reasons. According to those reasons, Mr. Diogu filed evidence on the application that he was an inspection engineer and in 2013 earned annual income net of tax of $40,000. He also had a Canadian dollar bank account and a credit card. He received transfers of US dollars, and he bought used cars for export to Nigeria.

[24] The evidence Mr. Diogu placed before the application judge paints a much different picture of his financial means than shown by his fee request affidavit. Mr. Diogu has not provided me with any explanation that reconciles the statements he makes on this fee waiver request about his current financial means with the evidence he placed before the application judge about his prior employment in Canada, annual income, and use of bank accounts. As a result, I am not persuaded that Mr. Diogu lacks the financial means to pay fees relating to his appeal.

DISPOSITION

[25] Mr. Diogu is not entitled to a fee waiver certificate.

Memorandum of Judgment

Application for Consent Judgment

Memorandum of Judgment

The Court:

[1] The applicants appealed an order declaring them vexatious litigants and subjecting them to court access restrictions. It appears the applicants and respondents have reached a settlement agreement which contemplates the parties jointly submitting a consent order that would vacate the order imposed below. The parties were directed by the Case Management Officer to bring an application before a panel for approval of the consent order. We deny their application.

Background

[2] The applicants and respondents have been embroiled in litigation at the Court of King's Bench. Eventually the applicants and respondents each filed applications to have the other declared vexatious litigants and to have court access restrictions imposed. The respondents' application was granted but the applicants' was denied. In the result, the applicants were declared vexatious but the respondents were not.

[3] The applicants filed a notice of appeal alleging numerous errors in the chambers judge's decision and asking that it be set aside in its entirety. With the respondents' consent, the applicants have now filed a discontinuance of the portion of their appeal arising from the chambers judge's decision not to declare the respondents vexatious litigants. The extant appeal therefore only concerns the portion of the decision below declaring the applicants vexatious and imposing restrictions on them.

[4] According to the applicant Mr. Uhrik, in an affidavit filed in support of this application, the parties reached a settlement agreement on June 8 of this year. He deposes that it is a condition of that agreement that it shall be kept confidential except insofar as disclosure is required by law.

[5] The redacted version of the agreement that was exhibited to Mr. Uhrik's affidavit indicates that the parties "wish to fully and completely resolve any and all outstanding matters between them". It further provides:

> 2. The Parties shall jointly file with the Court of Appeal a Consent Order directing that Justice Bourque's finding and declaration that UHRIK and LITZIUS are deemed vexatious litigants in Uhrik v. Terrigno 2023 ABKB 223 (the "Bourque Decision") be overturned/reversed without costs to any of the parties.
>
> 3. If the Consent Order contemplated in paragraph B (2) is not granted at first instance and instead the Court of Appeal directs that the parties make further submissions in person or writing, the Parties agree to facilitate and comply with the additional direction from the Court.

> a. It is expressly understood and accepted by UHRIK and LITZIUS that the final decision to overturn the Bourque Decision and their respective designation as vexatious litigants is exclusively the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal. [emphasis in original] > b. Neither MIKE TERRIGNO, MICHELE DE CESARE, or ANTOINETTA TERRIGNO make any representation or guarantees as to UHRIK or LITZIUS's success in the relief they now seek from the Court of Appeal.

4. The Release of the Settlement Amount is not dependent on UHRIK and LITZIUS's ultimate success in having their designation as vexatious litigants reversed; however, the release of the Settlement Funds to TERRIGNO and DE CESARE will not be permitted until the steps contemplated by paragraphs B2 and B3 have been voluntarily completed, along with any other conditions set out in the Settlement Agreement

[6] As discussed below, the applicants submit the chambers judge made reviewable errors. They submit the consent order should be granted because, inter alia: without it, the costs they have expended to date will have been wasted; they have no remaining assets; they do not foresee any reason they would need to engage in litigation in future, but should the need arise they would like to do so without restriction; and "[t]he dispute between the parties in this Honourable Court and in the Court below has been entirely in the nature of private litigation with no impact on third parties."

[7] The respondents filed no materials on this application, but they confirmed in oral argument that they are complying with their obligations under the agreement by supporting the application for consent judgment.

I. Analysis

[8] We accept that both parties wish to have the extant vexatious litigant order vacated. We accept that the litigation between the parties was private in nature. However, the vexatious litigant order is not purely, or primarily, private in nature. Therefore it is not appropriate to vacate it merely on the basis of giving effect to the wishes of private parties.

[9] Vexatious litigant orders may be imposed where the subject party has demonstrated a persistent pattern of inappropriate behaviour: Judicature Act, RSA 2000, J-2, s 23(2), Jonsson v Lymer, 2020 ABCA 167 at para 20 [Jonsson]. Such patterns of behaviour will virtually inevitably result in misuse of court resources. When determining a vexatious litigant application, the court's goal is to "find the proper balance between maintaining reasonable access to the court, while preserving court resources and shielding other litigants from abusive behavior": Jonsson at para 16.

[10] As this Court has said, universal access to the courts is an important component of the rule of law: Jonsson at para 10. As the Supreme Court of Canada has said in Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v British Columbia (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 59 at paras 32 and 40:

> Measures that prevent people from coming to the courts to have those issues resolved are at odds with this basic judicial function. The resolution of these disputes and resulting determination of issues of private and public law, viewed in > the institutional context of the Canadian justice system, are central to what the superior courts do. Indeed, it is their very book of business. To prevent this business being done strikes at the core of the jurisdiction of the superior courts protected by s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. . .

> In the context of legislation which effectively denies people the right to take their cases to court, concerns about the maintenance of the rule of law are not abstract or theoretical. If people cannot challenge government actions in court, individuals cannot hold the state to account — the government will be, or be seen to be, above the law. If people cannot bring legitimate issues to court, the creation and maintenance of positive laws will be hampered, as laws will not be given effect. . .

[11] Where persistent abusive conduct has been shown, it is the court's responsibility to step in and prevent the misuse, to ensure that the rights of other litigants to access the court is not impaired.

[12] Given the nature and purpose of vexatious litigant orders, it is evident that they are intended to protect interests beyond those of the parties to the litigation in which they arise. It follows that it is not appropriate to set aside a vexatious litigant order merely because it is the resolution desired by the parties.

[13] It should go without saying that courts "should never rubber stamp any judgment without being satisfied that it is proper": Wensel v Wensel, 1976 AltaSCAD 179 at para 15.

[14] Before us, the applicants submitted the decision below is flawed because the chambers judge did not give them an opportunity to respond orally to allegations concerning their conduct in an unrelated matter. They say they had understood the vexatious litigant application, and any remedy imposed, would address only the litigation between them and the respondents; in other words, they did not anticipate that they could be restricted from filing any action, against any respondent, without the court's permission.

[15] We are not satisfied from our review of the materials filed on the application and the parties' submissions that vacating the order in its entirety would be proper. We decline to say more about the merits of the matter since the appeal remains outstanding and may be argued on its merits with a full record before another panel.

II. Result

[16] The application is denied. Each of the parties shall bear their own costs.

[17] Rule 9.4(2)(c) is invoked, and the Court will prepare the resulting order.

PRESENT: Mr. Justice Grammond

BETWEEN:

RICHARD TIMM

Plaintiff

and

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

JUDGMENT AND REASONS

[1] Mr. Timm, an inmate in a federal institution, is seeking damages from the federal Crown. He alleges that two Crown employees caused him various forms of injury by criticizing him for pursuing certain remedies and by discouraging another inmate from associating with him for that reason. I dismiss Mr. Timm's action. Indeed, with one exception, I find that the Crown employees' conduct did not constitute a fault. Moreover, I find that Mr. Timm failed to prove the alleged injury and the causal link between that injury and the faults that may have been committed. Lastly, Mr. Timm failed to demonstrate interference with his fundamental rights. Therefore, he cannot claim punitive damages.

[2] In making these findings, I am not denying that it is important for every person, including incarcerated persons, to be able to pursue the various types of statutory remedies without retaliation or interference by Crown officials. I find that there is evidence of such a conduct on one specific occasion. However, Mr. Timm has not shown that the improper conduct caused him any injury.

I. Factual background

[3] The plaintiff, Richard Timm, is an inmate serving a life sentence. In 1995, he was convicted of first degree murder and other offences. Since that time, he has maintained that he did not commit the crime for which he was convicted. The Minister of Justice dismissed his application for mercy. That decision was upheld by this Court and by the Federal Court of Appeal (Timm v Canada (Attorney General), 2012 FC 505; 2012 FCA 282).

[4] Over a number of years, Mr. Timm has filed numerous complaints and grievances regarding various aspects of his conditions of detention. He has also commenced a number of proceedings in the Federal Court.

[5] In 2012, when the incidents giving rise to this action took place, Mr. Timm was incarcerated in La Macaza Institution, a medium-security facility. On September 14, 2012, his parole officer [PO], Valery Beaulieu-Guilbault, told him that she found it difficult to establish a relationship of trust with him, given the numerous complaints he was filing against the institution's staff members. On January 11, 2013, Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault had a meeting with Dave Roy, another inmate under her supervision, and noticed that his temporary absence request had clearly been prepared by another inmate, most likely Mr. Timm. Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault told Mr. Roy that his request had been prepared by another inmate whom she described as [TRANSLATION] "very litigious". She advised him to be careful about the company he kept, because that inmate [TRANSLATION] "[would] only hinder him". Shortly after, Yves Maillé, Mr. Roy's Aboriginal liaison officer, advised Mr. Roy not to associate with Mr. Timm.

[6] In response to these events, Mr. Timm filed a grievance disputing the way in which he had been treated by Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé. In the grievance, he requested that the Correctional Service of Canada [CSC] acknowledge that Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé had breached a number of provisions in Commissioner's Directives [CDs] 060 and 081. At the time, the grievance process under CD 081 consisted of three levels. At the first level, the acting warden of La Macaza Institution, Yves Guimont, denied the grievance. At the second level, CSC's regional deputy commissioner for Quebec, Réjean Tremblay, also rejected the grievance. At the third level, however, CSC's senior deputy commissioner, Anne Kelly, allowed Mr. Timm's grievance. The specific rationale for allowing the grievance will be examined in detail below.

[7] Shortly after receiving the third-level decision, Mr. Timm brought this action based on extracontractual liability against the federal Crown. He maintains that the actions of Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé have caused him injury. In his statement, he also complains about the actions of Mr. Guimont, Mr. Tremblay and Ms. Kelly. At the hearing, however, counsel for Mr. Timm stated that Mr. Timm was not basing his claim on the faults that these three individuals allegedly committed. Therefore, these reasons will relate to the actions of Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé. Mr. Timm is claiming $400,000 in compensatory damages for [TRANSLATION] "moral damages and damage to reputation", and $800,000 in punitive damages. He is also seeking declarations by the Court that various statutory or regulatory provisions have been breached.

II. Legal framework

[8] Mr. Timm bases his action on the provisions of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, RSC, 1985, c C-50 [the CLPA]. Under section 3 of the CLPA, the Crown is civilly liable for faults committed by "servant[s] of the Crown", that is, its employees. This means that, with respect to extracontractual liability, the Crown is subject to the private law of the province in which the events occurred. Since the events in this case occurred entirely in Quebec, the basic principles are set out in article 1457 of the Civil Code of Québec, SQ 1991, c 64:

1457. Every person has a duty to abide by the rules of conduct incumbent on him, according to the circumstances, usage or law, so as not to cause injury to another.	1457. Toute personne a le devoir de respecter les règles de conduite qui, suivant les circonstances, les usages ou la loi, s'imposent à elle, de manière à ne pas causer de préjudice à autrui.
Where he is endowed with reason and fails in this duty, he is liable for any injury he causes to another by such fault and is bound to make reparation for the injury, whether it be bodily, moral or material in nature.	Elle est, lorsqu'elle est douée de raison et qu'elle manque à ce devoir, responsable du préjudice qu'elle cause par cette faute à autrui et tenue de réparer ce préjudice, qu'il soit corporel, moral ou matériel.
He is also bound, in certain cases, to make reparation for injury caused to another by the act, omission or fault of another person or by the act of things in his custody.	Elle est aussi tenue, en certains cas, de réparer le préjudice causé à autrui par le fait ou la faute d'une autre personne ou par le fait des biens qu'elle a sous sa garde.

[9] It should be emphasized that, under the CLPA, the federal Crown cannot be held directly liable for its own actions; it is liable only in respect of the fault of its employees (Merchant Law Group v Canada Revenue Agency, 2010 FCA 184 at paragraphs 36–38; Hinse v Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 35 at paragraph 92, [2015] 2 SCR 621 [Hinse]). One cannot merely allege that a fault was committed by the "government" as an institution unless the fault was also that of a specific employee.

[10] In Quebec, the reference to private law in section 3 of the CLPA includes not only the Civil Code but also certain provisions of the Charter of human rights and freedoms, CQLR, c C-12 [the Quebec Charter] (Hinse at paragraphs 156–163). Consequently, when events giving rise to liability also constitute interference with a right guaranteed by the Quebec Charter, it is possible to claim punitive damages (sometimes called exemplary damages) under section 49, paragraph 2, of the Quebec Charter. According to de Montigny v Brossard (Succession), 2010 SCC 51, [2010] 3 SCR 64 [de Montigny], the purpose of punitive damages is not to compensate for the injury, but rather to punish a person who interferes with a right, to deter similar interference and to publicly denounce the impugned conduct. The amount of such damages must be determined taking into account the factors listed in article 1621 of the Civil Code, namely the gravity of the fault, the debtor's patrimonial situation, the amount of compensatory damages and whether the debtor is insured.

[11] Procedurally, it is important to note that the scope of the debate before me is framed by the allegations contained in the pleadings—the statement of claim or statement of defence—filed by the parties. There is a reason for the requirement, found in rule 174 of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106, that pleadings contain "a concise statement of the material facts on which the party relies". This enables the opposing party to conduct its own verification of the facts and to bring evidence and make legal submissions to refute the other party's allegations. This prevents surprises and ensures that the trial is conducted fairly and properly. Pleadings are used to determine the scope of pre-trial proceedings, such as examinations for discovery, as well as what can be proven at trial. Of course, pleadings must be interpreted generously, but not in such a way as to allow an endless investigation into the dealings between the parties.

[12] In his pleadings, Mr. Timm identified precise and time-specific events that, he alleges, constitute a fault against him. This judgment deals with those allegations. At trial, Mr. Timm referred to various other sources of dissatisfaction with his conditions of detention. However, these events are not alleged in the pleadings. This proceeding is therefore not the appropriate time to consider every detail of Mr. Timm's time at La Macaza Institution.

III. Fault

[13] The concept of fault is the cornerstone of extracontractual liability in civil law. Article 1457 of the Code defines fault as a failure to abide by "the rules of conduct incumbent on [every person], according to the circumstances, usage or law". Thus, the first step in the analysis is to define the appropriate standard of conduct. Second, the evidence must be analyzed to determine whether that standard has been violated.

[14] The standard of conduct may be based on circumstances or usage. In some types of situations that are frequently brought before the courts, such as damage to reputation, case law helps to define the appropriate standard of conduct. In other cases, it is up to the judge to determine a posteriori what a reasonable person would have done in the circumstances.

[15] The standard of conduct may also be based on legislation or regulations made under a statute. As will be seen below, however, not all statutes or regulations give rise to civil liability when they are breached.

A. Standard of conduct

[16] In his pleadings, Mr. Timm alleges various types of fault. Many of his criticisms of CSC employees stem from the alleged violation of certain internal CSC rules. I must therefore identify the conditions under which the violation of a statutory norm gives rise to civil liability. Moreover, Mr. Timm bases his claims on the decision at the third level of the review of his grievance. I must therefore clarify the authority of such a decision with respect to this case. Once I have examined these preliminary issues, I will be able to describe the various standards of conduct at issue in this case.

(1) Relationship between violation of legislation and civil fault

[17] Despite the reference to "law" in the first paragraph of article 1457 of the Civil Code, there is general agreement that not every breach of a statute or regulation constitutes civil fault. For example, in Morin v Blais, 1975 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1977] 1 SCR 570, the Supreme Court stated that the violation of a regulatory standard could constitute a fault if that standard also expressed an elementary standard of care. More recently, the Supreme Court stated in St. Lawrence Cement Inc. v Barrette, 2008 SCC 64 at paragraphs 34 and 36, [2008] 3 SCR 392:

> In Quebec civil law, the violation of a legislative standard does not in itself constitute civil fault . . . . For that, an offence provided for in legislation must also constitute a violation of the standard of conduct of a reasonable person under the general rules of civil liability set out in art. 1457 C.C.Q. . . .
>
> As a result, the content of a legislative standard may influence the assessment of the duty of prudence and diligence that applies in a given context. In a civil liability action, it will be up to the judge to determine the applicable standard of conduct—the content of which may be reflected in the relevant legislative standards—having regard to the law, usage and circumstances.

(2) Relevance of grievance decisions

[18] The events giving rise to an extracontractual liability action may have been considered in other decision-making processes. If so, it is necessary to determine the authority of decisions rendered in such processes over a civil trial.

[19] The decisions rendered in such processes are not binding on a judge who rules on an extracontractual liability action. This is because the conditions for the recognition of res judicata, provided for in article 2848 of the Civil Code, are not fulfilled (La Foncière, compagnie d'assurance de France v Perras, 1943 CanLII 42 (SCC), [1943] SCR 165). For a matter to be considered to be res judicata, the parties, cause and object must be identical. For example, in a professional discipline decision, the cause is a breach of a code of discipline and the object is a regulatory penalty, which is very different from an extracontractual liability action arising from civil fault and seeking reparation for injury.

[20] Nevertheless, it is recognized that a criminal or disciplinary decision may have de facto authority over a civil trial (Ali c Compagnie d'assurance Guardian du Canada, 1999 CanLII 13177 (QC CA), [1999] RRA 427 (CA); Audet c Transamerica Life Canada, 2012 QCCA 1746 at paragraphs 44–46). This means that a criminal or disciplinary decision is a relevant fact that may be put into evidence in a civil trial. The decision may be a convincing indication that the facts that it finds did in fact occur, even if the legal conclusions it draws may not be applicable to the issue of whether there was civil fault.

[21] In this case, the grievance process under the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, SC 1992, c 20 [the CCRA], does not aim at awarding damages for injury. It is not based on the concept of civil fault. In fact, it appears that the main purpose of this process is to enforce the internal rules of the penitentiary system (see May v Ferndale Institution, 2005 SCC 82 at paragraph 63, [2005] 3 SCR 809). Grievance decisions therefore do not have the force of res judicata in this case; they have only de facto authority.

[22] Having made these clarifications, I can now turn to the main standards of conduct that may be relevant. I will divide them into two main categories, namely standards governing the conduct of a public body with respect to the exercise of legal or other remedies, and standards prohibiting harassment and discrimination.

(3) Prohibition against interfering with the pursuit of a legal remedy and prohibition against retaliation

[23] The right to an effective remedy is an essential component of the rule of law. It is pointless to recognize the rights of individuals if they cannot exercise those rights. There is a growing awareness of the practical difficulties that Canadians face when seeking to have their legal disputes determined by the courts and of the significant resources they must devote to this end (see, for example, Hryniak v Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7 at paragraphs 23–33, [2014] 1 SCR 87). Nevertheless, the issue here is more specific, namely imposing hurdles or constraints on the pursuit of a remedy, in particular through retaliation.

[24] One of the best-known decisions on this issue is Golder v the United Kingdom, a decision made by the European Court of Human Rights on February 21, 1975. Mr. Golder, an inmate, sought to bring a civil suit against a prison guard who had allegedly made a false statement about him. However, the British prison authorities denied Mr. Golder permission to contact a lawyer. On the basis of Article 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the Court held that everyone has a right of access to the courts and that the British prison authorities had violated this right by denying Mr. Golder the right to consult a lawyer, thereby significantly interfering with his pursuit of a remedy.

[25] The Supreme Court of Canada applied the same principle in BCGEU v British Columbia (Attorney General), 1988 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1988] 2 SCR 214. The Court confirmed an injunction to prevent picketing outside British Columbia's courthouses. Citing Golder, Chief Justice Dickson linked the prohibition against interfering with the pursuit of legal remedies to the principle of the rule of law, stating the following at page 230:

> There cannot be a rule of law without access, otherwise the rule of law is replaced by a rule of men and women who decide who shall and who shall not have access to justice.

[26] The Supreme Court reiterated these principles in a more recent decision, Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v British Columbia (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 59 at paragraphs 32 and 38–40, [2014] 3 SCR 31.

[27] A concrete example of interference with the pursuit of a legal remedy that has been found to be contrary to the rule of law is provided by Compagnie de construction et de développement cris ltée v Société de développement de la Baie James, 2001 CanLII 20643 (QC CA), [2001] RJQ 1726 (CA). In that case, a municipality had included in the terms and conditions of its calls for tenders a clause that excluded from the bidding process any company that had filed a lawsuit against the municipality. The Court of Appeal found that such a clause was contrary to public order and the rule of law, since it imposed a disadvantage on persons who had exercised their right to pursue a legal remedy.

[28] To ensure the right to effectively pursue a remedy, it is also necessary to prohibit retaliation. Although this is undoubtedly a general principle, there are several statutory provisions that specifically prohibit retaliation against persons exercising certain rights or remedies (see, for example, section 14.1 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, RSC 1985, c H-6; section 147 of the Canada Labour Code, RSC 1985, c L-2; section 19 of the Public Servants Disclosure Protection Act, SC 2005, c 46; section 425.1 of the Criminal Code, RSC 1985, c C-46; and section 10 of the Canadian Victims Bill of Rights, SC 2015, c 13). In this case, the relevant provision is section 91 of the CCRA, which reads as follows:

91. Every offender shall have complete access to the offende r grievance procedure without negative consequences.	91. Tout délinquant doit, sans crainte de représailles, avoir li bre accès à la procédure de règ lement des griefs.

[29] How this process works is described in detail in CD 081—Offender Complaints and Grievances. (This directive has since been amended; I am quoting the provisions in force when the events took place.) Section 10(a) of this directive reiterates that retaliation ("negative consequences") is prohibited.

[30] In addition, section 54 of CD 081 states that the grievance process is confidential and that:

An offender's use of the comp laint and grievance process ma y not be mentioned in records outside the complaint and grie vance process without the auth orization of the Institutional H ead.	Le fait qu'un délinquant a eu r ecours au processus de règlem ent des plaintes et griefs ne pe ut être mentionné dans d'autre s dossiers que ceux qui concer nent ce processus sans l'autori sation du directeur de l'établis sement.

[31] Although most of the cases cited above dealt with applications to overturn government decisions, interfering with the pursuit of a remedy may also, depending on the circumstances, constitute a civil fault for which reparation may be sought if the fault has caused injury. Indeed, in the case of retaliation, several of the statutes above specifically provide for reparation to the victim.

(4) Prohibition against harassment and discrimination

[32] In his pleadings, Mr. Timm strongly emphasizes breaches of certain provisions of CSC's internal rules. More specifically, he refers to the prohibition against discrimination and harassment in the Commissioner's Directive No. 60 [CD 060]—Code of Discipline. For example, section 12 of the Code states that an employee has committed an infraction if he or she "maltreats, humiliates, harasses, discriminates and/or is abusive, by word or action, to an offender". Mr. Timm also refers to the following definitions in the appendix to the Code:

Discrimination: when the grievor believes that CSC staff actions, language or decisions were made in a discriminatory manner based on gender, race ethnicity, language, sexual orientation, religion, age, marital status, or a physical or mental disability. The category includes staff behaviour that constitutes a violation of the offender's human rights or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.	Discrimination : des actes, des paroles ou des décisions du personnel du SCC qui incitent le délinquant à s'estimer victime de discrimination fondée sur le sexe, la race, l'ethnie, la langue, l'orientation sexuelle, la religion, l'âge, l'état civil ou une déficience mentale ou physique. Sont inclus les comportements du personnel qui enfreignent les droits de la personne ou de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés.
Harassment: any improper conduct by one or more employees, offenders, visitors or volunteers, that is directed at and offensive to another person, and that the individual knew or ought reasonably to have known to cause offence or harm. It comprises any objectionable act, comment or display that demeans, belittles, or causes personal humiliation or embarrassment, and any act of intimidation or threat. It includes harassment within the meaning of the Canadian Human Rights Act.	Harcèlement : tout comportement inapproprié de la part d'un ou de plusieurs employés, délinquants, visiteurs ou bénévoles à l'égard d'une autre personne, et dont l'auteur ou les auteurs savaient ou auraient raisonnablement dû savoir qu'il serait offensant ou préjudiciable. Le harcèlement comprend tout acte, propos ou exhibition répréhensible qui diminue, rabaisse, humilie ou embarrasse une personne, ou tout acte d'intimidation ou de menace. Il comprend également le harcèlement au sens de la Loi canadienne sur les droits de la personne.

[33] Harassment and discrimination may also constitute a civil fault giving rise to an obligation to make reparation for the injury caused (regarding harassment, see Syndicat des employées et employés de métiers d'Hydro-Québec, section locale 1500 (SCFP-FTQ) c Fontaine, 2006 QCCA 1642, [2007] RJQ 5; regarding discrimination, see de Montigny at paragraph 44). In this case, however, I must rely on the definitions of these concepts that have been adopted by the civil courts and not on the definitions in the internal CSC rules.

[34] With regard to harassment, I refer to the following definition proposed by Judge Christian Brunelle of the Court of Québec in Bélanger c Hydro-Québec, 2016 QCCQ 15565, at paragraphs 64 and 65:

> [TRANSLATION]
>
> In general, harassment occurs when there are unwanted, vexatious acts whose effects are ongoing, either because the acts are being repeated or because there are serious harmful effects on the person being harassed.
>
> To describe a situation as harassment, one must assess [TRANSLATION] "all the circumstances of the case before the Court". Indeed, there are differences—of nature and degree—between harassing acts and acts that are simply [TRANSLATION] "annoying" or [TRANSLATION] "bothersome". [References omitted.]

[35] With regard to discrimination, the conduct complained of must involve a distinction related to one of the grounds set out in section 10 of the Quebec Charter, for example colour, age or sex. In the absence of such a distinction, there can be no discrimination (Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse) v Bombardier Inc. (Bombardier Aerospace Training Center), 2015 SCC 39 at paragraph 52, [2015] 2 SCR 789).

B. Evidence of fault

[36] In his statement, Mr. Timm complains about two separate events, namely the discussion between him and Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault on September 14, 2012, in which she criticized him for filing complaints against the staff, and the discussions on January 11, 2013, in which Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé advised Mr. Roy to stop associating with Mr. Timm. The circumstances of the first event are not subject to significant debate; however, the parties disagree on the second event. I must therefore analyze the evidence in detail to determine what in fact took place.

[37] Having established the facts, I will then be able to characterize them legally and determine whether a fault has been committed. I will state my findings at the outset: Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé committed a fault with respect to the second event only, by trying to discourage Mr. Roy from pursuing certain remedies; however, Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault's conduct in the first event was not a fault, and there was no harassment and no discrimination.

(1) Facts

[38] It is not disputed that, on September 14, 2012, Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault had a meeting with Mr. Timm and made the comments recorded in the Offender Management System [OMS]:

> [TRANSLATION]
>
> . . . we spoke at length about his resistant attitude towards authority and CSC. We talked about the complaints he has been filing and the consequences of that for him. . . . I told him that I am finding it difficult to reach him and that it is hard to trust him because of the many complaints he has been making against the staff.

[39] However, the accounts of the events on January 11, 2013, are divergent. It is therefore necessary to examine the evidence in detail on this matter.

(a) Mr. Roy's affidavit

[40] Mr. Timm did not personally witness the actions he alleges. These acts were revealed to him by another inmate, Mr. Roy, who agreed to sign an affidavit relating these facts.

[41] This affidavit was initially prepared in support of Mr. Timm's grievance. However, the defendant objects to its admission into evidence in these proceedings, because Mr. Roy did not testify at trial.

[42] Under rule 285 of the Federal Courts Rules, I may order that a specific fact be proven by affidavit. I am of the opinion that this discretionary power should be exercised and I order that Mr. Roy's affidavit be admitted into evidence. This affidavit was brought to the attention of the defendant in 2013, as part of the grievance process. There is no indication that the defendant has challenged the content of this affidavit or attempted to prove otherwise. Decisions at all three levels of the grievance process were based, at least implicitly, on the premise that the events described by Mr. Roy had actually taken place. In addition, because Mr. Roy has since been released, Mr. Timm has not been able to locate him.

[43] In the affidavit, Mr. Roy states that he asked Mr. Timm for help in preparing a request for an escorted temporary absence [ETA]. He submitted this written request to his PO, Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault. The following is his account of what then happened:

> [TRANSLATION]
>
> The following week, PO Valery Beaulieu Guilbault called me to her office to tell me that she had read my ETA request and was convinced that it had been written not by me but rather by Richard Timm, because she recognized his writing style.
>
> . . .
>
> PO Valery Beaulieu Guilbault then said not to associate with Richard Timm, because he was bad company, since he was a litigious person who had filed complaints against employees and since associating with him would only hinder my progress.
>
> On the same afternoon, Aboriginal liaison officer [ALO] Yves Maillé had a meeting with me to tell me that, further to a call from PO Valery Beaulieu Guilbault, he had to tell me to stop associating with Richard Timm, because he was bad company and was not well liked by the staff, since he had filed complaints against certain employees, and because it could hinder my reintegration in society.

[44] At first glance, these statements constitute evidence that, when Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault discovered that Mr. Timm had helped Mr. Roy with a request, she and Mr. Maillé immediately intervened to discourage Mr. Roy from associating with Mr. Timm and asking for more help.

(b) Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault's testimony

[45] Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault testified at trial. I found her to be generally honest and professional. However, she occasionally sought to interpret the facts to her advantage.

[46] Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault confirmed the accuracy of the note she entered in Mr. Roy's record in the OMS on January 11, 2013:

> [TRANSLATION]
>
> In addition, I noticed that the request was written not by him but by another very litigious inmate. I immediately told him that he should be careful about the company he kept and that this inmate would only hinder him. He said that he was able to form his own opinion about the other inmates and that he would not let another inmate hinder his progress. However, I urged him to be careful.

[47] She stated that, during this discussion with Mr. Roy, she did not mention Mr. Timm's name. However, she admitted that, at that time, she was certain it was Mr. Timm who had written Mr. Roy's ETA request, because only Mr. Timm had access to a computer and only Mr. Timm submitted typed documents. Even if I give her the benefit of the doubt in this regard, for her warning to make sense, she had to make it clear to Mr. Roy that she was referring to Mr. Timm, even if she did not say his name. Moreover, she wrote that associating with "this inmate" would hinder him. It is difficult to understand how this message could be conveyed without it being clear to Mr. Roy that she was talking about Mr. Timm. In fact, according to Mr. Roy's affidavit, that is how he understood the conversation. In this regard, it does not matter that Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault testified that there were other litigious inmates at La Macaza.

[48] I must also say that I was not convinced by her attempt to downplay the derogatory nature of the word [TRANSLATION] "litigious." Even though, as she points out, the dictionary defines a litigious person as one who always uses the law to assert their point of view, it is obvious that she does not see this in a positive light, especially since she uses the adverb [TRANSLATION] "very" before the adjective [TRANSLATION] "litigious" and concludes that the litigious person in question is bad company.

[49] Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault also acknowledged that she definitely told Mr. Maillé about this incident, probably at a meeting of Mr. Roy's case management team [CMT], although she could not say exactly when. She further stated that the workers did not keep secrets and that it was normal for one worker to talk to another about an inmate's interactions. She did not recall taking the initiative to contact Mr. Maillé on January 11, 2013, but she did not deny it.

[50] Finally, Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault stated that the entire staff of La Macaza Institution knew that Mr. Timm made frequent use of the complaints and grievance process.

(c) Mr. Maillé's testimony

[51] At trial, Mr. Maillé said that he remembered Mr. Roy, because Mr. Roy was involved in the activities for Indigenous inmates that he organized or facilitated. In those days, he could be interacting with Mr. Roy between 15 and 30 minutes a day.

[52] When asked about the matter, Mr. Maillé said he did not remember receiving a call from Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault regarding the relationship between Mr. Roy and Mr. Timm. He also does not remember advising Mr. Roy not to associate with Mr. Timm. This memory lapse seems implausible to me. One must not forget that these events were the subject of a grievance in the weeks that followed and of this action a few months later. It is unlikely that Mr. Maillé did not discuss this matter with the institution's management and then with the Crown attorneys. In other words, Mr. Maillé surely had several opportunities to refresh his memory shortly after the events took place.

(d) The grievance decision

[53] Mr. Timm filed a grievance regarding the facts underlying this action. This grievance was decided at all three levels. A review of these decisions shows that the facts alleged by Mr. Timm, including the discussions between Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault, Mr. Maillé and Mr. Roy, are not in question. To that extent, I am prepared to give some de facto authority to these decisions.

[54] The decision at the first level, signed by the warden of the institution, contains the following paragraph:

> [TRANSLATION]
>
> We are of the opinion that the two employees [Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé], more particularly the PO (because the grievance focuses more on her), did not harass you, based on the definition in CD 081 mentioned above. However, the casework records attached to the grievance may raise some questions. Nevertheless, we conclude that Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault acted openly with the intention of helping you, and the other inmate involved, in your respective paths.

[55] If the warden concludes that Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault acted to assist Mr. Timm and Mr. Roy, it is because he necessarily admits that she made comments to discourage Mr. Roy from associating with Mr. Timm and obtaining his help in writing requests.

[56] The decision at the second level, signed by CSC's regional deputy commissioner, contains the following paragraphs:

> [TRANSLATION]
>
> On 2013-02-13, the inmate you mentioned completed an affidavit, sworn in by a commissioner for oaths. It states that the ALO [Mr. Maillé] intervened and suggested that he no longer associate with you since this would only hinder his personal progress under paragraph 6a of CD 710-1.
> The ALO has to communicate with the PO and the CMT to provide input on the intervention strategy in relation to your correctional plan, in accordance with paragraphs 6c and 6e of CD 710-1.

[57] In these passages, however, the regional deputy commissioner assumes that there were in fact conversations between Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé. He seeks to justify their actions rather than deny that they took place. Far from contradicting the content of Mr. Roy's affidavit, this decision makes sense only if one concludes that Mr. Roy was telling the truth.

[58] The decision at the third level does not contain any additional information on this matter.

(e) Conclusion on facts

[59] From all of this evidence, I conclude that the events did indeed unfold as Mr. Roy describes in his affidavit.

[60] At the hearing, the Crown attorney tried to argue that Mr. Timm's testimony regarding Mr. Roy's visit on January 11, 2013, was implausible, because the time at which Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault entered her note on the conversation in the OMS is the time that Mr. Maillé would have finished his shift. Mr. Roy would therefore not have had time to visit Mr. Timm between the meetings with Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé. This argument assumes that the OMS entry was made at the exact time of the conversation and that Mr. Maillé remembers exactly what time he left work that day. I believe that this is speculation and that it does not support the inference that the Crown attorney urges me to draw, namely that the events described by Mr. Roy in his affidavit did not take place.

(2) Legal characterization of facts

(a) Retaliation and interference with pursuit of remedy

[61] The first event must be placed in context: it is a regular meeting between an inmate and his parole officer. It is normal in such a meeting to have a frank conversation on the various elements of the correctional plan and the factors that are hindering the inmate's progress. Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault was entitled to point out the lack of a relationship of trust between Mr. Timm and his CMT and to identify Mr. Timm's [TRANSLATION] "many complaints" as one of the barriers to establishing such a relationship, along with Mr. Timm's [TRANSLATION] "resistant attitude". In doing so, Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault was not retaliating: she was not attempting to impose negative consequences on Mr. Timm for pursuing a remedy. She was also not attempting to hinder the pursuit of remedies in the future.

[62] I would add that the fact that Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault referred to Mr. Timm's complaints in the OMS does not, in my opinion, constitute a civil fault. Although this entry violates CD 081, violating a regulatory standard does not necessarily constitute a civil fault. In this case, this violation was neither a form of retaliation nor an attempt to interfere with the pursuit of a remedy.

[63] However, in acting as they did in the second event, Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé committed a fault. They wanted to isolate Mr. Timm for having helped Mr. Roy write a request. This is retaliation for collaborating with another inmate in the pursuit of a remedy and, more generally, for having pursued multiple remedies in the past. In addition, the obvious goal was to discourage Mr. Roy and possibly other inmates from making more requests in the future with the help of Mr. Timm. In this sense, Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé sought to interfere with the exercise of the rights or remedies of these other inmates. The fact that their actions failed does not excuse their conduct, but remains relevant to the existence of injury, as discussed below.

(b) Harassment and discrimination

[64] To begin with, the evidence does not reveal any act of discrimination by Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault or Mr. Maillé. Indeed, they did not act on any prohibited ground of discrimination set out in section 10 of the Quebec Charter. Pursuing a remedy or filing a grievance, even repeatedly, is unrelated to these prohibited grounds of discrimination.

[65] For that reason alone, I am also of the opinion that the acts that Mr. Timm describes as harassment do not constitute a civil fault. Even if their purpose was to discourage the pursuit of remedies, the actions taken by Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé, according to the admissible evidence, did not constitute repeated or especially serious vexatious acts.

[66] As I mentioned above, the first event must be considered in the context of the relationship between officers and inmates in a penitentiary. Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault was simply trying to paint a realistic picture of Mr. Timm's situation to allow him to make progress towards achieving the objectives of his correctional plan. To make an analogy with workplaces, it is well established that the exercise of an employer's management rights, however unpleasant, does not constitute harassment (Bernard Cliche et al., Le harcèlement et les lésions psychologiques, 2nd ed., Cowansville, Que., Yvon Blais, 2012 at pages 197–198).

[67] Moreover, regarding the second event, the evidence shows that Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé were not so much seeking to offend or humiliate Mr. Timm, whom they did not see that day, as to discourage other inmates from seeking Mr. Timm's assistance in preparing a request or pursuing a remedy. Judge Brunelle's remarks in Bélanger, at paragraph 68, may apply to Mr. Timm's situation: [TRANSLATION] "However 'irritating' or 'annoying' it may be, this practice does not seem serious enough to constitute harassment amounting to civil fault."

[68] Mr. Timm also refers to the third-level decision on his grievance. He submits that it upholds his grievance in its entirety and that the deputy commissioner has therefore acknowledged that he was a victim of harassment.

[69] In this regard, it is useful to recall that the grievance decision can only have de facto authority. The concept of harassment in CD 060 is not necessarily defined in the same way as harassment that constitutes civil fault. As well, the grievance process is not intended to compensate the grievor. The decision therefore does not have the authority of res judicata.

[70] Moreover, from a factual standpoint, this decision does not conclude that harassment occurred. To fully understand this, one particular feature of the grievance process must be emphasized, namely the two-step process for handling harassment complaints. In the first step, the first-level authority must determine whether the facts alleged by the complainant, if they are assumed to be true, constitute harassment. Only if this initial question can be answered affirmatively should the decision-maker move to the second step and proceed to an inquiry to establish the facts.

[71] In this case, however, the warden concluded that the acts alleged by Mr. Timm, although they had occurred, did not constitute harassment. He therefore felt no need to proceed to the second step of the harassment process. At the second level, the regional deputy commissioner took the same approach:

> [TRANSLATION]
>
> Upon reading your allegations, I am able to conclude that the situations mentioned do not meet the definition of harassment . . . .

[72] At the third level, the senior deputy commissioner took a different approach. She states the following:

> [TRANSLATION]
>
> Despite the results of the first-level investigation, the conduct of your PO and ALO, were it proven [emphasis added], would meet the definition of harassment. However, the warden's investigation determined that the PO and ALO had not engaged in any conduct that was harmful to you. Indeed, at a meeting with the PO, it was determined that she had acted with the intention of helping you.
> [Emphasis in the original]

[73] Consequently, she deemed it necessary to proceed to the second step of the process. However, she noted that an examination of the facts that actually occurred did not support a finding of harassment. In other words, the senior deputy commissioner took a different path to reach the same result, the denial of the grievance with respect to harassment. Therefore, the grievance was allowed not because of harassment, but for another reason.

[74] In my opinion, the grievance was upheld at the third level only because the senior deputy commissioner found that the first-level process had not allowed Mr. Timm to present his arguments with respect to the entries in the OMS regarding complaints he had filed against staff members. The warden had noted that these entries might raise [TRANSLATION] "some questions", but had asked Mr. Timm to present a new grievance on the issue. At the third level, the deputy commissioner found that the grievance had [TRANSLATION] "not been dealt with in accordance with the provisions of CD 081 and GL 081-1".

[75] My understanding is that the only reason the grievance was upheld at the third level is that, at the two previous levels, Mr. Timm's allegations regarding the references to his complaints in the OMS had not been taken into consideration. This also explains why the only corrective measures imposed by the senior deputy commissioner are a reminder to staff members that they may not refer to the use of the complaint and grievance process in an inmate's record and the amendment of Mr. Timm's record to remove the references in question.

[76] I agree that the decision at the third level is not written in a way that makes it easy to understand. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court encourages us to read administrative decisions from a broad perspective and not to focus on flaws or deficiencies in drafting: Newfoundland and Labrador Nurses' Union v Newfoundland and Labrador (Treasury Board), 2011 SCC 62, [2011] 3 SCR 708. Mr. Timm claims that, since his grievance was not upheld [TRANSLATION] "in part", it was necessarily upheld [TRANSLATION] "in full". I disagree. A reading of the decision as a whole clearly shows that the allegations of harassment were not upheld and that the senior deputy commissioner agreed with Mr. Timm only on the issue of the casework record entries. There is therefore nothing in this decision to support an allegation of civil fault.

IV. Injury and causal link

[77] A finding of fault is not sufficient to establish extracontractual liability. The fault must also have caused injury. In his pleadings and at trial, Mr. Timm referred to various types of injury. I will assess whether Mr. Timm has proven this injury and whether he has shown that it was caused by the fault of Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé.

A. Interference with pursuit of remedy

[78] I should begin by noting that, although the fault I found may be described as discouraging the use of grievance procedures or other remedies, there is no evidence that this fault has had any consequence whatsoever.

[79] Indeed, Mr. Roy told Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault that he would form his own opinion about his relationship with Mr. Timm. There is no evidence that Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault's intervention discouraged Mr. Roy or anyone else from pursuing a remedy, with or without Mr. Timm's assistance. In any event, such injury would have been suffered by Mr. Roy (or another inmate), and Mr. Timm would not have the required standing to claim damages to compensate for that injury.

[80] During his testimony, Mr. Timm did not in any way claim to have been prevented from pursuing any remedy whatsoever. In fact, the evidence shows that he subsequently commenced a variety of recourses.

B. Damage to reputation

[81] In Bou Malhab v Diffusion Métromédia CMR inc, 2011 SCC 9, [2011] 1 SCR 214, Justice Marie Deschamps of the Supreme Court of Canada describes, at paragraphs 27 and 28, what constitutes damage to reputation in the context of an extracontractual liability action:

> A person is defamed where the image reflected back to the person by one or more other people is inferior not only to the person's self-image but above all to the image the person projected to "others" in the normal course of social interaction. . . .
> Therefore, the fact that a person alleging defamation feels humiliated, sad or frustrated is not a sufficient basis for an action in defamation. In such an action, injury is examined at a second level focussed not on the actual victim but on the perceptions of other people. Injury exists where "an ordinary person . . . believe[s] that the remarks made, when viewed as a whole, brought discredit on the reputation" of the victim.

[82] Mr. Timm argues that, in a prison context, the remarks made by Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé were extremely damaging, since, out of fear of authority, other prisoners would be strongly encouraged to avoid him and could even resort to physical violence towards him.

[83] These assertions are not supported by the evidence. Mr. Roy, the main recipient of the impugned remarks, did not stop associating with Mr. Timm. On the contrary, he even helped to prepare Mr. Timm's grievance by filing an affidavit.

[84] During his testimony, Mr. Timm alleged that, as a result of the events, some inmates avoided him. He did not say who the inmates were and did not give any further details. He also alleged that some staff members made comments, but did not provide further details. A finding of injury cannot be made on the basis of such vague statements.

[85] Mr. Timm states that at least three other inmates were present when Mr. Maillé told Mr. Roy to stop associating with him. The three inmates allegedly heard Mr. Maillé's remarks and went to see Mr. Timm to tell him what had happened. It was only at trial that Mr. Timm gave the names of these three inmates. He stated that he did not want to do so at discovery, for fear of hindering the progress of these inmates or, worse, for fear of retaliation. In any event, Mr. Timm's testimony in this regard is hearsay that is inadmissible in evidence. The other three inmates did not testify or provide an affidavit. In his affidavit, Mr. Roy does not mention the presence of the other three inmates. In any event, Mr. Timm did not claim that the three inmates stopped associating with him.

[86] Finally, there is no evidence that a fellow inmate used violence against Mr. Timm as a result of the events or for any other reason.

[87] Mr. Timm also testified about his reputation at La Macaza Institution. He claims that his nickname was [TRANSLATION] "the Citizen" and that he was known for not being associated with organized crime or contraband within the institution. Nothing in the evidence suggests that that perception has changed as a result of the interventions of Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé.

C. Negative effect on certain decisions

[88] At trial, Mr. Timm reported a number of events that occurred after the discussions on September 14, 2012, and January 11, 2013, that are central to his action. Although these subsequent events were not alleged in his statement, he asserted that they were consequences of the faults committed by Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé. This approach does not allow for a fair debate on these issues. Indeed, it deprives the Crown of the opportunity to investigate and bring evidence to refute Mr. Timm's allegations. In addition, the situations referred to by Mr. Timm would constitute separate faults and not injury caused by the conduct alleged in the statement of claim. This makes the attempt to broaden the debate to include facts that were not alleged in the pleadings even more problematic. Nevertheless, I shall say a few words about the main situations referred to by Mr. Timm.

[89] First, Mr. Timm states that the faults committed against him resulted in the denial of his ETA request and his request for a security classification decrease. More generally, Mr. Timm claims that he is still in prison because of the [TRANSLATION] "poor management of his case".

[90] Although, at the meeting on September 14, 2012, Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault told Mr. Timm that she would not support an ETA request, he nevertheless submitted one, and it was denied a few weeks later. The denial predates the events of January 11, 2013, which are the only events I consider to be faults. These events cannot be the cause of the ETA denial.

[91] It also appears that, in fall 2012, Mr. Timm requested that his security classification be decreased. His March 2013 correctional plan shows that the request was denied on November 14, 2012. Again, this decision predates the events of January 11, 2013.

[92] The correctional plan and the assessment for the ETA decision include detailed reasons. Mr. Timm's lack of commitment, lack of progress and resistant attitude are the main reasons given in support of the denials. There is no evidence to suggest that these grounds are unreasonable or flawed or that prison authorities acted on the basis of irrelevant factors. In any event, were that the case, these decisions would constitute separate faults, which are not alleged in the declaration, rather than injury.

D. Move to a different wing

[93] In January 2014, Mr. Timm was moved from Wing C of the La Macaza Institution, where he had been living for 11 years, to Wing A of the same institution. At discovery and at trial, he stated that he had been told at the time by staff members of the institution that this decision was a consequence of his having brought this action in September 2013.

[94] Such allegations are troubling. As mentioned above, it is unacceptable to retaliate against a prisoner who pursues remedies available under the law.

[95] However, I can grant a remedy only if Mr. Timm can prove the reasons for the move to a different wing. He has not done so. His statement constitutes hearsay. He has not called the people who were involved in this decision to testify. On cross-examination, he also acknowledged that, in August 2013, he had requested to be physically separated from Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault, since he believed that the third-level decision recognized that she had been harassing him. In addition, Exhibit 17 in the record contains a grievance apparently filed by Mr. Timm following the move to a different wing. The evidence does not show what action was taken on the grievance. In short, the situation may not be as clear-cut as Mr. Timm suggests. I am unable to draw a presumption of fact, as his counsel is asking me to do, since it is not serious, precise and concordant, as required by article 2849 of the Civil Code. Only fulsome evidence would allow me to make a finding.

E. Unwarranted searches and sleep deprivation

[96] During his testimony at trial, Mr. Timm also alleged that, after his move to Wing A, guards conducted unwarranted searches of his cell and deprived him of sleep. As for the latter, he stated that a guard would knock on his door to wake him up each hour during the night. Since his cell door was locked at night, he did not know the identity of the guards who had carried out these acts.

[97] Again, such allegations are troubling. However, there are a number of reasons preventing me from granting any reparation in this regard.

[98] First, Mr. Timm admitted on cross-examination that these events took place mainly over two months in 2016, shortly before he moved from La Macaza Institution to another institution. Moreover, while I acknowledge that it is inherently difficult to obtain evidence on this issue, I have no information about the motives of the guards who allegedly deprived Mr. Timm of sleep. It is therefore difficult for me to conclude that the sleep deprivation resulted from the events in January 2013 or, at the very least, from the commencement of this action in September 2013.

[99] Secondly, these events are not mentioned in Mr. Timm's statement of claim, since it was written in 2013. Mr. Timm never amended his statement of claim to mention these events. Procedurally, one cannot simply raise entirely new injuries at trial. As mentioned above, doing so deprives the opposing party of any realistic opportunity to investigate and bring counterevidence.

[100] Third, Mr. Timm admitted on cross-examination that he had filed a grievance in relation to these events and that the grievance had been denied. Therefore, it is possible that not all the relevant facts have been put in evidence before me.

V. Punitive damages

[101] In Hinse, the Supreme Court of Canada affirmed that the Quebec Charter is part of the jus commune ("droit commun", or general law) of extracontractual liability in Quebec, which applies to the federal Crown through section 3 of the CLPA. It would therefore be possible to claim punitive damages, under section 49, paragraph 2, of the Quebec Charter, in cases of intentional interference with a right that it guarantees. Since the Supreme Court considered that Mr. Hinse's claim was unfounded, it did not consider it necessary to specify the conditions under which the federal Crown could be ordered to pay punitive damages.

[102] Mr. Timm maintains that the conduct of Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé interfered with his right to dignity, honour and reputation (s. 4), his right to equality (s. 10), his right to protection from harassment (s. 10.1) and his right to liberty (s. 24).

[103] It is true that, in de Montigny, the Supreme Court stated that punitive damages could be awarded even in the absence of compensatory damages. However, there must still have been interference with a guaranteed right.

[104] Given the findings I have already reached, I must conclude that Mr. Timm has not proven any interference with a right guaranteed by the Quebec Charter. I have ruled that Mr. Timm has not proven any damage to his reputation, which disposes of section 4. Mr. Timm has also failed to demonstrate that he was a victim of discrimination under section 10. As for harassment, section 10.1 prohibits only harassment arising from a ground set out in section 10, for example sex. Therefore, it is not possible for Mr. Timm to demonstrate that section 10.1 was breached. In any case, I have found that he was not harassed. Lastly, section 24 provides that "no one may be deprived of his liberty . . . except on grounds provided by law". Mr. Timm is incarcerated because he has been convicted of an offence under the Criminal Code. He has not asked me, either in his statement or at trial, to question the legality of his conviction. Therefore, section 24 was not breached. Mr. Timm has not raised any rights other than the ones I have just discussed.

[105] In the absence of interference with a guaranteed right, I cannot award punitive damages.

VI. Declarations

[106] Although he did not emphasize this issue at trial, in his statement, Mr. Timm also requests that a series of declarations be issued finding violations of various standards by Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault, Mr. Maillé and the persons who ruled on his grievance.

[107] Declaratory relief may be provided where the parties have an interest in the determination of a genuine issue (Canada (Prime Minister) v Khadr, 2010 SCC 3 at paragraph 46, [2010] 1 SCR 44 [Khadr]). As the Supreme Court stated in Daniels v Canada (Indian Affairs and Northern Development), 2016 SCC 12 at paragraph 11, [2016] 1 SCR 99, "[a] declaration can only be granted if it will have practical utility, that is, if it will settle a 'live controversy' between the parties".

[108] In Mr. Timm's case, there is no longer any "live controversy"

[109] between the parties over the facts of this case. The case is a thing of the past. Unlike in Khadr, it cannot be said that the facts before the Court, namely the events of September 14, 2012, and January 11, 2013, continue to have legal or practical implications.

[110] In other words, this decision constitutes a complete solution to the matter before the Court. A declaration would add nothing.

VII. Costs

[111] Although the usual practice is to award costs in favour of the successful party, rule 400 of the Federal Courts Rules provides that the Court retains full discretion in this regard. Exercising this discretion, I am of the opinion that Mr. Timm should not be ordered to pay the costs.

[112] I find that Ms. Beaulieu-Guilbault and Mr. Maillé did commit a fault. This fault is not sufficient to give rise to liability on the part of the federal Crown, since it did not cause any injury to Mr. Timm. However, it explains why Mr. Timm brought this action. In addition, the wording of the third-level decision on Mr. Timm's grievance was rather confusing. Given all the circumstances, I consider it unfair to make Mr. Timm bear the financial consequences of the failure of his action.

content was "prescribed by law" for the purposes of s 1 of the Charter, such as to limit media and expressive freedom under s 2(b) of the Charter. In the end, the Supreme Court there concluded:

98 Freedom of the press and the fair administration of justice are essential to the proper functioning of a democratic society and must be harmonized with one another. Each one is just as vital as the other. Freedom of the press cannot foster self-fulfilment, democratic discourse and truth finding if it has a negative impact on the fair administration of justice. In the instant case, the government has taken action to reconcile those two values. Since no right is absolute, this reconciliation must be accepted.

[25] As mentioned above, it is contended by the applicant that the direction impugned in the present case adversely, and unlawfully, affected both access to justice under the Criminal Code and the liberty of the applicant as reflected in several provisions of the Charter. This is an important issue. The applicant's position is not banal. Access to justice has been recently explained (if not re-positioned) at an untouchable Constitutional level in Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v Attorney General of British Columbia, 2014 SCC 59 at paras 24 to 43, (2014) 375 DLR (4th) 599.

[26] It is argued by the applicant that the direction improperly impeded in a legally cognizable manner the exercise of liberty-related legal rights by the applicant. It is surmised by the applicant that the same direction probably adversely affected the similar liberty-based legal rights of untold other individuals during the operational period of this direction, which appears to be a period of almost a decade, until the direction was rescinded earlier in 2014 as mentioned.

[27] Before addressing the Crown's motion for dismissal on the grounds of mootness squarely, it is necessary to more clearly situate the applicant's motion as it presently exists and in light of the procedural history. This follows.

III Specific Context of the Mootness Motion

[28] Counsel for the applicant, counsel for the Attorney General of Alberta, standing in for the former Chief Justice and for the Clerk of that Court, and counsel for Her Majesty the Queen in right of Alberta efficiently addressed this motion and the relevant contextual circumstances seem to be largely in agreement.

[29] The relevant circumstances appear to have commenced with a letter dated May 28, 2004, signed by the then Chief Crown Prosecutor for Edmonton and addressed to the then Supervisor of the Criminal and Jury Section of the office of the Clerk of the Court setting out an understanding that "Bail applications will not be scheduled in the Court of Queen's Bench for persons with outstanding warrants." The letter refers to other alleged understandings but only the paragraph including the foregoing words was approved by a handwritten endorsement by the then Chief Justice which appears to have been ascribed to the letter on March 23, 2006 as "Approved".

[30] The supervisor's affidavit refers to a follow up document entitled "Bail Review Application Procedures – Effective June 1, 2004" which instructed the desk clerks that defence counsel could set dates for hearings by "call in or apply at the counter". The scheduling forms must, however, be completed with the information required. The Procedures include the requirement that the matter not be set down for hearing if there are "outstanding warrants in Alberta". There were other elements not in issue here. Checking for warrants was to be done by the desk clerks via the Information System the Court used called "JOIN".

[31] The specific arrangement under consideration here appears to have been a step in an evolution of the "bail review" process which had been described in an announcement called a "Notice to All Members of the Bar" made by the former Chief Justice dated February 5, 2004. While that February 5, 2004 announcement did not specifically mention the impugned management direction here, the announcement shows that the Court was seeking to establish an efficient system conducive to access, particularly by reduction of the "collapse" rate of motions set

Not Parties to the Application

[55] For example, a court could not impose a fee that obliged a plaintiff to pay $100,000 for the issuance of a statement of claim.[54] Such a fee would effectively deprive most persons of court access.

b. Section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867

[56] Other provisions in the Constitution Act, 1867[55] also support the primacy of the court's role as the guardian of the rule of law.

[57] Section 96 allots to the Governor General – the federal cabinet – the power to appoint "the Judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts of each Province, except those of the Courts of Probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick".

[58] The Supreme Court of Canada has used section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 to abridge the scope of section 92(14).[56]

[59] In 1995 the Supreme Court of Canada, in MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson,[57] held that section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 denies both Parliament and provincial legislatures the authority to transfer the "core jurisdiction of the provincial superior courts" to a nonsuperior court. Relying on this principle, the Court invalidated a provision in the federal Young Offenders Act[58] that transferred a core jurisdiction of a superior court to a youth court. The contested provision granted exclusive jurisdiction to youth courts over ex facie contempt of a superior court committed by a young person.[59] The Supreme Court held that Parliament could not deprive a superior court of the jurisdiction to try contemnors.

[60] Roughly twenty years later, in Trial Lawyers' Association of British Columbia v. British Columbia,[60] the Supreme Court completely reworked the "core jurisdiction of the provincial superior courts" principle.

[61] The new version had nothing to do with prohibiting legislation that transferred a core jurisdiction element of a superior court to nonsuperior courts. Surprisingly,[61] the retooled section 96 now protected the right of a class of impecunious litigants to access superior courts.

[62] One would have thought the fundamental values undeniably protected by the preamble – open courts – would have been the constitutional tool best suited to evaluate the constitutionality of British Columbia's contested law.

[63] The Court used the new tool to strike down a provision in British Columbia's Supreme Court Rules[62] obliging a party seeking to set a matter down for trial to pay a hearing fee:[63]

> The historic task of the superior courts is to resolve disputes between individuals and decide questions of private and public law. Measures that prevent people from coming to the courts to have those issues resolved are at odds with this basic judicial function. The resolution of these disputes and resulting determination of issues of private and public law, viewed in the institutional context of the Canadian justice system, are central to what the superior courts do. … To prevent this business being done strikes at the core of the jurisdiction of the superior courts protected by s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. As a result, hearing fees that deny people access to the courts infringe the core jurisdiction of the superior courts.

[64] The Supreme Court concluded that British Columbia's Supreme Court Rules could not impose fees that would "prevent some individuals from having their private and public law disputes resolved by the courts of superior jurisdiction".[64] This translated into a new constitutional role for section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 – a province cannot "enact legislation that prevents people from accessing the courts".[65]

[65] Chief Justice McLachlan, writing for the five-member majority, stated that a hearing-fee rule cannot apply to the very poor – there must be an exemption for this class of litigants[66] – or be set at a level that would not require those who are not affluent enough "to forego reasonable expenses in order to bring claims ".[67] She made it clear that this standard could not be invoked by indigents advancing frivolous or vexatious claims before a superior court.[68]

3. Rule 14.67 of the Alberta Rules of Court Is Not Inconsistent with the Constitution Act, 1867

[66] Rule 14.67 of the Alberta Rules of Court[69] does not, contrary to the principle adopted in MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson,[70] transfer a core jurisdiction of a provincial superior court to a nonsuperior court.

[67] This is obvious. Rule 14.67 allows the Court of Appeal of Alberta to order an appellant to pay security for costs. That is all it does.
