[105] The Charter guarantee of rights and freedoms is meaningful only to the extent that breaches are appropriately remedied. To this end, s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides for the nullification of laws which are inconsistent with the Constitution, including the Charter. It is complemented by s. 24 which authorizes courts to grant remedies where an individual's Charter rights have been infringed by state action. These remedial provisions, like all Charter provisions, should be given a generous and purposive interpretation: R. v. Gamble, 1988 CanLII 15 \(SCC\), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 595.

[106] In Ward, this Court examined the broad grant of powers provided in s. 24(1) of the Charter, which empowers courts of competent jurisdiction to grant remedies that are “appropriate and just in the circumstances”. Quoting Mills v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 17 (SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863, the Court observed that “[i]t is impossible to reduce this wide discretion to some sort of binding formula for general application in all cases, and it is not for appellate courts to pre-empt or cut down this wide discretion”: Ward, at para. 18, citing Mills, at p. 965. While the court’s discretion is not unfettered, “[w]hat is appropriate and just will depend on the facts and circumstances of the particular case”: Ward, at para. 19. To determine whether damages are an appropriate and just remedy, a court must be empowered to look at and balance all relevant considerations arising in a given case.

[107] Ward provides a framework for evaluating these competing considerations. The Ward test for an award of damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter consists of four steps:

- (1) The applicant must establish a Charter breach by the state;
- (2) The applicant must establish that damages would serve at least one of the functions of compensation, vindication or deterrence;
- (3) If (1) and (2) are established, the onus shifts to the state to show that there are countervailing considerations (such as alternative remedies or good governance concerns) that would make Charter damages inappropriate or unjust;
- (4) Finally, if the government fails to establish that countervailing considerations make Charter damages inappropriate or unjust, the last step in the Ward analysis is to determine the quantum of damages.

[108] Applying these principles to this case, Mr. Henry must plead facts that, if true, establish (1) a breach of his Charter rights and (2) that damages constitute an appropriate and just remedy to advance the purposes of compensation, vindication or deterrence. It is for the state to plead facts on the third step of countervailing factors, should it choose to do so.

III. Application of the Ward Framework to This Case

A. Step One: Breach of Charter Rights

[109] The first step in the Ward analysis requires that the claimant establish a breach of his or her Charter rights. Mr. Henry makes a number of specific allegations about the failure of the Crown to disclose evidence before, during and after his criminal trial on sexual assault charges. These allegations, if true, amount to blatant violations of his right to full disclosure, as protected under s. 7 of the Charter.

[110] For instance, according to Mr. Henry, the Crown withheld a large number of victim statements despite repeated defence requests for full disclosure of these statements. No victim statements, police reports or forensic reports were disclosed prior to the commencement of trial. Many victim statements remained undisclosed throughout the trial and, according to Mr. Henry, contain material inconsistencies that would have been helpful for his defence. Mr. Henry also alleges that forensic evidence relating to the perpetrator's spermatozoa remained undisclosed throughout the trial, again despite repeated specific requests. On the contrary, the Crown adduced evidence to the effect that no forensic evidence was located at any of the crime scenes that could be used to help identify the perpetrator. Further, police reports relating to another suspect were not disclosed. The sole issue at trial was the identity of the perpetrator and the Crown's case rested on victim identifications.

[111] If proven at trial, these facts would indisputably establish a breach of Mr. Henry's disclosure rights under s. 7 of the Charter. The government does not appear to dispute the violation of Mr. Henry's Charter rights.

B. Step Two: A Functional Justification of Damages

[112] The second step in the Ward analysis requires that the claimant establish that an award of Charter damages would serve one or more of the objectives of compensation, vindication, and deterrence. Compensation is about remedying personal loss (para. 25). Vindication is about remedying the harm the infringement causes society (para. 28). Deterrence is forward-looking and serves a preventative function (para. 29).

[113] By any measure, the facts alleged by Mr. Henry are egregious. The Crown allegedly withheld highly relevant and exculpatory evidence, despite repeated and specific defence requests for disclosure. The impact on Mr. Henry's ability to make full answer and defence is obvious. Mr. Henry was convicted on all charges at trial, was declared a dangerous offender, and spent 27 years behind bars. Following his convictions in 1983, Mr. Henry continued to proclaim his innocence and seek review of his case. His pleas were finally heard after the police reopened its investigation into a string of unsolved sexual assaults similar to those for which Mr. Henry was convicted. This investigation resulted in the conviction of a man who had been a suspect in Mr. Henry's case. As a result, a Special Prosecutor was appointed to review Mr. Henry's convictions, leading to the 2008 disclosure of substantial police file materials. In 2010, he was finally acquitted on all counts by the British Columbia Court of Appeal. The court held that no properly instructed jury, acting reasonably, could have rendered a guilty verdict on any of the counts (para. 142).

[114] Mr. Henry was wrongfully convicted and imprisoned by the state for 27 years. On the facts alleged, the fairness of his trial was directly and seriously compromised by the breach of his s. 7 right to full disclosure. In these circumstances, an award of Charter damages under s. 24(1) may provide some compensation for the hardships Mr. Henry has endured. Obviously, no amount of money can restore to him the decades he has spent behind bars. However, a monetary award may offer some compensation for this long period of wrongful imprisonment and the many lost life opportunities it entails.

[115] An award of Charter damages may also help vindicate the Charter rights that the Crown is alleged to have breached in Mr. Henry's case. As explained in Ward, vindication in this context refers to repairing the damage done to the public through the state's violation of Charter rights. There are few scenarios that can shake the public's confidence in the justice system more deeply than those alleged by Mr. Henry. According to the allegations, state action in breach of the Charter seriously undermined the fairness of Mr. Henry's trial and the state subsequently imprisoned him for nearly three decades. In these circumstances, an award of Charter damages may help to publicly vindicate such a serious violation of Charter rights. Such an award would recognize the state's responsibility for the miscarriage of justice that occurred in Mr. Henry's case, and the importance of respecting Charter rights in order to guarantee trial fairness.

[116] Finally, in the context of Charter damages under s. 24(1), “[d]eterrence seeks to regulate government behaviour, generally, in order to achieve compliance with the Constitution”: Ward, at para. 29. An award of Charter damages might also serve the objective of “influencing government behaviour in order to secure state compliance with the Charter in the future”: ibid. Proper disclosure of Crown evidence is obviously a matter under the control of the state and its agents, primarily Crown prosecutors. The objective of deterrence may be served by an award of damages that highlights the need for the state to remain vigilant in meeting its constitutional obligations.

[117] Step two of Ward establishes a functional approach to determining whether Charter damages would constitute, in the language of s. 24(1), an “appropriate and just” remedy for a given Charter breach: Ward, at paras. 24-31. Moreover, Ward holds explicitly that damages may be appropriate and just even where no causal connection is established between a Charter breach and harm suffered by the claimant: “. . . the fact that the claimant has not suffered personal loss does not preclude damages where the objectives of vindication or deterrence clearly call for an award” (para. 30).

[118] The objective of compensation, however, requires a causal connection between the Charter breach and the loss suffered by the claimant; this objective aims “to compensate the claimant for the loss caused by the Charter breach”: Ward, at para. 27. As the issue of causation was neither addressed in the decisions below nor argued before us, we prefer to leave any detailed discussion for another day. This said, we are not convinced that the “but for” test proposed by Moldaver J. is appropriate here.

C. Step Three: Countervailing Considerations — Has the Government Shown That Damages Are Inappropriate or Unjust?

[119] At step three of the Ward analysis, the government has an opportunity to advance any countervailing considerations that would make it inappropriate or unjust to award damages under s. 24(1).

[120] The first countervailing consideration discussed at the third stage of the Ward test is whether there are remedies other than s. 24(1) that “adequately meet the need for compensation, vindication and/or deterrence” (para. 34) in the particular case before the court. This is an individualized inquiry, not an abstract one. The question is not whether the law in the abstract provides a remedy for the wrong, but whether it is available in the particular case:

The claimant must establish basic functionality having regard to the objects of constitutional damages. The evidentiary burden then shifts to the state to show that the engaged functions can be fulfilled through other remedies. The claimant need not show that she has exhausted all other recourses. Rather, it is for the state to show that other remedies are available in the particular case that will sufficiently address the breach. [Emphasis added; para. 35.]

[121] The Court in Ward went on to state:

. . . it is conceivable that another Charter remedy may, in a particular case, fulfill the function of Charter damages. [Emphasis added; para. 35.]

[122] At the current stage of proceedings in this case, it is far from clear that there is an alternative remedy that will fulfill the functional objectives of Charter damages. The alleged wrong occurred decades ago. The lead prosecutor is dead. An action for damages under s. 24(1) may ultimately be the only remedy that will function to provide compensation, vindication or deterrence.

[123] The second set of countervailing considerations discussed in Ward — and the set relied on by the Attorney General of British Columbia — concerns good governance. Ward states:

In some situations, however, the state may establish that an award of Charter damages would interfere with good governance such that damages should not be awarded unless the state conduct meets a minimum threshold of gravity. [para. 39]

[124] By way of example, the Court in Ward opined that a claim for damages under s. 24(1) ought not to be permitted for the state’s enforcement of a law until it is declared invalid, unless the state conduct under the law was “clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power”: para. 39, citing Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance), 2002 SCC 13, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 405, at para. 78. This elevated fault threshold is justified because “[t]he rule of law would be undermined if governments were deterred from enforcing the law by the possibility of future damage awards in the event the law was, at some future date, to be declared invalid” (para. 39).

[125] The Attorney General of British Columbia argues that permitting Mr. Henry’s s. 24(1) claim to proceed: (1) will inappropriately interfere with prosecutorial discretion; (2) will inappropriately lower the standard for prosecutorial liability; and (3) will divert prosecutors from their day-to-day work by involving them in claims in the courts for prosecutorial misfeasance. The Attorney General says that these countervailing considerations mean that claims such as Mr. Henry’s should be completely barred; or alternatively that a high fault threshold should be set.

[126] Ward recognizes that there may be a need for limited immunity from s. 24(1) damages for a Charter breach that arises from the exercise of discretion. This is “because the law does not wish to chill the exercise of policy-making discretion” (para. 40). In this context, Ward mentions malice as a possible threshold for exercise of prosecutorial discretion. Our colleague, Moldaver J., in a variation on this, would reduce the threshold for s. 24(1) damages in this case to intentional conduct.

[127] In our view, however, the countervailing concerns raised by the Attorney General of British Columbia are misplaced in this case. Mr. Henry's case does not involve the exercise of prosecutorial discretion in the usual sense of the term or as it was discussed in cases such as Nelles v. Ontario, 1989 CanLII 77 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 170, and Miazga v. Kvello Estate, 2009 SCC 51, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 339. The discretion at issue in those cases is the discretion to commence and pursue a prosecution. This is a wide discretion long acknowledged by the law. It is as difficult to exercise as it is vital to the effective prosecution of criminal cases. The common law has struck a balance that reflects these complex concerns by allowing claims to be brought against prosecutors for misuse of this discretion, but only if malice can be shown: Miazga, at para. 7.

[128] However, none of this applies to the prosecution's disclosure obligation. The legal duty on the Crown to disclose relevant evidence does not involve prosecutorial discretion in the sense discussed in Nelles and Miazga. This duty is not a discretionary function but a legal obligation: R. v. Stinchcombe, 1991 CanLII 45 (SCC), [1991] 3 S.C.R. 326, at p. 333; R. v. McNeil, 2009 SCC 3, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 66, at paras. 17-18. This obligation is absolute, not discretionary, and it is one that Crown prosecutors take seriously. The only discretion left to the prosecutor is a limited operational discretion relating to timing, relevance in borderline cases, privilege and protection of witness identity. Stinchcombe states that matters falling within this limited discretion are to be resolved by the trial judge. In other words, prosecutorial discretion with respect to the disclosure of evidence is limited in scope (to operational issues) and duration (the judge, not the prosecutor will make the final decision). It may be helpful to quote the relevant passages from Stinchcombe:

The prosecutor must retain a degree of discretion in respect of these matters. The discretion, which will be subject to review, should extend to such matters as excluding what is clearly irrelevant, withholding the identity of persons to protect them from harassment or injury, or to enforce the privilege relating to informers. The discretion would also extend to the timing of disclosure in order to complete an investigation. . . .

The discretion of Crown counsel is . . . reviewable by the trial judge. Counsel for the defence can initiate a review when an issue arises with respect to the exercise of the Crown's discretion. On a review the Crown must justify its refusal to disclose. Inasmuch as disclosure of all relevant information is the general rule, the Crown must bring itself within an exception to that rule. [pp. 335-36 and 340]

[129] Thus any prosecutorial discretion in the process is both limited and judicially controlled. An action for failure to disclose relevant evidence to the defence is different from an action for misuse of prosecutorial discretion in bringing or pursuing a prosecution. It is not an action for abuse of discretion, but an action for breach of a legal duty imposed by the Charter. Where this Charter duty is breached, it is the state and not the individual prosecutor who faces liability: Ward, at para. 22. The focus is accordingly not on the fault of any particular individual, but on the failure to disclose. Where breaches of the duty to disclose occur, Charter liability flows from the constitutionally entrenched mechanisms that permit individuals to hold the state to account. This is distinct from tort liability, which imposes conduct-based thresholds to regulate tortious conduct as between individuals. Good governance is strengthened, not undermined, by holding the state to account where it fails to meet its Charter obligations. As Kent Roach has noted, “routine arguments that Charter damage awards adversely affect good governance discount the fact both deterrence and compliance with the Charter ‘is a foundation principle of good governance’”: “A Promising Late Spring for Charter Damages: Ward v. Vancouver” (2011), 29 N.J.C.L. 135, at p. 150, quoting Ward, at para. 38.

[130] Against this background, we return to the arguments of the Attorneys General of British Columbia and Canada that to allow damages for failure to disclose will chill the exercise of prosecutorial discretion, undermine the high threshold of malice for actions against prosecutors, and divert prosecutors from their proper functions by requiring them to participate in s. 24(1) actions. We conclude it would not.

[131] The concerns raised by the Attorneys General are all based on the assumption that disclosure is a matter of prosecutorial discretion as discussed in Nelles and Miazga — the discretion to commence and pursue a prosecution. But, as just discussed, this assumption is false. Prosecutors do not have discretion as to whether to disclose relevant evidence — they have a legal duty to disclose it. Their only discretion concerns peripheral matters relating to the timing of disclosure, privilege and whether a particular document is relevant — matters which are promptly resolved by trial judges.

[132] Recognizing Mr. Henry's claim will not chill the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. Nor will it change the high standard of malice for tort actions for misuse of prosecutorial discretion, since those actions are concerned with true exercises of prosecutorial discretion. And there is no reason to suppose that recognizing Mr. Henry's claim will divert prosecutors from their day-to-day work. Most issues of disclosure are settled at trial. In the rare case, like this one, where they arise after conviction, the prosecutor, if alive, may be called on to testify. The involvement of prosecutors is nonetheless likely to be limited. Since the prosecution is under a legal duty to disclose all relevant documents, the focus would be on the existence and relevance of the documents, not on the more complex questions of how discretion should have or could have been exercised.

[133] In summary, we are not persuaded that recognizing the right of Mr. Henry to claim damages for failure to disclose relevant documents will interfere with prosecutorial discretion, imperil the high threshold for suing prosecutors in cases like Nelles or Miazga, or divert prosecutors from their day-to-day work. The Attorney General of British Columbia's contention that these concerns constitute a countervailing consideration that should prevent Mr. Henry from bringing his action for Charter damages must, in our view, be rejected. There is thus no principled basis for imposing any threshold of fault or intention on Mr. Henry's claim for Charter damages, as our colleague Moldaver J. proposes to do.

[134] In our view, this is the right result in law and justice. Mr. Henry has suffered egregiously as a result, he alleges, of the state's breach of its legal obligation under the Charter to disclose all relevant documents to him when it should have. If he is denied the right to bring a claim for damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter, he may be denied any remedy. The legally desirable goals of compensation for wrong, vindication and deterrence elaborated in Ward will be unrealized.

[135] This result also upholds Canada's international obligations. Canada has committed itself internationally to compensating those who have been wrongfully convicted. Canada has ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 999 U.N.T.S. 171 (“ICCPR”), which provides, at art. 14(6):

When a person has by a final decision been convicted of a criminal offence and when subsequently his conviction has been reversed or he has been pardoned on the ground that a new or newly discovered fact shows conclusively that there has been a miscarriage of justice, the person who has suffered punishment as a result of such conviction shall be compensated according to law, unless it is proved that the non-disclosure of the unknown fact in time is wholly or partly attributable to him.

[136] Parliament has not passed legislation to implement this obligation domestically. The obligation expressed in the ICCPR is therefore not directly enforceable in Canadian courts. However, our Court has stated many times that the Charter should be interpreted consistently with Canada’s international obligations. This was reaffirmed most recently in Saskatchewan Federation of Labour v. Saskatchewan, 2015 SCC 4, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 401, at para. 64:

LeBel J. confirmed in R. v. Hape, 2007 SCC 26 (CanLII), [2007] 2 S.C.R. 292, that in interpreting the Charter, the Court “has sought to ensure consistency between its interpretation of the Charter, on the one hand, and Canada’s international obligations and the relevant principles of international law, on the other”: para. 55. And this Court reaffirmed in Divito v. Canada (Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness), 2013 SCC 47 (CanLII), [2013] 3 S.C.R. 157, at para. 23, “the Charter should be presumed to provide at least as great a level of protection as is found in the international human rights documents that Canada has ratified”.

[137] Canada has committed itself to providing compensation to those who have been wrongfully convicted, as expressed in art. 14(6) of the ICCPR. Mr. Henry alleges that he was wrongfully convicted following a trial that was rendered unfair through violation of his right to disclosure. Section 24(1) authorizes the courts to award damages to compensate Mr. Henry for the harm suffered as a result of this Charter breach. It would be inconsistent with the international obligation undertaken by Canada through art. 14(6) of the ICCPR to predicate an award of damages under s. 24(1) on Mr. Henry’s ability to establish an intentional violation of his Charter rights. To require proof of intention would be to lower Charter protection below the level of protection found in an international human rights instrument that Canada has ratified. The commitment embodied in art. 14(6) thus further supports our conclusion that Mr. Henry need not establish fault to justify an award of damages under s. 24(1).

VI. Conclusion

[138] We would allow Mr. Henry's appeal and grant his application to amend his pleadings to include a claim for Charter damages against the Attorney General of British Columbia in accordance with these reasons. It is sufficient for Mr. Henry to allege that the Crown breached its constitutional obligation to disclose relevant information and that Charter damages would be an appropriate and just remedy, serving one or more of the functions of compensation, vindication and deterrence. Mr. Henry need not allege that the Crown breached its constitutional obligation intentionally, or with malice, in order to access Charter damages. His pleadings allege that significant non-disclosure resulted in wrongful convictions and 27 years of incarceration. There can be little doubt that, if these allegations are proven, damages would be "appropriate and just" under s. 24(1) of the Charter.

In 1964, H was unjustly sentenced to 15 years’ imprisonment for armed robbery. He was granted parole after serving a third of his sentence. In 1966, he had persuaded three of the five perpetrators of the robbery to sign affidavits to clear his name. Between 1967 and 1981, H submitted three applications for mercy to the federal Minister of Justice (“Minister”) under the Criminal Code and an application for a pardon to the Governor General in Council. They were all denied. In 1988, he applied to the Commission de police du Québec, which, following an investigation, said that it hoped the Attorney General of Quebec (“AGQ”) would intervene with the Solicitor General of Canada so that justice would be done. In 1990, H submitted a fourth application for mercy, but the Minister replied that he should seek relief in the Quebec Court of Appeal, which he did. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal, but instead of entering an acquittal or ordering a new trial, it directed a stay of proceedings. On January 21, 1997, the Supreme Court of Canada unanimously acquitted H in a judgment delivered from the bench, as it was of the view that the evidence could not allow a reasonable and properly instructed jury to find H guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. H then instituted an action in civil liability for an order for solidary payment against the AGQ, the Attorney General of Canada (“AGC”) and the town of Mont-Laurier. Under out-of-court settlements, the town and the AGQ paid him a total of $5,550,000 in compensation. After these settlements, H continued to claim $1,079,871 for his pecuniary losses and $1,900,000 for his non-pecuniary losses, as well as $10,000,000 in punitive damages, from the AGC.

The Superior Court allowed the action and ordered the AGC to pay H a total of almost $5.8 million. It found, pursuant to the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, that the Minister was subject to Quebec’s rules of civil liability, that he was not protected by any immunity, that he had committed a fault of “institutional inertia” or “institutional indifference”, and that a sustained, concerted and extensive review would have uncovered the errors. It ordered the AGC to pay H more than $850,000 for pecuniary damage and $1,900,000 for non-pecuniary damage, as well as $2,500,000 in punitive damages. It also found that the AGC’s conduct at trial had amounted to an abuse of process and ordered him to pay $100,000 for fees H had paid to the first law firm that had represented him, as well as $440,000 for the value of the services rendered by the second even though that firm had never billed him for fees, as they had entered into a pro bono agreement.

The Court of Appeal reversed the judgment. It found that the exercise of the Minister’s power of mercy is protected by a qualified immunity and that the Crown can be held liable only if the decision was made in bad faith, and with malice. In this case, the court found that it had not been proven that the Minister had committed a fault and that, even if it were assumed that a fault had been committed, there was nothing to suggest that the miscarriage of justice would have been ascertained quickly if the Minister had acted promptly.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The power of mercy codified in the Criminal Code derives from the royal prerogative of mercy. At the material time, the applicable provisions of the Criminal Code left it up to the Minister to determine in what circumstances he or she should intervene. In making this discretionary decision, the Minister had to assess and weigh public policy considerations on the basis of social, political and economic factors. This power came into play after all judicial remedies had been exhausted, and the Minister, in exercising it, had to be careful to avoid usurping the role of the courts and short-circuiting the usual judicial process. The history and the nature of the power of mercy show that the exercise of that power was a true core policy act. The exercise of such a power could not therefore expose the Crown to liability unless the Minister acted irrationally or in bad faith.

To assess the Minister’s conduct in the exercise of his power of mercy, it would be inappropriate to apply a standard of fault that limits bad faith to malice. In Quebec civil law, bad faith is broader than just intentional fault or a demonstrated intent to harm another. Bad faith can be established by proving that the Minister acted deliberately with the specific intent to harm another person, or by proof of serious recklessness that reveals a breakdown of the orderly exercise of authority so fundamental that absence of good faith can be deduced and bad faith presumed. In light of the applicable provisions of the Criminal Code and of the fact that there was, at the relevant time, no established procedure to guide the exercise of the power of mercy, the Minister was required to conduct a meaningful review of any application that was neither frivolous nor vexatious. However, this review was not equivalent to the one that would be expected from a police investigation or a commission of inquiry. The duty to conduct a meaningful review entails a duty to make a decision in good faith on the basis of the evidence uncovered by that review.

The trial judge erred in approaching the issue of the federal Crown's civil liability from the perspective of a fault of institutional inertia or indifference. The analysis should instead have focused on the individual conduct of each Minister acting in his or her capacity as a servant of the federal Crown. The trial judge also erred in considering the powers of a commissioner under the Inquiries Act as a basis for determining whether the review conducted by the Minister was a meaningful one, given that those powers were not conferred on the Minister until 2002, when Parliament reformed the procedure in respect of applications for mercy. Moreover, there is no legislation establishing an obligation for the federal government or the provinces to compensate victims of miscarriages of justice, nor is there any legislation establishing a right to such compensation. Nor did the Guidelines: Compensation for Wrongfully Convicted and Imprisoned Persons require the federal government to compensate H, as they do not constitute binding legislation.

In this case, H has failed to prove, on a balance of probabilities, that the Minister acted in bad faith or with serious recklessness in reviewing his applications for mercy. The documentary evidence negates the trial judge's inference that there was no review whatsoever of H's initial application for mercy. Although there are only a few documents in the record, they attest to the fact that a certain review was conducted and that certain actions were taken in this regard. By way of admissions, the parties acknowledged that certain government employees would have confirmed that, as they had understood the facts, an extensive and careful review of the case was under way at the time in question. A delay in reviewing the initial application was raised, but despite this, an analysis of the circumstances does not support the conclusion that the Minister acted in bad faith or with serious recklessness. As for H's three subsequent applications, it cannot reasonably be argued that no meaningful review was conducted in respect of them. The relevant correspondence shows the opposite to be true. Regarding the second application, which was very brief and contained no new evidence or legal arguments, it was open to the Minister to find it frivolous and to reject it on that basis. As for the third application, given that it did not go into much detail, the allegations based on vague irregularities could have struck the Minister as being of little consequence. In the case of the fourth application, it was reasonable for the Minister to justify her decision by noting that the Court of Appeal could consider the case on its own without her having to intervene, particularly given that the Minister did not reject the application outright.

Some additional comments on causation and damages are in order. Even if it were assumed that the Minister failed to conduct a meaningful review of the first application, the evidence does not establish that he would probably have discovered at that time the key evidence uncovered by the investigator of the Commission de police 20 years later. To conclude otherwise would be to rely on mere conjecture or remote hypotheticals. H has failed to establish a causal connection between the Minister's fault and the alleged damage.

On the issue of damages, the trial judge failed to take into account the requirement that the liability be apportioned solidarily, and to establish the amounts being awarded on the basis of the actual liability of each of the solidary debtors. To the extent that more than one solidary debtor could be liable for heads of claim, the releases granted by H to the AGQ and the town of Mont-Laurier made it necessary to examine the causal faults and apportion liability. H should have borne the shares of the solidary debtors he had released (arts. 1526 and 1690 C.C.Q.). In addition to this overriding error, the grounds for each of the heads of damages were also flawed. Where the question of pecuniary damage is concerned, there is no direct connection between the Minister's conduct and H's decision to retire at age 60, the fees and costs incurred in respect of the proceedings brought in the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court between 1990 and 1997 did not result from the alleged faults, and wasted time and efforts expended to obtain justice are inconveniences that are inherent in the efforts of anyone who is involved in legal proceedings. As for non-pecuniary damage, an order that the AGC pay $1,900,000 after the AGQ had paid $1,100,000 under the same head of damages would seem to be disproportionate, and the amounts granted in other cases of miscarriages of justice were mostly made further to the recommendations of advisory bodies and were based on considerations that are different from those on which damages are based in principle. Moreover, those cases were different in that they involved the much more serious crime of murder and in that the period of incarceration was longer in almost all of them. On the issue of punitive damages, even though the reference in the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act to the Quebec rules of extracontractual civil liability encompasses the remedy of punitive damages provided for in the Charter of human rights and freedoms, it was not appropriate to award such damages in this case. Given that the Minister's conduct cannot be equated with bad faith or serious recklessness, it cannot be concluded that there was intentional interference with a right protected by the Charter. The evidence does not support a finding that the Minister's state of mind was such that he intended to harm H or had knowledge of the adverse consequences his conduct would have for H.

In Quebec law, it is only in exceptional cases that a party can be required to pay the fees of lawyers retained by the opposing party, and such compensation must be consistent with the general rules of civil liability. Only an abuse of process can justify awarding extrajudicial fees as damages. However, by virtue of art. 1608 C.C.Q., the obligation to pay damages to the other party is neither reduced nor altered by the fact that the latter received a gratuitous benefit from his or her counsel. In this case, the AGC's conduct did not amount to an abuse of process. The law on the federal Crown's liability for a fault committed by the Minister in exercising his or her power of mercy was far from clear at the time of the dispute, and it was reasonable and appropriate for the AGC to contest H's action and raise the defence that he did. The trial judge committed a palpable and overriding error in finding that there had been an abuse of process in the context of this case. H was not entitled to the extrajudicial fees that were awarded.

WAGNER AND GASCON JJ. —

I. Introduction

[1] Although it receives praise from around the world, the Canadian criminal justice system is not free from the risk of miscarriages of justice. Where such situations arise — although fortunately very rare, they have serious consequences — certain remedies are available to the victims. One such remedy is the discretionary power of mercy provided for in the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46 (“Cr. C.”), which enables the federal Minister of Justice (“Minister” or “Ministers”) to help rectify miscarriages of justice in certain cases. In this appeal, the Court is being asked for the first time to rule on the standard of conduct that applies to the exercise of this power and on the circumstances in which the federal Crown might be exposed to liability.

[2] The appellant, Réjean Hinse, was wrongly convicted of armed robbery. Under out-of-court settlements, the town of Mont-Laurier (“Mont-Laurier”) and the Attorney General of Quebec (“AGQ”) paid him a total of $5,550,000 in compensation for this miscarriage of justice. According to Mr. Hinse, this compensation was incomplete, however, since the Ministers who had decided on his applications for mercy over the years had also committed a fault against him by failing to diligently exercise their power in his favour.

[3] The Quebec Superior Court found that a simple fault was sufficient for the Crown to be liable in respect of the Minister’s conduct. The trial judge concluded that a fault of [TRANSLATION] “institutional inertia” or “institutional indifference” on the federal government’s part had caused Mr. Hinse damage equivalent to nearly $5.8 million. The Court of Appeal reversed that judgment, expressing the opinion that the person who exercises this power of mercy is protected by an immunity analogous to the one that applies to a Crown prosecutor in a case of malicious prosecution. Given that there was no intentional or gross fault, or even a simple fault, on the Minister’s part, it dismissed Mr. Hinse’s action against the Attorney General of Canada (“AGC”).

[4] We are of the opinion that, at the material time, the exercise of the Minister's power of mercy was a true policy decision. The Minister was therefore protected by a qualified (or "relative") immunity. On being presented with an application for mercy that was neither frivolous nor vexatious, the Minister had a duty to conduct a meaningful review of the application, and a breach of that duty amounting to bad faith, which encompasses serious recklessness, could expose the Crown to liability.

[5] We agree with the Court of Appeal that, on a balance of probabilities, the evidence does not support the trial judge's inference that the Ministers violated the rules of civil liability in this case. We also agree with the judges of that court that, in any event, Mr. Hinse failed to discharge his burden of proving the requisite causal connection between the Ministers' actions and the alleged damage. Finally, we agree with the Court of Appeal that the damages awarded to the appellant in excess of the $5,550,000 he had already received were inappropriate. The appeal should therefore be dismissed.

II. Background and Judicial History.

[6] In September 1964, Mr. Hinse was found guilty of an armed robbery that he claimed not to have committed. He was sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment. Because a request he made for legal aid was denied, he did not appeal his conviction. However, he began to take steps to have his conviction recognized as a miscarriage of justice.

[7] In 1966, he persuaded three of the five perpetrators of the robbery to sign affidavits to clear his name. On April 24, 1967, he wrote to the Minister, seeking recognition of the miscarriage of justice of which he claimed to be a victim. This was the beginning of a correspondence that would span more than three decades. Although he was in prison at the time of the initial exchanges, Mr. Hinse was granted parole in 1969 after serving a third of his sentence.

[8] Mr. Hinse submitted three applications for mercy between 1967 and 1981. He also applied to the Governor General in Council for a pardon in 1971. All these applications were denied. In 1988, he applied to the Commission de police du Québec ("Commission de police"). Following an investigation into Mr. Hinse's allegations, the Commission de police found that his complaint was [TRANSLATION] "sufficiently troubling" and the facts gathered were "sufficiently probative" to warrant submitting a report, which it forwarded to the AGQ and the Quebec Minister of Public Security: A.R., vol. XI, at p. 36. In its report, the Commission de police said that it hoped the AGQ would intervene with the Solicitor General of Canada so that "justice will be done" to Mr. Hinse: ibid., at p. 68. The Quebec Minister of Public Security sent the report to the Solicitor General of Canada on November 20, 1990. It was at this point that Mr. Hinse submitted a fourth application for mercy. The Minister replied that he should seek relief in the Quebec Court of Appeal, which he did.

[9] On June 8, 1994, after granting Mr. Hinse leave to file a notice of appeal and introduce fresh evidence, the Court of Appeal allowed his appeal: (1994), 64 Q.A.C. 53. But instead of entering an acquittal or ordering a new trial, the court exercised its inherent jurisdiction and directed a stay of proceedings for abuse of process, although that was not the result Mr. Hinse had requested.

[10] Mr. Hinse then appealed the case to this Court, challenging the legality and the constitutionality of the stay of proceedings. The Court denied him leave to appeal to it: [1995] 1 S.C.R. viii. Mr. Hinse refused to give up, filing an application for reconsideration. On November 30, 1995, the Court allowed his application and granted him leave to appeal: 1995 CanLII 54 \(SCC\), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 597. On January 21, 1997, it unanimously acquitted him in a judgment delivered from the bench, “being of the view that the evidence could not allow a reasonable jury properly instructed to find the appellant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt”: 1997 CanLII 394 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 3, at para. 2.

[11] On February 4, 1997, Mr. Hinse sent the AGC a formal notice. On June 5, 1997, he instituted an action for an order for solidary payment against three defendants: the AGQ, the AGC and Mont-Laurier. On November 15, 2002, Mont-Laurier signed a transaction with him for a total of $250,000. On December 2, 2010, the AGQ, too, entered into a transaction, this one for a total of $5,300,000 in principal, interest and costs. This out-of-court settlement came more than four weeks into the hearing on the merits of the action, after the parties had presented their evidence but before they had made their oral arguments.

[12] The hearing on the merits thus ended with the AGC as the sole defendant. In respect of the AGC, Mr. Hinse alleged that the federal government had helped to perpetuate and exacerbate the damage he had suffered by failing to act diligently to acknowledge and rectify the miscarriage of justice of which he had been the victim. He submitted that the conduct of the federal government [TRANSLATION] “was indicative of reprehensible carelessness, recklessness and total denial, which must be denounced and condemned [by the award of] exemplary damages”: A.R., vol. IV, at p. 31. After the settlement with the AGQ was reached, he continued to claim $1,079,871 for his pecuniary losses and $1,900,000 for his non-pecuniary losses, as well as $10,000,000 in punitive damages, from the AGC.

[13] The Superior Court allowed Mr. Hinse’s action and ordered the AGC to pay him a total of almost $5.8 million.

[14] Poulin J. began by determining that the out-of-court settlements Mr. Hinse had reached with Mont-Laurier and with the AGQ constituted an express release from the debt. Mr. Hinse therefore did not have to prove any fault on their parts. However, the federal Crown could be held liable only for the share of the damage caused by its servants: paras. 17-22; art. 1690 of the Civil Code of Québec (“C.C.Q.”).

[15] Poulin J. then found that the Minister was subject to Quebec’s rules of civil liability and was not protected by any immunity: paras. 62-63. She concluded that he had committed a fault of [TRANSLATION] “institutional inertia” or “institutional indifference”: paras. 33, 55 and 75-76. The Minister had had a duty to conduct a meaningful review of Mr. Hinse’s applications, but had failed to do so: paras. 71 and 73.

[16] Poulin J. was of the opinion that Mr. Hinse had proved causation by means of presumptions of fact, given that [TRANSLATION] “[a] sustained, concerted, extensive, competent and timely review of his initial efforts would surely have brought the errors to the AGC’s attention”: paras. 75 and 98. In her view, Mr. Hinse had proved the damage he had suffered. She ordered the AGC to pay him more than $850,000 for pecuniary damage and $1,900,000 for non-pecuniary damage. She also found that the AGC was guilty of unlawful and intentional interference with Mr. Hinse’s right to dignity and awarded Mr. Hinse $2,500,000 in exemplary damages. Finally, she found that the AGC’s conduct at trial had amounted to an abuse of process. She ordered him to pay Mr. Hinse $100,000 for fees he had paid to the first law firm that had represented him, as well as $440,000 for the value of the services rendered by the second even though it had never billed him for fees, as they had entered into a pro bono agreement.

B. Quebec Court of Appeal, 2013 QCCA 1513

[17] The Court of Appeal reversed Poulin J.'s judgment. It expressed disagreement with her finding on the issue of immunity. In its view, the exercise of the Minister's power of mercy is protected by a qualified immunity: para. 141. As a result, the Crown can be held liable only if the Minister's decision was made in bad faith, and with malice: paras. 144 and 150.

[18] The Court of Appeal found that it had not been proven that the Minister had committed a fault: para. 157. The court acknowledged that it was difficult [TRANSLATION] "to accurately gauge what kind of study was conducted, because of the summary nature of the evidence adduced", but inferred nothing negative from the brevity of the Minister's decision: para. 170 (CanLII). At the time in question, the Minister was under no obligation to give reasons for his or her decisions, and good faith on his or her part had to be presumed. The Court of Appeal also rejected the view that the time it had taken the Minister to reach a decision had caused the damage: even if it were assumed that a fault had been committed, there was nothing to suggest that the miscarriage of justice would have been ascertained quickly if the Minister had acted promptly (paras. 171-72).

[19] The Court of Appeal went on to say that even if it were assumed that there had been some fault on the AGC's part, Poulin J. had failed to apportion liability among the AGC, the AGQ and Mont-Laurier for the purpose of calculating the damages: paras. 193 et seq. On the issue of punitive damages, the court found that even if a fault had been proven, there had been no unlawful and intentional interference with Mr. Hinse's fundamental rights: paras. 228-32. Finally, it rejected Poulin J.'s findings with respect to abuse of process: para. 242.

III. Issues

[20] The appeal raises several issues, which can be summarized as follows:

1. What rules of civil liability apply to the Minister's power of mercy?
2. Has the appellant shown that the Minister's conduct constituted a fault in this case?
3. If so, has the appellant proven a causal connection between the Minister's fault and the alleged damage?
4. If so, is the appellant entitled to compensatory or punitive damages and to compensation for his counsel's extrajudicial fees?

IV. Analysis

A. Rules of Civil Liability That Apply to the Minister's Power of Mercy

(1) Extracontractual Liability of the Crown

[21] The original legislation respecting civil liability of the federal Crown was the Crown Liability Act, S.C. 1952-53, c. 30, which later became the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-50 (“C.L.P.A.”). The C.L.P.A. provides that whether the federal Crown is liable for damages is governed by the law of the jurisdiction where the acts in question were committed. In Quebec, the combined effect of the C.L.P.A. and the C.C.Q. is that the federal Crown is generally subject to the rules of civil liability set out in art. 1457 C.C.Q.: Canadian Food Inspection Agency v. Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada, 2010 SCC 66, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 657, at paras. 25-26. In the instant case, the Crown is alleged to be liable in respect of the fault of its servants: ss. 2 “liability” and 3(a)(i) C.L.P.A.

[22] However, art. 1376 C.C.Q. provides that the rules respecting liability set out in the C.C.Q. apply “to the State and its bodies, and to all other legal persons established in the public interest, subject to any other rules of law which may be applicable to them”. This Court has found, for example, that general principles or rules of public law may either prevent the general rules of civil liability from applying or substantially alter how they are applied: Finney v. Barreau du Québec, 2004 SCC 36, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 17, at para. 27; Prud’homme v. Prud’homme, 2002 SCC 85, [2002] 4 S.C.R. 663, at para. 31; Canadian Food Inspection Agency, at para. 26.

[23] The principles in question include those relating to Crown immunity, which the Court considered in R. v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2011 SCC 42, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 45; see also Canadian Food Inspection Agency, at para. 27; s. 8 C.L.P.A. In Imperial Tobacco, the Court noted that the prevailing view in Canada is that only “true” policy decisions are protected by Crown immunity. The Court explained that it is not helpful to posit a stark dichotomy between policy decisions and operational decisions, or to define policy decisions negatively as decisions that are not “operational” decisions: paras. 84-86. Although it refrained from establishing a black-and-white test, the Court concluded that core policy government decisions that are protected from suit are “decisions as to a course or principle of action that are based on public policy considerations, such as economic, social and political factors, provided they are neither irrational nor taken in bad faith”: para. 90. Policy decisions form a narrow subset of discretionary decisions. Such a decision is a considered decision that represents “a ‘policy’ in the sense of a general rule or approach, applied to a particular situation”: para. 87. To determine whether a decision is a policy decision, the role of the person who makes it may be of assistance, given that employees working at the operational level are not usually involved in making policy choices: paras. 87-90.

[24] In Imperial Tobacco, the Court did not lay down a strict rule that only “true” core policy decisions can be protected by a qualified immunity. On the contrary, it stated that “[a] black and white test that will provide a ready and irrefutable answer for every decision in the infinite variety of decisions that government actors may produce is likely chimerical”: para. 90. Although that case concerned the federal Crown’s liability for negligence at common law, its conclusions on the issue of immunity for acts of the Crown pertained to public law, which means that they are applicable to Quebec’s rules relating to Crown liability.

[25] With these principles in mind, we must begin by characterizing the nature of the ministerial power at issue so as to determine whether it is a true core policy act to which a qualified immunity applies. Having done this, we must identify the standard of fault that applies to this power and then, after defining the nature of the duties owed by the Minister during the material period, apply this standard to the facts.

(2) Nature of the Ministerial Power at Issue

[26] In the case at bar, Poulin J. found that the Minister is subject to the rules of civil liability and is not protected by any immunity when he or she exercises the power of mercy. But the Court of Appeal held that the Minister is in fact protected by a qualified immunity, given that the power in question stems from a royal prerogative and is exercised in a policy rather than an operational capacity. In this Court, the appellant submits that the Minister acts in the context of a statutory process, not of a royal prerogative, and that the standard is the existence of a simple fault. He argues that there is a distinction between the processing of applications for mercy and the Minister's final decision. In his view, the processing of applications falls within the operational sphere and should not be protected by any immunity. As for the respondent, he supports the Court of Appeal's analysis and its conclusion.

[27] Applications for mercy are governed by the Cr. C. Four successive provisions applied during the material period. They are reproduced in the Appendix. It can be seen from these provisions that the discretionary nature of the Minister's power ("[t]he Minister of Justice may") and the requirement that the Minister conduct an inquiry ("if after inquiry he is satisfied that in the circumstances") were constants throughout this period.

[28] We agree with the Court of Appeal that the power of mercy codified in the Cr. C. derives from the royal prerogative of mercy. Most academic commentators are also in agreement with this. Historically, the royal prerogative of mercy has had two strands and two objectives: to show compassion by relieving an individual of the full weight of his or her sentence, and to correct miscarriages of justice such as wrongful convictions (G. T. Trotter, "Justice, Politics and the Royal Prerogative of Mercy: Examining the Self-Defence Review" (2001), 26 Queen's L.J. 339, at p. 344, citing A. T. H. Smith, "The Prerogative of Mercy, the Power of Pardon and Criminal Justice", [1983] P.L. 398). The prerogative was incorporated into Canadian law and conferred on the Governor General by letters patent: Attorney General for Canada v. Attorney General of the Province of Ontario (1894), 1894 CanLII 12 (SCC), 23 S.C.R. 458, at pp. 468-69; Letters Patent Constituting the Office of Governor General of Canada (1947), Canada Gazette, Part I, vol. 81, p. 3014 (reproduced in R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 31).

[29] Until 2002, the second strand of the royal prerogative of mercy, that of the rectification of miscarriages of justice, was codified primarily in s. 690 Cr. C. Originally, in 1892, the forerunner of this provision read as follows:

748. If upon any application for the mercy of the Crown on behalf of any person convicted of an indictable offence, the Minister of Justice entertains a doubt whether such person ought to have been convicted, he may, instead of advising Her Majesty to remit or commute the sentence, after such inquiry as he thinks proper, by an order in writing direct a new trial at such time and before such court as he may think proper.

(Criminal Code, 1892, S.C. 1892, c. 29)

[30] The provision has evolved over time, but the link between the referral procedure and the concept of mercy has always remained, as can be seen from the words "upon an application for the mercy of the Crown" (Criminal Code, S.C. 1953-54, c. 51, s. 596). In Therrien (Re), 2001 SCC 35, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 113, Gonthier J. considered the effect of a pardon, which he defined as "an expression of the sovereignty of the monarch, the result of the unilateral and discretionary exercise of the Royal prerogative of mercy or clemency". He explained that in Canada, statutory provisions merely set out various ways to exercise this prerogative but do not limit its scope. The types of pardons include "the pardon granted after a referral for hearing or referral to a court of appeal in accordance with s. 690 of the Code . . . which results in a new trial or a new hearing”: Therrien, at para. 114.

[31] The fact that the Minister’s power derives from the royal prerogative of mercy attests to the broad discretion that is conferred on him or her. Although the fact that a decision is discretionary is not on its own sufficient to justify finding that a public law immunity applies, it is nonetheless a helpful criterion.

[32] Moreover, the various relevant provisions of the Cr. C. over the years were all drafted in broad and general language. They offered little guidance for the exercise of this discretion and accordingly gave the Minister a great deal of latitude. They gave the Minister the power to, inter alia, direct a new trial or refer the matter to the court of appeal, and left it up to the Minister to determine in what circumstances he or she should intervene:

596. The Minister of Justice may . . .

(a) direct . . . a new trial before any court that he thinks proper, if after inquiry he is satisfied that in the circumstances a new trial should be directed:

(Criminal Code, S.C. 1953-54)

[33] In making this discretionary decision, the Minister necessarily had to assess and weigh public policy considerations on the basis of social, political and economic factors. This power, which derived from the royal prerogative, fell outside the traditional sphere of criminal law in that it came into play after all judicial remedies had been exhausted. In exercising it, the Minister had to be careful to avoid usurping the role of the courts and short-circuiting the usual judicial process. It clearly did not constitute a new level of appeal. As the Court of Appeal noted in the case at bar, the Minister’s duties required

[TRANSLATION] . . . diverse (and often diverging) legal and social interests, ranging from the specific interest of the particular individual and a concern for justice to the preservation of the independence and integrity of the judicial system and of the stability of judgments — each of them being no less important than the others — to be weighed [in relation to] facts that are seldom clear. [para. 141]

[34] Furthermore, Part XXI.1 of the Cr. C., which was introduced in 2002 by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 2001, S.C. 2002, c. 13, s. 71, has as its purposes to provide greater guidance for the exercise of this power and to enhance the transparency of the process: Library of Parliament, “Bill C-15A: An Act to amend the Criminal Code and to amend other Acts”, Legislative Summary LS-410E, October 12, 2001 (“Legislative Summary”). Under the current s. 696.3(3)(a) Cr. C., the Minister may now direct a new trial or refer the matter to the court of appeal “if the Minister is satisfied that there is a reasonable basis to conclude that a miscarriage of justice likely occurred”. Unlike when Mr. Hinse made his applications, s. 696.4 Cr. C. now sets out specific criteria on which the Minister’s decision must be based. Public policy considerations, such as certainty of judgments and judicial independence, were taken into account when the new provisions were enacted, and their importance in the Minister’s decision-making process has been reduced.

[35] Finally, because the decision maker’s role may also be a relevant factor in characterizing the power in question, it should be borne in mind that the Minister, in making such policy decisions, does not act as a mere public servant working in an administrative or operational capacity. In this regard, the appellant’s argument that a distinction should be drawn between the processing of applications for mercy by government employees and the Minister's decision is wrong. Such a distinction is both difficult to justify and difficult to make in practice. This power is a single power — to review a conviction — that cannot be split into two unconnected steps. Although the ministerial review process does of course require administrative support, this fact alone does not, in the case before us, justify dividing the process into distinct compartments of policy decisions and operational decisions. The decision to consider a case further or to deny an application is an integral part of the evaluation process.

[36] The history and the nature of the Minister's power of mercy lead us to find that the exercise of that power was a true core policy act at the relevant time. In light of the principles from Imperial Tobacco, the exercise of such a power could not therefore expose the Crown to liability unless the Minister acted irrationally or in bad faith. In the instant case, it is not necessary to consider in detail what might constitute an irrational decision by the Minister. That is not the issue Mr. Hinse raises here. He merely complains of the failure to conduct adequate reviews of his applications. What is really at issue in this case is whether the Minister conducted a meaningful review. This means that it is important to define what constitutes bad faith in Quebec civil law in the context of the case at bar.

(3) Characterization of the Fault

[37] Mr. Hinse maintains that the Minister's conduct when exercising his power of mercy must be assessed against a standard of simple fault. In the alternative, he argues that the fault threshold required to lift the Crown's qualified immunity includes carelessness or serious recklessness. The AGC counters that the Crown cannot be held liable in respect of the Minister's conduct absent "bad faith or other similar conduct": R.F., at paras. 43 and 51. At the hearing in this Court, the AGC conceded that bad faith can be proven indirectly by showing conduct so blameworthy and inexplicable that it cannot be concluded that the person in question acted in good faith, since the only possible explanation is that he or she did so in bad faith. In the AGC's opinion, this is a very high threshold. A total failure by the Minister to review an application for mercy would be one example of such conduct: transcript, at pp. 77-78.

[38] The Superior Court, having found that the Minister was not protected by any immunity, decided on and applied a standard of simple fault. The Court of Appeal, being of the opinion that the Minister's actions were protected by an immunity, preferred to apply the malice standard developed in the context of the liability of Crown prosecutors for malicious prosecution. It pointed to the similarities between the Minister's duties and those of prosecutors. It did not rule definitively on the issue, however, as in its view, the appellant had not proven that a fault of any kind had been committed: paras. 150-57.

(a) Applicable Standard of Fault Is Not Malice

[39] In our opinion, it would be inappropriate to import the malice standard applicable to the liability of Crown prosecutors for malicious prosecution into a case concerning an application for mercy. Although there is a certain similarity between the duties discharged by the Minister in exercising his or her power of mercy and those discharged by Crown prosecutors in exercising their discretion in criminal prosecutions, there are significant differences between the two roles.

[40] First, although it is possible, in rare cases, to hold Crown prosecutors liable for malicious prosecution, there are policy reasons that justify an extremely high threshold for success in such an action:

Miazga v. Kvello Estate, 2009 SCC 51, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 339, at para. 43; Proulx v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2001 SCC 66, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 9, at para. 4; Nelles v. Ontario, 1989 CanLII 77 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 170. As a result, an action for malicious prosecution must be based on malice or on an improper purpose: Miazga, at paras. 56 and 81. The decision to initiate or continue criminal proceedings lies at the core of the Crown prosecutor's powers, and the principle of independence of the prosecutor's office shields prosecutors from the influence of improper political factors: Miazga, at para. 45; see also Krieger v. Law Society of Alberta, 2002 SCC 65, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 372. Prosecutors must be able to act independently of any political pressure from the government and must be beyond the reach of judicial review, except in cases of abuse of process. This independence is so fundamental to the integrity and efficiency of the criminal justice system that it is constitutionally entrenched: Miazga, at para. 46; Krieger, at paras. 30-32.

[41] The imposition of a high fault threshold thus flows from an intentional choice made to preserve a balance "between the right of individual citizens to be free from groundless criminal prosecutions and the public interest in the effective and uninhibited prosecution of criminal wrongdoing": Miazga, at para. 52.

[42] These policy reasons do not apply to the Minister's power of mercy, however. Although this power is a highly discretionary one, the Minister's latitude in deciding whether to exercise it is not fundamental to the integrity and efficiency of the criminal justice system per se. Indeed, the mercy process [TRANSLATION] "begins where the law ends": Bilodeau v. Canada (Ministre de la Justice), 2009 QCCA 746, [2009] R.J.Q. 1003, at para. 14; see also Thatcher v. Canada (Attorney General), 1996 CanLII 4092 (FC), [1997] 1 F.C. 289 (T.D.), at para. 9. Furthermore, although prosecutorial authority must be shielded from political influence, the Minister must weigh social, political and economic factors in making his or her decision. As well, the Minister's independence in the context of this decision-making process is not entrenched in the Constitution.

[43] Second, it must be borne in mind that the exercise of the royal prerogative, like the exercise of any other statutory power, can be reviewed by the courts. Ministerial decisions on applications for mercy are therefore subject to judicial review: Operation Dismantle Inc. v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441; P. W. Hogg, P. J. Monahan and W. K. Wright, Liability of the Crown (4th ed. 2011), at p. 26; see also Bilodeau v. Canada (Minister of Justice), 2011 FC 886, 394 F.T.R. 235; Daoulov v. Canada (Attorney General), 2009 FCA 12, 388 N.R. 54; Bilodeau (QCCA); Timm v. Canada (Attorney General), 2012 FC 505, 409 F.T.R. 8, aff'd 2012 FCA 282, 451 N.R. 250; Thatcher. This is generally not the case for Crown prosecutors' decisions on whether to prosecute.

[44] A comparison between the prosecutorial prerogative of Crown prosecutors and the evolution of the Minister's power of mercy under the Cr. C. reveals significant differences between the contents of the two prerogatives. This means that these prerogatives must be analyzed from different perspectives.

[45] Third, what is at issue in the instant case is whether the general Quebec rules of extracontractual civil liability apply to the federal Crown, as provided for in the C.L.P.A. Intent is not usually a prerequisite for establishing such liability. Even where gross fault is alleged, intent is not required, unlike in the case of the tort of malicious prosecution, for which intent must be proven.

[46] Finally, we note that the AGC did not insist on this very high standard at the hearing in this Court.

[47] It is therefore our opinion that to assess the Minister's conduct in the exercise of his power of mercy, it would be inappropriate to apply a standard of fault that limits bad faith to malice. The bad faith referred to in Imperial Tobacco to circumscribe the qualified immunity of the Crown for acts of political authority does not require such a result.

(b) Applicable Standard of Fault in This Case

[48] In Quebec civil law, the concept of bad faith is flexible, and its content varies from one area of the law to another: Entreprises Sibeca Inc. v. Frelighsburg (Municipality), 2004 SCC 61, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 304, at para. 25. In Finney, this Court defined the scope of a statutory immunity according to which the Barreau du Québec could not be prosecuted for acts carried out in good faith. The Court held that bad faith is broader than just intentional fault or a demonstrated intent to harm another: para. 37. It also encompasses serious recklessness. LeBel J. wrote the following:

. . . recklessness implies a fundamental breakdown of the orderly exercise of authority, to the point that absence of good faith can be deduced and bad faith presumed. The act, in terms of how it is performed, is then inexplicable and incomprehensible, to the point that it can be regarded as an actual abuse of power, having regard to the purposes for which it is meant to be exercised. [Emphasis added; para. 39.]

[49] In Sibeca, this Court applied the definition of bad faith from Finney in the context of the qualified immunity that protects a municipality when exercising its regulatory discretion. Deschamps J.'s comments on the nature of that discretion can be transposed to the instant case:

Municipalities perform functions that require them to take multiple and sometimes conflicting interests into consideration. To ensure that political disputes are resolved democratically to the extent possible, elected public bodies must have considerable latitude. Where no constitutional issues are in play, it would be inconceivable for the courts to interfere in this process and set themselves up as arbitrators to dictate that any particular interest be taken into consideration. They may intervene only if there is evidence of bad faith. The onerous and complex nature of the functions that are inherent in the exercise of a regulatory power justifies incorporating a form of protection both in civil law and at common law. [para. 24]

[50] In Deschamps J.'s view, the interpretation of bad faith proposed in Finney is applicable both to cases in which acts were committed deliberately with intent to harm and to those in which circumstantial evidence of bad faith must be relied on: Sibeca, at para. 26.

[51] In our opinion, a standard of bad faith that encompasses serious recklessness as defined in Finney and applied in Sibeca is consistent with the logic of Quebec's principles of civil liability. Moreover, this standard is akin to the concept of gross fault, which includes gross recklessness: see art. 1474 C.C.Q.; J.-L. Baudouin, P. Deslauriers and B. Moore, La responsabilité civile (8th ed. 2014), at No. 1-190.

[52] This standard is of course higher than the standard of simple fault that the trial judge incorrectly applied in the case at bar. A simple fault such as a mistake or a careless act does not correspond to the concept of bad faith that defines the limits of the Crown's qualified immunity. Moreover, it would be paradoxical if the exercise of the Minister's power of mercy were subject to a reasonableness standard on judicial review while being considered from the standpoint of a simple fault in extracontractual liability.

[53] In sum, decisions of the Minister that are made in bad faith, including those demonstrating serious recklessness — as defined in Finney and Sibeca — on the Minister's part, fall outside the Crown's qualified immunity. Bad faith can be established by proving that the Minister acted deliberately with the specific intent to harm another person. It can also be established by proof of serious recklessness that reveals a breakdown of the orderly exercise of authority so fundamental that absence of good faith can be deduced and bad faith presumed. It is with this in mind that the duty owed by the Minister when exercising his or her power of mercy must be analyzed.

(4) Minister's Duty

[54] The trial judge held that the Crown's extracontractual liability under art. 1457 C.C.Q. is based on [TRANSLATION] "the breach of a duty flowing from the conduct required of a reasonable person in society": para. 32. She found that when the Minister exercises the power of mercy, he or she has a duty to react as quickly as possible when evidence of a miscarriage of justice arises: para. 68. At a minimum, this duty requires the Minister to conduct a meaningful review of applications for mercy, since he or she has the powers of a commissioner under Part I of the Inquiries Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-11: para. 71. The trial judge described the meaningful review as a "thorough" investigation (para. 95) or a "sustained, concerted [and] extensive . . . review" (para. 75).

[55] The Court of Appeal concluded that the trial judge had erred in law in defining the scope of the Minister's duty at the time of Mr. Hinse's initial application for mercy on the basis of current standards and practices: para. 165. It instead found that the scope of that duty had been correctly defined in Thatcher: paras. 166-68. When presented with an application for mercy that was neither frivolous nor vexatious, the Minister was required to conduct a meaningful review of it, although not a review equivalent to the one that would be expected from a police investigation or a commission of inquiry.

[56] In our opinion, the Court of Appeal was right, in defining the scope of the Minister's duty at the relevant time, to endorse the conclusions reached by the Federal Court in Thatcher, to mention that the Minister was under no obligation to give reasons for his or her decisions, and to point out that good faith on the Minister's part had to be presumed: para. 170.

[57] Mr. Hinse's applications for mercy were made to the Minister between 1967 and 1990, and the response to his final application was sent to him in April 1991, that is, before the C.C.Q. came into force in 1994. It will therefore be necessary to refer to the standard that was provided for in art. 1053 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada ("C.C.L.C.") (now art. 1457 C.C.Q.), which was in force at the time of the facts alleged against the AGC:

Every person capable of discerning right from wrong is responsible for the damage caused by his fault to another, whether by positive act, imprudence, neglect or want of skill.

[58] Under the C.L.P.A., the federal Crown can be held liable not on its own account, but solely for the fault of its servants (in this case, the Minister): s. 3(a)(i). In Quebec civil law, it was art. 1054 C.C.L.C. — now art. 1463 C.C.Q. — that provided for this type of liability. However, this liability scheme was based on the same concept of fault as the one described in the general provisions on extracontractual liability, or, in this case, art. 1053 C.C.L.C.

[59] To define the duty owed by the Minister when exercising his or her power of mercy, we must take the Cr. C. and the procedure that applied at the material time into account. These factors will make it possible to establish a general definition of the scope of that duty.

[60] In finding that the Minister is protected by a qualified immunity, we noted that the Cr. C.'s successive provisions on mercy that applied during the relevant period (from 1967 to 1990) granted the Minister a broad discretion. Regardless of the amendments Parliament made over the years to the section of the Cr. C. that conferred this power on the Minister, the wording remained essentially the same: "The Minister of Justice may, upon an application for the mercy of the Crown" These various sections did not include the verb "shall" in relation to the Minister's powers, and nowhere in them was any specific duty imposed on the Minister.

[61] We also mentioned that Parliament left it up to the Minister to decide on the circumstances in which it would be appropriate to direct a new trial or refer the matter to the court of appeal. Ideally, Parliament could have defined the types of circumstances that were relevant and given better guidance on the procedure the Minister was to follow. But it did not do so. This reflects Parliament's choice to give the Minister considerable latitude and must be taken into account when defining the scope of the Minister's duty.

[62] As we mentioned above, Parliament modified the power of mercy significantly in 2002, choosing to provide greater guidance for the exercise of the power. Since then, the Minister has been required to review applications for mercy in accordance with the Regulations Respecting Applications for Ministerial Review — Miscarriages of Justice, SOR/2002-416: s. 696.2 Cr. C. The Minister is also required to submit an annual report to Parliament in relation to such applications: s. 696.5 Cr. C. This change underlines the fact that there was no applicable procedural framework when Mr. Hinse made his applications for mercy. Moreover, the following appears in the Legislative Summary:

Prior to 1994, the Department of Justice took a more or less ad hoc approach to section 690 applications. There was no set procedure or designated personnel to deal with them. . . .

In 1994, the Department of Justice instituted a number of measures to address complaints about the section 690 application process. [Emphasis added; pp. 17-18.]

[63] While the procedure to be followed is now more detailed, it does not actually require the Minister to conduct an investigation in every case. Section 3 of the Regulations provides that the Minister must conduct a preliminary assessment of the application. After that, the Minister is in principle required to conduct an investigation only "if [he or she] determines that there may be a reasonable basis to conclude that a miscarriage of justice likely occurred": s. 4 of the Regulations. Finally, unlike with the powers the Minister had at the material time in this case, he or she now has and may exercise the powers of a commissioner under Part I of the Inquiries Act and the powers that may be conferred on a commissioner under s. 11 of that Act: s. 696.2(2) Cr. C.

[64] In light of the applicable provisions of the Cr. C. and of the fact that there was, at the relevant time, no established procedure to guide the Minister in exercising his or her power of mercy, we, like the Court of Appeal, agree with the conclusions of Rothstein J. (then a judge of the Federal Court — Trial Division) in Thatcher regarding the scope of the Minister's duty. Thatcher concerned an application for judicial review of a decision to deny an application for mercy made under s. 690 Cr. C. and, therefore, the scope of the duty of fairness the Minister owed when exercising the power. Although that is not the issue in the instant case, Rothstein J.'s analysis of the Minister's power was nonetheless correct, and his conclusions will be helpful in determining the scope of the Minister's duty in the context of the Crown's civil liability.

[65] Rothstein J. began by indicating that the mercy procedure is not the subject of legal rights, as it is initiated only after a convicted person has exhausted his or her rights: Thatcher, at para. 9. He then made the following observation:

That the function of the Minister of Justice under section 690 is an "exemplar of a purely discretionary act" is reflected in the wide allowance given to the Minister to exercise his discretion. There are no statutory provisions directing the Minister as to the manner in which he should exercise his discretion. There are no requirements as to the type of investigation the Minister must carry out under section 690. [para. 10]

[66] Rothstein J. pointed out that no procedure had been established and that the Minister's decision was not subject to appeal: Thatcher, at para. 11. He concluded that "the Minister must act in good faith and conduct a meaningful review, provided that the application is not frivolous or vexatious": para. 13. An application usually had to introduce some new matter "indicating it is likely that there has been a miscarriage of justice": para. 14. Rothstein J. stated that the applicant had no general right to disclosure of what the Minister or his officials had considered in their review: para. 13. However, the applicant was entitled to disclosure of any new information uncovered by the Minister's investigation: para. 14.

[67] Finally, Rothstein J. wrote:

Exceptionally, as a result of new information that is substantial and would provide a reasonable basis for a finding of miscarriage of justice, the Minister may find it necessary to consider material in police or prosecution files. In such a case, the material, or at least the gist of the material the Minister or his officials review, if not already known by the applicant, would have to be disclosed to him. But there is no general obligation on the Minister to review police and prosecution files or to disclose those files merely because of a request by a convicted person. [Emphasis added.]

[68] It is our opinion that, for the purpose of establishing liability under the Quebec rules of extracontractual liability, the Minister's duty can be defined in terms of a meaningful review of an application for mercy. What a meaningful review entails must be understood in light of Rothstein J.'s comments. It is not the extensive and thorough review referred to by Poulin J. As well, this review is clearly not intended to be equivalent to a new level of appeal. And it is inappropriate to compare the Minister's review to a police investigation or to the work of a commission of inquiry. On the other hand, a slapdash investigation could hardly be described as a meaningful one either. It goes without saying that, as the AGC agreed at the hearing, a total failure to conduct a meaningful review of an application that is neither frivolous nor vexatious would constitute a breach of the Minister's duty. In addition, as we concluded above that it is inappropriate to draw a distinction between the processing of an application for mercy and the Minister's decision with respect to that application, these two aspects of the power of mercy are intrinsically linked. The duty to conduct a meaningful review therefore entails a duty to make a decision in good faith on the basis of the evidence uncovered by that review. Finally, we would add that at the time, the Minister did not have to document his or her investigation or give any reasons whatsoever for his or her discretionary decision. This fact will be important for our assessment of the evidence that has been submitted.

[69] Since we have concluded that the Minister is protected by a qualified immunity when exercising his or her power of mercy, only a breach of the Minister's duty that amounts to bad faith or serious recklessness could expose the Crown to liability. In short, the evidence had to show that the Minister had acted in bad faith or with serious recklessness in conducting the required review of Mr. Hinse's applications for mercy.

B. Evidence of Fault in This Case

[70] Although the basis for the Crown's extracontractual liability in respect of the Minister's conduct is governed by the C.C.L.C., it is the C.C.Q. that governs the rules of evidence and procedure in this case: ss. 2 and 3 of the Act respecting the implementation of the reform of the Civil Code (see also the second para. of s. 9). Article 2803 C.C.Q. provides that "[a] person seeking to assert a right shall prove the facts on which his claim is based." The onus was therefore on Mr. Hinse to prove fault on the AGC's part, damage he himself had suffered, and a causal connection between the two: see J.-C. Royer and S. Lavallée, La preuve civile (4th ed. 2008), at No. 158.

[71] In this case, there is no direct evidence regarding the quality of the Minister's review. The appellant's argument was based on proof by presumption of fact, and the trial judge relied on this argument to conclude that the Minister had not conducted a meaningful review. Article 2846 C.C.Q. provides that "[a] presumption is an inference drawn by the law or the court from a known fact to an unknown fact." Regarding presumptions of fact, art. 2849 C.C.Q. provides that courts may, at their discretion, take such presumptions into account, but only if they are "serious, precise and concordant". These modifiers can be defined as follows:

[TRANSLATION] Presumptions are serious when the connection between the known fact and the unknown fact is such that the existence of one establishes the existence of the other in a clear and obvious manner. . . .

Presumptions are precise when the conclusions that flow from the known fact tend to establish the contested unknown fact in a direct and specific manner. If it were also possible to draw different and even contrary results, to infer the existence of various and contradictory facts, the presumptions would not be precise in nature and would give rise only to doubt and uncertainty.

Finally, they are concordant, whether or not they each spring from a common or different source, when they tend[, as a whole and in how they accord with one another,] to establish the fact to be proven. . . . If, on the contrary, they contradict each other . . . and cancel each other out, they are no longer concordant, and create only doubt in the magistrate's mind. [Emphasis added.]

[72] Thus, [TRANSLATION] "[a] presumption of fact cannot be deduced from a pure hypothesis, from speculation, from vague suspicions or from mere conjecture": Royer and Lavallée, at No. 842, citing Crispino v. General Accident Insurance Company, 2007 QCCA 1293, [2007] R.R.A. 847. An unknown fact will not be proven if the known facts cause another fact that is inconsistent with the fact the plaintiff wants to prove to be more or less likely, or if they do not reasonably rule out another possible cause of the damage he or she suffered: see, e.g., Crispino. However, it is not necessary to rule out every other possibility: Royer and Lavallée, at No. 842; see also St-Yves v. Laurentienne générale, compagnie d'assurance inc., 1997 CanLII 10732 (Que. C.A.).

[73] After reviewing the steps taken by Mr. Hinse and the authorities' responses, Poulin J. concluded that [TRANSLATION] "the federal government's conduct was marked by institutional indifference": para. 55. She made the following points, inter alia, in this regard:

- despite the multiple and urgent distress calls Mr. Hinse sent out, no one really listened to him, no one helped him, no one looked into his allegations, no one tried to validate them;
- even though he was acquitted by this Court in 1997, and despite the Quebec government's proposal, the federal government refused to compensate him in accordance with the Guidelines: Compensation for Wrongfully Convicted and Imprisoned Persons (1988) ("Guidelines"); and
- the AGC contested Mr. Hinse's action firmly and vigorously for more than 13 years, thereby perpetuating the miscarriage of justice (paras. 57 and 59-60).

[74] Poulin J. then expressed the opinion that [TRANSLATION] "the federal government is liable for the faults committed by its servants and agents, manifested primarily in their indifference toward him": para. 61. In this regard, she notably criticized the federal government for a number of actions:

- it let more than a year and a half go by and did not respond to the appellant's first application for review until it had received the third letter from the appellant or his spouse;
- it created confusion in the instructions it gave them;
- it misled the appellant by referring him to the provincial authorities on several occasions;
- it deliberately caused the appellant to lose precious time;
- it repeatedly asked the appellant to tell his story; and
- it forwarded documents the appellant had sent to it to third parties who were not involved in his case (para. 63).

[75] Moreover, Poulin J. expressed the opinion that the AGC had had a duty to react as quickly as possible to Mr. Hinse's application for mercy, as a wrongful conviction is a flagrant example of a miscarriage of justice: para. 68. In her view, the Minister [TRANSLATION] "had at the very least a duty to conduct a meaningful review of Hinse's review applications simply because he 'has and may exercise the powers of a commissioner under Part I of the Inquiries Act'": para. 71, quoting s. 696.2(2) Cr. C. She added that the Minister should, in exercising his power, have taken into account certain concerns raised in an article published in 1992, in which Philip Rosen describes the procedure followed when an application for mercy is sent to the Minister: para. 72, citing Library of Parliament, "Wrongful Convictions in the Criminal Justice System", Background Paper BP-285E, January 1992, at pp. 10-11. Poulin J. observed that this exercise had "clearly" not been undertaken in this case, which amounts to a fault of omission: para. 73.

[TRANSLATION] The evidence that Hinse adduced by presumption of fact satisfies the Court that the AGC's wrongful inaction compounded his suffering. . . . Institutional inertia exacerbated and extended it by perpetuating the impact of the criminal past that the whole of society had attached to Hinse for a robbery he had not committed, whereas the AGC was the only one in a position to remedy the injustice.

That, it should be repeated, is where his fault lies. [paras. 75-76]

[77] The Court of Appeal found that the Minister had had a duty to conduct a meaningful review of Mr. Hinse's case, because the affidavits submitted by Mr. Hinse had indicated that a miscarriage of justice may have occurred. The court acknowledged that it was difficult [TRANSLATION] "to accurately gauge what kind of study was conducted, because of the summary nature of the evidence adduced", but nevertheless inferred nothing negative from that: para. 170. At the time in question, the Minister had not been under an obligation to give reasons for his or her decisions, and good faith on his or her part was presumed. In the court's view, the evidence in the record did not justify the trial judge's inferring from the refusals Mr. Hinse had met with that the Ministers had not conducted a meaningful review or had acted maliciously: para. 177. The Court of Appeal pointed out that when Mr. Hinse had made his applications, he had not yet exhausted his legal remedies, and that at his trial, Judge Côté had made some very harsh comments regarding his credibility: paras. 168-69. Finally, the court stated that, even if it considered the handling of all Mr. Hinse's applications globally, it could not identify any wrongful conduct: para. 183.

[78] The appellant submits that the trial judge did not err in law in defining the meaningful review standard. In his view, it can be seen from Thatcher and from Wilson v. Minister of Justice, 1983 CanLII 5071 (FC), [1983] 2 F.C. 379 (T.D.), aff'd 1985 CanLII 5589 (FCA), [1985] 1 F.C. 586 (C.A.), that in those cases, Department of Justice officials had conducted exhaustive investigations and reviews, and [TRANSLATION] "[t]he contrast between the work carried out in those cases and the total absence of any documentation and/or any information showing any enquiry whatsoever carried out by the AGC in this case is striking": A.F., at para. 58 (emphasis deleted). The respondent contends that the trial judge erred in law by reviewing the Minister's conduct on the basis of the provisions of the Cr. C. that came into force in 2002 and the practices followed in the 1990s. She should have conducted this review on the basis of the standards that applied at the time of the acts in question. The respondent relies on the conclusions reached in Thatcher to himself conclude that the Minister's conduct in the case at bar was not wrongful.

[79] We are of the opinion that the trial judge not only erred in finding that no immunity whatsoever applied to the Minister's exercise of his power, but also made several errors regarding the scope of the Minister's duty, and that those errors led her to conclude, incorrectly, that the Minister had committed a fault. We will discuss the errors in question first, before turning to the determinative issue of the allegation that the Minister failed to conduct a meaningful review.

(1) Anachronism in the Scope of the Minister's Duty.

[80] The Court of Appeal was right to find that Poulin J. had erred in considering the powers of a commissioner under the Inquiries Act as a basis for determining whether the review conducted by the Minister was a meaningful one. Those powers were not conferred on the Minister until 2002, when Parliament reformed the procedure in respect of applications for mercy. As the Court of Appeal pointed out, this anachronism had distorted Poulin J.'s analysis of the nature of the meaningful review the Minister was required to conduct, as she had found that the Minister had [TRANSLATION] "extremely broad" latitude in this regard and could seek assistance from the RCMP, from local police forces and from forensic scientists or other experts: para. 71, citing Rosen, at p. 11. As was established in Thatcher, however, the Minister would be required to consult the files of the prosecutor or of the police only in exceptional circumstances. In our opinion, requiring the Minister to assume the role of a police investigator or to enlist the aid of such investigators or any other experts would have been even less appropriate.

[81] Similarly, as the Court of Appeal observed, the 1992 study by Philip Rosen could be helpful, but not determinative, in the analysis of the Minister's conduct: para. 165. Although Rosen briefly reviewed the history of the Minister's power, his study was really limited to s. 690 Cr. C., the Department of Justice's "present practice" (i.e. the one followed since 1985), problems with that practice, and proposals for change. But s. 690 Cr. C. did not come into force until 1988, whereas Mr. Hinse made the first three of his applications before that date. As for the fourth application, which he made in 1990, it is enough at this point to note that Mr. Hinse did not meet with a firm refusal from the Minister then in office; rather, the Minister asked Mr. Hinse to seek relief directly from the Quebec Court of Appeal, and to contact her again if he was unsuccessful: A.R., vol. XI, at p. 75.

[82] In his study, Rosen discussed problems with the Department of Justice's "present practice" that the lawyers of certain applicants had denounced. Those problems confirm some of the criticisms of the Minister made by Mr. Hinse and the trial judge, which included the following (pp. 13-14):

- a lack of established rules of procedure;
- issues with respect to the types of evidence and documents collected by the Department and the nature of the report submitted to the Minister;
- concerns about the fact that applicants or their counsel were not advised of adverse findings and allowed to make further legal or evidentiary responses before the investigation report was submitted to the Minister; and
- the Minister's response to an application for mercy, which might not provide the reasons for rejecting the application in sufficient detail.

(2) Confusion of the Minister's Conduct With That of the AGC

[83] Furthermore, Poulin J. sometimes confused the Minister's actions with those of the AGC. Thus, she faulted the AGC for vigorously contesting Mr. Hinse's action and for asserting in his oral argument that there was no evidence showing beyond a reasonable doubt that Mr. Hinse had not committed the crime: paras. 60, 64 and 66. Although the AGC is the Minister's representative for the purposes of this proceeding, it is important to distinguish the conduct of the former from that of the latter. It is the Minister's conduct that must be reviewed to determine whether the federal Crown is civilly liable. In the part of her judgment dealing with fault, the judge should have confined her analysis to the Minister's conduct. If the criticisms levelled against the AGC regarding the conduct of the litigation are at all relevant, it is only for the purpose of determining whether there was an abuse of process, which is an issue that must be considered separately.

(3) Federal Crown's Obligation to Compensate

[84] Canada has recognized that it is desirable to compensate victims of miscarriages of justice. In particular, it acceded to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 999 U.N.T.S. 171 ("ICCPR"), which provides, in art. 14(6):

When a person has by a final decision been convicted of a criminal offence and when subsequently his conviction has been reversed or he has been pardoned on the ground that a new or newly discovered fact shows conclusively that there has been a miscarriage of justice, the person who has suffered punishment as a result of such conviction shall be compensated according to law, unless it is proved that the non-disclosure of the unknown fact in time is wholly or partly attributable to him.

[85] However, Canada has not enacted legislation to incorporate the ICCPR into Canadian domestic law. There is no legislation establishing an obligation for the federal government or the provinces to compensate victims of miscarriages of justice, nor is there any legislation establishing a right to such compensation. The federal and provincial governments did adopt the Guidelines in 1988. The Guidelines establish a set of criteria that a wrongfully convicted person must meet to be entitled to compensation. In addition to fixing the maximum amount of such compensation, they require, inter alia, that the person first receive a statement to the effect that he or she is innocent: a free pardon or the quashing of a guilty verdict is not, on its own, sufficient. The Guidelines are not binding legislation, however, and have never been regarded as such: see, e.g., S. L. Robins, In the Matter of Steven Truscott: Advisory Opinion on the Issue of Compensation, March 28, 2008 (online), at pp. 18-23.

[86] As a result, the Guidelines did not require the federal government to compensate Mr. Hinse, particularly given that his “factual innocence” had not been proven. Moreover, Quebec had decided not to compensate the appellant for this very reason: examination on discovery of D. Grégoire, May 28, 2009, R.R., vol. II, at pp. 89-90, 94-96 and 99. The trial judge therefore could not hold this against the AGC when assessing the alleged fault.

(4) Refusal Based on the Earlier Applications

[87] The trial judge faulted the federal authorities for denying subsequent applications on the basis of the original refusal:

[TRANSLATION] Even though they had fresh evidence establishing that he was the victim of a miscarriage of justice, the federal authorities based their subsequent refusals on the rejection of the initial application. [Footnotes omitted; para. 74.]

[88] In support of this conclusion, she relied on the following excerpts from the examination of Kerry Scullion, Director and General Counsel for the Criminal Conviction Review Board of the Department of Justice, who represented the AGC:

- Do you know what the federal government did after that?
- If he's repeating the same claims that he made in the previous applications, probably not much. There would be no further reviews if the same material is being put forward in support of subsequent applications as what was put forward in past applications that were denied. It probably wouldn't go any further than somebody having reviewed what was done in the past and a letter written back saying I mean you have to look at it to see if there is something new as to what was maintained in the previous ones, but other than that, that would be the extent of it. It looks like something was written back to him possibly.

- So basically, Mr. Hinse's request is once again turned down?
- Yes. There would have been nothing new from the last request. [Emphasis added.]

(A.R., vol. VII, at pp. 164-65)

[89] In our opinion, the comments the trial judge attributed to the AGC’s representative must be qualified. It is true that the AGC’s representative stated that if Mr. Hinse had submitted new applications to the Minister without raising any new facts or evidence, then the subsequent refusals would very likely have been due to the first refusal.

[90] With respect, however, these statements do not establish that, in the instant case, the Ministers failed to consider what was described as fresh evidence. It should be borne in mind that the Minister’s duty is owed in respect only of serious applications and that such an application will usually arise from some new matter indicating that it is likely there has been a miscarriage of justice: Thatcher, at para. 14. Absent exceptional circumstances, the Minister may deny a new application for mercy on the basis of previous refusals if the new application does not introduce any new facts or issues.

(5) Fault of Institutional Inertia or Indifference

[91] At trial, Mr. Hinse linked the fault allegedly committed by the federal authorities to what his counsel described as [TRANSLATION] “institutional indifference”: paras. 33, 40 and 52. Poulin J. summarized Mr. Hinse’s position in this regard as follows:

[TRANSLATION] More specifically, he submits that the government acted wrongfully toward him for over 40 years by failing to act as a competent, prudent and diligent authority would have done, given that it knew or ought to have known about the miscarriage of justice of which he was the unfortunate victim and that it could not therefore have been unaware that its failure to act was exacerbating the damage Hinse was sustaining. [para. 33]

Although Poulin J. referred to specific, time-limited wrongful actions, she ultimately characterized the AGC’s fault as one of “institutional inertia” (para. 75; see also para. 209) or “institutional indifference” (paras. 55, 89, 149 and 203), as if there were one continuous fault that subsumed the individual actions of the successive Ministers. In her view, this “institutional inertia” had exacerbated and extended the duration of the miscarriage of justice of which Mr. Hinse was the victim, and that was the essence of the AGC’s fault: paras. 75-76.

[92] To thus characterize the fault as one of “institutional inertia” or “institutional indifference” amounted to accusing the federal Crown itself of a fault. But under the C.L.P.A., the federal Crown cannot be held liable for its own actions, but is only liable in respect of the fault of its servants (in this case, the Minister): s. 3(a)(i). The trial judge erred in approaching the issue of the federal Crown’s civil liability from the perspective of a fault of institutional inertia or indifference. She should instead have analyzed the individual conduct of each of the successive Ministers acting in his or her capacity as a servant of the federal Crown.

(6) Alleged Failure to Conduct a Meaningful Review

[93] Regarding the alleged failure to conduct meaningful reviews of Mr. Hinse’s applications for mercy, we will begin by pointing out that Poulin J. erred in law first in finding that a simple fault on the Minister’s part had exposed the Crown to liability. She then erred in law a second time when she determined that the Minister’s duty at the relevant time was to conduct a [TRANSLATION] “sustained, concerted [and] extensive . . . review” or a “thorough investigation”: paras. 75 and 95. Her finding of fault on the Minister’s part must be attributed to these two errors. The analysis of Mr. Hinse's applications must be reconsidered in light of both the duty the Ministers owed at the relevant time and the applicable standard of civil fault.

[94] Before doing so, we must make two preliminary remarks. First, given the scope of the meaningful review the Minister was required to conduct, the appellant is wrong to compare the reviews conducted in his case to the ones conducted in Thatcher and Wilson. Mr. Hinse submits that [TRANSLATION] “[t]he contrast between the work carried out in those cases and the total absence of any documentation and/or any information showing any enquiry whatsoever carried out by the AGC in this case is striking”: A.F., at para. 58 (emphasis deleted). He points out that in Thatcher, counsel for the Department prepared a draft investigative summary that included the trial evidence, the appellate proceedings, the material provided by the applicant, and other information gathered during the investigation. Counsel sent this summary to the applicant's lawyer, who had a chance to make further submissions, and the Minister rendered a detailed 73-page decision.

[95] In the case at bar, Mr. Hinse had the opportunity to introduce any new facts or evidence he wished to present in order to flesh out his applications for mercy. The federal authorities asked him several times to provide specific facts to support his application. Mr. Hinse had a “reasonable opportunity to state his case”: Thatcher, at para. 13. This being said, it should be borne in mind that under the law as it then stood, the Minister was under no obligation to provide Mr. Hinse with an investigative summary or to give reasons for his or her decision.

[96] In Wilson, there had been newspaper reports suggesting that members of the jury had been involved in improprieties. The provincial attorney general had therefore ordered a police investigation, which led him to conclude that no offences had been committed. Mr. Wilson submitted an application for mercy, and federal officials asked him several times for additional information that was needed. The Minister ultimately refused to exercise his power of mercy in Mr. Wilson's favour. In his refusal letter, he stated that he had reviewed Mr. Wilson's submissions, information obtained in the provincial attorney general's investigation, and other information gathered in the course of inquiries made at his own request.

[97] At that time, however, absent exceptional circumstances, the Minister was under no obligation to consult the files of the prosecutor or the police, let alone to contact other sources or to organize any investigation whatsoever. The fact that the Minister decided to do so in Mr. Wilson's case does not mean that he should have done the same in Mr. Hinse's case. It is important to note that the Minister had a broad discretion in exercising his or her power of mercy. It was open to the Minister to take special or additional measures if he or she deemed it appropriate to do so. But that could not create a legitimate expectation that he or she was to do so in every case.

[98] The second remark concerns the appellant's argument that there is no documentary or testimonial evidence attesting to any review whatsoever having been conducted in his case. In his oral argument in this Court, counsel for the appellant noted that his client had demanded that the AGC turn over any documents confirming that a meaningful review had been conducted in his case, and that he was told that he had been provided with all the documentation there was. His client had therefore done all that he could, because only the Minister could really prove what sort of review he had conducted: transcript, at pp. 19-20. In the absence of such evidence, counsel argued, the trial judge was right to find that there had been no review.

[99] It should be pointed out, however, that in this situation, the burden of proof was on Mr. Hinse. It was therefore up to him to establish the Minister's fault, that is, a breach equivalent to bad faith or serious recklessness in the review of the applications for mercy. He could of course present evidence by presumption of fact that would lead the court to infer that a meaningful review had not been conducted, or that one had been conducted in bad faith or with serious recklessness. Nevertheless, that burden was on him, and it was up to him to discharge it. This is particularly significant as regards Mr. Hinse's first application. At the hearing, counsel for the appellant and counsel for the respondent agreed that the key period for determining whether the Crown is liable in respect of the Minister's conduct is the period of that first application.

(a) The 1967 Application

[100] We will limit our review to a summary of the initial correspondence between Mr. Hinse and the federal authorities. Mr. Hinse sent his first application for mercy to the Minister on July 19, 1967. He proclaimed his innocence and stated that he had identified the five people who actually committed the crime. Three of them had agreed to sign affidavits, which he had photocopied and enclosed with his application. The affidavits of Yvon Savard and Laurent Beausoleil were identical, so we will reproduce only that of Mr. Savard:

[TRANSLATION] I, Yvon Savard, hereby admit that I was one of the perpetrators of the armed robbery committed on December 14, 1961 at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Henriot Grenier, of Mont-Laurier.

Consequently, I solicit the attention of the appropriate person so that I may be called to testify in the case of Réjean Hinse and exonerate him of that crime, of which I know, beyond a doubt, he is innocent.

[101] The affidavit of Claude Levasseur was different:

[TRANSLATION] I, Claude Levasseur, hereby admit that I know the facts of what happened during the robbery committed on December 14, 1961 at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Henriot Grenier, of Mont-Laurier.

[102] Mr. Hinse had also identified the other two perpetrators of the robbery: Georges Beaulieu and Léopold Véronneau. But he explained that they had refused categorically to sign any statement whatsoever and would refuse to testify even if they were offered court protection.

[103] J. A. Bélisle acknowledged receipt of the application on behalf of the Director of the Criminal Law Section on July 28, 1967. That same day, Mr. Bélisle wrote to Quebec's Deputy Minister of Justice, asking the latter to send him the police reports. Mr. Hinse's file then remained inactive for more than a year after being sent to the Canadian Penitentiary Service, which did not return it to the federal Department of Justice. It was Mr. Hinse's spouse who, by writing to the Minister in September 1968, caused the loss of the file to be discovered, and the file itself to be reactivated.

[104] A series of letters were then exchanged, between the office of the Deputy Solicitor General of Canada and the Criminal Law Section of the Department of Justice in particular. In addition, the Quebec government sent [TRANSLATION] “certain documentation” to the Minister in April 1969: A.R., vol. X, at p. 78. Mr. Bélisle asked his Quebec counterpart about the possibility that they [TRANSLATION] “compare [their] files at a future date”: ibid., at p. 75.

[105] On March 12, 1971, Mr. Hinse applied to the Governor General in Council for a free pardon under s. 655 Cr. C. (now s. 748 Cr. C.), continuing to proclaim his innocence. On March 30 of that same year, J. L. Cross of the Privy Council Office wrote to the Solicitor General of Canada. He enclosed the conclusions of the Special Committee of the Privy Council that had reviewed Mr. Hinse’s application for a pardon. The following is an excerpt from those conclusions:

It is our opinion that subject did not provide us with sufficient fresh facts that were not available at the time of the trial and that could have been a basis to prove his innocence under the royal prerogative of mercy.

However, it is suggested that the case be referred to your department for further study in this matter based on our above inquiry, and for the Minister’s approval as to whether Mr. Hinse should be given a new trial.

(A.R., vol. X, at p. 83)

[106] In October 1971, Mr. Hinse obtained two additional affidavits, one from Jean-Claude Pressé and the other from Laurent Beausoleil. They are almost identical:

[TRANSLATION] I hereby declare that on or about September 10, 1961, I was one of the passengers in the vehicle of Laurent Beausoleil (a 1957 Buick) when said vehicle was searched and its passengers were checked by officer Arthur Scott of the municipality of Mont-Laurier.

I declare that, besides me, there were: Laurent Beausoleil, Hugues Duval and Léopold Véronneau.

I wish to attest to the fact that neither Réjean Hinse nor André Lavoie was in the vehicle or was with us on that day.

(A.R., vol. X, at p. 85)

[107] Mr. Hinse sent these affidavits to the National Parole Board, which forwarded them to the federal Minister of Justice in November. On December 22, 1971, S. F. Sommerfeld, Director of the Criminal Law Section, informed the National Parole Board of the Minister’s refusal in the following words:

[TRANSLATION] We have carefully reviewed the file of Réjean Hinse and have come to the conclusion that a new trial should not be granted in this matter.

(A.R., vol. X, at p. 102)

[108] The National Parole Board forwarded this response to Mr. Hinse on February 10, 1972. This response was not unrelated to the result of Mr. Hinse’s parallel application for a free pardon. The Special Committee of the Privy Council was of the opinion that there was not enough fresh evidence to conclude that Mr. Hinse was innocent, but nevertheless suggested that his case be submitted to the Minister.

[109] In our opinion, this documentary evidence negates the trial judge’s inference that there had been no review whatsoever of Mr. Hinse’s initial application for mercy. Although there are only a few documents in the record, they nevertheless attest to the fact that a certain review was conducted and that certain actions were taken in this regard. As the Court of Appeal stated, given that the Minister was under no obligation to give reasons for his decision at that time, it is inappropriate to draw a negative inference from the summary nature of the Minister's file in this matter.

[110] Moreover, the record contains minutes of hearing that record an admission by the parties regarding the production of determinative documents:

[TRANSLATION] The parties admitted the following with regard to all the documents in respect of which they make admissions for the purposes of production:

- they are certified copies of the originals;
- if the person who signed a document were to testify, he or she would confirm having written the document in question and having sent it to its recipient, who received it, if such is the case; and
- finally, he or she would confirm that the document is proof of the truth of its content.

(Minutes from the hearing of November 9, 2010, A.R., vol. IV, at p. 57)

[111] One of the documents to which this admission applied was a letter sent to Mrs. Hinse in January 1969 by Mr. Bélisle on behalf of the Director of the Criminal Law Section in which Mr. Bélisle wrote:

[TRANSLATION] Rest assured that we will contact you [regarding your husband's application] in the near future, as we are currently conducting an extensive review of this case. [Emphasis added.]

(A.R., vol. X, at p. 62)

[112] Another document to which the admission applied was a letter in which Mr. Sommerfeld, the Director of the Criminal Law Section, forwarded the Minister's refusal to the National Parole Board. In it, Mr. Sommerfeld said the following: [TRANSLATION] "We have carefully reviewed the file of Réjean Hinse . . ." (A.R., vol. X, at p. 102). By their admission, therefore, the parties had acknowledged that if Mr. Bélisle and Mr. Sommerfeld were to testify, they would have confirmed that these letters were proof of the truth of their content — in short, that as Mr. Bélisle and Mr. Sommerfeld had understood the facts, an extensive and careful review of Mr. Hinse's case was under way at the time in question. The trial judge did not mention this admission. It is true that the obligation to give reasons for judgments does not imply that a judge must address every little detail of a case. However, given the state of the documentary evidence in the record, the trial judge should have considered this admission before inferring that no review had been conducted. Taken together with the other relevant evidence that we have just discussed, it did not support her inference that a review had not been undertaken.

[113] The probative value of this admission is enhanced by the fact that the appellant, for reasons known only to him, asked merely to examine a single representative of the AGC and did not specifically summon the decision makers who had played a role in the review of his applications for mercy: R.R., vol. I, at p. 16. Moreover, when the appellant began his action, he concentrated his efforts on the suit against the AGQ and Mont-Laurier, no doubt because it was they who were primarily responsible for the damage he had suffered.

[114] If we disregard the inferences drawn from the presumptions of fact on which Mr. Hinse relies, we must find that, on a balance of probabilities, the evidence does not support his assertion that the Minister failed to conduct a meaningful review of his initial application. The appellant has also failed to prove, on a balance of probabilities, that the Minister acted in bad faith or with serious recklessness in reviewing his application. Although he points to the fact that the Minister misplaced his file for a period of time, this fact cannot be equated with bad faith or serious recklessness. The review of the application stretched over several years from the time it was received until the time the Minister gave his final answer. Despite the delay at issue, an analysis of the circumstances does not support the conclusion that the Minister acted in bad faith or with serious recklessness. Here again, the burden of proof was on Mr. Hinse. We cannot find that he discharged it.

(b) The Other Applications

[115] The appellant submitted a second application for mercy on July 23, 1980. This application was only three paragraphs long. On December 30 of that same year, a special adviser to the Minister informed Mr. Hinse that his application had been denied because it contained only [TRANSLATION] “vague allegations of mistaken identification that occurred during [his] trial”, and because after reading Judge Omer Côté’s judgment, the Department had “found nothing to support [his] affirmation”: A.R., vol. X, at p. 108.

[116] A week later, on January 6, 1981, Mr. Hinse submitted a third application to the Minister. On January 22, the special adviser to the Minister asked him to set out in writing, and in detail, the grounds that he intended to raise in support of his application for mercy, as well as all the contacts he had had with other judicial and political authorities. The adviser stated that [TRANSLATION] “it is essential that you disclose the new facts that lead you to request an interview with the Minister”: A.R., vol. X, at p. 111. Mr. Hinse sent the Minister a more detailed letter on March 9, 1981.

[117] As the Court of Appeal observed, most of the facts Mr. Hinse alleged in that letter were the same as the ones that had been set out in his 1967 application, the exception being allegations with respect to an identification error made by officer Scott and to the conduct of counsel and of the judge at his trial. First, Mr. Hinse claimed that Mr. Véronneau — with whom he had been jointly tried — had retained a criminal lawyer [TRANSLATION] “who had close ties to Judge Omer Côté” and who had previously defended Mr. Beaulieu, Mr. Levasseur and Mr. Savard in another case: A.R., vol. XI, at p. 10. This lawyer allegedly recommended to these three individuals that they not testify for the defence, and this enabled him to have Mr. Véronneau acquitted. Next, Mr. Hinse explained that officer Scott had had an excellent lead from the outset. Upon arriving at the scene of the crime, he had made a connection with a search he had undertaken two months earlier when he had stopped four suspicious individuals in a car with its lights turned off at about 10:00 p.m. in front of the victims’ house. Those four individuals were Mr. Beausoleil, Mr. Véronneau, Mr. Duval and Mr. Pressé. According to Mr. Hinse, Mr. Beausoleil and Mr. Duval had confided to him that officer Scott had also taken down the name of André Lavoie, since the vehicle was registered in his name. Mr. Hinse said that at the trial, officer Scott had referred to his notes from that initial arrest and that he had been “shocked” to hear the officer testify that he had been the fifth occupant of the car even though his name did not appear in the officer’s notebook: ibid., at p. 11.

[TRANSLATION] I regret to inform you that, despite the additional explanations you gave to the Minister, your case is not one that justifies his intervention. Indeed, the Minister of Justice exercises his power of intervention in exceptional circumstances only, and no such circumstances were revealed in the thorough examination of your file.

[119] Finally, several years later, the appellant retained a lawyer who, in November 1990, sent a fourth application for mercy to the Minister of the day. The lawyer explained that the Commission de police had conducted an investigation and prepared a report, which he enclosed with his letter. In reply, the Minister acknowledged that the report [TRANSLATION] “describes fresh evidence highly deserving of consideration”: A.R., vol. XI, at p. 75. However, she expressed the opinion that the issues raised by the Commission de police could also be heard by the Quebec Court of Appeal without this task having to be imposed on it under s. 690 Cr. C. The Minister invited Mr. Hinse’s lawyer to contact her again should the Court of Appeal refuse to consider his case.

[120] As in the case of the first application for mercy, we find that none of the Ministers who considered the three subsequent applications acted in bad faith or with serious recklessness. Mr. Hinse cannot reasonably argue that the Minister failed to conduct a meaningful review in respect of any of those applications. The relevant correspondence shows the opposite to be true. Nor has the requisite element of bad faith or serious recklessness been proven. Regarding Mr. Hinse’s second application (1980), which was very brief and contained no new evidence or legal arguments, it was open to the Minister to find it frivolous and to reject it on that basis. As for the third application, as the Court of Appeal wrote, [TRANSLATION] “[g]iven that Mr. Hinse did not go into much detail, the new allegations, based on vague irregularities committed by the police officers, attorneys and trial judge, could have struck the Minister as being of little consequence”: para. 181. In the case of the fourth application (1990), the Minister justified her decision by noting that the Court of Appeal could agree on its own to consider the case without her having to intervene. This was a reasonable attitude to adopt, particularly since the Minister did not reject Mr. Hinse’s application outright, but asked him to contact her again should the Court of Appeal refuse to consider his case. It should be noted that an application for mercy is an exceptional remedy that is available only after the applicant’s legal rights have been exhausted: Thatcher, at para. 9.

[121] In short, after a proper analysis of the Ministers’ conduct based on the duty they owed and the applicable standard of fault, we cannot conclude that Mr. Hinse has discharged his burden, namely that of proving that the Ministers acted in bad faith or with serious recklessness in dealing with his applications for mercy. Our analysis could end with this finding, but like the Court of Appeal, we believe that some comments on causation and damages are in order.

C. Causation

[122] The trial judge concluded that Mr. Hinse had proven causation, once again by means of presumptions of fact. In her view, [TRANSLATION] “[a] sustained, concerted, extensive, competent and timely review of his initial efforts would surely have brought the errors to the AGC’s attention”: para. 75. Her finding on causation was based primarily on the 1990 report of the Commission de police: because the Commission de police had concluded that a miscarriage of justice had occurred, a meaningful review by the Minister should logically have led to the same result. In light of the nine years that had elapsed between the time when Mr. Hinse contacted the Commission de police (1988) and the date of his acquittal by this Court (1997), the trial judge found that Mr. Hinse could have been acquitted in the mid-1970s were it not for the AGC’s fault: paras. 77 and 97.

[123] We agree with the Court of Appeal that, even if it were assumed that the Minister failed to conduct a meaningful review between 1967 and 1972, it was not possible to conclude that such a review would inevitably have led to the discovery of the irregularities brought to light in 1990 by the report of the Commission de police. A comparison of the information in that report with the information that was available when Mr. Hinse made his initial application to the Minister reveals two crucial pieces of evidence that could not, in all likelihood, have been discovered at that time.

[124] According to the evidence in the record, it was not until November 1988, when Mr. Hinse wrote to the Commission de police, that he provided [TRANSLATION] “for the first time certain crucial details that would guide the work of Commissioner Fourcaudot”: C.A. decision, at para. 65. The report of the Commission de police shows that the most significant facts that emerged from the investigation were officer Scott’s recantation of his testimony and, to a lesser degree, the willingness of the true perpetrators of the crime to co-operate with the investigator in 1989 and 1990.

[125] Where the perpetrators of the crime are concerned, it should be noted that after they had signed their affidavits in 1966, Mr. Beausoleil, Mr. Savard and Mr. Levasseur refused to co-operate further with the police. In the second set of affidavits signed in 1971, Mr. Pressé and Mr. Beausoleil merely attested to their having been in the car that was searched by officer Scott in Mont-Laurier on September 10, 1961, and to the fact that Mr. Lavoie and Mr. Hinse had not been in it. They made no declarations about the robbery committed in December of that same year of which Mr. Hinse had been found guilty. At the time of the investigation carried out by Mr. Fourcaudot in 1989, Mr. Beausoleil added [TRANSLATION] “many details” about the events, and Mr. Véronneau, although he had refused to sign an affidavit, ended up stating that Mr. Hinse [TRANSLATION] “wasn’t even there”: A.R., vol. XI, at pp. 54 and 53.

[126] Even more importantly, the investigator received a call from Mr. Duval, who was then living in the Dominican Republic, in 1990. Mr. Duval revealed for the first time several details regarding the conspiracy and the robbery, stating that Mr. Hinse was in no way involved. He subsequently sent the investigator a letter confirming this information. However, the police report of September 12, 1966, prepared by an officer named Bourgeois (officer in charge of the Sûreté du Québec detachment at Mont-Laurier), indicated that Mr. Duval had provided the police with information about the robbery and that he was supposed to be questioned further. Mr. Duval was never questioned after that.

[127] This “oversight” can perhaps be explained by a comment made by Mr. Duval in his conversation with the investigator in 1990 that he knew officer Bourgeois quite well at the time, as the latter had taken part in some chain letter schemes he was operating. This is why Mr. Duval [TRANSLATION] “was never bothered by the police, even though he believed that they knew he was behind the robbery”: A.R., vol. XI, at p. 56. Officer Bourgeois had played an important role in the initial investigation, particularly in the identification of Mr. Hinse by the victims of the robbery.

[128] Nevertheless, the evidence does not support an assertion that Mr. Duval would have been prepared to incriminate himself in this way or to co-operate with the police (or the Minister) at the time of the initial police investigation, or at the time of Mr. Hinse’s first application for mercy. This information was in fact highly incriminating. As the AGC points out, these statements were ultimately made from the Dominican Republic, a country with which Canada does not have an extradition treaty.

[129] Moreover, the particular focus of the report of the Commission de police is on officer Scott’s recantation of his testimony. This is clear from both the language used and the number of pages dedicated to this subject. Out of the report's 35 pages, the role of officer Scott takes up approximately 9, whereas the analysis of each of the other exculpatory factors rarely exceeds 2 pages. The officer's testimony had [TRANSLATION] "made a strong impression" on the trial judge, because he had declared under oath, without any hesitation, that he had seen Mr. Hinse among the individuals in the car he had stopped on September 10, 1961: A.R., vol. XI, at p. 56. This declaration contradicted Mr. Hinse's version of the facts. The officer testified that he had known Mr. Hinse for a long time and swore categorically that Mr. Hinse had been in Mont-Laurier that day. It was not until his third meeting with the investigator of the Commission de police, on July 31, 1990, that officer Scott admitted he might have been mistaken.

[130] It should be mentioned that officer Scott had difficulty identifying the exact year in which he had started having doubts about his testimony. He said it may have been around 1974 or 1975, after a friend of Mr. Duval's (Yves Chalifoux) and Mr. Duval himself both told him he was wrong. It was these conversations that in all likelihood sowed a doubt in his mind, and that doubt finally surfaced during the investigation of the Commission de police. On this point, too, it cannot be assumed that officer Scott would have recanted his testimony earlier.

[131] As a result, even if the Minister had decided to conduct a more extensive investigation at the time of Mr. Hinse's first application, there is no evidence that officer Scott would have recanted his testimony then, as he did later, or that the individuals involved in the robbery would have been inclined to answer the Minister's questions. It is highly likely that, 20 years after the events, these individuals agreed to co-operate with the authorities because they had less to fear, or because they no longer had anything to lose.

[132] Also, Poulin J.'s assertion that the Minister's investigation should [TRANSLATION] "surely" have led to the same result as the report of the Commission de police is based on assumptions and inferences that are not supported by any analysis. It is well established that, even where a fault has been committed, the person who committed it cannot be held liable for damage that was not related to the fault. Rather, the damage must have been a logical, direct and immediate consequence of the fault (art. 1053 C.C.L.C.; Parrot v. Thompson, 1984 CanLII 118 (SCC), [1984] 1 S.C.R. 57, at p. 71; Dallaire v. Paul-Émile Martel Inc., 1989 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 419; Baudouin, Deslauriers and Moore, at No. 1-683).

[133] Furthermore, as the Commission de police explained in a letter to Mr. Hinse, it [TRANSLATION] "may, at the written request of a citizen, investigate the conduct of municipal police or Sûreté du Québec officers if the citizen provides sufficient grounds for his or her request": A.R., vol. XI, at p. 23. In the case at bar, the Commission de police instructed an investigator to conduct an investigation in accordance with the Act respecting police organization, R.S.Q., c. O-8.1, ss. 64 to 88 (later replaced by the Police Act, CQLR, c. P-13.1 (S.Q. 2000, c. 12, s. 353)). Under that Act, the investigator had the power to enter any police station and examine any documents or other effects relating to the complaint. He could also require of any person any information or document he considered necessary. Moreover, all persons were prohibited from hindering his work in any manner whatever, deceiving him through concealment or by making a false declaration, refusing to furnish him with information or a document relating to the complaint, refusing to allow him to make a copy of such a document, or concealing or destroying such a document: ss. 71, 84 and 85 of the Act respecting police organization.

[134] In this case, the report of the Commission de police indicates that the investigator [TRANSLATION] [f]or several months . . . focused his efforts on building up a huge file: he met with numerous individuals and collected their stories; he searched through the records of several courthouses and examined all the documents he could lay his hands on; and, finally, he reported his findings to the Commission.

[135] However, it is clear that the Minister did not have those same powers at the material times. It was not until 2002 that the Minister was given the powers of a commissioner under the Inquiries Act, including the power to summon witnesses and to compel them to testify and to produce documents: s. 696.2(2) Cr. C.; ss. 4 and 5 of the Inquiries Act. These new powers were deemed necessary because of the inefficiency of the existing review process: House of Commons Debates, vol. 137, No. 054, 1st Sess., 37th Parl., May 3, 2001, at p. 3583; Debates of the Senate, vol. 139, No. 66, 1st Sess., 37th Parl., November 1, 2001, at p. 1612.

[136] A distinction must therefore be made between the investigation conducted by the Commission de police from 1988 to 1990 and the meaningful review of an application for mercy that the Minister was required to conduct in the late 1960s. At that time, the Minister had neither the power nor the duty to compel witnesses to testify, to require the production of documents, or to review police or prosecution files, which would have enabled him or her to build up a file as extensive and exhaustive as the one amassed by the Commission de police. On this point, we cannot accept Mr. Hinse's argument that officer Scott might have retracted his testimony sooner had the Minister confronted him with certain evidence that discredited it. The Minister was not required to take such action; he was simply required to consider Mr. Hinse's application in good faith and to determine on the basis of the file submitted to him whether additional information was needed or intervention was appropriate. The evidence does not establish that at the time of the first application, the Minister would probably have discovered the key evidence uncovered by the investigator of the Commission de police 20 years later. The burden of proving that the Minister would probably have done so was on Mr. Hinse, and it was up to him to discharge this burden.

[137] In this regard, Poulin J. did not really explain her reasoning on the issue of causation, but merely stated that the facts set out in her reasons, which Mr. Hinse had proven by means of presumptions of fact, established a causal connection: para. 98. However, it is clear from her reasons that her finding that the miscarriage of justice would have been ascertained quickly if the AGC had acted promptly and competently (para. 97) is based on the erroneous premise that the Minister, like the investigator of the Commission de police, had a duty to conduct a thorough investigation. Because Poulin J., in so doing, drew inferences and made findings of fact that were not supported by the evidence, the Court of Appeal was justified in intervening: Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235, at para. 22; H.L. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 25, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 401, at para. 4. It has therefore not been proven that the alleged failure, namely the failure to conduct a meaningful review or to conduct one more expeditiously, was the probable cause of the failure to discover the miscarriage of justice in Mr. Hinse's case. To conclude otherwise would be to rely on mere conjecture or remote hypotheticals. A court's conclusion with respect to civil liability cannot be based on speculation such as this.

D. Damages

[138] In our opinion, the Court of Appeal was also right to intervene on the issue of damages. There was an overriding error in the trial judge's analysis. She failed to take into account the requirement that the liability be apportioned solidarily, and to establish the amounts being awarded on the basis of the actual liability of each of the solidary debtors. As the Court of Appeal noted, [TRANSLATION] “to every extent that more than one solidary debtor could be liable for the heads of claim, Mr. Hinse’s releases made it necessary to examine the causal faults and apportion liability”: para. 189. Mr. Hinse should have borne the shares of the solidary debtors he had released: arts. 1526 and 1690 C.C.Q.

[139] The trial judge addressed the issue of damages as if the Minister were the only party to commit a fault and as if the damage sustained by Mr. Hinse was due solely to the Minister’s [TRANSLATION] “institutional inertia”: paras. 75-77. Indeed, rather than fixing the damages amounts that could be specifically attributed to the AGC, she simply relied on Mr. Hinse’s claims:

[TRANSLATION] Furthermore, since, following the transaction entered into between the AGQ and Hinse, the latter amended his proceeding so as to claim from the AGC only the portion he had attributed to [the AGC] on the basis of the various heads of damage he raised, the Court will examine, for the purpose of this proceeding and in compliance with the provisions quoted above, only the applications that are in line with this new reality and that concern solely the AGC. [para. 22]

[140] Thus, except in the case of the punitive damages, the trial judge awarded the amounts being claimed on the assumption that Mr. Hinse had correctly limited them to the amounts that solely concerned the AGC. However, the apportionment of the liability of Mr. Hinse’s various co-debtors had to be determined on the basis of the seriousness of each one’s fault: art. 1478 C.C.Q. The trial judge could not simply rely on the apportionment suggested by Mr. Hinse; her role as the arbiter of damages required that she herself fix each debtor’s share of the liability.

[141] In addition to this overriding error, which skews the amounts awarded under all the heads of damages, the grounds for each of those amounts were also flawed.

(1) Pecuniary Damage

[142] Poulin J. ordered the AGC to pay a total of $855,229.61 in respect of pecuniary damage. This amount seems excessive, given that the AGQ had already paid $1,100,000 under this head pursuant to the transaction entered into with Mr. Hinse. At the very least, the onus was on Mr. Hinse to show that the payments concerned distinct heads of compensation. He did not do so. Moreover, when the amounts awarded are broken down, it is clear that there was no justification for the amounts being claimed.

[143] The amount of $127,214 awarded for a loss of income by Mr. Hinse that resulted from his retiring at age 60 instead of at 65 is unjustified. In Quebec law, only an injury which is an immediate and direct consequence of a wrongful act gives rise to an entitlement to damages: art. 1607 C.C.Q. This was a personal decision on Mr. Hinse’s part. There is no direct connection between the Ministers’ conduct and his decision. Poulin J. erred in awarding damages under this head of claim.

[144] Poulin J. ordered the AGC to pay Mr. Hinse $193,660.88 under the head of claim for fees and costs incurred in respect of the proceedings he brought in the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court between 1990 and 1997. She was wrong to do so. Even if the Minister had granted one of Mr. Hinse’s applications, he would have either ordered a new trial or referred the matter to the Court of Appeal. In short, Mr. Hinse would have had to pay these fees anyway. This is not damage that resulted from the alleged faults.

[145] Poulin J. awarded $500,000 for investigation costs, wasted time and effort, photocopies, transcripts, travel, postage, etc. The Court of Appeal correctly found that wasted time and efforts expended to obtain justice are inconveniences that are inherent in the efforts of anyone who is involved in legal proceedings: para. 215. Unless there has been an abuse of process, these are not heads of damage under which Mr. Hinse can seek compensation. Moreover, they fall under non-pecuniary damage, given that there is no evidence of lost income. Since Poulin J. awarded a separate amount in respect of non-pecuniary damage, this resulted in double recovery.

(2) Non-pecuniary Damage

[146] In the Andrews trilogy, this Court set an upper limit of $100,000 for non-pecuniary losses resulting from a serious bodily injury: Andrews v. Grand & Toy Alberta Ltd., 1978 CanLII 1 \(SCC\), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 229; Thornton v. School District No. 57 (Prince George), 1978 CanLII 12 \(SCC\), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 267; Arnold v. Teno, 1978 CanLII 2 \(SCC\), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 287. This limit applies in the common law provinces and Quebec alike. Relying on its own decision in France Animation, the Court of Appeal applied the limit in the instant case. But when it rendered its decision, the Court of Appeal did not have the benefit of this Court's judgment in Cinar, which confirmed that the limit is inapplicable to damages for non-pecuniary loss that do not stem from bodily injury: Cinar Corporation v. Robinson, 2013 SCC 73, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 1168, at para. 97. This being said, even if the Court of Appeal erred on this point, the trial judge had nonetheless erred in awarding an amount under this head of damages.

[147] Poulin J., after comparing the amount — $1,900,000 — claimed by Mr. Hinse for non-pecuniary damage with the amounts granted in the Marshall, Proulx, Sophonow, Milgaard and Truscott cases, ordered the AGC to pay him the exact amount he sought, expressing the opinion that it was [TRANSLATION] “not excessive”: para. 198. In Cinar, this Court reiterated that to properly assess the amounts to be awarded, a court should compare the case at hand with other analogous cases in which amounts were awarded for non-pecuniary damage: paras. 105-6. In the case at bar, the comparisons made were shaky and did not justify a quantum of that magnitude.

[148] In the case of Donald Marshall Jr., a royal commission was struck to review the case in 1989. In his report submitted in 1990, Justice Evans valued the amount to compensate for non-pecuniary losses at $225,000, to which were added $158,000 in interest, for a total of $383,000 in compensation. Mr. Marshall, who had been convicted of murder in 1971, had spent 11 years in prison (between the ages of 17 and 28) and had been acquitted in 1983: G. T. Evans, Commission of Inquiry Concerning the Adequacy of Compensation Paid to Donald Marshall, Jr., Report of the Commissioner (1990); In the Matter of Steven Truscott, at p. 48; C.A. decision, at paras. 221-22; Sup. Ct. decision, at para. 184.

[149] In the Proulx case, Mr. Proulx had been convicted of murder on November 10, 1991, and was acquitted on August 20, 1992: Proulx v. Québec (Procureur général), 1997 CanLII 8157 \(QC CS\), [1997] R.J.Q. 2509 (Sup. Ct.). He sued the AGQ for $1,443,000 in damages. In 1997, Letarte J. awarded him $250,000 in compensation for non-pecuniary damage: 1997 CanLII 8342 \(QC CS\), [1997] R.J.Q. 2516 (Sup. Ct.), at p. 2524.

[150] In the inquiry regarding Thomas Sophonow, the Honourable Peter Cory recommended in 2001 the payment in compensation of approximately $2,600,000, including interest, of which $1,750,000 would be for non-pecuniary damage. Mr. Sophonow had undergone three trials and spent nearly four years in prison after being unjustly charged with murder. The liability for payment of the compensation was to be apportioned among the city (Winnipeg), the province (Manitoba) and the federal government: P. deC. Cory, The Inquiry Regarding Thomas Sophonow: The Investigation, Prosecution and Consideration of Entitlement to Compensation (2001); C.A. decision, at para. 222; Sup. Ct. decision, at para. 184.

[151] In the Milgaard case, a total of $10,000,000 was paid to Mr. Milgaard in 2008 following the settlement of two civil liability suits. The exact apportionment of liability among the levels of government is unknown. Mr. Milgaard had been charged with murder in 1970 and had spent 23 years in prison. He had been shot during one of two escape attempts and had suffered abuse while incarcerated: In the Matter of Steven Truscott, at p. 49.

[152] Finally, in the Truscott case, Justice Robins recommended in 2008 that a payment of $6,500,000 be made to Mr. Truscott, who had been convicted of murder at the age of 14 and sentenced to death by hanging. Mr. Truscott, who was the subject of an unprecedented reference to this Court, had spent 10 years in prison and had finally been on parole for almost 40 years, living under an assumed name. Justice Robins felt that, in the circumstances, Mr. Truscott should be paid $250,000 per year of incarceration and $100,000 per year on parole. Given that both levels of government had been involved in the case virtually from the beginning, Justice Robins was of the opinion that they should share the costs of the compensation equally: In the Matter of Steven Truscott, at p. 56.

[153] As the Court of Appeal pointed out, the amounts granted in the Marshall, Sophonow and Truscott cases were made further to the recommendations of advisory bodies. They did not result from judicial awards and were based on considerations that are very different from those on which damages are based: C.A. decision, at para. 222. Only the compensation assessed in Proulx was the result of a judicial process. What is more, all these cases can be distinguished from the case at bar in that they involved the much more serious crime of murder and in that the period of incarceration was longer in almost all of them.

[154] Moreover, we note that under the transaction between the AGQ and Mr. Hinse, the latter was paid only $1,100,000 under this head of damages, whereas he had been claiming $3,000,000 in this regard from the AGQ and the AGC, for which they were to be solidarily liable. We realize that care must be taken in comparing amounts agreed to in transactions with amounts resulting from judicial awards. Nevertheless, in this case, Mr. Hinse and the AGQ fixed the amount under this head of damages in their agreement after each side had made its case. In the circumstances of this case, we have difficulty seeing why the federal government should be ordered to pay more in respect of non-pecuniary damage than the amount paid by the province. Even if the Minister had committed a fault, we find it hard to justify finding that such a fault would be as serious as, or even more serious than, the ones committed by Mont-Laurier and the AGQ with regard to the arrest, the police investigation and the criminal prosecution that led to Mr. Hinse's wrongful conviction and imprisonment. At the very most, such a fault would have prolonged the damage already caused by the town and the AGQ.

[155] In our opinion, therefore, an order that the AGC pay $1,900,000 after the AGQ had paid $1,100,000 under the same head of damages would be disproportionate. In a civil liability case, the court's primary objective is to compensate the plaintiff for damage he or she has suffered, not to punish the debtor.

(3) Punitive Damages

[156] Poulin J. ordered the AGC to pay Mr. Hinse $2,500,000 in punitive damages under s. 49 of the Charter of human rights and freedoms, CQLR, c. C-12 (“Charter”). Section 3 C.L.P.A. provides that the federal Crown is liable for damages for which, if it were a person, it would be liable for the purpose of assessing damage caused by the fault of a servant of the Crown. According to s. 2 C.L.P.A., “liability” means “extracontractual civil liability” in the Quebec context. It must therefore be determined whether this reference in the C.L.P.A. encompasses the remedy of punitive damages provided for in the Charter. This question does not appear to have been answered by the courts. We are of the opinion that it must be answered in the affirmative.

[157] First, when Parliament enacted the Crown Liability Act, the predecessor to the C.L.P.A., in 1953, the intention was “to make the federal crown liable to the full extent to which a person in a private capacity would be liable under the provincial law”: House of Commons Debates, vol. IV, 7th Sess., 21st Parl., March 26, 1953, at p. 3330; see also s. 3\(1\) of the Crown Liability Act. Under the C.L.P.A., the Crown continues to be liable for damages for which, if it were a person, it would be liable in respect of damage caused by the fault of a servant of the Crown, the word “person” meaning a natural person of full age and capacity: ss. 3 and 2.1.

[158] Second, as can be seen from the language used in the C.L.P.A. and from its bijural nature, Parliament has referred to the applicable provincial law in very general terms: extracontractual civil liability in Quebec and liability in tort in any other province. Even before 1953, this Court [TRANSLATION] “had already held that the suppletive law in delict and in tort is the law of the place where the right of action arose”: P. Garant, with the collaboration of P. Garant and J. Garant, Droit administratif (6th ed. 2010), at p. 913. The applicable provincial law to which the C.L.P.A. refers includes not only the relevant articles of the C.C.Q., but also all the provincial statutes that modify the liability law of the province where the cause of action arose, including the Charter: see s. 8.1 of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21; Hogg, Monahan and Wright, at p. 436.

[159] Third, although it is true that there is a “purist” view according to which the concept of punitive damages does not exist in the traditional civil law (see, e.g., Chaput v. Romain, 1955 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1955] S.C.R. 834, at p. 841; Baudouin, Deslauriers and Moore, at No. 1-373), the awarding of such damages has been permitted in Quebec civil law in certain circumstances for many years: see, e.g., the Tree Protection Act, CQLR, c. P-37. In addition, at the time of the reform of the C.C.Q., the draft Civil Code of Québec provided that punitive damages could be widely awarded in cases involving gross or intentional fault: Baudouin, Deslauriers and Moore, at No. 1-373. Although the legislature ultimately abandoned this idea, punitive damages are now referred to in art. 1621 C.C.Q., but they remain an exceptional remedy given that they can be awarded only where they are expressly provided for by law: de Montigny v. Brossard (Succession), 2010 SCC 51, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 64, at para. 48; Béliveau St-Jacques v. Fédération des employées et employés de services publics inc., 1996 CanLII 208 (SCC), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 345, at para. 20.

[160] In our opinion, the scheme established by the Charter in this regard can be seen as complementing the rules of extracontractual liability. The Charter [TRANSLATION] “has the effect of complementing the protection afforded by the Civil Code by creating a new remedy that enables victims to claim punitive damages that are not available under the [Civil] Code”: L. Perret, “De l’impact de la Charte des droits et libertés de la personne sur le droit civil des contrats et de la responsabilité au Québec” (1981), 12 R.G.D. 121, at p. 170.

[161] Thus, the scheme of punitive damages provided for in s. 49 of the Charter is not distinct from and inconsistent with the rules of extracontractual civil liability. Rather, they contribute to this area of the law without being totally subsumed by it. The two sets of rules intersect at several levels, but the remedy under s. 49 is not entirely subordinate to the conditions for civil liability. It can constitute an autonomous scheme that creates remedies that are not based in civil liability: de Montigny, at para. 44; Cinar, at para. 124; Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse) v. Communauté urbaine de Montréal, 2004 SCC 30, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 789, at para. 26.

[162] Before the Charter came into force in 1976, fundamental rights were protected by the civil liability provisions of the C.C.L.C. And [TRANSLATION] “the civil law concept of fault is an extremely flexible one that affords protection to individuals in all spheres”: Perret, at p. 124; L. LeBel, “La protection des droits fondamentaux et la responsabilité civile” (2004), 49 McGill L.J. 231, at p. 235. In the instant case, the alleged wrongful conduct essentially occurred before the C.C.Q. came into force. The preliminary provision of the C.C.Q. now expressly provides that the C.C.Q., “in harmony with the Charter . . . and the general principles of law, governs persons, relations between persons, and property”. The C.C.L.C. lacked equivalents for both the preliminary provision and art. 1621 of the C.C.Q., but we are nevertheless of the opinion that this does not affect our analysis. Although these provisions attest to the relationship between the Charter and the C.C.Q., they do not create that relationship and are therefore not essential to our conclusion.

[163] For these reasons, we conclude that the reference in the C.L.P.A. to provincial law encompasses the remedy of punitive damages provided for in the Charter. We would add that since punitive damages are also available in the law of the common law provinces, this conclusion favours a more uniform application of the law of Crown liability across the country. Having resolved this preliminary issue, we will now consider whether it was appropriate to award such damages in this case.

(b) Award of Punitive Damages

[164] Section 49 of the Charter provides that, “[i]n case of unlawful and intentional interference, the tribunal may, in addition, condemn the person guilty of it to punitive damages.” This Court explained what “unlawful and intentional interference” means in Quebec (Public Curator) v. Syndicat national des employés de l’hôpital St-Ferdinand, 1996 CanLII 172 (SCC), [1996] 3 S.C.R. 211:

Consequently, there will be unlawful and intentional interference within the meaning of the second paragraph of s. 49 of the Charter when the person who commits the unlawful interference has a state of mind that implies a desire or intent to cause the consequences of his or her wrongful conduct, or when that person acts with full knowledge of the immediate and natural or at least extremely probable consequences that his or her conduct will cause. This test is not as strict as specific intent, but it does go beyond simple negligence. Thus, an individual’s recklessness, however wild and foolhardy, as to the consequences of his or her wrongful acts will not in itself satisfy this test. [Emphasis added; para. 121.]

[165] In the instant case, given that the Ministers’ conduct cannot be equated with bad faith or serious recklessness, we cannot conclude that there was intentional interference. The evidence does not support a finding that the Ministers’ state of mind was such that they intended to harm Mr. Hinse or had knowledge of the adverse consequences their conduct would have for him. This stringent test was not met, and punitive damages should not have been awarded.

(4) Extrajudicial Fees

[166] Finally, the trial judge concluded that the AGC's conduct had amounted to an abuse of process, and she ordered the AGC to pay Mr. Hinse $100,000 for the fees paid to the first law firm he had retained: para. 230. She also awarded $440,000 for services rendered by the firm that had replaced the first and with which Mr. Hinse had entered into a pro bono agreement: para. 240. To justify her decision to award this amount even though Mr. Hinse had not had to pay his lawyers, the trial judge relied on an Ontario judgment: para. 236, quoting 1465778 Ontario Inc. v. 1122077 Ontario Ltd. (2006), 2006 CanLII 35819 \(ON CA\), 82 O.R. (3d) 757 (C.A.). She was of the opinion that it would be [TRANSLATION] "unfair for a person at fault to have the benefit of an agreement [concluded] for the purpose of helping out a victim": para. 239. However, she stated that in order to avoid unjust enrichment, such an award could be made only if there was an agreement under which the party was to remit the amount to his or her counsel: paras. 237-39. It should be pointed out that the total amount of the transaction with the AGQ — $5.3 million — had included $800,000 for Mr. Hinse's lawyers.

[167] The Court of Appeal reversed the trial judge's conclusion, finding that the AGC was entitled to answer the case against him given the amounts being claimed and the legal principles at issue. It found that the AGC had not shown bad faith in defending himself and that he had not taken multiple procedural steps or unnecessarily and improperly continued the proceedings. The Court of Appeal also cautioned against [TRANSLATION] "[indiscriminately] importing common law precedents" and stated that "[t]he judge wrongly referred to a case from Ontario case law to grant the claim, extrajudicial fees being different from costs": paras. 243-44.

[168] In Viel v. Entreprises Immobilières du Terroir ltée, 2002 CanLII 41120 \(QC CA\), [2002] R.J.Q. 1262, the Court of Appeal had confirmed that in Quebec law, it is only in exceptional cases that a party can be required to pay the fe 72-73. There must be a fault committed by the other party, damage, and a causal connection between the fault and the damage. In Viel, the Court of Appeal mentioned the distinction between an abuse on the merits and an abuse of process, and noted that only an abuse of process can justify awarding extrajudicial fees as damages:

[TRANSLATION] In theory, and save exceptional circumstances, the fees paid by one party to its attorney cannot, in my opinion, be considered direct damages that sanction abuse on the merits. There is no adequate causation between the fault (abuse on the merits) and the damage. Adequate causation corresponds to the event or events having a logical, direct and immediate relation with the origin of the injury suffered. . . .

Conversely, regardless of whether there is abuse on the merits, a party [whose conduct amounts to an abuse of process] causes injury to the opposing party, which, to combat the abuse, needlessly pays judicial fees to its attorney. In that event, there is an actual causation between the fault and the damage. [Emphasis added; emphasis in original deleted.]

(Viel, at paras. 77-79)

[169] Since Viel, the Quebec legislature has added provisions to the Code of Civil Procedure, CQLR, c. C-25 ("C.C.P."), that confirm the power of the courts to impose sanctions for improper use of procedure: see arts. 54.1 to 54.6. Article 54.4 C.C.P. provides that a court may, inter alia, "condemn a party to pay, in addition to costs, damages in reparation for the prejudice suffered by another party, including the fees and extrajudicial costs incurred by that party”.

[170] Thus, in Quebec, damages can be awarded in respect of extrajudicial fees in cases of abuse of process in order to compensate a party who has suffered damage resulting from the fault of the other party. In the common law provinces, costs are traditionally awarded to indemnify the successful party for expenses incurred either in defending an unfounded claim (if the successful party is the defendant) or in pursuing a valid legal right (if the plaintiff prevails): see, e.g., British Columbia (Minister of Forests) v. Okanagan Indian Band, 2003 SCC 71, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 371, at para. 21; Young v. Young, 1993 CanLII 34 (SCC), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 3, at p. 135. This Court has pointed out that at common law, the modern rules with respect to costs have objectives that are not limited to compensation. For example, an order as to costs could penalize a party who has refused a reasonable settlement offer. It could also be used to sanction conduct that increased the duration or the expense of litigation, or that was otherwise unreasonable or vexatious: Okanagan Indian Band, at para. 25. In the common law provinces, therefore, the purpose of costs is not limited to compensation, but also includes repression. In this sense, costs differ from an order to pay extrajudicial fees as damages in Quebec law. These differences must be taken into account when considering judgments on these issues from the other provinces.

[171] The trial judge did not refer to any Quebec cases in which extrajudicial fees had been awarded in respect of pro bono representation. Rather, she turned to the case law of the Ontario Court of Appeal, which has stated on various occasions that a pro bono representation agreement is no bar to an award of costs: see, inter alia, 1465778 Ontario Inc.; Human Rights Commission (Ont.) v. Brillinger (2004), 2004 CanLII 16323 (ON CA), 185 O.A.C. 366; Reynolds v. Kingston (Police Services Board), 2007 ONCA 375, 86 O.R. (3d) 43. Since costs at common law are different in nature from extrajudicial fees in Quebec law, the comparison was inappropriate.

[172] In this Court, the appellant relies on art. 1608 C.C.Q. in support of the awarding of extrajudicial fees in an abuse of process case despite the existence of a pro bono agreement. This is the first time art. 1608 has been raised in this context. It reads as follows:

1608. The obligation of the debtor to pay damages to the creditor is neither reduced nor altered by the fact that the creditor receives a benefit from a third person, as a result of the injury he has suffered, except so far as the third person is subrogated to the rights of the creditor.

[173] The interveners Centre Pro Bono Québec and Pro Bono Law Ontario submit that this is exactly what happened in the situation now before us: counsel, acting on a pro bono basis, indemnified the victim of an abuse of process for the injury he sustained, and this intervention by a third person did not release the debtor from his obligation to make reparation for the injury. The AGC disputes this assertion, arguing that the damage that is normally compensable by an order to pay extrajudicial fees in a case of abuse of process is non-existent when representation is without cost. A party that is the victim of such an abuse cannot be a “creditor” within the meaning of art. 1608 C.C.Q.

[174] On its face, the AGC’s argument is appealing. The Court of Appeal held in Viel that the damage sustained by a party as a result of an abuse of process is the obligation to pay unnecessary legal fees: para. 79. If there is a pro bono agreement, the victim of the abuse of process pays no fees to his or her counsel (subject to the particulars of the agreement in each case). On the basis of this reasoning, given that the victim of the abuse of process has suffered no damage, he or she cannot be a creditor of the party whose conduct constituted such an abuse.

[175] However, if this were true in the case of an abuse of process, it would also have to be true in the other situations to which art. 1608 C.C.Q. applies. A person who suffers an injury caused by the fault of another person but receives an indemnity or a benefit from a third person under a contract of insurance or a contract of employment has not really suffered an injury either. But it is clear from the commentary of the Minister of Justice from the time of enactment of the C.C.Q. that it is to that type of situation in particular that art. 1608 C.C.Q. applies:

[TRANSLATION] [This article] is intended to resolve the question of whether the obligation on a debtor to compensate can be reduced or altered by payments made to the creditor by a third party, whether those payments are gratuitous or for consideration. This would be the case if, for example, without being required to do so, the creditor's employer continued to pay him his salary while he was unable to work; it would also be the case if the creditor's insurer paid him, in his capacity as an insured, the proceeds of an insurance policy he had taken out.

Giving a negative answer to this question may sometimes result in giving the creditor double compensation — what he receives from the third party and what he is paid by the debtor — and so conferring an enrichment on him; such an answer may also seem contrary to the principle of compensation for injury, since in some cases the injury may no longer exist as the third party may have already given compensation for it.

On the other hand, an affirmative answer seems contrary to the preventive function of the obligation to compensate, and may also lead to the somewhat disturbing result of relieving the debtor of any obligation to compensate solely as the result of the good will of a third party or the creditor's foresight in protecting himself at his own expense against the possibility of the injury.

The article comes down in favour of a negative answer to this question of whether the debtor's obligation to compensate may be reduced or altered by payments the creditor receives from a third party; but so as to avoid the principal cases in which double compensation would result, it expressly excludes situations where the third party is legally or by agreement subrogated to the creditor's rights.

This is the solution which seems fairest in the circumstances, especially as most of the payments made by third parties — social security indemnities, insurance payments or payments resulting from collective labour agreements — are not really in the nature of an indemnity and in any case are not meant to compensate for the injury sustained by the creditor. [Emphasis added.]

[176] We are aware that the drafting of art. 1608 C.C.Q. may have left something to be desired: “. . . that the creditor receives a benefit from a third person, as a result of the injury he has suffered” However, the legislature's intent is unambiguous, and we must give effect to it. Moreover, this interpretation is consistent with art. 1440 C.C.Q.:

1440. A contract has effect only between the contracting parties; it does not affect third persons, except where provided by law.

[177] Litigants are required to refrain from conduct that would amount to an abuse of process. A litigant who defaults on this obligation commits a fault and may be ordered to pay damages. By virtue of art. 1608 C.C.Q., the litigant's obligation to pay damages to the other party is neither reduced nor altered by the fact that the latter received a gratuitous benefit from his or her counsel. The rationale for art. 1608 C.C.Q., which is explained in the Minister of Justice's commentary, applies with equal force in a case of abuse of process: damages must be allowed to fully perform their preventive function, and a person who causes an “injury” must not be exempted from liability.

[178] Article 1608 C.C.Q. also attests to the legislature’s intention not to relieve debtors of their obligation to compensate even if this may result in double recovery for the victim. The legislature chose to exclude cases involving subrogation, as they are the ones that most often give rise to double recovery. The courts must defer to that choice. This means that, contrary to what the trial judge said, it is not necessary for the pro bono agreement to stipulate that any extrajudicial fees that might be awarded are to be paid to counsel. It is up to the parties and their counsel to negotiate the particulars of such agreements.

[179] Having made these clarifications, we will now consider the trial judge’s finding that the AGC’s conduct in this case amounted to an abuse of process. In particular, she stressed the fact that the AGC had

- insisted that Mr. Hinse prove every little detail;
- refused to give him certain documents;
- faulted Mr. Hinse for failing to call the decision makers who had played a role in his case to testify before the court;
- repeatedly stated that it was up to Mr. Hinse to discharge his burden of proof;
- blindly endorsed the theory of his own experts;
- waited until November 2, 2010, the first day of the trial, to acknowledge that Mr. Hinse was the victim of a miscarriage of justice;
- refused to allow the report of the Commission de police to be filed in the record; and
- contended that the witnesses who provided the “new evidence” adduced in the Court of Appeal that led to the stay of proceedings in June 1994 should be heard (para. 226).

[180] Like the Court of Appeal, however, we can see no abuse of process in the AGC’s conduct. It is true that the position taken by Dr. Chamberland, a psychiatric expert, that the effects of Mr. Hinse’s incarceration had been “beneficial” was unfortunate; the AGC should have disassociated himself from it. But this on its own does not amount to an abuse of process. The AGC did not multiply proceedings in an unreasonable manner or call unnecessary witnesses. He did not use procedural mechanisms excessively or unreasonably, nor did he act in bad faith or recklessly. The law on the federal Crown’s liability for a fault committed by the Minister in exercising his or her power of mercy was far from clear at the time of the dispute. It was reasonable and appropriate for the AGC to contest the appellant’s action and raise the defence that he did. The trial judge committed a palpable and overriding error in finding that there had been an abuse of process in the context of this case. The appellant was not entitled to the extrajudicial fees that were awarded.

V. Disposition

[181] There is no denying that the miscarriage of justice of which Mr. Hinse was a victim is most regrettable. However, in the absence of bad faith or serious recklessness on the Minister’s part, and of a causal connection between his actions and the alleged damage, Mr. Hinse’s action against the AGC must fail. We would dismiss the appeal without costs, as the Court of Appeal did.

596. [Powers of Minister of Justice] The Minister of Justice may, upon an application for the mercy of the Crown by or on behalf of a person who has been convicted in proceedings by indictment,

- (a) direct, by order in writing, a new trial before any court that he thinks proper, if after inquiry he is satisfied that in the circumstances a new trial should be directed;
- (b) refer the matter at any time to the court of appeal for hearing and determination by that court as if it were an appeal by the convicted person; or
- (c) refer to the court of appeal at any time, for its opinion, any question upon which he desires the assistance of that court, and the court shall furnish its opinion accordingly.

62. Section 596 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

596. [Powers of Minister of Justice] The Minister of Justice may, upon an application for the mercy of the Crown by or on behalf of a person who has been convicted in proceedings by indictment or who has been sentenced to preventive detention under Part XXI,

- (a) direct, by order in writing, a new trial or, in the case of a person under sentence of preventive detention, a new hearing, before any court that he thinks proper, if after inquiry he is satisfied that in the circumstances a new trial or hearing, as the case may be, should be directed;
- (b) refer the matter at any time to the court of appeal for hearing and determination by that court as if it were an appeal by the convicted person or the person under sentence of preventive detention, as the case may be; or
- (c) refer to the court of appeal at any time, for its opinion, any question upon which he desires the assistance of that court, and the court shall furnish its opinion accordingly.

617. [Powers of Minister of Justice] The Minister of Justice may, upon an application for the mercy of the Crown by or on behalf of a person who has been convicted in proceedings by indictment or who has been sentenced to preventive detention under Part XXI,

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Right to be tried within reasonable time — Delay of more than four years between charges and end of trial — Whether accused's right to be tried within reasonable time under s. 11(b) of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms infringed — New framework for applying s. 11(b).

J was charged in December 2008 for his role in a dial-a-dope operation. His trial ended in February 2013. J brought an application under s. 11(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, seeking a stay of proceedings due to the delay. In dismissing the application, the trial judge applied the framework set out in R. v. Morin, 1992 CanLII 89 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 771. Ultimately, J was convicted. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal.

Held: The appeal should be allowed, the convictions set aside and a stay of proceedings entered.

Per Abella, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Côté and Brown JJ.: The delay was unreasonable and J's s. 11(b) Charter right was infringed. The Morin framework for applying s. 11(b) has given rise to both doctrinal and practical problems, contributing to a culture of delay and complacency towards it. Doctrinally, the Morin framework is too unpredictable, too confusing, and too complex. It has itself become a burden on already over-burdened trial courts. From a practical perspective, the Morin framework's after-the-fact rationalization of delay does not encourage participants in the justice system to take preventative measures to address inefficient practices and resourcing problems.

A new framework is therefore required for applying s. 11(b). This framework is intended to focus the s. 11(b) analysis on the issues that matter and encourage all participants in the criminal justice system to cooperate in achieving reasonably prompt justice, with a view to fulfilling s. 11(b)'s important objectives.

At the heart of this new framework is a presumptive ceiling beyond which delay — from the charge to the actual or anticipated end of trial — is presumed to be unreasonable, unless exceptional circumstances justify it. The presumptive ceiling is 18 months for cases tried in the provincial court, and 30 months for cases in the superior court (or cases tried in the provincial court after a preliminary inquiry). Delay attributable to or waived by the defence does not count towards the presumptive ceiling.

Once the presumptive ceiling is exceeded, the burden is on the Crown to rebut the presumption of unreasonableness on the basis of exceptional circumstances. If the Crown cannot do so, a stay will follow. Exceptional circumstances lie outside the Crown's control in that (1) they are reasonably unforeseen or reasonably unavoidable, and (2) they cannot reasonably be remedied.

It is obviously impossible to identify in advance all circumstances that may qualify as exceptional for the purposes of adjudicating a s. 11(b) application. Ultimately, the determination of whether circumstances are exceptional will depend on the trial judge's good sense and experience. The list is not closed. However, in general, exceptional circumstances fall under two categories: discrete events and particularly complex cases.

If the exceptional circumstance relates to a discrete event (such as an illness or unexpected event at trial), the delay reasonably attributable to that event is subtracted from the total delay. If the exceptional circumstance arises from the case's complexity, the delay is reasonable and no further analysis is required.

An exceptional circumstance is the only basis upon which the Crown can discharge its burden to justify a delay that exceeds the ceiling. The seriousness or gravity of the offence cannot be relied on, nor can chronic institutional delay. Most significantly, the absence of prejudice can in no circumstances be used to justify delays after the presumptive ceiling is breached. Once so much time has elapsed, only circumstances that are genuinely outside the Crown's control and ability to remedy may furnish a sufficient excuse for the prolonged delay.

Below the presumptive ceiling, however, the burden is on the defence to show that the delay is unreasonable. To do so, the defence must establish that (1) it took meaningful steps that demonstrate a sustained effort to expedite the proceedings, and (2) the case took markedly longer than it reasonably should have. Absent these two factors, the s. 11(b) application must fail. Stays beneath the presumptive ceiling should only be granted in clear cases.

As to the first factor, while the defence might not be able to resolve the Crown's or the trial court's challenges, it falls to the defence to show that it attempted to set the earliest possible hearing dates, was cooperative with and responsive to the Crown and the court, put the Crown on timely notice when delay was becoming a problem, and conducted all applications (including the s. 11(b) application) reasonably and expeditiously. At the same time, trial judges should not take this opportunity, with the benefit of hindsight, to question every decision made by the defence. The defence is required to act reasonably, not perfectly.

Turning to the second factor, the defence must show that the time the case has taken markedly exceeds the reasonable time requirements of the case. These requirements derive from a variety of factors, including the complexity of the case and local considerations. Determining the time the case reasonably should have taken is not a matter of precise calculation, as has been the practice under the Morin framework.

For cases currently in the system, a contextual application of the new framework is required to avoid repeating the post-Askov situation, where tens of thousands of charges were stayed as a result of the abrupt change in the law. Therefore, for those cases, the new framework applies, subject to two qualifications. First, for cases in which the delay exceeds the ceiling, a transitional exceptional circumstance may arise where the charges were brought prior to the release of this decision. This transitional exceptional circumstance will apply when the Crown satisfies the court that the time the case has taken is justified based on the parties' reasonable reliance on the law as it previously existed. This requires a contextual assessment, sensitive to the manner in which the previous framework was applied, and the fact that the parties' behaviour cannot be judged strictly, against a standard of which they had no notice.

The second qualification applies to cases currently in the system in which the total delay (minus defence delay) falls below the ceiling. For these cases, the two criteria — defence initiative and whether the time the case has taken markedly exceeds what was reasonably required — must also be applied contextually, sensitive to the parties' reliance on the previous state of the law. Specifically, the defence need not demonstrate having taken initiative to expedite matters for the period of delay preceding this decision. Since defence initiative was not expressly required by the Morin framework, it would be unfair to require it for the period of time before the release of this decision. Further, if the delay was occasioned by an institutional delay that was, before this decision was released, reasonably acceptable in the relevant jurisdiction under the Morin framework, that institutional delay will be a component of the reasonable time requirements of the case for cases currently in the system.

In this case, the total delay between the charges and the end of trial was 49.5 months. As the trial judge found, four months of this delay were waived by J when he changed counsel shortly before the trial was set to begin, necessitating an adjournment. In addition, one and a half months of the delay were caused solely by J for the adjournment of the preliminary inquiry because his counsel was unavailable for closing submissions on the last day. This leaves a remaining delay of 44 months, an amount that vastly exceeds the presumptive ceiling of 30 months in the superior court. The Crown has failed to discharge its burden of demonstrating that the delay of 44 months (excluding defence delay) was reasonable. While the case against J may have been moderately complex given the amount of evidence and the number of co-accused, it was not so exceptionally complex that it would justify such a delay.

Nor does the transitional exceptional circumstance justify the delay in this case. Since J's charges were brought prior to the release of this decision, the Crown was operating without notice of the new framework within a jurisdiction with some systemic delay issues. But a total delay of 44 months (excluding defence delay), of which the vast majority was either Crown or institutional delay, in an ordinary dial-a-dope trafficking prosecution is simply unreasonable regardless of the framework under which the Crown was operating. Therefore, it cannot be said that the Crown's reliance on the previous state of the law was reasonable. While the Crown did make some efforts to bring the matter to trial more quickly, these efforts were too little and too late. And the systemic delay problems that existed at the time cannot justify the delay either. Much of the institutional delay could have been avoided had the Crown proceeded on the basis of a more reasonable plan by more accurately estimating the amount of time needed to present its case. To the extent that the trial judge held that this delay was reasonable, he erred.

All the parties were operating within the culture of complacency towards delay that has pervaded the criminal justice system in recent years. Broader structural and procedural changes, in addition to day-to-day efforts, are required to maintain the public's confidence by delivering justice in a timely manner. Ultimately, all participants in the justice system must work in concert to achieve speedier trials. After all, everyone stands to benefit from these efforts. Timely trials are possible. More than that, they are constitutionally required.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Cromwell, Wagner and Gascon JJ.: This Court's jurisprudence for dealing with alleged breaches of s. 11(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms over the last 30 years supplies a clear answer to this appeal. Striking out in the completely new direction adopted by the majority is unnecessary. A reasonable time for trial under s. 11(b) cannot and should not be defined by numerical ceilings, as the majority concludes.

The right to be tried in a reasonable time is multi-factored, fact-sensitive, and case-specific; its application to specific cases is unavoidably complex. The relevant factors and general approach set out in R. v. Morin, 1992 CanLII 89 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 771, respond to these complexities. With modest adjustments to make the analysis more straightforward and with some additional clarification, a revised Morin framework will continue to ensure that the constitutional right of accused persons to be tried in a reasonable time is defined and applied in a way that appropriately balances the many relevant considerations. In order to do so, the Morin considerations should be regrouped under four main analytical steps.

First, the accused must establish that there is a basis for the s. 11(b) inquiry. The court should look to the overall period between the charge and the completion of the trial to determine whether its length merits further inquiry.

Second, the court must determine on an objective basis what would be a reasonable time for the disposition of a case like the one under review — that is, how long a case of this nature should reasonably take. The objective standard of reasonableness has two components: institutional delay and inherent time requirements of the case. Both of these periods of time are to be determined objectively. The acceptable period of institutional delay is the period that is reasonably required for the court to be ready to hear the case once the parties are ready to proceed, and is determined in accordance with the administrative guidelines for institutional delay set out by this Court in Morin: eight to ten months before the provincial courts and six to eight months before the superior courts. These guidelines set some rough limits on the point at which inadequacy of state resources will be accepted as an excuse. The guidelines should not be understood as precluding allowance for any sudden and temporary strain on resources that causes a temporary congestion in the courts. The inherent time requirements of a case, on the other hand, represent the period of time that is reasonably required for the parties to be ready to proceed and to conclude the trial for a case similar in nature to the one before the court, and are to be determined on the basis of judicial experience, supplemented by submissions of counsel and evidence. In estimating a reasonable time period, the court should also take into account the liberty interests of the accused.

Third, the court must consider how much of the actual delay in the case counts against the state. This is done by subtracting the periods attributable to the defence, including any waived time periods, from the overall period of delay. When the accused consents to a date for trial offered by the court or to an adjournment sought by the Crown, that consent, without more, does not amount to waiver. The onus is on the Crown to demonstrate that this period is waived, that is, that the accused's conduct reveals something more than mere acquiescence in the inevitable, and that it meets the high bar of being clear, unequivocal, and informed acceptance. Delay resulting from unreasonable actions solely attributable to the accused must also be subtracted from the period for which the state is responsible, such as last-minute changes in counsel or adjournments flowing from a lack of diligence. It is also necessary to subtract from the actual delay any periods that, although not fairly attributable to the defence, are nonetheless not fairly counted against the state, including unavoidable delays due to inclement weather or illness of a trial participant.

Fourth, the court must determine whether the actual period of time that fairly counts against the state exceeds the reasonable time by more than can be justified on any acceptable basis. Where the actual time exceeds what would have been reasonable for a case of that nature, the result will be a finding of unreasonable delay unless the Crown can show that the delay was justified. Even substantial excess delay may be justified and therefore reasonable where, for example, there is a particularly strong societal interest in the prosecution proceeding on its merits, or where the delay results from temporary and extraordinary pressures on counsel or the court system. However, it does not follow that in these conditions the excess period is invariably justified. The accused still may be able to demonstrate actual prejudice. Although actual prejudice need not be proved to find an infringement of s. 11(b), its presence would make unreasonable (in the particular circumstances of the case) a delay that might otherwise be objectively viewed as reasonable. As a result, justification may be found to be lacking.

Under this revised Morin framework, any delay in excess of the reasonable time requirements and any actual prejudice arising from the overall delay must be evaluated in light of societal interests: on one hand, fair treatment and prompt trial of accused persons and, on the other, determination of cases on their merits. If there are exceptionally strong societal interests in the prosecution of a case against an accused which substantially outweigh the societal interest and the interest of the accused person in prompt trials, these can serve as an acceptable basis upon which exceeding the inherent and institutional requirements of a case can be justified.

This approach is a slight reorientation of the Morin framework because the focus is more explicitly on the period of delay which exceeds what would have been reasonable. But there is no change in principle.

Applying these four steps of the revised Morin framework in this case, J's constitutional right to be tried within a reasonable time was violated. The 49.5-month delay from the charges to the end of the scheduled trial date is sufficient to trigger an inquiry into whether the delay is unreasonable. There were 10.5 months of inherent delay and 18 months of institutional delay. These findings make it appropriate to conclude that the reasonable time requirements for a case of this nature were 28.5 months. The case in fact took 49.5 months. The difference is 21 months. Of that, 4 months are attributable to the defence. The rest — a period of 17 months — counts against the state. In other words, this case took almost a year and a half longer than what would be a reasonable period to prosecute a case of this nature. This is not a close case. The time to the end of trial greatly exceeds what would be a reasonable time to prosecute a similar case. While there are societal interests in the trial on the merits of the serious drug crimes alleged against J, these cannot make reasonable the grossly excessive time that it took society to bring him to trial.

In contrast, the majority's new framework is not an appropriate approach to interpreting and applying the s. 11(b) right, for several reasons. First, the new approach reduces reasonableness to numerical ceilings. Reasonableness cannot be judicially defined with precision or captured by a number. As well, the majority's judicially created ceilings largely uncouple the right to be tried within a reasonable time from the bedrock constitutional requirement of reasonableness, which is the core of the right.

Moreover, this approach unjustifiably diminishes the right to be tried within a reasonable time. When the elapsed time is below the ceiling, an accused would have to show not only that the case took markedly longer than it reasonably should have but also that he or she took meaningful steps that demonstrate a sustained effort to expedite the proceedings. This requirement has no bearing on whether the delay was unreasonable.

The majority's approach also exceeds the proper role of the Court. Creating fixed or presumptive ceilings is a task better left to legislatures. The ceilings place new limits on the exercise of the s. 11(b) right to a trial within a reasonable time for reasons of administrative efficiency that have nothing to do with whether the delay in a given case was or was not excessive. This is inconsistent with the judicial role.

As well, the ceilings have no support in the record in this case. What evidence there is in the record suggests that it would be unwise to establish these sorts of ceilings. For the vast majority of cases, the ceilings are so high that they risk being meaningless. They are unlikely to address the culture of delay that is said to exist and are more likely to feed such a culture.

The majority's approach also risks negative consequences for the administration of justice. The presumptive ceilings are unlikely to improve the pace at which the vast majority of cases move through the system. As well, if this new framework were applied immediately, the majority's transitional provisions would not avoid the risk of thousands of judicial stays.

Moreover, the increased simplicity which is said to flow from the majority's new framework is likely illusory. Even if creating ceilings were an appropriate task for the courts and even if there were an appropriate evidentiary basis for them, there is little reason to think these ceilings would avoid the complexities inherent in deciding whether a particular delay is unreasonable. The majority's framework simply moves the complexities of the analysis to a new location: deciding whether to rebut the presumption that a delay is unreasonable if it exceeds the ceiling in particular cases.

Ultimately, the majority's new framework casts aside three decades of the Court's jurisprudence when no participant in the appeal called for such a wholesale change, has not been the subject of adversarial scrutiny or debate, and risks thousands of judicial stays. In short, the new framework is wrong in principle and unwise in practice.

I. Introduction

[1] Timely justice is one of the hallmarks of a free and democratic society. In the criminal law context, it takes on special significance. Section 11\(b\) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms attests to this, in that it guarantees the right of accused persons “to be tried within a reasonable time”.

[2] Moreover, the Canadian public expects their criminal justice system to bring accused persons to trial expeditiously. As the months following a criminal charge become years, everyone suffers. Accused persons remain in a state of uncertainty, often in pre-trial detention. Victims and their families who, in many cases, have suffered tragic losses cannot move forward with their lives. And the public, whose interest is served by promptly bringing those charged with criminal offences to trial, is justifiably frustrated by watching years pass before a trial occurs.

[3] An efficient criminal justice system is therefore of utmost importance. The ability to provide fair trials within a reasonable time is an indicator of the health and proper functioning of the system itself. The stakes are indisputably high.

[4] Our system, however, has come to tolerate excessive delays. The circumstances in this appeal are illustrative. Notwithstanding a delay of over four years in bringing a drug case of modest complexity to trial, both the trial judge and the Court of Appeal were of the view that the appellant was tried within a reasonable time. Their analyses are reflective of doctrinal and practical difficulties plaguing the current analytical framework governing s. 11(b). These difficulties have fostered a culture of complacency within the system towards delay.

[5] A change of direction is therefore required. Below, we set out a new framework for applying s. 11(b). At the centre of this new framework is a presumptive ceiling on the time it should take to bring an accused person to trial: 18 months for cases going to trial in the provincial court, and 30 months for cases going to trial in the superior court. Of course, given the contextual nature of reasonableness, the framework accounts for case-specific factors both above and below the presumptive ceiling. This framework is intended to focus the s. 11(b) analysis on the issues that matter and encourage all participants in the criminal justice system to cooperate in achieving reasonably prompt justice, with a view to fulfilling s. 11(b)'s important objectives.

[6] Applying this new framework, including its transitional features, we conclude that the appellant was not brought to trial within a reasonable time. We would allow the appeal, set aside his convictions and direct a stay of proceedings.

II. Facts

[7] The appellant, Mr. Jordan, was arrested in December 2008 following an RCMP investigation into a “dial-a-dope” operation in Langley and Surrey, British Columbia. He was eventually charged with nine other co-accused on a 14-count information alleging various offences relating to possession and trafficking. Mr. Jordan remained in custody until February 2009, when he was released under strict house arrest and other restrictive bail conditions.

[8] The 10 co-accused made numerous appearances through the early months of 2009 as they obtained counsel, made their elections, and coordinated schedules. By May 2009, all counsel had agreed that the preliminary inquiry would require approximately four days, and it was eventually set for May 13, 14, 17 and 18, 2010. Several of the co-accused entered guilty pleas or were severed from the information. By the time the preliminary inquiry commenced, there were five co-accused left on the information, including Mr. Jordan.

[9] At the preliminary inquiry, it quickly became apparent that the initial time estimate of four days was too low. Crown counsel advised the preliminary inquiry judge that the Crown would be able to present all of the evidence against the four co-accused, but that the Crown would require significantly more court time to present the “mountain of evidence” it had in respect of Mr. Jordan. The parties sought and obtained continuation dates throughout 2010 and into 2011. In May 2011, Mr. Jordan (along with two co-accused) was committed to stand trial on all 14 counts. The preliminary inquiry — which ended up taking nine days of court time — had taken a full year to complete. It was now two and a half years since Mr. Jordan had been charged.

[10] Following committal, the matter moved to the British Columbia Supreme Court. Crown counsel estimated that six weeks would be required for trial, and the trial was set for the first available six-week block — in September 2012. A new Crown counsel took over the file in July 2011, and wrote to Mr. Jordan’s counsel advising of her estimate that only two to three weeks would be needed to present the Crown’s case, and offering to seek earlier trial dates. Mr. Jordan’s counsel did not respond to this offer. Later, in December 2011, one of the remaining two co-accused was severed from the information. Only Mr. Jordan and one co-accused remained.

[11] As Mr. Jordan awaited trial, his liberty was restricted. He spent two months in custody following his arrest in December 2008, which was followed by close to four years of restrictive bail conditions. However, in July 2011, Mr. Jordan was convicted of prior drug charges and was sentenced to a 15-month conditional sentence order (“CSO”), which he served until October 2012. The conditions of the CSO were similar to the bail conditions Mr. Jordan was under for the charges at issue in this appeal. Therefore, for 15 months of the delay, Mr. Jordan’s liberty was restricted by both the bail conditions and the CSO.

[12] At the start of his trial in September 2012, Mr. Jordan brought an application for a stay of proceedings alleging a breach of his s. 11(b) right to be tried within a reasonable time. This application was dismissed. The trial was adjourned, and it eventually concluded in February 2013 with his conviction on five drug-related offences. The total delay from Mr. Jordan's charges to the conclusion of the trial was 49.5 months.

III. Judgments Below

A. British Columbia Supreme Court, 2012 BCSC 1735

[13] The trial judge found that the delay in bringing this matter to trial was not unreasonable, and declined to enter a stay of proceedings. In concluding there was no s. 11(b) breach, he applied the framework from this Court's decision in R. v. Morin, 1992 CanLII 89 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 771, including the guidelines set out in it for how much institutional delay is generally tolerable.

[14] The trial judge found that the inherent time requirements for this case were 10.5 months. He also found that, of the total delay, four months (incurred when Mr. Jordan changed counsel and requested an adjournment of his trial) were attributable to the defence, and two months were attributable to the Crown.

[15] The bulk of the delay — 32.5 months — was attributable to institutional delay, of which 19 months occurred at the Provincial Court and 13.5 months occurred at the B.C. Supreme Court. This was, as the trial judge noted, well outside the Morin guidelines for tolerable institutional delay of eight to ten months in the provincial court, and six to eight months in the superior court. However, the trial judge held that institutional delay should be given less weight than Crown delay in the final balancing.

[16] The trial judge then considered the issue of prejudice. He reasoned that if the institutional delay had been within the Morin guidelines, the trial would have concluded by May 2011. Most of the additional delay coincided with the term of Mr. Jordan's CSO. The trial judge therefore found that Mr. Jordan's liberty interest was not significantly prejudiced by the delay. While Mr. Jordan's security of the person was affected, any prejudice was minimized by the fact that he was facing other outstanding charges for much of the delay. Finally, he found no prejudice to Mr. Jordan's right to make full answer and defence because the Crown's case did not depend on the memory of witnesses.

[17] The trial judge balanced all of the factors and concluded that Mr. Jordan's s. 11(b) right had not been infringed, due primarily to the fact that Mr. Jordan did not suffer significant prejudice.

B. British Columbia Court of Appeal, 2014 BCCA 241, 357 B.C.A.C. 137

[18] Mr. Jordan appealed. He argued that the trial judge erred in his assessment of prejudice and gave inadequate weight to the excessive institutional delay. The Court of Appeal found that the trial judge did not err in his attribution of the delay, or in his weighing of the institutional delay. Further, the trial judge's determination on prejudice was a finding of fact that was entitled to deference. Finally, the trial judge did not err by declining to infer prejudice based on the length of the delay alone. The appeal was dismissed.

IV. Analysis

A. The Right to Be Tried Within a Reasonable Time Is Important to Individuals and Society as a Whole

[19] As we have said, the right to be tried within a reasonable time is central to the administration of Canada's system of criminal justice. It finds expression in the familiar maxim: "Justice delayed is justice denied." An unreasonable delay denies justice to the accused, victims and their families, and the public as a whole.

[20] Trials within a reasonable time are an essential part of our criminal justice system's commitment to treating presumptively innocent accused persons in a manner that protects their interests in liberty, security of the person, and a fair trial. Liberty is engaged because a timely trial means an accused person will spend as little time as possible held in pre-trial custody or living in the community under release conditions. Security of the person is impacted because a long-delayed trial means prolonging the stress, anxiety, and stigma an accused may suffer. Fair trial interests are affected because the longer a trial is delayed, the more likely it is that some accused will be prejudiced in mounting a defence, owing to faded memories, unavailability of witnesses, or lost or degraded evidence.

[21] At the same time, we recognize that some accused persons who are in fact guilty of their charges are content to see their trials delayed for as long as possible. Indeed, there are incentives for them to remain passive in the face of delay. Accused persons may seek to avoid responsibility for their crimes by embracing delay, in the hope that the case against them will fall apart or they will obtain a stay of proceedings. This operates to the detriment of the public and of the system of justice as a whole. Section 11(b) was not intended to be a sword to frustrate the ends of justice (Morin, at pp. 801-2).

[22] Of course, the interests protected by s. 11(b) extend beyond those of accused persons. Timely trials impact other people who play a role in and are affected by criminal trials, as well as the public's confidence in the administration of justice.

[23] Victims of crime and their families may be devastated by criminal acts and therefore have a special interest in timely trials (R. v. Askov, 1990 CanLII 45 \(SCC\), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1199, at pp. 1220-21). Delay aggravates victims' suffering, preventing them from moving on with their lives.

[24] Timely trials allow victims and witnesses to make the best possible contribution to the trial, and minimize the "worry and frustration [they experience] until they have given their testimony" (Askov, at p. 1220). Repeated delays interrupt their personal, employment or business activities, creating inconvenience that may present a disincentive to their participation.

[25] Last but certainly not least, timely trials are important to maintaining overall public confidence in the administration of justice. As McLachlin J. (as she then was) put it in Morin, "delays are of consequence not only to the accused, but may affect the public interest in the prompt and fair administration of justice" (p. 810). Crime is of serious concern to all members of the community. Unreasonable delay leaves the innocent in limbo and the guilty unpunished, thereby offending the community's sense of justice (see Askov, at p. 1220). Failure "to deal fairly, quickly and efficiently with criminal trials inevitably leads to the community's frustration with the judicial system and eventually to a feeling of contempt for court procedures" (p. 1221).

[26] Extended delays undermine public confidence in the system. And public confidence is essential to the survival of the system itself, as “a fair and balanced criminal justice system simply cannot exist without the support of the community” (Askov, at p. 1221).

[27] Canadians therefore rightly expect a system that can deliver quality justice in a reasonably efficient and timely manner. Fairness and timeliness are sometimes thought to be in mutual tension, but this is not so. As D. Geoffrey Cowper, Q.C., wrote in a report commissioned by the B.C. Justice Reform Initiative:

. . . the widely perceived conflict between justice and efficiency goals is not based in reason or sound analysis. The real experience of the system is that both must be pursued in order for each to be realised: they are, in practice, interdependent.

[28] In short, timely trials further the interests of justice. They ensure that the system functions in a fair and efficient manner; tolerating trials after long delays does not. Swift, predictable justice, “the most powerful deterrent of crime” is seriously undermined and in some cases rendered illusory by delayed trials (McLachlin C.J., “The Challenges We Face”, remarks to the Empire Club of Canada, published in (2007), 40 U.B.C. L. Rev. 819, at p. 825).

B. Problems With the Current Framework

[29] While this Court has always recognized the importance of the right to a trial within a reasonable time, in our view, developments since Morin demonstrate that the system has lost its way. The framework set out in Morin has given rise to both doctrinal and practical problems, contributing to a culture of delay and complacency towards it.

[30] The Morin framework requires courts to balance four factors in determining whether a breach of s. 11(b) has occurred: (1) the length of the delay; (2) defence waiver; (3) the reasons for the delay, including the inherent needs of the case, defence delay, Crown delay, institutional delay, and other reasons for delay; and (4) prejudice to the accused’s interests in liberty, security of the person, and a fair trial. Prejudice can be either actual or inferred from the length of the delay. Institutional delay in particular is assessed against a set of guidelines developed by this Court in Morin: eight to ten months in the provincial court, and a further six to eight months after committal for trial in the superior court. The Morin guidelines reflect the fact that resources are finite and there must accordingly be some tolerance for institutional delay. Institutional delay within or close to the guidelines has generally been considered to be reasonable.

[32] First, its application is highly unpredictable. It has been interpreted so as to permit endless flexibility, making it difficult to determine whether a breach has occurred. The absence of a consistent standard has turned s. 11(b) into something of a dice roll, and has led to the proliferation of lengthy and often complex s. 11(b) applications, thereby further burdening the system.

[33] Second, as the parties and interveners point out, the treatment of prejudice has become one of the most fraught areas in the s. 11(b) jurisprudence: it is confusing, hard to prove, and highly subjective. As to the confusion prejudice has caused, courts have struggled to distinguish between “actual” and “inferred” prejudice. And attempts to draw this distinction have led to apparent inconsistencies, such as that prejudice might be inferred even when the evidence shows that the accused suffered no actual prejudice. Further, actual prejudice can be quite difficult to establish, particularly prejudice to security of the person or fair trial interests. Courts have also found that “it may not always be easy” to distinguish between prejudice stemming from the delay versus the charge itself (R. v. Pidskalny, 2013 SKCA 74, 299 C.C.C. (3d) 396, at para. 43). And even if sufficient evidence is adduced, the interpretation of that evidence is a highly subjective enterprise.

[34] Despite this confusion, prejudice has, as this case demonstrates, become an important if not determinative factor. Long delays are considered “reasonable” if the accused is unable to demonstrate significant actual prejudice to his or her protected interests. This is a problem because the accused’s and the public’s interests in a trial within a reasonable time does not necessarily turn on how much suffering an accused has endured. Delayed trials may also cause prejudice to the administration of justice.

[35] Third, the Morin framework requires a retrospective inquiry, since the analysis of delay arises only after the delay has been incurred. Courts and parties are operating within a framework that is designed not to prevent delay, but only to redress (or not redress) it. As a consequence, they are not motivated to manage “each case in advance to achieve future compliance with consistent standards” (M. A. Code, Trial Within a Reasonable Time (1992), at p. 117 (emphasis in original)). Courts are instead left to pick up the pieces once the delay has transpired. This after-the-fact review of past delay is understandably frustrating for trial judges, who have only one remedial tool at their disposal — a stay of proceedings. It is therefore unsurprising that courts have occasionally strained in applying the Morin framework to avoid a stay.[1]

[36] The retrospective analysis required by Morin also encourages parties to quibble over rationalizations for vast periods of pre-trial delay. Here, for example, the Crown argues that the trial judge erred in characterizing most of the delay as Crown or institutional delay. Had he assessed it properly, the argument goes, he would have attributed only 5 to 8 months as Crown or institutional delay, as opposed to 34.5 months. Competing after-the-fact explanations allow for potentially limitless variations in permissible delay. As the intervener the Criminal Lawyers’ Association (Ontario) submits: “Boundless flexibility is incompatible with the concept of a Charter right and has proved to serve witnesses, victims, defendants and the justice system’s reputation poorly” (I.F., at para. 12).

[37] Finally, the Morin framework is unduly complex. The minute accounting it requires might fairly be considered the bane of every trial judge’s existence. Although Cromwell J. warned in R. v. Godin, 2009 SCC 26, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 3, that courts must avoid failing to see the forest for the trees (para. 18), courts and litigants have often done just that. Each day of the proceedings from charge to trial is argued about, accounted for, and explained away. This micro-counting is inefficient, relies on judicial “guesstimations”, and has been applied in a way that allows for tolerance of ever-increasing delay.

[38] In sum, from a doctrinal perspective, the s. 11(b) framework is too unpredictable, too confusing, and too complex. It has itself become a burden on already over-burdened trial courts.

[40] As we have observed, a culture of complacency towards delay has emerged in the criminal justice system (see, e.g., Alberta Justice and Solicitor General, Criminal Justice Division, “Injecting a Sense of Urgency: A new approach to delivering justice in serious and violent criminal cases”, report by G. Lepp (April 2013) (online), at p. 17; Cowper, at p. 4; P. J. LeSage and M. Code, Report of the Review of Large and Complex Criminal Case Procedures (2008), at p. 15; Canada, Department of Justice, “The Final Report on Early Case Consideration of the Steering Committee on Justice Efficiencies and Access to the Justice System” (2006) (online), at pp. 5-6). Unnecessary procedures and adjournments, inefficient practices, and inadequate institutional resources are accepted as the norm and give rise to ever-increasing delay. This culture of delay “causes great harm to public confidence in the justice system” (LeSage and Code, at p. 16). It “rewards the wrong behaviour, frustrates the well-intentioned, makes frequent users of the system cynical and disillusioned, and frustrates the rehabilitative goals of the system” (Cowper, at p. 48).

[41] The Morin framework does not address this culture of complacency. Delay is condemned or rationalized at the back end. As a result, participants in the justice system — police, Crown counsel, defence counsel, courts, provincial legislatures, and Parliament — are not encouraged to take preventative measures to address inefficient practices and resourcing problems. Some courts, with the cooperation of counsel, have undertaken commendable efforts to change courtroom culture, maximize efficiency, and minimize delay, thereby showing that it is possible to do better. Some legislative changes and government initiatives have also been taken. In many cases, however, much remains to be done.

[42] Aggravating the tolerance for delay is the increased complexity of pre-trial and trial processes since Morin. New offences, procedures, obligations on the Crown and police, and legal tests have emerged. Many of them put a premium on fairness, reasonableness, and a fact-specific analysis. They take time. They also take up judges, courtrooms, and other resources.

[43] Complexity is sometimes unavoidable in order to achieve fairness or ensure that the state lives up to its constitutional obligations. But the quality of justice does not always increase proportionally to the length and complexity of a trial. Unnecessary procedural steps and inefficient advocacy have the opposite effect, weighing down the entire system. A criminal proceeding does not take place in a vacuum. Each procedural step or motion that is improperly taken, or takes longer than it should, along with each charge that should not have been laid or pursued, deprives other worthy litigants of timely access to the courts.

[44] The intervener Attorney General of Alberta submits that a change in courtroom culture is needed. This submission echoes former Chief Justice Lamer’s two decades-old call for participants in the justice system to “find ways to retain a fair process . . . that can achieve practical results in a reasonable time and at reasonable expense” (“The Role of Judges”, address to the Empire Club of Canada, 1995 (online)).

[45] We agree. And, along with other participants in the justice system, this Court has a role to play in changing courtroom culture and facilitating a more efficient criminal justice system, thereby protecting the right to trial within a reasonable time. We accept Mr. Jordan’s invitation — which was echoed by the Criminal Lawyers’ Association (Ontario), the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association, and Mr. Williamson in the companion appeal of R. v. Williamson, 2016 SCC 28, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 741 — to revise the s. 11(b) analysis. While departing from a precedent of this Court “is a step not to be lightly undertaken” (Ontario (Attorney General) v. Fraser, 2011 SCC 20, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 56), as we have explained, “there are compelling reasons to do so” (R. v. Henry, 2005 SCC 76, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 609, at para. 44).

V. A New Framework for Section 11(b) Applications

A. Summary

[46] At the heart of the new framework is a ceiling beyond which delay is presumptively unreasonable. The presumptive ceiling is set at 18 months for cases going to trial in the provincial court, and at 30 months for cases going to trial in the superior court (or cases going to trial in the provincial court after a preliminary inquiry).

[47] If the total delay from the charge to the actual or anticipated end of trial (minus defence delay) exceeds the ceiling, then the delay is presumptively unreasonable. To rebut this presumption, the Crown must establish the presence of exceptional circumstances. If it cannot, the delay is unreasonable and a stay will follow.

[48] If the total delay from the charge to the actual or anticipated end of trial (minus defence delay or a period of delay attributable to exceptional circumstances) falls below the presumptive ceiling, then the onus is on the defence to show that the delay is unreasonable. To do so, the defence must establish that (1) it took meaningful steps that demonstrate a sustained effort to expedite the proceedings, and (2) the case took markedly longer than it reasonably should have. We expect stays beneath the ceiling to be rare, and limited to clear cases.

B. The Presumptive Ceiling

[49] The most important feature of the new framework is that it sets a ceiling beyond which delay is presumptively unreasonable. For cases going to trial in the provincial court, the presumptive ceiling is 18 months from the charge to the actual or anticipated end of trial. For cases going to trial in the superior court, the presumptive ceiling is 30 months from the charge to the actual or anticipated end of trial.^[2] We note the 30-month ceiling would also apply to cases going to trial in the provincial court after a preliminary inquiry.^[3] As we will discuss, defence-waived or -caused delay does not count in calculating whether the presumptive ceiling has been reached — that is, such delay is to be discounted.

[50] A presumptive ceiling is required in order to give meaningful direction to the state on its constitutional obligations and to those who play an important role in ensuring that the trial concludes within a reasonable time: court administration, the police, Crown prosecutors, accused persons and their counsel, and judges. It is also intended to provide some assurance to accused persons, to victims and their families, to witnesses, and to the public that s. 11(b) is not a hollow promise.

[51] While the presumptive ceiling will enhance analytical simplicity and foster constructive incentives, it is not the end of the exercise: as we will explain in greater detail, compelling case-specific factors remain relevant to assessing the reasonableness of a period of delay both above and below the ceiling. Obviously, reasonableness cannot be captured by a number alone, which is why the new framework is not solely a function of time. Contrary to what our colleague Cromwell J. asserts, we do not depart from the concept of reasonableness; we simply adopt a different view of how reasonableness should be assessed.

[52] In setting the presumptive ceiling, we were guided by a number of considerations. First, it takes as a starting point the Morin guidelines.^[4] In Morin, this Court set eight to ten months as a guide for institutional delay in the provincial court, and an additional six to eight months as a guide for institutional delay in the superior court following an accused's committal for trial. Thus, under Morin, a total of 14 to 18 months was the measure for proceedings involving both the provincial court and the superior court.

[53] Second, the presumptive ceiling also reflects additional time to account for the other factors that can reasonably contribute to the time it takes to prosecute a case. These factors include the inherent time requirements of the case and the increased complexity of criminal cases since Morin. In this way, the ceiling takes into account the significant role that process now plays in our criminal justice system.

[54] Third, although prejudice will no longer play an explicit role in the s. 11(b) analysis, it informs the setting of the presumptive ceiling. Once the ceiling is breached, we presume that accused persons will have suffered prejudice to their Charter-protected liberty, security of the person, and fair trial interests. As this Court wrote in Morin, “prejudice to the accused can be inferred from prolonged delay” (p. 801; see also Godin, at para. 37). This is not, we stress, a rebuttable presumption: once the ceiling is breached, an absence of actual prejudice cannot convert an unreasonable delay into a reasonable one.

[55] Fourth, the presumptive ceiling has an important public interest component. The clarity and assurance it provides will build public confidence in the administration of justice.

[56] We also make this observation about the presumptive ceiling. It is not an aspirational target. Rather, it is the point at which delay becomes presumptively unreasonable. The public should expect that most cases can and should be resolved before reaching the ceiling. For this reason, as we will explain, the Crown bears the onus of justifying delays that exceed the ceiling. It is also for this reason that an accused may in clear cases still demonstrate that his or her right to be tried within a reasonable time has been infringed, even before the ceiling has been breached.

[57] There is little reason to be satisfied with a presumptive ceiling on trial delay set at 18 months for cases going to trial in the provincial court, and 30 months for cases going to trial in the superior court. This is a long time to wait for justice. But the ceiling reflects the realities we currently face. We may have to revisit these numbers and the considerations that inform them in the future.

[58] Our colleague Cromwell J. misapprehends the effect of the presumptive ceiling, asserting that this framework “reduces reasonableness to two numerical ceilings” (para. 254). As we will explain in greater detail, this is clearly not so. The presumptive ceiling marks the point at which the burden shifts from the defence to prove that the delay was unreasonable, to the Crown to justify the length of time the case has taken. As our colleague acknowledges, pursuant to our framework, “the judge must look at the circumstances of the particular case at hand” in assessing the reasonableness of a delay (para. 301).

[59] We now turn to discussing the various case-specific factors that must be accounted for both above and below the presumptive ceiling.

C. Accounting for Defence Delay

[60] Application of this framework, as under the Morin framework, begins with calculating the total delay from the charge to the actual or anticipated end of trial. Once that is determined, delay attributable to the defence must be subtracted. The defence should not be allowed to benefit from its own delay-causing conduct. As Sopinka J. wrote in Morin: “The purpose of s. 11(b) is to expedite trials and minimize prejudice and not to avoid trials on the merits” (p. 802).

[61] Defence delay has two components. The first is delay waived by the defence (Askov, at pp. 1228-29; Morin, at pp. 790-91). Waiver can be explicit or implicit, but in either case, it must be clear and unequivocal. The accused must have full knowledge of his or her rights, as well as the effect waiver will have on those rights. However, as in the past, “[i]n considering the issue of ‘waiver’ in the context of s. 11(b), it must be remembered that it is not the right itself which is being waived, but merely the inclusion of specific periods in the overall assessment of reasonableness” (R. v. Conway, 1989 CanLII 66 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659, per L’Heureux-Dubé J., at p. 1686).

[63] The second component of defence delay is delay caused solely by the conduct of the defence. This kind of defence delay comprises “those situations where the accused’s acts either directly caused the delay . . . or the acts of the accused are shown to be a deliberate and calculated tactic employed to delay the trial” (Askov, at pp. 1227-28). Deliberate and calculated defence tactics aimed at causing delay, which include frivolous applications and requests, are the most straightforward examples of defence delay. Trial judges should generally dismiss such applications and requests the moment it becomes apparent they are frivolous.

[64] As another example, the defence will have directly caused the delay if the court and the Crown are ready to proceed, but the defence is not. The period of delay resulting from that unavailability will be attributed to the defence. However, periods of time during which the court and the Crown are unavailable will not constitute defence delay, even if defence counsel is also unavailable. This should discourage unnecessary inquiries into defence counsel availability at each appearance. Beyond defence unavailability, it will of course be open to trial judges to find that other defence actions or conduct have caused delay (see, e.g., R. v. Elliott (2003), 2003 CanLII 24447 (ON CA), 114 C.R.R. (2d) 1 (Ont. C.A.), at paras. 175-82).

[65] To be clear, defence actions legitimately taken to respond to the charges fall outside the ambit of defence delay. For example, the defence must be allowed preparation time, even where the court and the Crown are ready to proceed. In addition, defence applications and requests that are not frivolous will also generally not count against the defence. We have already accounted for procedural requirements in setting the ceiling. And such a deduction would run contrary to the accused's right to make full answer and defence. While this is by no means an exact science, first instance judges are uniquely positioned to gauge the legitimacy of defence actions.

[66] To summarize, as a first step, total delay must be calculated, and defence delay must be deducted. Defence delay comprises delays waived by the defence, and delays caused solely or directly by the defence's conduct. Defence actions legitimately taken to respond to the charges do not constitute defence delay.

[67] The next step of the analysis depends upon whether the remaining delay — that is, the delay which was not caused by the defence — is above or below the presumptive ceiling.

D. Above the Ceiling — Presumptively Unreasonable Delay

[68] Delay (minus defence delay) that exceeds the ceiling is presumptively unreasonable. The Crown may rebut this presumption by showing that the delay is reasonable because of the presence of exceptional circumstances.

Exceptional Circumstances

[69] Exceptional circumstances lie outside the Crown's control in the sense that (1) they are reasonably unforeseen or reasonably unavoidable, and (2) Crown counsel cannot reasonably remedy the delays emanating from those circumstances once they arise. So long as they meet this definition, they will be considered exceptional. They need not meet a further hurdle of being rare or entirely uncommon.

[70] It is not enough for the Crown, once the ceiling is breached, to point to a past difficulty. It must also show that it took reasonable available steps to avoid and address the problem before the delay exceeded the ceiling. This might include prompt resort to case management processes to seek the assistance of the court, or seeking assistance from the defence to streamline evidence or issues for trial or to coordinate pre-trial applications, or resorting to any other appropriate procedural means. The Crown, we emphasize, is not required to show that the steps it took were ultimately successful — rather, just that it took reasonable steps in an attempt to avoid the delay.

[71] It is obviously impossible to identify in advance all circumstances that may qualify as “exceptional” for the purposes of adjudicating a s. 11(b) application. Ultimately, the determination of whether circumstances are “exceptional” will depend on the trial judge’s good sense and experience. The list is not closed. However, in general, exceptional circumstances fall under two categories: discrete events and particularly complex cases.

[72] Commencing with the former, by way of illustration, it is to be expected that medical or family emergencies (whether on the part of the accused, important witnesses, counsel or the trial judge) would generally qualify. Cases with an international dimension, such as cases requiring the extradition of an accused from a foreign jurisdiction, may also meet the definition.

[73] Discrete, exceptional events that arise at trial may also qualify and require some elaboration. Trials are not well-oiled machines. Unforeseeable or unavoidable developments can cause cases to quickly go awry, leading to delay. For example, a complainant might unexpectedly recant while testifying, requiring the Crown to change its case. In addition, if the trial goes longer than reasonably expected — even where the parties have made a good faith effort to establish realistic time estimates — then it is likely the delay was unavoidable and may therefore amount to an exceptional circumstance.

[74] Trial judges should be alive to the practical realities of trials, especially when the trial was scheduled to conclude below the ceiling but, in the end, exceeded it. In such cases, the focus should be on whether the Crown made reasonable efforts to respond and to conclude the trial under the ceiling. Trial judges should also bear in mind that when an issue arises at trial close to the ceiling, it will be more difficult for the Crown and the court to respond with a timely solution. For this reason, it is likely that unforeseeable or unavoidable delays occurring during trials that are scheduled to wrap up close to the ceiling will qualify as presenting exceptional circumstances.

[75] The period of delay caused by any discrete exceptional events must be subtracted from the total period of delay for the purpose of determining whether the ceiling has been exceeded. Of course, the Crown must always be prepared to mitigate the delay resulting from a discrete exceptional circumstance. So too must the justice system. Within reason, the Crown and the justice system should be capable of prioritizing cases that have faltered due to unforeseen events (see R. v. Vassell, 2016 SCC 26, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 625). Thus, any portion of the delay that the Crown and the system could reasonably have mitigated may not be subtracted (i.e. it may not be appropriate to subtract the entire period of delay occasioned by discrete exceptional events).

[76] If the remaining delay falls below the ceiling, the accused may still demonstrate in clear cases that the delay is unreasonable as outlined below. If, however, the remaining delay exceeds the ceiling, the delay is unreasonable and a stay of proceedings must be entered.

[77] As indicated, exceptional circumstances also cover a second category, namely, cases that are particularly complex. This too requires elaboration. Particularly complex cases are cases that, because of the nature of the evidence or the nature of the issues, require an inordinate amount of trial or preparation time such that the delay is justified. As for the nature of the evidence, hallmarks of particularly complex cases include voluminous disclosure, a large number of witnesses, significant requirements for expert evidence, and charges covering a long period of time. Particularly complex cases arising from the nature of the issues may be characterized by, among other things, a large number of charges and pre-trial applications, novel or complicated legal issues, and a large number of significant issues in dispute. Proceeding jointly against multiple co-accused, so long as it is in the interest of justice to do so, may also impact the complexity of the case.

[78] A typical murder trial will not usually be sufficiently complex to comprise an exceptional circumstance. However, if an inordinate amount of trial or preparation time is needed as a result of the nature of the evidence or the issues such that the time the case has taken is justified, the complexity of the case will qualify as presenting an exceptional circumstance.

[79] It bears reiterating that such determinations fall well within the trial judge's expertise. And, of course, the trial judge will also want to consider whether the Crown, having initiated what could reasonably be expected to be a complex prosecution, developed and followed a concrete plan to minimize the delay occasioned by such complexity (R. v. Auclair, 2014 SCC 6, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 83, at para. 2). Where it has failed to do so, the Crown will not be able to show exceptional circumstances, because it will not be able to show that the circumstances were outside its control. In a similar vein, and for the same reason, the Crown may wish to consider whether multiple charges for the same conduct, or trying multiple co-accused together, will unduly complicate a proceeding. While the court plays no supervisory role for such decisions, Crown counsel must be alive to the fact that any delay resulting from their prosecutorial discretion must conform to the accused's s. 11(b) right (see, e.g., Vassell). As this Court said in R. v. Rodgerson, 2015 SCC 38, [2015] 2 S.C.R. 760:

Certainly, it is within the Crown's discretion to prosecute charges where the evidence would permit a reasonable jury to convict. However, some semblance of a cost-benefit analysis would serve the justice system well. Where the additional or heightened charges are marginal, and pursuing them would necessitate a substantially more complex trial process and jury charge, the Crown should carefully consider whether the public interest would be better served by either declining to prosecute the marginal charges from the outset or deciding not to pursue them once the evidence at trial is complete. [para. 45]

[80] Where the trial judge finds that the case was particularly complex such that the time the case has taken is justified, the delay is reasonable and no stay will issue. No further analysis is required.

[81] To be clear, the presence of exceptional circumstances is the only basis upon which the Crown can discharge its burden to justify a delay that exceeds the ceiling. As discussed, an exceptional circumstance can arise from a discrete event (such as an illness, extradition proceeding, or unexpected event at trial) or from a case's complexity. The seriousness or gravity of the offence cannot be relied on, although the more complex cases will often be those involving serious charges, such as terrorism, organized crime, and gang-related activity. Nor can chronic institutional delay be relied upon. Perhaps most significantly, the absence of prejudice can in no circumstances be used to justify delays after the ceiling is breached. Once so much time has elapsed, only circumstances that are genuinely outside the Crown's control and ability to remedy may furnish a sufficient excuse for the prolonged delay.

E. Below the Presumptive Ceiling

[82] A delay may be unreasonable even if it falls below the presumptive ceiling. If the total delay from the charge to the actual or anticipated end of trial (minus defence delay and delay attributable to exceptional circumstances that are discrete in nature) is less than 18 months for cases going to trial in the provincial court, or 30 months for cases going to trial in the superior court, then the defence bears the onus to show that the delay is unreasonable. To do so, the defence must establish two things: (1) it took meaningful steps that demonstrate a sustained effort to expedite the proceedings, and (2) the case took markedly longer than it reasonably should have. Absent these two factors, the s. 11(b) application must fail.

[83] We expect stays beneath the ceiling to be granted only in clear cases. As we have said, in setting the ceiling, we factored in the tolerance for reasonable institutional delay established in Morin, as well as the inherent needs and the increased complexity of most cases.

(1) Defence Initiative — Meaningful and Sustained Steps

[84] To discharge its onus where delay falls below the ceiling, the defence must demonstrate that it took meaningful, sustained steps to expedite the proceedings. “Action or non-action by the accused which is inconsistent with a desire for a timely trial is something that the court must consider” (Morin, at p. 802). Here, the trial judge should consider what the defence could have done, and what it actually did, to get the case heard as quickly as possible. Substance matters, not form.

[85] To satisfy this criterion, it is not enough for the defence to make token efforts such as to simply put on the record that it wanted an earlier trial date. Since the defence benefits from a strong presumption in favour of a stay once the ceiling is exceeded, it is incumbent on the defence, in order to justify a stay below the ceiling, to demonstrate having taken meaningful and sustained steps to be tried quickly. While the defence might not be able to resolve the Crown’s or the trial court’s challenges, it falls to the defence to show that it attempted to set the earliest possible hearing dates, was cooperative with and responsive to the Crown and the court, put the Crown on timely notice when delay was becoming a problem, and conducted all applications (including the s. 11(b) application) reasonably and expeditiously. At the same time, trial judges should not take this opportunity, with the benefit of hindsight, to question every decision made by the defence. The defence is required to act reasonably, not perfectly.

[86] Our colleague Cromwell J. criticizes this requirement as diminishing the right to be tried within a reasonable time. We respectfully disagree. First, this Court already considers defence conduct in assessing s. 11(b) applications. And the level of diligence displayed by the accused is relevant in the context of other Charter rights as well, like the s. 10(b) right to counsel (R. v. Tremblay, 1987 CanLII 28 (SCC), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 435, at p. 439). Second, as mentioned, the requirement of defence initiative below the ceiling is a corollary to the Crown’s justificatory burden above the ceiling. Third, this requirement reflects the practical reality that a level of cooperation between the parties is necessary in planning and conducting a trial. Encouraging the defence to be part of the solution will have positive ramifications not only for individual cases but for the entire justice system, thereby enhancing — rather than diminishing — timely justice.

(2) Reasonable Time Requirements of the Case — Time Markedly Exceeded

[87] Next, the defence must show that the time the case has taken markedly exceeds the reasonable time requirements of the case. The reasonable time requirements of a case derive from a variety of factors, including the complexity of the case, local considerations, and whether the Crown took reasonable steps to expedite the proceedings.

[88] The reasonable time requirements of the case will increase proportionally to a case’s complexity. As Sopinka J. wrote in Morin: “All other factors being equal, the more complicated a case, the longer it will take counsel to prepare for trial and for the trial to be conducted once it begins” (pp. 791-92).

[89] In considering the reasonable time requirements of the case, trial judges should also employ the knowledge they have of their own jurisdiction, including how long a case of that nature typically takes to get to trial in light of the relevant local and systemic circumstances.

[90] Where the Crown has done its part to ensure that the matter proceeds expeditiously — including genuinely responding to defence efforts, seeking opportunities to streamline the issues and evidence, and adapting to evolving circumstances as the case progresses — it is unlikely that the reasonable time requirements of the case will have been markedly exceeded. As with assessing the conduct of the defence, trial judges should not hold the Crown to a standard of perfection.

[91] Determining whether the time the case has taken markedly exceeds what was reasonably required is not a matter of precise calculation. Trial judges should not parse each day or month, as has been the common practice since Morin, to determine whether each step was reasonably required. Instead, trial judges should step back from the minutiae and adopt a bird's-eye view of the case. All this said, this determination is a question of fact falling well within the expertise of the trial judge (Morin, per Sopinka J., at pp. 791-92).

F. Applying the New Framework to Cases Already in the System

[92] When this Court released its decision in Askov, tens of thousands of charges were stayed in Ontario alone as a result of the abrupt change in the law. Such swift and drastic consequences risk undermining the integrity of the administration of justice.

[93] We recognize that this new framework is a departure from the law that was applied to s. 11(b) applications in the past. A judicial change in the law is presumed to operate retroactively and apply to past conduct (Canada (Attorney General) v. Hislop, 2007 SCC 10, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 429, at para. 84). Slightly more relaxed rules apply to judicial changes to the interpretation of constitutional provisions (para. 88). Transition periods, suspended declarations of invalidity, and purely prospective remedies are part of the discretionary remedial framework of our constitutional law (paras. 88-92; R. v. Brydges, 1990 CanLII 123 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 190, at pp. 217-18; R. v. Feeney, 1997 CanLII 343 \(SCC\), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 117).

[94] Here, there are a variety of reasons to apply the framework contextually and flexibly for cases currently in the system, one being that it is not fair to strictly judge participants in the criminal justice system against standards of which they had no notice. Further, this new framework creates incentives for both the Crown and the defence to expedite criminal cases. However, in jurisdictions where prolonged delays are the norm, it will take time for these incentives to shift the culture. As well, the administration of justice cannot tolerate a recurrence of what transpired after the release of Askov, and this contextual application of the framework is intended to ensure that the post-Askov situation is not repeated.

[96] First, for cases in which the delay exceeds the ceiling, a transitional exceptional circumstance may arise where the charges were brought prior to the release of this decision. This transitional exceptional circumstance will apply when the Crown satisfies the court that the time the case has taken is justified based on the parties' reasonable reliance on the law as it previously existed. This requires a contextual assessment, sensitive to the manner in which the previous framework was applied, and the fact that the parties' behaviour cannot be judged strictly, against a standard of which they had no notice. For example, prejudice and the seriousness of the offence often played a decisive role in whether delay was unreasonable under the previous framework. For cases currently in the system, these considerations can therefore inform whether the parties' reliance on the previous state of the law was reasonable. Of course, if the parties have had time following the release of this decision to correct their behaviour, and the system has had some time to adapt, the trial judge should take this into account.

[97] Moreover, the delay may exceed the ceiling because the case is of moderate complexity in a jurisdiction with significant institutional delay problems. Judges in jurisdictions plagued by lengthy, persistent, and notorious institutional delays should account for this reality, as Crown counsel's behaviour is constrained by systemic delay issues. Parliament, the legislatures, and Crown counsel need time to respond to this decision, and stays of proceedings cannot be granted en masse simply because problems with institutional delay currently exist. As we have said, the administration of justice cannot countenance a recurrence of Askov. This transitional exceptional circumstance recognizes that change takes time, and institutional delay — even if it is significant — will not automatically result in a stay of proceedings.

[98] On the other hand, the s. 11(b) rights of all accused persons cannot be held in abeyance while the system works to respond to this new framework. Section 11(b) breaches will still be found and stays of proceedings will still be entered for cases currently in the system. For example, if the delay in a simple case vastly exceeds the ceiling because of repeated mistakes or missteps by the Crown, the delay might be unreasonable even though the parties were operating under the previous framework. The analysis must always be contextual. We rely on the good sense of trial judges to determine the reasonableness of the delay in the circumstances of each case.

[99] The second qualification applies to cases currently in the system in which the total delay (minus defence delay) falls below the ceiling. For these cases, the two criteria — defence initiative and whether the time the case has taken markedly exceeds what was reasonably required — must also be applied contextually, sensitive to the parties' reliance on the previous state of the law. Specifically, the defence need not demonstrate having taken initiative to expedite matters for the period of delay preceding this decision. Since defence initiative was not expressly required by the Morin framework, it would be unfair to require it for the period of time before the release of this decision. However, in close cases, any defence initiative during that time would assist the defence in showing that the delay markedly exceeds what was reasonably required. The trial judge must also still consider action or inaction by the accused that may be inconsistent with a desire for a timely trial (Morin, at p. 802).

[100] Further, if the delay was occasioned by an institutional delay that was reasonably acceptable in the relevant jurisdiction under the Morin framework before this decision was released, that institutional delay will be a component of the reasonable time requirements of the case for cases currently in the system.

[101] We note that given the level of institutional delay tolerated under the previous approach, a stay of proceedings below the ceiling will be even more difficult to obtain for cases currently in the system. We also emphasize that for cases in which the charge is brought shortly after the release of this decision, the reasonable time requirements of the case must reflect this high level of tolerance for institutional delay in particular localities.

[102] Ultimately, for most cases that are already in the system, the release of this decision should not automatically transform what would previously have been considered a reasonable delay into an unreasonable one. Change takes time. In his dissenting opinion in Mills v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 17

(SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863, Lamer J. (as he then was) was alive to this concern and his comments are apposite here:

This case is the first to have presented this Court with the opportunity of establishing appropriate guidelines for the application of s. 11(b). The full scope of the section, and the nature of the obligation it has imposed upon the government and the courts has remained uncertain for the period prior to the rendering of this judgment.

Given this uncertainty and the terminative nature of the remedy for a violation of the section, i.e., a stay of proceedings, I am of the view that a transitional approach is appropriate, and indeed necessary, to enable the courts and the governments to properly discharge their burden under s. 11(b). This is not to say that different criteria ought to apply during the transitional period, that is, the period prior to the rendering of this judgment, but rather that the behaviour of the accused and the authorities must be evaluated in its proper context. In other words, it would be inaccurate to give effect to behaviour which occurred prior to this judgment against a standard the parameters of which were unknown to all. [Emphasis added; p. 948.]

[103] We echo Lamer J.’s remarks. For cases already in the system, the presumptive ceiling still applies; however, “the behaviour of the accused and the authorities” — which is an important consideration in the new framework — “must be evaluated in its proper context” (Mills, at p. 948). The reasonableness of a period of time to prosecute a case takes its colour from the surrounding circumstances. Reliance on the law as it then stood is one such circumstance.

[104] We disagree with Cromwell J. that our framework’s allowance for present realities somehow creates a Charter amnesty. For cases currently in the system, the s. 11(b) right will receive no less protection than it does now. The point is that, on an ongoing basis, our framework has the potential to effect positive change within the justice system, rather than succumb to the culture of complacency we have described.

G. Concluding Comments on the New Framework

[105] The new framework for s. 11(b) can be summarized as follows:

- There is a ceiling beyond which delay becomes presumptively unreasonable. The presumptive ceiling is 18 months for cases tried in the provincial court, and 30 months for cases in the superior court (or cases tried in the provincial court after a preliminary inquiry). Defence delay does not count towards the presumptive ceiling.

- Once the presumptive ceiling is exceeded, the burden shifts to the Crown to rebut the presumption of unreasonableness on the basis of exceptional circumstances. Exceptional circumstances lie outside the Crown's control in that (1) they are reasonably unforeseen or reasonably unavoidable, and (2) they cannot reasonably be remedied. If the exceptional circumstance relates to a discrete event, the delay reasonably attributable to that event is subtracted. If the exceptional circumstance arises from the case's complexity, the delay is reasonable.
- Below the presumptive ceiling, in clear cases, the defence may show that the delay is unreasonable. To do so, the defence must establish two things: (1) it took meaningful steps that demonstrate a sustained effort to expedite the proceedings; and (2) the case took markedly longer than it reasonably should have.
- For cases currently in the system, the framework must be applied flexibly and contextually, with due sensitivity to the parties' reliance on the previous state of the law.

[106] As part of the process of developing this framework, we conducted a qualitative review of nearly every reported s. 11(b) appellate decision from the past 10 years, and many decisions from trial courts. These cases assisted in developing the definition of exceptional circumstances, as they highlighted the types of circumstances that judges have found to justify prolonged delays. By reading these cases with the new framework in mind, we were able to get a rough sense of how the new framework would have played out in some past cases. Indeed, we note that in the seminal case of Askov, the delay was in the range of 30 months, as it was in Godin some 19 years later, and in both cases, this Court found the delays to be unreasonable.

[107] It is also clear from this case law review that the ceiling will not permit the parties or the courts to operate business as usual. The ceiling is designed to encourage conduct and the allocation of resources that promote timely trials. The jurisprudence from the past decade demonstrates that the current approach to s. 11(b) does not encourage good behaviour. Finger pointing is more common than problem solving. This body of decisions makes it clear that the incentives inherent in the status quo fall short in the ways we have described.

[108] We acknowledge that this new framework represents a significant shift from past practice. First, its standpoint is prospective. Participants in the criminal justice system will know, in advance, the bounds of reasonableness so proactive measures can be taken to remedy any delay. And the public will more clearly understand what it means to hold a trial within a reasonable time. Enhanced clarity and predictability befits a Charter right of such fundamental importance to our criminal justice system.

[109] Second, the new framework resolves the difficulties surrounding the concept of prejudice. Instead of being an express analytical factor, the concept of prejudice underpins the entire framework. Prejudice is accounted for in the creation of the ceiling. It also has a strong relationship with defence initiative, in that we can expect accused persons who are truly prejudiced to be proactive in moving the matter along.

[110] Prejudice has been one of the most fraught areas of s. 11(b) jurisprudence for over two decades. Understanding prejudice as informing the setting of the ceiling, rather than treating prejudice as an express analytical factor, also better recognizes that, as we have said, prolonged delays cause prejudice to not just specific accused persons, but also victims, witnesses, and the system of justice as a whole.

[111] Third, the new framework reduces, although does not eliminate, the need to engage in complicated micro-counting. While judges will still have to determine defence delay, the inquiry beneath the ceiling into whether the case took markedly longer than it reasonably should have replaces the micro-counting process with a global assessment. This inquiry need only arise if the accused has taken meaningful and sustained steps to expedite matters. And above the ceiling, a s. 11(b) analysis is triggered only where the Crown seeks to rely on exceptional circumstances. A framework that is simpler to apply is itself of value: “. . . we must remind ourselves that the best test will be relatively easy to apply; otherwise, stay applications themselves will contribute to the already heavy load on trial judges and compound the problem of delay” (Morin, per McLachlin J., at p. 810).

[112] In addition, the new framework will help facilitate a much-needed shift in culture. In creating incentives for both sides, it seeks to enhance accountability by fostering proactive, preventative problem solving. From the Crown's perspective, the framework clarifies the content of the Crown's ever-present constitutional obligation to bring the accused to trial within a reasonable time. Above the ceiling, the Crown will only be able to discharge its burden if it can show that it should not be held accountable for the circumstances which caused the ceiling to be breached because they were genuinely outside its control. Crown counsel will be motivated to act proactively throughout the proceedings to preserve its ability to justify a delay that exceeds the ceiling, should the need arise. Below the ceiling, a diligent, proactive Crown will be a strong indication that the case did not take markedly longer than reasonably necessary.

[113] The new framework also encourages the defence to be part of the solution. If an accused brings a s. 11(b) application when the total delay (minus defence delay and delay attributable to exceptional circumstances that are discrete in nature) falls below the ceiling, the defence must demonstrate that it took meaningful and sustained steps to expedite the proceedings as a prerequisite to a stay. Further, the deduction of defence delay from total delay as a starting point in the analysis clearly indicates that the defence cannot benefit from its own delay-causing action or inaction.

[114] The new framework makes courts more accountable, too. Absent exceptional circumstances, the ceiling limits the extent to which judges can tolerate delays before a stay must be imposed. Indeed, courts are important players in changing courtroom culture. Many courts have developed robust case management and trial scheduling processes, focussing attention on possible sources of delay (such as pre-trial applications or unrealistic estimates of trial length) and thereby seeking to avoid or minimize unnecessary delay. Some courts, however, have not.

[115] As we have said, this Court also has a role to play. On many occasions, this Court has established detailed guidelines and minimum requirements to give meaningful content to constitutional rights in the criminal law context (see, e.g., R. v. Fearon, 2014 SCC 77, [2014] 3 S.C.R. 621, at para. 83; Lavallee, Rackel & Heintz v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 61, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 209, at para. 49; Canada (Attorney General) v. Federation of Law Societies of Canada, 2015 SCC 7, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 401, at paras. 53-56). Section 11(b) has received its content in much the same way. Cromwell J.'s framework, like ours, and like Morin and Askov, is entirely judicially created. And, like ours, and like Morin and Askov, it relies heavily on numerical guidelines (with such guidelines acting as guideposts, not absolute limitation periods). Our approach is entirely consistent with the judicial role.

[116] Ultimately, all participants in the justice system must work in concert to achieve speedier trials. After all, everyone stands to benefit from these efforts. As Sharpe J.A. wrote in R. v. Omar, 2007 ONCA 117, 84 O.R. (3d) 493:

The judicial system, like all other public institutions, has limited resources at its disposal, as do the litigants and legal aid. . . . It is in the interest of all constituencies — those accused of crimes, the police, Crown counsel, defence counsel, and judges both at trial and on appeal — to make the most of the limited resources at our disposal. [para. 32]

[117] Sharpe J.A.’s reference to finite resources is an important point. We are aware that resource issues are rarely far below the surface of most s. 11(b) applications. By encouraging all justice system participants to be more proactive, some resource issues will naturally be resolved because parties will be encouraged to eliminate or avoid inefficient practices. At the same time, the new framework implicates the sufficiency of resources by reminding legislators and ministers that unreasonable delay in bringing accused persons to trial is not merely contrary to the public interest: it is constitutionally impermissible, and will be treated as such.

VI. Application to This Case

[118] Having established the new framework for s. 11(b), we now turn to the case before us.

[119] The first step in determining whether Mr. Jordan’s s. 11(b) right was infringed is to determine the total delay between the charges and the end of trial. In this case, the total delay was 49.5 months.

[120] Turning to the first case-specific factor that must be accounted for, the next step is to determine whether any of that delay was waived or caused solely by the defence. We see no reason to interfere with the trial judge’s finding that four months of this delay were waived by Mr. Jordan when he changed counsel shortly before the trial was set to begin, necessitating an adjournment.

[121] The more difficult assessment is whether any of the remaining delay was caused solely by the action or inaction of the defence. The Crown argues that the trial judge erred by failing to attribute significant periods of delay to the defence, and that the defence was equally culpable in the delay in bringing this matter to trial. The Crown cited several examples: the defence consented to numerous adjournments; defence counsel initially suggested the four-day estimate for the preliminary inquiry; defence counsel's unavailability resulted in the preliminary inquiry not being completed as scheduled in December 2010; defence counsel failed to respond to the Crown's offer in July 2011 of an earlier trial; and there was no evidence that defence counsel would have been available for trial earlier than June 2012.

[122] While these instances that the Crown points to are symptomatic of the systemic complacency towards delay that we have described, most of them are not attributable solely to the defence. The Crown and defence both share responsibility for the preliminary inquiry underestimation. Similarly, responsibility for the delay resulting from consent adjournments and the defence's failure to respond to the Crown's offer of a shorter trial time in July 2011 should not be borne solely by the defence. These adjournments were part of the legitimate procedural requirements of the case, and it does not appear from the record that any occurred when the Crown and court were otherwise ready to proceed. Further, there was no evidence that, had the defence responded to the Crown's offer of an earlier trial, the Crown and the court would have been able to accommodate an earlier date. Rather, the only evidence before the trial judge was that the earliest available trial dates were in September 2012.

[123] The defence should, however, bear responsibility for the delay resulting from the adjournment of the preliminary inquiry necessitated by defence counsel's unavailability for closing submissions on December 22, 2010, the last day scheduled for the preliminary inquiry. We would only attribute one and a half months of that delay to the defence, however, given the evidence that Crown counsel was unable to attend at the first available continuation date for the preliminary inquiry of February 3, 2011.

[124] In total then, four months of delay were waived by the defence and one and a half months of delay were caused solely by the defence. This leaves a remaining delay of 44 months, an amount that vastly exceeds the presumptive ceiling of 30 months in the superior court. The burden is therefore on the Crown to demonstrate that the delay is reasonable in light of exceptional circumstances.

[125] There is nothing in the record to indicate that any discrete, exceptional circumstances arose. And although particularly complex cases may present an exceptional circumstance, this is not one of those cases. In terms of the legal issues, while Mr. Jordan was initially charged along with nine other co-accused, this number quickly dropped as the case progressed. At the time of trial, only one co-accused remained on the indictment with Mr. Jordan. Further, none of the alleged offences involved novel or complex points of law. Relatively few pre-trial applications were scheduled. In short, the legal issues in Mr. Jordan's case were not particularly complex.

[126] As for the evidence, it was substantial but it was relatively straightforward. It consisted of surveillance evidence by police officers, undercover buys by police officers, a small amount of expert evidence regarding how dial-a-dope operations are conducted, and a search warrant for Mr. Jordan's apartment. There was nothing particularly complex about this evidence.

[127] In the end, while the case against Mr. Jordan may have been moderately complex given the amount of evidence and the number of co-accused, it was not so exceptionally complex that it would justify a delay of 44 months (excluding defence delay).

[128] However, since Mr. Jordan's charges were brought prior to the release of this decision, we must also consider whether the transitional exceptional circumstance justifies the delay. In our view, it does not. We recognize that the Crown was operating without notice of this change in the law within a jurisdiction with some systemic delay issues. But a total delay of 44 months (excluding defence delay), of which the vast majority was either Crown or institutional delay, in an ordinary dial-a-dope trafficking prosecution is simply unreasonable regardless of the framework under which the Crown was operating. Therefore, it cannot be said that the Crown's reliance on the previous state of the law was reasonable.

[129] We note that a good portion of the delay resulted from the inaccurate assessment of the time required for the preliminary inquiry, and in particular, the Crown's failure to communicate with the parties with a view to tying down the evidence that it needed to call at the preliminary inquiry. A similar problem occurred with the trial. While the fault for the delay in bringing this matter to trial certainly did not lie solely with Crown counsel, it is equally clear that the Crown prosecutors assigned to the case did not have a solid plan for bringing the matter to trial within a reasonable time. The Crown was aware of potential s. 11(b) issues as early as December 2010, yet it took few steps to expedite the matter. Instead, the Crown was content to rely on an overly large estimate of trial time without attempting to streamline the issues or consider severing the co-accused from the indictment.

[130] The Crown did make a good faith effort to bring the matter to trial more quickly in light of the s. 11(b) issue when Crown counsel wrote to defence counsel in July 2011 with a revised estimate of the length of the Crown's case. But by this point, approximately 31 months had already elapsed from the date of Mr. Jordan's charges. This is a substantial length of time to wait before making efforts to expedite the matter. At this point, the scheduled trial was still more than a year away.

[131] While the Crown did make some efforts to bring the matter to trial more quickly, these efforts were too little and too late. The previous state of the law cannot reasonably support the Crown's conduct. And the systemic delay problems that existed in the Surrey Provincial Court at the time cannot justify the delay either. As discussed, much of the institutional delay could have been avoided had the Crown proceeded on the basis of a more reasonable plan.

[132] To the extent that the trial judge held that this delay was reasonable under the Morin framework, he erred. Citing the Court of Appeal's decision in R. v. Ghavami, 2010 BCCA 126, 253 C.C.C. (3d) 74, at para. 52, he incorrectly held that institutional delay is entitled to less weight than delay within the Crown's control. The parties agree that this was in error.

[133] It follows that the delay was unreasonable and Mr. Jordan's s. 11(b) right was infringed.

VII. Conclusion

[134] The right to a trial within a reasonable time has aptly been described as "discipline for the justice system", in that it may cause "discomfort in the short term but [it will bring] achievement in the long term" (Code, at pp. 133-34).

[135] In this case, the system was undisciplined. It failed. Mr. Jordan's s. 11(b) right was breached when it took 49.5 months to bring him to trial. All the parties were operating within the culture of complacency towards delay that has pervaded the criminal justice system in recent years. There is simply no reasonable explanation for why the matter took as long as it did. The appeal must be allowed, the convictions set aside and a stay of proceedings entered.

[136] We agree with Cromwell J. that our differences of opinion are indeed fundamental. In our view, given the considerable doctrinal and practical problems confronting the Morin approach, further minor refinements to the model are incapable of responding to the challenges facing timely justice in this country.

[137] Real change will require the efforts and coordination of all participants in the criminal justice system.[\[5\]](#)

[138] For Crown counsel, this means making reasonable and responsible decisions regarding who to prosecute and for what, delivering on their disclosure obligations promptly with the cooperation of police, creating plans for complex prosecutions, and using court time efficiently. It may also require enhanced Crown discretion for resolving individual cases. For defence counsel, this means actively advancing their clients' right to a trial within a reasonable time, collaborating with Crown counsel when appropriate and, like Crown counsel, using court time efficiently. Both parties should focus on making reasonable admissions, streamlining the evidence, and anticipating issues that need to be resolved in advance.

[139] For the courts, this means implementing more efficient procedures, including scheduling practices. Trial courts may wish to review their case management regimes to ensure that they provide the tools for parties to collaborate and conduct cases efficiently. Trial judges should make reasonable efforts to control and manage the conduct of trials. Appellate courts must support these efforts by affording deference to case management choices made by courts below. All courts, including this Court, must be mindful of the impact of their decisions on the conduct of trials.

[140] For provincial legislatures and Parliament, this may mean taking a fresh look at rules, procedures, and other areas of the criminal law to ensure that they are more conducive to timely justice and that the criminal process focusses on what is truly necessary to a fair trial. Legal Aid has a role to play in securing the participation of experienced defence counsel, particularly for long, complex trials. And Parliament may wish to consider the value of preliminary inquiries in light of expanded disclosure obligations. Government will also need to consider whether the criminal justice system (and any initiatives aimed at reducing delay) is adequately resourced.

[141] Thus, broader structural and procedural changes, in addition to day-to-day efforts, are required to maintain the public's confidence by delivering justice in a timely manner. Timely trials are possible. More than that, they are constitutionally required.

I. Introduction

A. Overview

[142] Every person charged with an offence in Canada has a constitutional right to be tried within a reasonable time: Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 11(b). The right has ancient origins and finds expression across legal systems. In the Great Charter of 1215 (the Magna Carta) the King promised that “[t]o no one will we . . . delay right or justice”: clause 40. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966), Can. T.S. 1976 No. 47, calls for trial “without undue delay”: art. 14(3) (c). A right of this nature is also found in the United States, New Zealand, Australia, India, South Africa, the Caribbean, the United Kingdom, Ireland, and in the European Union, among others: see Justice C. Hill and J. Tatum, “Re-Chartering an Old Course Rather than Staying Anew in Remediating Unreasonable Delay under the Charter” (paper presented at the Crown Defence Conference in Winnipeg September 2012) (online), at p. 59.

[144] Determining reasonableness requires a court to balance a number of factors, including the length of the delay, waiver of any time periods by the accused, the reasons for the delay, including the time requirements for the case, the actions of the parties, limitations on institutional resources, and prejudice to the person charged. It is necessary to consider these factors on a case-by-case basis: the answer to the question of whether an accused is tried within a reasonable time is inherently case-specific.

[145] There is much wisdom, based on accumulated experience, in the Court's jurisprudence about unreasonable delay. But the Court has made adjustments over time and has been clear that further adjustments will likely need to be made in the future. As Sopinka J. wrote in Morin, "Embarking as we did on uncharted waters it is not surprising that the course we steered has required, and may require in the future, some alteration in its direction to accord with experience": p. 784. To be sure, some issues that need clarification have arisen in the case law and this appeal provides an opportunity to provide such clarification. But the orientation of our jurisprudence to case-specific determinations of reasonableness is sound. With modest adjustments to make the analysis more straightforward and with some additional clarification, that approach will continue to ensure that the constitutional right of accused persons to be tried in a reasonable time is defined and applied in a way that appropriately balances the many relevant considerations.

[146] My reasons on this appeal and those of my colleagues, Justices Moldaver, Karakatsanis and Brown, present contrasting visions of how our s. 11(b) jurisprudence should develop.

[147] My colleagues would define reasonableness by assigning a number of months of delay — “ceiling[s]” (para. 5) — that will be taken to be reasonable unless the accused establishes not only that the case took markedly longer than it reasonably should have, but also that he or she took meaningful steps that demonstrate a sustained effort to expedite the proceedings. As I see it, this is not an appropriate approach to interpreting and applying the s. 11(b) right for several reasons. First, reasonableness cannot be captured by a number; the ceilings substitute a right for “trial under the ceiling[s]” (para. 74) for the constitutional right to be tried within a reasonable time. Second, creating these types of ceilings is a task better left to legislation. Third, the ceilings are not supported by the record or by my colleagues’ analysis of the last 10 years of s. 11(b) jurisprudence and have not been the subject of adversarial debate. Fourth, there is a serious risk that the introduction of these ceilings will put thousands of cases at risk of being judicially stayed. Fifth, the ceilings are unlikely to achieve the simplicity that is claimed for them. Finally, setting aside 30 years of jurisprudence and striking out in this new direction is unnecessary. My colleagues easily conclude that our existing jurisprudence supplies a clear answer to this appeal: paras. 125 and 128. I agree with them that it does: the appeal must be allowed and a stay of proceedings entered.

[148] In contrast, my view is that a reasonable time for trial under s. 11(b) cannot and should not be defined by numerical ceilings. The accumulated wisdom of the past 30 years of jurisprudence, modestly clarified, provides a workable framework to determine whether the right to be tried in a reasonable time has been breached in a particular case.

B. The Nature of the Section 11(b) Right

[149] The right to be tried within a reasonable time is easy to state and understand: people charged with offences should be tried within a reasonable time. Determining whether the right has been breached in a specific case, however, may be far from straightforward. The right is by its very nature fact-sensitive and case-specific. There are several reasons for this.

[150] First, the term “delay” is not entirely apt. While delay has a pejorative connotation, delay, in the sense of the passage of time, is inherent in any legal proceeding. In fact, some delay may be desirable. As stated by Lamer J., dissenting but not on this point, with Dickson C.J. concurring, undue haste itself can make a trial unfair: see Mills, at p. 941. Therefore, delay only becomes problematic when it is unreasonable.

[151] Second, unreasonableness is not conducive to being captured by a set of rules: a reasonable time for the disposition of one case may be entirely unreasonable for another. Reasonableness is an inherently contextual concept, the application of which depends on the particular circumstances of each case. This makes it difficult and in fact unwise to try to establish the reasonable time requirements of a case by a numerical guideline. Inevitably, the ceiling will be too high for some cases and too low for others. More fundamentally, a fixed guideline is inconsistent with the notion of reasonableness in the context of the infinitely varied situations that arise in real cases.

[152] Third, the Charter protects only against state action. Even if a case took too long to be dealt with, there will only be a breach of the right if that unreasonable delay counts against the state. And so it follows that the focus is not on unreasonable delay in general, but on unreasonable delay that properly counts against the state. We must therefore attribute responsibility for the delay that has occurred and only factor in the delay which can fairly be counted against the state in deciding whether the Charter right has been infringed.

[153] Finally, s. 11(b) implicates several distinct interests, both individual and societal. Excessive delay implicates the liberty, security, and fair trial interests of persons charged, as well as society's interest in the prompt disposition of criminal matters and in having criminal matters determined on their merits: Morin, at p. 786. Historically, the liberty interest was the focus: Mills, at p. 918, per Lamer J.; Rahey, at p. 642, per La Forest J., concurring.

[154] More recently, the “overlong subjection to the vexations and vicissitudes of a pending criminal accusation” — the stigmatization, loss of privacy, stress and anxiety of those awaiting trial — has been recognized as implicating the security of the person charged: Rahey, at p. 605, per Lamer J., quoting A. G. Amsterdam, “Speedy Criminal Trial: Rights and Remedies” (1975), 27 Stan. L. Rev. 525, at p. 533; see also Mills, at pp. 919-20. As Cory J. for the majority put it in Askov, at p. 1219:

There could be no greater frustration imaginable for innocent persons charged with an offence than to be denied the opportunity of demonstrating their innocence for an unconscionable time as a result of unreasonable delays in their trial. The time awaiting trial must be exquisite agony for accused persons and their immediate family.

[155] A third interest protected by s. 11(b) is the accused's interest in mounting a full and fair defence. As Sopinka J. said in Morin, the "right to a fair trial is protected [by s. 11(b)] by attempting to ensure that proceedings take place while evidence is available and fresh": p. 786. When delay is present, "justice may be denied. Witnesses forget, witnesses disappear. The quality of evidence may deteriorate": p. 810, per McLachlin J. (as she then was), concurring. Delay "can prejudice the ability of the defendant to lead evidence, cross-examine witnesses, or otherwise to raise a defence": Godin, at para. 30.

[156] Finally, the right to be tried within a reasonable time has a societal dimension: see e.g. Askov, at p. 1219, per Cory J. But societal interests do not all point in the same direction. On one hand, the wider community has an interest in "ensuring that those who transgress the law are brought to trial and dealt with according to the law" (pp. 1219-20) and in "preventing an accused from using the [s. 11(b)] guarantee as a means of escaping trial": p. 1227. On the other hand, there is a broad societal interest in ensuring that individuals on trial are "treated fairly and justly": p. 1220. The community benefits "by the quick resolution of the case either by reintegrating into society the accused found to be innocent or if found guilty by dealing with the accused according to the law" and witnesses and victims benefit from a prompt resolution of a criminal matter: ibid.

unavoidably complex. Our experience to date suggests that the relevant factors and general approach set out in Morin respond to these complexities. However, experience also suggests that the way in which Morin has come to be applied is unduly complicated and that aspects of the relevant factors require clarification. This can be done without losing the case-specific focus on whether a particular case has been or will be tried within a reasonable time.

II. The Analytical Framework

[159] The purpose of carrying out the s. 11(b) analysis is to decide whether the length of time to try the case which counts against the state is “substantially longer than can be justified on any acceptable basis”: Smith, at p. 1138. If so, the delay is unreasonable and in breach of s. 11(b).

[160] The Morin framework identifies and describes the many factors that are relevant to whether a delay is reasonable or unreasonable. But one of the limitations of the framework is that it provides little assistance as to how these various factors are to be weighed in order to reach a final conclusion. In order to simplify and clarify this analysis, it will be helpful to regroup the Morin considerations under four main analytical steps, which may be framed as questions to guide a court when confronted with a s. 11(b) claim. Doing so will make what is being considered and why more apparent, without losing the necessarily case-specific focus of the reasonableness inquiry. The questions are:

1. Is an unreasonable delay inquiry justified?
2. What is a reasonable time for the disposition of a case like this one?
3. How much of the delay that actually occurred counts against the state?
4. Was the delay that counts against the state unreasonable?

[161] This framework, along with elaboration of the relevant considerations, will clarify questions that have arisen in this case, namely: whether different periods of delay receive different weighting in the analysis; what is meant by “waiver” by the accused; and what is the role of prejudice in the analysis.

[162] I will now turn to a brief elaboration of each of these four analytical steps.

A. Is an Unreasonable Delay Inquiry Justified?

[163] The accused must establish as a threshold matter that there is a basis for the Charter inquiry. The court should look to the overall period between the charge and the completion of the trial to determine whether its length is such that it merits further inquiry. As stated by McLachlin J. in her concurring opinion in Morin, this determination can be made by referring to “‘norms’ representing the time reasonably taken to bring the offence charged to the point of trial in all the circumstances”: p. 811. If there is no reasonable basis to think that the delay in question is excessive, the accused’s s. 11(b) claim fails and the inquiry stops at this stage.

B. What Is a Reasonable Time for the Disposition of a Case Like This One?

[164] This second analytical step is to determine on an objective basis what would be a reasonable time for the trial of a case like the one under review. The objective standard of reasonableness has two components: institutional delay and inherent time requirements of the case. The period of institutional delay is the period that is reasonably required for the court to be ready to hear the case (including interlocutory motions) once the parties are ready to proceed. The reasonable inherent time requirements of the case represent the period of time that is reasonably required for the parties to be ready to proceed and to conclude the trial for a case similar in nature to the one before the court.

[165] Both of these periods of time are to be determined objectively. The acceptable period of institutional delay is determined in accordance with the administrative guidelines for institutional delay set out by this Court in Morin: eight to ten months before the provincial courts and six to eight months before the superior courts (see Morin, at pp. 798-99). The inherent time requirements of a case, on the other hand, are to be determined on the basis of judicial experience, supplemented by submissions of counsel and evidence in relation to the reasonable time requirements of a case of a similar nature to the one before the court. As I will describe below, these two elements must be distinguished in the s. 11(b) analysis.

(1) Institutional Delay

[166] Institutional delay is the period of time that results from the inadequacy of institutional resources. The period of institutional delay “starts to run when the parties are ready for trial but the system cannot accommodate them”: Morin, at pp. 794-95. At this stage of the objective analysis, the court will determine an acceptable period of time for the court to be available to hear the case once the parties are ready to proceed.

(a) The Morin Administrative Guidelines Are Appropriate for Determining Institutional Delay

[167] As stated in Morin, “institutional delay is the most common source of delay and the most difficult to reconcile with the dictates of s. 11(b) of the Charter”: p. 794. The difficulty arises because we do not live in a “Utopia” in which there is always fully adequate funding, personnel, and facilities in order to administer criminal matters: p. 795. The courts must account for both the fact that the state does not have unlimited funds to attribute to the administration of the criminal justice system and the fact that an accused has a fundamental Charter right to be tried within a reasonable time: ibid.

[168] The period of institutional delay is generally not case-specific, unlike the inherent time requirements of a particular case. Institutional delay is therefore more amenable to generalization based on evidence than is the element of the reasonable inherent time requirements of particular types of cases. Moreover, institutional delay is largely the result of government choices about how to allocate resources. Accordingly, the courts “cannot simply accede to the government’s allocation of resources and tailor the period of permissible delay accordingly”: Morin, at p. 795.

[169] The Morin administrative guidelines, namely eight to ten months for trials in provincial courts and six to eight months for trials before the superior courts, were established on the basis of extensive statistical and expert evidence. There is no basis in the record in this case to revise them and I would therefore confirm these guidelines as appropriate for determining reasonable institutional delay.

(b) Determining Institutional Delay

[170] I would add two comments about determining institutional delay using the Morin administrative guidelines.

[171] First, in determining where a particular case should fit within the range established by the Morin guidelines, the court should consider whether the accused is in remand custody pending trial or subject to stringent bail conditions in identifying a reasonable period of institutional delay for a particular type of case. The period of reasonable institutional delay should generally be at the lower end of the range in these circumstances because these types of cases should receive higher priority by the courts. This period might even be shortened below the range described in the guidelines. As Sopinka J. put it Morin:

If an accused is in custody or, while not in custody, subject to restrictive bail terms or conditions or otherwise experiences substantial prejudice, the period of acceptable institutional delay may be shortened to reflect the court's concern. [p. 798]

[172] Second, the guidelines should not be understood as precluding allowance for any “sudden and temporary strain on resources” that causes a temporary congestion in the courts: Morin, at p. 797. As I discuss at the final step of the analysis, even a properly resourced system will occasionally buckle under an unusually heavy onslaught of work.

(2) The Inherent Time Requirements of the Case

(a) Introduction

[173] The inherent time requirements of a case include the time periods that are reasonably necessary to conclude the proceedings for a case similar in nature to the one before the court. In Morin, Sopinka J. described some of the inherent time requirements of the case as including the time required “in processing the charge, retention of counsel, applications for bail and other pre-trial procedures” along with “police and administration paperwork, disclosure, etc.”: pp. 791-92. Separate consideration of these inherent time requirements is essential given the almost infinitely variable circumstances of particular cases.

[174] As Lamer J. described in Mills, the inquiry into the inherent time requirements of a case will necessarily require judges to “rely heavily upon their practical experience and good sense”: p. 932. Judges should “undertake an objective assessment of the delay which may be required in the circumstances of the case”: ibid. This inquiry is “wholly objective” (p. 931):

. . . the court must fix an objective and realistic time period for the preparation of the type of case which is at bar. It must determine the period which would normally be required, taking into account the number of charges, the number of accused, the complexity and volume and similar objective elements, for the preparation and completion of the case [Emphasis added; p. 932.]

In the end, we must rely on the good sense and experience of trial judges to determine what would constitute a reasonable period of time required for a particular type of case.

[175] The inherent time requirements of a case are to be determined objectively on a case-by-case basis.

(b) Determining the Inherent Time Requirements

[176] The elements to be considered are the amounts of time reasonably required in processing the charge, retaining counsel, applying for bail, completing police and administration paperwork, making disclosure, dealing with pre-trial applications, preparing for and arguing the preliminary inquiry and/or the trial, and trying a case similar in the nature to the one before the court. Included are such things as the time reasonably required to reschedule after a mistrial, the time to resolve legal issues, the time to convene a judicial pre-trial, and a reasonable time to try the case: see e.g. Hill and Tatum, at pp. 14-15.

[177] If a case is more complex, the estimate of the reasonable time period required to dispose of the case will be higher. Given the type of case before the court, it may be expected that there will be more pre-trial motions, or particular types of motions. Most s. 11(b) applications are considered after the fact, and any incidental proceedings to a trial could help guide this analysis. However, courts should avoid ex post facto analysis focusing on whether certain motions in the case before them were unreasonably or unnecessarily taken. The objective nature of this inquiry involves an analysis of the type of case before the court, and all the motions and other pre-trial procedures that could reasonably be expected in such a case.

[178] One example is a case involving a large amount of disclosure, where it could reasonably be expected that such disclosure would lengthen the inherent time requirements to try the case. However, disclosure may be a major factor contributing to delay and should be approached on the basis that the Crown has a duty to make disclosure fully, but also promptly. And defence counsel must not engage in unnecessary fishing expeditions. The reasonable estimation of the objective inherent time requirements of a case must assume both prompt disclosure and the absence of unnecessary fishing expeditions.

[179] Also included in the inherent time requirements of a case is the time required for counsel, both Crown and defence, to be available and to prepare the case: see Morin, at p. 791. In Morin, Sopinka J. noted that the courts must take account of the fact that “counsel for the prosecution and the defence cannot be expected to devote their time exclusively to one case”: p. 792. Or, as I put it in Godin, s. 11(b) does not require counsel to “hold themselves in a state of perpetual availability”: para. 23. The court should estimate the reasonable amount of time required for Crown and defence counsel to prepare and to make themselves available in the type of case before them. This estimation is objective, and does not include an analysis of the record which may demonstrate that counsel was available before or after this estimated time period.

[180] Morin provides an example of how this may be done. Sopinka J. specifically found that “[a]n additional period for inherent time requirements must be allowed” for the post-preliminary inquiry “second stage”: p. 793. He further inferred, absent concrete evidence to the contrary, that counsel would have required 2 months to make themselves prepared and available for trial and for the matter to be heard, leaving the other 12 months to institutional delay: pp. 804-6. Similarly, in R. v. Sharma, 1992 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 814, at pp. 825-26, Sopinka J. estimated 3 months of inherent time requirements in the 12-month period from the set date appearance to the trial date.

[181] Finally, in estimating a reasonable time period for the inherent time requirements of a case, the court should also take into account the liberty interests of the accused. If an accused is in custody or under stringent conditions of release, such as house arrest, counsel and the court system should accord his or her case priority over those of accused persons subject to less onerous conditions pending trial.

(c) Do the Periods of Institutional Delay and Inherent Time Requirements Overlap?

[182] The question has arisen of whether the periods of institutional delay (i.e. the time for the court to be ready to hear the matter) and inherent delay (i.e. the time reasonably required for the parties to be ready to proceed and to conclude the trial for a case similar in nature to the one before the court) overlap. On occasion, the elements of institutional and inherent requirements have been intermingled in the application of the s. 11(b) framework such as in considering periods of time during which both counsel and the court are unavailable: see e.g. C. Ruby, “Trial Within a Reasonable Time under Section 11(b): the Ontario Court of Appeal Disconnects from the Supreme Court” (2013), 2 C.R. (7th) 91, at p. 94, citing Morin, at p. 793. The short answer to this question of overlap, however, is that, on the objective determination of how much time the case should reasonably take, the two periods are distinct.

[183] The reasonable inherent time requirements are concerned with identifying a reasonable period to get a case similar in nature to the one before the court ready for trial and to complete the trial. The inherent time requirements are not determined, for instance, with reference to the actual availability of particular counsel and court, but rather they are determined by an objective estimation. The other element, the acceptable period of institutional delay, is the amount of time reasonably required for the court to be ready to hear the case once the parties are ready to proceed. This is expressed with reference to the Morin guidelines. These guidelines do not relate to inherent time requirements; they reflect only the acceptable period of institutional delay.

(3) Conclusion on Objectively Reasonable Time Requirements

[184] To sum up, in assessing a claim under s. 11(b), the courts must first determine the reasonable time requirements, objectively viewed, for the type of case before them. Simply put, the courts must determine how long the case should reasonably take (or have taken). This consists, first, of the length of time required for that type of case to be prepared, heard, and decided (i.e. the case's inherent time requirements). The second element is the additional time required for the court to be available to hear the parties beyond the point at which they should be prepared to proceed (i.e. the period of institutional delay). This period of institutional delay is assessed by applying the administrative guidelines developed in Askov and Morin: eight to ten months in provincial court and six to eight months in superior court. These guidelines set some rough limits on the point at which inadequacy of state resources will be accepted as an excuse for excessive delay.

C. How Much of the Delay That Actually Occurred Counts Against the State?

[185] Having addressed the objective elements of the analysis — the reasonable institutional delay and the reasonable inherent time requirements of the case — the judge moves on to compare those objectively reasonable time periods against the time actually taken in the case before the court, to determine whether the overall delay is reasonable. Delay in excess of the objectively required time may be reasonable if it is not attributable to the state. As mentioned at the outset, s. 11(b) protects only against unreasonable delay attributable to the state. The period fairly attributable to the state excludes any time period fairly attributable to the accused — including “waiver” — and any extraordinary and unavoidable delays that should not be counted against the state. The main task at this step of the analysis is to identify any portion of the actual elapsed time that should not count against the state.

(1) Delay Attributable to the Accused

[186] Delay attributable to the accused includes any period “waived” by the accused, and other delays attributable to the accused.

(a) Waiver

[187] The concept of “waiver” by the accused in the s. 11(b) context has given rise to some confusion and this case provides an opportunity to bring further clarity to that issue.

[188] First, the language of “waiver” in this context may be misleading. As stated by this Court in Conway, when the courts speak of “waiver” in the context of s. 11(b), “it is not the right itself which is being waived but merely the inclusion of specific periods in the overall assessment of reasonableness”: p. 1686. This means that periods of time to which the accused has or is deemed to have agreed will not count towards any determination of unreasonable delay.

[189] Second, there is admittedly some lack of clarity in our jurisprudence as to whether the accused’s consent to an adjournment sought by the Crown constitutes “waiver” of the resulting delay. In Smith, this Court created a rebuttable inference of waiver if defence consents to a future trial date. This proposition was qualified, however, by the point that “inaction or acquiescence on the part of the accused, short of waiver”, does not result in a forfeiture of an accused’s s. 11(b) rights: Smith, at p. 1136. In Morin, Sopinka J. explained that the accused’s consent to a trial date “can give rise to an inference of waiver”, but this is not the case “if consent to a date amounts to mere acquiescence in the inevitable”: p. 790. This Court, albeit in very short decisions, upheld this approach in R. v. Brassard, 1993 CanLII 42 (SCC), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 287, at p. 287, and R. v. Nuosci, 1993 CanLII 40 (SCC), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 283, at p. 284, stating that consent to a future date will be characterized as waiver in the absence of evidence that it is acquiescence.

[190] A rebuttable inference of waiver from the accused’s consent to an adjournment does not sit well with the settled law that waiver must be clear, unequivocal and must be established by the Crown: see e.g. Askov, at p. 1232. As noted in Morin, the waiver must be done “with full knowledge of the rights the procedure was enacted to protect and of the effect that waiver will have on those rights”, and such a test is “stringent”: p. 790.

[191] I conclude that, when the accused consents to a date for trial offered by the court or to an adjournment sought by the Crown, that consent, without more, does not amount to waiver. The onus is on the Crown to demonstrate that this period is waived, that is, that the accused’s conduct reveals something more than “mere acquiescence in the inevitable” and that it meets the high bar of being clear, unequivocal, and informed acceptance that the period of time will not count against the state.

(b) Other Delay Attributable to the Accused

[192] All steps that are reasonably necessary to make full answer and defence are properly part of the inherent time requirements of the case and do not count against either the Crown or the accused. However, delay resulting from unreasonable actions solely attributable to the accused must be subtracted from the period for which the state is responsible.

[193] Unreasonable actions by the accused may take diverse forms, such as last-minute changes in counsel or adjournments flowing from a lack of diligence (e.g. failure to pursue or review disclosure in a timely way; pursuit of unnecessary information; failure to attend court appearances or to give timely notice of intended Charter applications, particularly during case scheduling; unreasonable rejection of earlier dates for preliminary hearing, trial or other court appearances (see Hill and Tatum, at pp. 17-18); and a lack of sufficient effort to accommodate dates available to the court and the prosecution). It is obvious that delays caused by attempts to obstruct the course of the trial, that amount to “deliberate and calculated tactic[s] employed to delay the trial”, or other vexatious or bad faith conduct by the accused, cannot count against the state: Askov, at p. 1228.

[194] The question of whether the actions of the accused were unreasonable must be viewed through the lens of reasonable conduct of counsel and the accused at the time the judgments had to be made, not with the benefit of hindsight. The accused must not be penalized for taking all reasonable steps to make full answer and defence even if, with the benefit of hindsight, they were not particularly fruitful.

(2) Extraordinary and Unavoidable Delays That Should Not Count Against the State

[195] It is also necessary to subtract from the actual delay any periods that, although not fairly attributable to the defence, are nonetheless not fairly counted against the state. Such time periods could include unavoidable delays due to inclement weather or illness of a trial participant.

D. Was the Delay That Counts Against the State Unreasonable?

[196] At this point in the analysis, the judge has determined the reasonable time a case ought to have taken, and the period of time that fairly counts against the state that it actually took. The next and final step is to determine whether this actual period of time exceeds the reasonable time by more than can be justified on any acceptable basis. This approach is a slight reorientation of the Morin framework because the focus is more explicitly on the period of delay which exceeds what would have been reasonable. But there is no change in principle.

(1) Can the Delay Beyond What Would Have Been Reasonable Be Justified?

[197] Determining whether the actual delay was longer than what would have been reasonable is a simple matter of arithmetic. However, qualifying the extent of that excess delay as justified or not requires evaluation. As stated in Morin, at p. 787: “The general approach to a determination as to whether the right has been denied is not by the application of a mathematical or administrative formula” but rather by judicial determination.

[198] Where the actual time exceeds what would have been reasonable for a case of that nature, the result will be a finding of unreasonable delay unless the Crown can show that the delay was justified having regard to the length of the excess delay balanced against certain other factors described below. The point at which the amount of time beyond what would have been a reasonable delay becomes unreasonable cannot be described with precision. We can say, however, that where the delay exceeds what would have been reasonable, justification is required and, as the length of the excess delay increases, justification will be more difficult. Even substantial excess delay may be justified and therefore reasonable where, for example, there is a particularly strong societal interest in the prosecution proceeding on its merits, or where the delay results from temporary and extraordinary pressures on counsel or the court system. However, it does not follow that in these conditions the excess period is invariably justified. As I will discuss, given proof of actual prejudice to the accused or of abusive or negligent conduct on the part of the Crown which contributed to the delay, justification may be found to be lacking.

[199] The focus must remain on the fundamental question at this point in the analysis: whether the amount of excess delay can be “justified on any acceptable basis”: Smith, at p. 1138.

(2) The Role of Prejudice in the Analysis

[200] The role of prejudice in the unreasonable delay analysis has become unduly complicated. The jurisprudence has distinguished between inferred and actual prejudice and, in some cases, it appears that it has been almost impossible to succeed on an unreasonable delay claim without proof of either type of prejudice.

[201] I would clarify the role of prejudice in the following ways.

[202] First, I would affirm the statements in previous cases to the effect that actual prejudice is not necessary to establish a breach of s. 11(b): see e.g. Mills, at p. 926, per Lamer J.; Askov, at p. 1232, per Cory J. The question is whether the delay is unreasonable, not whether an unreasonable delay has, in addition to being unreasonable, caused identifiable and actual prejudice.

[203] Second, and as explained earlier, actual prejudice to the liberty interests of the accused, notably being detained in custody or subject to very restrictive bail conditions pending trial, is taken into account in deciding what a reasonable time for trial would be. Prejudice of this nature during the period of reasonable delay need not be considered again in the final assessment of whether the delay is unreasonable.

[204] Third, prejudice to an accused's security and fair trial interests in the general sense — such as stress and stigma or the erosion of evidence — is already considered in this revised framework. Defining the reasonable time requirements of a case recognizes that delay beyond this point will cause such stress and erosion of fair trial interests, regardless of any evidence the Crown may bring to the contrary. Prejudice to these interests during the period of reasonable delay need not be explicitly considered as a separate factor in this final inquiry, and the court should not consider evidence on any vague, general effect that the delay may have had on the security or fair trial interests of the accused.

[205] Fourth, specific examples of actual prejudice to an accused's security and fair trial rights, such as the loss of employment or death of a witness (this, of course, is not an exhaustive list), are properly considered at the final stage of the analysis.

[206] Lastly, the absence of actual prejudice cannot make reasonable what would otherwise be an unreasonable delay. Actual prejudice need not be proved to find an infringement of s. 11(b) and its absence cannot be used to excuse otherwise unreasonable delay. However, even if the excess delay does not exceed the objectively determined reasonable time requirements of a case of that nature, the accused still may be able to demonstrate actual prejudice, thus making unreasonable (in the particular circumstances of the case) a delay that might otherwise be objectively viewed as reasonable.

(3) Extraordinary Reasons for the Delay

[207] Exceptional cases may arise which merit further consideration of the various reasons for the delay at this final stage of the inquiry.

[208] In most cases, the elements of delay apart from delay attributable to the accused will be given equal weight, contrary to the approach in R. v. Ghavami, 2010 BCCA 126, 253 C.C.C. (3d) 74, at para. 52. Specifically, institutional delay and other delay that is counted against the state are generally given equal weight. Abusive or grossly negligent Crown conduct causing delay counts more heavily against the state in determining whether the excessive delay may be justified on any acceptable basis. Such conduct not only undermines the accused's rights, but is contrary to society's interest in an effective and fair justice system.

[209] Conversely, institutional delay that is attributable to exceptional and temporary conditions in the justice system may be excused or given somewhat less weight against the state in the overall balancing and may in some cases justify excusing what would otherwise be excessive delay. This should generally be done, however, only if the state has made reasonable efforts to alleviate those conditions: Askov, at p. 1242.

(4) Are There Especially Strong Societal Interests in the Prosecution on the Merits of the Case?

[210] As discussed above, s. 11(b) encompasses "a community or societal interest" to "see that the justice system works fairly, efficiently and with reasonable dispatch": Askov, at pp. 1219 and 1221. This societal interest supports prompt disposition of criminal cases. However, there is also a societal interest in “ensuring that those who transgress the law are brought to trial”: pp. 1219-20. Societal interests must be considered “in conjunction” with the interests of the accused in the interpretation of s. 11(b): p. 1222.

[211] In McLachlin J.’s concurring opinion in Morin, she held that the societal interests in bringing the accused to trial should be considered in the determination of s. 11(b) claims: the “true issue at stake” in a s. 11(b) analysis is the “determination of where the line should be drawn between conflicting interests”, i.e. those of the accused and those of society: p. 809. Whether a delay becomes unreasonable, on the spectrum of delays apparent in criminal proceedings, must be determined by an analysis in which the interests of society in bringing those accused of crimes to trial are balanced against the rights of the person accused of a crime: pp. 809-10. To this I would add the societal interest in prompt disposition of criminal matters.

[212] I agree with this balancing approach. Under the revised framework I propose, the delay in excess of the reasonable time requirements of the case and any actual prejudice arising from the overall delay must be evaluated in light of societal interests: on one hand, fair treatment and prompt trial of accused persons and, on the other, determination of cases on their merits. As noted by Cory J. in Askov, more serious offences will carry commensurately stronger societal demands that the accused be brought to trial: p. 1226. These interests, however, are in effect factored into the determination of what would be a reasonable time for the disposition of a case like this one. But if there are exceptionally strong societal interests in the prosecution of a case against an accused which substantially outweigh the societal interest and the interest of the accused person in prompt trials, these can serve as an “acceptable basis” upon which exceeding the inherent and institutional requirements of a case can be justified.

E. Summary of the Analytical Framework

[213] If the accused first establishes a basis that justifies a s. 11(b) inquiry, the court must then undertake an objective inquiry to determine what would be the reasonable time requirements to dispose of a case similar in nature to the one before the court (the inherent time requirements) and how long it would reasonably take the court to hear it once the parties are ready for hearing (the institutional delay).

[215] Finally, the court must consider whether and to what extent the actual delay exceeds the reasonable time requirements of a case, and whether this can be “justified on any acceptable basis”. If the actual delay that counts against the state is longer than the reasonable time requirements of a case, then the delay will generally be considered unreasonable. The converse is also the case. However, there may be countervailing considerations, such as the presence of actual prejudice, exceptionally strong societal interests, or exceptional circumstances such as Crown misconduct or exceptional and temporary conditions affecting the justice system. These may either shorten or lengthen the period that would otherwise be unreasonable delay.

[216] This straightforward framework does not attempt to gloss over the inherent complexity of determining what delays are unreasonable. It merely clarifies where the various relevant considerations fit into the analysis and how they relate to each other. It also simplifies the analysis of prejudice and makes clear that, as a general rule, institutional and Crown delay should be given equal weight. It retains the focus on the circumstances of the particular case and builds on the accumulated experience found in 30 years of this Court’s jurisprudence.

III. Application

[217] Although, as noted, this appeal would also be allowed applying the existing Morin analysis, it will be useful by way of illustration to analyze it under the modified framework that I have just described.

A. Facts

[218] In 2008, the RCMP conducted a single, straightforward undercover investigation into a “dial-a-dope” operation involving the sale of drugs out of the Langley and Surrey areas of British Columbia. Undercover police officers purchased cocaine six times over seven months, calling a number associated with Mr. Jordan. On December 17, 2008, the police executed a search warrant, seizing 42.3 grams of heroin and just under 1.5 kilograms of cocaine and crack cocaine from the apartment that Mr. Jordan and his then-girlfriend, Ms. Kristina Gaudet, shared. On December 17, 2008, the police arrested Mr. Jordan and Ms. Gaudet. Mr. Jordan was charged with possession for the purposes of trafficking on December 18, and Ms. Gaudet was charged on February 20, 2009.

[219] From December 18, 2008 to February 16, 2009, Mr. Jordan was in custody. He was released on February 16, on strict conditions, including house arrest. During this time, the Crown swore additional and amended informations. Ultimately, 10 accused were charged. Mr. Jordan, as the main target of the investigation and prosecution, faced six charges.

[220] The accused elected to be tried in British Columbia Supreme Court. Crown and defence counsel agreed upon a preliminary hearing. For 24 months, the preliminary hearing process was held before the Provincial Court; it took another 16 months to obtain a Supreme Court trial date for the two remaining accused.

B. Judicial History

(1) British Columbia Supreme Court, 2012 BCSC 1735

[221] Verhoeven J. of the British Columbia Supreme Court dismissed Mr. Jordan's s. 11(b) motion. He reached the following conclusions with respect to the total time to the end of the trial:

- Total length of delay: 49.5 months
- Inherent requirements: 10.5 months
- Crown delay: 2 months
- Institutional delay: 32.5 months
- Accused delay: 4 months

[222] Some of the delay present in this case was due to an underestimation of the time required to conduct the preliminary inquiry. While the Crown argued that the subsequent delay should be attributable to the defence, the trial judge ultimately attributed it as institutional delay, citing a lack of evidence supporting the Crown's claims.

[223] The trial judge ultimately concluded that the accused only waived four months of the delay, due to a last-minute change in counsel. He rejected the Crown's arguments that the delay before the superior court was waived. The Crown relied upon a letter it sent to defence counsel, asking whether the latter would be interested in an earlier trial date based upon a three-week (as opposed to a six-week) trial estimation. Defence counsel did not respond to this letter, and there was no evidence as to the reason behind this. The trial judge found that this did not amount to clear and unequivocal waiver.

[224] The trial judge estimated eight months of inherent time requirements before the provincial court (five months of intake requirements, two months for scheduling and preparation, and one month for the hearing and decision), and two and a half months before the superior court (two months to accommodate counsel scheduling, two weeks for the trial itself).

[225] The trial judge found that no time was attributable to the accused, but that the Crown was responsible for two months due to unavailability to continue the preliminary inquiry.

[226] The trial judge concluded that there was 19 months of institutional delay before the provincial court, noting the evidence supporting the shortage of institutional resources in those courts in British Columbia. He further concluded that there was 13.5 months of institutional delay before the superior court.

[227] The trial judge then considered both actual prejudice and inferred prejudice. He concluded that the accused was not greatly prejudiced with respect to any of his liberty or fair trial interests but that he did suffer some prejudice to his security interests in the form of stress and worry. However, he held that the prior charges against Mr. Jordan "substantially reduc[e] the degree of prejudice" that would otherwise be assigned to Mr. Jordan's security interests: para. 124 (CanLII).

[228] The trial judge concluded that the delay present in Mr. Jordan's case "substantially exceeded" the guidelines: para. 138. However, the delay was not unreasonable given the seriousness of the offences charged, the lack of substantial prejudice against the accused, and the reduced weight attributed to institutional delay.

(2) British Columbia Court of Appeal, 2014 BCCA 241, 357 B.C.A.C. 137

[229] The British Columbia Court of Appeal dismissed Mr. Jordan's appeal.

[230] Justice Stromberg-Stein agreed with the facts laid out by the trial judge. She also confirmed that the "application judge identified and applied the correct legal authorities and principles": para. 13.

[231] On the first ground of appeal, Mr. Jordan argued that the judge should have used the full 34.5 months of delay in his s. 11(b) analysis, instead of the 17 months outside of the Morin guidelines. However, the court concluded that the application judge correctly assessed the delay period.

[232] Next, Mr. Jordan argued that the trial judge erred in attaching less weight to institutional delay. Justice Stromberg-Stein found that the judge's assessment of 34.5 months as institutional delay was not based on a proper evidentiary record. However, this assessment was favourable to Mr. Jordan, and she declined to interfere with Verhoeven J.'s weighing of the institutional delay in comparison to other factors.

[233] Finally, Mr. Jordan claimed that the trial judge erred in his assessment of prejudice: by using the wrong quantum of delay and by failing to make a meaningful finding of inferred prejudice. The application judge found that Mr. Jordan experienced "some degree" of prejudice, but not a "substantial" degree of prejudice: C.A. reasons, at para. 46. This finding of fact is reviewable on a standard of palpable and overriding error. The Court of Appeal found that the trial judge's assessment did not rise to this degree. The court affirmed the trial judge's findings regarding actual prejudice, and held that the judge was "alive to the possibility of inferring prejudice" and did, in fact, infer some degree of prejudice from the delay: para. 51.

C. Analysis

[234] Applying the analytical framework from Morin as elaborated and clarified above, I conclude that Mr. Jordan's appeal should be allowed and the charges against him stayed because his constitutional right to be tried within a reasonable time was violated in this case. I will briefly consider the four steps in the analytic framework.

(1) Is an Unreasonable Delay Inquiry Justified?

[235] I agree with the trial judge that the 49.5-month delay from the charges to the end of the scheduled trial date is sufficient to trigger an inquiry into whether the delay is unreasonable.

(2) What Is a Reasonable Time for the Disposition of a Case Like This One?

(a) Inherent Time Requirements

[236] The trial judge identified the periods of inherent delay present in the case as being 10.5 months. While the trial judge did not approach this on a purely objective basis, I nonetheless find no reason to interfere with this assessment as representing the reasonable inherent time requirements of a case of this nature, even treating this case as involving an in-custody accused or an accused subject to very restrictive bail conditions.

(b) Institutional Delay

[237] This case proceeded through the Provincial Court and the Supreme Court of British Columbia. Under the Morin administrative guidelines, the reasonable institutional delays for both levels of court total between 14 and 18 months. Although it is debatable whether accepting the upper end of the range is appropriate in a case of this nature, for the purposes of my analysis I will proceed on the basis that 18 months of institutional delay would be reasonable.

[238] It follows that a reasonable period for the disposition of this case was 28.5 months.

(3) How Much of the Delay That Actually Occurred Counts Against the State?

[239] We know that this case took 49.5 months in total. To determine the amount of delay that counts against the state we must subtract any period attributable to the defence and any period of unusual or unforeseen delay not fairly counted against the Crown.

(a) Delay Attributable to the Defence

[240] The Crown's main argument is that the trial judge erred in categorizing so much of the delay as institutional. The Crown makes multiple submissions regarding the categorization of delay between the charge to the arraignment hearing, from the arraignment hearing to the preliminary inquiry, of the adjournments of the preliminary inquiry, and in setting the six-week trial. For many of these submissions, the Crown argues that various periods should be considered "waiver" or conduct otherwise attributable to the defence.

[241] As stated above, for any period to be considered waived by the defence, the defence must have so indicated in clear and unequivocal terms. The trial judge noted that Mr. Jordan agreed that four months of the delay was "waived" because it resulted from his last-minute change in counsel. However, I see no reason to attribute any other period as being "waived" by Mr. Jordan. Moreover, I see no reason to classify any other period as being fairly attributable to Mr. Jordan.

(b) Exceptional or Unavoidable Delay

[242] No such delay is present here.

(4) Was the Delay That Counts Against the State Unreasonable?

[243] As discussed earlier, the reasonable time requirements for a case of this nature were 28.5 months. The case in fact took 49.5 months. The difference is 21 months. Of that, 4 months are attributable to the defence. The rest — a period of 17 months — counts against the state. In other words, this case took almost a year and a half longer than what would be a reasonable period to prosecute a case of this nature.

[244] This is not a close case. The time to the end of trial greatly exceeds what would be a reasonable time to prosecute a case of this nature. While there are societal interests in the trial on the merits of the serious drug crimes alleged against Mr. Jordan, these cannot make reasonable the grossly excessive time that it took society to bring him to trial.

D. Other Issues Raised

[245] The parties raised a number of other issues, explicitly or implicitly, to which I will briefly respond.

- (1) Should some delay where the courts are unavailable be classified as inherent requirements if defence counsel is also unavailable?

[246] The inherent requirements of a case are determined objectively and when this is done as described earlier in my reasons, there is no overlap between the inherent requirements and institutional delay.

- (2) Should institutional delay be accorded “less weight” in determining the overall reasonableness of the delay?

[247] Under the revised framework, institutional delay is not given less weight than other delay that counts against the state.

- (3) Does the accused’s consent to an adjournment or later trial date constitute “waiver”?

[248] The onus is on the Crown to demonstrate that, when an accused agrees to an adjournment initiated by the Crown or to a trial date, it amounts to “waiver” and not “mere acquiescence in the inevitable”.

- (4) Should inherent requirements be subtracted from the final quantum of delay when assessing the overall reasonableness of the delay?

[249] Inherent requirements are not “subtracted” but are rather considered along with institutional delay in deciding what period of delay would be reasonable for a case of this nature.

- (5) Can the constitutionally tolerable length of institutional delay be extended if the accused did not suffer “substantial” or “significant” prejudice?

[250] As explained earlier, the answer is no: proof of actual prejudice is not required to find unreasonable delay.

- (6) Did the trial judge err in finding that the accused only suffered “some” and not “substantial” prejudice?

[251] I see no reason to interfere with the trial judge’s reasons to this effect.

- (7) Did the trial judge err when categorizing the delays in this case, specifically in attributing so much of the delay to Crown and institutional delay?

[252] I see no reason to interfere with the trial judge’s classification of delay in this case.

E. Conclusion

[253] I would allow the appeal and would stay the charges against Mr. Jordan.

IV. The Approach of Justices Moldaver, Karakatsanis and Brown

[254] It will by now be obvious that I fundamentally disagree with the approach proposed by my colleagues. It is, in my respectful view, both unwarranted and unwise. The proposed approach reduces reasonableness to two numerical ceilings. But doing so uncouples the right to be tried within a reasonable time from the Constitution’s text and purpose in a way that is difficult to square with our jurisprudence, exceeds the proper role of the Court by creating time periods which appear to have no basis or rationale in the evidence before the Court, and risks negative consequences for the administration of justice. Based on the limited evidence in the record, the presumptive time periods proposed by my colleagues are unlikely to improve the pace at which the vast majority of cases move through the system while risking judicial stays for potentially thousands of cases. Moreover, the increased simplicity which is said to flow from this approach is likely illusory. The complexity inherent in determining unreasonable delay has been moved into deciding whether to “rebut” the presumption that a delay is unreasonable if it exceeds the ceiling in particular cases: para. 47.

A. Reasonableness Cannot Be Captured by a Number

[255] One of the themes that appears throughout the Court’s jurisprudence on the right to be tried within a reasonable time is that reasonableness cannot be judicially defined with precision or captured by a number. The proposed ceilings are deeply inconsistent with this constant in our jurisprudence.

[256] In Mills, where this Court first considered the scope of s. 11(b), Lamer J. wrote that a “reasonable” time to trial cannot be determined with reference to specific numbers:

Reasonableness is an elusive concept which cannot be juridically defined with precision and certainty. Under s. 11(b), however, as we are dealing with reasonableness as regards the passage of time, we have the advantage of being able to refer to precise stages of proceedings and events.

This is not to say that reasonableness can be predetermined with precision. That would be “falling victim to the tyranny of numbers”. But the advantage to be found when dealing with time is that reasonableness can be determined with the help of the precision surrounding the happening of certain events, e.g. arraignment, the preliminary inquiry, the trial, and the time elapsed between. [p. 923] necessarily relative. It is consistent with delays and depends upon circumstances’’: p. 1672, quoting Beavers v. Haubert, 198 U.S. 77 (1905), at p. 87.

[258] In Smith, Sopinka J. for the Court elaborated on this point:

The question is, at what point does the delay become unreasonable? If this were simply a function of time, the matter could be easily resolved. Indeed a sliding scale of times could be developed with respect to specified offences which could be adjusted because of the special circumstances of the case. But it is not simply a function of time, but of time and several other factors. What those basic factors are is not the subject of disagreement. [p. 1131]

[259] In Askov and Morin, this Court again reiterated the importance of the balancing test in determining reasonable delay. In fact, in Morin, this Court specifically declined to create an administrative guideline for the “inherent” or “intake” time requirements of a case, noting the “significant variation between some categories of offences”: p. 792. Sopinka J. wrote that as “the number and complexity of [intake requirements of a case] increase, so does the amount of delay that is reasonable”: ibid.

[260] Thus, the Court has said on several occasions that reasonable inherent time requirements for cases do not lend themselves to the creation of administrative guidelines.

[261] Moreover, a judicially fixed ceiling for overall case disposition is at odds with jurisprudence arising from every other jurisdiction with a speedy trial guarantee of which I am aware. In Trial Within a Reasonable Time (1992), Michael A. Code wrote that “[i]t is generally foreign to the U.S. speedy trial jurisprudence to establish numerical standards of any kind”: p. 119. The presence of time limitations, whether judicial or statutory, are virtually unheard of in European jurisdictions. In Can excessive length of proceedings be remedied? (2007), the Venice Commission polled a number of jurisdictions ranging from Albania to the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, all of which replied in the negative to the questions as to whether there was a deadline or fixed time frame in which the competent authorities need rule on a criminal matter: Section II (pp. 65-322). Statutory timelines are, of course, an entirely different matter and I will have more to say about them in a moment.

[262] There is no parallel between the administrative guidelines for institutional delay adopted in Askov and Morin and the ceilings for overall delay proposed in my colleagues' reasons. As I have explained, institutional delay is concerned with how long one should have to wait for the court to be ready to hear the case. This is not a question that depends to any significant extent on the particular circumstances of the case. It is mainly a question of resources. It is quintessentially a judicial function under the Constitution to set some clear limits on the point at which the state's plea of inadequate resources must give way to the constitutionally guaranteed right to be tried within a reasonable time. The administrative guidelines in Askov and Morin serve the reasonableness analysis by defining when state-provided court services should reasonably be available. Unlike the proposed ceilings, the administrative guidelines do not attempt to define what would be a reasonable time for trying all cases in all circumstances. Moreover, the administrative guidelines were intended to be generous and established "neither a limitation period nor a fixed ceiling on delay": Morin, at pp. 795-96.

[264] Moreover, this approach unjustifiably diminishes the right to be tried within a reasonable time. As I see it, a case is not tried within a reasonable time if it has taken "markedly longer than it reasonably should have" (para. 48) to be tried. Other than in very unusual circumstances, that is what an accused has to show to establish a breach of s. 11(b) of the Charter. But that is not enough under the proposed framework. When the elapsed time is below the ceiling, an accused would have to show not only that the case took "markedly longer" than it reasonably should have but also that he or she "took meaningful steps that demonstrate a sustained effort to expedite the proceedings": para. 48. This requirement has no bearing on whether the time to trial was unreasonable. It is, in effect, a judicially created diminishment of a constitutional right, and one for which there is no justification. I see no basis in the constitutional text or the jurisprudence for imposing this burden on an accused person.

[265] My colleagues’ “qualitative review of nearly every reported s. 11(b) appellate decision from the past 10 years, and many decisions from trial courts” (para. 106) suggests that my concerns on this score are not theoretical. That examination shows that our superior courts found unreasonable delay in 20 percent of the cases where the delay was at or under the 30-month ceiling. The percentage is about the same for the provincial court cases at or under the ceiling. But under the proposed framework, none of these cases could be stayed absent proof by the accused that they had attempted to actively expedite the process. Imposing this burden is contrary to the Court’s holding in Askov that “it is the responsibility of the Crown to bring the accused to trial” and that “any inquiry into the conduct of the accused should in no way absolve the Crown from its responsibility to bring the accused to trial”: p. 1227.

[266] The proposed approach in effect substitutes a right to be “tried under the ceiling” for a right to be tried within a reasonable time. In doing so, it unjustifiably diminishes the right guaranteed by the Charter and sets aside a central teaching of our s. 11(b) jurisprudence — that reasonableness cannot be captured by a number.

B. Creating Presumptive Ceilings for Reasonableness Is a Legislative, Not a Judicial Task

[267] Creating fixed or presumptive ceilings is a task better left to legislatures. If such ceilings are to be created, Parliament should do so. As Lamer J. stated in Mills: “There is no magic moment beyond which a violation will be deemed to have occurred, and this Court should refrain from legislating same” (p. 942; see also Conway, at p. 1697 (concurring)).

[268] Prof. P. W. Hogg’s Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.) notes that a number of commentators have advocated that Parliament enact fixed time limits for trials: s. 52.5. The Law Reform Commission in Trial Within a Reasonable Time: A Working Paper Prepared for the Law Reform Commission of Canada (1994) (“Working Paper”) pointed to a number of considerations that weigh in favour of legislative standards, instead of judicially imposed ceilings: pp. 5-6.

[269] First, courts do not, and should not, function as legislatures. As the Working Paper put it:

The courts have been given a greatly expanded role with the Charter, but their essential function has not changed. They do not function as legislating bodies; their principal task is adjudicating conflicts brought before them. Rather, it is the role of Parliament to advance and enhance constitutional rights through legislative standards which the Charter, by its very nature, can provide only in general terms. As Chief Justice Dickson stated in Hunter v. Southam Inc., [1984 CanLII 33 \(SCC\)], [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, at p. 169]:

While the courts are guardians of the Constitution and of individuals' rights under it, it is the legislature's responsibility to enact legislation that embodies appropriate safeguards to comply with the Constitution's requirements. [p. 5]

[270] The Working Paper also pointed out that legislative timelines can be more easily changed:

Another advantage of statutory rules or internal court goals is that they can more easily be adjusted and fine-tuned: constitutional standards, in contrast, are difficult to amend. This will be particularly valuable in the case of the right to a trial within a reasonable time. [p. 6]

[271] In addition, the Working Paper noted that legislation can more comprehensively address the root causes of delay:

In addition, statutory provisions are not restricted to establishing time-limits. A Charter decision can do little beyond setting a maximum allowable delay and providing a remedy when it is exceeded. While this approach may be satisfactory from the perspective of the individual accused, it does not address the societal interest. Statutory provisions, on the other hand, can address the underlying causes of delay, rather than merely responding to failures to meet the standard. [p. 6]

[272] Creating presumptive, fixed ceilings is a matter for Parliament, not for this Court, in my respectful view.

[273] My colleagues write, and I agree, that giving meaningful content to constitutional rights is entirely consistent with the judicial role: para. 115. But that is not what the proposed ceilings do. The proposed ceilings do not so much define the content of the s. 11(b) right to a trial within a reasonable time as place new limits on the exercise of that right for reasons of administrative efficiency that have nothing to do with whether the delay in a given case was or was not excessive. In my respectful view, this is inconsistent with the judicial role.

C. The Proposed Presumptive Ceilings Are Not Supported by the Record

[274] The proposed ceilings have no support in the record that was placed before the Court in this case. The Court did not hear argument about the impact of imposing them, which remains unknown.

[275] Moreover, the ceilings appear to be illogical. The ceilings accept the Morin guidelines for institutional delay: 8 to 10 months in provincial courts and 14 to 18 months in cases involving a preliminary hearing and a trial (para. 52). This means that the proposed ceilings allow 8 to 10 months for the inherent time requirements of the case in provincial courts, which seems long, while allowing only marginally more inherent time requirements (12 to 16 months) for cases — generally significantly more complex cases — that involve a preliminary inquiry and a trial. As well, under the ceilings, the seriousness or gravity of the offence cannot be relied on to discharge the onus which the ceilings impose: para. 81. Yet under the transitional scheme, this remains a relevant factor: para. 96. The illogical result is that serious offences are more likely to be stayed under the ceilings than under the transitional scheme.

[276] What evidence there is in the record suggests that it would be unwise to establish these sorts of ceilings. For the vast majority of cases, the ceilings are so high that they risk being meaningless. They are unlikely to address the culture of delay that is said to exist. If anything, such high ceilings are more likely to feed such a culture rather than eliminate it.

[277] Consider the statistical information that we have in the record which is from the Provincial Court of British Columbia. It suggests that the proposed ceiling for the provincial courts is too high to be of any use in encouraging more expeditious justice in the vast majority of cases.

[278] The proposed ceiling is set for 18 months in provincial courts. But the median time to disposition of matters in the Provincial Court of British Columbia was 95 days in 2011-2012, with the average being 259 days, both well below the proposed ceiling: B.C. Justice Reform Initiative, A Criminal Justice System for the 21st Century (2012), at p. 30. Of course, these statistics relate to all matters, the vast majority of which (about 95 percent) are disposed of without trial: p. 33. The time to trial varies widely by court location with the time to the commencement of trial for a 2-day case varying in the Provincial Court from 12 to 16 months: p. 34. (I note that this period does not include the period from intake until a trial date is set and measures only to the beginning, not the end of the trial: “Justice Delayed: A Report of the Provincial Court of British Columbia Concerning Judicial Resources” (September 2010) (online), at p. 21.) But there is not much here to lead one to think that the ceilings will do anything to improve the timeliness of the vast majority of criminal cases in the Provincial Court. And, as I will discuss shortly, the ceilings put a small percentage of the total caseload, but a large number of long cases, at serious risk of judicial stay.

[279] The “qualitative review” conducted by Justices Moldaver, Karakatsanis, and Brown “assisted in developing the definition of exceptional circumstances” and provided “a rough sense of how the new framework would have played out in some past cases”: para. 106. This examination has not been the subject of adversarial scrutiny or debate, and how it “assisted” in developing the definition of exceptional circumstances is unstated. In any case, the examination as I have reviewed it suggests that the proposed ceilings are unrealistic and that their implementation risks large numbers of judicial stays.

[280] What does this examination tell us about the appropriateness of the ceilings? Consider first the superior court cases over the past 10 years in which stays were granted. The average “net” delay was about 44 months, with the median “net” delay being about 37 months. This provides no support for a ceiling of 30 months for superior court cases. The examination is no more supportive in relation to the provincial courts. Looking at provincial court cases in which stays were granted, the average “net” delay was about 27 months and the median was 24.5 months (I have excluded Quebec from this calculation because of the distinctive jurisdiction of the Court of Québec). Once again, my colleagues’ examination of the cases fails to support the proposed ceiling of 18 months for provincial court cases.

[281] Developing the proposed ceilings in the absence of evidence and submissions by counsel contrasts with the Court’s development of the administrative guidelines for institutional delay in Askov and Morin. In those cases, the Court had the benefit of extensive evidence including statistical information from comparable jurisdictions and expert opinion: Morin, at p. 797. The record in Morin included four volumes of evidence, largely consisting of evidence from three experts with exhibits on the issue of institutional delay across various jurisdictions in Canada — in fact, two volumes of the record were exclusively devoted to such information. This record contained evidence from a solicitor in the region of Durham, the region at issue in Morin, who was a member of the trial delay reduction committee in the region. His evidence included statistical information and information about the efforts made to reduce delay in the region. Furthermore, the record included extensive evidence from Professor Baar, who “has written and consulted extensively on court administration in general and case flow management in particular in Canada, the United States and other jurisdictions”: R. v. Morin (1990), 1990 CanLII 10952 (ON CA), 55 C.C.C. (3d) 209 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 213. This extensive record enabled the Court to analyze the respective caseloads of provincial courts and superior courts, the increase in caseload in particular regions (including in Durham), reasons for the growth in this caseload, and the abilities of various courts to handle the increasing caseload: see Morin (S.C.C.), at pp. 798-99. The broad range set out in the administrative guidelines in Morin (eight to ten months in provincial court; six to eight months from committal to trial) was derived from the considerable mass of evidence then before the Court.

D. There Is a Significant Risk of Negative Consequences

[282] My colleagues acknowledge that, if their new framework were applied immediately, there would be a risk of thousands of cases being off-side the new ceilings and being judicially stayed as a result: para. 98. There are worrying signs in the limited record that we do have that large numbers of cases (although not a large percentage of the total cases dealt with by the courts) would be at risk if the presumptive ceilings were applied.

[283] The record indicates that, in the British Columbia Provincial Court, as of March 31, 2010, there were over 2,000 adult criminal cases pending for over 18 months. As of 2011, this represented 13 percent of the caseload of the Provincial Court. As of 2012, 4 percent of pending cases in the Provincial Court had been in the system for more than two years: “Justice Delayed”, at p. 23; B.C. Justice Reform Initiative, at p. 35. Thus the limited record that we do have suggests that the proposed ceiling of 18 months in provincial courts, if applied now, would put thousands of prosecutions in the Provincial Court at serious risk of being judicially stayed. Dramatic improvements for the group of cases at the top end of the delays would be required to avoid thousands of judicial stays under the proposed ceilings.

[284] The examination of the case law undertaken by my colleagues increases rather than diminishes this concern. As I noted earlier, the average time for stays in superior courts, based on that analysis, is about 44 months, with the median being about 37 months. This time period significantly exceeds the proposed 30-month ceiling. If these figures can be relied on, they suggest that the proposed ceilings would require unrealistic and improbable improvement in case processing times to avoid many judicial stays.

[285] The transitional regime which my colleagues propose is intended to avoid the problems that would arise from immediate application of the presumptive ceilings. In my view, these transitional provisions will not avoid the risk of thousands of judicial stays of proceedings.

[286] Although my colleagues maintain that different criteria should not apply during the transitional period, they in fact establish different criteria for transitional cases. To take only one example, there will be a “transitional exceptional circumstance” if the parties reasonably relied on the law as it previously existed and have not had time “to correct their behaviour”: para. 96. In other words, the ceilings do not apply to some transitional cases.

[287] The basic problem with this is that transitional provisions create a Charter amnesty. What is unreasonable according to the Constitution is treated as if it were reasonable. The justification for this is that parties require time to correct their behaviour following the release of this decision. However, this sort of Charter amnesty is contrary to our s. 11(b) jurisprudence.

[288] Morin ruled against transitional provisions in s. 11(b) cases and explained why purporting to set up a parallel system of rules to govern existing cases is wrong in principle. Sopinka J. for the majority wrote, at pp. 797-98:

. . . the Court of Appeal purported to apply a transitional period to accommodate the situation in Durham. While a transitional period may have been appropriate immediately after the Charter came into effect, it is not appropriate any longer. This Court so held in Askov. The use of a transitional period implies a fixed period during which unreasonable delay will be tolerated while the system adjusts to a new set of rules. It imposes a general moratorium on certain Charter rights. For this reason and quite apart from the statement in Askov that the transitional period had ended, I would not find it appropriate in this case. It appears to me undesirable to impose a moratorium on Charter rights every time a region of the country experiences unusual strain on its resources. It is preferable to simply treat this as one factor in the overall decision as to whether a particular delay is unreasonable. [Emphasis added.]

[289] In my opinion, this teaching is both authoritative and sensible. I would continue to apply it.

[290] Moreover, my colleagues indicate that the proposed transitional exception applies to problems of institutional delay. But it is hard to see how this can be justified by the need to give parties an opportunity to correct their behaviour. The guidelines for reasonable institutional delay were established (at the very latest) in Morin, almost a quarter of a century ago. Twenty-four years is long enough for parties to modify their behaviour to comply. No transitional arrangements for institutional delay can now be justified.

[291] My colleagues write that the “contextual application of the [new] framework is intended to ensure that the post-Askov situation [in which tens of thousands of charges were stayed in Ontario alone] is not repeated”: para. 94. In other words, the hope is that the presumptive ceilings that are unrealistic now will become realistic in the fairly near future. But there is no basis in the record or in logical reasoning to suppose that these ceilings, if dramatically unrealistic now, will become less unrealistic with the passage of time. In my respectful view, this Court should not impose on the criminal justice system the risk that thousands of prosecutions will be judicially stayed. Doing so is especially regrettable when it is done, as is proposed here, in a virtual factual vacuum, with no opportunity for submissions about either the wisdom of this approach or the accuracy of the assumptions on which it is based.

[292] My colleagues maintain that there is a “culture of complacency towards delay” (para. 40) that has emerged in the criminal justice system, which is not addressed by the Morin framework. They argue that their revised approach to s. 11(b) is warranted, given that under the current framework “participants in the justice system . . . are not encouraged to take preventative measures to address inefficient practices and resourcing problems”: para. 41. But, contrary to these broad and unsupported generalizations, even the limited record before the Court indicates that the problem of excessive delay has been the focus of extensive attention by the British Columbia Provincial Court and by the governments of British Columbia, Alberta, Newfoundland and Labrador, and Ontario. The most recent statistics in the record indicate that the situation is, if anything, getting better, not worse: see “The Semi-Annual Time to Trial Report of the Provincial Court of British Columbia to March 31, 2015” (online), at p. 5.

[293] Imposing judicially created ceilings as an aspect of our s. 11(b) jurisprudence presents risks. If we are to take these risks through the imposition of ceilings or other time limits, these limits should be created by legislation and informed by facts.

E. The Promised Simplicity of the Ceilings Is Likely Illusory

[294] Even if creating ceilings were an appropriate task for the courts and even if there were an appropriate evidentiary basis for them, there is little reason to think these presumptive ceilings would avoid the complexities inherent in deciding whether a particular delay is unreasonable in all of the circumstances.

[295] We can look to the experience of other jurisdictions. It appears that even fixed limitation periods set by legislatures have not succeeded in avoiding complexity. Various states in the United States have created statutory time limitation periods dealing with overall delay in criminal proceedings. At the federal level, there is the Speedy Trial Act of 1974, 18 U.S.C. § 3161, and there are similar provisions in many states: W. R. LaFare et al., Criminal Procedure (5th ed. 2009), at pp. 892-93. These provisions create time limitations, but also include a number of contingencies to account for the plethora of different circumstances under which criminal cases may arise: pp. 895-97. In short, to be workable, the legislated limits inevitably require that a number of factors be balanced and considered in determining whether any case or charge should be dismissed: p. 897. But these contingencies and this balancing simply give rise to the sort of litigation that the limits were supposed to avoid: see S. Hopwood, “The Not So Speedy Trial Act” (2014), 89 Wash. L. Rev. 709, at p. 715.

[296] Turning to the proposed scheme, it seems to me that rather than avoiding complexity, it simply moves the complexities of the analysis to a new location.

[297] I turn first to cases in which the delay exceeds the presumptive ceiling. Departure from the ceiling may be required by a variety of circumstances: “discrete exceptional events” (para. 75), including delay caused by unexpected recantation by a complainant and other unforeseen trial delays; delay resulting from a case’s particular “complexity” (para. 77); and whether particular periods of delay could reasonably have been mitigated. It is hard to see how this framework is likely to bring greater simplicity to the analysis.

[298] The same applies to the burden on the defence in cases which fall below the ceilings. Under the proposed framework, the defence has the burden to show, first, that the time required to dispose of the case “markedly exceeds the reasonable time requirements of the case”: para. 87. In order to consider a defence attempt to discharge this burden, the court will have to consider a variety of factors, including “the complexity of the case, local considerations, and whether the Crown took reasonable steps to expedite the proceedings”: ibid. These factors largely mirror the test under the existing jurisprudence.

[299] The defence must also show that it took “meaningful, sustained steps to expedite the proceedings”: para. 84. The defence must show that “it attempted to set the earliest possible hearing dates, was cooperative with and responsive to the Crown and the court, put the Crown on timely notice when delay was becoming a problem, and conducted all applications . . . reasonably”: para. 85. I have already explained why I think it is inappropriate to impose this burden. But putting that aside, the need for these inquiries increases rather than reduces the complexity of the analysis mandated by the existing jurisprudence.

[300] Finally, consider the proposed transitional provisions. It is unexplained how the Crown will be able to satisfy the court that “the time the case has taken is justified based on the parties’ reasonable reliance on the law as it previously existed” in the relevant jurisdiction, let alone how it will be shown that “the parties have [or have not] had time following the release of this decision to correct their behaviour”: para. 96. Little imagination is needed to see the ballooning evidentiary implications of these elements of the scheme. Also, it seems that for transitional cases below the ceiling, unlike cases subject to the new template, the defence does not have to prove having taken initiative to expedite matters in the period preceding this decision in order to make out a case of unreasonable delay. But doing so will assist the defence claim of unreasonable delay. The result is that even in transitional cases, the parties will be parsing the record to show how the defence did, or did not, try to move things along.

[301] These considerations suggest that the proposed presumptive ceilings will do little to simplify the task of determining whether the delay in a particular case violates the accused's right to be tried within a reasonable time. In one way or the other, the judge must look at the circumstances of the particular case at hand.

F. Conclusion

[302] I am not convinced that this Court should impose the scheme proposed by my colleagues. It diminishes Charter rights. It casts aside three decades of the Court's jurisprudence when no participant in the appeal called for such a wholesale change — and this in the context of a case in which all of us agree that the result is clear under the existing jurisprudence. It has not been the subject of adversarial scrutiny or debate. The record does not support the particular ceilings selected. Nor, so far as I can tell, does the Court-conducted examination of reported cases. And it risks repetition of the Askov aftermath in which thousands of prosecutions were judicially stayed. In short, the proposed scheme is, in my respectful view, wrong in principle and unwise in practice.

V. Disposition

[303] I would allow the appeal and enter a stay of proceedings.

Appeal allowed.

[1] We were not invited to revisit the question of remedy. Accordingly, we refrain from doing so.

[2] This Court has held that s. 11(b) applies to sentencing proceedings (R. v. MacDougall, 1998 CanLII 763 (SCC), [1998] 3 S.C.R. 45). Some sentencing proceedings require significant time, for example, dangerous offender applications or situations in which expert reports are required, or extensive evidence is tendered. The issue of delay in sentencing, however, is not before us, and we make no comment about how this ceiling should apply to s. 11(b) applications brought after a conviction is entered, or whether additional time should be added to the ceiling in such cases.

[3] While most proceedings with a preliminary inquiry are eventually tried in the superior court, this is not always the case. For example, a case may go to trial in the provincial court after a preliminary inquiry if the province in which the trial takes place offers this as an option (such as Quebec), or if the accused re-elects a trial in the provincial court following a preliminary inquiry. In either case, the 30-month ceiling would apply.

[4] We note that the appellant and some of the interveners submitted that the Morin guidelines were intended to apply to the entire period of delay, rather than just the segment of delay caused by a shortfall of institutional resources. This is incorrect. The only reasonable reading of this Court's decisions in Askov, Morin, and Godin is that the guidelines were intended to apply only to institutional delay, not the entire period of delay.

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF ALBERTA, APPELLATE DIVISION

Criminal law—Failure of Court to proceed with case at appointed time and place—Resulting loss of jurisdiction—Jurisdiction over offence not saved by curative section of Code—Criminal Code, s.440.1 [en. 1974-75-76, c. 93, s. 43].

On February 9, 1977, the respondent was charged with unlawfully driving a motor vehicle while impaired. The case was adjourned from time to time until finally set for trial on April 21, 1977, at 2:00 p.m. in Courtroom No. 5 of the Provincial Court Building in the City of Edmonton. Due to a mix-up, the case was called that morning in Courtroom No. 1 and, the respondent not being present, the provincial judge issued a warrant for her arrest. Unaware of these developments, the respondent and her counsel duly appeared at Courtroom No. 5 at 2:00 p.m. Her name did not appear on the list of cases scheduled to be heard that afternoon. Crown counsel told respondent's counsel that he knew nothing about the charge. The respondent and her counsel departed.

Thereafter, the respondent applied to the Trial Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta for an order (i) setting aside the warrant, and (ii) prohibiting the Provincial Court from dealing further with the information. The order was granted. The Crown conceded that the warrant had been improperly issued, but challenged, in the Appellate Division, that part of the order which prohibited further proceedings on the information. The Appellate Division in a unanimous judgment maintained the order of prohibition. Subsequently, leave to appeal to this Court was granted. The narrow question was whether s. 440.1 of the Criminal Code, a curative section proclaimed in force April 26, 1976, remedies a loss of jurisdiction resulting from the failure of a court to proceed with a case at the appointed time and place.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The language of s. 440.1(1), read in its grammatical and ordinary sense, is simply not wide enough to cover the situation, as here, where there is failure on the part of the court to proceed. The language of s. 440.1 (2) is equally inapposite.

Section 440.1(1), on a plain reading, contemplates three elements, precedent to the operation of the section, namely, (i) a proceeding before a court, judge, magistrate or justice; (ii) failure to comply with the provisions of the Code relating to adjournments or remands; (iii) non-appearance of the accused or defendant at any such proceeding or adjournment thereof. It is doubtful if any one of these elements is present in circumstances where the accused or defendant appears at the time and place appointed, but the court fails to appear and nothing is done.

Section 440.1 is directed to the situation where there has been a procedural defect or irregularity in respect of adjournments or remands. The court may purport to adjourn the trial or remand the accused, but inadvertently breach some provision of the Criminal Code in so doing. A good example is the case in which the magistrate contravenes the eight-day time limitation by adjourning the matter beyond eight days without consent or sine die. In those circumstances, the proceedings are not to be held to be invalid. Section 440.1, in effect, gives statutory recognition to the earlier practice of issuing a summons or warrant to bring an accused person before the court where there had been an improper adjournment and the accused failed to appear.

The problem in the instant case was not one of contravention of the requisites of the Code relating to adjournments. There was no failure to comply with any provision of the Code. The imbroglio arose because the court failed to appear and nothing was done at the time and place set for trial.

In the case of Doyle v. The Queen, 1976 CanLII 11 \(SCC\), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 597, the Court evidenced a willingness to abandon the distinction between loss of jurisdiction over the person (as in improper adjournments) and loss of jurisdiction over the offence (as in a failure to proceed). Section 440.1, however, cannot be interpreted as embracing both eventualities. It is not so worded as to save jurisdiction over the offence when the court has not acted. The decision in Trenholm v. Attorney-General of Ontario, 1940 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1940] S.C.R. 301, affirmed in Doyle, governs this appeal.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Alberta, Appellate Division^[1], dismissing the Crown's appeal from the granting of an order of prohibition. Appeal dismissed.

J. Watson, for the appellant.

Brian Burrows, for the respondent.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

DICKSON J.—It has long been recognized in our law that an inferior court may suffer loss of jurisdiction by reason of some procedural irregularity, as for example, when the date to which an accused is remanded or to which a case is adjourned for trial comes and goes without any hearing or appearance, “with nothing done”. The narrow question in this appeal is whether s. 440.1 of the Criminal Code, a curative section proclaimed in force April 26, 1976, remedies a loss of jurisdiction resulting from the failure of a court to proceed with a case at the appointed time and place.

The facts are short and simple. On February 9, 1977, the respondent was charged with unlawfully driving a motor vehicle while impaired. The case was adjourned from time to time until finally set for trial on April 21, 1977, at 2.00 p.m. in Courtroom No. 5 of the Provincial Court Building in the City of Edmonton. Due to a mix-up, the case was called that morning in Courtroom No. 1 and, the respondent not being present, the provincial judge issued a warrant for her arrest. Unaware of these developments, the respondent and her counsel duly appeared at Courtroom No. 5 at 2.00 p.m. Her name did not appear on the list of cases scheduled to be heard that afternoon. Crown counsel told respondent's counsel that he knew nothing about the charge. The respondent and her counsel departed.

Thereafter, the respondent applied to the Trial Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta for an order (i) setting aside the warrant, and (ii) prohibiting the Provincial Court from dealing further with the information. The order was granted. The Crown conceded that the warrant had been improperly issued, but challenged, in the Appellate Division, that part of the order which prohibited further proceedings on the information. The Appellate Division in a unanimous judgment maintained the order of prohibition.

In circumstances of a failure to act, the leading decision is Trenholm v. Attorney-General of Ontario^[2], in which the applicant sought a writ of habeas corpus. He had appeared before a magistrate on January 3, 1938, and was remanded to January 10, 1938. An inquiry into his mental condition was being conducted in the interim. By warrant dated January 12, he was detained at a mental institution. It was held the warrant was not validly issued because the remand had expired on the tenth, at which time no steps were taken. Thus, there was no authority under which the warrant could have been issued. There was “no criminal cause or charge in existence”: per Kerwin J. at p. 308. The justice became functus: per Davis J. at p. 313. Loss of jurisdiction over the offence occurred when the date of adjournment or remand passed and “nothing was done”. Such procedural defect destroyed the jurisdiction of the court. The indictment or warrant became invalid and of no effect. R. v. Lights^[3]; Ex p. Peters^[4]; R. v. Mack^[5].

In a more recent judgment of this Court, Doyle v. The Queen^[6], Trenholm was affirmed. Where a court fails to proceed with a hearing, jurisdiction over the information charging the accused with the offence is lost, and thereafter “that information is to be treated as if it had never been laid”: per Ritchie J. at p. 610.

The question for determination in the case at bar, however, is whether s. 440.1 of the Code has changed all of this. Does the section have the result of saving the jurisdiction which would otherwise have been lost? Section 440.1 reads:

(1) The validity of any proceeding before a court, judge, magistrate or justice is not affected by any failure to comply with the provisions of this Act relating to adjournments or remands, and where such failure has occurred and an accused or a defendant does not appear at any such proceeding or upon any adjournment thereof, the court, judge, magistrate or justice may issue a summons or, if it or he considers it necessary in the public interest, a warrant for the arrest of the accused or defendant.

(2) Where, in the opinion of the court, judge, magistrate or justice, an accused or a defendant who appears at a proceeding has been misled or prejudiced by reason of any matter referred to in subsection (1), the court, judge, magistrate or justice may adjourn the proceeding and may make such order as it or he considers proper.

(3) The provisions of Part XIV apply mutatis mutandis where a summons or warrant is issued under subsection (1).

The Crown contends that where an adjournment expires with no valid action taken by the court, s. 440.1(1) preserves the court’s jurisdiction on the information charging the accused. Reliance is place upon Doyle v. The Queen, supra.

Prior to the decision in Doyle, there was a respectable body of authority which drew a distinction between loss of jurisdiction over the person and loss of jurisdiction over the offence, i.e. the indictment or information. Loss of jurisdiction over the person was considered to arise when the court failed to follow the prescriptions of the Criminal Code pertaining to adjournments and remands. Although jurisdiction over the person was said to be lost, it could be regained when the accused appeared before the court voluntarily or in response to a summons or warrant. Proceedings then continued on the original information or indictment. See R. v. Bence et al, Ex p. Regina Oral Arts Ltd.^[7]; Re Kuhn and the Queen^[8]; R. v. Stedelbauer Chevrolet Oldsmobile Ltd.^[9]; Re

Groves Certiorari Application^[10]; but see also St-Pierre v. The Queen^[11], and Kolot v. Hemsworth^[12].

The judgment in Doyle cast doubt upon the validity of a distinction between jurisdiction over the person and jurisdiction over the offence. Very briefly, these were the circumstances in Doyle. There had been a number of delays and adjournments, each of which had been met by protest from counsel representing Doyle. Although the information had been initiated December 8, 1973, it was not until April 1, 1974, that the charge was read to the accused. At that time, the Court further adjourned the trial to a time four months later. Doyle then brought an application for a writ of mandamus declaring void his recognizance. Mr. Justice Ritchie, writing for this Court, held that the failure to put the accused to his election “involved the loss of jurisdiction over the accused” (p. 607); and, by adjourning the case for more than eight days, “jurisdiction over the person of the accused was accordingly lost” (p. 608). Later in the judgment, in obiter dicta, Mr. Justice Ritchie, had this to say:

In the present case if the magistrate had granted an adjournment for eight days and then done nothing, the situation would have been exactly within the Trenholm decision and I cannot see that the affirmative violation of the Code by adjournment for more than eight days which occurred here affords any distinction in principle from the acquiescence in allowing an eight-day adjournment to expire which is what occurred in Trenholm. (p. 609)

It is this language which has been interpreted as removing the distinction between loss of jurisdiction over the information or indictment and loss of jurisdiction over the person. See the annotation “The Wonderful World of Practice”, 35 C.R.N.S. 14 at p. 19; also “Criminal Law and Procedure”, (1977) 9 Ott.L.R. 568 at p. 648.

It should be observed at the outset that this case approximates the situation in Trenholm, where “nothing is done”, rather than in Doyle, where there was a clear contravention of a specific provision of the Code relating to adjournments. Doyle did nothing to erode the view expressed in Trenholm that when the assigned date passes, without action taken, jurisdiction is lost. Doyle had the effect of recognizing a like loss of jurisdiction when there has been an irregular adjournment or remand. If the dicta in Doyle could be said to have suppressed the distinction between jurisdiction over the person and jurisdiction over the offence, s. 440.1 may be seen as restoring that distinction, in the sense that it permits the court, judge, magistrate or justice to issue a summons or warrant to secure attendance of an accused or defendant where there is any failure to comply with the provisions of the Code relating to adjournments or remands. The validity of the proceeding is not affected by such failure.

The Crown advances two main arguments. First, it is said that in setting an adjournment to a certain time and place, and allowing it to expire without the court taking steps to extend the adjournment or otherwise deal with the matter, there has been a failure to comply with the provisions relating to adjournments. When the court does nothing on the 'adjourned' date, it has failed to comply with the terms of the adjournment and is therefore within the curative scope of s. 440.1.

Second, it is argued that the section ought to be given a liberal construction; taking a fair and liberal reading, failure to deal with a matter on the adjourned date is a failure relating to an adjournment. The spirit in which s. 440.1 was enacted was that of resolving procedural irregularities and losses of jurisdiction. If Doyle teaches that there is no difference in principle between the two sets of circumstances in which formerly there would have been a loss of jurisdiction, then s. 440.1 ought to be applied equally to cover losses of jurisdiction over the person and the offence. More particularly, it is urged that the section can be used to remedy a failure by the court to attend proceedings set for a particular day.

The Crown submits that a narrow reading of s. 440.1 will revive the dichotomy of loss of jurisdiction and that the section should receive such large interpretation as will save jurisdiction in a case such as the one at bar. It might be noted that a broad interpretation was given in Magna v. R.^[13]; in R. v. Griffin, Whyte, Porter, and Bruce (Ont. Weekly Court, August 15, 1978, unreported); and in Craven and National Aviation Consultants Ltd. v. R. (Toronto Weekly Court, March 26, 1979, unreported). A narrow interpretation was preferred by the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island sitting in banco in R. v. Barry (October 11, 1978, unreported).

In my view, the interpretation the Crown would give to the word "adjournment", in order to use s. 440.1 to cure a loss of jurisdiction consequent upon a failure of the court to attend, is both artificial and contrived. The language of s. 440.1(1), read in its grammatical and ordinary sense, is simply not wide enough to cover the situation, as here, where there is failure on the part of the court to proceed. The language of s. 440.1(2) is equally inapposite.

Section 440.1(1), on a plain reading, contemplates three elements, precedent to the operation of the section, namely, (i) a proceeding before a court, judge, magistrate or justice; (ii) failure to comply with the provisions of the Code relating to adjournments or remands; (iii) non-appearance of the accused or defendant at any such proceeding or adjournment thereof. In my view, it is doubtful if any one of these elements is present in circumstances where the accused or defendant appears at the time and place appointed, but the court fails to appear and nothing is done.

Section 440.1 is directed to the situation where there has been a procedural defect or irregularity in respect of adjournments or remands. The court may purport to adjourn the trial or remand the accused, but inadvertently breach some provision of the Criminal Code in so doing. A good example is the case in which the magistrate contravenes the eight-day time limitation by adjourning the matter beyond eight days without consent (R. v. Dupras Ltd.; R. v. Latraverse^[14]) or sine die (Queen v.

Morse^[15]; Queen v. Quinn^[16]; R. v. Moore^[17]). In those circumstances, the proceedings are not to be held to be invalid. Section 440.1, in effect, gives statutory recognition to the earlier practice of issuing a summons or warrant to bring an accused person before the court where there had been an improper adjournment and the accused failed to appear.

The problem in the instant case was not one of contravention of the requisites of the Code relating to adjournments. There was no failure to comply with any provision of the Code. The imbroglio arose because the court failed to appear and nothing was done at the time and place set for trial.

In the case of Doyle, the Court evidenced, as I have indicated, a willingness to abandon the distinction between loss of jurisdiction over the person (as in improper adjournments) and loss of jurisdiction over the offence (as in a failure to proceed). Section 440.1, however, cannot be interpreted as embracing both eventualities. It is not so worded as to save jurisdiction over the offence when the court has not acted. The Trenholm decision, affirmed in Doyle, governs this appeal.

I add this caveat. The Appellate Division was of opinion that the Court had lost jurisdiction over the offence, but that a new information was available, if one could be laid within the limitation period for summary conviction cases. The question of whether a new information may be laid after jurisdiction has been lost is not before us, and I refrain from any extended discussion on the point, in the absence of argument and on the narrow facts of this case. It is manifest, however, that there will be occasions on which the laying of a new information will not be available. Time limitations may preclude it. Indeed, the laying of another information may amount to nothing less than an abuse of process. The successful challenge to jurisdiction may not come until after trial on the merits and conviction. The full effect of s. 440.1(2) and possible prejudice to the accused, through the laying of a new information, would require consideration. The dicta in Doyle should not therefore, in my opinion, be taken as authority for the proposition that in every case it will be possible, when jurisdiction over the offence is lost, to lay another information in the same jurisdiction charging the same offence.

I would dismiss the appeal. Pursuant to the order granting leave to appeal to this Court, the appellant will pay the costs of the respondent on a solicitor and client basis.

Constitutional law — Division of powers — Interjurisdictional immunity — Scope.

Lafarge Canada Inc. wished to build an integrated ship offloading/concrete batching facility on waterfront lands owned by the Vancouver Port Authority (“VPA”), a federal undertaking constituted pursuant to the 1998 Canada Marine Act. The City of Vancouver, which proposed certain modifications, and the VPA approved the project in principle, but a group of ratepayers opposed it and filed an application in the British Columbia Supreme Court, arguing that the City had declined to exercise jurisdiction over the lands and ought to have insisted that Lafarge obtain a City development permit. The VPA replied that no City permit was necessary because VPA lands enjoy interjurisdictional immunity as “public property” within the meaning of s. 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867, or because the management of those lands is vital to the VPA’s “federal undertaking” pursuant to the federal s. 91(10) jurisdiction over “navigation and shipping”. In the alternative, the VPA contended that there was an operational conflict and that, according to the doctrine of federal paramountcy, the conflict must be resolved in favour of federal jurisdiction. The chambers judge granted the ratepayers’ application and declared that the VPA lacked jurisdiction to approve the project. The Court of Appeal set aside the decision, finding that VPA lands are “public property” within the meaning of s. 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and declaring the City’s zoning and development by-law to be inapplicable to the proposed development.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella and Charron JJ.: This case should be decided on the basis of federal paramountcy, not interjurisdictional immunity. As explained in Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, released concurrently, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity should generally not be applied where the legislative subject matter presents a double aspect and both federal and provincial authorities have a compelling interest. Were there to be no valid federal land use planning controls applicable to the site, federalism does not require a regulatory vacuum, which would be the consequence of interjurisdictional immunity. The matter at issue here — the development of waterfront lands — could potentially fall under either provincial or federal jurisdiction, depending on the ownership of the lands and on the use to which it is proposed that they be put. Waterfront lands do not cease to be “within the province” by reason of their potential use for federally regulated activities, but the federal power will be paramount to the provincial power where valid federal and provincial laws are applicable to different aspects of the proposed use and come into operational conflict. [4] [37] [43]

The Canada Marine Act is a federal law that in pith and substance relates both to the management of “public property” and to “navigation and shipping”. Section 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867 does not extend interjurisdictional immunity to all federally controlled property. Absent an agency relationship, public property must encompass some element of ownership by Canada in order to receive constitutional immunity from provincial land use regulations. The federal Crown has no proprietary interest in the subject land. The VPA’s letters patent indicate that the lands Lafarge proposes to lease from the VPA for its project are Schedule C lands. Under the Canada Marine Act, Schedule C lands are owned by the VPA, not by the Crown, and it is expressly provided that the VPA is not an agent of Canada in relation to those lands. Since s. 91(1A) creates an immunity based on a proprietary interest, Schedule C lands are not “public property” of the federal Crown and do not therefore fall within the scope of s. 91(1A). To impute s. 91(1A) status to the Schedule C lands and thereby subject the lands to a Crown regime which the denial of Crown agent status was designed to avoid, would be inconsistent with Parliament’s intent. [48] [53] [56] [60] [72]

Nor does interjurisdictional immunity apply to every element of an undertaking that has been incorporated federally or is subject to federal regulation; it is restricted to “essential and vital elements” of the undertaking. There is no explicit federal jurisdiction over “port lands”. The VPA’s authority must therefore be derived from the federal power over “navigation and shipping” under s. 91(10) of the Constitution Act, 1867. This power may bring within federal jurisdiction a matter otherwise subject to provincial jurisdiction if that matter is “closely integrated” with shipping or navigation. Here, the Canada Marine Act’s land use controls reach beyond Crown property to embrace uses that are “closely integrated” with shipping and navigation. This covers the Lafarge project, which has from the outset been conceived of by both the City and the VPA as an integrated transportation/mixing facility in which the marine transportation aspect dominates. The port is not a federal enclave. VPA lands are held and leased for a variety of activities.

Authorizing the construction of a cement mixing facility on these port lands does not fall within the VPA's core or vital functions. On the facts of this case, it is rather an activity incidental to shipping. In the absence of valid and applicable federal regulatory land use controls there would be no regulatory vacuum on the land at issue. Provincial land use controls would apply. The federal arguments in favour of interjurisdictional immunity are therefore rejected. [42] [65-66] [68] [72-73]

The preconditions of federal paramountcy are met, however, and the ratepayers' application should be dismissed on that ground. First, there is a valid and applicable federal law, namely the Canada Marine Act. Its land use plan and policies and procedures must be construed in light of the scope of the federal power. The only source of federal power relevant to the Lafarge project lands is the navigation and shipping power. The whole of the Lafarge project on the VPA's Schedule C lands is sufficiently "integrated" into the ship/barge unloading facility to make federal law applicable to all aspects of it. Second, there is a valid and applicable provincial law. The City's zoning and development by-law is a valid expression of provincially authorized legislative power. The land use controls are laws of general application that are not aimed at navigation and shipping. Third, these two valid laws are incapable of simultaneous enforcement: there is an operational conflict in this case because a judge could not have given effect to both the federal law and the municipal law. The record confirms areas of conflict relating to a height restriction, and to noise and pollution standards. To apply the relevant municipal law in these areas would frustrate the federal purpose by depriving the VPA of its final decisional authority on the development of a project that both the City and the VPA have considered to be primarily shipping-related in respect of matters that fall within the legislative authority of Parliament. [75] [77-81] [85]

Per Bastarache J.: The appeal should be dismissed solely on a proper application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity in the context of Parliament's power over navigation and shipping. Although this doctrine has been criticized, its critics have not successfully demonstrated why it should be abandoned. Without it, there would be no remedy permitting a provincial law to be read down in such a way as to be inapplicable to a federal matter while continuing to be applicable to other, non-federal matters. There would also be no way to prevent the improper application of an otherwise valid provincial law to a federal matter in situations where there is no competing federal law. [93] [103] [107]

The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is about jurisdiction: what matters is whether a valid provincial law “affects” the core of a federal head of legislative power. The test for immunity should therefore be focussed not on a specific activity or operation and on whether that activity or operation is immune from the provincial law; rather, its focus should be on whether the federal power in question is immune from the application of the provincial law. Because of this focus on jurisdiction rather than on an action, there need not be any federal legislation or executive action “occupying the field” for federal immunity to be triggered in an area under federal legislative authority. The mere fact that a provincial law or a municipal by-law “affects” a vital part of an area under exclusive federal jurisdiction is enough to render it inapplicable to a federal undertaking. The meaning of the word “affects” should not be interpreted as requiring complete paralysis of the core of the federal power or the operations of the undertaking; rather, to trigger immunity, the impact of the application of the provincial law must be sufficiently severe and serious. [109-110] [139]

Here, the City’s by-law is valid provincial legislation of general application. Its pith and substance is in relation to the regulation of land use planning and development for property situated within the City. The application of the by-law does not invade Parliament’s exclusive legislative jurisdiction over “public property”, because the lands in question do not constitute “public property” within the meaning of s. 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and therefore do not enjoy federal immunity from the application of the municipal by-law on that basis. Since the immunity at the heart of s. 91(1A) is based on a proprietary interest, the relevant test for determining whether lands constitute public property for the purposes of that section is whether there is evidence that the federal Crown has a sufficient proprietary interest in them. Thus, when a Crown corporation owns or holds land other than as a Crown agent, there must be some element of ownership by the federal Crown for it to receive constitutional immunity from provincial land use laws and regulations. On the facts of this case, the Crown has not established a proprietary interest in the lands that would be sufficient to justify federal immunity on the basis of s. 91(1A). The lands in question are listed in Schedule C of the VPA's letters patent, and it is clear that Parliament explicitly chose to exclude Schedule C lands from the definition of federal lands and lands held in the name of the Crown by Crown agents. In including the lands in Schedule C, Parliament renounced any proprietary interest in them. The lands are held by the VPA in its own name, and not for the benefit of the Crown. [115] [119] [123-125]

The City's by-law is constitutionally inapplicable by reason of federal immunity in respect of the core of the navigation and shipping power under s. 91(10) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The core of the s. 91(10) power necessarily extends to and includes the power to regulate land use planning and development for port lands in support of port operations. This provides the necessary link to navigation and shipping in order to trigger federal immunity, and it flows from the inclusion of ports and harbours generally within the federal power over navigation and shipping and, more specifically, from the inclusion of land use planning and development activities and decisions by port authorities in respect of port lands when such activities and decisions have a sufficient connection to navigation and shipping. The s. 91(10) power must also include and extend to federally regulated port authorities such as the VPA, whose creation, role and mandate are undeniably at the core of Parliament's legislative authority over navigation and shipping insofar as their operations and functions are performed in support of port operations. The decision to recognize or deny federal immunity should not be based solely on whether the parcel of port lands in question is to be used directly for "port activities" or merely "in support of" port operations, and on fears that certain uses of the latter category would appear to be somehow less closely connected to shipping and navigation. The regulation of land use planning and development for all port lands lies at the core of s. 91(10). So long as that regulation function is performed properly according to the federal undertaking's terms and mandate and is concerned with port lands for activities in support of port operations (at a minimum), or directly for port activities, the specific status of a particular parcel of port lands and its specific intended use should not matter. Specific uses of land are relevant to the immunity analysis only to the extent that they might reflect an improper exercise of the core federal power over the regulation of land use for port lands. Here, under the Canada Marine Act, Schedule C lands have been deemed to be “necessary to support port operations”, and the VPA’s decision to approve the Lafarge project on such lands was consistent with a valid exercise of its power to regulate land use planning for port lands in support of port operations. Although certain aspects of the project, taken on their own and in isolation, may appear to be only loosely connected with shipping and navigation activities or operations, the project “supports” port operations given that its ultimate objective is to enhance competitiveness and commercial viability. Since the City’s by-law clearly and significantly affects the VPA’s regulation of land use planning for port lands in support of port operations by imposing a zoning regime and an approval process for development proposals and projects on such lands, the by-law is inapplicable because it affects a vital part of the federal power over navigation and shipping. The judgment of Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella and Charron JJ. was delivered by

1 BINNIE AND LEBEL JJ. — Vancouver possesses by far the busiest port in Canada, and its vast operations constitute not only a vital part of the shipping and transportation industry but generate economic activity, commercial opportunities and environmental concerns for the eight surrounding municipalities. Changing land use patterns and more efficient modern shipping methods (containerization, for example) have released stretches of waterfront for other types of development. Vancouver's original Coal Harbour is now a forest of luxury hotels and high-priced condominiums. Elsewhere smokestacks have given way to parkland. Warehouses have been converted into trendy office buildings. Yet shipping activities flourish. The realities of mixed transportation/industrial/commercial/residential development along urban waterfronts pose a challenge to the venerable “watertight compartments” division of federal legislative jurisdiction over navigation and shipping, on the one hand, and provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights on the other. How to give practical effect in the harbour context to the exercise of these potentially conflicting legislative and regulatory powers is the central question posed by this litigation.

2 The immediate controversy is the proposal by the respondent Lafarge Canada Inc. to build an “integrated” ship offloading/concrete batching facility in the east harbour area on what is known as the Sterling Shipyard site. Aggregate is to be barged in by sea from the Sunshine Coast, offloaded, stored temporarily in silos on the waterfront, then mixed with cement, and thereafter dispatched to various construction sites, particularly within downtown Vancouver. Some material like cement is to be trucked in. The mixing component of the facility is described as a “twin batch plant” because the ingredients can either be tumbled on site (“wet mix”) and then loaded and dispatched, or loaded in their original state (“dry mix”) with water added in the rotating drums of concrete trucks. In the latter situation, the ingredients are churned into concrete on the way to a construction site. The respondents contend that as a matter of fact the “twin batch plant” will be integrated into the marine unloading facility.

3 The two levels of government are in agreement that the Lafarge project reflects good planning principles, but objection is taken by the Burrardview Neighbourhood Association (the “Ratepayers”). Their legal argument, advanced in this Court by the provincial attorneys general, is that the City ought to have insisted that Lafarge obtain a City development permit. The respondent, Vancouver Port Authority (“VPA”), replies that as a matter of law no City permit is necessary because VPA lands enjoy interjurisdictional immunity as federal “public property” within the meaning of s. 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867, or their management is vital to the VPA's "federal undertaking" pursuant to the federal s. 91(10) jurisdiction over "navigation and shipping". In either case, the VPA says provincial land use controls are rendered inoperative. In the alternative, the respondents say, there is operational conflict between the federal land use controls and provincial land use controls, and the conflict, according to the doctrine of federal paramountcy, must be resolved in favour of federal jurisdiction.

4 For the reasons we gave in Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, 2007 SCC 22, released concurrently, we agree with the approach outlined by the late Chief Justice Dickson in OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), 1987 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 2, at p. 18, in which he characterized the arguments for interjurisdictional immunity as not particularly compelling, and concluded that they ran contrary to the "dominant tide" of Canadian constitutional jurisprudence. In particular, in our view, the doctrine should not be used where, as here, the legislative subject matter (waterfront development) presents a double aspect. Both federal and provincial authorities have a compelling interest. Were there to be no valid federal land use planning controls applicable to the site, federalism does not require (nor, in the circumstances, should it tolerate) a regulatory vacuum, which would be the consequence of interjurisdictional immunity. On the facts, however, there is valid and applicable federal legislation which is in conflict, both in its operation and in its purpose, with the provincial land use legislation and regulations adopted under its authority. The appeal is thus easily resolved in favour of the VPA on the basis of federal paramountcy. The British Columbia Court of Appeal rejected the Ratepayers' challenge and, for somewhat different reasons, we agree with its conclusion.

5 The appeal should therefore be dismissed.

I. Facts

6 Vancouver harbour, for navigational purposes, is defined as a stretch of 233 kilometres of coastline from Roberts Bank near the U.S. border through Sturgeon Bank, English Bay, and Burrard Inlet to Port Moody. The VPA claims proprietary jurisdiction over 150 kilometres of shoreline. Within Burrard Inlet, the VPA is responsible for approximately 6,000 hectares of seabed and 460 hectares of “upland” (i.e. mostly reclaimed waterfront land).

7 The VPA has adopted a Port Land Use Management Plan (June 1994) (called “Port 2010”) whose “strategic rationale” is set out in part as follows:

. . . the port is situated within an urban region which is also experiencing significant growth. Accordingly, there is a need to effectively plan the interface of these two dynamics. [p. 2]

8 Port 2010 includes adjacent municipalities in its definition of “stakeholders” (p. 12) and acknowledges that

VPC [predecessor to the VPA] will need to work with the municipalities and communities to establish compatible land use plans that support a viable working waterfront. [p. 20] 9 The provincial assessment authority has effectively exempted from local taxes the Sterling Shipyard site and other port lands by assessing them at “nil” for municipal and provincial taxation purposes, although some monies are paid to the municipalities pursuant to the federal Payments in Lieu of Taxes Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. M-13.

The City's Central Waterfront Official Development Plan (which was adopted by By-law No. 5261, June 19, 1979) states that: "It is recognized that in order to realize the City's basic objectives, full co-operation will be needed from the various waterfront property owners and authorities. The objectives of the different owners must be clearly understood by the City and must be respected in the planning of the Central Waterfront" (p. 4). Further, the City's statement of planning policies continues:

The [VPA], which is a federal agency, is a major owner of the land, foreshore and water area of the Central Waterfront. The [VPA] provides vital port functions to the Vancouver Harbour, as well as the region. Such existing port functions should continue to operate effectively in the Central Waterfront. The development of urban uses on [VPA] property should be compatible with essential port functions.

The City recognizes that the [VPA], being a Crown Agency, has control over the uses of its property for port and other functions which are largely port-related and are compatible in character to the area, and is not legally bound by the City's development regulations. However, [VPA] officials have clearly indicated to the City that they would endeavour to co-operate in achieving City objectives as long as port functions and future port development objectives are not jeopardized. [p. 4]

For some years, Lafarge has been attempting to find a suitable waterfront site for a new facility. A previous proposal had also been opposed by ratepayer groups and been rejected by the VPA's Project Advisory Committee because it was incompatible with existing land uses in the area. In August 2001, Lafarge submitted for approval its present project to be built on land acquired by the VPA the previous year from the City. The site had for many years been used for shipping and industrial purposes. It is physically separated from residential and commercial uses to the south by a transportation corridor that includes roads and four sets of railway tracks. The City had initially planned to put its own asphalt plant on the site. From the City's planning perspective, the project land lies within the area of Vancouver subject to By-law No. 6718, Burrard Waterfront, enacted August 28, 1990, and zoned CD-1 which allows a concrete batch plant.

12 In 1998, the City had entered into a protocol (called a “Charter”) with the VPA which recited in part that “the Port occupies a major proportion of the waterfront lands in the City of Vancouver, and . . . the [City] provides municipal services and access, essential to the effective operation of the port, and manages development adjacent to the port”. The protocol continues “the City and the . . . Port . . . are both committed to the economic development of the region, the provision of jobs, the efficient movement of goods and people, and the maintenance and enhancement of the environment [and] acknowledge the importance of each to the other, and the necessity for a good working relationship between the two bodies” (A.R., at p. 341). They agreed to “work together . . . ensuring that development on Port lands is compatible with both the economic development of the Port and the interests of the City . . . ensuring that development in the City is compatible with the economic development of the Port and the interests of the City [and] ensuring effective public consultation” (A.R., at p. 341).

13 A policy of Port 2010 is to promote “marine-related” port uses, and the Lafarge project was determined by the VPA (and the City) to qualify as such, stating:

Lafarge’s proposed use of the property includes the barging of aggregate to site. This marine activity is a critical component of their proposed operations. With respect to the batch plant itself, this is essentially a processing operation. There are many examples of processing activities that are permitted on port lands; fish processing plants, grain handling terminals, and a rendering plant, are a few such examples. [A.R., at p. 345]

14 The Ratepayers opposed the Lafarge plant on the Sterling Shipyard site on a number of grounds, including concerns about increased air and noise pollution, truck traffic, loss of trees and visual obstruction of the residents' view over the harbour. They noted that part of the facility would exceed the City's 30-foot height restriction. By letter dated January 31, 2002, the Ratepayers demanded that the City assert jurisdiction over the "twin plant" component of the Lafarge project. Underlying the Ratepayers' position, it is fair to say, was the belief that elected City politicians would likely be more amenable to ratepayer interests than would be the appointed Board of Directors of the VPA.

15 The Lafarge proposal was referred to the City for comment and considered by its Urban Design Panel, which includes design professionals, architects, landscape architects, professional engineers and representatives of the development industry. Its role is to advise the City on significant development proposals. On November 14, 2001, despite Ratepayers' opposition, the Urban Design Panel gave its support to the Lafarge proposal by a vote of 7 to 1.

16 On March 4, 2002, the Lafarge proposal was considered by the City's Development Permit Board, which heard comments from City staff, representatives of the Vancouver Coastal Health Authority, the VPA, Lafarge, and 37 members of the public. Some ratepayers expressed opposition. In the end, the Development Permit Board supported the Lafarge proposal, subject to recommending certain modifications with respect to exterior colour, signage, retention of trees, and noise abatement. On March 13, 2002, the City wrote to the VPA indicating approval, subject to the stated modifications.

17 The VPA, in the meantime, had followed its own procedure of internal and external consultation pursuant to its Guide To Project Approvals In Port Vancouver. The VPA's "Public Review Process" included public meetings and reports from technical advisors retained by the VPA who addressed issues of air quality and noise abatement. The Burrard Environmental Review Committee (comprised of various provincial and federal environmental agencies) also filed a report. These reports were considered by the VPA along with comments and advice from the City and input from the public at a public meeting and through written submissions.

18 On May 27, 2002, the Vice-President of the Ratepayers wrote the Mayor threatening to sue him personally for damages if the City of Vancouver did not assert jurisdiction over the “twin plant” component of the Lafarge project:

Pursuant to Section 208 of the Vancouver Charter, the Mayor’s duties are to enforce the law for government of the City and “to be vigilant and active at all time in causing the law for the government of the City to be duly enforced and obeyed”. I do not believe the conduct of the Staff has assisted the Mayor in being either vigilant or active in ensuring the bylaws are enforced.

In spite of my personal, positive opinion as to your abilities as Mayor, I feel compelled to tell you that one of the results may be that, in the event that our application to Court is successful, the [Ratepayers] may seek damages or other compensation from you, personally, arising from Section 208.

It may well be that the position adopted by the Staff and your personal obligations are not the same. [A.R., at p. 874]

19 On July 8, 2002, the VPA issued its Approval in Principle of the Lafarge proposal, subject to certain additional requirements, including satisfactory resolution of the Ratepayers’ challenge over land use jurisdiction. Mr. James P. Crandles, the Director of Port Development testified that the Lafarge project was acceptable because “the marine transportation of aggregate rock, as integrated into the processing of that aggregate rock, is ‘a process related to shipping’. Further, it is consistent with joint transportation-processing-manufacturing practices in other long-term Port of Vancouver industries. Finally, it realizes Policy 2.1 of the Plan, supporting port service industries reliant on waterfront access” (A.R., at p. 412).

20 On April 5, 2002, prior to the VPA's Approval in Principle, the Ratepayers filed a petition in the Supreme Court of British Columbia objecting that the City had "declined to exercise jurisdiction over the Lands to require Lafarge to obtain a valid development permit as required by the City's by-laws before any development on the Lands is undertaken" (A.R., at p. 122) and seeking an order directing the Respondent, City of Vancouver ("City"), to enforce the provisions of its zoning and development by-law no. 3575 (the "By-law") with respect to the Lands as defined herein and any development by the Respondent, Lafarge Canada Inc. ("Lafarge") of a concrete batch plant or related facility to be constructed on the Lands, in particular, the mandatory By-law requirement that Lafarge obtain a valid development permit before any such development is undertaken; [A.R., at p. 119]

The Ratepayers also sought ancillary injunctive and declaratory relief.

II. Judicial History

A. Supreme Court of British Columbia (2002), 32 M.P.L.R. (3d) 205, 2002 BCSC 1412

21 Lowry J. accepted the VPA's formulation of the constitutional issues as follows (at para. 18):

1. Is the land that is the subject of the proposal public property of Canada as contemplated by s. 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867 such that municipal land use and planning laws have no application?
2. Does the proposed use of the land fall within exclusive federal power to legislate in respect of navigation and shipping under s. 91(10) of the Constitution Act, 1867 such that the Port Authority can be authorized to lease the land thereby rendering the City by-law inapplicable?

3. Does this court have jurisdiction to determine whether the Port Authority has been authorized to lease the land for the proposed purpose and, if so, does the Port Authority have that authority?

(We note parenthetically that the VPA's third issue seems unresponsive to the Ratepayers' application to have the City ordered to exercise its land use jurisdiction, because the third issue switched the focus to the exercise by the VPA (not the City) of its statutory jurisdiction, which in any event the chambers judge declined to deal with.)

22 As to s. 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867, the chambers judge concluded that the VPA in acquiring and leasing the lands to Lafarge was not acting as an agent of the Crown and, therefore, the lands were not "public property":

The scheme of the Canada Marine Act gives a port authority a degree of local autonomy. It is to perform port activities as an agent of the federal Crown and other activities that are deemed necessary to support the operation of the port on its own behalf. Its management of "federal real property" is performed as an agent; its management of "other property" is not. [para. 39]

23 Turning to the issue of whether the Lafarge proposal falls within the exclusive federal power to legislate in respect of navigation and shipping under s. 91(10) of the Constitution Act, 1867, Lowry J. adopted a "necessity" test, and ruled:

I consider that, even construed broadly, navigation and shipping cannot extend beyond land-based operations that are incidental in the sense of being necessary to marine transport. Aggregate that is carried by sea must, like all marine cargo, be offloaded and it may have to be stored short-term before it is delivered from the dock. However, it does not have to be mixed with other ingredients and made into concrete. That may be related to the carriage in that it is the reason for the transport, but it is not necessary for the transport to be performed.

. . . A marine facility may well be commercially desirable for the efficient operation of a batch plant, but that does not mean that a plant that makes concrete is necessary to the operation of a marine facility. [Emphasis added; paras. 51-52.]

24 Lowry J. granted the Ratepayers' application and made a declaration that the VPA was without jurisdiction to approve the Lafarge project.

B. Court of Appeal for British Columbia (Finch C.J.B.C. and Mackenzie and Thackray JJ.A.) (2004), 26 B.C.L.R. (4th) 263, 2004 BCCA 104

25 Finch C.J.B.C. disagreed with the chambers judge's conclusions on the two constitutional grounds. With respect to whether the site was "public property" for the purposes of s. 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867, Finch C.J.B.C. concluded, at para. 77:

The finding that a statutory body is not a Crown agent should not lead inevitably to the conclusion that the lands that body holds are not "public property".

In his view, the degree of control exercised by the federal government over the VPA was sufficient to constitute all VPA lands as federal "public property" for constitutional purposes, and therefore its use is immune from provincial/municipal regulation.

26 Finch C.J.B.C. also expressed the view that the development proposal for the site fell within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction granted to Parliament under s. 91(10) over navigation and shipping. Finding that the chambers judge had applied the wrong test, he stated that "[t]he test is not the necessity of a concrete batch plant to navigation and shipping, but rather whether the application of the City's Bylaw to regulate the development of port lands would affect a vital aspect of the federal power over navigation and shipping" (para. 96). He went on to explain:

I agree with the submissions of the Port Authority and Lafarge that the Port Authority requires the flexibility to adapt its land uses to the changing needs of its customers and the surrounding community. The ability to control the use of port lands adjacent to the harbour ensures that marine access is maintained and that industries compatible with port uses are served. The Port Authority's power to control its own land also ensures consistency rather than a checkerboard of regulation by different municipalities. Integrated land-use planning and control are essential to the continued strength and competitiveness of the Port of Vancouver. [para. 107]

27 Having concluded that compliance with the City by-law would impermissibly affect a vital federal shipping function, Finch C.J.B.C. declared the by-law to be inapplicable to the proposed development. The appeal was allowed, the order of the chambers judge set aside, and the Ratepayers' petition was dismissed.

28 Mackenzie and Thackray JJ.A. agreed with Finch C.J.B.C. that the lands were "public property" within the meaning of s. 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867, but did not find it necessary to address the alternative ground of federal jurisdiction over navigation and shipping.

III. Statutory Authorities

29 The statutory authorities are cited in the Appendix.

IV. Constitutional Questions

On January 26, 2005, the Chief Justice stated the following constitutional questions:

1. Is the City of Vancouver Zoning and Development Bylaw No. 3575 constitutionally inapplicable to property, with a legal description of Parcel P, Block 17, Plan LMP 47343, District Lot 184 and the Public Harbour of Burrard Inlet (the “Property”), held by the Vancouver Port Authority, on the basis that the Property is “public property” within the meaning of s. 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867?
2. Is the City of Vancouver Zoning and Development Bylaw No. 3575 constitutionally inapplicable to the proposed development on the Property in view of Parliament’s legislative authority over “navigation and shipping” under s. 91(10) of the Constitution Act, 1867?

V. Analysis

31 Harbours, as with railways and airports, present difficult land use planning problems. The framers of the Constitution Act, 1867, seeking to unify the several colonies into a single country, logically placed the lines of interprovincial communication and transportation in federal hands. Yet transportation has a dramatic impact on land use, and land use is inherently local. Transportation facilities do not exist for their own sake but to serve the needs of the economy and the local communities that depend upon an efficient network for the movement of people and goods. On the other hand, there is a mutual self-interest linking the federally regulated transportation systems and the communities they serve, as is recognized both in the VPA’s Port 2010 plan and in the City’s Central Waterfront Official Development Plan, already discussed.

32 The Attorney General of British Columbia argues that when engaged in activities that are merely “supportive” of shipping and navigation, as by promoting waterfront development that will (incidentally) generate waterborne transportation business (as in the hypothetical case of the dockside car assembly plant mentioned by the chambers judge), the VPA is operating outside federal jurisdiction and must comply with City by-laws like any other waterfront developer, such as those who put up waterfront condominium residences.

33 The respondent VPA, supported by the City, says that this approach understates the federal interest identified by the Court of Appeal including:

1. the Crown’s ultimate “ownership” or control of all VPA lands, including lands held by the VPA in its own name, and

2. the VPA’s role as exclusive regulator of shipping and navigation activities, a federal power that has traditionally been construed broadly.

34 The VPA is particularly concerned about its ability to function effectively if required to deal in development matters with the eight different municipalities that border the harbour. Lafarge, for its part, points out that it has done what the City and the VPA asked it to do, and is now in its eleventh year of seeking to bring a waterfront project to fruition and its fifth year of litigation, with no project implementation in sight.

35 Whether or not a particular activity is “integral” to the exercise of a federal head of legislative power, or is “sufficiently linked” to validate federal regulation, is essentially a factual inquiry. ITO—International Terminal Operators Ltd. v. Miida Electronics Inc., 1986 CanLII 91 \(SCC\), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 752, held that dockside unloading and storage operations are “integral” to shipping, as would be loading trucks to remove the cargo from the port. The wharves would otherwise become so congested as to cease to operate. The law favours unified regulation of integrated facilities. Insistence on bright jurisdictional lines within what the City and the VPA considered to be a continuous transportation-based project would encourage regulatory conflict and dampen entrepreneurial activity in the port area that both the City and the VPA agree would comply with good planning principles.

A. Constitutional Overview

36 There is no separate head of legislative power over “ports”. The federal government enjoys exclusive jurisdiction in relation to its public property and over shipping and navigation activities. The province exercises jurisdiction over “property and civil rights” and “municipal institutions” within the province but it has, of course, been long recognized that the power to control navigation and shipping conferred by s. 91(10) is “capable of allowing the Dominion Parliament to restrict very seriously the exercise of proprietary rights”: Montreal (City of) v. Montreal Harbour Commissioners, 1925 CanLII 325 \(UK JCPC\), [1926] 1 D.L.R. 840 (P.C.), at pp. 848-49, per Viscount Cave L.C.

37 The development of waterfront land could potentially fall under either provincial or federal jurisdiction, depending on the ownership and the use to which the land is proposed to be put. Waterfront lands do not cease to be “within the province” by reason of their potential use for federally regulated activities (Cardinal v. Attorney General of Alberta, 1973 CanLII 980 \(SCC\), [1974] S.C.R. 695), but of course federal authority will be paramount to the provincial authority in cases of overlapping jurisdiction where there is a valid federal law and a valid provincial law applicable to different aspects of the proposed use and the two laws come into operational conflict. In this respect, we agree, as did the Ontario Court of Appeal ((1978), 21 O.R. (2d) 491), with what was said by Griffiths J. (as he then was) in Hamilton Harbour Commissioners v. City of Hamilton (1976), 1978 CanLII 1511 \(ON CA\), 21 O.R. (2d) 459 (H.C.J.), at p. 484:

In my opinion, land-use control within a harbour has both provincial and federal aspects. . . . Only if conflict arises with respect to the use of a parcel of land within the limits of the harbour, will the paramountcy of the federal power cause the operation of the by-law of the City to be suspended.

38 The potential for conflict in mixed land use development along urban waterfronts is considerable. In Hamilton, bouts of litigation between the City and the Hamilton Harbour Commissioners over jurisdiction to regulate land use in the harbour area lasted almost as long as the Thirty Years War, beginning in the 1960s with the Hamilton harbour dredging scandal (whose criminal aspects were eventually dealt with in Canadian Dredge & Dock Co. v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 32 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 662). More recently, the City of Mississauga, expressing frustration because its development procedures were being disregarded in the enlargement of Toronto's Pearson Airport, threatened to withhold emergency fire services; see Greater Toronto Airports Authority v. Mississauga (City) (2000), 2000 CanLII 16948 (ON CA), 50 O.R. (3d) 641 (C.A.), leave to appeal refused, [2001] 1 S.C.R. ix. On the other hand, as the now virtually abandoned airport at Mirabel and the aborted mega-airport project at Pickering show, the federal ability to implement transportation infrastructure without provincial cooperation is seriously circumscribed. Federal-provincial-municipal cooperation in such matters is not unconstitutional. It is essential.

39 It is worth recalling in this connection the plea for cooperation expressed by Houlden J.A. when one of the pitched battles in the Hamilton Harbour Commissioners litigation was before the Ontario Court of Appeal:

We are certain that both the [Hamilton Harbour Commissioners] and the city are desirous that this important harbour and the land surrounding it are properly developed and controlled. The extensive litigation between the plaintiff and the city, which has culminated in this appeal, is, in our opinion, unnecessary and futile. It is our hope that the parties will now be able to resolve their differences by amicable agreement so that further litigation can be avoided and their common objective accomplished. [p. 491]

40 It seems to us that this approach is mirrored in the 1998 protocol (Charter) made between the City of Vancouver and the VPA, and in their respective land use plans, previously referred to. It remains to be seen of course whether what was done complies with the Constitution.

B. The Scope of Interjurisdictional Immunity

41 As discussed in Canadian Western Bank, there are circumstances in which the powers of one level of government must be protected against intrusions, even incidental ones, by the other level (para. 32). This is called interjurisdictional immunity and is an exception to the ordinary rule under which legislation whose pith and substance falls within the jurisdiction of the legislature that enacted it may, at least to a certain extent, affect matters beyond the legislature's jurisdiction without necessarily being unconstitutional (para. 26). Thus a provincial Planning Act relating to pith and substance of "Municipal Institutions in the Province" (Constitution Act, 1867, s. 92(8)) and "Property and Civil Rights in the Province" (s. 92(13)) as well as "Matters of a merely local or private Nature" (s. 92(16)) would quite permissibly have "incidental effects" on matters within its scope that would otherwise fall within federal jurisdiction over navigation and shipping, provided such "incidental effects" are not precluded from doing so by (i) the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity or (ii) the operation of federal paramountcy.

42 In this case, we are dealing with a federal undertaking, the VPA, constituted pursuant to two heads of federal legislative power, the authority in relation to public property (Constitution Act, 1867, s. 91(1A)) and the federal authority in relation to navigation and shipping (s. 91(10)).

In Bell Canada v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 749 (“Bell Canada (1988)”), the Court restricted interjurisdictional immunity to “essential and vital elements” of such undertakings (pp. 839 and 859-60). In our view, as explained in Canadian Western Bank, Beetz J. chose his words carefully, and intended to use “vital” in its ordinary grammatical sense of “[e]ssential to the existence of something; absolutely indispensable or necessary; extremely important, crucial” (Shorter Oxford English Dictionary on Historical Principles (5th ed. 2002), at p. 3548). The word “essential” has a similar meaning, e.g. “[a]bsolutely indispensable or necessary” (p. 860). The words “vital” and “essential” were not randomly chosen. The expression “vital part” was used in an earlier shipping case Reference re Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, 1955 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1955] S.C.R. 529 (the “Stevedoring” case), at p. 592. What is “vital” or “essential” is, by definition, not co-extensive with every element of an undertaking incorporated federally or subject to federal regulation. In the case of federal undertakings, that would include the VPA. Beetz J. referred to a “general rule” that there is no interjurisdictional immunity, provided “the application of [the] provincial laws does not bear upon those [federal] subjects in what makes them specifically of federal jurisdiction” (Bell Canada (1988), at p. 762 (emphasis added)).

43 The question before us, therefore, is whether it can be said that federal jurisdiction over all development on VPA lands within the port area of Vancouver, even non-Crown lands not used for shipping and navigation purposes, is “absolutely indispensable or necessary” to the discharge by the VPA of its responsibilities in relation to federal “public property” or “navigation and shipping”. We concluded in Canadian Western Bank that interjurisdictional immunity is not essential to make these federal powers effective for the purposes for which they were conferred and therefore this appeal should be decided on the basis of federal paramountcy, not interjurisdictional immunity.

In the reorganization of Canadian ports undertaken after the Great Depression of the 1930s, a distinction was drawn by Parliament between harbours of national importance (e.g. Halifax, Montreal, Vancouver) which were to be run by the National Harbours Board, a Crown agency, and those harbours of lesser significance (Toronto, Hamilton, Cobourg, Windsor, etc.) which were left with their own harbour commissions constituted by special federal statute, with Commissioners nominated in varying proportions by the federal government and the local municipality. As Finch C.J.B.C. rightly pointed out in the present case, the different types of harbour commissioners were subject to varying levels of federal control, and care must be taken in reading the earlier cases not to overgeneralize about their status (paras. 71-72).

In 1998, Parliament again substantially reorganized the structure of federal harbours with the Canada Marine Act, S.C. 1998, c. 10 (“CMA”). Introduction of the CMA followed publication of a Report by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Transport which had observed:

[T]he [Local port corporations including Vancouver] have major concerns regarding the limitations placed on their present delegations of authority for contracts, leasing, real property acquisition or disposal, and independence within the federal structure. It was pointed out that when government approval is required the process is cumbersome, complicated, and time-consuming to the point where some approvals have taken as long as two years.

Thus the Minister of Transport assured Members of Parliament:

The revised act will consolidate and simplify maritime regulations, reduce red tape, and speed up commercial decision-making. It will enable the ports to meet client needs more efficiently and to reduce the bureaucracy. Overall, it will make our maritime sector competitive.

(House of Commons Debates, vol. 135, 1st Sess., 36th Parl., October 10, 1997, at p. 766)

The general provisions of the CMA are supplemented in the case of each designated port authority by Letters Patent, which took effect in the case of the VPA on March 1, 1999 (Canada Gazette, Part I, vol. 133, February 27, 1999 (Supplement), at p. 3). The federal government appoints six of the nine directors of the VPA. Mr. James P. Crandles, the Director of Port Development, testified that the CMA aimed at making Canadian ports “more efficient, less bureaucratic, and more responsive to the needs of local communities and customers. It also made local ports more accountable, permitting them to perform acts, enter into contracts, and incur debts on their own without acting through the Federal government” (A.R., at p. 401). To achieve this objective, Parliament authorized port authorities such as the VPA to engage as Crown agents in their traditional activities related to shipping, navigation, transportation of passengers and goods, handling of goods (s. 7(1)) to the extent that such activities are specified in the letters patent issued to each such port authority (s. 28(2)(a)). At the same time, port authorities were authorized on their own behalf and not as Crown agent (s. 28(3)) to undertake “other activities that are deemed in the letters patent to be necessary to support port operations” (s. 28(2)(b)). The verb “to support” is very broad and its ordinary grammatical meaning includes to “contribut[e] to the success of [an undertaking]” (Shorter Oxford English Dictionary on Historical Principles (5th ed. 2002), at p. 3119). The VPA has adopted a very broad view of “support” including “indirect support”. Port 2010, for example, includes in Policy 3.2.2, a justification for its “non-deep-sea marine operations”:

While the majority of these activities are not directly trade related, they indirectly support the port’s trade functions through rental revenue derived by VPC which is reinvested in terminals and other infrastructure. [Emphasis added; p. 15.]

Activities that “support” port operations (directly or indirectly) are not necessarily in themselves port operations and need not necessarily be of a shipping and navigation nature, provided they generate revenue for the development of the port as an economic entity. To qualify as “support” in this sense is clearly not sufficient in our view to justify exclusive federal jurisdiction.

47 As a good deal of argument was made before us about the different categories of VPA land and the potential implications for federal-provincial jurisdiction, it is necessary to review the legislative framework. The CMA creates different categories of ownership of land which are more or less aligned with Crown agent and non-Crown agent objectives. Schedule B to the Letters Patent is aligned to Crown agent activities and lists federal real property that is “under the management of the port authority” (see s. 8(2)(d) of the CMA and art. 3.2 of the Letters Patent). In the case of Vancouver, such lands are in Crown ownership but under VPA management. The lands adjacent to the Lafarge project lands were Schedule B lands.

48 On the other hand, Schedule C to the Letters Patent describes “real property . . . other than the federal real property” that is “held or occupied by the port authority” (see s. 8(2)(e) of the CMA and art. 3.3 of the Letters Patent). Part of the rationale for Schedule C is to fulfil the Minister’s promise to free lands from such constraints as those imposed on Crown lands by the Federal Real Property and Federal Immovables Act, S.C. 1991, c. 50, s. 2. At the relevant time, the only VPA lands listed in Schedule C were the Lafarge project lands acquired by the VPA from the City and approved by supplementary Letters Patent on August 7, 2000. As such they differ from Schedule B Crown lands in the following respects (to summarize):

- (i) Schedule B lands are owned by the Crown; Schedule C lands are owned by the VPA (CMA, s. 2);
- (ii) Schedule B lands have been determined by the Minister to be necessary for port purposes; Schedule C lands have been determined by the Minister to be necessary to support port operations (CMA, s. 28(2));

- (iii) The VPA acts as agent of Canada in relation to purposes for which Schedule B lands are managed; the VPA is not an agent of Canada in relation to purposes for which Schedule C lands are held (CMA, ss. 7, 28(2) and 28(3));
- (iv) The VPA can mortgage or charge Schedule C lands but it is specifically prohibited from doing so in relation to Schedule B lands (CMA, s. 31(3));
- (v) The VPA must stipulate in its contracts relating to Schedule C lands, including contracts to borrow, that is not acting as agent for the Crown (CMA, ss. 28(2)(b) and 28(5)).

D. The Federal Land Use Management Plan and Project Approval Scheme Adopted by the VPA
(Port 2010)

49 The VPA is required by s. 48(1) of the CMA to develop a detailed land use plan, which must contain objectives and policies for the development of both the federal Crown land that it manages and other land the VPA holds or occupies. Port 2010 was originally developed in 1994 by its predecessor, the Vancouver Port Corporation (VPC), and adopted in 1999 by the VPA. Policy 3.2.1 of the Port 2010 is to “protect waterfront land and water lots in support of port service industries that are dependent upon waterfront access” (p. 14). Policy 3.2.2 provides that the VPA will support marine-related commercial and public sector harbour operations. The VPA’s A Guide To Project Approvals In Port Vancouver contains provisions analogous to a municipal development permit approval system.

50 Section 48(9) of the CMA provides that “[l]and-use plans are not regulations within the meaning of the Statutory Instruments Act”. Like a municipal official plan, Port 2010 sets out policies and objectives. Unlike a municipal official plan, Port 2010 applies only to lands owned by the VPA itself, including both Crown land and non-Crown land.

51 Port 2010 policies extend beyond shipping and navigation uses. For example, the plan shows land uses within federal jurisdiction (e.g. docks) as well as land uses under provincial jurisdiction (e.g. access roads) and identifies non-shipping waterfront uses such as the Cannery Restaurant (p. 41), proposed residential development on its Maplewood North site (p. 50) and industrial freezing facilities (p. 16). Thus, while Port 2010 sets out land uses it supports and encourages within the port, it must be read in light of the constitutional limits on federal power. Much of the VPA lands are s. 91(1A) “public lands”, and their development is exclusively within federal jurisdiction. This is not the case with development on non-Crown lands, the use of which must be brought within the scope of the navigation and shipping power if federal jurisdiction is to be justified.

52 The City plan, too, shows features of the harbour, but does not thereby invade federal jurisdiction. The harbour is a physical fact of life. Planners at both levels of government simply accept the physical reality of the Vancouver waterfront and recognize overlapping jurisdictions over different activities that can potentially take place on waterfront lands. As Port 2010 notes, “urban encroachment pressures result in competition for shoreline usage” (p. 14).

53 The existence of such a multi-use plan at either level of government authority is not an assertion that everything shown on the plan is claimed to be within its jurisdiction. Policy 3.2.3, for example, provides that the VPA will support “non-marine dependent land uses” (p. 16 (emphasis added)) in appropriate locations on VPA lands within the port. The Policy reads in part:

Several commercial activities in the port do not require direct marine access. However, given the industrial nature of most of these uses, they are compatible with port facilities. . . . When they occupy sites where eventual deep-sea terminal usage is anticipated, [VPA] leasing policies will continue to take such potential land requirements into account. [p. 16]

The Schedule C land which Lafarge proposes to lease for its project is designated “marine related” industrial and commercial uses.

E. The Schedule C Lands Are Not the “Public Property” of the Federal Crown Within the Scope of Section 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867

54 The first branch of the respondent’s interjurisdictional immunity argument relates to the exclusive federal authority in relation to “public property” within the scope of s. 91(1A).

55 While federal ownership of land does not create an enclave from which all provincial laws are excluded, provincial law cannot affect the exercise of “a vital part” of federal property rights. (See also Construction Montcalm Inc. v. Minimum Wage Commission, 1978 CanLII 18 \(SCC\), [1979] 1 S.C.R. 754, at pp. 777-79, Greater Toronto Airports Authority, at paras. 62-63, and Spooner Oils Ltd. v. Turner Valley Gas Conservation Board, 1933 CanLII 86 \(SCC\), [1933] S.C.R. 629, at pp. 643-44.)

56 The appellant submits that, “absent an agency relationship, ‘public property’ must encompass some element of ownership by Canada in order to receive constitutional immunity from provincial land use regulations” (A.F., at para. 42). We think this proposition is correct. Section 91(1A) creates an immunity based on a proprietary interest. As Professor Peter Hogg states:

The federal Parliament has the exclusive power to make laws in relation to “the public debt and property” (s. 91(1A)). This power enables it to enact laws in respect of federally-owned property. [Emphasis added.]

Interjurisdictional immunity does not, in our view, extend to all federally controlled property. In Greater Toronto Airports Authority v. Mississauga (City) (1999), 1999 CanLII 14773 \(ON SC\), 43 O.R. (3d) 9 (Gen. Div.), it was “common ground that the federal government is the owner of the land at Pearson Airport” (p. 20). Gérard V. La Forest wrote (prior to his appointment to this Court) that if the federal government has an interest in property it may legislate respecting that property in such a way as to displace ordinary provincial law. For it should be observed that the Dominion may legislate respecting its property notwithstanding anything in the [Constitution Act, 1867]. [Emphasis added.]

57 For s. 91(1A) purposes, the property can be held directly by the Crown, or indirectly by an agent, because if an agent acquires land on behalf of the principal in the agent’s own name, then the agent is a trustee of the land for the principal who holds a beneficial proprietary interest. As the redoubtable Chancellor Boyd stated in Coyne v. Broddy (1887), 13 O.R. 173 (Ch. D.), at p. 184:

So it is with an agent dealing with any property; he obtains no interest himself in the subject matter beyond his remuneration; he is dealing throughout for another

In the case of Schedule B lands, the legal and/or beneficial proprietary interest belongs to the Crown in right of Canada. On the other hand, the Schedule C land designated by the VPA for the Lafarge project is not held in the name of the Crown; nor is it held by the VPA as Crown agent.

Nor is the VPA the Crown.

58 The B.C. Court of Appeal sought to expand the scope of s. 91(1A) beyond a proprietary interest to include lands owned by an entity “controlled” by the Crown. Control is, of course, a leading indicator of Crown agency status, but it is only part of the test:

It is not possible for me to formulate a comprehensive and accurate test applicable in all cases to determine with certainty whether or not an entity is a Crown agent. The answer to that question depends in part upon the nature of the functions performed and for whose benefit the service is rendered. It depends in part upon the nature and extent of the powers entrusted to it. It depends mainly upon the nature and degree of control exercisable or retained by the Crown.

(R. v. Ontario Labour Relations Board, Ex parte Ontario Food Terminal Board (1963), 1963 CanLII 299 (ON CA), 38 D.L.R. (2d) 530 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 534, per Laidlaw J.A., adopted by this Court in Westeel-Rosco Ltd. v. Board of Governors of South Saskatchewan Hospital Centre, 1976 CanLII 185 (SCC), [1977] 2 S.C.R. 238, at p. 250.)

59 In Halifax (City of) v. Halifax Harbour Commissioners, 1934 CanLII 79 (SCC), [1935] S.C.R. 215, at p. 226, Duff C.J. stated that the Port Authority is “subject at every turn in executing those powers to the control of the [federal Crown]”. See also Nova Scotia Power Inc. v. Canada, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 53, 2004 SCC 51, and R. v. Eldorado Nuclear Ltd., 1983 CanLII 34 (SCC), [1983] 2 S.C.R. 551.

60 In the CMA however Parliament has taken the trouble to specify in explicit terms when the VPA is acting as a Crown agent and when it is not so acting. Section 28(3) of the CMA provides for example that when the VPA is acting merely “in support” of port operations it is not acting as Crown agent. This reflects the CMA policy to liberate the port authority from the full measure of constraints imposed on dealings with federal Crown land. To impute s. 91(1A) status to Schedule C lands, and thereby to subject the lands to a Crown regime which the denial of Crown agent status was designed to avoid, is to undermine achievement of Parliament's intent.

61 We decline to accept the invitation of the B.C. Court of Appeal to take one of the elements of the Crown agency test (albeit the key element of control) and elevate it for this purpose above the test of which it forms a part, i.e., the requirement of agency status. The consequences of extending the interjurisdictional immunity enjoyed by federal property proposed by the Court of Appeal would create a significant hole in relevant and appropriate provincial regulation that, with respect, is not justified. We would therefore reaffirm the need for a Crown proprietary interest to justify the application of s. 91(1A) and on this point reject the conclusion of the B.C. Court of Appeal. If the respondents are to succeed, they must do so on the basis of the navigation and shipping power, which is another branch of their argument.

F. Validity of the CMA Land Use Controls Set Out in Port 2010

62 The methodology for reconciling the exercise of federal power and provincial power is canvassed at length in Canadian Western Bank and will not be repeated here. The initial step, as always in cases involving the division of legislative powers, is to identify the “pith and substance” of the respective enactments. As mentioned earlier, the CMA in relation to non-Crown lands is supported by the federal legislative power relating to navigation and shipping under s. 91(10), which is complemented by such provisions as s. 91(9) (beacons, buoys, etc.), and s. 91(11) (quarantine and marine hospitals). The scope of the s. 91(10) power includes maritime law which establishes the framework of legal relationships arising out of navigation and shipping activities. The federal power also includes the infrastructure of navigation and shipping activities. This power enables the federal government to build or regulate the necessary facilities like ports and to control the use of shipping lanes and waterways (A. Braën, Le droit maritime au Québec (1992), at pp. 68-75). If valid and applicable to development on non-Crown lands, the CMA may have “incidental effects” in matters that would otherwise fall within provincial authority, such as the planning and development of land uses within the municipality of Vancouver.

63 On the provincial side, the power involved is the authority over municipal institutions and matters of local interest. The province of British Columbia has delegated broad powers to the City on zoning and construction within its boundaries. No one disputes the validity of this delegation of provincial powers. As a result, it is clear that both the Parliament of Canada and the legislature of British Columbia have validly exercised their legislative powers. The regulatory and decision-making power of the VPA and the City flow from them. The question before our Court is their applicability.

64 Historically, the federal navigation and shipping power has been broadly construed (Queddy River Driving Boom Co. v. Davidson (1883), 1883 CanLII 60 \(SCC\), 10 S.C.R. 222). The transportation needs of the country cannot be allowed to be hobbled by local interests. Nothing would be more futile than a ship denied the space to land or collect its cargo and condemned like the Flying Dutchman to forever travel the seas. Authority for the proposition that transportation undertakings need facilities to pick up and drop cargo, if any is required, is to be found in Attorney-General for Ontario v. Winner, 1954 CanLII 289 \(UK JCPC\), [1954] A.C. 541 (P.C.). Effective regulation of harbour facilities are as essential to shipping as airports to aeronautics. As stated by Estey J. in Johannesson v. Rural Municipality of West St. Paul, 1951 CanLII 55 \(SCC\), [1952] 1 S.C.R. 292, at p. 319:

. . . it is impossible to separate the flying in the air from the taking off and landing on the ground and it is, therefore, wholly impractical, particularly when considering the matter of jurisdiction, to treat them as independent one from the other.

Similarly, MacKinnon J.A. (later A.C.J.O.) observed in Re Orangeville Airport Ltd. and Town of Caledon (1976), 1976 CanLII 743 (ON CA), 11 O.R. (2d) 546 (C.A.), at p. 549:

. . . airports are an integral and vital part of aeronautics and aerial navigation, and cannot be severed from that subject-matter so as to fall under a different legislative jurisdiction.

See also Hamilton Harbour Commissioners, at p. 480. Nevertheless, there are limits. Federal undertakings such as the VPA are not, on that account, wholly exempt from valid provincial laws of general application that in their operation do not “bear upon those subjects in what makes them specifically of federal jurisdiction”, per Beetz J. in Bell Canada (1988), at p. 762.

(1) There Is No Explicit Federal Jurisdiction Over “Port Lands”. Such Authority Must Be Derived From the Federal Power Over Navigation and Shipping, and Is Limited Thereby

65 In Hamilton Harbour Commissioners, the Commissioners (two appointed federally, one by the City) took the view that within an area defined by federal regulation as “the port”, the City’s land use powers were inapplicable. The Ontario Court of Appeal rightly rejected the notion that “the port” could be treated as a separate head of federal power or a federal enclave that as such attracted interjurisdictional immunity. It is true that the federal navigation and shipping power can extend to regulate “integral” land-based activities but that does not withdraw all port-located industry that may be said “to support port operations” (such as the waterside car assembly plant mentioned by the chambers judge) from provincial jurisdiction just because such a plant makes use of waterborne transportation and, in a general way, contributes to the profitability of the VPA land lease business.

(2) Federal Jurisdiction Can Be Supported in Relation to Matters “Closely Integrated”
With Navigation and Shipping

66 Our jurisprudence holds that a matter otherwise subject to provincial jurisdiction may be brought within federal jurisdiction if it is “closely integrated” with shipping and navigation. In Monk Corp. v. Island Fertilizers Ltd., 1991 CanLII 95 \(SCC\), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 779, for example, it was held that claims for money owed for excess product delivered, demurrage, and the cost of renting the cranes used to unload goods (normally a contract claim within provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights) were so “integrally connected to maritime matters as to be legitimate Canadian maritime law within federal competence” (pp. 795-96 (emphasis in original)). This test of “close integration” was discussed in Whitbread v. Walley, 1990 CanLII 33 \(SCC\), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1273, at p. 1299, where the Court held that certain provisions of the Canada Shipping Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. S-9, applied as well to pleasure craft as to commercial ships. See also Zavarovalna Skupnost Triglav v. Terrasses Jewellers Inc., 1983 CanLII 138 \(SCC\), [1983] 1 S.C.R. 283, at p. 297. On that basis, it seems to us that jurisdiction over “marine-related port uses”, properly circumscribed and interpreted by reference to the shipping component, may also come within the reach of the federal power over navigation and shipping.

67 The chambers judge drew the limit for federal jurisdiction too narrowly when he stated:

Aggregate that is carried by sea must, like all marine cargo, be offloaded and it may have to be stored short-term before it is delivered from the dock. However, it does not have to be mixed with other ingredients and made into concrete. That may be related to the carriage in that it is the reason for the transport, but it is not necessary for the transport to be performed. [Emphasis added; para. 51.]

The issue is not necessity but integration. As Rand J. pointed out in the Stevedoring case:

Actual necessity need not appear as the contracting out case shows [Grand Trunk Railway Co. v. Attorney General of Canada, [1907] A.C. 65 (P.C.)]; it is the appropriateness, on a balance of interests and convenience, to the main subject matter or the legislation. [Emphasis added; pp. 548-49.]

68 In our view, the CMA land use controls can constitutionally extend to the Lafarge project, which has from the outset been conceived of by both the City and the VPA as an integrated transportation/mixing facility in which the marine transportation aspect dominates.

(3) The VPA Is a Federal Undertaking With Multiple Mandates

69 The VPA performs a key shipping and navigation role in Vancouver harbour. It is also a significant owner of non-Crown lands on which it contemplates undertaking or authorizing various types of development. It thus joins a long tradition of corporations created by federal statute with multiple mandates, powers and responsibilities. It is no more exclusively a “navigation and shipping” undertaking than is the Canadian Pacific Railway exclusively a federal railway undertaking, as was made clear (by way of illustration) in Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. Attorney-General of British Columbia, 1948 CanLII 18 \(SCC\), [1948] S.C.R. 373, aff’d 1949 CanLII 278 \(UK JCPC\), [1950] A.C. 122 (P.C.) (the “Empress Hotel” case). The Canadian Pacific Railway was clearly in part a federally regulated railway undertaking, nevertheless

[b]ecause a company is a railway company it does not follow that all its works must be railway works or that all its activities must relate to its railway undertaking. [p. 143]

Much of the Port 2010 plan relates to activities that clearly have nothing to do with shipping and navigation, let alone qualify as “absolutely indispensable and necessary” to the VPA’s ability to fulfill its shipping and navigation mandate. Port 2010 land use designations for VPA lands include

Port recreation [including] parks and plazas [and] conditional uses. [p. 29]

Conditional Uses . . . are not directly marine-oriented but . . . provide ongoing revenue to VPC and are compatible with neighbouring industrial uses. The Cannery Restaurant and Versatile cold storage plant are two such operations. [p. 41]

...

Urban and mixed port use [including] urban uses, or urban uses combined with compatible port-related facilities. [p. 29]

Port 2010 policies in relation to VPA lands include:

There are three sites that offer the opportunity for both recreational pursuits and waterfront access including Devonian Harbour Park, Portside Park and New Brighton Park. All three parks are maintained by the Vancouver Parks Board. [VPA] has ensured the long-term existence of these parks to the municipality and to the public through new lease agreements with the City of Vancouver. [p. 43]

The [Central Waterfront area] has the added capacity to support significant, urban-related development, including commercial, residential and public uses, while also accommodating transportation facilities such as the existing SeaBus terminal and the Heliport. [p. 43]

...

Port Recreation accounts for the largest proportion of waterfront use within Planning Area #2, especially at the head of Burrard Inlet in the City of Port Moody. [p. 44]

...

Maplewood North is the second [VPA] site identified for urban-related development. This 14 hectare site is located to the north of the Dollarton Highway in the District of North Vancouver. Part of the site is currently occupied by the Canadian International College while the balance of the site is being examined for potential residential use by a private developer together with the District of North Vancouver.

In Planning Area #5, two sites are designated Port Recreation in recognition of existing community parks that offer public access to the waterfront. . . . [VPA] encourages public access to the waterfront in these locations through the Port Recreation designation. [p. 55]

Port 2010 thus itself refutes the notion that it is narrowly aligned with s. 91(10). Further, the VPA's view of uses that "support" port operations is extremely broad and cannot be said to be absolutely indispensable and necessary to its shipping and navigation undertaking. It is important to underline at this point that the VPA approved the Lafarge project in part because "it realizes Policy 2.1 of the Plan, supporting port service industries reliant on waterfront access" (A.R., at p. 412 (emphasis added)). Merely "supporting port service industries reliant on waterfront access" does not, it seems to us, qualify as absolutely indispensable and necessary to the VPA's federal undertaking.

G. Conclusion With Respect to Interjurisdictional Immunity

72 The CMA is a federal law in pith and substance related to the management of public property and shipping and navigation. Its land use controls reach beyond Crown property to embrace uses that are "closely integrated" with shipping and navigation. This covers the Lafarge project. However, land use jurisdiction asserted by the VPA in this case, while valid, does not attract interjurisdictional immunity. The port is not a federal enclave. VPA lands are held and leased for a variety of activities. Authorizing the construction of a cement plant on these port lands does not fall within the core or vital functions of VPA. On the facts of this case, it rather belongs to an incidental port development business, which because of its integration in marine transportation is reached by federal jurisdiction, but which certainly lies beyond the core of s. 91(10).

73 In the absence of valid and applicable federal regulatory land use controls, there would be no regulatory vacuum on the former Sterling shipbuilding site. The provincial land-use controls would apply.

H. In this Case, the Federal Power Will Prevail Only if the Requirements of the Federal Paramountcy Doctrine Are Satisfied

74 The stronger argument presented by the intervener, the Attorney General of Canada, is that the federal land use controls and procedures authorized by s. 48 of the CMA and implemented in Port 2010 are paramount over conflicting provincial land use laws so as to render such laws inoperative. We therefore turn to this alternative argument.

(1) The Application of Federal Paramountcy to CMA Section 48 and Port 2010

75 The provincial Attorneys General argue that there is no operational conflict because Lafarge could apply for and obtain building permits from both the VPA and the City. But that argument overlooks the fact that the Lafarge project in its present form does not comply with the City's by-law. The by-law imposes a 30-foot height restriction. It would be within the City's discretion to waive the height limit up to 100 feet, but that would impose the condition precedent of an exercise of a discretion by the City to approve a project that has already been approved by the VPA. This would create an operational conflict that would flout the federal purpose, by depriving the VPA of its final decisional authority on the development of the port, in respect of matters which fall within the legislative authority of Parliament.

The principles governing the modern doctrine of federal paramountcy were summarized by Dickson J. in Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 161, at pp. 190-91, where he said:

[T]here is no true repugnancy in the case of merely duplicative provisions since it does not matter which statute is applied; the legislative purpose of Parliament will be fulfilled regardless of which statute is invoked by a remedy-seeker; application of the provincial law does not displace the legislative purpose of Parliament.

In principle, there would seem to be no good reason to speak of paramountcy and preclusion except where there is actual conflict in operation as where one enactment says “yes” and the other says “no”; “the same citizens are being told to do inconsistent things”; compliance with one is defiance of the other. [Emphasis added.]

We restated the requirements for federal paramountcy in our reasons in Canadian Western Bank. The party raising the issue must establish the existence of valid federal and provincial laws and the impossibility of their simultaneous application by reason of an operational conflict or because such application would frustrate the purpose of the enactment, as explained by our Court in Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc. v. Saskatchewan, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 188, 2005 SCC 13, at paras. 11-14. (See also Law Society of British Columbia v. Mangat, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 113, 2001 SCC 67, at paras. 68-71; Bank of Montreal v. Hall, 1990 CanLII 157 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 121.)

(a) The Existence of a Valid Federal Law

We have already explained why, in our view, the provisions in the CMA governing the dedication of land within the port area for uses related to shipping, and the CMA authorized land use plan and policies and procedures set out in Port 2010 construed in light of the scope of the federal power, are valid federal law. We agree with counsel for the respondents that as a question of fact, the whole of the Lafarge project on the VPA's Schedule C land is sufficiently "integrated" into the ship/barge unloading facility to make federal regulation applicable to all aspects of it.

(b) The Existence of a Valid and Applicable Provincial Law

79 There was also, as the Ratepayers contend, a valid provincial law. It is beyond question that City of Vancouver By-law No. 3575 is a valid expression of provincially authorized legislative power. It is a law of general application that is not aimed at navigation and shipping. It does not authorize development that would adversely affect shipping and navigation. (On the contrary, it emphasizes cooperation with the VPA on all such matters.) In the absence of conflicting federal law, the City's By-law No. 3575 would properly regulate where industrial uses such as a cement batch facility would be permitted. This point was recognized as early as 1911 when Middleton J. (as he then was) stated in Re Sturmer and Town of Beaverton (1911), 24 O.L.R. 65 (Div. Ct.), at p. 72:

The harbour may be, as a harbour, "within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada;" but is none the less, for purposes within the ambit of provincial legislation, within the jurisdiction of the Province and its Legislatures, provincial and municipal.

Middleton J.'s judgment was upheld on appeal by the Divisional Court and cited with approval in the Hamilton Harbour Commissioners case, at p. 483.

(c) Are the Two Valid Laws Capable of Simultaneous Enforcement?

80 The Court in Rothmans, Benson & Hedges divided this aspect of the test into two parts.

(i) The Existence of an Operational Conflict

81 Operational conflict is present here. Reference has already been made to the City's 30-foot height restriction. The record confirms other areas of conflict in respect of noise and pollution from the offloading activity and the subsequent loading of the aggregates.

82 If the Ratepayers had succeeded in persuading the City to seek an injunction to stop the Lafarge project from going ahead without a city permit, the judge could not have given effect both to the federal law (which would have led to a dismissal of the application) and the municipal law (which would have led to the granting of an injunction). That is an operational conflict, as held in M & D Farm Ltd. v. Manitoba Agricultural Credit Corp., 1999 CanLII 648 (SCC), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 961.

(ii) Frustration of Federal Legislative Purpose

83 Such an application of the relevant municipal standards would frustrate the federal purpose. Although the VPA should seek to cooperate with the municipalities of the Greater Vancouver area, it retains the final say in respect of all matters falling within valid federal jurisdiction, in case of conflict.

84 Assistance can be drawn from Mangat where provincial legislation prohibited non-lawyers from appearing for a fee before a tribunal, but the federal legislation authorized non-lawyers to appear as counsel for a fee. Mangat confirms that the second prong of the test should not be interpreted as a return to the doctrine of the "occupied field". Rather it intends to capture those instances where it might be possible to comply with the letter of both laws, but where such compliance would frustrate the purpose intended by Parliament. In Mangat, it was argued that both enactments could be complied with, if would-be advocates either became a member in good standing of the Law Society of British Columbia or refrained from charging a fee. However, Gonthier J. held at para. 72 that “[t]o require ‘other counsel’ to be a member in good standing of the bar of the province or to refuse the payment of a fee would go contrary to Parliament’s purpose in enacting ss. 30 and 69(1) of the Immigration Act. . . . Where there is an enabling federal law, the provincial law cannot be contrary to Parliament’s purpose.” Here, the CMA has authorized the VPA to make its decision about the project and has enabled Lafarge to proceed on the basis of that authorization.

85 The City accepted the Lafarge project as a facility with a sufficient level of integration between the transportation and non-transportation aspects to come within VPA jurisdiction. We do not think the City’s factual determination was unreasonable in the circumstances and we would not interfere with it. Given the operational conflict and its impact on the achievement of the federal purpose, the preconditions of federal paramountcy are met and the Ratepayers’ petition should be rejected on that ground.

VI. Conclusion

86 A successful harbour in the 21st century requires federal provincial cooperation. The courts should not be astute to find ways to frustrate rather than facilitate such cooperation where it exists if this can be done within the rules laid down by the Constitution.

87 Here the VPA and the City worked out a cooperative framework. The Lafarge project, although opposed by the Ratepayers, complied with the land use envisaged by both levels of government in their respective planning documents.

88 Of course, consent cannot confer jurisdiction where none exists. In this case, however, the project was found by those most closely concerned in the planning exercise to be sufficiently integrated in the marine offloading and storage operation to be dealt with through federal rather than municipal procedures. No reason has been shown for us to interfere.

89 There will be other cases where both levels of government are vitally interested in a project (such as the hypothetical automotive assembly plant raised by the chambers judge) where the shipping aspect of the project may clearly be severable from the manufacturing operation. In that case, the VPA must yield to the City's procedures in those aspects that concern the manufacturing operation.

90 Where the VPA and the City are in disagreement, of course, the courts will have to resolve the difference. But that is not this case.

91 For these reasons, we would dismiss the appeal with costs and answer the constitutional questions as follows:

1. Is the City of Vancouver Zoning and Development Bylaw No. 3575 constitutionally inapplicable to property, with a legal description of Parcel P, Block 17, Plan LMP 47343, District Lot 184 and the Public Harbour of Burrard Inlet (the "Property"), held by the Vancouver Port Authority, on the basis that the Property is "public property" within the meaning of s. 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867?

Answer: No.

2. Is the City of Vancouver Zoning and Development Bylaw No. 3575 constitutionally inapplicable to the proposed development on the Property in view of Parliament's legislative authority over "navigation and shipping" under s. 91\(10\) of the Constitution Act, 1867?

Answer: Yes.

The following are the reasons delivered by

BASTARACHE J. —

1. Introduction

92 The particular facts in this case are set out by Finch C.J.B.C. in his reasons for judgment for the British Columbia Court of Appeal ((2004), 26 B.C.L.R. (4th) 263, 2004 BCCA 104), and by Justices Binnie and LeBel in their reasons for judgment, at paras. 6-20. Justices Binnie and LeBel also summarize the decisions of the B.C. Supreme Court and the Court of Appeal, at paras. 21-28. As a result, I will deal directly with the legal issues involved in this appeal.

93 I am of the view that the appeal should be dismissed solely on a proper application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity with respect to Parliament's power over navigation and shipping, and that it is neither appropriate nor necessary to consider the doctrine of federal paramountcy.

2. The Proper Analytical and Methodological Approach

94 Before undertaking an analysis of the issues raised in this appeal, it will be useful to first provide a brief review of the applicable principles of constitutional law and the proper analytical approach to be undertaken.

2.1 Validity: The Pith and Substance Analysis

95 As this case involves a constitutional challenge to a municipal by-law, the first step in the analysis is to examine the validity of the by-law itself. If a law or by-law is held to be constitutionally invalid, it cannot be applicable to the subject matter at hand, and the law must be declared ultra vires. This inquiry involves the identification of the “pith and substance” of the impugned law in order to determine its “matter”, its “true meaning”, or its “dominant or most important characteristic” (see P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (loose-leaf ed.), vol. 1, at pp. 15-6 and 15-7, and P. J. Monahan, Constitutional Law (2nd ed. 2002), at p. 117). The pith and substance analysis involves a consideration of both the law’s purpose and its effects (Monahan, at p. 117), and in particular how the law will actually operate with respect to legal rights and obligations.

2.2 Applicability: The Interjurisdictional Immunity Doctrine

96 The second step, assuming the impugned law has been held to be constitutionally valid, is to determine whether the law is applicable to the subject matter in question. When considering a federal matter, as in the present case, the appropriate doctrine to be applied is that of interjurisdictional immunity (see Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 15-25); the central question is whether the by-law, though valid in its own right, should be read down so as to be inapplicable to the federal matter because that matter enjoys immunity from the application of provincial legislation, deriving from Parliament's exclusive legislative authority over the matter or over a corresponding head of power under s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (see Paul v. British Columbia (Forest Appeals Commission), [2003] 2 S.C.R. 585, 2003 SCC 55, at paras. 15-16). The result of a successful application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity (that is, a finding that the federal matter or undertaking is immune from the impugned provincial law) is that the provincial law in question can never be applicable to that federal matter or undertaking, regardless of whether any federal legislative or executive action has been taken (see Monahan, at p. 124). In most cases, the application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity to federal "undertakings" is concerned with "Works and Undertakings" outlined in s. 92(10) of the Constitution Act, 1867, whereby provinces have legislative authority over local works and undertakings other than those enumerated in that provision, such as ships, steam lines, railways, canals, etc., which are international or interprovincial in nature. Yet the immunity doctrine has also been applied to federal undertakings which do not fall within s. 92(10), especially when such undertakings clearly fall within a separate federal head of power mentioned in s. 91 (see Monahan, at p. 123, fn. 67). In my view, the federal undertaking at issue here is the Vancouver Port Authority ("VPA") as an entity established by and falling within Parliament's legislative authority over navigation and shipping under s. 91(10), and the subject matter in question is the VPA's regulation of land use planning and development on port lands in support of port operations.

97 Until 1966, the test for federal immunity was to determine whether the provincial law under scrutiny would significantly "impair" or "sterilize" the federally regulated activity. This changed with the Quebec Minimum Wage case, where the test adopted by the Supreme Court of Canada was whether "a vital part of the management and operation of the undertaking" was "affect[ed]" (see Commission du salaire minimum v. Bell Telephone Co. of Canada, 1966 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1966] S.C.R. 767, at p. 774 (emphasis added), cited in Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 15-27). In 1988, the Court reaffirmed that test in Bell Canada v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 749 ("Bell Canada (1988)"). Beetz J., for the Court, indicated that in order for a federal undertaking to enjoy immunity from the application of provincial laws, “it is sufficient that the provincial statute which purports to apply to the federal undertaking affects a vital or essential part of that undertaking, without necessarily going as far as impairing or paralyzing it” (pp. 859-60). Beetz J. stated that provincial laws cannot affect the “basic, minimum and unassailable content” (i.e. the “core”) at the heart of each head of federal power (p. 839).

98 It should be noted that the application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity over federal undertakings is different from its application to federally incorporated companies (see Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 15-26). In the case of federally incorporated companies, an otherwise valid provincial law cannot “impair the status or essential powers of a federally-incorporated company” (Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 15-26); because the federal incorporation power does not authorize the regulation of the activities of federal companies, there can be no immunity from provincial regulation of such activities (Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 15-26, fn. 116). In contrast, “undertakings” which operate in a federal legislative field are, by definition, subject to federal regulation, whether or not they are federally or provincially incorporated, and even where they are unincorporated. As a result, some federal undertakings will be at least partially immune from provincial laws purporting to regulate their activities (see Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 15-26, fn. 116). In the present case, the undertaking in question is the VPA itself, not Lafarge nor Lafarge’s development proposal, implicitly. As demonstrated later, the question is therefore whether the regulation of land use planning and development with respect to port lands in support of port operations, as exercised by the VPA, a federal undertaking, pursuant to the federal power over navigation and shipping under s. 91(10), is immune from the by-law.

99 It should also be noted that there has been much debate over the use and merits of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. Some authors (and some litigants in recent cases) have urged this Court to abandon the doctrine altogether, arguing that it serves no useful purpose in the constitutional law analysis of the division of powers and that other doctrines (such as pith and substance or paramountcy) already provide the necessary answers and analytical tools for most if not all constitutional law problems of this nature (see D. Gibson, “Interjurisdictional Immunity in Canadian Federalism” (1969), 47 Can. Bar Rev. 40; D. Gibson, “Constitutional Law—Freedom of Commercial Expression Under the Charter—Legislative Jurisdiction over Advertising—A Representative Ruling: Attorney General of Quebec v. Irwin Toy Limited” (1990), 69 Can. Bar Rev. 339; J. Leclair, “The Supreme Court of Canada’s Understanding of Federalism: Efficiency at the Expense of Diversity” (2003), 28 Queen’s L.J. 411; and J. Leclair, “L’étendue du pouvoir constitutionnel des provinces et de l’État central en matière d’évaluation des incidences environnementales au Canada” (1995), 21 Queen’s L.J. 37). Essentially, critiques of the doctrine generally include two types of claims — that the doctrine is too vague or complicated, or that the doctrine unnecessarily and unfairly creates a much wider scope for greater centralization at the expense of the principles of federalism and regionalism.

100 Professor Hogg, in the second edition of Constitutional Law of Canada (1985), at pp. 329-32 heavily criticized the Supreme Court’s development of the interjurisdictional immunity doctrine, which he saw as being unnecessary and creating an impediment to natural and acceptable jurisdictional overlaps. This criticism was fully addressed and essentially disarmed by Beetz J. in Bell Canada (1988). Professor Hogg, in later editions of his text, has diminished the extent of his critique, acknowledging that “some degree of interjurisdictional immunity is entailed by the Constitution of Canada’s dual lists of exclusive powers. Otherwise, what would be incompetent to a legislative body in a narrowly framed law would be permitted if the law were framed more broadly. That cannot be right” (see Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 15-28, fn. 129). Ultimately, however, Hogg states that the “vital part” test for immunity casts too wide a net and should be eliminated in favour of the more restrictive and older “sterilization” or “impairment” test. Later on, Hogg agrees with Gibson that it would be best to abandon the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity altogether in the case of federal undertakings whose functioning is not “threatened” by provincial laws (see Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 15-30). Hogg states that the impairment of federal undertakings is “the only situation where the immunity is needed” (ibid.); in all other cases, immunity is seen as too broad, too vague and needlessly complicated.

101 These critiques and criticisms of immunity are quite serious and merit some consideration, particularly those concerned with the complexity of the test for immunity and the need for consistency and predictability in its application. In my view, however, many of the criticisms aimed at abandoning the doctrine altogether may be misguided. From a logical and practical perspective, all constitutional legal challenges to legislation should follow the same pattern: considerations of validity, considerations of applicability and, where two laws are potentially in conflict, considerations of operability in terms of federal paramountcy. These steps correspond to Professor Hogg’s description of the three ways in which to “attack” a law that potentially applies to matters outside the jurisdiction of the enacting legislative body (see Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at pp. 15-25 and 15-26). There is therefore a doctrinal and a practical need to conserve the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity as an essential legal test concerned with the applicability of a provincial law which purports to apply to federal matters.

102 Other scholars and commentators have argued for the continued preservation and application of the doctrine: see e.g. R. M. Elliot, “Constitutional Law—Division of Powers—Interjurisdictional Immunity, Reading Down and Pith and Substance: Ontario Public Service Employees Union v. Attorney-General for Ontario” (1988), 67 Can. Bar Rev. 523, and J. E. Magnet, “Research Note: The Difference Between Paramountcy and Interjurisdictional Immunity”, in Constitutional Law of Canada: Cases, Notes and Materials (8th ed. 2001), vol. 1, at p. 341. In the context of aboriginal legal disputes, K. Wilkins in “Of Provinces and Section 35 Rights” (1999), 22 Dal. L.J. 185, at pp. 206-7, provides an excellent description of the doctrine and a summary of its continued relevance and usefulness:

Restrictions on the application of otherwise valid provincial measures follow necessarily from the fact that federal authority over certain matters is exclusive and remains so whether or not the federal government chooses ever to use it. Subjects within exclusive federal authority, again, are subtracted from the powers conferred on the provinces. For this reason, it makes no difference, at least for some purposes, whether a province sets out to exercise powers or deal with matters reserved exclusively to the federal order. Whatever its intention may be, it simply cannot deal with such matters, and provincial measures that do so can have, to that extent, no legal effect. Provincial activity cannot have enforceable legal consequences that a province is not entitled or empowered to intend. . . .

Seen in this context, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity gives courts a way of preserving as much as possible of a provincial measure despite the fact that the measure, if given full scope, would regulate or dispose of matters that lie beyond the reach of provincial authority. . . . Confronted with a measure that would make mandatory provision for some matters that lie outside, as well as some within, the enacting body's authority, the courts will as a general rule "read down" the measure to confine its application exclusively to permissible matters. [Footnotes omitted.]

103 The continued usefulness and worth of the interjurisdictional immunity doctrine essentially depends on the results or consequences of its application. An inquiry into the validity of a law, discussed earlier, may result in a declaration of invalidity which strikes down the law or the specific statutory provision altogether, while a declaration that a federal law is paramount over a provincial law, as discussed below, merely renders the provincial law inoperative to the extent of any conflict between the two laws. Without the availability of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity, there would be no remedy available to read down a provincial law which would be rendered "inapplicable" to a federal matter while still preserving the applicability of the provincial law to other non-federal matters. The only solution would be to find the provincial law invalid through a consideration of its pith and substance; this could result in the law or provision actually being struck down altogether. Furthermore, if there were no doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity, there would be no way to prevent the impermissible application of an otherwise valid provincial law to a federal matter in situations where there is no competing federal law.

It should be noted that some critics of interjurisdictional immunity have argued that it is unnecessary and irrelevant in light of the doctrine of federal paramountcy. Magnet convincingly notes the differences between the two doctrines discussed in the preceding paragraphs. Magnet writes that immunity “is different from the paramountcy doctrine in that even where there is no contradiction or meeting of legislation, the provincial legislation offers significant obstruction to the federal thing, person or undertaking, affects its status, or drains off essential federal attributes which make them within federal jurisdiction” (p. 339). Preserving the application of the immunity doctrine in certain contexts demonstrates the full extent and breadth of different types of constitutional legal inquiries.

In addition, those who would argue that interjurisdictional immunity is unnecessary in light of the “doctrine” of pith and substance have, in my respectful view, misinterpreted the scope and nature of that inquiry. Characterizing the “pith and substance” of a law, as described above, is not a “doctrine” or a “legal test” on the same level as or of the same nature as the doctrines of interjurisdictional immunity and federal paramountcy. Rather, a consideration of a law’s pith and substance is merely an analytical tool which helps characterize the true nature of a law in order to determine if it was validly enacted by a legislative body (i.e., by ensuring that the law was enacted pursuant to an existing head of legislative jurisdiction or authority). If the law was not enacted pursuant to an existing head of legislative power within the enacting body’s field of competence, then the law is declared invalid; if it was, then it will not be struck down. But this inquiry tells us nothing about whether or not the law, though valid, could or should apply to a particular matter or thing. Immunity helps resolve that question (see Elliot).

Finally, there are those who would argue that the concerns addressed by the doctrine of immunity are already resolved by the “double aspect” doctrine. Once again, those criticisms appear to be misguided in that the double aspect doctrine merely recognizes that some laws may have a purpose corresponding to a valid head of provincial jurisdiction, but may also have a purpose corresponding to a valid head of federal jurisdiction. With respect, I believe Binnie and LeBel JJ. mischaracterize this doctrine, at para. 4 of their reasons. The recognition of an apparent double aspect to a provincial law does not render it inapplicable or inoperative (nor invalid). Those matters must still be determined using the concepts of federal immunity and paramountcy. Likewise, a finding that a provincial law has only “incidental effects” on a federal head of power is merely a statement about the law’s validity; it says nothing about the impact of the provincial law — its effects on federal matters when it is applied to those matters. It may in fact be possible for a provincial law to be valid to the extent that its true or essential nature can be seen as having merely “incidental” effects on a federal head of power (pursuant to the pith and substance analysis), but then to be rendered inapplicable because of “impermissible” effects on the core of a federal head of power when it is applied to certain federal undertakings. Immunity would therefore play a role in preventing constitutionally impermissible applications of provincial laws to federal matters, without the need to strike down such laws and without the need for competing and conflicting federal legislation.

107 Thus, in my view, those opposed to the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity have not successfully demonstrated why it should be abandoned or why it should not continue to be considered and applied where appropriate. Professor Hogg ((loose-leaf ed.), at pp. 15-25 to 15-34) has correctly identified three types of scenarios or situations where the doctrine has been applied and, I would argue, should continue to be applied: (1) federally incorporated companies, which enjoy immunity from provincial laws of general application that affect their corporate structure or constitution, by virtue of the federal incorporation power; (2) federally regulated undertakings or federal matters falling under distinct heads of legislative power under s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (such as the VPA and the s. 91(10) navigation and shipping power in the present case), which enjoy immunity from provincial laws of general application that affect the core of such a power and/or a vital part of such an undertaking; and (3) federal institutions or matters which enjoy immunity from provincial laws that specifically target those institutions or matters. The present situation clearly falls into the second category.

Notwithstanding this defence of the doctrine, I would agree with some critics of interjurisdictional immunity who allege that its application is often difficult and who in particular allege that the criterion for determining when a provincial law “affects” the core of a federal power or vital part of a federal undertaking is often vague or overly broad. It is no doubt time to recognize that defining the word “affects” as simply or merely “touches on” leads to an overly wide scope of immunity in many contexts. While the former standard of “impairment” or “sterilization” appears to be too narrow and restrictive (with the possible exception of special cases like Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927, where the provincial law has only “indirect” effects on the federal matter, which is not the case here), an overly broad or vague notion of whether a provincial law “affects” the core of a federal power might confer federal immunity in wholly inappropriate scenarios. Some middle ground should therefore be sought out. In my view, the effect of the application of a provincial law on the core of a federal head of legislative power must be sufficiently severe to justify a finding of immunity. Without going so far as to require the federal core or matter or undertaking to be “sterilized”, I would suggest that we should interpret Bell Canada (1988)’s determination of a vital part of the federal core being “affected” to mean that the full or plenary exercise (or potential exercise) of the federal legislative authority in question would need to be “attacked”, “hindered” or “restrained” before immunity could attach. The key, to return to the language used by Beetz J. in Bell Canada (1988), at p. 856, is whether the provincial law “bear[s] upon” a federal matter or subject in what makes it “specifically of federal jurisdiction” (p. 762). As Professor Hogg suggests, the provincial law in its application to the federal matter must “intrude heavily” upon core federal areas of jurisdiction and/or upon core aspects of federal subject matters in order for immunity to be triggered (see Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 15-34). In my view, these qualifying descriptions of the word “affects” will give more teeth to the notion of immunity and respond to critics of the doctrine who have expressed concern over its overly broad and limitless application. I will not discuss the matter of indirect effects described in Irwin Toy; it raises a number of difficulties in its own right that are better left to another day.

109 Regarding the application of the immunity doctrine in cases like the present one, I would disagree with Justices Binnie and LeBel’s treatment of the operation of interjurisdictional immunity, at para. 46 of their reasons, where they focus on an “activities” based notion of jurisdiction. This indicates a focus on the specific nature of the Lafarge proposal and the activities it would carry out. This concern is repeated at para. 71, where the core of the federal power here is found not to include “uses that . . . cannot be said to be absolutely indispensable and necessary to its shipping and navigation undertaking”. With respect, this analysis is problematic because the test for immunity should not focus on any specific activity or operation at issue (i.e. the Lafarge proposal for a concrete batch facility or any other particular use of port lands) and whether this activity or use is immune from the municipal by-law, but rather on whether the federal power over navigation and shipping (expressed in this case as the federal power over land use planning and development decisions by a port authority, a federally regulated undertaking) is immune from the application of the municipal by-law. The immunity doctrine is about jurisdiction; what matters is whether or not a provincial law affects the core of a federal head of legislative power, regardless of whether or how that federal power is exercised or will be exercised, if at all, with respect to a particular project or activity. The only relevance of the activity is that discussed further on in these reasons, i.e. whether approval of the project by the VPA as a federal undertaking is consistent with the regulation of land use planning and development of port lands in support of port operations (which I believe falls within the core of s. 91(10)). But even that determination says nothing of the applicability of the municipal by-law.

110 Because of this focus on jurisdiction rather than action, there need not be any federal legislation or executive action “occupying the field” for federal immunity to be triggered with respect to an area of federal legislative authority. This is one of the key facets of the immunity doctrine; the mere fact that a provincial law or municipal by-law affects a vital part of an area of exclusive federal jurisdiction is enough to render it inapplicable with respect to a federal undertaking, regardless of whether or not Parliament has itself enacted any laws or taken any specific action with respect to the jurisdictional area or the undertaking. For example, in the Quebec Minimum Wage case, the Court concluded that a federally regulated interprovincial undertaking was immune from a provincial minimum wage law because it affected a vital aspect of the management and operation of the federal undertaking, even though at the time there was no federal minimum wage law or policy in existence. The doctrine of federal immunity was triggered even though no federal legislative or executive action had occurred with respect to that subject matter (see Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 15-27).

111 This conclusion (that a provincial law, if it is found inapplicable to a federal undertaking or matter by reason of interjurisdictional immunity, cannot “fill the gap” left by the absence of any federal legislation or action) is consistent with the principle of “exclusivity” whereby subject matters enumerated in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 are assigned to one level of government only. According to Monahan, this principle means that “constitutional jurisdiction over a particular work or undertaking is to be undivided: for the purposes of section 92(10), jurisdiction is allocated to a single level of government. The courts have consistently rejected the idea of dividing jurisdiction between the federal and the provincial governments over a single undertaking” (p. 357). The same could be said of undertakings or subject matters covered by a particular head of power under s. 91, such as navigation and shipping in this case (see Monahan, at p. 123, fn. 67).

2.3 Operability: The Federal Paramountcy Doctrine

doctrine of federal paramountcy. In order for a consideration of the doctrine to be possible, there must be two valid and applicable laws (one federal and one provincial or municipal) which overlap; the nature and extent of the overlap will then determine whether the federal law should take precedence over the provincial law. According to J. Bakan et al., the authors of Canadian Constitutional Law (3rd ed. 2003), at pp. 254-55: “The paramountcy issue only arises after the issues of validity and applicability have been determined. If a court has determined, through the process of characterization, that both the federal and provincial laws in issue are valid, and that both apply to the facts of the case, then a paramountcy issue may arise. The paramountcy issue will not arise if the court finds that one or the other of the laws is invalid or that the provincial law is inapplicable (using the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity).” (emphasis added). I agree. If the doctrine of paramountcy is considered, and if the overlap constitutes a “conflict” (that is, if the federal legislative purpose is frustrated, or if there is an impossibility of dual compliance — see Hogg ((loose-leaf ed.), at pp. 16-4 to 16-8)), then the doctrine of federal paramountcy will apply so as to render the provincial law inoperable to the extent of the conflict. The result of a finding of federal paramountcy is that the provincial law is still considered valid and applicable but is inoperable so long as there is a conflict with federal legislation (see Monahan, at p. 127). If, however, there is no conflict (either because the overlap does not constitute a conflict, or because any conflict has disappeared through legislative repeal or amendment), then the two laws may validly co-exist, even with respect to the same matter or undertaking.

113 In the present case, I would likely agree with Justices Binnie and LeBel’s conclusion that the operation of the City’s by-law here (if applicable) would frustrate Parliament’s intent; but because I believe the by-law is not applicable, as discussed below, paramountcy need not be discussed. I would add that the mere requirement of a permit under provincial law, without evidence that the permit would not in fact be granted in this case, does not necessarily indicate an express operational conflict with federal law, since compliance with one law does not necessarily mean a breach of the other (see Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 161; 114957 Canada Ltée (Spraytech, Société d’arrosage) v. Hudson (Town), [2001] 2 S.C.R. 241, 2001 SCC 40). Dual compliance could be achieved by satisfying the requirements of whichever law was “stricter” (see Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at pp. 16-9 and 16-10). If the City did in fact grant a permit in this case, then dual compliance would therefore be possible; certainly, until the City refuses a permit, dual compliance is not “impossible” here. Federal paramountcy would therefore need to be triggered by some other means, such as the frustration of legislative intent despite the absence of any express operational conflict in terms of impossibility of dual compliance.

3. Application to this Case

3.1 The Validity of the Municipal By-law and the Canada Marine Act, S.C. 1998, c. 10

114 In this case, both parties appear to admit that the municipal by-law in question is valid legislation. The respondents Lafarge Canada Inc. (“Lafarge”), the VPA and the City of Vancouver (“City”) do not challenge the validity of the by-law, but rather the application of the by-law to a particular subject matter, namely property situated in the Port of Vancouver and the proposed development project for the property.

115 In my view, the municipal by-law is indeed valid legislation. In pith and substance, the by-law is concerned with zoning regulations and requirements surrounding land use for property situated within the municipality’s boundaries. It imposes a regulatory regime with respect to development and building permits and an approval process for projects to be undertaken on city grounds. Its purpose can be characterized as the achievement of certainty and efficiency in land use planning and development for municipal land; its effects on interested parties are generally concerned with ensuring the compliance of development proposals with municipal regulations and procedural standards for city council approval. In short, the pith and substance of the by-law is in relation to the regulation of land use planning and development for property situated within the City of Vancouver. As such, the by-law is an example of delegated legislative authority deriving from the provincial legislative power over property and civil rights under s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867. It is a valid provincial law (more precisely, a valid municipal by-law) of general application, which does not target any particular federal subject matter or federal undertaking. In general terms, a valid provincial law of general application can be found to have permissible and incidental effects on federal matters, so long as these effects do not impact on the federal character or nature of the federal matter (see Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 15-33, citing Bell Canada (1988), at p. 762: “provided however that the application of these provincial laws does not bear upon those subjects in what makes them specifically of federal jurisdiction”). However, as discussed below, in this case the application of the municipal by-law to the regulation of land use planning within the Port of Vancouver for port lands in support of port operations would impermissibly affect a vital part of the federal power over navigation and shipping under s. 91(10).

116 It should also be noted that because paramountcy only arises after both the provincial law (or municipal by-law) and the federal law in question have been found to be valid and applicable to the same subject matter, as discussed above, the validity of the federal legislation in this case might also need to be addressed at this first step of the analysis. That is, when assessing the validity of the municipal by-law in question, it might also be useful to consider the validity of the applicable federal legislation which allegedly conflicts with the by-law, in order to properly consider the application of the doctrine of federal paramountcy, should the analysis proceed that far. The relevant federal legislation here is the Canada Marine Act in general, and s. 48 in particular, which requires and provides for the development of land use plans by port authorities which contain “objectives and policies for the physical development of the real property” that the port authority “manages, holds or occupies”, and which take into account “relevant social, economic and environmental matters and zoning by-laws that apply to neighbouring lands”. In my view, a consideration of the validity of s. 48 is not necessary, given that it is not challenged; I have also found that there is no need (and no possibility) to consider the application of the doctrine of paramountcy because the interjurisdictional immunity doctrine applies here. Nevertheless, if the issue were to emerge, I would agree with Justices Binnie and LeBel's conclusion on the validity of the federal law in question. In my view, s. 48 of the Canada Marine Act is, in pith and substance, legislation aimed at the regulation of land use planning and development for property related to shipping and navigation. It is legislation properly adopted under s. 91(10) of the Constitution Act, 1867, which establishes Parliament's exclusive authority to legislate with respect to navigation and shipping. This power undeniably includes and extends to harbours and ports (see the discussion below); s. 48 of the Canada Marine Act is a function of this power.

3.2 The Application of the Municipal By-law

117 Having concluded that the municipal by-law in question is valid provincial legislation of general application, the next step in the analysis is to determine whether the by-law is applicable in this case. The respondents Lafarge, the VPA and the City have proposed two possible routes by which the by-law could be held to be inapplicable by virtue of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity: the federal power over “public property” under s. 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867, and the federal power over “navigation and shipping” under s. 91(10). In my view, the first ground fails to show why the by-law should be inapplicable, while the second ground succeeds.

118 In either case, the analysis remains the same regardless of which federal power is considered. The first step is to identify the “core” of the federal head of power; that is, to determine what the federal power encompasses within its primary scope, and then to determine whether the impugned federal undertaking or matter at issue falls within that core. The second step is to determine whether the impugned provincial law (or in this case, the impugned municipal by-law) impermissibly affects a vital aspect of the federal core of either head of power, so as to render it inapplicable to the federal undertaking or matter (see Bell Canada (1988); see also Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at pp. 15-25 to 15-28, and Monahan, at pp. 123-26).

3.2.1 Federal Immunity Over Public Property Under Section 91(1A)

119 On this point, I would find that the lands in question do not constitute “public property” under s. 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867, and thus do not enjoy federal immunity from the application of the municipal by-law on that basis.

120 In the Court of Appeal, Finch C.J.B.C. found that the chambers judge, Lowry J. of the B.C. Supreme Court, had applied the wrong legal test (and thereby reached the wrong conclusion) in determining whether the port lands in question were “public property” under s. 91(1A) and thus whether they enjoyed federal immunity from the application of the by-law. Lowry J. had essentially adopted a test of “agency” for identifying public property in situations where the land is not owned directly by the Crown, and he had concluded that because here the VPA holds the subject lands in its own name and not as an agent of the federal Crown, the lands in question could not be considered public property under s. 91(1A) and therefore did not enjoy federal immunity from the by-law.

121 In assessing this analysis, Finch C.J.B.C. held that it is the degree of control exercised by the federal Crown over the lands in question which determines its status as public or non-public property under s. 91(1A), not whether there is an agency relationship with the Crown. Finch C.J.B.C. determined that Lowry J. had misinterpreted Hamilton Harbour Commissioners v. City of Hamilton (1978), 21 O.R. (2d) 491 (C.A.), as establishing the principle that only where a Crown corporation is an agent for the Crown for the purposes of holding land can the lands so held be considered public property; instead, according to Finch C.J.B.C., there may be situations where a Crown corporation that is not a Crown agent is nonetheless subject to a sufficient degree of control by the federal Crown such that the property it holds in its own name is in reality public property under s. 91(1A). For example, ongoing federal approval for and control over the acquisition, tenure and disposition of land held by a Crown corporation which is not a Crown agent will generally indicate a sufficient degree of federal control. In this case, Finch C.J.B.C. held that the degree of control exercised by the federal Crown through the Canada Marine Act over all lands belonging to or held by the VPA was sufficient to characterize the lands in question as public property under s. 91(1A); thus, by application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity, the municipal by-law is inapplicable to the lands in question.

122 I agree with Finch C.J.B.C. that Lowry J. applied the wrong legal test and that in general a provincial law cannot affect the federal power to enact laws in respect of federally owned property (see Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 28-2; see also Construction Montcalm Inc. v. Minimum Wage Commission, 1978 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1979] 1 S.C.R. 754, and Greater Toronto Airports Authority v. Mississauga (City) (2000), 2000 CanLII 16948 (ON CA), 50 O.R. (3d) 641 (C.A.), at paras. 62-77). The test for public property under s. 91(1A) cannot be one of “agency”, since this is not an appropriate or principled basis upon which to classify land as “public” or “non-public”. This is reinforced by the fact that the statutory designation of a Crown corporation as an agent for the Crown is more accurately understood as an expression of the Crown’s legal liability in relation to land held by a Crown agent, rather than as a statement about the constitutional status of land (see P. W. Hogg and P. J. Monahan, Liability of the Crown (3rd ed. 2000); see also ss. 23(1) and (2) of the Canada Marine Act). Furthermore, agency itself is merely an indicator or a factor in identifying public property; as noted by Finch C.J.B.C., there is a consistent line of jurisprudence which demonstrates that the status of land as public property under s. 91(1A) coincides with its ownership by Crown agents for the benefit of the federal Crown (see para. 74).

123 I would however disagree with Finch C.J.B.C.’s “control” test as a substitute for the agency test in identifying public property. The relevant test is not the degree of control exercised by the federal Crown (which is, in effect, merely an indicator of Crown agency). Rather, the relevant test is whether there is evidence of a sufficient proprietary interest in the lands on the part of the federal Crown. First, it is clear that Crown ownership of land generally coincides with its prima facie classification as s. 91(1A) public property; see Hogg (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 28-2. Second, a focus on the federal Crown's proprietary interests is consistent with the historical origins and development of federal jurisdiction over public property as a way to ensure that the federal Crown would possess and be the proprietor of sufficient resources to establish and maintain a transcontinental economy in the early years of Confederation (see Monahan, at pp. 111-12, and G. V. La Forest, Natural Resources and Public Property under the Canadian Constitution (1969), at p. 58, on the extension of this idea to nation-wide transportation initiatives). Third, even a partial proprietary interest of the federal Crown in land will help establish a sufficient basis for classifying the land as public property under s. 91(1A) (see Greater Toronto Airports Authority, at para. 66). Thus, when a Crown corporation owns or holds land other than as a Crown agent, there must be some element of ownership by the federal Crown in order to receive constitutional immunity from provincial land use laws and regulations. Therefore, the immunity at the heart of s. 91(1A) is based on a proprietary interest.

124 In addition to rejecting the “control” test, I cannot accept Finch C.J.B.C.’s conclusion regarding the lands in question here. On the facts of this case, I would conclude that the Crown has not established a proprietary interest in the lands sufficient to justify federal immunity on the basis of s. 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The property in question is listed in Schedule C of the VPA’s Letters Patent (Canada Gazette, Part I, vol. 133, February 27, 1999 (Supplement), at p. 3), and based on a plain reading of the legislative scheme and of the Letters Patent, it is clear that it was Parliament’s explicit and deliberate choice to exclude Schedule C lands from the definition of federal lands and lands held in the name of the Crown by Crown agents. The Letters Patent for the VPA draw a clear distinction between “federal real property” (s. 3.2) and “other than federal real property” (s. 3.3); given that the subject lands fall into the latter category, it is clear that the federal Crown has indicated its legislative and executive intent to consider the lands in question as something other than federal property. By its own decision to include the lands in question in Schedule C of the VPA's Letters Patent, and thereby to exclude them from lands owned by the Crown or held by agents for the Crown, Parliament has chosen to renounce any proprietary interest in such lands. The property is held by the VPA in its own name and not for the benefit of the Crown.

125 As a result, although the by-law seeks to regulate the land use planning and development of the lands in question, such lands are not public property under s. 91(1A); accordingly, the application of the by-law does not invade Parliament's exclusive legislative jurisdiction over public property, and there is no s. 91(1A) immunity here.

3.2.2 Federal Immunity Over Navigation and Shipping Under Section 91(10)

126 The alternative ground for federal immunity from the application of the municipal by-law is that the by-law cannot apply by virtue of Parliament's exclusive legislative jurisdiction over navigation and shipping under s. 91(10), and in particular over the VPA's regulation of land use planning and development of port lands in respect of port operations, as a federally regulated undertaking rooted in s. 91(10).

3.2.2.1 The Core of Section 91(10)

127 As previously mentioned, the first step in the analysis is to determine and identify the core of the federal power at issue (i.e. the exclusive legislative jurisdiction over navigation and shipping under s. 91(10)). As Finch C.J.B.C. noted in his reasons, at para. 97, the proper question to ask is "whether the Port Authority's powers to plan and regulate land use development within the Port form a vital part of the exclusive federal legislative jurisdiction over navigation and shipping” (see also para. 100). In other words, we must determine whether the regulation of land use planning and development, as exercised by the VPA acting as a federal undertaking, created and governed by the federal government pursuant to its navigation and shipping power, falls within the core of s. 91(10). As discussed earlier, it is important not to define the core too widely, such that the core of the federal sphere of jurisdiction would become as large as its outer boundaries. The attempt to draw bright lines in this area should also be resisted. In my view, it is best to address the issue on a case-by-case basis. Clearly then, there must be a sufficient connection to a basic understanding of navigation and shipping for immunity to attach; in other words, the VPA’s regulation of land use planning and development in respect of port lands must be for purposes relating to navigation and shipping in order to enjoy federal immunity under s. 91(10). This is what must guide the inquiry. It may be that certain uses of land do not appear to have a sufficient connection to navigation and shipping on their own but the VPA’s decision to authorize such uses in exercising its powers over port lands derived from the federal power over navigation and shipping (including port operations) cannot be considered in isolation. In my view, the core of the federal legislative power over navigation and shipping under s. 91(10) necessarily extends to and includes the power (as exercised by the VPA as a federal undertaking) to regulate land use planning and development for port lands in support of port operations (i.e. Schedule C lands, according to the preamble of the VPA’s Letters Patent; this is in fact the category of port lands on which the Lafarge facility would be built). That is the only issue that concerns us in this appeal and that governs our inquiry. We must determine whether the regulation of land use in the port is a core function of navigation and shipping. In contrast with Justices Binnie and LeBel’s reasoning, I am of the view that the regulation of land use planning for such lands in support of port operations provides the necessary link to navigation and shipping in order to trigger federal immunity; this is discussed in greater detail below. This conclusion flows from the inclusion of ports and harbours generally within the federal power over navigation and shipping and, more specifically, from the inclusion of land use planning and development activities and decisions by port authorities in respect of port lands, when such regulation is sufficiently connected to navigation and shipping.

I would note first of all that the jurisprudence clearly establishes that ports and harbours with interprovincial dimensions fall within the core of s. 91(10) as facilities or undertakings in which various aspects of the federal power over navigation and shipping would logically be exercised (see Holman v. Green (1881), 1881 CanLII 35 \(SCC\), 6 S.C.R. 707, at p. 718, per Strong J.: “the object of vesting the harbours in the Dominion was doubtless with the object of enabling that Government to carry out with more facility such measures as it might, under the power granted to it to legislate on the subject of navigation and shipping, from time to time think fit to enact”). This is similar in nature to the federal power over aeronautics and consequently over airports and aeronautical facilities. That analogy was recognized by Griffiths J. in the Hamilton Harbour Commissioners case, at pp. 479-80, which was subsequently upheld on appeal, in which the inclusion of ports and harbours within s. 91(10) was confirmed:

In City of Montreal v. Montreal Harbour Com'rs, 1925 CanLII 325 \(UK JCPC\), [1926] 1 D.L.R. 840 at p. 848, [1926] A.C. 299 at pp. 312-3, 47 Que. K.B. 163, Viscount Haldane stated: “Now there is no doubt that the power to control navigation and shipping conferred on the Dominion by s. 91 is to be widely construed.” By implication the Privy Council in the Montreal Harbour case recognized the jurisdiction of the federal Government over harbours. . . .

Even in the absence of authority I would have no hesitation in holding that jurisdiction over Hamilton harbour, operated as an international harbour connected with international trade routes, is implicit in the legislative power conferred on the Dominion in relation to “Navigation and Shipping”.

By analogy, harbours are as essential to the effective jurisdiction over maritime navigation as are airports to effective jurisdiction over aerial navigation. Legislative control over airports has been considered by the Courts to be an integral and vital part of the federal jurisdiction over aeronautics. This latter view was expressed by Estey, J., in Johannesson et al. v. Rural Municipality of West St. Paul et al., 1951 CanLII 55 \(SCC\), [1952] 1 S.C.R. 292 at p. 319, [1951] 4 D.L.R. 609 at pp. 620-1, 69 C.R.T.C. 105:

Indeed, in any practical consideration it is impossible to separate the flying in the air from the taking off and landing on the ground and it is, therefore, wholly impractical, particularly when considering the matter of jurisdiction, to treat them as independent one from the other.

This reasoning was echoed by MacKinnon, J.A., in Re Orangeville Airport Ltd. and Town of Caledon et al. (1976), 1976 CanLII 743 \(ON CA\), 11 O.R. (2d) 546 at p. 549, 66 D.L.R. (3d) 610 at p. 613:

As was pointed out by members of the Court in the Johannesson case, airports are an integral and vital part of aeronautics and aerial navigation, and cannot be severed from that subject-matter so as to fall under a different legislative jurisdiction.

As Griffiths J. noted, the absence of an explicit separate head of power for “ports and harbours” is not an obstacle to the conclusion that they fall under exclusive federal jurisdiction by reason of s. 91(10), just as airports remain under federal authority despite the absence of any separate head of power — see Greater Toronto Airports Authority and Whitbread v. Walley, 1990 CanLII 33 \(SCC\), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1273, at p. 1299; see also Finch C.J.B.C.’s reasons, at paras. 102-3. Thus, Justices Binnie and LeBel’s observation, at para. 36, that there is no separate or enumerated head of power over “ports” does not affect the interjurisdictional immunity analysis.

129 As well, the long-accepted principle that s. 91(10) is to be construed broadly and is to include an extensive range of legislative matters has led to the inclusion of a wide range of subjects within its reach and within its core. According to Professor Hogg ((loose-leaf ed.), at p. 22-20), federal jurisdiction has been held to include legislative competence over navigable waters and works of navigation (see Reference re Waters and Water-Powers, 1929 CanLII 72 \(SCC\), [1929] S.C.R. 200), harbours (see Hamilton Harbour Commissioners) and a wide range of maritime law subject matters. In addition, ports and harbours under the control of federal Crown corporations (like the VPA) are usually international ports intimately connected to routes of international commerce, trade and shipping and, as such, form part of a class of matters traditionally associated with federal rather than provincial jurisdiction.

130 If ports and harbours are part of the core of s. 91(10), then, in my view, it is clear that the regulation of land use within ports also falls within the core when such regulation concerns port lands and port operations and, thus, navigation and shipping. Clearly, if ports themselves are a vital aspect of navigation and shipping, then the use and development of surrounding port lands for port operations must be as well. More specifically, the land use planning activities and operations of port authorities as federally created and regulated undertakings charged with managing and operating ports, and ensuring their commercial viability, must also fall within the core of s. 91(10). The federal power over navigation and shipping must therefore also include and extend to federally regulated port authorities such as the VPA, whose creation, role and mandate are undeniably at the core of Parliament's legislative authority over navigation and shipping, insofar as its operations and functions are exercised in support of port operations. This legislative authority is expressed most notably in the Canada Marine Act, which provides the legislative framework for the creation and governance of port authorities such as the VPA, including its power to regulate land use planning and development of port lands.

131 Even further, in my view, the federal regulation of port lands in support of port operations also falls within the core of s. 91(10) — not just federal regulation of port lands used directly or strictly for port “activities” per se. As discussed above, the federal power over navigation and shipping is broad and comprehensive; as a result, its core must be defined in a more global and coherent fashion, such that there cannot be an easy or meaningful distinction between land use planning and development for certain port lands, but not for others simply because those other lands are used only for activities to “support” port operations. The federal regulation of land use planning and development on port lands must include all port lands, regardless of their status or degree of connection or necessity to port operations. Given the nature and scope of the federal power over the regulation of land use planning on port lands, it makes no sense to either recognize or deny federal immunity based solely on whether the parcel of port lands in question is to be used directly for “port activities” or “in support of” port operations and simply because of fears that certain uses of the latter category would appear to be in their own right somehow “less connected” to shipping and navigation. The fact remains that land use planning and development of all port lands, regardless of the specific status of individual parcels of land, lies at the core of s. 91(10). As for concerns over certain “uses” of land which might not seem closely connected to navigation and shipping, as discussed earlier, those concerns fail to recognize the nature of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity as being concerned with areas of potential legislative jurisdiction, not specific executive action or activities. If immunity extends to the regulation of land use planning on all port lands, then so long as that regulation is properly exercised according to the VPA's terms and mandate and is concerned with port lands for activities in support of port operations (at a minimum) or directly for port activities, then it should not matter what is the specific status of a particular parcel of port lands, and what its specific intended use would be.

132 The VPA, as a federal undertaking linked to navigation and shipping is thus a “vehicle” for the exercise of the power to regulate land use planning and development of port lands in support of port operations (i.e. Schedule C lands); the regulation of land use planning as exercised by the VPA for Schedule C port lands thus falls within the core of s. 91(10). As Finch C.J.B.C. noted at para. 101, “the power to plan and regulate land-use development within the Port of Vancouver is a vital part of the federal power over ‘navigation and shipping’”. The analogy to airports and related activities is again appropriate here. According to Finch C.J.B.C., at para. 103, if, in the aeronautics context, the ability to control the building, design and operational quality of airports is a vital part of the federal jurisdiction over aeronautics (citing Greater Toronto Airports Authority), then surely the “ability to plan and regulate the development and use of port lands, which is essential to ensuring the operational quality of the port” should also be considered a vital part of the federal jurisdiction over navigation and shipping.

133 The VPA's regulation of land use planning and development for port lands in support of port operations must therefore fall within the core of s. 91(10), given that such regulation is integral to the VPA's role, mandate and operation (see paras. 104-5 of Finch C.J.B.C.'s reasons). Effective and responsive land use planning is essential to the operations and responsibilities of a port, given that a “port facility” under s. 2 of the Canada Marine Act includes “all land incidental” to the use of the port. Indeed, the ability to control and regulate the use of port lands adjacent to the actual harbour is an integral part of ensuring effective marine access to the harbour itself. The significance of land use planning to port operations (and thus to navigation and shipping) is confirmed by s. 48 of the Canada Marine Act, which specifies that a port authority's land use plan should govern land use on all port property, rather than the municipal zoning by-laws which govern neighbouring lands. As previously noted, s. 48 requires the creation of land use plans by port authorities which contain "objectives and policies for the physical development of the real property" that the port authority "manages, holds or occupies", and which take into account "relevant social, economic and environmental matters and zoning by-laws that apply to neighbouring lands". According to Finch C.J.B.C., this reflects "the significance attached to the planning and regulation of land use as part of the Port Authority's activities" (para. 106). From a practical perspective, the ability to control and regulate the use of port lands "ensures that marine access is maintained and that industries compatible with port uses are served" (para. 107), thus fulfilling the objectives of the Canada Marine Act by ensuring adaptability and flexibility in the VPA's operations and continued strength and competitiveness. This is also consistent with the statement in Irwin Toy that Parliament has exclusive jurisdiction over the "essential and vital elements" of a federal undertaking, "including the management of such an undertaking", because the operation and management of an undertaking may fall within the "basic, minimum and unassailable content" of a relevant head of federal power (p. 955).

134 Thus the regulation of land use planning and development for Schedule C lands (as exercised by the VPA) falls within the protected core of s. 91(10) for a number of reasons: because of the inclusion of ports and harbours generally in that core; because of the VPA's status as a Crown corporation and a federally regulated undertaking whose creation and operation is integrally connected to shipping and navigation; and because the regulation of land use planning and development in respect of port lands (including activities in support of port operations) is a vital part of the VPA's functions and operations as a federally regulated undertaking under s. 91(10) and as a vehicle for the exercise of the federal land use planning power for port lands in support of port operations.

As a further element of this inquiry, it must be shown that the context of the Lafarge proposal is consistent with this characterization of the core of s. 91(10). That is, if federal immunity attaches to the VPA's regulation of land use planning and development on port lands in support of port operations, then it must also be determined whether the approval of the concrete batch facility project proposed by Lafarge would be included in that regulatory authority. As previously stated, the interjurisdictional immunity analysis concerns jurisdiction, not action, and is therefore concerned with Parliament's power to regulate land use planning on port lands (including lands for activities in support of port operations) as part of the core of the navigation and shipping power under s. 91(10), rather than with the actual exercise of that power in this case (i.e. the approval of the Lafarge proposal). The actual content of Lafarge's proposal is of minor importance to the immunity analysis, given that the key question is whether the regulation of land use planning falls within the core of s. 91(10) and whether the by-law affects that regulatory power. I would note simply that the context of the Lafarge proposal illustrates the application of the analysis to a particular set of facts by providing a link to navigation and shipping which is central to the legal issues involved in this appeal. The question could therefore be asked whether the VPA's approval of the Lafarge proposal is a valid exercise of the "core" power to regulate land use planning on port lands, including lands for activities in support of port operations. If it is, then the VPA's decision to approve the project is clearly consistent with the above characterization of the core of s. 91(10), given that the VPA would be acting as a vehicle for Parliament in regulating land use planning within the Port of Vancouver; the VPA's regulation of land use planning in respect of the Lafarge proposal (by approving the project) would thus be indirectly protected from the by-law. If approval of the Lafarge project is not a valid exercise of the core power to regulate land use planning in respect of port operations, then this does not mean that the City's by-law would apply; rather, it would mean that the VPA may have exceeded its jurisdiction in going beyond its statutorily mandated powers and responsibilities, which is a separate issue.

In my view, the VPA's decision to approve the Lafarge project is consistent with a valid exercise of the power to regulate land use planning for port lands in support of port operations. The proposed project would be situated on land which is part of Burrard Inlet, which falls under Schedule C of the VPA's Letters Patent (i.e. "real property other than federal real property", which the VPA acquired and holds in its own name); such lands have been deemed by the Minister to be "necessary to support port operations" (by operation of s. 28\(2\)\(b\) of the Canada Marine Act, and the preamble and article 7.3(b) of the VPA's Letters Patent). And the project is undeniably consistent with this goal of "supporting" port operations, given that the project's ultimate objective is to enhance competitiveness and commercial viability within the Port of Vancouver for its users and for the VPA, despite any aspects of the project which, taken on their own and in isolation, may appear to be only loosely connected with shipping and navigation activities or operations. The key factor is that the approval of the project as a whole was clearly intended in law and in fact to be consistent with the VPA's regulation of land use planning and development on port lands, including lands for activities in support of port operations.

137 In my view, Justices Binnie and LeBel's conclusion (at para. 71) that the regulation of land use on port lands for activities in "support" of port operations and for a "port service industr[y] reliant on waterfront access" does not fall within the core of s. 91(10) because it is not "absolutely indispensable and necessary" to the VPA's federal undertaking is really a reflection of their concern that certain possible uses of land (plazas, parks, restaurants, condominiums, etc.) should not receive federal immunity because they would be unconnected to navigation and shipping. With respect, as previously discussed, I do not understand how the regulation of land use planning for port lands "in support of port operations" does not fall within the core of the navigation and shipping power; nor can I understand how certain land uses which support "port service industries reliant on waterfront access" could also be excluded from the core, even if those uses in and of themselves do not appear to be "navigation and shipping" activities. By definition, such uses of land, even if they do not appear at first blush to be part of the core of navigation and shipping, are destined to support the operations of a port, which falls within the core of s. 91(10), and would occur on port lands, the development and planning of which also falls within the core of s. 91(10). The concern over apparently non-marine related uses of port lands (such as plazas, condominiums, parks, industrial facilities, etc.) seems rooted in the fear that uses of port lands which merely act as additional sources of income are not sufficiently “marine related” to count as “navigation and shipping”. It could be argued that uses of land which merely generate revenue for the VPA, although potentially falling generally under federal jurisdiction pursuant to s. 91(10), should not receive federal immunity, much in the same way that the sale of liquor on Air Canada flights could not benefit from any federal immunity because it merely maintains an airline’s “competitive edge”. In my view, the two situations are wholly dissimilar. The analogy overlooks the global and integrated nature of land use planning and development under the federal navigation and shipping power. In Air Canada v. Ontario (Liquor Control Board), 1997 CanLII 361 \(SCC\), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 581, a purely economic and unique activity (the sale of liquor) was found to fall outside the core of the federal aeronautics power because there was no connection whatsoever to airports, airlines or aeronautics. In the present case, however, even if some “purely” economic or commercial uses of Schedule C lands could result from the VPA’s regulation of land use planning and development on port lands, such uses are still designed to support port operations and are still occurring on port lands; these factors establish a strong connection to core matters within the federal navigation and shipping power. Furthermore, it is unfeasible to segregate control over land use planning to each use contemplated. The broad nature of the federal navigation and shipping power justifies a more global and cohesive approach in this case, which would allow immunity even for purely economic or commercial activities so long as such activities are still consistent with the regulation of port lands for port operations or in support of port operations. Immunity still protects activities which appear to be at the outer limits of the core of a federal power, even those apparently aimed at generating revenue or increasing the competitive edge of a federal undertaking, but only if such activities can be tied to a core function of the federal power (in this case, the regulation of land use planning and development on port lands, including lands for activities in support of port operations).

extent that they might not reflect a proper exercise of the core federal power over the regulation of land use for port lands, including for activities in support of port operations. If certain uses should not receive federal immunity, that is because they lack a sufficient connection to navigation and shipping and are likely inconsistent with the federal power to regulate land use in support of port operations, and would therefore constitute an excess of federal jurisdiction. That would not change the fact that the provincial law in question here (the municipal by-law) affects a vital part of the federal navigation and shipping power because it hinders (by its application to the Port of Vancouver) the regulation of land use planning on port lands in support of operations, a protected “core” matter within s. 91(10) which is intended to be performed exclusively by a federal authority — i.e. the VPA.

3.2.2.2 The By-law’s Effect on the Core of Section 91(10)

139 The second step in the interjurisdictional immunity test with respect to navigation and shipping is to determine whether the application of the municipal by-law in this case would “affect” a vital part of the federal legislative authority over navigation and shipping under s. 91(10) — that is, whether it would affect the core of that head of power as defined above. More specifically, the question is whether the application of the by-law would impermissibly affect the power (as exercised by the VPA as a federal undertaking) to regulate land use planning of port lands, including for activities in support of port operations, as a “vital part” of the federal navigation and shipping power under s. 91(10). As noted earlier, the meaning of the word “affects” should be interpreted as a kind of middle ground between the perhaps overly vague or broad standard of “touches on” and the older and overly restrictive standard of “sterilizes” or “impairs”. Without requiring complete paralysis of the core of the federal power or the operations of the undertaking, the impact of the application of the by-law must be sufficiently severe and serious to trigger immunity.

In my view, this question must be answered in the affirmative here. The by-law clearly and significantly affects the VPA's regulation of land use planning and development for port lands in support of port operations by imposing a zoning regime and an approval process for development proposals and projects on such lands. This regulation of land use planning and development within the port for purposes related to navigation and shipping is at the core of the federal power over navigation and shipping under s. 91(10). If the by-law were applied to the Port of Vancouver, the VPA's ability to regulate the land use planning and development of the port would be severely affected (see para. 108 of Finch C.J.B.C.'s reasons on this point). From a practical perspective, it would create a jurisdictional nightmare, given that the port itself lies at the intersection of eight separate municipalities, all of whom could conceivably enforce a land use planning by-law regime which would apply to port lands. It is therefore clear that the application of any of these by-laws would seriously affect or hinder a vital part of the federal navigation and shipping power under s. 91(10) by affecting the ability of the VPA as a federal undertaking to regulate land use planning of port lands in support of port operations. The ideal of federal-provincial-municipal cooperation discussed by Justices Binnie and LeBel at para. 38 must be concerned with actual facts.

It should also be noted that even if this were an "impairment" situation where the provincial law in question applied only "indirectly" to the federal matter (see Irwin Toy), immunity would still attach. If the by-law were only indirectly applicable to the VPA's regulation of land use planning and development within the port, it would still be impossible to exercise the s. 91(10) federal power over navigation and shipping (and more specifically over the regulation of land use planning and development on port lands by a federally regulated port authority) in any rational way. The federal power would consistently be subject to interference, and thus impairment, by municipal legislation and action in the form of delays, lengthy approval processes, inconsistent municipal zoning norms and the possibility of a "patchwork" of separate rules over the same relatively small land mass. Thus, even under the Irwin Toy version of the doctrine, interjurisdictional immunity should attach to the VPA's regulation of land use in the port for port lands in support of port operations.

3.3 The Operation of the Municipal By-law

142 Having concluded that the by-law in question is constitutionally inapplicable in this case, by reason of interjurisdictional immunity, it is neither necessary nor possible to consider whether the by-law is also constitutionally inoperable by reason of the doctrine of federal paramountcy to the extent of any conflict with s. 48 of the Canada Marine Act and with the Port Land Use Management Plan adopted by the VPA pursuant to that legislative provision. As previously stated, consideration of the doctrine of federal paramountcy is only triggered when there are two valid and applicable laws which overlap and appear to conflict. That is not the case here, given that the municipal by-law is inapplicable.

4. Conclusion

143 Accordingly, I would dismiss the Attorney General of British Columbia's appeal and would answer the constitutional questions as follows:

1. Is the City of Vancouver Zoning and Development Bylaw No. 3575 constitutionally inapplicable to property, with a legal description of Parcel P, Block 17, Plan LMP 47343, District Lot 184 and the Public Harbour of Burrard Inlet (the "Property"), held by the Vancouver Port Authority, on the basis that the Property is "public property" within the meaning of s. 91(1A) of the Constitution Act, 1867?

Answer: No.

2. Is the City of Vancouver Zoning and Development Bylaw No. 3575 constitutionally inapplicable to the proposed development on the Property in view of Parliament’s legislative authority over “navigation and shipping” under s. 91\(10\) of the Constitution Act, 1867?

Answer: Yes.

The by-law cannot apply to the VPA’s regulation of land use planning for port lands in support of port operations, including in this case the approval of the Lafarge proposal. In the result, then, I would uphold the ultimate decision of the Court of Appeal which overturned the chambers judge’s decision and dismissed the neighbourhood association’s petition against the development project.

APPENDIX

Canada Marine Act, S.C. 1998, c. 10

2. (1) . . .

“federal real property” has the same meaning as in section 2 of the Federal Real Property and Federal Immovables Act;

5. . . .

“port” means the navigable waters under the jurisdiction of a port authority and the real property and immovables that the port authority manages, holds or occupies as set out in the letters patent.

7. (1) Subject to subsection (3), a port authority is an agent of Her Majesty in right of Canada only for the purposes of engaging in the port activities referred to in paragraph 28(2)(a).

28. . . .

(2) The power of a port authority to operate a port is limited to the power to engage in

(a) port activities related to shipping, navigation, transportation of passengers and goods, handling of goods and storage of goods, to the extent that those activities are specified in the letters patent; and

(b) other activities that are deemed in the letters patent to be necessary to support port operations.

(3) The activities that a port authority may engage in under paragraph 2(b) may be carried on by the port authority directly or through a wholly-owned subsidiary of the port authority. The port authority and the subsidiary are not agents of Her Majesty in right of Canada for the purpose of engaging in those activities.

(5) A port authority or wholly-owned subsidiary of a port authority that enters into a contract other than as agent of Her Majesty in right of Canada shall do so in its own name. It shall expressly state in the contract that it is entering into the contract on its own behalf and not as agent of Her Majesty in right of Canada. For greater certainty, the contracts to which this subsection applies include a contract for the borrowing of money.

46. (1) Subject to subsection 45(3), a port authority may not dispose of any federal real property or federal immovable that it manages

(2) A port authority may dispose of any real property or immovable that it occupies or holds, other than federal real property or federal immovables, subject to the issuance of supplementary letters patent, and, without the issuance of supplementary letters patent, it may grant road allowances or easements, rights of way or licences for utilities, services or access.

Letters Patent issued to the Vancouver Port Authority (1999)

7.1 Activities of the Authority Related to Certain Port Operations. To operate the port, the Authority may undertake the port activities referred to in paragraph 28(2)(a) of the Act to the extent specified below:

...

7.3 Activities of the Authority Necessary to Support Port Operations. To operate the port, the Authority may undertake the following activities which are deemed necessary to support port operations pursuant to paragraph 28(2)(b) of the Act:

...

- (b) acquisition or disposition of real property other than federal real property subject to the issuance of supplementary letters patent;

...

- (d) occupying or holding real property other than federal real property;

...

- (g) developing, leasing or licensing real property other than federal real property, for, or in connection with the activities described in this Article 7;
- (h) carrying on activities described in section 7.3 on federal real property described in Schedule B or described as federal real property in any supplementary letters patent or on real property other than federal real property described in Schedule C or described as real property other than federal real property in any supplementary letters patent;

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Supreme Court of Canada
Landreville v. Town of Boucherville, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 801
Date: 1978-02-07

Lucien Landreville (Expropriated party) Appellant;

and

Town of Boucherville (Expropriating party) Respondent.

1977: June 9; 1978: February 7.

Present: Martland, Ritchie, Pigeon, Beetz and de Grandpré JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR QUEBEC

Expropriation—Contestation of the right to expropriate—Bad faith of the expropriating party—Burden of proof—Code of Civil Procedure, art. 777.

Municipal law—Validity of a by-law disputed by incidental arguments—Statutory right of a municipality to expropriate—Cities and Towns Act, R.S.Q. 1964, c. 193, ss. 411, 605.

Appellant is contesting the right to expropriate of respondent (the “Town”), which passed a by-law ordering the expropriation of his land for purposes of a municipal park and offering him an indemnity of one dollar. The land is a shale quarry covering forty arpents located approximately three miles from the centre of the Town of Boucherville. On December 7, 1965, the Town issued a permit for appellant to work this quarry but made it subject to a number of conditions, inter alia that the Town could take 10,000 tons of stone free of charge and that appellant would transfer the part of his lot that was used as a quarry to the Town for $1. The Town did in fact take the specified quantity of stone free of charge, but appellant refused to transfer his quarry. On March 1, 1966 the municipal council passed a resolution requiring appellant to sign the contract transferring the quarry to the Town. At the same time counsel for the Town were authorized to take the necessary measures to stop the quarrying of stone until appellant had signed the contract. On April 19, 1966 the municipal council adopted a by-law ordering that part of lot 167, namely appellant's land, be homologated for purposes of a park. On August 9, 1966 the municipal council passed a resolution ordering "that appropriate legal proceedings be taken regarding the operation of a quarry [belonging to appellant] ... and that if existing by-laws are insufficient for this purpose, a recommendation be made to this Council without delay". Finally, on December 6, 1966 the contested expropriation by-law was passed. The Superior Court judge concluded that the Town had expropriated appellant not for the reason put forward but solely to prevent him from operating his quarry, and had thus acted in bad faith and abused its power: he found in favour of appellant and quashed the by-law. The Court of Appeal reversed the judgment on the ground that the expropriated party, on whom the burden of proof rested, had failed to establish fraud and flagrant injustice. Hence the appeal to this Court.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

The trial judge made no error of law and drew no incorrect conclusions from the facts when he decided that the resolutions passed by the Town, and the content of these resolutions, showed clearly that the Town's bad faith was such as to be the equivalent of a fraud upon the party concerned. It may be added that while the resolutions and by-laws passed by the municipal council clearly condemn the Town, this condemnation is confirmed by the other circumstances. There is no legislation permitting the Town to make the issuing of a permit to operate the quarry conditional upon appellant's transferring his land to the Town. Since the wrongful and unjust conduct of the Town with regard to appellant prior to the adoption of the expropriation by-law had been proved, it was up to the Town to prove a subsequent change, which it did not do. On the contrary, in its efforts to acquire appellant's property for $1, the Town continued to act in bad faith since its valuation was clearly unfair and disregarded a recognized legal principle that the indemnity must be calculated on the basis of the value to the owner, not the value to the expropriating party. Appellant did not have to demonstrate that the Town did not intend to use the quarry as a park. Once the initial bad faith was proved, it vitiated and nullified the Town's actions regardless of the intentions that the Town may eventually have formed in order to attain its objectives. We are dealing with a cause of nullity that transcends the others and vitiates whatever it produces.

The argument that a municipal by-law can be nullified only by a petition to quash, as provided by s. 411 of the Cities and Towns Act, cannot be allowed. Section 411 creates an additional but not an exclusive remedy. It is also possible to dispute the validity of a municipal by-law on defence or by incidental arguments, such as the contestation of the right to expropriate in the case at bar. Finally, the Town's statutory right to expropriate under s. 605 of the Cities and Towns Act is not an absolute right. It may be contested, as in the case at bar, if the expropriating party commits abuses that vitiate the substance of its decisions.

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal of Quebec reversing a judgment of the Superior Court. Appeal allowed.

Viateur Bergeron, Q.C., and Richard Gaudreau, for the appellant.

Yvon Denault, for the respondent.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

BEETZ J.—The issue is whether respondent committed an abuse of power in expropriating appellant's land. The case also raises both procedural and jurisdictional questions.

By-law No. 533 ordering expropriation of this land for purposes of a municipal park was adopted on December 6, 1966 by resolution No. 66-906 of the municipal council of the Town of Boucherville. The notice of expropriation estimated the value of the expropriated immovable (part of lot 167) at one dollar; this was the amount of the indemnity offered to the expropriated party by the expropriating party.

Lucien Landreville contested “the right to expropriate” under art. 777 C.C.P., pleading inter alia that:

[TRANSLATION] Under the pretext of exercising a statutory right specifically granted to cities and towns under ss. 605 et seq. of the Cities and Towns Act, namely the right to expropriate for municipal purposes, the expropriating municipality in its notice of expropriation falsely and unlawfully alleged its desire to acquire the property of the expropriated party for purposes of a municipal park, when in fact it wished to acquire the said property not for municipal purposes but solely with the objective of putting an end to the operation of a quarry located on it, more specifically, a shale borrow pit...

Lucien Landreville also pleaded that the Town:

[TRANSLATION] falsely and in bad faith alleged the necessity of developing the said lot P-167 for purposes of a municipal park ...

He further pleaded that:

[TRANSLATION] the expropriating municipality attempted unlawfully and in bad faith to camouflage its true intention, which is to put an end to the operation being carried out on lot P-167...

The Superior Court (Nolan J.) held that the expropriation was motivated by a reason other than the reason put forward: the sole aim of the Town was to prevent Lucien Landreville from operating his quarry. The Town had therefore acted in bad faith, treated Landreville unfairly and abused its power. Consequently, the trial judge found in favour of appellant, dismissed the notice of expropriation and quashed the resolution and the by-law ordering the expropriation.

The Court of Appeal (Tremblay C.J.A. and Casey and Turgeon JJ.A.) reversed the judgment of the Superior Court and dismissed Lucien Landreville's contestation. Turgeon J.A., with whom Tremblay C.J.A. concurred, held that:

[TRANSLATION] the expropriated respondent, on whom the burden of proof rested, failed to establish the fraud and flagrant injustice alleged in his defence. The evidence of the engineer Gilles Chabot and the town planner Victor Lambert convinced me of this.

The Chief Justice and Turgeon J.A. took for granted, without deciding the point, that in its contestation the expropriated party could argue the nullity of the by-law ordering the expropriation. Casey J.A. paid more attention to this latter question, which does not appear to have been raised in Superior Court, but he agreed with the opinion of his colleagues on the main issue:

The motivation of the Councillors or the suspicion that they do not intend to proceed with the work requires proof far stronger than that contained in this record.

The appeal, filed under the old s. 36 of the Supreme Court Act, asks this Court to set aside the decision of the Court of Appeal and restore the judgment of the Superior Court. (Affidavits attesting that the value of the matter in controversy exceeds ten thousand dollars were filed by appellant. The jurisdiction of this Court was not questioned.)

The evidence consisted mainly of resolutions and by-laws adopted by the Town. The remainder of the evidence included the testimony of Lucien Landreville, Victor Lambert, town planner and witness for Lucien Landreville, Gilles Chabot, engineer and witness for the Town, and Eugène McClish, Town clerk.

The facts are not disputed but the Court of Appeal and the Superior Court did not draw the same conclusions from them.

The land that the Town wished to expropriate is a shale quarry covering forty arpents (1,472,027 sq. ft.) located in an open field approximately three miles from the centre of the Town of Boucherville in the Parish of Sainte-Famille de Boucherville, which was annexed by the Town in 1963. At the time the expropriation was ordered the quarry was approximately twenty-five feet deep and covered forty per cent of the farm belonging to Lucien Landreville. Exploitation began in December 1965 when the owner transferred to contractors the right of quarrying the shale, at first for a one-year period and later for a ten-year period.

Believing he needed a permit, Lucien Landreville sent a written request to the municipal authorities on December 7, 1965, after he had transferred quarrying rights to the first contractor. At first, the Mayor, whom he went to see, told him that the matter was "as good as money in the bank". Later, however, at the Town Hall, the Town's engineer, Gilles Chabot, and the Mayor told him that the Town could not agree to issue him a permit unless he transferred the land to the Town once the quarrying was over. In the application for a permit, dated December 7, 1965, which was dictated to him, Lucien Landreville wrote "that in consideration of this application" he "would undertake" to transfer this part of his lot to the Town "for the sum of $1 plus other consideration and an access to the said land". (The offer was withdrawn on April 11, 1968.)

Pursuant to this application, a resolution of the municipal council dated December 16, 1965 authorized Lucien Landreville to lease part of his lot to Mégantic Construction Inc. for quarrying of the stone, but with a number of conditions, including the following: the excavation was limited to a depth of twenty feet; all excavation or quarrying of stone was to end on May 1, 1967; the earth removed was to be deposited at a place to be specified by the Town and to remain its property; the Town could take 10,000 tons of stone free of charge; Lucien Landreville was to transfer to the Town for $1, by means of a notarized contract, the part of his lot that was used as a quarry; a notary was chosen to prepare the contract, which the Mayor and the Secretary-Treasurer were empowered to sign.

The 10,000 tons of stone, valued at $0.85 a ton, were in fact used for municipal purposes free of charge, but Lucien Landreville did not agree to transfer his quarry to the Town.

On March 1, 1966 the municipal council passed a resolution refusing to grant Paul-Emile Lamontagne and Lucien Landreville permission to use lot 167 as a dump. The same resolution required Lucien Landreville to sign the contract transferring the quarry to the Town. Counsel for the Town were authorized to take the necessary measures to stop the quarrying of stone until Lucien Landreville had signed the contract. If he refused, they were to see that the quarrying was halted indefinitely and sue him for damages.

On March 15, 1966 a proposal was made to the municipal council that a land surveyor [TRANSLATION] “be authorized to prepare plans for the piece of land to be homologated on lot 167 belonging to Mr. Lucien Landreville”. (The copy in the record does not mention, however, whether this proposal was adopted.)

On April 19, 1966 the municipal council adopted a by-law ordering that part of lot 167 be homologated for purposes of a park. (The record does not show whether the homologation was actually carried out.)

On August 9, 1966 the municipal council resolved [TRANSLATION] “that appropriate legal proceedings be taken regarding the operation of a quarry known as a borrow pit within our boundaries, namely on lot No. 167 of the official cadastre of the Parish of Ste-Famille, and that if existing by-laws are insufficient for this purpose, a recommendation be made to this Council without delay”.

On December 6, 1966 the council adopted the [TRANSLATION] “by-law to provide for the acquisition by mutual consent or by expropriation of part of lot No. 167 of the official cadastre of the Parish of Ste-Famille de Boucherville, registration division of Chambly, for the sum of $1 for purposes of a municipal Park”. Counsel for the Town were authorized to take the necessary measures to acquire the land by mutual consent or expropriation with prior taking of possession.

On January 17, 1967, the municipal council adopted construction and zoning by-laws Nos. 545 and 546, covering the entire area of the Town of Boucherville. According to these by-laws and the accompanying plan (D-5), Lucien Landreville’s quarry is in a residential development zone. In the middle of this zone quite a large area is zoned as a park (P-48). This is a proposed regional park outlined on the plan by curved or elliptical lines, with the exception of a single rectangular projection. This rectangle represents Lucien Landreville’s quarry, which the municipality said it wanted to add to the proposed park.

The notice of expropriation is dated February 21, 1967.

The following are the trial judge’s reasons for his conclusions:

If this expropriation were being contested solely on the grounds that the City was wrong or unwise in deciding to add Petitioner’s property to the park zone P-48 because of the alleged incongruity of adding to the said park zone 40 arpents of land used as a quarry, the whole superficies of which consists of a hole some 25 feet deep, the undersigned would have no hesitation in dismissing the Contestation as it is not the function of the Court to substitute its views for those of the municipal council.

For the same reason, the Court is of the opinion that the fact that the park P-48 may not be built for fifteen years or more (as was proven) should not be considered per se as a valid ground for invalidating the City's by-law decreeing the expropriation. Nor is it its function to pass judgment on the valuation of $1.00 placed on the Contestant's land in the certificate accompanying the Notice of Expropriation even though the municipal valuation for tax purposes was proven to be $100.00 per arpent.

The Court's decision has been reached on the evidence as a whole. Considered by themselves the complaints of Petitioner on the three points mentioned above are irrelevant. But considered together with the other actions of Petitioner they help to confirm Contestant's contention that Petitioner acted unjustly towards him in this matter.

The undersigned is satisfied from the proof which was adduced in this case that Petitioner had an ulterior motive in decreeing the expropriation of Contestant's land and that this motive was its determination to stop Contestant from exploiting his quarry.

The resolutions which were passed, and the contents of these resolutions, show clearly that Petitioner was determined to prevent Contestant from operating a quarry on his land unless he first deeded the land over to the City; and that when all other threats and maneuvers failed it was decided to foil Contestant by expropriating his land. In fact, Petitioner was so anxious to teach Contestant a lesson that the by-law decreeing the expropriation of Contestant's land was passed more than a month before Petitioner's land was added to the park zone P-48 by the Plan D-5.

In the opinion of the undersigned, Petitioner's bad faith is further evidenced by the fact that when this case was heard in March 1970, more than three years after Petitioner passed the by-law decreeing the expropriation of Contestant's land, Petitioner had taken no steps to expropriate any of the other lots forming part of the park zone P-48 except for one single lot on which a road was built as part of the network of roads in the Petitioner municipality and which the undersigned seriously doubts was in any way, other than accidentally, related to park zone P-48.

The principle has been clearly laid down in many cases dealing with decisions reached by municipal corporations that the Courts must not interfere unless fraud is established or a violation of the law or an abuse of power, in either case so violent as to be the equivalent of a fraud upon the public or the parties concerned.

Corporation de la Ville de Dorval v. Sanguinet Automobile Ltée, [1960] Que. K.B. 706, Roy v. Corporation

d'Aubert-Gallion, [1929] 46 Que. K.B. 15—Rivard, J. at pp. 29-30, Sula vs Cité de Duvernay, [1970] Que. K.B. 234.

The undersigned believes this to be a case which falls within the principles laid down in the above cases.

The undersigned therefore has no hesitation in finding that in passing By-law No. 533 on December 6, 1966 decreeing the expropriation of Contestant's property, Petitioner committed an abuse of power, a flagrant injustice equivalent to bad faith towards Contestant.

I find no error of law in the reasons of the trial judge and I cannot say that the conclusions he draws from the facts are manifestly incorrect.

I would, however, add the following reasons to those of the trial judge.

The burden of proof is a heavy one when it involves establishing the commission of an “abuse of power equivalent to fraud” and “resulting in a flagrant injustice”: City of Sillery v. Sun Oil Co. and Royal Trust Co.^[1], at p. 557.

In the case at bar, however, the municipal council is clearly condemned by its own resolutions and by-laws, and this condemnation is confirmed by the other circumstances.

In the resolution of December 16, 1965, far from opposing the operation of a quarry on Lucien Landreville’s farm because of existing or expected zoning or a proposed park, the municipal council indicated that it was prepared to allow this operation on the conditions mentioned above: that the earth removed, 10,000 tons of stone and above all the land itself be given to the Town. From the very beginning, therefore, the Town was trying to appropriate the quarry without paying for it.

There is explicit legislation enabling municipalities to require, as a condition precedent to the approval of a subdivision plan, that the owner convey to them free of charge a specified percentage of his land, to be used for parks or playgrounds; or to appropriate without indemnity in specific cases land to be used for streets or lanes or the land necessary for the first public road on a lot. For example, s. 429 of the Cities and Towns Act,

R.S.Q. 1964, c. 193, as amended by L.Q. 1975, c. 66, s. 15—a provision subsequent to the facts at issue—states that the municipal council may make by-laws:

(8) To require, as a condition precedent to the approval of a subdivision plan, whether it provides for streets or not, that the owner convey to the municipal corporation, for park or playground purposes, an area of land not exceeding ten per cent of the land comprised in the plan and situated at a place which, in the opinion of the council, is suitable for the establishment of parks or playgrounds; or to exact from the owner, instead of such area of land, the payment of a sum not exceeding ten per cent of the real value of the land comprised in the plan, notwithstanding the application of section 21 of the Real Estate Assessment Act (1971, chapter 50) ...

See also art. 392f(g) of the Municipal Code, ss. 610a, 610b, 610c and 1054 of the Charter of the City of Montreal, S.Q. 1959-60, c. 102, S.Q. 1960-61, c. 97, s. 30, S.Q. 1963, c. 70, s. 21, L.Q. 1969, c. 91, s. 6; s. 336(204) of the Charter of the City of Quebec, L.Q. 1976, c. 54, s. 15. Municipalities may not, however, extend this legislation by using permit-granting powers that they have or think they have to extort from an owner advantages such as those that the Town attempted to obtain from Lucien Landreville on December 16, 1965: such action by a municipality demonstrates bad faith and constitutes an abuse of power.

The Town repeated its conduct five and a half months later with its resolution of March 1, 1966. I am not thinking of its refusal to authorize use of lot 167 as a dump but of the notice to transfer title that was sent to Lucien Landreville with a threat of legal proceedings and prevention of further quarrying. The Town still had no objection in principle, however, to the operation of a quarry on this site provided that Lucien Landreville agreed to relinquish his property; and there was no mention of a park.

The threats became more specific with the resolution or proposal of March 15, 1966 authorizing a surveyor to make plans for homologation which necessarily suggests expropriation. There was still no mention of a park.

The park was mentioned for the first time in the resolution of April 19, 1966, ordering the homologation for purposes of a park of a site that, a month and a half earlier, the Town had been willing in principle to have used as a quarry.

Moreover, the resolution of August 9, 1966 must be interpreted in the light of the resolutions that preceded and followed it: the municipal council was in fact asking for suggestions of how it could attain the objectives that it had been pursuing unlawfully from the beginning.

Finally, there is by-law No. 533, dated December 6, 1966, ordering the expropriation of Lucien Landreville's quarry for purposes of a park. It is this by-law that must be considered, but not in isolation from the events that preceded and culminated in it. If implemented to the letter, this by-law would secure for the Town in substance the very thing it had been wrongfully seeking to obtain by its resolutions of December 16, 1965 and March 1, 1966, namely ownership of Lucien Landreville's land for the sum of $1. What begins and continues in abuse and bad faith remains vitiated to the end, unless there is evidence of a change in circumstances and attitudes that indicates the supervening of good faith. The resolutions leading up to the by-law of December 6, 1966 establish the initially wrongful and unjust conduct of the Town with regard to Lucien Landreville's property. From that moment on, in my view, it was up to the Town to prove a subsequent change. It did not do so.

The Court of Appeal relied on the testimony of Victor Lambert and Gilles Chabot, to which the trial judge did not refer specifically.

Victor Lambert is a town planner and witness for Lucien Landreville. The part of his testimony most favourable to the Town is the part in which he approves the creation of park zone P-48 by means of a by-law dated January 17, 1967. He also says, however, that he found the addition of the rectangular area representing Lucien Landreville's quarry to be incongruous, and that he could not understand what priorities would lead the Town to acquire this land for a park ten or fifteen years before it was needed for this purpose. Taken as a whole, this testimony does not appear to me to strengthen the Town's position.

Gilles Chabot is the Town's engineer. He stated that the Town's planning board had been studying the construction and zoning by-law adopted on January 17, 1967 since 1962. Though he did not actually say so, he implied that the municipal council may have had this by-law in mind before its adoption. In his view, the Town was faced with a "fait accompli" in the form of the excavation of Lucien Landreville's quarry; it was better to fill in the excavation completely or partially and add it to what would later become a large regional park than to let it remain in an area that had just been designated residential. As for the nominal value of $1 offered to Lucien Landreville for his land, he explained that this was due to the fact that the Town's costs for filling in the excavation would be much greater than the value of the land.

This is the same Gilles Chabot, however, who, along with the Mayor, told Lucien Landreville in December 1965 that the Town would agree to let him operate his quarry provided that he transferred the ownership of it after the excavation was completed. How can this witness later speak of a "fait accompli" when he contributed to bringing it about? If the operation of a quarry on this site was not desirable in view of a proposed zoning by-law then under study, why, in so far as it believed it could do otherwise, did the Town allow the operation and even become involved in it?

The explanation of the nominal value of $1 offered to Lucien Landreville for his land is taken up again by the Town in its factum submitted to this Court. This explanation is unexpected, to say the least: the Town takes 10,000 tons of stone free of charge, thereby helping to transform the expropriated property into a hole, which the expropriated party is then charged for filling in by having the cost of this filling deducted from the expropriation indemnity. From the Town's point of view this hole was indeed a treasure-trove. In my view, the offer of $1 and the explanation seeking to justify it are based on a valuation that is clearly unfair, since it disregards the long-recognized legal principle that the indemnity must be calculated on the basis of the value to the owner, not the value to the expropriating party: Cedar Rapids Manufacturing and Power Company v. Lacoste^[2]; Fraser v. Fraserville^[3]; The City of Montreal v. McAnulty Realty Co.^[4] at pp. 278, 281, 282, 290, 297; Attorney General of Quebec v. Hébert^[5], at p. 695; Place Versailles Inc. et al. v. Minister of Justice of Quebec^[6], at pp. 1128, 1129. The Town's bad faith is therefore clear from the actual by-law ordering the expropriation, and not only from the preceding resolutions.

In addition, if Lucien Landreville had not contested the right to expropriate, the deposit of this one dollar, representing an indemnity calculated on the basis of a false principle, would have allowed the Town to obtain prior possession until such time as the Public Service Board determined the true value of a piece of land which, for municipal tax purposes, had already been assessed at $4,000. Furthermore, for the only other expropriation carried out within zone P-48, which took place in 1970 and involved a road, the Town borrowed $1,600 and did not require prior possession in its by-law.

Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that the trial judge, who saw and heard the witnesses and says that he based his conclusions on the evidence as a whole, did not find it necessary to refer specifically to the oral evidence.

In the Court of Appeal, Casey J.A. expressed the opinion that in order to succeed Lucien Landreville would have had to prove that the Town did not intend to use the quarry as a park. The key allegation in Lucien Landreville's case, however, is the bad faith of the Town. If bad faith is proved, as I believe it was, it vitiates and nullifies the Town's actions regardless of the intentions that the Town may eventually have formed in order to attain its objectives.

The appellant here contends that the "by-law is not in the public interest" and further, that the council acted "in bad faith and through fraud and partiality". The authorities are clear that the onus of proving these allegations rests upon the applicant. They are equally clear that if the applicant succeeds in proving these allegations, the by-law is invalid.

Estey J., speaking for the majority of this Court in Kuchma v. Rural Municipality of Taché^[7], at p. 239.

Fraud, dishonesty, bad faith, extortion and bribery form a special category of causes of nullity, which transcends all others.

Fraud unravels everything. The Court is careful not to find fraud unless it is distinctly pleaded and proved; but once it is proved, it vitiates judgments, contracts and all transactions whatsoever...

Lord Denning in Lazarus Estates Ltd. v. Beasley^[8], at p. 712.

This was also the opinion of Lord Loreburn in Marquess of Clanricarde v. Congested Districts Board of Ireland^[9]:

There is only one point in the case, a short point, whether the Congested Districts Board could be restrained from using its compulsory power to acquire Lord Clanricarde's lands in county Galway. In form their proceedings were regular, but in substance, so the appellant contended, they were proceeding ultra vires. At first there was another contention that they were not proceeding bona fide, and it was explained that this conveyed no sort of reflection upon their honesty or good faith, but merely that there was some by-motive. I think it would be better to select some happier expression. I do not understand an honest dishonesty. ... fraud or dishonesty stands on a different footing. A court will always defeat that under any shape, and quite regardless of all form.

This brings me to the questions of procedure and jurisdiction.

The question of procedure was raised in the Court of Appeal by Casey J.A., who found merit in the argument that a municipal by-law could be nullified only by a petition to quash on the ground of illegality, a direct remedy provided for in s. 411 of the Cities and Towns Act, and not by incidental arguments or on defence, as in the case at bar, where Lucien Landreville is disputing the validity of the by-law ordering the expropriation by contesting the notice of expropriation.

Section 411 of the Cities and Towns Act creates an additional but not an exclusive remedy; it cannot have the effect of depriving a person of other remedies that would normally be available to him. In my view, it is also possible to dispute the validity of a municipal by-law on defence or by incidental arguments. This is the meaning of the rather long-standing line of authority for which this Court demonstrated its preference in Duquet v. The Town of Ste-Agathe-des-Monts^[10].

The Superior Court could not dispose of Lucien Landreville's contestation without ruling on the validity of the resolution and the by-law ordering the expropriation. Having concluded that they were invalid, should the Court have limited itself in the order it made to dismissing the notice of expropriation, without explicitly quashing the resolution and the by-law as requested by the expropriated party? I think not. This would be nothing but formalism, since the resolution and by-law have no purpose other than the expropriation in question. In my view, Lucien Landreville could ask in defence that the resolution and the by-law ordering the expropriation be quashed.

Article 777 C.C.P. provides that:

the party being expropriated can only contest the right to expropriate.

Article 1066e of the old Code of Civil Procedure provided that:

No party being expropriated may file any plea against the notice save to contest the right of the expropriating party to have recourse to expropriation.

In Hamel v. Town of Asbestos^[11], this Court, which was called upon to apply art. 1066e, held (at p. 538):

[TRANSLATION] in opposition to the notice, the expropriated party may argue that the expropriating party does not have the statutory right to resort to expropriation, but not that there were irregularities or illegalities in the procedure followed in exercising this right.

In the case at bar, however, the Town contends that the statutory right of the municipal council to expropriate for purposes of a park cannot be questioned in view of s. 605(c) of the Cities and Towns Act, which enables it to:

expropriate any immovable property, any part thereof or any servitude it may need for any municipal purpose.

Since the Town's statutory right to expropriate is indisputable, Lucien Landreville's defence would appear to contravene art. 777 C.C.P.

This submission by the Town goes beyond procedure and gets into jurisdiction. It cannot be retained, however, since it would enable a town to thwart any efforts to contest its expropriations by wording them in such a way as to give them an appearance of legality.

In Hamel (supra), appellant alleged that the municipality had committed procedural irregularities, and in particular that the by-law ordering the expropriation had been adopted by an illegally convened and improperly held meeting. He did not, however, contest the municipality's right to expropriate his immovable. He did not deny that in his case the expropriating party was entitled to resort to expropriation.

In the case at bar, although in general Lucien Landreville recognized the Town's authority to expropriate immovables, including his own, for municipal purposes, he contested its right to exercise this authority as it had done in the circumstances, by committing not procedural irregularities but abuses that vitiated the substance of its decision. In so doing and in so far as he is concerned, Lucien Landreville is in my view contesting "the right to expropriate" in the sense in which this phrase from art. 777 C.C.P. must be understood.

The appeal should be allowed, the decision of the Court of Appeal set aside and the judgment of the Superior Court restored, with costs in this Court as in the Court of Appeal.

Appeal allowed with costs.

on appeal from the court of appeal for ontario

Criminal law — Evidence — Production — Crown's duty to disclose — Corollary police obligation to disclose to Crown — Accused charged with drug-related offences — Crown's main police witness involved in drug-related misconduct leading to disciplinary proceedings and criminal charges — Accused sought production of arresting officer's police disciplinary records and criminal investigation files — Whether common law production regime for third party records applicable only in cases where these records attract reasonable expectation of privacy — Whether criminal investigation files relating to third party accused attract reasonable expectation of privacy — Whether police records relating to findings of misconduct by officer involved in investigation against accused fall within scope of first party disclosure package from police to Crown.

The accused was convicted on multiple drug charges. The arresting officer was the Crown's main witness. After his conviction but before sentencing, the accused learned that the arresting officer was engaged in drug-related misconduct that had led to both internal disciplinary proceedings under the Ontario Police Services Act and to criminal charges. In a preliminary motion before the Court of Appeal, the accused sought production of all documents related to the arresting officer's misconduct, claiming that he required this material to assist him in preparing an application to introduce fresh evidence on his appeal from conviction. The Court of Appeal held that an O'Connor-type procedure is only required in cases where third party records attract a reasonable expectation of privacy, and concluded that no expectation of privacy existed in respect of the criminal investigation files. Subject to appropriate redactions and the resolution of any privilege claims, the Court of Appeal ordered the third parties to produce the criminal investigation files in their possession related to the charges against the arresting officer to the federal Crown prosecuting the accused's case. Subsequently, the arresting officer pleaded guilty to one of the criminal charges brought against him. Evidence of the officer's conviction was admitted on the accused's appeal, and the accused's convictions were set aside, following which the Crown undertook not to re-prosecute him. The production issue in this case was rendered moot and the accused withdrew his participation in this appeal. The Court appointed an amicus curiae and heard this appeal despite its mootness.

Held: The appeal is allowed and the order in the court below is set aside. The application having become moot, the Court makes no further order.

The Crown's obligation to disclose all relevant information in its possession to an accused is well established at common law under the Stinchcombe regime. Under Stinchcombe, the Crown's first party disclosure obligation extends only to material relating to the accused's case in the possession or control of the prosecuting Crown. A question then arises as to whether the "Crown" for disclosure purposes encompasses other state authorities. While the roles of the Crown and the police are separate and distinct, the police have a duty to participate in the disclosure process. The necessary corollary to the Crown's disclosure duty under Stinchcombe is the obligation of police to disclose to the Crown all material pertaining to its investigation of the accused. For the purposes of fulfilling this corollary obligation, the investigating police force, although distinct and independent from the Crown at law, is not a third party. Rather, it acts on the same first party footing as the Crown. Records relating to findings of serious misconduct by police officers involved in the investigation against the accused properly fall within the scope of the first party disclosure package due to the Crown from police, where the police misconduct is either related to the investigation, or the finding of misconduct could reasonably impact on the case against the accused. [14-15] [22-23]

Production of disciplinary records and criminal investigation files in the possession of the police that do not fall within the scope of this first party disclosure package is governed by the

O'Connor regime for third party production. The O'Connor procedure provides a general mechanism at common law for ordering production of any record beyond the possession or control of the prosecuting Crown, and is not limited to cases where third party records attract a reasonable expectation of privacy. To limit the applicability of the O'Connor regime to those cases where a third party has an expectation of privacy in the targeted documents would raise some uncertainty concerning the appropriate mechanism for accessing third party records when it is unknown whether a reasonable expectation of privacy attaches. [11] [15]

The first step in the O'Connor procedure for production of documents in the possession of a third party is for the person seeking production to satisfy the court that the documents are likely relevant to the proceedings. If likely relevance is demonstrated by the applicant, the third party record holder may be ordered to produce the documents for inspection by the court in order to determine whether production should be ordered. Ultimately, what is required at this second stage of the common law regime is a balancing of the competing interests at stake in the particular circumstances of the case. [28] [34] [35]

In most cases, a useful starting point for courts in balancing the competing interests at the second stage of an O'Connor application will be to assess the true relevancy of the targeted record in the case against the accused. Once a court has ascertained upon inspection that third party records are indeed relevant to the accused's case, in the sense that they pertain to an issue in the trial, the second stage balancing exercise is easily performed. In effect, a finding of true relevance puts the third party records in the same category for disclosure purposes as the fruits of the investigation against the accused in the hands of the prosecuting Crown under Stinchcombe. It may be useful to pose the question in this way: If the third party record in question had found its way into the Crown prosecutor's file, would there be any basis under the first party Stinchcombe disclosure regime for not disclosing it to the accused? If the answer to that question is no, there can be no principled reason to arrive at a different outcome on the third party production application. The accused's interest in obtaining disclosure for the purpose of making full answer and defence will, as a general rule, outweigh any residual privacy interest held by third parties in the material. This is particularly so in respect of criminal investigation files concerning third party accused. [20] [39] [42]

That is not to say that residual privacy interests in the contents of criminal investigation files, police disciplinary records or any other third party records should be disregarded. The court should ensure that a production order is properly tailored to meet the exigencies of the case but do no more. To ensure that only relevant material is produced and that no unwarranted invasion of privacy interests occurs, the court may find it necessary to make a production order subject to redactions or other conditions. In addition, when just and appropriate to do so, the court may well impose restrictions on the dissemination of the information produced for purposes unrelated to the accused's full answer and defence or prosecution of an appeal. CHARRON J. —

1. Introduction

[1] This appeal concerns an accused's motion for production of police disciplinary records and criminal investigation files relating to the Crown's main police witness in the case against him. The respondent Lawrence McNeil brought his motion in accordance with the procedure set out in R. v. O'Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 \(SCC\), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, for the production of third party records. The proceedings against McNeil have since been discontinued, McNeil has withdrawn his participation in this appeal, and the production issue is now moot.

[2] Issues concerning the production of police disciplinary records and criminal investigation files relating to third party accused occur frequently and, because the proceedings in which these questions generally arise are interlocutory in nature, production orders are often evasive of appellate review. In addition, the third parties in the present case have a subsisting interest in clarifying some of the uncertainties arising from the decision below. For these reasons, the Court appointed an amicus curiae and heard this appeal despite its mootness.

[3] The question of whether production of the particular documents at issue in the court below should or should not have been ordered is no longer before us. The evidence and prior proceedings in the current case will therefore be reviewed simply to provide the necessary background for discussion of the issues canvassed by the parties on this appeal.

2. Background

[4] McNeil was arrested by Constable Rodney Hackett and other members of the Barrie Police Service in respect of an alleged drug transaction. He was subsequently prosecuted by the federal Crown and convicted on multiple drug charges, including possession of marijuana and cocaine for the purpose of trafficking. Hackett was the Crown's main witness in the case against McNeil. He was the only witness who testified to the reasonable grounds supporting McNeil's arrest. In addition, the trial judge's ultimate finding that McNeil's admitted possession of marijuana and cocaine was for the purpose of trafficking turned on Hackett's credibility.

[5] After his conviction but before sentencing, McNeil learned that Hackett was engaged in drug-related misconduct that had led to both internal disciplinary proceedings under the Ontario Police Services Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.15, and to criminal charges. Both proceedings against Hackett were ongoing at the time. Following an aborted application to reopen his trial to introduce evidence about Hackett's misconduct, McNeil chose to proceed to sentence and appeal his conviction instead.

[6] In a preliminary motion before the Court of Appeal for Ontario, McNeil sought production of all documents related to Hackett's misconduct, claiming that he required this material to assist him in preparing an application to introduce fresh evidence on his appeal from conviction. The police disciplinary and criminal investigation documents at issue were intermingled, and were in the possession of both the Barrie Police Service and the provincial Crown prosecuting the criminal charges against Hackett. Both entities resisted production, and the federal Crown supported their opposition to the motion.

[7] In O'Connor, this Court set out a two-part test for production of third party records. First, the applicant must demonstrate that the information contained in the records is likely relevant. In the appellate context, it was therefore incumbent on McNeil to show that the targeted documents were likely relevant to his proposed application to introduce fresh evidence on his appeal from conviction. Second, if the threshold test of likely relevance is met, the court may order production of the records for its inspection. With the targeted documents before it, the court weighs “the positive and negative consequences of production, with a view to determining whether, and to what extent, production should be ordered” (O’Connor, at para. 137). The second part of the O’Connor test essentially requires a court to conduct a balancing of the third party’s privacy interest in the targeted documents, if any, and the accused’s interest in making full answer and defence.

[8] In the present case, the Court of Appeal found that some of the targeted records, including both disciplinary police records and criminal investigation files, met the requisite relevancy threshold, satisfying the first part of the O’Connor test. Rather than proceeding to the second part of the test, however, the court held that an “O’Connor-type procedure” is only required in cases where third party records attract a reasonable expectation of privacy ((2006), 2006 CanLII 40087 (ON CA), 218 O.A.C. 1). The court drew a distinction between criminal investigation files and police disciplinary records, and concluded that no expectation of privacy existed in respect of the former. Accordingly, subject to appropriate redactions and the resolution of any privilege claims, the court ordered the third parties to produce the criminal investigation files in their possession related to the charges against Hackett to the federal Crown prosecuting McNeil’s case. The court directed the prosecuting Crown in McNeil’s case to determine whether the documents were in fact relevant to McNeil’s appeal and, if so, to make disclosure to the accused. As for the police disciplinary records, the court noted the conflicting jurisprudence on whether such records are subject to a reasonable expectation of privacy and invited counsel to make further submissions on this issue. The balance of the motion was adjourned accordingly.

[9] The Attorney General of Ontario, as third party record holder, was granted leave to appeal to this Court and the production order was stayed pending disposition of the appeal.

Subsequently, Hackett pleaded guilty to one of the criminal charges brought against him. Evidence of Hackett's conviction was admitted on McNeil's appeal before the Court of Appeal for Ontario, and his convictions were set aside, following which the Crown undertook not to re-prosecute him. McNeil then withdrew his participation in the appeal. This Court acceded to the remaining parties' request to proceed with the appeal despite its mootness and appointed an amicus curiae to maintain a proper adversarial context.

3. Overview of the Issues on Appeal

[10] As stated earlier, the third party record holders in this case seek clarification in respect of some of the uncertainties arising from the decision below. The issues canvassed before this Court are the following.

[11] First, by limiting the applicability of the O'Connor production regime to those cases where a third party has an expectation of privacy in the targeted documents, the decision under appeal raises some uncertainty concerning the appropriate mechanism for accessing third party records when it is unknown whether a reasonable expectation of privacy attaches. As I will explain, the procedure set out in O'Connor provides a general mechanism at common law for ordering production of any record beyond the possession or control of the prosecuting Crown. Whether or not the targeted record is subject to a reasonable expectation of privacy is one of the questions that must be determined at the hearing of an O'Connor application. For that pragmatic reason alone, the operation of the common law production regime cannot be premised on the existence of a reasonable expectation of privacy.

[12] Second, to the extent that the decision in the court below suggests that there can be no expectation of privacy in the contents of a criminal investigation file, it is in error. As this Court stated in R. v. Mills, 1999 CanLII 637 \(SCC\), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 668: “Privacy is not an all or nothing right. It does not follow from the fact that the Crown has possession of the records that any reasonable expectation of privacy disappears” (para. 108). This principle holds equally in respect of criminal investigation files relating to third party accused that are not in the possession or control of the prosecuting Crown. There can be no assumption that criminal investigation files relating to third party accused persons do not attract an expectation of privacy absent consideration of their particular contents and other relevant factors. The existence of a reasonable expectation of privacy and its impact, if any, on a third party’s obligation to produce is always a contextual, fact-based inquiry. Likewise, no blanket ruling can be made in respect of privacy interests in police disciplinary records without regard to their contents.

[13] Third, to the extent that the operative terms of the production order below may suggest that records in possession of one Crown entity are deemed to be in the possession of another, this interpretation should be discarded. The notion that all state authorities constitute a single indivisible Crown entity for the purposes of disclosure finds no support in law and, moreover, is unworkable in practice. Accordingly, Crown entities other than the prosecuting Crown are third parties under the O’Connor production regime. As I will explain, however, this does not relieve the prosecuting Crown from its obligation to make reasonable inquiries of other Crown entities and other third parties, in appropriate cases, with respect to records and information in their possession that may be relevant to the case being prosecuted. The Crown and the defence in a criminal proceeding are not adverse in interest for the purpose of discovering relevant information that may be of benefit to an accused.

[14] In addition to clarifying these three uncertainties, this case provides an appropriate context within which to reiterate the respective obligations of the police and the Crown to disclose the fruits of the investigation under R. v. Stinchcombe, 1991 CanLII 45 \(SCC\), [1991] 3 S.C.R. 326, and to consider the extent to which relevant police disciplinary records and third party criminal investigation files should form part of this “first party” disclosure package. The Crown’s obligation to disclose all relevant information in its possession to an accused is well established at common law and is now constitutionally entrenched in the right to full answer and defence under s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The necessary corollary to the Crown’s disclosure duty under Stinchcombe is the obligation of police (or other investigating state authority) to disclose to the Crown all material pertaining to its investigation of the accused. For the purposes of fulfilling this corollary obligation, the investigating police force, although distinct and independent from the Crown at law, is not a third party. Rather, it acts on the same first party footing as the Crown.

[15] As I will explain, records relating to findings of serious misconduct by police officers involved in the investigation against the accused properly fall within the scope of the “first party” disclosure package due to the Crown, where the police misconduct is either related to the investigation, or the finding of misconduct could reasonably impact on the case against the accused. The Crown, in turn, must provide disclosure to the accused in accordance with its obligations under Stinchcombe. Production of disciplinary records and criminal investigation files in the possession of the police that do not fall within the scope of this first party disclosure package is governed by the O’Connor regime for third party production.

[16] I will first review the respective obligations of the Crown and the police to disclose the fruits of the investigation against the accused.

4. The Stinchcombe Duty to Disclose the Fruits of the Investigation

[17] The Crown’s obligation to disclose all relevant information in its possession relating to the investigation against an accused is well established. The duty is triggered upon request and does not require an application to the court. Stinchcombe made clear that relevant information in the first party production context includes not only information related to those matters the Crown intends to adduce in evidence against the accused, but also any information in respect of which there is a reasonable possibility that it may assist the accused in the exercise of the right to make full answer and defence (pp. 343-44). The Crown's obligation survives the trial and, in the appellate context, the scope of relevant information therefore includes any information in respect of which there is a reasonable possibility that it may assist the appellant in prosecuting an appeal.

[18] While the Stinchcombe automatic disclosure obligation is not absolute, it admits of few exceptions. Unless the information is clearly irrelevant, privileged, or its disclosure is otherwise governed by law, the Crown must disclose to the accused all material in its possession. The Crown retains discretion as to the manner and timing of disclosure where the circumstances are such that disclosure in the usual course may result in harm to anyone or prejudice to the public interest. The Crown's exercise of discretion in fulfilling its obligation to disclose is reviewable by a court.

[19] As this Court confirmed in Mills, the Crown's obligation under Stinchcombe to disclose the fruits of the investigation does not signify that no residual privacy interest can exist in the contents of the Crown's file. It should come as no surprise that any number of persons and entities may have a residual privacy interest in material gathered in the course of a criminal investigation. Criminal investigative files may contain highly sensitive material including: outlines of unproven allegations; statements of complainants or witnesses — at times concerning very personal matters; personal addresses and phone numbers; photographs; medical reports; bank statements; search warrant information; surveillance reports; communications intercepted by wiretap; scientific evidence including DNA information; criminal records, etc. The privacy legislation of all 10 provinces addresses the disclosure of information contained in law enforcement files. See Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. F.31, s. 14; Access to Information and Protection of Privacy Act, S.N.L. 2002, c. A-1.1, s. 22; Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, S.N.S. 1993, c. 5, s. 15; Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, R.S.P.E.I. 1988, c. F-15.01, s. 18; Right to Information Act, S.N.B. 1978, c. R-10.3, ss. 6(a) and 6(f); An Act respecting Access to Documents Held by Public Bodies and the Protection of Personal Information, R.S.Q., c. A-2.1, s. 28; The Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, S.M. 1997, c. 50, s. 25; The Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, S.S. 1990-91, c. F-22.01, s. 15; Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. F-25, s. 20; Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 165, s. 15. See also the federal Privacy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. P-21, s. 22.

[20] Implicit in the Crown's broad duty to disclose the contents of its file under Stinchcombe are not the absence of any residual expectation of privacy, but rather the following two assumptions. The first is that the material in possession of the prosecuting Crown is relevant to the accused's case. Otherwise, the Crown would not have obtained possession of it (O'Connor, at para. 12). The second assumption is that this material will likely comprise the case against the accused. As a result, the accused's interest in obtaining disclosure of all relevant material in the Crown's possession for the purpose of making full answer and defence will, as a general rule, outweigh any residual privacy interest held by third parties in the material. These two assumptions explain why the onus is on the Crown to justify the non-disclosure of any material in its possession.

[21] Although the common law regime of disclosure under Stinchcombe generally strikes the appropriate balance between the accused's right to make full answer and defence and the residual privacy interests of other persons in the fruits of the investigation, it is not the only regime that meets constitutional standards. As this Court concluded in Mills, it was open to Parliament to enact, as it did, a statutory regime for the disclosure of records containing personal information of complainants and witnesses in proceedings for sexual offences under ss. 278.1 to 278.91 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46 (commonly referred to as the “Mills regime”). Absent an express waiver from the complainant or witness to whom the record relates, production of all records falling within the Mills regime, whether in the possession or control of a third person or of the prosecutor in the proceedings, can only be made on application to the court and in accordance with the balancing test set out in the Code provisions. This statutory regime therefore constitutes an exception to the common law regime of Crown disclosure under Stinchcombe. As we shall see, the Mills regime is also different from the common law regime for production of third party records under O’Connor. It is nonetheless constitutional (Mills, at para. 59).

[22] The Stinchcombe regime of disclosure extends only to material in the possession or control of the Crown. The law cannot impose an obligation on the Crown to disclose material which it does not have or cannot obtain: R. v. Stinchcombe, 1995 CanLII 130 \(SCC\), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 754. A question then arises as to whether the “Crown”, for disclosure purposes, encompasses other state authorities. The notion that all state authorities amount to a single “Crown” entity for the purposes of disclosure and production must be quickly rejected. It finds no support in law and, given our multi-tiered system of governance and the realities of Canada’s geography, is unworkable in practice. As aptly explained in R. v. Gingras (1992), 1992 CanLII 2826 \(AB CA\), 120 A.R. 300 (C.A.), at para. 14:

If that line of reasoning were correct, then in order to meet the tests in Stinchcombe, some months before trial every Crown prosecutor would have to inquire of every department of the Provincial Government and every department of the Federal Government. He would have to ask each whether they had in their possession any records touching each prosecution upcoming. It would be impossible to carry out 1% of that task. It would take many years to bring every case to trial if that were required.

Accordingly, the Stinchcombe disclosure regime only extends to material relating to the accused’s case in the possession or control of the prosecuting Crown entity. This material is commonly referred to as the “fruits of the investigation”.

[23] Under our Canadian system of law enforcement, the general duty to investigate crime falls on the police, not the Crown. The fruits of the investigation against an accused person, therefore, will generally have been gathered, and any resulting criminal charge laid, by the police. While the roles of the Crown and the police are separate and distinct, the police have a duty to participate in prosecutions: see, for example, s. 42(1)(e) of the Ontario Police Services Act. Of particular relevance here is the police’s duty to participate in the disclosure process. The means by which the Crown comes to be in possession of the fruits of the investigation lies in the corollary duty of police investigators to disclose to the Crown all relevant material in their possession. The police’s obligation to disclose all material pertaining to the investigation of an accused to the prosecuting Crown was recognized long before Stinchcombe. The state of the law was well summed up by the Honourable G. Arthur Martin, Q.C., in his Report of the Attorney General’s Advisory Committee on Charge Screening, Disclosure, and Resolution Discussions (1993) (“Martin Report”), at pp. 167-68:

It is well settled and accepted by all, including the police, that the police, although operating independently of Crown counsel, have a duty to disclose to Crown counsel all relevant information uncovered during the investigation of a crime, including information which assists the accused. . . . As one commentator has observed, “the duty of the police to disclose relevant information about a case, to the Crown, is a duty that existed before [Stinchcombe, supra]”.

[24] The corollary duty of the police to disclose to the Crown the fruits of the investigation is now well recognized in the appellate jurisprudence. See R. v. Jack (1992), 1992 CanLII 2764 \(MB CA\), 70 C.C.C. (3d) 67 (Man. C.A.), at p. 94; R. v. T. (L.A.) (1993), 1993 CanLII 3382 \(ON CA\), 14 O.R. (3d) 378 (C.A.), at p. 382; R. v. Gagné (1998), 1998 CanLII 12526

(QC CA), 131 C.C.C. (3d) 444 (Que. C.A.), at p. 455; and Driskell v. Dangerfield, 2008 MBCA 60, [2008] 6 W.W.R. 615, at para. 17. It is also widely acknowledged that the Crown cannot explain a failure to disclose relevant material on the basis that the investigating police force failed to disclose it to the Crown. See R. v. MacPherson (1991), 1991 CanLII 4570 (NS SC), 105 N.S.R. (2d) 123 (S.C.), at paras. 37-38; R. v. Oliver (1995), 1995 CanLII 7518 (NS SC), 143 N.S.R. (2d) 134 (S.C.), at para. 36; R. v. Campbell, [1992] N.S.J. No. 702 (QL) (Prov. Ct.), at paras. 16-17.

[25] Even though, in this narrow sense, the police and the Crown may be viewed as one entity for disclosure purposes, the two are unquestionably separate and independent entities, both in fact and in law. Hence, production of criminal investigation files involving third parties, and that of police disciplinary records, usually falls to be determined in the context of an O'Connor application. This is unsurprising because information about third party accused or police misconduct is not likely to make its way into the Crown's Stinchcombe disclosure package unless such information is in some way related to the accused's case. I will come back to this point later in discussing the circumstances in which information about third party misconduct should properly form part of the police disclosure package to the Crown. First, I will review the principles governing the production of third party records under the O'Connor regime.

5. The O'Connor Regime for Production of Third Party Records

[26] In O'Connor, this Court was concerned with the manner in which the accused, who was charged with multiple sexual offences, could obtain production of the therapeutic records of the complainants from third party custodians. O'Connor has been overtaken by Parliament's subsequent enactment of the Mills regime contained in ss. 278.1 to 278.91 of the Criminal Code for the disclosure of records containing personal information of complainants and witnesses in sexual assault proceedings. In respect of any other criminal proceeding, however, the O'Connor application provides the accused with a mechanism for accessing third party records that fall beyond the reach of the Stinchcombe first party disclosure regime.

[27] Stated briefly, the procedure to be followed on an O'Connor application is the following:

- (1) The accused first obtains a subpoena duces tecum under ss. 698(1) and 700(1) of the Criminal Code and serves it on the third party record holder. The subpoena compels the person to whom it is directed to attend court with the targeted records or materials.
- (2) The accused also brings an application, supported by appropriate affidavit evidence, showing that the records sought are likely to be relevant in his or her trial. Notice of the application is given to the prosecuting Crown, the person who is the subject of the records and any other person who may have a privacy interest in the records targeted for production.
- (3) The O'Connor application is brought before the judge seized with the trial, although it may be heard before the trial commences. If production is unopposed, of course, the application for production becomes moot and there is no need for a hearing.
- (4) If the record holder or some other interested person advances a well-founded claim that the targeted documents are privileged, in all but the rarest cases where the accused's innocence is at stake, the existence of privilege will effectively bar the accused's application for production of the targeted documents, regardless of their relevance. Issues of privilege are therefore best resolved at the outset of the O'Connor process.

- (5) Where privilege is not in question, the judge determines whether production should be compelled in accordance with the two-stage test established in O'Connor. At the first stage, if satisfied that the record is likely relevant to the proceeding against the accused, the judge may order production of the record for the court's inspection. At the next stage, with the records in hand, the judge determines whether, and to what extent, production should be ordered to the accused.

The question of privilege is beyond the scope of this appeal. However, I will elaborate on each stage of the O'Connor test for production of third party records in turn.

5.1 First Stage: Screening for Likely Relevance

5.1.1 Burden Is on the Applicant

[28] The first step in any contested application for production of non-privileged documents in the possession of a third party is for the person seeking production — in this case the accused — to satisfy the court that the documents are likely relevant to the proceedings. This threshold burden simply reflects the fact that the context in which third party records are sought is different from the context of first party disclosure. We have already seen that the presumptive duty on Crown counsel to disclose the fruits of the investigation in their possession under Stinchcombe is premised on the assumptions that the information is relevant and that it will likely comprise the case against the accused. No such assumptions can be made in respect of documents in the hands of a third party who is a stranger to the litigation. The applicant must therefore justify to the court the use of state power to compel their production — hence the initial onus on the person seeking production to show “likely relevance”. In addition, it is important for the effective administration of justice that criminal trials remain focussed on the issues to be tried and that scarce judicial resources not be squandered in “fishing expeditions” for irrelevant evidence. The likely relevance threshold reflects this gate-keeper function.

5.1.2 Burden on Applicant Is Significant but not Onerous

[29] It is important to repeat here, as this Court emphasized in O'Connor, that while the likely relevance threshold is “a significant burden, it should not be interpreted as an onerous burden upon the accused” (para. 24). On the one hand, the likely relevance threshold is “significant” because the court must play a meaningful role in screening applications “to prevent the defence from engaging in ‘speculative, fanciful, disruptive, unmeritorious, obstructive and time-consuming’ requests for production” (O'Connor, at para. 24, quoting from R. v. Chaplin, 1995 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 727, at para. 32). The importance of preventing unnecessary applications for production from consuming scarce judicial resources cannot be overstated; however, the undue protraction of criminal proceedings remains a pressing concern, more than a decade after O'Connor. On the other hand, the relevance threshold should not, and indeed cannot, be an onerous test to meet because accused persons cannot be required, as a condition to accessing information that may assist in making full answer and defence, “to demonstrate the specific use to which they might put information which they have not even seen” (O'Connor, at para. 25, quoting from R. v. Durette, 1994 CanLII 123 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 469, at p. 499).

5.1.3 O'Connor Common Law Threshold Is Significantly Different From Mills Statutory Regime

[30] It is important to note that the common law likely relevance threshold in O'Connor differs significantly from the statutory likely relevance threshold set by Parliament for the production of records containing personal information in sexual assault proceedings under the Mills regime (see s. 278.3(4) of the Criminal Code). As this Court explained at some length in Mills, a range of permissible regimes can meet constitutional standards. It was therefore open to Parliament to craft its own solution to address the particular concerns arising from disclosure of third party records in sexual proceedings. In doing so, Parliament “sought to recognize the prevalence of sexual violence against women and children and its disadvantageous impact on their rights, . . . and to reconcile fairness to complainants with the rights of the accused” (Mills, at para. 59). The following differences between the two regimes are particularly noteworthy.

[31] First, the likely relevance standard adopted by Parliament under the Mills regime is tailored to counter speculative myths, stereotypes and generalized assumptions about sexual assault victims and about the usefulness of private records in sexual assault proceedings. Such generalized views need not be countered at large in respect of all third party records that fall outside the Mills regime. The general common law threshold of likely relevance under O'Connor is intended rather to screen applications to ensure the proper use of state authority in compelling production of third party records and to establish the appropriateness of the application so as to avoid squandering scarce judicial resources.

[32] Second, while the Mills regime retains the two-stage framework set out in O'Connor, it differs significantly in that much of the balancing of the competing interests is effected at the first stage in determining whether production should be made to the court for inspection. This reflects Parliament’s assumption that a reasonable expectation of privacy exists in the types of records targeted by the statutory regime: see R. v. Clifford (2002), 2002 CanLII 14471 (ON CA), 163 C.C.C. (3d) 3 (Ont. C.A.), at paras. 48-49. An equivalent presumption of privacy does not attach in respect of all third party records that fall outside the Mills regime. Hence, any balancing of competing interests is reserved for the second stage of the O'Connor regime, when the documents can be inspected by the court to better ascertain the nature of the privacy interest, if any. Because of these significant differences, it is important not to transpose the Mills regime into the O'Connor production hearing in respect of documents to which the statutory dispositions do not apply.

5.1.4 Likely Relevance Under the Common Law Regime

[33] “Likely relevant” under the common law O’Connor regime means that there is “a reasonable possibility that the information is logically probative to an issue at trial or the competence of a witness to testify” (O’Connor, at para. 22 (emphasis deleted)). An “issue at trial” here includes not only material issues concerning the unfolding of the events which form the subject matter of the proceedings, but also “evidence relating to the credibility of witnesses and to the reliability of other evidence in the case” (O’Connor, at para. 22). At this stage of the proceedings, the court cannot insist on a demonstration of the precise manner in which the targeted documents could be used at trial. The imposition of such a stringent threshold burden would put the accused, who has not seen the documents, in an impossible Catch-22 position.

5.2 Second Stage: Balancing the Interests at Play

[34] If likely relevance is demonstrated by the applicant, the third party record holder may be ordered to produce the documents for inspection by the court in order to determine whether production should be ordered to the accused.

. . . “(1) the extent to which the record is necessary for the accused to make full answer and defence; (2) the probative value of the record in question; (3) the nature and extent of the reasonable expectation of privacy vested in that record; (4) whether production of the record would be premised upon any discriminatory belief or bias” and “(5) the potential prejudice to the complainant’s dignity, privacy or security of the person that would be occasioned by production of the record in question”

The factors set out in O'Connor should not be applied mechanically. It should be kept in mind that O'Connor involved the production of the complainant's private records in proceedings for a sexual offence, an area of law subsequently overtaken by Parliament's enactment of the Mills regime. Some of the factors listed in O'Connor, in particular items 4 and 5 above, were obviously tailored to meet the exigencies in sexual assault proceedings and, consequently, are unlikely to be of assistance in other contexts. Ultimately, what is required at this second stage of the common law regime is a balancing of the competing interests at stake in the particular circumstances of the case. No exhaustive list can be crafted to suit every situation; however, I will elaborate somewhat on the balancing process.

5.2.1 A Useful Starting Point: Assessing True Relevance

[36] As we have seen, by the time the court embarks on the second stage of an O'Connor hearing, the application has been screened for likely relevance and the judge is satisfied that compelling the production of the documents for inspection by the court is warranted in the circumstances. Once the documents are before the court, the final question to be determined is whether production should be made to the accused.

[37] The amicus curiae submits that the starting point for determining whether to order production to the accused of documents in the hands of third parties, including, as in this case, Crown briefs, police briefs and police disciplinary files, requires a determination of the nature of the records to define the existence or absence of a reasonable expectation of privacy (factum, at para. 19). There is some merit to the proposal of looking first at whether there is any expectation of privacy in the targeted records. Indeed, if it is clear upon inspection of the documents and their contents that there is no basis upon which the third party record holder or any other interested person could claim a reasonable privacy interest, there is no balancing of interests left to perform.

Given that likely relevance has by this point been established, the sole remaining interest at stake is the accused's right to make full answer and defence. A production order should therefore issue. It is in this sense that the Court of Appeal's finding in the present case, that an "O'Connor-type procedure" is only required in cases where the third party records attract a reasonable expectation of privacy, must be understood.

[38] The difficulty with this approach, however, is that it is largely premised on the conclusion that the existence of a reasonable expectation of privacy may be determined solely by characterizing the type of record at issue. While this may be possible in respect of some records, determining whether an expectation of privacy attaches to a particular record usually requires a more contextual approach. As we have seen, even in the context of the Crown's Stinchcombe obligation of disclosure, there exists no presumption that all expectations of privacy are lost just because a record has found its way into the prosecuting Crown's file.

[39] The amicus curiae submits, and I agree, that determining the existence of a reasonable expectation of privacy requires a contextual assessment having regard to numerous factors, including but not limited to: how the record was created; who created the record; the purpose of the record; the context of the case in which the record would be used; who holds the privacy interest; how the record was obtained by the Crown or police; the presence or absence of waiver; any applicable legislation; and whether the privacy interest extends to all or part of the record. As one can readily appreciate from this non-exhaustive list, determining whether there is any residual expectation of privacy in a document may be a complex and time-consuming exercise that has the potential to significantly delay and detract from the actual proceeding before the court — the trial of the accused. For that reason, it is my view that in most cases, a more useful starting point for courts in balancing competing interests at the second stage of an O'Connor application will be to assess the true relevancy of the targeted record in the case against the accused. This approach allows the court to remain focussed on the trial of the accused and, given the competing interests at stake, the relevancy assessment will usually be largely determinative of the production issue. I will explain.

[40] On the one hand, because the accused will not have seen the documents that he or she seeks to have produced, it may be readily apparent upon inspection by the court that the claim of likely relevance established at the first stage of the O'Connor application is simply not borne out. If the court is satisfied that the documents are clearly irrelevant, there is no basis for compelling production to the accused, and the application can be summarily dismissed.

[41] On the other hand, if the claim of likely relevance is borne out upon inspection, the accused's right to make full answer and defence will, with few exceptions, tip the balance in favour of allowing the application for production. Recall that at this stage of the proceedings, the court has confirmed that the production application concerns non-privileged documents. The existence of any privacy interest in third party records relevant to an accused's defence of a criminal charge may well warrant, in appropriate circumstances, some redactions or the imposition of conditions to ensure that no unnecessary invasion of privacy follows from production to the accused. However, absent an overriding statutory regime governing the production of the record in question, a third party privacy interest is unlikely to defeat an application for production.

disclosure regime for not disclosing it to the accused? If the answer to that question is no, there can be no principled reason to arrive at a different outcome on the third party production application. As we have seen, the Crown's obligation under Stinchcombe to disclose to the accused the fruits of the investigation in its possession does not signify that no residual privacy interest exists in the contents of the file. However, it does mean that, with few exceptions (including the Mills statutory scheme), the accused's right to access information necessary to make full answer and defence will outweigh any competing privacy interest. The same applies with respect to relevant material in the hands of third parties. This is particularly so in respect of criminal investigation files concerning third party accused. As Professor Paciocco aptly puts it:

. . . it would be perverse to hold that investigative information is not private enough to impose any constraints on the ability of the police to gather it and the Crown to use it to seek the conviction of the target of that investigation, yet that same information is protected by privacy interests when it contains relevant information that would help someone defend himself.

5.2.2 Guarding Against Unnecessary Intrusions Into Privacy Interests

[43] That is not to say, however, that residual privacy interests in the contents of criminal investigation files should be disregarded. As concluded in the Martin Report, at p. 181 (reference in Attorney General of Ontario's factum, at para. 24):

The privacy of the victim and any other witnesses must yield to preparing a full answer and defence. But it need not yield any further. The Committee considers that, provided the making of full answer and defence is not impaired, it is desirable to permit limitations on the use of disclosure materials that recognize the privacy interests of victims and witnesses.

[44] The same applies in respect of police disciplinary records, or any other third party records. The court should ensure that a production order is properly tailored to meet the exigencies of the case but do no more. As we have seen, likely relevance for disclosure purposes has a wide and generous connotation and includes information in respect of which there is a reasonable possibility that it may assist the accused in the exercise of the right to make full answer and defence. In considering the ambit of the information that can assist in the trial, regard must be given to the particular issues in the case and to the governing rules of evidence and procedure. This does not mean that only material that would be admissible at trial should be produced. Material that would not, on its own, be admissible may nonetheless be of use to the defence, for example, in cross-examining a witness on matters of credibility or in pursuing other avenues of investigation. An O'Connor application must, however, lay a foundation for the relevance of the material sought, having regard to the issues in the case. In large part, this is the reason why such applications should be brought before the judge seized with the trial. Doing so allows production issues to be effectively disposed of by the judge and counsel who are sufficiently apprised of the issues in the case. Of course, production applications can be heard prior to the commencement of the trial, and the judge, when appropriate to do so, may enlist the assistance of counsel in determining the relevance of a particular record for the purposes of production.

[45] Ascertaining the true relevancy of records targeted for production may become particularly important when the information on the production application concerns police disciplinary records. The contentious nature of police work often leads to public complaints, some legitimate and others spurious. Police disciplinary proceedings may also relate to employment issues or other matters that have no bearing on the case against the accused. The risk in this context is that disclosure, and by extension trial proceedings, may be sidetracked by irrelevant allegations or findings of police misconduct. Disclosure is intended to assist an accused in making full answer and defence or in prosecuting an appeal, not turn criminal trials into a conglomeration of satellite hearings on collateral matters.

[46] Hence, to ensure that only relevant material is produced and that no unwarranted invasion of privacy interests occurs, the court may find it necessary to make a production order subject to redactions or other conditions. In addition, when just and appropriate to do so, the court may well impose restrictions on the dissemination of the information produced for purposes unrelated to the accused's full answer and defence or prosecution of an appeal: see, for example, recommendations 34 and 35 in the Martin Report (at p. 179) and P. (D.) v. Wagg (2004), 2004 CanLII 39048 (ON CA), 239 D.L.R. (4th) 501 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 46. Absent unusual circumstances, however, the crafting of a production order should not necessitate any detailed inquiry into the precise nature or extent of the privacy interest in question. The O'Connor hearing should remain focussed on the criminal proceeding at hand.

6. Bridging the Gap Between First Party Disclosure and Third Party Production

[47] As the preceding discussion makes clear, once the true relevance of the targeted records has been ascertained on an O'Connor application for production of third party records, the ultimate question of production is essentially governed by the same principles that apply to the disclosure of material in the possession of the Crown under Stinchcombe. To the accused, however, the distinction between these two regimes is significant. While the accused will receive automatic disclosure of relevant material that finds its way into the hands of the prosecuting Crown, accessing relevant material in the hands of third parties will often be more happenstance. To a certain extent, that is inevitable. Third parties are under no obligation to come forth with relevant information to assist the accused in his defence. However, the prosecuting Crown and the investigating police force are in a different position and can assist in bridging the gap between first party disclosure and third party production. I will deal firstly with the Crown.

6.1 Crown Counsel's Duty to Inquire

[48] As stated earlier, the suggestion that all state authorities constitute a single entity is untenable and unworkable. In order to fulfill its Stinchcombe disclosure obligation, the prosecuting Crown does not have to inquire of every department of the provincial government, every department of the federal government and every police force whether they are in possession of material relevant to the accused's case. However, this does not mean that, regardless of the circumstances, the Crown is simply a passive recipient of relevant information with no obligation of its own to seek out and obtain relevant material.

[49] The Crown is not an ordinary litigant. As a minister of justice, the Crown's undivided loyalty is to the proper administration of justice. As such, Crown counsel who is put on notice of the existence of relevant information cannot simply disregard the matter. Unless the notice appears unfounded, Crown counsel will not be able to fully assess the merits of the case and fulfill its duty as an officer of the court without inquiring further and obtaining the information if it is reasonably feasible to do so. Ryan J.A. in R. v. Arsenault (1994), 1994 CanLII 5244 \(NB CA\), 153 N.B.R. (2d) 81 (C.A.), aptly described the Crown's obligation to make reasonable inquiries of other Crown agencies or departments. He stated as follows:

When disclosure is demanded or requested, Crown counsel have a duty to make reasonable inquiries of other Crown agencies or departments that could reasonably be considered to be in possession of evidence. Counsel cannot be excused for any failure to make reasonable inquiries when to the knowledge of the prosecutor or the police there has been another Crown agency involved in the investigation. Relevancy cannot be left to be determined by the uninitiated. If Crown counsel is denied access to another agency's file, then this should be disclosed to the defence so that the defence may pursue whatever course is deemed to be in the best interests of the accused. This also applies to cases where the accused or defendant, as the case may be, is unrepresented [para. 15]

[50] The same duty to inquire applies when the Crown is informed of potentially relevant evidence pertaining to the credibility or reliability of the witnesses in a case. As the amicus curiae rightly states, “[t]he Crown and the defence are not adverse in interest in discovering the existence of an unreliable or unethical police officer” (factum, at para. 62). Doherty J.A. made the point forcefully in R. v. Ahluwalia (2000), 2000 CanLII 17011 (ON CA), 138 O.A.C. 154, commenting on the Crown’s failure to inquire further when confronted with the perjury of its own witness as follows (at paras. 71-72):

For reasons not shared with this court, the Crown does not appear to have regarded itself as under any obligation to get to the bottom of this matter. . . .

The Crown has obligations to the administration of justice that do not burden other litigants. Faced with its own witness’s perjury and the fact that the perjured evidence coincided with the incomplete disclosure that the Crown says it innocently passed to the defence, the Crown was obliged to take all reasonable steps to find out what had happened and to share the results of those inquiries with the defence. In my view, the Crown did not fulfill its obligations to the administration of justice by acknowledging the incomplete disclosure discovered by the defence, and after making limited inquiries, professing neither a responsibility for the incomplete disclosure nor an ability to provide any explanation for it. The Crown owed both the appellant and the court a fuller explanation than it chose to provide.

[51] Hence, by properly fulfilling its dual role as an advocate and officer of the court, Crown counsel can effectively bridge much of the gap between first party disclosure and third party production. I now turn to the police corollary duty to participate in the disclosure process.

6.2 The Police’s Corollary Duty to Disclose Relevant Information

[52] We have already seen that the police have a corollary duty to disclose to the prosecuting Crown all material pertaining to the investigation of an accused. This disclosure obligation accords with police codes of conduct enacted in many jurisdictions across the country. For example, under s. 2(1)(c)(vi) of the Code of Conduct found in O. Reg. 123/98, Sch., enacted pursuant to the Ontario Police Services Act, a police chief or other police officer commits neglect of duty if he or she “fails to report anything that he or she knows concerning a criminal or other charge, or fails to disclose any evidence that he or she, or any person within his or her knowledge, can give for or against any prisoner or defendant”. See also Code of Professional Conduct Regulation, B.C. Reg. 205/98, s. 5(e); Police Service Regulation, Alta. Reg. 356/90, s. 5(2)(h)(vii); Code of ethics of Québec police officers, (1990) 122 G.O. II, 1760, s. 7(2); and Code of Professional Conduct Regulation — Police Act, N.B. Reg. 2007-81, s. 36(1)(d)(iii).

[53] While the obligation itself is firmly established, the difficulty lies in identifying the contours of relevance for the purposes of the police’s first party disclosure obligation. The particular question that this case exemplifies is whether information of misconduct by a police officer involved in the case against the accused should form part of the first party disclosure package provided to the Crown for its assessment of relevance according to the edicts of Stinchcombe. Obviously, the accused has no right to automatic disclosure of every aspect of a police officer’s employment history, or to police disciplinary matters with no realistic bearing on the case against him or her. However, where the disciplinary information is relevant, it should form part of the first party disclosure package, and its discovery should not be left to happenstance.

[54] When the police misconduct in question concerns the same incident that forms the subject-matter of the charge against the accused, the police duty to disclose information concerning police disciplinary action taken in respect of that misconduct is rather self-evident. To state an obvious example, if a police officer is charged under the applicable provincial legislation for excessive use of force in relation to the accused’s arrest, this information must be disclosed to the Crown. Where the misconduct of a police witness is not directly related to the investigation against the accused, it may nonetheless be relevant to the accused's case, in which case it should also be disclosed. For example, no one would question that the criminal record for perjury of a civilian material witness would be of relevance to the accused and should form part of the first party disclosure package. In the same way, findings of police misconduct by a police officer involved in the case against the accused that may have a bearing on the case against an accused should be disclosed.

[55] The need for guidance in this area prompted a review commissioned by the Chief of the Toronto Police Service. The review was conducted by the Honourable George Ferguson, Q.C., and culminated in his January 2003 report entitled Review and Recommendations Concerning Various Aspects of Police Misconduct, vol. I (the "Ferguson Report"). The terms of reference included the mandate to review "when, in what manner and under what circumstances does the Police Service have an obligation to bring to the attention of the Crown, alleged or proven acts of misconduct of a police officer who will be a witness or was otherwise involved in an investigation that has led to a criminal proceeding" (p. 1).

Once into O'Connor, it is difficult, if not impossible, for the defence to meet the threshold required to access the records. Unless the officer is notorious or the defence personally knows details of the officer's files, the defence will be found to be on nothing more than a fishing expedition and access will be denied. A diligent officer-in-charge will not likely know the full employment history of each police witness, and, currently, is not required to make any inquiries. Short of a criminal conviction for dishonesty, nothing is likely to be provided to the Crown for disclosure analysis. Even convictions for dishonesty may not always be revealed. This is clearly unsatisfactory.

[57] The Ferguson Report concluded that leaving the entire question of access to police disciplinary records to be determined under the O'Connor regime for third party production “is neither efficient nor justified” (p. 15). In order to assist in bridging the gap between first party disclosure and third party production, the Ferguson Report made a number of recommendations, including the automatic disclosure by the police upon request by the Crown of the following information regarding acts of misconduct by a member of the Toronto Police Service who may be a witness or who was otherwise involved in a case before the court (at p. 17):

- a. Any conviction or finding of guilt[t] under the Canadian Criminal Code or under the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act [for which a pardon has not been granted].
- b. Any outstanding charges under the Canadian Criminal Code or the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act.
- c. Any conviction or finding of guilt under any other federal or provincial statute.
- d. Any finding of guilt for misconduct after a hearing under the Police Services Act or its predecessor Act.
- e. Any current charge of misconduct under the Police Services Act for which a Notice of Hearing has been issued.

[58] The Ferguson Report recommended that upon receiving this information from police, the Crown act as “gate-keeper”, sorting out what parts of this material, if any, should be turned over to the defence in compliance with the Crown’s Stinchcombe obligation of disclosure. The Ferguson Report made the further recommendation that any concerned officer who was the subject of disciplinary records produced to the Crown be notified in writing and be given the opportunity to make submissions to the Crown.

[59] I agree that it is “neither efficient nor justified” to leave the entire question of access to police misconduct records to be determined in the context of the O’Connor regime for third party production. Indeed, as discussed earlier, the disclosure of relevant material, whether it be for or against an accused, is part of the police corollary duty to participate in the disclosure process. Where the information is obviously relevant to the accused’s case, it should form part of the first party disclosure package to the Crown without prompting. For example, as was the case here, if an officer comes under investigation for serious drug-related misconduct, it becomes incumbent upon the police force, in fulfilment of its corollary duty of disclosure to the Crown, to look into those criminal cases in which the officer is involved and to take appropriate action. Of course, not every finding of police misconduct by an officer involved in the investigation will be of relevance to an accused’s case. The officer may have played a peripheral role in the investigation, or the misconduct in question may have no realistic bearing on the credibility or reliability of the officer’s evidence. The kinds of information listed in the Ferguson Report can provide useful guidance on those types of matters in respect of which a police force may well be advised to seek the advice of Crown counsel.

[60] With respect to records concerning police disciplinary matters that do not fall within the scope of first party disclosure obligations, procedures such as those recommended in the Ferguson Report, tailored to suit the particular needs of the community in which they are implemented, can go a long way towards ensuring a more efficient streamlining of O’Connor applications for third party production. Trial courts seized with motions for disclosure under Stinchcombe or applications for third party production are well placed to make appropriate orders to foster the necessary cooperation between police, the Crown and defence counsel.

7. Disposition

on appeal from the court of appeal for alberta

Criminal law -- Evidence -- Crown's obligation to make disclosure to defence -- Witness favourable to accused interviewed by police -- Crown not calling witness and refusing to produce statements obtained -- Whether Crown obliged to disclose statements.

The accused, a lawyer, was charged with breach of trust, theft and fraud. A former secretary of his was a Crown witness at the preliminary inquiry, where she gave evidence apparently favourable to the defence. After the preliminary inquiry but prior to trial, the witness was interviewed by an RCMP officer and a tape-recorded statement was taken. Later, during the course of the trial, the witness was again interviewed by a police officer and a written statement taken. Defence counsel was informed of the existence but not of the content of the statements. His requests for disclosure were refused. During the trial defence counsel learned conclusively that the witness would not be called by the Crown and sought an order that the witness be called or that the Crown disclose the contents of the statements to the defence. The trial judge dismissed the application. The trial proceeded and the accused was convicted of breach of trust and fraud. Conditional stays were entered with respect to the theft counts. The Court of Appeal affirmed the convictions without giving reasons.

Held: The appeal should be allowed and a new trial ordered.

The Crown has a legal duty to disclose all relevant information to the defence. The fruits of the investigation which are in its possession are not the property of the Crown for use in securing a conviction but the property of the public to be used to ensure that justice is done. The obligation to disclose is subject to a discretion with respect to the withholding of information and to the timing and manner of disclosure. Crown counsel has a duty to respect the rules of privilege and to protect the identity of informers. A discretion must also be exercised with respect to the relevance of information. The Crown's discretion is reviewable by the trial judge, who should be guided by the general principle that information should not be withheld if there is a reasonable possibility that this will impair the right of the accused to make full answer and defence. The absolute withholding of information which is relevant to the defence can only be justified on the basis of the existence of a legal privilege which excludes the information from disclosure. This privilege is reviewable, however, on the ground that it is not a reasonable limit on the right to make full answer and defence in a particular case.

Counsel for the accused must bring to the trial judge's attention at the earliest opportunity any failure of the Crown to comply with its duty to disclose of which counsel becomes aware. This will enable the trial judge to remedy any prejudice to the accused if possible and thus avoid a new trial.

Initial disclosure should occur before the accused is called upon to elect the mode of trial or plead. Subject to the Crown's discretion, all relevant information must be disclosed, both that which the Crown intends to introduce into evidence and that which it does not, and whether the evidence is inculpatory or exculpatory. All statements obtained from persons who have provided relevant information to the authorities should be produced, even if they are not proposed as Crown witnesses. Where statements are not in existence, other information such as notes should be produced. If there are no notes, all information in the prosecution's possession relating to any relevant evidence the person could give should be supplied.

Crown counsel was not justified in refusing disclosure here on the ground that the witness was not worthy of credit: whether the witness is credible is for the trial judge to determine after hearing the evidence. The trial judge ought to have examined the statements. Since the information withheld might have affected the outcome of the trial, the failure to disclose impaired the right to make full answer and defence. There should be a new trial at which the statements are produced.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

SOPINKA J. -- This appeal raises the issue of the Crown's obligation to make disclosure to the defence. A witness who gave evidence at the preliminary inquiry favourable to the accused was subsequently interviewed by agents for the Crown. Crown counsel decided not to call the witness and would not produce the statements obtained at the interview. The trial judge refused an application by the defence for disclosure on the ground that there was no obligation on the Crown to disclose the statements. The Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment at trial and the case is here with leave of this Court.

1. Facts

The appellant was a Calgary lawyer charged with appropriating certain financial instruments from a client, one Jack Abrams. The indictment charged thirteen counts of criminal breach of trust contrary to s. 296 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34 (now s. 336), thirteen counts of theft contrary to s. 294(a) (now s. 334(a)) of the Code, and one count of fraud contrary to s. 338(1)(a) (now s. 380(1)(a)) of the Code. The trial in the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench was before Brennan J. without a jury.

The Crown alleged that the appellant had wrongfully appropriated property which he held in trust for Abrams. The defence did not contest the receipt of funds by the appellant. The defence did contend, however, that despite Stinchcombe's formal status as trustee of the property, Abrams had in fact made Stinchcombe his business partner. Under this theory, Stinchcombe had acted as he was legally entitled to act. At issue therefore was the actual, as opposed to the formal, nature of the relationship between the two men.

Patricia Lineham is a former secretary of Mr. Stinchcombe. She was a Crown witness at the preliminary inquiry. There, she gave evidence which was, apparently, very favourable to the defence regarding the conduct of Abrams. The precise content of this testimony was not before the trial judge and is not in the record. Lineham was not listed on the indictment, but was subpoenaed by the Crown.

After the preliminary inquiry but prior to the trial, Lineham was interviewed by an RCMP officer. A tape-recorded statement was taken. Crown counsel informed defence counsel of the existence but not the content of this statement. A request for disclosure was refused. Later, during the course of the trial, Lineham was again interviewed by a police officer and a written statement taken. Again, though defence counsel was advised of the existence of the statement, a request for disclosure was refused. Crown counsel also indicated that he would not be calling Lineham as she was not worthy of credit.

It was not until the third day of the trial that defence counsel learned conclusively that Lineham would not be called by the Crown. At this time, he moved before the trial judge for an order that (i) the Crown call the witness, or (ii) the Court call the witness, or (iii) the Crown disclose the contents of the statements to the defence. A review of the record makes it clear that defence counsel was pressing for access to, or production of, both the tape-recorded and written statements and was not pressing the alternative requests. In support of this motion, counsel for the defendant indicated that Ms. Lineham refused to speak to him or his staff when they attempted to interview her about the contents of the statements. Crown counsel did not provide any basis for resisting production other than to say that in his view the potential witness was not worthy of credit.

The trial judge dismissed the application. Brennan J. ruled that under the circumstances there was no obligation on the Crown to call the witness and that there was no obligation on the Crown to disclose the contents of the statements. The trial proceeded, and the accused was found guilty of all twenty-seven counts charged. A conditional stay was entered with respect to the thirteen theft counts. The Alberta Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal from conviction without issuing reasons. Leave to appeal to this Court was granted on the disclosure issue.

During argument before this Court, an application was made by the Crown to adduce the statements and the tape as fresh evidence. This application was rejected. The principal basis for the rejection was that at this stage it would be impossible to determine whether the statements would have been material to the defence if produced at trial.

2. Crown's Obligation to Disclose

The circumstances which give rise to this case are testimony to the fact that the law with respect to the duty of the Crown to disclose is not settled. A number of cases have addressed some aspects of the subject. See, for example, Cunliffe v. Law Society of British Columbia (1984), 1984 CanLII 537 \(BC CA\), 40 C.R. (3d) 67 (B.C.C.A.); Savion v. The Queen (1980), 1980 CanLII 2872 \(ON CA\), 13 C.R. (3d) 259 (Ont. C.A.); R. v. Bourget (1987), 1987 CanLII 208 \(SK CA\), 56 C.R. (3d) 97 (Sask. C.A.). No case in this Court has made a comprehensive examination of the subject. The Law Reform Commission of Canada, in a 1974 working paper titled Criminal Procedure: Discovery (the "1974 Working Paper") and a 1984 report titled Disclosure by the Prosecution (the "1984 Report"), recommended comprehensive schemes regulating disclosure by the Crown but no legislative action has been taken implementing the proposals. Apart from the limited legislative response contained in s. 603 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, enacted in the 1953-54 overhaul of the Code (which itself condensed pre-existing provisions), legislators have been content to leave the development of the law in this area to the courts.

Production and discovery were foreign to the adversary process of adjudication in its earlier history when the element of surprise was one of the accepted weapons in the arsenal of the adversaries. This applied to both criminal and civil proceedings. Significantly, in civil proceedings this aspect of the adversary process has long since disappeared, and full discovery of documents and oral examination of parties and even witnesses are familiar features of the practice. This change resulted from acceptance of the principle that justice was better served when the element of surprise was eliminated from the trial and the parties were prepared to address issues on the basis of complete information of the case to be met. Surprisingly, in criminal cases in which the liberty of the subject is usually at stake, this aspect of the adversary system has lingered on. While the prosecution bar has generally co-operated in making disclosure on a voluntary basis, there has been considerable resistance to the enactment of comprehensive rules which would make the practice mandatory. This may be attributed to the fact that proposals for reform in this regard do not provide for reciprocal disclosure by the defence (see 1974 Working Paper at pp. 29-31; 1984 Report at pp. 13-15; Marshall Commission Report, infra, Vol. 1, at pp. 242-44).

It is difficult to justify the position which clings to the notion that the Crown has no legal duty to disclose all relevant information. The arguments against the existence of such a duty are groundless while those in favour, are, in my view, overwhelming. The suggestion that the duty should be reciprocal may deserve consideration by this Court in the future but is not a valid reason for absolving the Crown of its duty. The contrary contention fails to take account of the fundamental difference in the respective roles of the prosecution and the defence. In Boucher v. The Queen, 1954 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1955] S.C.R. 16, Rand J. states, at pp. 23-24:

It cannot be over-emphasized that the purpose of a criminal prosecution is not to obtain a conviction, it is to lay before a jury what the Crown considers to be credible evidence relevant to what is alleged to be a crime. Counsel have a duty to see that all available legal proof of the facts is presented: it should be done firmly and pressed to its legitimate strength but it must also be done fairly. The role of prosecutor excludes any notion of winning or losing; his function is a matter of public duty than which in civil life there can be none charged with greater personal responsibility. It is to be efficiently performed with an ingrained sense of the dignity, the seriousness and the justness of judicial proceedings.

I would add that the fruits of the investigation which are in the possession of counsel for the Crown are not the property of the Crown for use in securing a conviction but the property of the public to be used to ensure that justice is done. In contrast, the defence has no obligation to assist the prosecution and is entitled to assume a purely adversarial role toward the prosecution. The absence of a duty to disclose can, therefore, be justified as being consistent with this role.

Other grounds advanced by advocates of the absence of a general duty to disclose all relevant information are that it would impose onerous new obligations on the Crown prosecutors resulting in increased delays in bringing accused persons to trial. This ground is not supported by the material in the record. As I have already observed, disclosure is presently being made on a voluntary basis. The extent of disclosure varies from province to province, from jurisdiction to jurisdiction and from prosecutor to prosecutor. The adoption of uniform, comprehensive rules for disclosure by the Crown would add to the work-load of some Crown counsel but this would be offset by the time saved which is now spent resolving disputes such as this one surrounding the extent of the Crown's obligation and dealing with matters that take the defence by surprise. In the latter case an adjournment is frequently the result of non-disclosure or more time is taken by a defence counsel who is not prepared. There is also compelling evidence that much time would be saved and therefore delays reduced by reason of the increase in guilty pleas, withdrawal of charges and shortening or waiver of preliminary hearings. The 1984 Report (at pp. 6-9) refers to several experimental projects which were established after the publication of the 1974 Working Paper in order to test the viability of pre-trial disclosure. The result of these experiments, and in particular the Montreal experiment, which was the most exhaustively evaluated, was that there was a significant increase in the number of cases settled and pleas of guilty entered or charges withdrawn.

In England, under the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 (U.K.), 1967, c. 80, a "packet" of material is furnished to defence counsel. The provision of such material has led to a reduction in the length and number of preliminary hearings in that jurisdiction: Report of the Special Committee on Preliminary Hearings, Bench and Bar Council of Ontario (1982), at pp. 12-15.

Refusal to disclose is also justified on the ground that the material will be used to enable the defence to tailor its evidence to conform with information in the Crown's possession. For example, a witness may change his or her testimony to conform with a previous statement given to the police or counsel for the Crown. I am not impressed with this submission. All forms of discovery are subject to this criticism. There is surely nothing wrong in a witness refreshing his or her memory from a previous statement or document. The witness may even change his or her evidence as a result. This may rob the cross-examiner of a substantial advantage but fairness to the witness may require that a trap not be laid by allowing the witness to testify without the benefit of seeing contradictory writings which the prosecutor holds close to the vest. The principle has been accepted that the search for truth is advanced rather than retarded by disclosure of all relevant material.

Finally, it is suggested that disclosure may put at risk the security and safety of persons who have provided the prosecution with information. No doubt measures must occasionally be taken to protect the identity of witnesses and informers. Protection of the identity of informers is covered by the rules relating to informer privilege and exceptions thereto (see Marks v. Beyfus (1890), 25 Q.B.D. 494 (C.A.); R. v. Scott, 1990 CanLII 27 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 979), and any rules with respect to disclosure would be subject to this and other rules of privilege. With respect to witnesses, persons who have information that may be evidence favourable to the accused will have to have their identity disclosed sooner or later. Even the identity of an informer is subject to this fact of life by virtue of the "innocence exception" to the informer privilege rule (Marks v. Beyfus, supra, at pp. 498-99; R. v. Scott, supra, at p. 996; Bisaillon v. Keable, 1983 CanLII 26 (SCC), [1983] 2 S.C.R. 60, at p. 93; Solicitor General of Canada v. Royal Commission of Inquiry (Health Records in Ontario), 1981 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 494). It will, therefore, be a matter of the timing of the disclosure rather than whether disclosure should be made at all. The prosecutor must retain a degree of discretion in respect of these matters. The discretion, which will be subject to review, should extend to such matters as excluding what is clearly irrelevant, withholding the identity of persons to protect them from harassment or injury, or to enforce the privilege relating to informers. The discretion would also extend to the timing of disclosure in order to complete an investigation. I shall return to this subject later in these reasons.

This review of the pros and cons with respect to disclosure by the Crown shows that there is no valid practical reason to support the position of the opponents of a broad duty of disclosure. Apart from the practical advantages to which I have referred, there is the overriding concern that failure to disclose impedes the ability of the accused to make full answer and defence. This common law right has acquired new vigour by virtue of its inclusion in s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms as one of the principles of fundamental justice. (See Dersch v. Canada (Attorney General), 1990 CanLII 3820 (SCC), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1505, at p. 1514.) The right to make full answer and defence is one of the pillars of criminal justice on which we heavily depend to ensure that the innocent are not convicted. Recent events have demonstrated that the erosion of this right due to non-disclosure was an important factor in the conviction and incarceration of an innocent person. In the Royal Commission on the Donald Marshall, Jr., Prosecution, Vol. 1: Findings and Recommendations (1989) (the "Marshall Commission Report"), the Commissioners found that prior inconsistent statements were not disclosed to the defence. This was an important contributing factor in the miscarriage of justice which occurred and led the Commission to state that "anything less than complete disclosure by the Crown falls short of decency and fair play" (Vol. 1 at p. 238). The Commission recommended an extensive regime of disclosure of which the key provisions are as follows (Vol. 1 at p. 243):

- 2(1) Without request, the accused is entitled, before being called upon to elect the mode of trial or to plead to the charge of an indictable offence, whichever comes first, and thereafter:
- (a) to receive a copy of his criminal record;
 - (b) to receive a copy of any statement made by him to a person in authority and recorded in writing or to inspect such a statement if it has been recorded by electronic means; and to be informed of the nature and content of any verbal statement alleged to have been made by the accused to a person in authority and to be supplied with any memoranda in existence pertaining thereto;
 - (c) to inspect anything that the prosecutor proposes to introduce as an exhibit and, where practicable, receive copies thereof;
 - (d) to receive a copy of any statement made by a person whom the prosecutor proposes to call as a witness or anyone who may be called as a witness, and recorded in writing or, in the absence of a statement, a written summary of the anticipated testimony of the proposed witness, or anyone who may be called as a witness;
 - (e) to receive any other material or information known to the Crown and which tends to mitigate or negate the defendant's guilt as to the offence charged, or which would tend to reduce his punishment therefor, notwithstanding that the Crown does not intend to introduce such material or information as evidence;

- (f) to inspect the electronic recording of any statement made by a person whom the prosecutor proposes to call as a witness;
- (g) to receive a copy of the criminal record of any proposed witness; and
- (h) to receive, where not protected from disclosure by the law, the name and address of any other person who may have information useful to the accused, or other details enabling that person to be identified.

2(2) The disclosure contemplated in subsection (1), paragraphs (d), (e) and (h) shall be provided by the Crown and may be limited only where, upon an inter partes application by the prosecutor, supported by evidence showing a likelihood that such disclosure will endanger the life or safety of such person or interfere with the administration of justice, a justice having jurisdiction in the matter deems it just and proper.

In my opinion there is a wholly natural evolution of the law in favour of disclosure by the Crown of all relevant material. As long ago as 1951, Cartwright J. stated in Lemay v. The King, 1951 CanLII 27 \(SCC\), [1952] 1 S.C.R. 232, at p. 257:

I wish to make it perfectly clear that I do not intend to say anything which might be regarded as lessening the duty which rests upon counsel for the Crown to bring forward evidence of every material fact known to the prosecution whether favourable to the accused or otherwise.... [Emphasis added.]

This statement may have been in reference to the obligation resting on counsel for the Crown to call evidence rather than to disclose the material to the defence, but I see no reason why this obligation should not be discharged by disclosing the material to the defence rather than obliging the Crown to make it part of the Crown's case. Indeed, some of the information will be in a form that cannot be put in evidence by the Crown but can be used by the defence in cross-examination or otherwise. Production to the defence is then the only way in which the injunction of Cartwright J. can be obeyed.

In R. v. C. (M.H.) (1988), 1988 CanLII 3283 \(BC CA\), 46 C.C.C. (3d) 142 (B.C.C.A.), at p. 155, McEachern C.J.B.C. after a review of the authorities stated what I respectfully accept as a correct statement of the law. He said that: "there is a general duty on the part of the Crown to disclose all material it proposes to use at trial and especially all evidence which may assist the accused even if the Crown does not propose to adduce it". This passage was cited with approval by McLachlin J. in her reasons on behalf of the Court (1991 CanLII 94 \(SCC\), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 763). She went on to add: "This Court has previously stated that the Crown is under a duty at common law to disclose to the defence all material evidence whether favourable to the accused or not" (p. 774).

As indicated earlier, however, this obligation to disclose is not absolute. It is subject to the discretion of counsel for the Crown. This discretion extends both to the withholding of information and to the timing of disclosure. For example, counsel for the Crown has a duty to respect the rules of privilege. In the case of informers the Crown has a duty to protect their identity. In some cases serious prejudice or even harm may result to a person who has supplied evidence or information to the investigation. While it is a harsh reality of justice that ultimately any person with relevant evidence must appear to testify, the discretion extends to the timing and manner of disclosure in such circumstances. A discretion must also be exercised with respect to the relevance of information. While the Crown must err on the side of inclusion, it need not produce what is clearly irrelevant. The experience to be gained from the civil side of the practice is that counsel, as officers of the court and acting responsibly, can be relied upon not to withhold pertinent information. Transgressions with respect to this duty constitute a very serious breach of legal ethics. The initial obligation to separate "the wheat from the chaff" must therefore rest with Crown counsel. There may also be situations in which early disclosure may impede completion of an investigation. Delayed disclosure on this account is not to be encouraged and should be rare. Completion of the investigation before proceeding with the prosecution of a charge or charges is very much within the control of the Crown. Nevertheless, it is not always possible to predict events which may require an investigation to be re-opened and the Crown must have some discretion to delay disclosure in these circumstances.

The discretion of Crown counsel is, however, reviewable by the trial judge. Counsel for the defence can initiate a review when an issue arises with respect to the exercise of the Crown's discretion. On a review the Crown must justify its refusal to disclose. Inasmuch as disclosure of all relevant information is the general rule, the Crown must bring itself within an exception to that rule.

The trial judge on a review should be guided by the general principle that information ought not to be withheld if there is a reasonable possibility that the withholding of information will impair the right of the accused to make full answer and defence, unless the non-disclosure is justified by the law of privilege. The trial judge might also, in certain circumstances, conclude that the recognition of an existing privilege does not constitute a reasonable limit on the constitutional right to make full answer and defence and thus require disclosure in spite of the law of privilege. The trial judge may also review the decision of the Crown to withhold or delay production of information by reason of concern for the security or safety of witnesses or persons who have supplied information to the investigation. In such circumstances, while much leeway must be accorded to the exercise of the discretion of the counsel for the Crown with respect to the manner and timing of the disclosure, the absolute withholding of information which is relevant to the defence can only be justified on the basis of the existence of a legal privilege which excludes the information from disclosure.

The trial judge may also review the Crown's exercise of discretion as to relevance and interference with the investigation to ensure that the right to make full answer and defence is not violated. I am confident that disputes over disclosure will arise infrequently when it is made clear that counsel for the Crown is under a general duty to disclose all relevant information. The tradition of Crown counsel in this country in carrying out their role as "ministers of justice" and not as adversaries has generally been very high. Given this fact, and the obligation on defence counsel as officers of the court to act responsibly, these matters will usually be resolved without the intervention of the trial judge. When they do arise, the trial judge must resolve them. This may require not only submissions but the inspection of statements and other documents and indeed, in some cases, viva voce evidence. A voir dire will frequently be the appropriate procedure in which to deal with these matters.

Counsel for the accused must bring to the attention of the trial judge at the earliest opportunity any failure of the Crown to comply with its duty to disclose of which counsel becomes aware. Observance of this rule will enable the trial judge to remedy any prejudice to the accused if possible and thus avoid a new trial. See Caccamo v. The Queen, 1975 CanLII 11 \(SCC\), [1976] 1 S.C.R. 786. Failure to do so by counsel for the defence will be an important factor in determining on appeal whether a new trial should be ordered.

These are the general principles that govern the duty of the Crown to make disclosure to the defence. There are many details with respect to their application that remain to be worked out in the context of concrete situations. It would be neither possible nor appropriate to attempt to lay down precise rules here. Although the basic principles of disclosure will apply across the country, the details may vary from province to province and even within a province by reason of special local conditions and practices. It would, therefore, be useful if the under-utilized power conferred by s. 482 of the Criminal Code which empowers superior courts and courts of criminal jurisdiction to enact rules were employed to provide further details with respect to the procedural aspects of disclosure.

The general principles referred to herein arise in the context of indictable offences. While it may be argued that the duty of disclosure extends to all offences, many of the factors which I have canvassed may not apply at all or may apply with less impact in summary conviction offences. Moreover, the content of the right to make full answer and defence entrenched in s. 7 of the Charter may be of a more limited nature. A decision as to the extent to which the general principles of disclosure extend to summary conviction offences should be left to a case in which the issue arises in such proceedings. In view of the number and variety of statutes which create such offences, consideration would have to be given as to where to draw the line. Pending a decision on that issue, the voluntary disclosure which has been taking place through the co-operation of Crown counsel will no doubt continue. Continuation and extension of this practice may eliminate the necessity for a decision on the issue by this Court.

There are, however, two additional matters which require further elaboration of the general principles of disclosure outlined above. They are: (1) the timing of disclosure, and (2) what should be disclosed. Some detail with respect to these issues is essential if the duty to disclose is to be meaningful. Moreover, with respect to the second matter, resolution of the dispute over disclosure in this case requires a closer examination of the issue.

With respect to timing, I agree with the recommendation of the Law Reform Commission of Canada in both of its reports that initial disclosure should occur before the accused is called upon to elect the mode of trial or to plead. These are crucial steps which the accused must take which affect his or her rights in a fundamental way. It will be of great assistance to the accused to know what are the strengths and weaknesses of the Crown's case before committing on these issues. As I have pointed out above, the system will also profit from early disclosure as it will foster the resolution of many charges without trial, through increased numbers of withdrawals and pleas of guilty. The obligation to disclose will be triggered by a request by or on behalf of the accused. Such a request may be made at any time after the charge. Provided the request for disclosure has been timely, it should be complied with so as to enable the accused sufficient time before election or plea to consider the information. In the rare cases in which the accused is unrepresented, Crown counsel should advise the accused of the right to disclosure and a plea should not be taken unless the trial judge is satisfied that this has been done. At this stage, the Crown's brief will often not be complete and disclosure will be limited by this fact. Nevertheless, the obligation to disclose is a continuing one and disclosure must be completed when additional information is received.

With respect to what should be disclosed, the general principle to which I have referred is that all relevant information must be disclosed subject to the reviewable discretion of the Crown. The material must include not only that which the Crown intends to introduce into evidence but also that which it does not. No distinction should be made between inculpatory and exculpatory evidence. The attempt to make this distinction in connection with the confession rule proved to be unworkable and was eventually discarded by this Court. See Piché v. The Queen, 1970 CanLII 182 \(SCC\), [1971] S.C.R. 23, at p. 36; Rothman v. The Queen, 1981 CanLII 23 \(SCC\), [1981] 1 S.C.R. 640, at p. 645. To re-introduce the distinction here would lead to interminable controversy at trial that should be avoided. The Crown must, therefore, disclose relevant material whether it is inculpatory or exculpatory.

A special problem arises in respect to witness statements and is specifically raised in this case. There is virtually no disagreement that statements in the possession of the Crown obtained from witnesses it proposes to call should be produced. In some cases the statement will simply be recorded in notes taken by an investigator, usually a police officer. The notes or copies should be produced. If notes do not exist then a "will say" statement, summarizing the anticipated evidence of the witness, should be produced based on the information in the Crown's possession. A more difficult issue is posed with respect to witnesses and other persons whom the Crown does not propose to call. In its 1974 Working Paper, the Law Reform Commission of Canada recommended disclosure of not only the names, addresses and occupations of all "persons who have provided information to investigation or prosecution authorities" (p. 41), but the statements obtained or, if these did not exist,

"a summary of the information provided by those persons not intended to be called at trial, along with a statement of the manner in which the information in each summary has been obtained..." (p. 41). In its 1984 Report, the Commission seemed to have changed its mind. It stated (at pp. 27-28):

With respect to potential witnesses we do not recommend, on a mandatory basis, the type of thorough disclosure that we recommend with respect to proposed witnesses. Complete disclosure would entail not only the identification of such persons, but the disclosure of any statement they made and in some cases their criminal records. In our view a recommendation to this effect would be excessive and disproportionate to the needs of the defence. In many instances these people are of no use, or of marginal use, to the case for either side. Their statements are not evidence, although they may be effectively used by the prosecution for purposes of impeachment in cross-examination in the event the witness is called by the accused. Prosecutors are understandably reluctant to disclose these statements because to do so would imperil their principal utility. It is our view that the interests of the defence are adequately served by the mandatory disclosure of the identity of such persons, although we would not wish our comments to discourage prosecutors from disclosing statements and other relevant information on a voluntary basis.

The Marshall Commission Report recommended disclosure of "any statement made by a person whom the prosecutor proposes to call as a witness or anyone who may be called as a witness". Although not entirely clear, this recommendation appears to extend to anyone who has relevant information and who is either compellable or prepared to testify whether proposed to be called by the Crown or not.

This Court, in R. v. C. (M.H.), supra, dealt with the failure to disclose either the identity or statement of a person who provided relevant information to the police but who was not called as a witness. McLachlin J., speaking for the Court, indicated that failure to disclose in such cases could impair the fairness of the trial.

I am of the opinion that, subject to the discretion to which I have referred above, all statements obtained from persons who have provided relevant information to the authorities should be produced notwithstanding that they are not proposed as Crown witnesses. Where statements are not in existence, other information such as notes should be produced, and, if there are no notes, then in addition to the name, address and occupation of the witness, all information in the possession of the prosecution relating to any relevant evidence that the person could give should be supplied. I do not find the comments of the Commission in its 1984 Report persuasive. If the information is of no use then presumably it is irrelevant and will be excluded in the exercise of the discretion of the Crown. If the information is of some use then it is relevant and the determination as to whether it is sufficiently useful to put into evidence should be made by the defence and not the prosecutor. Moreover, I do not understand the Commission's statement that "[t]heir statements are not evidence". That is true of all witness statements. They themselves are not evidence but are produced not because they will be put in evidence in that form but will enable the evidence to be called viva voce. That prosecutors are reluctant to disclose statements because use of them in cross-examination is thereby rendered less effective is understandable. That is an objection to all forms of discovery and disclosure. Tactical advantage must be sacrificed in the interests of fairness and the ascertainment of the true facts of the case.

3. Application to This Case

No request was made in this case for disclosure prior to pleading or electing the mode of trial and this issue does not, therefore, arise. A request for disclosure was made during the trial for the disclosure of two statements taken subsequent to the preliminary hearing. An application for disclosure was dismissed by the trial judge on the ground that there was no obligation on the Crown to disclose the statements.

Applying the above principles, I conclude that the following errors were committed:

- (1) Counsel for the Crown misconceived his obligation to disclose the statements;
- (2) The explanation for refusal that the witness was not worthy of credit was completely inadequate to support the exercise of this discretion on the ground of irrelevance. Whether the witness is credible is for the trial judge to determine after hearing the evidence;
- (3) The trial judge ought to have examined the statements. The suggestion that this would have prejudiced the trial judge is without merit. Trial judges are frequently apprised of evidence which is ruled inadmissible. One example is a confession that fails to meet the test of voluntariness. No one would suggest that knowledge of such evidence prejudices the trial judge. We operate on the principle that a judge trained to screen out inadmissible evidence will disabuse himself or herself of such evidence;

(4)The trial judge erred in his statement of the duty to disclose on the part of the Crown.

It was submitted that the appellant was not deprived of the opportunity to make full answer and defence because he could have:

(a)interviewed the witness and obtained his own statement;

(b)called the witness, and if her evidence proved adverse, cross-examined on the basis of the preliminary hearing transcript.

With respect to (a), counsel for the appellant pointed out that the witness refused to be interviewed. In any event, even if such an interview took place, what the witness said on two prior occasions could be very material to the defence.

As for (b), counsel for the defence is entitled to know whether the witness he/she is calling will give evidence that will assist the defence or whether the witness will be adverse and necessitate an application to cross-examine on the basis of a prior inconsistent statement. The latter usually creates an undesirable atmosphere at the trial and the most that can be achieved is to impeach or destroy the credibility of the witness. See McInroy v. The Queen, 1978 CanLII 175 \(SCC\), [1979] 1 S.C.R. 588, and R. v. Mannion, 1986 CanLII 31 \(SCC\), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 272, at pp. 277-78. Most counsel faced with this prospect would likely opt not to call the witness, a matter which bears on the right to make full answer and defence.

What are the legal consequences flowing from the failure to disclose? In my opinion, when a court of appeal is called upon to review a failure to disclose, it must consider whether such failure impaired the right to make full answer and defence. This in turn depends on the nature of the information withheld and whether it might have affected the outcome. As McLachlin J. put it in R. v. C. (M.H.), supra, at. p. 776:

Had counsel for the appellant been aware of this statement, he might well have decided to use it in support of the defence that the evidence of the complainant was a fabrication. In my view, that evidence could conceivably have affected the jury's conclusions on the only real issue, the respective credibility of the complainant and the appellant.

In this case, we are told that the witness gave evidence at the preliminary hearing favourable to the defence. The subsequent statements were not produced and therefore we have no indication from the trial judge as to whether they were favourable or unfavourable. Examination of the statements, which were tendered as fresh evidence in this Court, should be carried out at trial so that counsel for the defence, in the context of the issues in the case and the other evidence, can explain what use might be made of them by the defence. In the circumstances, we must assume that non-production of the statements was an important factor in the decision not to call the witness. The absence of this evidence might very well have affected the outcome.

Accordingly, I would allow the appeal and direct a new trial at which the statements should be produced.

Appeal allowed.

In 1995, the New Brunswick Act to Amend the Provincial Court Act (“Bill 7”) abolished the system of supernumerary judges and replaced it with a panel of retired judges paid on a per diem basis. Supernumerary judges, who were judges under the Provincial Court Act, received a salary and fringe benefits equivalent to those given to judges sitting full time. Although the Provincial Court Act was silent concerning the size of the reduction in workload, supernumerary judges were normally asked to take on only about 40 percent of the usual workload of a full-time judge. Supernumerary judges in office when Bill 7 came into force were required to choose between retiring or returning to sit full time before April 1, 1995. The change was made in the interest of efficiency and flexibility, and for economic and financial reasons. The respondent R began to sit as a supernumerary judge in 1993, but his workload was not significantly reduced between 1993 and his eventual retirement. When Bill 7 became law, he had to return to full-time judicial office. He retired in 1997 and asked to be placed on the panel of retired judges. Prior to the enactment of Bill 7, R had organized his financial and personal affairs in light of the conditions applying to supernumerary judges. The respondent M began to sit as a supernumerary judge in 1988. Until 1990, his workload was not appreciably reduced, but thereafter, the reorganization of his judicial duties enabled him to spend several winters in Australia. M did not express his intention to retire before April 1, 1995, and was deemed to have resumed his duties as a full-time judge. The respondents instituted separate proceedings, successfully challenging the constitutionality of Bill 7 at trial and on appeal, arguing that it unjustifiably affected the tenure and financial security that form part of judicial independence. The respondents' claim for damages was rejected at trial. The Court of Appeal held that damages could be awarded and referred the question of the appropriate amount back to the trial judge. The respondents were awarded solicitor-client costs.

Held (Binnie and LeBel JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed in part. Bill 7 is unconstitutional.

Per L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major and Arbour JJ.: Judicial independence is essential to the achievement and proper functioning of a free, just and democratic society based on the principles of constitutionalism and the rule of law. The general test for judicial independence is to ask whether a reasonable person fully informed of all the circumstances would consider that a particular court enjoyed the necessary independent status. This requires independence in fact and a reasonable perception of independence. Only objective legal guarantees are capable of meeting this double requirement. Judicial independence has individual and institutional dimensions, and three essential characteristics: financial security, security of tenure and administrative independence. The constitutional protection of judicial independence requires the existence in fact of these essential characteristics and the maintenance of the perception that they exist. Thus, each of them must be institutionalized through appropriate legal mechanisms.

The opportunity to sit as a supernumerary was not integral to the office of a judge and eliminating that opportunity was not a removal from office. The ability to perform 40 percent of the usual duties but not to work full time should be classified as an inability to perform the duties of a judge. The elimination of the duties of supernumerary judges should be treated as a question relating to financial security. Individually, financial security requires that judges' salaries be provided for by law and that neither the executive nor the legislative branch arbitrarily encroach upon this right in a manner that affects the independence of the courts. Any measure taken by a government that affects any aspect of the remuneration conditions of judges will automatically trigger the application of the principles relating to the institutional dimension of financial security. In particular, governments have a constitutional duty to use an independent, effective and objective body for recommendations on salary reductions, increases or freezes for judges. If these recommendations are ignored, that decision must be justified, if necessary in a court of law, on the basis of a simple rationality test.

Bill 7 violates the institutional guarantees of judicial independence contained in s. 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867 and is therefore declared unconstitutional. The system of supernumerary judges constituted an undeniable economic benefit for judges of the Provincial Court appointed before Bill 7 came into force and for eventual candidates for the position of judge in the court. There is no distinction in principle between a straight salary cut and the elimination of offices that offer a clear economic benefit since both raise controversial questions of public policy and resource allocation and raise the possibility of financial manipulation. By failing to refer the question of the elimination of the office of supernumerary judge to an independent, effective and objective body, the New Brunswick government breached a fundamental duty. The lack of a grandfather clause in favour of the supernumerary judges in office and the judges of the Provincial Court appointed before Bill 7 came into force aggravates the violation.

Since the appellant did not adduce any evidence tending to show that Bill 7's constitutional shortcomings were justified under s. 1 of the Charter, Bill 7 must therefore be declared invalid even though the New Brunswick government was pursuing a perfectly legitimate purpose in trying to make certain changes to the organization of its judiciary. The declaration of invalidity applies to both the elimination of the office of supernumerary judge and its replacement by the panel of judges. Except with respect to the respondents, the declaration is suspended for six months from the date of judgment. Although the directives issued by this Court in the Provincial Court Judges Reference did not acquire their full effect until September 18, 1998, the respondents instituted their proceedings before that decision was rendered. It would be unjust if they were not allowed to take advantage of the finding of unconstitutionality due to the sequence of events.

The respondents' claim for damages is dismissed. An action for damages brought under s. 24(1) of the Charter cannot normally be combined with an action for a declaration of invalidity based on s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. In this case, the New Brunswick government did not display negligence, bad faith or wilful blindness with respect to its constitutional obligations. Nor was the Minister of Justice's failure to keep his promise to refer Bill 7 to the Law Amendments Committee an instance of bad faith that justified the damage awards.

The respondents are to have their costs throughout, on a party-and-party basis. Solicitor-client costs are not appropriate in this case.

Per Binnie and LeBel JJ. (dissenting): The Provincial Court judges in New Brunswick who elected supernumerary status did not enjoy a constitutional right to work only 40 percent of the time in exchange for 100 percent of the salary of a full-time judge.

The essential guarantees of judicial independence, including financial security, are intended for the benefit of the judged, not the judges.

Although the majority's statement of the broad principles of judicial independence was agreed with, the respondents' expectation of a reduced workload was neither spelled out in the Act nor otherwise put in a legally enforceable form. The workload varied dramatically from region to region and the bare concept of a "reduced" workload is too elastic to provide a manageable constitutional standard. The legislature was clearly not prepared to guarantee any fixed and defined benefit, or indeed any benefit at all. The doctrine of judicial independence does not protect “understandings” about specific financial benefits that are pointedly not written into the governing legislation. As the Provincial Court judges were given no guarantee in the Act, the anticipated reduced workload attaching to supernumerary status formed no part of the constitutional guarantee of judicial independence. Supernumerary status was a wholly discretionary potential benefit voluntarily conferred on the judges by the legislature, and its repeal could not and did not undermine the Provincial Court’s institutional independence.

Even if the respondents could establish all of the elements of the administrative law doctrine of legitimate expectation, it would not be of assistance since the doctrine does not apply to a body exercising purely legislative functions. Nor can it operate to entitle the respondents to a substantive as opposed to procedural remedy. Furthermore the constitutional requirement of an independent, effective and objective process mandated by the Provincial Court Judges Reference was not elaborated by this Court until two years after the amendments in issue here.

GONTHIER J. —

I. Introduction

1 This appeal primarily raises the issue of whether the abolition by the legislature of the position of supernumerary judge of the Provincial Court of New Brunswick contravenes the constitutional guarantees of judicial independence in s. 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and in the Preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867. The incidental issues that arise are whether the respondent judges should be awarded damages and whether costs should be ordered on a solicitor- client basis.

2 The Provincial Court of New Brunswick was established in 1973 by the Provincial Court Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. P-21. Section 8(1) of the Act provides that “[e]ach judge is hereby constituted a court of record and, throughout the Province, has all the powers, authority, criminal jurisdiction and quasi-criminal jurisdiction vested in a police magistrate or in two or more justices of the peace sitting and acting together, under any law or statute in force in the Province”. It accordingly has substantial criminal jurisdiction. The court is also the youth court designated by the province for the purposes of the Young Offenders Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. Y-1. Section 6 of the Provincial Court Act provides that a “judge holds office during good behaviour and may be removed from office only for misconduct, neglect of duty or inability to perform his duties”. Section 4.2 provides that a “judge shall retire at the age of 75 years”. Finally, s. 3.1 states that “[a] judge shall have the same protection and privileges as are conferred upon judges of The Court of Queen’s Bench of New Brunswick, for any act done or omitted in the execution of his or her duty”.

3 On January 1, 1988, the Act to Amend the Provincial Court Act, S.N.B. 1987, c. 45, the purpose of which was to create the office of supernumerary judge and to eliminate that of deputy judge, came into force. A judge of the Provincial Court could thereby elect to sit as a supernumerary judge if he or she met the following conditions: (i) he or she had reached the age of 65 years and had accumulated 15 years of service; or (ii) he or she had reached the age of 60 years and had accumulated 25 years of service; or, finally, (iii) he or she had reached the age of 70 years and had accumulated 10 years of service. Thus, as the conditions of eligibility for the office of supernumerary judge fully reflected the conditions of eligibility for payment of a retirement pension equivalent to 60 percent of the full salary, an additional choice was given to the judges of the Provincial Court who satisfied these conditions. They could then: retire and receive their pension; continue to sit as a full-time judge; or sit as a supernumerary judge. Section 4.1\(5\) of the Provincial Court Act provided that a supernumerary judge was to remain available in order to perform the duties assigned to him or her “from time to time” by the Chief Judge. It was understood by everyone, however, that while a supernumerary judge of the Provincial Court received a salary and fringe benefits equivalent to those given to judges sitting full time, he or she was in practice asked to take on only about 40 percent of the usual workload of a full-time judge.

4 On April 1, 1995, ss. 1 through 8 of the Act to Amend the Provincial Court Act, S.N.B. 1995, c. 6 (also called “Bill 7”), came into force. Section 2 provided for the straight abolition of the system of supernumerary judges and s. 3 provided for its replacement by a panel of retired judges sitting at the request of the Chief Judge or the Associate Chief Judge and paid on a per diem basis. Also, the supernumerary judges then in office were faced with a choice of retiring or beginning to sit full time again (s. 9(1)). They were required to give notice to the government of their decision before April 1, 1995. The legislation did not contain a so-called “grandfather” clause that would have allowed the supernumerary judges in office at that time as well as the other judges of the Provincial Court appointed before Bill 7 came into force to retain the privileges conferred upon them by law. According to the appellant, the government’s decision to abolish the position of supernumerary judge was made for reasons of efficiency and flexibility as well as for economic and financial reasons. Thus, in its plea, it stated that “[t]he repeal of the supernumerary provisions by Bill 7 was a legislative initiative undertaken in the context of overall public fiscal restraint and a reasonable attempt to improve the utilization of resources and cost effectiveness in the administration of the Provincial Court”.

5 The respondent Judge Douglas E. Rice joined the provincial judiciary on August 16, 1971. On July 2, 1992, upon reaching the age of 65 years and after sitting for more than 15 years, he was entitled to retire and to receive his pension. Rather than doing so, he decided to exercise his right to sit as a supernumerary judge, which he did starting on April 30, 1993. On April 2, 1995, after Bill 7 became law, he was forced, against his will, to return to a full-time judicial office. He finally retired on October 15, 1997 and asked to be placed on the new panel of judges paid on a per diem basis starting on December 4 of that year. In his written submissions, Judge Rice mentioned that he had organized his financial and personal affairs in light of the conditions applying to his duties as a supernumerary judge.

6 The respondent Judge Ian P. Mackin joined the provincial judiciary on October 17, 1962. On October 17, 1987, upon reaching the age of 60 years and after accumulating more than 25 years of service, he acquired the right to receive his pension. Nevertheless, on August 15, 1988, he decided, like Judge Rice, to sit as a supernumerary judge. It appears that this reorganization of his judicial duties enabled him to plan the use of his time in such a way that he was able to spend several winters in Australia. Since he did not express his intentions following the enactment of Bill 7, Judge Mackin was deemed, in accordance with s. 9(1) of the Act, to have resumed his duties as a full-time judge. He still held this office as at the date of the hearing before this Court.

7 Following the coming into force of Bill 7, the two respondents instituted separate proceedings in the New Brunswick courts. Judge Mackin officially informed the government of his intention to bring legal proceedings on April 25, 1995, while Judge Rice submitted his written pleadings on June 24, 1997. The respondents challenged the constitutionality of the legislation abolishing the position of supernumerary judge, arguing that it affected the components of tenure and financial security that form part of judicial independence. Damages and payment of solicitor-client costs were also claimed. In this Court, both cases were joined and argued at the same time.

III. Judgments Under Appeal

A. New Brunswick Court of Queen's Bench

- (1) Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance) (1998), 1998 CanLII 9800 (NB QB), 202 N.B.R. (2d) 324

8 Deschênes J. began by noting the three essential conditions (financial security, security of tenure and administrative independence) and the two dimensions (individual and institutional) of judicial independence as set out by this Court in Valente v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 673, and in Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3 (“Provincial Court Judges Reference”), in particular. He also mentioned that the judges, whether appointed before or after the creation of the position of supernumerary judge, had definitely developed certain expectations because of the existence of the position. Thus, they were able to plan their professional and financial future accordingly and the facts show that some of them acted in this way. He therefore concluded that, like their pension plan, the existence of the position of supernumerary judge constituted a genuine financial benefit for the judges of the Provincial Court.

9 On the other hand, he was of the opinion that the office of supernumerary judge also had elements that related to the condition of security of tenure, especially in the sense that a supernumerary judge continued to enjoy the same financial benefits as a full-time judge and was forced to take mandatory retirement at the age of 75. On the basis of the test developed in Valente, supra, at p. 698 — namely, that security of tenure requires “tenure . . . that is secure against interference by the Executive or other appointing authority in a discretionary or arbitrary manner” —, Deschênes J. considered, however, that the legislative abolition of the position of supernumerary judge was not equivalent, strictly speaking, to a dismissal of the supernumerary judges then in office. Consequently, the individual dimension of the condition of security of tenure had not been infringed. However, he added that in terms of both security of tenure and financial security, the issue was institutional in nature rather than individual. Thus, it is not so much the content of the impugned legislation as the process surrounding its enactment that was constitutionally dubious.

10 Starting with the finding that the office of supernumerary judge constituted a financial benefit for the judges of the Provincial Court, Deschênes J. was of the view that the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick should have submitted its decision to abolish this position to an independent, effective and objective commission in accordance with what was prescribed in the Provincial Court Judges Reference. In fact, the decision was political in nature in two respects. First, it was informed by classic objectives of general public policy: spending cuts and a more efficient administration of justice. It also raised the spectre of interference by the legislative branch in the independence of the judiciary by means of financial manipulation. As a result, approval by a commission became necessary in order to ensure that the judiciary would not let itself — or appear to let itself — be dragged onto the political stage and at the same time jeopardize its independence. In fact, if the situation were otherwise, a reasonable person informed of all the circumstances would conclude that there was an insufficient degree of independence.

11 Moreover, Deschênes J. was of the opinion that this violation of the constitutional guarantees of independence could not be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. Because the violation consisted of a failure to refer the matter to an independent, effective and objective commission, this failure itself must be demonstrably justified. The government merely raised a defence of the reasonably justified nature of the legislation. Whether the legislation was justified or not, Deschênes J. felt that the amendment had been made arbitrarily without any real consultation with the judges affected. Finally, he mentioned that the lack of a grandfather clause was unfair to the judges of the Provincial Court generally, on the one hand, and even more unfair to those judges who sat as supernumeraries, on the other.

12 Consequently, Deschênes J. declared that s. 2 of the Act to Amend the Provincial Court Act was unconstitutional, ordered that the question of the abolition of the office of supernumerary judge be referred immediately to the existing salary commission and suspended the declaration of unconstitutionality until the commission had issued a report on the question.

13 On the other hand, Deschênes J. refused to award damages to Judge Mackin for the violation of judicial independence by the provincial legislature. First, he noted that s. 24\(1\) of the Charter did not apply because Judge Mackin had not been the victim of a violation or infringement of his rights or freedoms protected by the Charter. Second, the general rule of public law, as set out in Guimond v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1996 CanLII 175 \(SCC\), [1996] 3 S.C.R. 347, states that damages will not be awarded for the enactment of legislation that is subsequently declared to be unconstitutional, except in the event of bad faith or other wrongful conduct on the part of government institutions.

14 Finally, on the question of costs, Deschênes J. stated that notwithstanding the use of disputed means, Judge Mackin was advancing the legitimate cause of protecting the independence of the judiciary and that he had been partially vindicated in this regard. He accordingly ordered that he be reimbursed for his costs on a party-and-party basis.

(2) Rice v. New Brunswick, [1998] N.B.J. No. 226 (QL)

15 Deschênes J. applied the same reasoning to the situation of Judge Rice. He also rejected Judge Rice's argument to the effect that the legislation abolishing the office of supernumerary had been enacted for ulterior or wrongful reasons.

16 Ryan J.A. viewed the actions of the provincial government as a violation of the concept of judicial independence. He began by finding that the office of supernumerary judge was a genuinely separate judicial office as opposed to a mere status or position. He then expressed the view that the elimination of the position of supernumerary judge had violated both the condition of financial security and that of security of tenure.

17 According to Ryan J.A., financial security was violated in both its individual and institutional dimensions. With respect to judges who were performing supernumerary duties at the time, their financial security was affected in its individual dimension whereas in respect of the other judges of the Provincial Court, it was affected in its institutional dimension. He also concluded that there was in fact political interference as a result of financial manipulation. By contrast, he asserted that the guarantee of security of tenure was affected only in its individual dimension because, for the supernumerary judges in office at that time, the abolition of their positions was equivalent to an arbitrary and premature removal.

18 Since there was a violation of financial security, Ryan J.A. agreed with the trial judge in stating that the case should at the very least have been submitted to an independent, effective and objective commission. However, given his further findings concerning the violation of the condition of security of tenure, he felt that a referral to the existing commission would not be sufficient and that the Act quite simply had to be declared invalid. In any event, he added that the jurisdiction of this commission — which was limited to examining salaries, pension, vacation and sick leave benefits (s. 22.03(1) of the Provincial Court Act) — did not extend to the question of the abolition of the position of supernumerary judge.

19 Moreover, Ryan J.A. felt that the legislation could not be justified under s. 1. First, he maintained that judicial independence went beyond the provisions of the Charter and that an attack on an institution that was so fundamental to the Canadian constitutional system was well and truly unjustifiable. He then referred to the arbitrary and unfair nature of the government's actions. Finally, he noted that the lack of a grandfather clause for the benefit of the supernumerary judges and the other judges of the Provincial Court precluded any claim that the violation of judicial independence was minimal.

20 Concerning the awarding of damages, Ryan J.A. noted that the case related to an exceptional situation involving a veritable attack by the legislative and executive branches against the judiciary. The government of the time could not have been oblivious to what it was doing and must have been aware of the effects its decision would have on the independence of the judiciary. He concluded accordingly that it was necessary to set aside the principle of qualified government immunity referred to in Guimond, supra. Consequently, neither negligence nor bad faith necessarily had to be established. Furthermore, there was a direct causal link between the violation of the rights of judges and the harm sustained. Thus, damages could be awarded under s. 24(1) of the Charter, or because of the duty of mutual respect owed by the different branches of government to one another. In the alternative, Ryan J.A. considered that the failure of the then-Minister of Justice to keep the promise made to the provincial judges to refer the legislation eliminating the office of supernumerary judge to the Law Amendments Committee constituted sufficient evidence of bad faith justifying the award of damages. However, he decided to refer the question of determining the appropriate amount back to the trial judge.

21 Finally, Ryan J.A. ordered that Judge Rice be paid his legal costs on a solicitor-client basis.

22 Drapeau J.A. concurred with Ryan J.A. He nevertheless made a number of comments of his own on the question of damages. He began by expressing his agreement with Ryan J.A. that evidence of bad faith was not required in order for damages to be awarded in this case. The individual dimension of judicial independence was at issue and both the public and the supernumerary judges personally bore the cost of the provincial government's decision unilaterally to abolish the office of supernumerary judge. He added that the legislation was enacted despite a clear awareness of its effects on the independence of the judiciary and on the supernumerary judges. He accordingly concurred with Ryan J.A. in finding that the traditional rules concerning the award of damages in constitutional proceedings should be set aside. Damages should be awarded not only to compensate the supernumerary judges but also to discourage any other attempt at legislative interference with judicial independence.

23 Daigle C.J.N.B. examined each of the first two conditions of judicial independence in order to determine whether they were violated by the enactment of Bill 7. His analysis focused first on the question of financial security. In his opinion, it was compromised in that the abolition of the office of supernumerary judge was likely to affect the judges' planning of the conditions for their retirement. Thus, although the situation did not involve a reduction as such in their net salary — since they retained the possibility of earning the equivalent of a full-time salary — the fact remained that the judges of the Provincial Court could legitimately rely on the existence of such a position in order to make certain plans of an economic and financial nature.

24 According to Daigle C.J.N.B., however, the guarantee of financial security was affected only in its institutional dimension. According to the principles set out in Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick had a duty to refer the question of the elimination of the office of supernumerary judge to an independent, effective and objective commission. However, he noted that there was no evidence in the case to suggest that there might have been any attempt at economic interference on the part of the legislature at the expense of the judges of the Provincial Court.

25 Daigle C.J.N.B. was, moreover, of the view that the constitutional guarantees of security of tenure were not infringed since it was possible for the supernumerary judges to resume their duties full time. An analysis of the Provincial Court Act supported him in this conclusion. First, he noted that s. 1 of the Act defined “judge” as including both a judge and a supernumerary judge. He added that s. 6 provided that a judge should hold office during good behaviour and could be removed from office only for misconduct, neglect of duty or inability to perform his duties. He also noted that a judge did not have to retire in order to become supernumerary. Rather, a supernumerary judge continued to exercise his duties as a judge of the Provincial Court until retiring. In short, Daigle C.J.N.B. found that there was no separate judicial office relating to the office of supernumerary judge. Consequently, the abolition of this position was of no consequence in terms of the security of tenure of the judges of the Provincial Court.

26 He was of the opinion, moreover, that the violation of the institutional guarantees of financial security was not justified under s. 1 of the Charter, since the government did not direct its argument to the legitimacy of its decision to ignore its duty to refer the question to an independent, effective and objective commission.

27 On the subject of damages, Daigle C.J.N.B. proceeded to apply the general rules governing the liability in tort of government institutions for enacting legislation that is subsequently declared unconstitutional. Thus, he was of the view that in such cases, damages would be awarded only in very rare instances, including where an act was passed in bad faith or for unworthy reasons. A bare allegation of unconstitutionality could not, on the other hand, justify an award of damages. In this case, not only was the refusal of the Minister of Justice to honour his promise to submit the legislative amendments to the Law Amendments Committee not alleged in the pleadings but, moreover, it does not support a finding of bad faith.

28 Daigle C.J.N.B. added that any relief under s. 24(1) of the Charter constituted a personal right that could be exercised only by a person whose fundamental rights had been violated. In this situation, only the institutional dimension of judicial independence was at issue. Furthermore, judicial independence exists for the benefit of the litigants and not for that of the judges. Finally, and in any event, he was of the opinion that a claim for damages could not succeed because the province enacted the legislation in good faith and in accordance with the constitutional teachings of the time. In fact, when Bill 7 came into force, the decision in Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, had not yet been rendered.

29 Because of the infringement of the institutional dimension of financial security, Daigle C.J.N.B. declared Bill 7 to be unconstitutional. However, he ordered a suspension of this declaration for a period of six months to allow the province to correct its approach. He refrained from referring the matter to the existing salary commission since the province could rectify the problem by other means.

30 Finally, he agreed with the trial judge's opinion that the award of costs as between solicitor and client was quite simply not appropriate in this case. As far as the appeal proceedings were concerned, since each party should, in his view, be successful in part, he would have ordered that they pay their own costs.

(2) Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Justice) (1999), 40 C.P.C. (4th) 107

31 All three judges in the Court of Appeal adopted their reasoning in Rice for the decision in Mackin.

IV. Relevant Statutory Provisions

32 Provincial Court Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. P-21 (as of March 30, 1995)

4.1(1) A judge appointed under subsection 2(1) may elect to become a supernumerary judge upon meeting the requirements under this Act.

4.1(2) Where a judge appointed under subsection 2(1) intends to become supernumerary, the judge shall give notice to the Minister of election two months prior to the effective date specified in the notice, being a day on which the judge will be eligible to so elect, and the judge shall, effective on that day, be deemed to have elected and given notice on that day.

4.1(3) Where a judge appointed under subsection 2(1) has notified the Minister of the judge's election to give up regular judicial duties and hold office only as a supernumerary judge, the judge shall upon the effective date hold the office of supernumerary judge and shall be paid the salary annexed to that office until the judge ceases to hold office.

4.1(4) A judge appointed under subsection 2(1) may elect to hold office as a supernumerary judge upon

(a) attaining the age of sixty-five years and having continued in judicial office for at least fifteen years,

(a.1) attaining the age of sixty years and having continued in judicial office for at least twenty-five years, or

(b) attaining the age of seventy years and having continued in judicial office for at least ten years.

4.1(5) A judge appointed under subsection 2(1) who has elected to hold the office of supernumerary judge shall be available to perform such judicial duties as may be assigned to the judge from time to time by the chief judge or associate chief judge.

6. Subject to this Act, a judge holds office during good behaviour and may be removed from office only for misconduct, neglect of duty or inability to perform his duties.

An Act to Amend the Provincial Court Act, S.N.B. 1995, c. 6

1 Subsection 1(1) of the Provincial Court Act, chapter P-21 of the Revised Statutes, 1973, is amended in the definition "judge" by striking out "and a supernumerary judge".

2 Section 4.1 of the Act is repealed.

9(1) A judge who is a supernumerary judge under the Provincial Court Act immediately before the commencement of this section shall elect, before April 1, 1995, whether to resume the duties of judicial office on a full-time basis or to retire.

9(2) An election by a judge under subsection (1) shall be in writing to the Minister of Justice and shall be effective as of April 1, 1995, if no date is specified in the election, or upon the date specified in the election, whichever is the earlier.

9(3) If a judge fails to make an election under subsection (1) or if the Minister of Justice fails to receive a notice in writing before April 1, 1995, from a judge pursuant to subsection (2), the judge shall be deemed to have resumed the duties of judicial office on a full-time basis in accordance with the Provincial Court Act, effective April 1, 1995.

V. Issues

33 On December 12, 2000, the following constitutional questions were stated:

1. Does An Act to Amend the Provincial Court Act, S.N.B. 1995, c. 6, which repealed the supernumerary scheme for Provincial Court judges in New Brunswick, interfere with the judicial tenure and financial security of members of the Provincial Court and thereby violate in whole or in part the principle of judicial independence as guaranteed by:
 - (a) the Preamble of the Constitution Act, 1867, or
 - (b) s. 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?
2. Does An Act to Amend the Provincial Court Act, S.N.B. 1995, c. 6, which repealed the supernumerary scheme for Provincial Court judges in New Brunswick, and which was enacted without reference to an independent remuneration commission, thereby violate in whole or in part the principle of judicial independence as guaranteed by:
 - (a) the Preamble of the Constitution Act, 1867, or
 - (b) s. 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?
3. If the answer to question 1(b) or question 2(b) is yes, is the Act demonstrably justified as a reasonable limit prescribed by law under s. 1 of the Charter?

VI. Analysis

A. Constitutional Questions

(1) Introduction: Judicial Independence

34 Judicial independence is essential to the achievement and proper functioning of a free, just and democratic society based on the principles of constitutionalism and the rule of law.

Within the Canadian Constitution, this fundamental value has its source in s. 11(d) of the Charter and in the Preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, which states that the Constitution of Canada shall be “similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom”. It was in Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, at paras. 82 et seq., that this Court explained in detail the constitutional foundations and scope of judicial independence.

35 Generally speaking, the expanded role of the judge as an adjudicator of disputes, interpreter of the law and guardian of the Constitution requires that he or she be completely independent of any other entity in the performance of his or her judicial functions. Such a view of the concept of independence may be found in art. 2.02 of the Universal Declaration on the Independence of Justice (reproduced in S. Shetreet and J. Deschênes, eds., Judicial Independence: The Contemporary Debate (1985), 447, at p. 450), which states:

Judges individually shall be free, and it shall be their duty, to decide matters before them impartially, in accordance with their assessment of the facts and their understanding of the law without any restrictions, influences, inducements, pressures, threats or interferences, direct or indirect, from any quarter or for any reason.
[Emphasis added.]

The adoption of a broad definition of judicial independence by this Court was confirmed, moreover, in Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, at para. 130, where Lamer C.J., for the majority, stated the following:

Finally, although I have chosen to emphasize that judicial independence flows as a consequence of the separation of powers, because these appeals concern the proper constitutional relationship among the three branches of government in the context of judicial remuneration, I do not wish to overlook the fact that judicial independence also operates to insulate the courts from interference by parties to litigation and the public generally: Lippé, supra, at pp. 152 et seq., per Gonthier J. [Emphasis added.]

36 On the other hand, in order for a judge to remain as far as possible sheltered from pressure and interference from all sources, he or she “should be removed from financial or business entanglement likely to affect or rather to seem to affect him in the exercise of his judicial functions” (S. Shetreet, “Judicial Independence: New Conceptual Dimensions and Contemporary Challenges”, in Shetreet and Deschênes, op. cit., 590, at p. 599).

37 The concept of independence accordingly refers essentially to the nature of the relationship between a court and others. This relationship must be marked by a form of intellectual separation that allows the judge to render decisions based solely on the requirements of the law and justice. The legal standards governing judicial independence, which are the sources governing the creation and protection of the independent status of judges and the courts, serve to institutionalize this separation. Moreover, the Preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867 and s. 11(d) of the Charter give them a fundamental status by placing them at the highest level of the legal hierarchy.

38 The general test for the presence or absence of independence consists in asking whether a reasonable person who is fully informed of all the circumstances would consider that a particular court enjoyed the necessary independent status (Valente, supra, at p. 689; Committee for Justice and Liberty v. National Energy Board, 1976 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 369). Emphasis is placed on the existence of an independent status, because not only does a court have to be truly independent but it must also be reasonably seen to be independent. The independence of the judiciary is essential in maintaining the confidence of litigants in the administration of justice. Without this confidence, the Canadian judicial system cannot truly claim any legitimacy or command the respect and acceptance that are essential to it. In order for such confidence to be established and maintained, it is important that the independence of the court be openly “communicated” to the public. Consequently, in order for independence in the constitutional sense to exist, a reasonable and well-informed person should not only conclude that there is independence in fact, but also find that the conditions are present to provide a reasonable perception of independence. Only objective legal guarantees are capable of meeting this double requirement.

39 As was explained in Valente, supra, at p. 687, and in the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, at paras. 118 et seq., the independence of a particular court includes an individual dimension and an institutional dimension. The former relates especially to the person of the judge and involves his or her independence from any other entity, whereas the latter relates to the court to which the judge belongs and involves its independence from the executive and legislative branches of the government. The rules relating to these dimensions result from somewhat different imperatives. Individual independence relates to the purely adjudicative functions of judges — the independence of a court is necessary for a given dispute to be decided in a manner that is just and equitable — whereas institutional independence relates more to the status of the judiciary as an institution that is the guardian of the Constitution and thereby reflects a profound commitment to the constitutional theory of the separation of powers. Nevertheless, in each of its dimensions, independence is designed to prevent any undue interference in the judicial decision-making process, which must be based solely on the requirements of law and justice.

40 Within these two dimensions will be found the three essential characteristics of judicial independence set out in Valente, supra, namely financial security, security of tenure and administrative independence. Together, these characteristics create the relationship of independence that must exist between a court and any other entity. Their maintenance also contributes to the general perception of the court’s independence. Moreover, these three characteristics must also be seen to be protected. In short, the constitutional protection of judicial independence requires both the existence in fact of these essential characteristics and the maintenance of the perception that they exist. Thus, each of them must be institutionalized through appropriate legal mechanisms.

41 This being the case, it remains for me to determine whether the elimination of the office of supernumerary judge in the Provincial Court of New Brunswick violates judicial independence by breaching one or more of its essential characteristics in either of its dimensions.

(2) Elimination of the Office of Supernumerary Judge and Judicial Independence

(a) Security of Tenure

42 In Valente, supra, at p. 695-96, it was found that in its individual dimension, the security of tenure provided for provincial court judges in Canada generally required that they may not be dismissed by the executive before the age of retirement except for misconduct or disability, following a judicial inquiry. Similarly, in New Brunswick, s. 4.2 of the Provincial Court Act provides that a judge shall retire at the age of 75 and ss. 6.1 to 6.13 provide that a judicial inquiry shall be held in order to adjudicate on the merits of a recommendation that a judge be removed from office.

43 It was stated further that, in order for the individual dimension of security of tenure to be constitutionally protected, it was sufficient that a judge could be removed from office only for a reason relating to his or her capacity to perform his or her judicial duties (Valente, supra, at p. 697). Any arbitrary removal is accordingly prohibited. In this context, s. 6 of the Provincial Court Act seems to create adequate protection for judges of the Provincial Court of New Brunswick by indicating that “a judge holds office during good behaviour and may be removed from office only for misconduct, neglect of duty or inability to perform his duties”.

44 In the first place, therefore, it is necessary to determine whether the elimination of the office of supernumerary judge constituted an arbitrary removal of the respondent judges from office. To this end, the nature of their office must be examined and defined on the basis of the relevant legislation.

45 In order to find that there was a removal from office, the judges in the majority in the Court of Appeal relied first on the proposition that the functions of the supernumerary judge constituted a genuine separate judicial office, as opposed to a mere status. Therefore, according to Ryan J.A., the characteristic of security of tenure would apply separately to this office and consequently, a supernumerary judge could not be removed from office otherwise than for a reason linked to his or her ability to perform the duties of that office and following a judicial inquiry. Since the respondents had their offices as supernumerary judges abolished by legislation with no reason given that related to their ability to perform their duties and without any form of inquiry, not only was there a removal from office but this removal was arbitrary and unconstitutional in nature.

46 With the greatest respect, it is my opinion that this reasoning is ill-founded to the extent that the interpretation of the relevant legislation as a whole does not support its essential premise. In my judgment, there was simply no removal from the judicial office held by the respondent judges in this case.

First, s. 1 of the Provincial Court Act defined “judge” as including both a judge and a supernumerary judge. This means that, in electing to become a supernumerary, a judge nevertheless remained a judge of the Provincial Court. This finding is supported by the fact that a judge did not previously have to retire in order to become supernumerary. Rather, the judge decided to exercise his or her duties as a judge of the Provincial Court under different terms until he or she retired. Finally, it must be borne in mind that s. 9(1) of Bill 7 gave the supernumerary judges the possibility of resuming their duties full time. Obviously, therefore, there simply was no separate office linked to the position of supernumerary judge. Essentially, this position merely involved a reorganization of the workload of a judge of the Provincial Court. Consequently, there never was a real removal from office in this case and Judges Mackin and Rice at all times retained their security of tenure as judges of the Provincial Court.

Moreover, it was suggested that the possibility of sitting as a supernumerary judge was an integral part of the office of Provincial Court judge so that the elimination of this position could affect its integrity. The security of tenure of all provincial judges appointed before Bill 7 came into force would therefore have been infringed since the conditions applying to their office would have been fundamentally altered. Here again, I cannot accept such an argument. It seems to me to be a clear exaggeration to suggest that the possibility that a judge of the Provincial Court can sit as a supernumerary is an integral part of his main office and that the elimination of this possibility is therefore equivalent to removal from office. As I noted earlier, I view the definition of the duties of a supernumerary judge as pertaining to the office of a judge of the Provincial Court and not to a separate judicial office. The question as to whether, in certain circumstances, the conditions applying to a particular judicial office can be changed to the point where they are equivalent to a removal from office does not therefore arise in this case.

Finally, it was argued that the elimination of the position of supernumerary judge was contrary to security of tenure in that a judge able to perform 40 percent of the usual duties but unable to work full time could be forced to take early retirement. In my opinion, such a possibility should be classified as an inability to perform the duties of a Provincial Court judge rather than as a removal of that judge from office. Security of tenure within the meaning of the Constitution is therefore not affected. In short, the elimination of the duties of supernumerary judges affects first and foremost the definition of the duties of Provincial Court judges and must accordingly be treated as a question relating to the protection of financial security rather than security of tenure.

(b) Financial Security

(i) Overview

50 In Valente, supra, only the individual dimension of financial security was considered in connection with the determination of salaries by the executive branch. It was determined at that time that the constitutional requirements in this regard were limited to ensuring that the judges' salaries were provided for by law and that the executive could not arbitrarily encroach upon this right in a manner that affected the independence of the courts. In Beauregard v. Canada, 1986 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 56, it was confirmed that this obligation also applied to the legislative branch.

51 In the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, at para. 121, it was clearly indicated that the financial security of provincial court judges also had an institutional dimension, shaping the relationships between the judiciary, on the one hand, and the executive and legislative branches, on the other.

52 Although it is a creation of the legislature, the provincial judiciary has important constitutional functions to perform, especially in terms of what it may do: ensure respect for the primacy of the Constitution under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982; provide relief for violations of the Charter under s. 24; apply ss. 2 and 7 to 14 of the Charter; ensure compliance with the division of powers within Confederation under ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867; and render decisions concerning the rights of the aboriginal peoples protected by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. In short, given the position occupied by the provincial courts within the Canadian legal system, the Constitution requires them to remain financially independent of the other political branches (Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, at paras. 124-30).

53 We are here dealing with a situation in which the New Brunswick legislature decided to make changes in the organization of its judiciary by means of a statute applying to all the judges of the Provincial Court. Such an exercise of power affects interactions of a purely institutional nature between the legislative and judicial branches and is accordingly likely to be subject to the requirements of the institutional dimension of financial security. A violation of the institutional aspect of financial security will, furthermore, have a concrete impact on the financial security of all judges of the Provincial Court.

54 As was stated in Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, at para. 131, each of the elements of financial independence at the institutional level results from the constitutional imperative that, as far as possible, the relationship between the judiciary and the other two branches of government should be depoliticized. This imperative makes it necessary for the judiciary to be protected against political interference from the other branches through financial manipulation and for it to be seen to be so protected. Furthermore, one must ensure that it does not become involved in political debates concerning the remuneration of persons paid out of public funds. In fact, the judge's role as a constitutional adjudicator requires that it be isolated therefrom and be seen to be so.

55 On the other hand, one must seek to enhance the impartiality of judges as well as the perception of such impartiality by minimizing their involvement in questions concerning their own remuneration while preventing the other branches of government from using their control of public funds in order to interfere with their adjudicative independence.

56 In the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, at paras. 133-35, three elements or principles were found to be essential to the institutional dimension of financial security.

57 First, the salaries of provincial court judges may generally be reduced, increased or frozen but in order to do this, governments must resort to a body (usually called a “salary commission”) that is independent, effective and objective, and that will make recommendations. The provincial governments have a constitutional duty to make use of this process. The existence of such a body makes it possible for the legislative or executive branch to determine the level of remuneration while allaying the possibility of interference by way of financial manipulation or the perception that such a possibility of interference exists. The recommendations of this commission are not binding on the executive or the legislature. However, they may not be ignored lightly. If a decision is made to ignore them, the decision must be justified, if necessary, in a court of law on the basis of a simple rationality test. Such a process accordingly promotes the impartiality of the judiciary and its appearance by ensuring that the financial security of judges will not be at the mercy of political meddling.

58 Further, any negotiation — in the sense of trade-offs — concerning the salaries of the judges between a member or representative of the judiciary, on the one hand, and a member or representative of the executive or legislative branch, on the other hand, is prohibited. Such negotiations are fundamentally inconsistent with the independence of the judiciary. First, they are inevitably political as a result of the intrinsic nature of the question of salaries paid from the public purse. Second, the holding of such negotiations would undermine the perception of the independence of the judiciary since the jurisdiction of the provincial courts entails that the government is frequently a party to disputes before those courts and salary negotiations are likely to give rise to certain obvious fears concerning the independence of the judiciary arising from the attitude of the parties to these negotiations.

59 Finally, reductions in the salaries of judges must not result in lowering these below the minimum required by the office of judge. Public trust in the independence of the judiciary would be weakened if the salaries paid to judges were so low that they led people to think that the judges were vulnerable to political or other pressures through financial manipulation. In order to counter the possibility that government inaction could function as a means of financial manipulation because the salaries of judges in constant dollars would be allowed to decline as a result of inflation and also to counter the possibility that these salaries would fall below the minimum required to ensure the independence of the judiciary, the salary commission must convene when a specified period has passed since its last report was submitted in order to examine the adequacy of the judges' salaries in light of the cost of living and other relevant factors.

60 Thus, the need to ensure that the process is depoliticized imposes negative and positive obligations on the legislative and executive branches because not only must they refrain from using their financial powers to influence judges in the performance of their duties, but they must also actively protect the independence of the judiciary by enacting appropriate legislative and institutional instruments.

61 The Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, at para. 136, also indicates that these principles apply to the pensions and other benefits given to judges. Hence, any measure taken by government that affects any aspect of the remuneration conditions of judges will automatically trigger the application of the principles relating to the institutional dimension of financial security.

62 It is now necessary to examine whether the functions of supernumerary judges and their abolition have an impact on the financial security of judges of the Provincial Court.

(ii) Application to the Instant Case

1. Does the Elimination of the Office of Supernumerary Judge Violate the Financial Security of the Judges of the Provincial Court?

63 It appears that when it was created, the office of supernumerary judge was thought to provide a certain flexibility within the organization of the provincial judicial system. On the other hand, it enabled the government to benefit from the expertise of experienced judges while paying only the difference between a full salary and the pension that would in any event have been paid to a judge who had elected to retire. Hence, the conditions of eligibility for the office of supernumerary judge have always accurately reflected those of eligibility for a retirement pension. Moreover, these duties have already been described as creating a “useful bridge towards retirement” (M. L. Friedland, A Place Apart: Judicial Independence and Accountability in Canada (1995), at p. 46 (emphasis added)).

64 For a judge of the Provincial Court of New Brunswick who had met certain conditions of age and seniority, the possibility of becoming a supernumerary judge was added to those of retiring and receiving a pension, on the one hand, and continuing to sit full time, on the other hand. Clearly, the only way to make such a position attractive was to offer conditions that were more advantageous than those linked to retirement or full-time duties.

Normally, a judge of the Provincial Court of New Brunswick who became a supernumerary judge enjoyed a substantial reduction in his or her workload while receiving a full salary. However, the Provincial Court Act was silent concerning the relative size of this reduction and, in s. 4.1(5), merely left this decision to the Chief Judge of the Court. In theory, therefore, this reduction could have been minimal or even non-existent. That was, in fact, what happened in the case of Judge Rice, who had to sit full time despite his supernumerary status because of the shortage of judges. However, if such a practice had been widespread, it would almost certainly have eliminated access to the office of supernumerary judge as a reasonable choice for a judge who met the conditions of eligibility. The government of New Brunswick would then have been deprived of the benefits of flexibility and expertise contemplated when it created this office. Consequently, I do not believe that it is possible to examine the nature of the office of supernumerary judge on the basis of such an abstract reading of s. 4.1(5) of the Act that we end up completely ignoring the factual and legal contexts in which this provision was enacted. Moreover, by its very wording, which indicates that a supernumerary judge “shall be available to perform such judicial duties as may be assigned to the judge from time to time by the chief judge or associate chief judge” (emphasis added), the Act appears to suggest a reduced workload.

In my opinion, therefore, it is necessary to take into account the uncontradicted evidence showing that it was understood by everyone that a supernumerary judge had to perform approximately 40 percent of the usual workload of a judge of the Provincial Court. The retirement pension received by a judge of the Provincial Court was equivalent to 60 percent of the full salary. The reasoning behind this understanding was accordingly that it was logical for a judge who was eligible for a pension equivalent to 60 percent of his or her full salary to be given an opportunity to perform 40 percent of his or her former duties in return for a full salary.

In light of what has been said above, it is my view that the system of supernumerary judges constituted an undeniable economic benefit for all the judges of the Provincial Court appointed before Bill 7 came into force and for eventual candidates for the position of judge in the court. In other words, this type of benefit was certainly taken into consideration both by sitting judges and by candidates for the office of judge in planning their economic and financial affairs. Thus, it seems to me to be wrong to suggest that the abolition of the office of supernumerary judge did not violate the collective dimension of the financial security of the Provincial Court of New Brunswick. At the very least, this office provided a right to a potential benefit of a reduced workload, the extent of which was established by the Chief Judge, that is by judicial authority independent of the Executive or other government authority. Its abolition constituted a change in the conditions of office which were advantageous to the judges by denying them the option of being eligible for a less demanding workload to be determined in a manner respectful of the institutional independence of the court. This benefit was likely to be substantial, impacting the quality and style of life of judges in their latter years. The issue here is not whether this benefit is a sufficient guarantee of financial security or judicial independence, as was the issue in Valente to which my colleague Binnie J. refers, but whether the supernumerary status provided a substantial benefit pertaining to financial security likely to give rise to negotiation and politicization.

In my opinion, there is no distinction in principle between a straight salary cut and the elimination of offices that offer a clear economic benefit. Both give rise to the political aspects mentioned in the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, that is to say they raise controversial questions of public policy and resource allocation and raise the possibility of interference by the other branches of government in the independence of the judiciary by means of financial manipulation. Indeed, as my colleague Binnie J. states, supernumerary status was adopted in New Brunswick after lengthy discussions between the government and the Provincial Court judges. Thus, the elimination of the office of supernumerary judge violates the institutional dimension of the financial security of judges of the Provincial Court of New Brunswick. A similar conclusion was drawn, moreover, by Parrett J. in British Columbia (Provincial Court Judge) v. British Columbia (1997), 1997 CanLII 4364 (BC SC), 40 B.C.L.R. (3d) 289 (S.C.), at pp. 314-15.

In short, I consider that the opinion stated by this Court in the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, requires that any change made to the remuneration conditions of judges at any given time must necessarily pass through the institutional filter of an independent, effective and objective body so that the relationship between the judiciary, on the one hand, and the executive and legislative branches, on the other, remain depoliticized as far as possible. That is a structural requirement of the Canadian Constitution resulting from the separation of powers and the rule of law. By failing to refer the question of the elimination of the office of supernumerary judge to such a body, the government of New Brunswick breached this fundamental duty. The lack of a grandfather clause in favour of the supernumerary judges in office and the judges of the Provincial Court appointed before Bill 7 came into force also aggravates this initial violation. Consequently, Bill 7 must be declared invalid.

However, the foregoing reasoning must not be interpreted as negating or ossifying the exercise by the provinces of their legislative jurisdiction under s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867. While the provincial legislative assemblies have exclusive jurisdiction over “[t]he Administration of Justice in the Province, including the Constitution, Maintenance, and Organization of Provincial Courts, both of Civil and of Criminal Jurisdiction”, that jurisdiction must nevertheless be exercised in accordance with the structural principles of the Canadian Constitution, including the independence of the judiciary. In other words, the New Brunswick government was pursuing a perfectly legitimate purpose in trying to make certain changes to the organization of its judiciary for reasons of efficiency, flexibility and cost savings. In light of the impact of the elimination of the position of supernumerary judge on the financial security of Provincial Court judges, it should however have exercised its legislative jurisdiction while complying with the process of review by an independent, effective and objective body prescribed by the Constitution.

2. Justification and Section 1 of the Charter

71 As I indicated at the beginning of my analysis, judicial independence is protected by both the Preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867 and s. 11(d) of the Charter. Thus, not only is it a right enjoyed by a party subject to the threat of criminal proceedings but it is also a fundamental element underlying the very operations of the administration of justice. In other words, judicial independence functions as a prerequisite for giving effect to a litigant's rights including the fundamental rights guaranteed in the Charter.

72 Given the vital role played by judicial independence within the Canadian constitutional structure, the standard application of s. 1 of the Charter could not alone justify an infringement of that independence. A more demanding onus lies on the government. Thus, in the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, at para. 137, it was indicated that the elements of the institutional dimension of financial security did not have to be followed in cases of dire and exceptional financial emergencies caused by extraordinary circumstances such as the outbreak of war or imminent bankruptcy. In this case, it is clear that such circumstances did not exist in New Brunswick at the time when Bill 7 was passed. Moreover, no arguments were made by the appellant in this regard.

73 Since it had been decided in the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, to resolve the questions in dispute solely on the basis of s. 11(d) of the Charter, the question as to whether the violation of this provision could be justified under s. 1 was examined (paras. 277 et seq.). In this process, it was stated: (i) that the government had to adduce evidence to justify the violation; and (ii) that it was the fact that the independent, effective and objective process had been circumvented that had to be justified and not the content of the government measures. Although in my opinion a s. 1 analysis alone is not adequate to resolve the question as to whether the violation is justified, these principles remain applicable to the more demanding analysis required by the fundamental nature of judicial independence. In this case, the appellant did not adduce any evidence tending to show that its constitutional shortcomings were justified. Furthermore, in my judgment, the lack of a grandfather clause in Bill 7 aggravates the violation of judicial independence.

3. Appropriate Relief

74 Some of the interveners suggested that the appellant did not breach its constitutional obligations set out in the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, simply because under the directives issued by this Court on the rehearing in Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1998 CanLII 833 \(SCC\), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 3, these obligations did not acquire their full effect until September 18, 1998 while Bill 7 came into force on April 1, 1995.

75 It is true that in order to ensure continuity in the proper administration of justice, the Court decided in the rehearing of the Provincial Court Judges Reference, to suspend all aspects of the requirement relating to the judges' salary commission, including any reimbursement for past salary reductions for one year following the date of the judgment in the first reference (para. 18). This order was designed to permit the courts whose independence was at issue to function nevertheless, while the governments proceeded to establish and implement the process of review by a commission required by the first Provincial Court Judges Reference. According to the order, the requirement relating to the judges' salary commission applied for the future, effective September 18, 1998. Lamer C.J. added at para. 20:

I note that the prospectiveness of the judicial compensation requirement does not change the retroactivity of the declarations of invalidity made in this case. . . . In the rare cases in which this Court makes a prospective ruling, it has always allowed the party bringing the case to take advantage of the finding of unconstitutionality. [Emphasis added.]

76 A similar solution is appropriate in this case. The respondents instituted their legal proceedings before the Provincial Court of Judges Reference, supra, was rendered. An injustice would be perpetuated if they were not allowed to take advantage of the finding of unconstitutionality in the same way as the parties to the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, solely on the basis of this sequence of events. As I indicated in the preceding paragraph, the suspension of the requirement for a commission was ordered solely on the basis of necessity, in order to permit the provincial courts to operate in the meantime in the absence of the required level of independence. However, it was certainly not a case of a blanket suspension of the constitutional obligations explained in the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra (see Newfoundland Assn. of Provincial Court Judges v. Newfoundland (2000), 2000 NFCA 46 (CanLII), 191 D.L.R. (4th) 225 (Nfld. C.A.), at pp. 266-80 (per Green J.A.)). Also, in all fairness, I consider that the declaration of invalidity must benefit the respondents who are, for all practical purposes, in the same position as the successful parties in the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra.

77 Moreover, this declaration applies to both the elimination of the office of supernumerary judge and its replacement by a new panel of part-time judges paid on a per diem basis since it is impossible for all practical purposes to dissociate both these aspects of Bill 7 (Schachter v. Canada, 1992 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679, at pp. 710-11; Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1947 CanLII 347 (UK JCPC), [1947] A.C. 503 (P.C.), at p. 518). However, in order to fill the legal vacuum that would be created by a simple declaration of invalidity, the declaration will initially be suspended erga omnes for a period of six months to allow the government of New Brunswick to provide a solution that meets its constitutional obligations (Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1985 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721). However, it is not appropriate for this Court to dictate the approach that should be taken in order to rectify the situation. Since there is more than one way to do so, it is the government's task to determine which approach it prefers. It is also the responsibility of the government to decide whether the existing judges' salary commission established by ss. 22.01 et seq. of the Provincial Court Act may validly consider the question of the abolition of the office of supernumerary judge.

B. Other Questions

(1) Damages

78 According to a general rule of public law, absent conduct that is clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power, the courts will not award damages for the harm suffered as a result of the mere enactment or application of a law that is subsequently declared to be unconstitutional (Welbridge Holdings Ltd. v. Greater Winnipeg, 1970 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1971] S.C.R. 957; Central Canada Potash Co. v. Government of Saskatchewan, 1978 CanLII 21 (SCC), [1979] 1 S.C.R. 42). In other words “[i]nvalidity of governmental action, without more, clearly should not be a basis for liability for harm caused by the action” (K. C. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise (1958), vol. 3, at p. 487). In the legal sense, therefore, both public officials and legislative bodies enjoy limited immunity against actions in civil liability based on the fact that a legislative instrument is invalid. With respect to the possibility that a legislative assembly will be held liable for enacting a statute that is subsequently declared unconstitutional, R. Dussault and L. Borgeat confirmed in their Administrative Law: A Treatise (2nd ed. 1990), vol. 5, at p. 177, that:

In our parliamentary system of government, Parliament or a legislature of a province cannot be held liable for anything it does in exercising its legislative powers. The law is the source of duty, as much for citizens as for the Administration, and while a wrong and damaging failure to respect the law may for anyone raise a liability, it is hard to imagine that either Parliament or a legislature can as the lawmaker be held accountable for harm caused to an individual following the enactment of legislation.

However, as I stated in Guimond v. Quebec (Attorney General), supra, since the adoption of the Charter, a plaintiff is no longer restricted to an action in damages based on the general law of civil liability. In theory, a plaintiff could seek compensatory and punitive damages by way of “appropriate and just” remedy under s. 24\(1\) of the Charter. The limited immunity given to government is specifically a means of creating a balance between the protection of constitutional rights and the need for effective government. In other words, this doctrine makes it possible to determine whether a remedy is appropriate and just in the circumstances. Consequently, the reasons that inform the general principle of public law are also relevant in a Charter context. Thus, the government and its representatives are required to exercise their powers in good faith and to respect the “established and indisputable” laws that define the constitutional rights of individuals. However, if they act in good faith and without abusing their power under prevailing law and only subsequently are their acts found to be unconstitutional, they will not be liable. Otherwise, the effectiveness and efficiency of government action would be excessively constrained. Laws must be given their full force and effect as long as they are not declared invalid. Thus it is only in the event of conduct that is clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power that damages may be awarded (Crown Trust Co. v. The Queen in Right of Ontario (1986), 1986 CanLII 2725 \(ON SC\), 26 D.L.R. (4th) 41 (Ont. Div. Ct.)).

Thus, it is against this backdrop that we must read the following comments made by Lamer C.J. in Schachter, supra, at p. 720:

An individual remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter will rarely be available in conjunction with an action under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Ordinarily, where a provision is declared unconstitutional and immediately struck down pursuant to s. 52, that will be the end of the matter. No retroactive s. 24 remedy will be available.

81 In short, although it cannot be asserted that damages may never be obtained following a declaration of unconstitutionality, it is true that, as a rule, an action for damages brought under s. 24(1) of the Charter cannot be combined with an action for a declaration of invalidity based on s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

82 Applying these principles to the situation before us, it is clear that the respondents are not entitled to damages merely because the enactment of Bill 7 was unconstitutional. On the other hand, I do not find any evidence that might suggest that the government of New Brunswick acted negligently, in bad faith or by abusing its powers. Its knowledge of the unconstitutionality of eliminating the office of supernumerary judge has never been established. On the contrary, Bill 7 came into force on April 1, 1995, more than two years before this Court expressed its opinion in the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, which, it must be recognized, substantially altered the situation in terms of the institutional independence of the judiciary. Consequently, it may not reasonably be suggested that the government of New Brunswick displayed negligence, bad faith or wilful blindness with respect to its constitutional obligations at that time.

83 Furthermore, I cannot accept the statement of Ryan J.A. of the Court of Appeal that the failure of the Minister of Justice to keep his promise to refer Bill 7 to the Law Amendments Committee was an instance of bad faith that justified the awards of damages. Even if admitted to be true, such evidence is far from establishing a negligent or unreasonable attitude on the part of government. In fact, it has no probative value as to whether, in the circumstances, the legislation was enacted wrongly, for ulterior motives or with knowledge of its unconstitutionality.

84 The claim of the respondent judges for damages is accordingly dismissed.

(2) Costs

85 Although the appeal is allowed in part, the fact remains that the respondents are successful on the principal issue, namely the constitutional invalidity of the legislation in question. I would accordingly award their costs throughout.

86 At trial, the respondents were awarded party-and-party costs. In the Court of Appeal, this decision was reversed and it was decided that the government's conduct justified the award of solicitor-client costs. It is established that the question of costs is left to the discretion of the trial judge. The general rule in this regard is that solicitor-client costs are awarded only on very rare occasions, for example when a party has displayed reprehensible, scandalous or outrageous conduct (Young v. Young, 1993 CanLII 34 \(SCC\), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 3, at p. 134). Reasons of public interest may also justify the making of such an order (Friends of the Oldman River Society v. Canada (Minister of Transport), 1992 CanLII 110 \(SCC\), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 3, at p. 80).

87 Although judicial independence is a noble cause that deserves to be firmly defended, it is not appropriate in my opinion to grant such a form of costs to the respondents in this case. I would accordingly award them their costs on a party-and-party basis.

VII. Disposition

88 The appeal is allowed in part. The Act to Amend the Provincial Court Act (Bill 7) is declared unconstitutional because it violates the institutional guarantees of judicial independence contained in s. 11(d) of the Charter and the Preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867. Except with respect to the respondents, however, this declaration of unconstitutionality is suspended for a period of six months from the date of this judgment* to allow the government of New Brunswick to rectify the situation in accordance with its constitutional obligations as described in this decision and in the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra. Accordingly, the constitutional questions are answered as follows:

Answer to question 1: Yes, with respect to financial security.

Answer to question 2: Yes.

Answer to question 3: No.

89 The respondents' claim for damages is dismissed.

90 However, since the respondents were successful on the main issue, they are entitled to their costs throughout.

The reasons of Binnie and LeBel JJ. were delivered by 91 BINNIE J. (dissenting) — I have had the benefit of reading the reasons of my colleague Gonthier J. I agree with his statement of the broad principles of judicial independence but, with respect, I do not agree that supernumerary status as defined in the New Brunswick Provincial Court Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. P-21, constituted an economic benefit protected by the Constitution. The respondents’ expectation that they would work only 40 percent of the time for 100 percent of the pay of a full-time judge was neither spelled out in the Act nor otherwise put in a legally enforceable form.

92 My colleague notes “the uncontradicted evidence showing that it was understood by everyone that a supernumerary judge had to perform approximately 40 percent of the usual workload of a judge of the Provincial Court” (para. 66 (emphasis added)). I do not doubt it. It seems clear that it was thus understood by both judges and government officials. The question, however, is whether the doctrine of judicial independence protects “understandings” about specific financial benefits that are pointedly not written into the governing legislation.

93 My colleague says that judicial independence must be protected by “objective legal guarantees” (para. 38). I agree. What we have here, however, is neither objective nor a guarantee. As my colleague notes (para. 65) the repealed provision of the New Brunswick Provincial Court Act defined the workload of a supernumerary judge only in terms of being “available to perform such judicial duties as may be assigned to the judge from time to time by the chief judge or associate chief judge” (s. 4.1(5)). The problem is not simply that the extent of the discretionary benefit was not specified in the Act. The more fundamental problem is that, as I read it, the legislation guaranteed no benefit at all.

We are not dealing here with the broad unwritten principles of the Constitution. There is no general constitutional entitlement for judges to work 40 percent of the time for a 100 percent salary. What is at issue is the claim to a particular supernumerary benefit said to be voluntarily conferred by the legislature in the 1988 Act, and thereafter unconstitutionally withdrawn in 1995. The argument is that once conferred, a benefit becomes wrapped in constitutional protection and beyond legislative recall except in accordance with the independent, objective and effective procedure mandated by the Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3 (“Provincial Court Judges Reference”).

95

In this case, however, the New Brunswick legislature refused to make a reduced workload commitment in framing the supernumerary provisions of the 1988 amendments. (No one argues that such refusal was itself contrary to unwritten constitutional guarantees.) The omission of any guarantee of a reduced workload in the original 1988 amendments was plain for all to see from the outset. The legislature thereafter refused to make sufficient funds available to fund a number of new judicial appointments to permit the supernumerary scheme to work as the judges had anticipated. The budget allocation fell well short of the earlier expectations raised by government officials, but it was consistent with the legislature’s refusal throughout to provide any sort of a legislated guarantee of a reduced workload. The result was that, while a judge on supernumerary status was required by law to do whatever judicial duties were assigned by the Chief Judge, the Chief Judge was prevented by a shortage of judges from giving effect in most cases to the expectations of the judges who elected supernumerary status.

96

As the Provincial Court judges were given no guarantee in the Act, it follows that the anticipated reduced workload attaching to supernumerary status contended for by the respondents formed no part of the constitutional guarantee of judicial independence of the court of which they were members. The repeal of a potential benefit voluntarily conferred by the legislature, that was wholly discretionary as to whether in practice it produced any benefit at all, could not and in my view did not undermine their institutional independence. I would therefore allow the appeal.

Facts

97 Supernumerary status was introduced in New Brunswick by the 1987 amendments to the Act, which came into force January 1, 1988. From then until its repeal seven years later, six Provincial Court judges elected supernumerary status. Their varied work histories illustrate the basic flaw in the respondents' legal argument, namely the absence of any guaranteed benefit — let alone a 40 percent workload benefit — attaching to supernumerary status under the legislative scheme.

98 The respondent, Judge Douglas Rice, elected supernumerary status on April 30, 1993 after more than 21 years on the bench. His workload was not reduced to 40 percent of what it had been. It seems not to have been reduced significantly between 1993 and his eventual retirement.

99 In the companion case the respondent, Judge Ian Mackin elected to become supernumerary on August 15, 1988 after 25 years on the bench. In the initial period his workload did not reduce appreciably either but thereafter he eased off, travelled extensively, and for at least five years prior to 1995 was able to winter for six months or so in Australia while drawing 100 percent of the salary of a Provincial Court judge on regular status.

100 Judge James D. Harper, one of the other judges who elected supernumerary status continued, like Judge Rice, more or less at full throttle. Some of the supernumerary judges he thought did “little or no work”, i.e., much less than a 40 percent workload. Others he thought worked “very hard indeed”. On November 7, 1994 Judge Harper wrote to Chief Judge Hazen Strange:

Naturally, I have been well aware that many of the supernumeraries had not been pulling their weight and were receiving full pay for little or no work. As you well know, however, there are at least two such Judges who work very hard indeed.

101 The uneven workload was caused by many factors, including both the receptiveness and/or professionalism of supernumerary judges and, more importantly, the severe resource constraints confronting the Provincial Court as a whole. There were only six supernumerary judges and, as stated, the government failed to appoint judges to replace at least two of them, namely Judge Rice and Judge Harper. As the Chief Judge explained in his testimony:

A. The most difficult administrative responsibility and the one that took the most time was assigning judges around the Province. At some stages we had more courts sitting on a given day, almost, than we had judges, and we had a number of satellite courts — I think at one stage 21 — I think we had at one stage 24 permanent courts and we only had something like 23 judges. So the most difficult part of my job, really, was to assign judges to courts so that they wouldn’t go empty.

Q. Okay.

A. And that was true for ten years.

102 The administrative troubles of the Chief Judge did not end on March 3, 1995, when royal assent was given to An Act to Amend the Provincial Court Act, S.N.B. 1995, c. 6 repealing the provisions permitting supernumerary status. By law, each of the six incumbent judges on supernumerary status was required to elect by April 1, 1995 whether to retire or to work full-time as a member of the court. Each of them did so except the respondent Judge Mackin who refused to elect one way or the other, apparently taking the view that to make an election would be to give the 1995 repeal undeserved credibility. In his view the repeal was unlawful, and on April 25, 1995, he gave notice to the Crown of his intention to challenge in court its constitutionality.

103 The following day, April 26, 1995, without waiting for his constitutional challenge to proceed, Judge Mackin entered a courtroom that was not in session in the provincial courthouse at Moncton and in the presence of a couple of Crown attorneys and other members of the bar declared that he would no longer “sit, hear and decide cases under the duress of these amendments”.

104 By letter dated May 17, 1995 he was ordered back to work by his Chief Judge. Judge Mackin declined to comply. In his view he could no longer be considered “independent” within the meaning of s. 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

105 On June 16, 1995 Judge Mackin’s application for an injunction to restrain the Chief Judge from “assigning, designating or otherwise requiring [him] to perform Judicial . . . duties” was dismissed by Russell J. of the Court of Queen’s Bench.

106 The Chief Judge took the view that Judge Mackin’s constitutional objection had been overruled by a superior court, and that public confidence in the judiciary would suffer unless Judge Mackin accepted that legal result unless and until it was overturned by a higher court. Thus, on July 19, 1995, although he appeared to share Judge Mackin’s view of the invalidity of the legislation repealing supernumerary status, the Chief Judge wrote to Judge Mackin to say “I believe you have had sufficient time to study the decision by Justice RUSSELL”. He then reiterated his insistence that Judge Mackin return to work. Judge Mackin’s response was to declare himself on sick leave. This was eventually supported by a one-sentence “report” from a Dr. Paul Doucet dated August 2, 1995 advising that Judge Mackin would not be returning to work for “an undetermined period of time because of medical reasons”. When asked by the Chief Judge for an explanation from Dr. Doucet of the “medical reasons”, Judge Mackin had his lawyers respond that it was “entirely possible” that the Chief Judge’s request for an explanation was in contravention of the provincial Human Rights Act. The legal basis for such a curious suggestion was not disclosed.

107 Eventually a pattern developed whereby Judge Mackin, when he worked at all, would go into court and frequently either adjourn matters for lengthy periods of time or enter a stay of proceedings. As Chief Judge Strange testified:

What was happening — there was one case, particularly — it was a rather terrible one where the alleged victim was a young person, a sexual assault — that was just put over for a month or two or three or four. Witnesses were showing up; the Crown was bringing witnesses in, sometimes from far away, sometimes from right there. It would just be adjourned, adjourned, adjourned, and it was making a farce of the situation; it wasn’t fair to the accused; it wasn’t fair to the prosecutors; it wasn’t fair to the witnesses, and simply nothing was going ahead in his court

108 On November 14, 1995, the Chief Judge obtained from the Court of Queen’s Bench a mandamus order requiring Judge Mackin “to hold sittings at the places and on the days designated by the Chief Judge of the Provincial Court of New Brunswick and to hear and determine cases properly brought before him during such sittings”. Judge Mackin’s appeal from this order was dismissed (with a variation in costs) on April 12, 1996.

109 In the meantime Judge Mackin had continued with his policy of granting a stay of proceedings to any accused who requested it. This had the effect of preventing the further prosecution of some quite serious criminal charges. In R. v. McCully on February 13, 1996, for example, the following exchange took place in Judge Mackin's court:

[Crown Attorney]: . . . I wish the record to indicate clearly that the Crown was prepared to proceed. Our witnesses, who are present, we had nothing to give notice of any motion [i.e. for a stay of proceedings].

Court: Yeah, so the — this case is stayed due to the non-structural independence of the Provincial Court.

[Crown Attorney]: Might I presume, Your Honour, that in all cases in which you're going to be sitting, you'll be staying proceedings?

Court: If anybody requests it.

[Crown Attorney]: As long as someone makes the request?

Court: Yeah.

[Crown Attorney]: Okay.

Court: Well, that's my decision.

110 As regularly as Judge Mackin granted a stay of proceedings in these cases his decision was reversed by the New Brunswick Court of Appeal. On June 26, 1996 it reversed Judge Mackin in R. v. Woods (1996), 1996 CanLII 18836 \(NB CA\), 179 N.B.R. (2d) 153. On February 12, 1997 he was again corrected in R. v. Lapointe, [1997] N.B.J. No. 57 (QL) (C.A.). On June 23, 1997 the Court of Appeal had to repeat again its disapproval of the entry of a stay of proceedings in similar circumstances in R. v. Leblanc (1997), 1997 CanLII 9554 \(NB CA\), 190 N.B.R. (2d) 70.

111 On April 10, 1996, the New Brunswick Minister of Justice complained about Judge Mackin's conduct to the Judicial Council of New Brunswick. About a week later, on April 19, 1996, Judge Mackin retaliated with a letter to the provincial Solicitor General requesting that contempt proceedings be brought against the provincial Minister of Justice. The province eventually rejected Judge Mackin's demand based on an opinion from the Deputy Attorney General of Alberta.

112 On June 5, 1996 the Judicial Council took the view that it ought not to take action in Judge Mackin's case until the various court proceedings had been "finally dealt with" and concluded that "the present complaint is premature".

113 Those who were required to appear in Judge Mackin's court bore the brunt of the difficulties. A number of extracts from the testimony of Chief Judge Strange (who, as stated, continued to express support for the constitutional challenge itself) gives the flavour of the situation in which members of the public found themselves:

This was causing a terrible situation. We had witnesses showing up, sometimes on relatively serious matters, sometimes from a great distance, and lawyers showing up, prosecutors showing up and so on, and matters were simply being stayed or more likely adjourned over to a lengthy date. And it was reaching the stage where it was simply upsetting the whole court system down there.

[Judge Mackin's] going to the courtroom and he's adjourning cases in 90 percent of the time. I was getting calls constantly that he wouldn't do any cases. He would adjourn them, adjourn them, and this has continued right up until – well, as recently I know is last December [1997] when there were 112 charges adjourned to one afternoon on December 15th. I mean that was not conducive to putting cases properly through the court and it was not conducive to treating people properly.

114 In these circumstances, the Chief Judge and his colleagues ultimately decided not to ask Judge Mackin to take on cases of any importance, as the Chief Judge explained in evidence:

I didn't want, as Chief Judge, any big cases where victims would be humbled or hurt or witnesses would show up and be sent home. I didn't want anything like that going in there. We'd had enough of that and it was wrong.

115 The respondent Judge Douglas Rice carried his full work load through to the date of his retirement on October 15, 1997. No replacement judge was named until after his departure. Judge Harper died in office. No replacement judge was named until after his death. The respondent Judge Ian Mackin reached mandatory retirement age on April 7, 2000.

Analysis

116 Judicial independence is a cornerstone of constitutional government. Financial security is one of the essential conditions of judicial independence. Yet, unless these principles are interpreted in light of the public interests they were intended to serve, there is a danger that their application will wind up hurting rather than enhancing public confidence in the courts.

117 In Valente v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 25 \(SCC\), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 673, this Court made the fundamental point that the guarantee of judicial independence was for the benefit of the judged, not the judges. Its purpose was not only to ensure that justice is done in individual cases, but to ensure public confidence in the court system as a whole. Le Dain J. stated at p. 689:

Without that confidence the system cannot command the respect and acceptance that are essential to its effective operation. It is, therefore, important that a tribunal should be perceived as independent, as well as impartial, and that the test for independence should include that perception.

118 A similar note was struck by Lamer C.J. in R. v. Lippé, 1990 CanLII 18 \(SCC\), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 114, at p. 139:

The overall objective of guaranteeing judicial independence is to ensure a reasonable perception of impartiality; judicial independence is but a “means” to this “end”. If judges could be perceived as “impartial” without judicial “independence”, the requirement of “independence” would be unnecessary. However, judicial independence is critical to the public’s perception of impartiality. Independence is the cornerstone, a necessary prerequisite, for judicial impartiality.

It should be stated that neither Judge Rice nor Judge Mackin suggest that the 1995 repeal affected in any way their impartiality. Nor, I think can the repeal be said to have undermined their individual independence because their full salary and security of tenure were not affected. Their argument is that it undermined the institutional independence of the court of which they were members.

119 In the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, Lamer C.J. returned to the need for a purposive interpretation of the guarantee of judicial independence at para. 156 where he adopted this proposition:

Financial security is an essential condition of judicial independence. It must not, however, be considered abstractly. It must be considered in relation to its purpose, which is, ultimately, to protect the judiciary from economic manipulation by the legislature or executive.

120 Lamer C.J. emphasized the point again at para. 193:

I want to make it very clear that the guarantee of a minimum salary is not meant for the benefit of the judiciary. Rather, financial security is a means to the end of judicial independence, and is therefore for the benefit of the public. As Professor Friedland has put it, speaking as a concerned citizen, it is “for our sake, not for theirs”. . . .

121 The solution mandated in the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, was to erect an institutional barrier (an “independent, effective and objective process”) between the legislature and executive on the one hand and the judiciary on the other to deal with matters related to the judges’ financial security. The constitutional requirement was to “depoliticize” the relationship.

This appeal does not put in issue the merits of the solution. It does put in issue the boundaries of what may fairly be described as matters related to the guarantee of financial security.

122 The need for a purposive approach was acknowledged by the New Brunswick Court of Appeal in these cases, per Ryan J.A.:

The Re Provincial Court Judges case focused on the independence of the judiciary, a concept frequently misunderstood because its purpose is a protection to the public, not a benefit to judges. [Emphasis added.]

((1999), 1999 CanLII 4752 \(NB CA\), 235 N.B.R. (2d) 1, at para. 25)

In light of the history of this litigation it would not be surprising if the witnesses and parties and members of the public in Judge Mackin’s court from 1995 onwards “misunderstood” the concept of judicial independence in so far as it is said to be for their benefit, and not for the benefit of the judges.

123 The legislature could have provided (but did not) that a supernumerary judge was obliged to work no more than 100 of the 251 court sitting days per year. In that event, I would have agreed with my colleague Gonthier J. that legislative repeal of such a significant fixed benefit without a prior review by an independent, effective and objective process (such as a remuneration commission) would be unconstitutional. Nothing in these reasons should be read as dissenting in any way from the process mandated in the Provincial Court Judges Reference to depoliticize the adjustment of judicial compensation.

124 My disagreement with my colleague is therefore quite narrow, and proceeds in the following steps:

- (i) the essentials of judicial independence, including financial security, necessarily reside in objective and enforceable guarantees established in the governing law;
- (ii) Provincial Court judges on supernumerary status in New Brunswick were guaranteed a full-time salary. The guarantee was honoured;
- (iii) Provincial Court judges on supernumerary status were guaranteed security of tenure. The guarantee was honoured;
- (iv) Provincial Court judges on supernumerary status were not guaranteed a 40 percent workload in exchange for full pay, or indeed any reduction in workload of an enforceable nature;
- (v) a constitutional rule that provided that any decrease or increase in an undefined judicial workload could only be initiated through a remuneration commission would be unworkable;
- (vi) the existence (or repeal) of discretionary benefits does not threaten judicial independence;
- (vii) the disappointed expectations of the Provincial Court judges, however understandable, do not justify a finding of unconstitutionality.

I propose to deal with each of these points in turn.

- (i) The essentials of judicial independence, including financial security, necessarily reside in objective and enforceable guarantees established in the governing law.

125 The bedrock of judicial independence, whether in relation to the individual judge or to the court of which he or she is a member, is the requirement of objective non-discretionary guarantees. Thus in Valente, Le Dain J. referred at p. 688 to the test adopted in that case by the Ontario Court of Appeal, namely whether the alleged deficiencies in “the status of [the judges of the Ontario Provincial Court] gave rise to a reasonable apprehension that the tribunal lacked the capacity to adjudicate in an independent manner”. Le Dain J. added, “[t]his I take to be more clearly a reference to the objective status or relationship of judicial independence, which in my opinion is the primary meaning to be given to the word ‘independent’ in s. 11(d)” (emphasis added). Thus, he concluded, “judicial independence is a status or relationship resting on objective conditions or guarantees” (p. 689).

126 The essential guarantees of judicial independence (both individual and constitutional) are security of tenure, financial security and administrative independence in relation to adjudicative matters.

127 For present purposes, the discussion in Valente of financial security is instructive. According to Le Dain J., the salaries of superior court judges, “fixed” in a federal statute pursuant to s. 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, represent “the highest degree of constitutional guarantee of security of tenure and security of salary and pension” (p. 693), but this is not essential. While Ontario Provincial Court judges’ salaries were not “fixed” by legislation, they were guaranteed by regulation. “The essential point”, Le Dain J. said, “is that the right to salary of a provincial court judge is established by law, and there is no way in which the Executive could interfere with that right in a manner to affect the independence of the individual judge” (p. 706).

128 The situation here is very different. There were no guarantees of reduced workload in the Act. As the respondent Judge Rice testified, “If the Chief Judge asked me to do something, I did it”. The rule that security of tenure, financial security and administrative independence in relation to adjudicative matters must be guaranteed in the law in explicit non-discretionary terms, was endorsed in Beauregard v. Canada, 1986 CanLII 24 \(SCC\), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 56, at p. 75, and Lippé, at p. 143. Thus, if a measure is essential to judicial independence it cannot be left up in the air as a matter of discretion.

129 In the Provincial Court Judges Reference, Lamer C.J. pointed out at para. 112 that “the objective guarantees define th[e] status” of independence (emphasis in original). In that case statutory provisions that lacked concrete guarantees were held insufficient to ensure judicial independence. Thus an Alberta statutory provision that said the government may set judicial salaries for provincial judges was declared unconstitutional even though a regulation subsequently made under the same Act made it mandatory (paras. 221-22). A Manitoba statutory provision withdrawing provincial court staff as a cost cutting measure on specific days (“Filmon Fridays”) was declared unconstitutional because the Court refused to “read down” the legislation to eliminate the objection. Lamer C.J. stated that “to read down the legislation to its proper [i.e. constitutional] scope would amount to reading in those objective conditions and guarantees” (para. 276). This, he said, was not permissible.

130 In this case we are asked to read specific guarantees of workload reduction into the Provincial Court Act in order that we can declare their repeal to be unconstitutional.

131 It is only by reading in such guarantees that repeal of the statutory provisions could be said to require recourse to a remuneration commission. If, as I believe, there is no guarantee in the legislation of workload reduction, there is nothing to repeal that could be said to entail one of the objective guarantees that “define” the status of judicial independence (Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, at para. 112).

132 Perhaps the closest analogy to the case now before us is provided by one of the provisions struck down in Valente, supra. It authorized the reappointment of retired Ontario Provincial Court judges to sit “at pleasure” (p. 699). The evidence accepted by the Court was that by tradition these appointments were as secure as the tenure of regular Provincial Court judges who held office during good behaviour. The existence and strength of this tradition was accepted by the Ontario Court of Appeal as sufficient to guarantee judicial independence. Le Dain J. noted that “Howland C.J.O. placed considerable emphasis on the role of tradition as an objective condition or safeguard of judicial independence” (p. 699). Howland C.J.O. had cited, inter alia, P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (1977), at p. 120:

The independence of the judiciary has since become such a powerful tradition in the United Kingdom and Canada that there may be little point in a fine analysis of the language of the provisions by which it is formally guaranteed.

133 This Court disagreed. The “fine analysis of the language of the provisions” was thought to be very important indeed. Le Dain J., speaking for a unanimous Court, ruled that traditions and expectations, however strongly observed, “cannot supply essential conditions of independence for which specific provision of law is necessary” (p. 702 (emphasis added)). This is particularly the case where the terms of the law are at odds with the alleged expectation. The Ontario law provided, contrary to the alleged tradition, that retired judges would on reappointment hold office “at pleasure” (p. 699). Here the law simply provided that the judge on supernumerary status would be available to perform whatever judicial duties were assigned. To read a specific workload limitation into such a provision would be to amend the legislation.

134 In my view, with respect, there must be a specific provision of law to guarantee a judge full-time pay for part-time work if it is sought (as here) to make that guarantee part of the bulwark of judicial independence.

135 The lesson from these cases is that traditions and expectations, however widely shared, do not constitute “objective conditions” for the purposes of defining the judicial independence required by s. 11(d) of the Charter. The Court cannot amend the legislation by reading in expectations, however widely shared (as in the anticipation of a 40 percent workload of supernumerary judges in New Brunswick) or expectation based on longstanding tradition (as in the tenure of post-retirement appointees to the Ontario provincial bench).

136 I do not underestimate the importance of the unwritten customs and traditions that support the institutional independence of the courts. I say only that a particular workload benefit, which never rose to the level of being specified let alone guaranteed in law, does not constitute part of the “objective guarantees” that define the status of judicial independence and which thereby attract constitutional protection.

137 If the legislative provision is so imprecise as not to be capable of constituting part of the guarantee of financial security (or, more broadly, of judicial independence), its existence is not essential to the constitutionality of the court, and its repeal is not therefore constitutionally prohibited.

(ii) Provincial Court judges on supernumerary status in New Brunswick were guaranteed a full-time salary. The guarantee was honoured.

138 In Valente, Beauregard, Lippé, and the Provincial Court Judges Reference, the Court established “the essential” guarantees of judicial independence. One of these is financial security. No objection is taken to the statutory guarantee of a fixed salary to Provincial Court judges on regular status (s. 14(2)). The judges on supernumerary status were guaranteed the same salary by their inclusion in the definition of “judge” in s. 2(1) of the Act. When the respondents returned to regular status on April 1, 1995, there was no change in either the amount of their pay or its protected status.

(iii) Provincial Court judges on supernumerary status were guaranteed security of tenure. The guarantee was honoured.

139 The respondents Mackin and Rice continued to enjoy the same security of tenure as Provincial Court judges on regular status. As mentioned, they were included in the definition of “judge”. I agree with my colleague Gonthier J. (at para. 47) that their supernumerary status did not give rise to any special tenure. Those who elected to become supernumerary were not “appointed” or “re-appointed”. The original appointment continued in effect with the potential of a reduction in workload of an indeterminate amount at an indeterminate time. As the respondent Judge Rice wrote in his letter of February 17, 1993 to the Minister of Justice electing supernumerary status:

This election is not, in any way, to be considered as my resignation from my appointment as a Judge of the Provincial Court.

140 In the New Brunswick Court of Appeal, Ryan J.A. argued that the use of the word “office” in s. 4.1(3) implied a separate and distinct tenure that was wiped out by the 1995 amendments. It is true that the word “office” has a special connotation in law, but it is not associated with any particular security of tenure: Ridge v. Baldwin, [1964] A.C. 40 (H.L.), per Lord Reid, at p. 65. In Nicholson v. Haldimand-Norfolk Regional Board of Commissioners of Police, 1978 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1979] 1 S.C.R. 311, the “office” holder was a probationary police constable whose tenure was at pleasure. If Ryan J.A. were correct that use of the word “office” connoted a distinct and separate tenure from that of the Provincial Court judges on regular status, the result would have been an office without clear legislative definition. The holders of the allegedly distinct office of supernumerary judge would have lacked from the outset the objective guarantees of judicial independence. Such a judicial “office” would have been unconstitutional. As pointed out by Lamer C.J. in the extract from the Provincial Court Judges Reference previously cited at para. 39, it would not be for the Court to read into the word “office” the necessary guarantees of tenure to make up for the legislative deficiency.

(iv) Provincial Court judges on supernumerary status were not guaranteed a 40 percent workload or any other reduction.

141 Supernumerary status was adopted in New Brunswick in 1988 after lengthy discussions between the government and the Provincial Court judges which had commenced in about 1981.

142 The theory underlying the 40 percent workload expectation was that to be eligible for supernumerary status a Provincial Court judge must meet all the conditions for retirement except the desire to retire. If he or she elected to retire, the state would be required to pay a pension equivalent to 60 percent of the average of specified years of judicial earnings. There would be no further judicial work. If he or she elected supernumerary status, however, the judge could make up the 40 percent loss of income occasioned by retirement by continuing to work 40 percent of the time. This expectation of a greatly reduced workload was widely shared by Ministers, judges, civil servants and others in New Brunswick. But it was not written into the Provincial Court Act.

143 To be clear, the respondent Rice, as a Provincial Court judge with supernumerary status, was not a retired person with a part-time job. He was eligible to retire but he had elected not to. He was not drawing a pension “topped up” by 40 percent pay for 40 percent workload. He was receiving a full-time salary and all the benefits of a judge on regular status. He continued to receive medical coverage. His life insurance continued to be subsidized to the extent (at the date of his retirement) of over $2,000 per month. Any increase in annual salary would translate into a higher base on which his pension would eventually be calculated (albeit, as with judges on regular status, he was required to continue pension contributions in the interim). The respondent Mackin was in a similar position. In exchange for these benefits they continued to hold themselves available for work as assigned by the Chief Judge. In a province short on judicial resources, the assignments in some cases amounted more or less to full-time employment. If the assignments proved unexpectedly onerous, either one of them could have elected to retire on full pension at any time.

144 The key provision, as stated, is s. 4.1\(5\) of the Provincial Court Act, which said:

4.1(5) A judge appointed under subsection 2(1) who has elected to hold the office of supernumerary judge shall be available to perform such judicial duties as may be assigned to the judge from time to time by the chief judge or associate chief judge.

145 If “full” workload for a Provincial Court judge is taken to be plus or minus 251 court days a year (which is the assumption on which the repealing legislation is based), 40 percent of that is plus or minus 100 days a year. The legislation establishing supernumerary status obviously could have specified a precise figure but just as obviously it did not do so. Instead the obligation was to do the judicial work assigned by the Chief Judge, whatever and whenever it might be.

146 My colleague Gonthier J., in para. 65, places emphasis on the words “time to time” in s. 4.1(5). It was not, of course, contemplated that the first assignment by the Chief Judge would necessarily be the last. It was to be expected that from “time to time” the assignments would change. In my view that phrase indicates a multiplicity of assignments, not a reduction in workload. With respect, an increase in overall workload would be equally consistent with the statutory language (such as, for example, a transfer to a busier court).

147 When the respondent, Judge Rice, who at the time was a judge of over 20 years' experience, was considering whether to elect supernumerary status in 1992, he sought a number of clarifications from the Minister of Justice. He asked for information as follows:

(3) WORK ASSIGNMENTS. Supernumerary Judges are required to sit a minimum of 40% of working days each year, as assigned by the Chief Judge, the Associate Chief Judge, or a Judge designated for the purpose of assigning Judges in a Judicial District. [Emphasis in original.]

This was confirmed by the Minister in writing on March 16, 1992:

A supernumerary judge is required to sit the equivalent of a minimum of 40% of a full-time judge's work year. The Chief Judge, or the Associate Chief Judge, is responsible to assign sittings. [Emphasis added.]

148 Neither the respondent, Judge Rice, nor the Minister suggested that there existed a maximum workload short of 100 percent of the workload of a judge on regular status. Having regard to the varied work experiences of Judge Rice, Judge Harper and Judge Mackin, I do not think, with respect, that the evidence supports my colleague's conclusion, at para. 65, that "[n]ormally" a judge on supernumerary status "enjoyed a substantial reduction in his or her workload". The experience was too mixed to permit any generalization in that regard, in my opinion.

149 The assignment responsibility rested with the Chief Judge, but the reality was that he could only work within the resources the province provided. The respondents' position is, in truth, not only that the 40 percent workload should be read into the Act, but that the province had a constitutional responsibility to provide enough judges to make the 40 percent workload achievable. This, with respect, is too much to “read into” a statute that simply says a judge is to do the work assigned by the Chief Judge.

- (v) A constitutional rule that provided that any decrease or increase in an undefined judicial workload could only be initiated through a remuneration commission would be unworkable.

150 The judgments on appeal state that the 1995 repeal of supernumerary status was unconstitutional because it did not receive prior review by an independent, effective and objective process (e.g. a remuneration commission). Quite apart from the fact the constitutional requirement of an independent, effective and objective process was not elaborated by this Court until the Provincial Court Judges Reference in 1997, two years after the amendments in issue here, I cannot accept this argument.

151 It is useful to reiterate that the respondents received the same salary after the repeal of the supernumerary status as they did beforehand.

152 In oral argument it was suggested that if a supernumerary judge were required to do more work for the same amount of money, his hourly rate, if it may be so conceived, was reduced. Instead of earning a full salary for a 40 percent workload he had to work a full year for the same amount of money. However, once the debate is properly focused on workload, and the so-called workload guarantee is related to the process mandated by the Provincial Court Judges Reference, the question arises as to how a remuneration commission would be supposed to give prior effective review to increases or decreases in judicial workload across the province.

153 The evidence shows that in 1990-91 each judge in the Provincial Court at Fredericton disposed of 2,714 cases a year. In Campbellton the equivalent per year was 1,775 cases and in St. John it was 2,729 cases. The busiest Provincial Court was Moncton where each of the judges disposed of about 5,335 cases per year. In each instance the Provincial Court judge on regular status received the same salary. If the statistics are to be believed, judges in different regions therefore had a very different workload and, because each earned the same salary, a very different “hourly” rate.

154 The Chief Judge testified that the statistics were simplistic and failed to take into account many factors, including the nature of the cases. I agree with his criticism, but even making a generous allowance for the crudity of the statistics, the workload variation is impressive. In these circumstances how many hours a year constitutes a 100 percent workload on which the 40 percent workload is to be calculated? Are we to take a provincial average or is a judge entitled to look at the historical average for his or her region? Or his or her personal history? This again provides unevenly moving targets. The statistics show that whereas the workload in Moncton was expected to grow by 17 percent in 1991-92, the increase in St. John was only 2 percent. In Campbellton the expected growth was 66 percent.

155 The constitutional requirement is for prior reference of a change in benefits to the remuneration commission. Unless the Legislature was prepared to fix a specific number of work days per year (and, as stated, 100 days would be 40 percent of a notional 251 days a year sat by Provincial Court judges on regular status), I do not understand how “workload” as an abstract statistic can be fixed in advance. The bare concept of a reduced workload is too elastic to provide a manageable standard. The legislature, as stated, was clearly not prepared to guarantee any fixed and defined benefit, or indeed any benefit at all.

The bottom line is that the 1995 New Brunswick legislation established a potential benefit of wholly indeterminate value. It offered the possibility of less work for the same amount of pay, but the possibility of achieving this expectation was always subject to the exigencies of each court location and the resources available to the Chief Judge to get done the judicial work that had to be done. The Provincial Court Judges Reference established the requirement of an independent, effective and objective process to deal with financial security. The salary of supernumerary judges was secure. Each supernumerary judge received full pay. An extension of the remuneration commission process to an undefined “reduced” workload is neither sensible nor required. Yet it is the repeal of the workload benefit supposedly guaranteed by supernumerary status that is said to be unconstitutional because the province did not first go through a remuneration commission process.

(vi) The existence (or repeal) of discretionary benefits does not threaten judicial independence.

The potential advantages of supernumerary status lay either in the discretion of the Chief Judge or his delegate who was responsible for assigning the work (or assigning a specific courtroom) to the supernumerary judge or, alternatively in the discretion of the provincial government in its overall budgetary allocation for the Provincial Court and its willingness to appoint new judges to replace supernumerary judges to help to deal with the expanding workload.

In my view the culprit here, if culprit there be, is the provincial government’s refusal to allocate adequate resources to the court. Chief Judge Strange was clearly willing to exercise his discretion to allow very significant workload reductions to supernumerary judges, but his priority was to staff the courts on a week-to-week basis, and the lack of adequate resources left him unable to accomplish both objectives. As between the public interest in seeing the courts operate on a full-time basis and the private interest of some of the judges on supernumerary status in realizing their expected benefits, he chose correctly, and inevitably, the public interest. The issue, therefore, is really about the government's exercise of its discretion over the Provincial Court budget.

159 In Valente it was contended that government control over such discretionary matters as post-retirement reappointment, or leaves of absence with or without pay, or permission to engage in extra-judicial employment, violated judicial independence. This argument was rejected. Le Dain J. stated at p. 714:

While it may well be desirable that such discretionary benefits of advantages, to the extent that they should exist at all, should be under the control of the judiciary rather than the Executive, as recommended by the Deschênes report and others, I do not think that their control by the Executive touches what must be considered to be one of the essential conditions of judicial independence for purposes of s. 11(d) of the Charter. In so far as the subjective aspect is concerned, I agree with the Court of Appeal that it would not be reasonable to apprehend that a provincial court judge would be influenced by the possible desire for one of these benefits or advantages to be less than independent in his or her adjudication.

160 When a similar objection was raised in the Provincial Court Judges Reference in relation to the discretion of the Government of Prince Edward Island over judges' sabbatical leave, Lamer C.J. simply cited the above passage from Valente and added, "To my mind, the same reasoning applies here" (para. 207).

161 Even if one were to assume (as I do) that the variable benefits of supernumerary status were a function of the government's budget control rather than within the gift of the Chief Judge, I do not think either the existence of these benefits or their ultimate repeal in 1995 violated the "objective guarantees" of judicial independence. As noted by Lamer C.J. in the Provincial Court Judges Reference at para. 113, the question is whether a reasonable person, who was informed of the relevant statutory provisions, their historical background and other relevant facts, after viewing the matter realistically and practically, would conclude that the tribunal or court was independent. In my view such persons would not regard the creation, continuation or ultimate repeal of the discretionary workload benefit associated with supernumerary status as compromising judicial independence. They would hold, I believe, a loftier view of their judges.

162 In the end this appeal comes down to the fact that the respondents formed a quite legitimate expectation of a substantially reduced workload if they elected supernumerary status and their expectation was not honoured. A reduction to roughly 40 percent of a notional workload was permitted, but not required, by the Provincial Court Act. The evidence does not clearly source this expectation in the Minister's office (i.e., the Minister's letter talked about a minimum of 40 percent), but even if the respondents could establish all of the elements of the administrative law doctrine of legitimate expectation as set out in Old St. Boniface Residents Assn. Inc. v. Winnipeg (City), 1990 CanLII 31 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1170; Reference re Canada Assistance Plan (B.C.), 1991 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 525, and Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 (SCC), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817, it would not assist the respondents' attack on the repealing legislation. As Sopinka J. pointed out in Canada Assistance Plan, at p. 558, the doctrine does not apply "to a body exercising purely legislative functions". Nor can it operate to entitle the respondents to a substantive as opposed to procedural remedy. In some ways the respondents' effort to use their disappointed expectations to attack the validity of the legislative amendments in this case parallels the unsuccessful effort of the Government of British Columbia to use expectations created by federal-provincial funding arrangements to attack the validity of amendments to the Canada Assistance Plan in that case. The attempt was rejected there and it should be rejected here as well.

In summary, the 1988 amendments to the Provincial Court Act enacted a form of supernumerary status that created expectations but not guarantees. Its repeal, as high-handed and offensive as it may have appeared to the respondents, did not undermine the judicial independence of the Provincial Court judges or the court of which they were members. The repeal was undertaken in a period of budgetary cuts which impacted all the residents of New Brunswick. Supernumerary benefits for judges competed with the closure of hospital beds and the reduction or elimination of crucial public expenditures in other areas. The New Brunswick legislature sought to change a system (which had so unevenly benefited Judge Rice, Judge Harper and Judge Mackin) to a pay-for-work system in which a retired judge who in fact works about 100 days a year (i.e., 40 percent of a notional 251 court days) while drawing a full pension (i.e., equivalent to 60 percent of a full salary) would receive “top up” per diem payments equivalent to the remaining 40 percent of the full salary. The new system, according to the evidence, was designed to allow judges on supernumerary status to get the same financial benefits as under the 1988-95 scheme but by means of a method of payment that tied rewards to actual work. It appears that all retired Provincial Court judges are eligible for per diem work if they want it. Work assignments are still made by the Chief Judge within an overall budget. Whether the new system is better or fairer than the old system is not for us to judge. The only question before us is whether the change is unconstitutional. In my view, for the reasons discussed, the repeal of the former system of supernumerary status, as much as the original enactment, was within the legislative competence of the Province of New Brunswick in relation to “[t]he Administration of Justice in the Province, including the Constitution, Maintenance, and Organization of Provincial Courts” under s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

Conclusion

I would allow the appeal with costs. I would therefore answer the first two constitutional questions in the negative and, in light of that conclusion, the third constitutional question does not arise.

Appellant

And

Benjamin Bradley

Respondent

1878: Feb. 6, 7; 1878: June 4.

Present:—Sir William Buell Richards, Knt., C.J., and Ritchie, Strong, Taschereau, Fournier and Henry, J.J.

The Chief Justice was absent when judgment was delivered.

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF NOVA SCOTIA.

Absent and absconding debtors Act of Nova Scotia, Ch. 97, Rev. St. of N. S.—Attachment—Demurrer—Conversion by Sheriff—Corporation, sale by—Justification under Order of Court—Seal.

One H. instituted proceedings against the L. C. M. Company, the officers of which resided in the United States, but which did business in Nova Scotia, and, on the 25th May, 1872, caused a Writ of Attachment to be issued out of the Supreme Court at Amherst, under the absent and absconding debtors Act of Nova Scotia,^[1] directed to the Appellant, the High Sheriff of the County of Cumberland. Under this Writ, the Appellant seized certain chattels, as being the chattels of the said Company. On the 12th November, 1872, an order was issued out of the said Court, directing the Appellant to sell, and the Appellant did sell said chattels as being of a perishable nature. On the 11th December, 1874, a discontinuance was filed in the said cause by H. On the 30th May, 1876, the Respondent commenced an action against the Appellant for the conversion of the chattels in question, contending that the Company, having failed in its operations and being desirous of winding up its affairs, and being indebted to him, had sold and conveyed to him the said chattels by a certain memorandum of sale, dated July 5th, 1867, "signed on behalf of the Company," by one "Hawley, agent." To this memorandum a seal was affixed which did not purport to be the seal of the Company. The Appellant pleaded to the Declaration, that he did not convert; goods not Plaintiff's; not possessed; and also a special plea of justification, setting forth the proceedings by H., and that he had seized and sold the goods as the goods of the Company, in obedience to the attachment and order issued in said proceedings. The Respondent replied, setting up the discontinuance.

The Appellant rejoined that the proceedings were not discontinued, and that the discontinuance was not filed till after the sale. He also demurred, on the ground that being bound to obey the order of the Court, he could not be affected by the discontinuance. At the trial a verdict of $500 damages was rendered for Respondent. The Appellant obtained a rule nisi to set aside verdict, and the rule and demurrer were argued together. The Court below refused to set aside the verdict and gave judgment for Plaintiff on the demurrer.

Held,—That the appeal should be allowed; that the plea of justification showed a sufficient answer to the declaration; that the replication was bad, and that the verdict must be set aside and judgment be for the Defendant on the demurrer.

Ritchie, J., dissented, on the ground that the seizing under the attachment, and not the sale, constituted the conversion; that there was sufficient evidence to show that the chattels in question had been transferred by the Company to Respondent, and that under Sec. 15, ch. 53 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, the sale of the chattels did not require to be under the corporate seal of the Company.

Per Strong, J.: The sale, and not the seizure, was the conversion complained of, and to this the order of the Court was a sufficient answer. Semble, a mere taking of the goods of a third person under a mesne attachment against a Defendant to keep them in medio until the termination of the action is not a conversion.

Per Henry, J.: The order for sale would not have been a justification for the original levy on the goods, as well as for the sale, if they had been the property of the Respondent, but the evidence failed to show a sale by the Company to the Respondent. Such a sale would require to be under the corporate seal of the Company, and did not come within the meaning of Sec. 15, ch. 53 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia.

This was an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, giving judgment on demurrer in favour of the Plaintiff (Respondent), and discharging a rule nisi, granted to the Defendant (Appellant), to set aside the verdict for the Plaintiff.

The Lawrence Coal Mining Company, a body corporate, incorporated out of Nova Scotia, in the State of Massachusetts, in the United States of America, under the Joint Stock Companies Act of Nova Scotia, commenced coal mining operations in 1862 on a colliery property at or near river Hebert, in the County of Cumberland, in the Province of Nova Scotia, purchased from one George Hibbard, and continued to work the same until 1865, when the Company became hopelessly, insolvent. Hibbard, the former owner, who resided on the spot, continued from the outset to be a Director, and was the only resident Director in Nova Scotia, and was Managing Director from 1862 up to the spring of 1867, excepting only one season in 1864, and as such had charge of all the property of the Company. He also attended all the annual meetings of the Company held at Boston.

To enable the Company to carry on its operations, the Company, through Hibbard as Managing Director, obtained from Bradley a loan of $10,000, for which Hibbard, as Managing Director, gave a note or notes and a warrant to confess to Bradley, the Respondent, on which judgment was entered up by Bradley for $10,022.75, for principal and interest, on the 11th September, 1865. In 1866 the real and personal property was advertized for sale under Respondent's judgment, and the real estate was sold to him for $3,975, leaving $6,025 still due; the personal property was not sold, and remained on the premises until July, 1867, when Hawley, as agent of the Company, transferred it to Respondent, who, in consideration of the transfer, gave up notes and claims for about $1,500. Hawley, at the same time, gave the following memorandum of sale (filed in the case as exhibit A):—

"RIVER HEBERT, CUMBERLAND COUNTY,

"NOVA SCOTIA, July 5th, 1867.

"Know all men by these presents, that Benjamin

There was no seal to this document purporting to be the seal of the Company, nor had any resolution been passed by the shareholders authorizing a sale by Hawley, but at an adjourned meeting of the Company, held on the 26th February, 1866, it had been, on motion, voted that Messrs. Hawley, W. G. Howe and Alden, should be and were thereby authorized to sell all the real and personal estate, and also the leasehold of the Company for such sum or sums, and on such terms as in their judgment would be for the best interest of the Company, and pay the proceeds of such sale into the hands of the Treasurer for the benefit of the creditors of said Company, and if the amount of such sale exceeded the debts the balance to be paid pro rata among the stockholders.

From the date of the sale, Bradley, and others claiming under him as proprietors, employed an agent to take care of the property, and paid all taxes and expenses connected with it. The mem. of sale was delivered by Hawley to Alden, who acted as Secretary of the Company.

No meetings of the Company were held subsequent to that of the 26th February, 1866, until December 30 and 31, 1874, when the Company, being still largely indebted to Respondent on his judgment, by a resolution unanimously adopted by the shareholders present, further resolved that all the interest of the Company in the mining lease of the Company be transferred to Respondent.

On the 25th May, 1872, Hibbard, who claimed $1,760 from the Company, brought an action against the Company, and caused a writ of attachment to be issued out of the Supreme Court at Amherst, under the absent or absconding debtors Act of Nova Scotia^[2], directed to the Appellant, as High Sheriff of the County of Cumberland, requiring him to seize, and in obedience to the writ the Appellant did seize, certain chattels as being the chattels of the said Company.

On the 12th November, 1872, an order was issued out of the said Court, directing the Sheriff to sell the said chattels, as being of a perishable nature within the meaning of sec. 6, of the last mentioned Act; and they were sold by the Sheriff.

On the 11th December, 1874, a discontinuance of the cause "and all proceedings thereunder," was entered in the action brought by Hibbard against the Company.

On the 30th May, 1876, the Respondent, contending that the chattels in question were his property, commenced an action of trover against the Appellant, the Sheriff, for the conversion of the said chattels.

The Appellant pleaded to the declaration:—1st. That he did not convert. 2nd. That goods were not the property of the Plaintiff. 3rd. Not possessed. And 4th. A special plea of justification setting forth the proceedings by Hibbard, against the Lawrence Coal Mining Company, and that the Defendant, as Sheriff, under the said writ of attachment, and the said order made in such proceedings, seized and sold the chattels in question as and being the chattels of the Company.

The Plaintiff replied to the fourth plea, that after the proceedings aforesaid the said proceedings were discontinued.

The Defendant rejoined that the proceedings were not discontinued, and that the discontinuance was not filed till after the sale in the fourth plea mentioned.

He also demurred to the replication, on the ground that, being bound to act in obedience to the order of the Court, he could not be affected by a discontinuance of a suit under which property was sold.

The Plaintiff joined in demurrer.

The issues of fact were tried at Amherst on the 16th October, 1876, before the Chief Justice, Sir William Young, and a jury, when a verdict was rendered for the Respondent for five hundred dollars damages.

The Appellant obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict, and the said rule nisi and the demurrer were argued together.

The Court below, after argument, gave judgment refusing to set aside the verdict, and, on the 2nd April, 1877, a rule was made ordering that the rule nisi be discharged with costs, and that the Plaintiff have judgment of the demurrer with costs.

The Appellant, thereupon, appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Gormully, for Appellant:—

The Respondent claims title to the chattels in question by a transfer or conveyance thereof from the Lawrence Coal Mining Company. If once admitted to be the property of the Company, they must so remain until divested. The principal question is whether there was an actual sale of the goods; whether exhibit A had the effect of transferring the chattels to Bradley; I contend it had not. That document must operate either as a contract or conveyance. If it operates as a contract, it must be regarded as a contract under seal, or as a simple contract. It is not binding on the Company, because it does not purport to bind them, and because the seal affixed is not the corporate seal of the Company, which was necessary, there having been evidence of the existence of one. Sec. 15, ch. 87, Rev. Stat., N. S., 3rd series, only establishes as a rule of statute law what was formally a rule of common law. It has been held that as to personalty a corporation could sell it, but whether they could do so, except under seal, is another question.

The Statute says: "Acts within the scope of their charter." This sale, purporting to convey all the property, and showing an intention to abandon the object for which the Company was incorporated, should have been under seal.

Hawley never was duly authorized. There never was a meeting respecting the sale, and no evidence of that concerted action which was necessary.

D'Arcy v. The Tamar, Kit Hill and Callington Railway Co. [3]; Ridley v. Plymo Grinding Co. [4]. There is no evidence that the Company delegated their power; and further, if they did delegate it, they had no right to do so. The last delegation of authority is to Hawley, Howe and Alden—and this was a power which must have been exercised by all three, and was not a power which could be delegated. The Respondent was bound to know what was being done. Exparte Brown [5].

The transaction was a fraudulent one as against the statute of Elizabeth [6], there was no change of possession, and this was a document which should have been registered under the statute.

The learned counsel then proceeded to argue that the learned judge who tried the action had improperly admitted evidence and had misdirected the jury; and that as to the demurrer, the Appellants fourth plea was good in law, and replication bad because it admits and does not sufficiently avoid the plea:

Mr. Halliburton, Q. C., for Respondent:—

The Company became indebted to Bradley for an advance of $10,000. In 1865, they find themselves insolvent. Hibbard, from whom the Company purchased their mine, was the only director resident in Nova Scotia, and was the only person up to this date who had any benefit from the Company. He attended all the meetings and was familiar with all that was done. In 1865, meetings were called, but nothing was done, and at last Bradley enters up judgment and issues execution. He unwisely allowed the matter to stand over to save Sheriffs' fees, and a conveyance became necessary from, the Company. Five days after the sale of the personal property, Hibbard renders an account, showing $25 due him. The Company set off against that the rent, and considered they had paid every body; they supposed all claims were paid both in Canada and the United States. The Company authorized Hawley to go to Nova Scotia to sell the property.

[RITCHIE, J.:—Will you show us from the evidence that he was authorized by the Company?]

There is no one at present claiming the property except Bradley. The Company did not claim it, nor any shareholder or director on behalf of the Company.

[THE CHIEF JUSTICE:—A question has been raised which seems important. This property was sold by order of the Court as perishable property. How can the Sheriff be held responsible for selling this specific property under the order of the Court?]

I am prepared to show that the Sheriff, under the circumstances, was not justified in selling.

Where there is a seal, the seal must be presumed to be the seal of the Company. Ontario Salt Co. v. Merchants Salt Co. (limited)[\[7\]](#).

[RITCHIE, J.:—Where is the evidence that Hawley had any right to use the seal of the Company?]

It is to be presumed he had the right.

[RITCHIE, J.:—What evidence raises this presumption?]

The Company took this man's money, which was the consideration for the sale.

[RITCHIE, J.:—If you can show that this party was professing to act for the Company and entered into this sale, and afterwards the Company had known of the facts and received the money, you will have good evidence that the sale was the sale of the Company.]

In 1874 a general meeting of the Company was called, and it is to be presumed the Company ratified the action of Mr. Hawley. When proceedings have been manifestly illegal between a Company and an individual, and the Company choose to continue these dealings, that is a ratification by the Company of such dealings.

[HENRY, J.:—The difficulty seems to me to be that there were no meetings, and no Company.]

It is to be presumed all necessary by-laws were passed to continue the Company, and the meeting of 1874 was a ratification of what was done before.

The transfer purporting to be signed and sealed by R. Hawley, as their agent, was given to the Secretary of the Company, and was never repudiated by them, and Bradley continued thenceforth to be in undisputed possession of the property and paid taxes on it, and employed an agent to take charge of it.

Even though the Company could not contract directly except under seal, yet they could without the corporate seal appoint an agent, whose acts and contracts within the scope of his authority were binding on the Company. 3 P. Wms. 419. 1 Fonb., 305; Phil. Ed., n. o. Abbott's Dig. of Law of Corporations[\[8\]](#).

The sale was not ultra vires, but was a lawful means of making the most of the assets of the Company to discharge its liabilities. Featherstonehaugh v. Lee Moor Porcelain Clay Co.[\[9\]](#); Burrell on assignments, 36.

The promises and engagements of a Company may as well be implied from its acts and the acts of its agent as if it were an individual. Abbott's Dig. of Law of Corporations[\[10\]](#).

In a case like the present the law presumes omnia rite acta and, unless the contrary appears, that all necessary by-laws and resolutions have been passed necessary for the validity or ratification of the acts performed by the Company's agent. Field on Corporations[11].

The Company, after notice to it of sale by Hawley, did, by their acquiescence for so many years in the possession of Respondent of the personal property sold to him, by their accepting therefor notes, &c., to the amount of $1,500, and by their unanimous vote in 1874 in further satisfaction of the balance due Respondent, that the lease of the mine should be transferred to him, ratify and confirm the sale of the personal property to Respondent by Hawley, as their agent; and it must be assumed that all necessary by-laws and resolutions had been passed and adopted to ratify and confirm the sale by Hawley, as agent of the Company. To enforce an executory contract against a corporation it may be necessary to show that it was by deed: but where the corporation has acted upon an executed contract, it is to be presumed against them that everything has been done that was necessary to make it a binding contract upon both parties, they having had all the advantage they would have had if the contract had been regularly made. Doe dem. Till[20]; Angel & Ames on Corporations[21]; Bigelow on Estoppel[22].

If any question could be raised as to the power of the Company to sell, or the agency of Hawley, or as to the validity of the sale by him, or as to the ratification of such agency, or of such sale by the Company, it is settled by the provisions of the Nova Scotian Act respecting factors and agents. Rev. Stat. Nova Scotia, Fourth Series, App. 63, secs. 1—10.

The Respondent further contends that Appellant's plea of justification is bad in substance, for the following reasons:—

Because it appears by it that the attachment under the Nova Scotian Act respecting absent or absconding debtors, was issued against "a body corporate doing business in Nova Scotia," the said Act not extending to such a company, but only to companies "incorporated out of the Province and doing business by an agent within the Province." Rev. Stat. Nova Scotia, Fourth Series, ch. 97.

Because, even if sec. 6 of the said Act refers to such foreign companies doing business in Nova Scotia, it does not appear that the goods in question were exhibited to the Sheriff as the goods of the Company, nor does it appear that they were valued by two sworn appraisers, or that the amount of appraisal was endorsed on writ of attachment, or that the Sheriff levied on such part of the goods as would be sufficient to refund the sum so sworn to, &c.

Because, if sec. 7 is also applicable to such foreign companies, it does not appear that notice of such assessment was given to the agent of the Company, or that the three days were allowed him to find security; nor does it appear that the prothonotary had any power to issue the order for sale in consequence of the absence of a judge. Rex. v. Croke^[23].

Because the plea of justification does not show that the Sheriff has made a return of the writ of attachment, without which he cannot be allowed to justify in such a case. Rev. Stat. Third Series, ch. 40, s. 13. Rowland v. Veale^[24]; Cheaseley v. Barnes^[25]; Freeman v. Bluett^[26]; Williams v. Babbitt^[27]; also, American cases cited in 2 Greenleaf on Ev., 597.

And Respondent further contends:—That as it is only service of summons on the agent of a foreign company doing business in the Province by an agent, which the statute says "gives jurisdiction to the Court," and as it appears that the summons was served on the agent of Respondent, and not of the company, the Court had no jurisdiction, and the writ of attachment and order for sale, and all proceedings thereunder, were null and void; that a Court of law has in itself no inherent power or right to order perishable goods seized under attachment to be sold, La Rochelle v. Piche et al^[28]; and that sec. 6 and 7 of Absent or Absconding Debtors Act does not extend to foreign companies doing business in the Province by an agent, and the Court has no power to order a sale of their property under the said Act, and that all proceedings for a sale of such property are therefore null and void. "When the Court has no jurisdiction of the cause, the whole proceeding is coram non judice, and actions will lie against the above mentioned parties without any regard to the precept or process, and in this case it is not necessary to obey one who is not judge of the cause." Broom, L. M. 90, Taylor v. Clemson^[29]. Factum a judice, quod ad officium jure non pertinet, ratum non est. "A plea of justification by a constable acting under the warrant of a justice will accordingly be bad, if it does not show that the justice had jurisdiction over the subject matter upon which it is granted." Taylor v. Clemson^[30]; Broom's Prac.^[31]; Broom, L. M.^[32].

As to evidence necessary in support of defence, see Crocker on Sheriffs^[33].

Mr. Gormully in reply:—

RITCHIE, J.:—

This was an action brought against the Sheriff of the County of Cumberland for converting to his own use Plaintiff's goods. Defendant, as such Sheriff, levied on these goods under an attachment. There is a provision in the Act under which these goods were seized, giving power to the Court to order perishable goods to be sold^[34]. The Court did in this case order the goods to be sold, and they were sold, and after such sale all the proceedings under the attachment appears to have been discontinued. If the Sheriff had properly taken the goods in the first instance, and if they were legally in his hands, and he sold them under the order of the Court, I think that order would protect him; but, in this case, in my opinion, the conversion of the goods took place when the Sheriff levied on them. The evidence shows the goods originally belonged to the St. Lawrence Coal Mining Company, the officers of which were domiciled in New York. The Company appears to have failed in its operations, and all their property in Nova Scotia was disposed of, except that now in question, and all debts in that Province, except $28, appear to have been settled, leaving a large debt due to the Plaintiff, who had been connected with the Company, and for which he held the promissory notes of the Company. The Supreme Court of Nova Scotia held there was evidence of a sale of these goods; and there appears to me to have been ample evidence for the consideration of the jury of a bonâ fide sale, for a valuable consideration, by the officers of the Company to the Plaintiff, for the purpose of discharging the lawful indebtedness of the Company. I think this was within the legislative power given to incorporated companies under ch. 53, sec. 15, N. S. Acts, which makes acts performed within the scope of their charter, or acts creating them, valid, notwithstanding they may not be done under, or authenticated by, the seal of the Company, if such an authentication was needed, but which, I think, was, in this case, wholly unnecessary^[35].

The Company having in the due course of its business become indebted to the Plaintiff, I can see no reason why it might not as well pay that liability by a sale and delivery of personal property to their creditor in discharge thereof, as by handing him the amount in money, or selling the property to third parties, and handing over the proceeds to the creditor.

With reference to the conversion, I think the very circumstance of Defendant's levying on the goods, and subsequently selling them, was a clear conversion. There was not, it is true, evidence that the goods were on the levy moved, but it is clear the Sheriff did levy on them, and it is equally clear that the Court ordered the goods, thus in his hands and under his control, to be sold, as being in his possession under the levy, and that they were so sold.

The definition of a conversion, as given by the editor of Bacon's abridgment "Trover" (B), is this:—

The action being founded upon a conjunct right of property and possession, any act of the Defendant which negatives or is inconsistent with such right, amounts in law to a conversion. It is not necessary to a conversion that there should be a manual taking of the thing in question by the Defendant; it is not necessary that it should be shown that he has applied it to his own use. Does he exercise a dominion over it in exclusion or in defiance of Plaintiff's right? If he does, that is in law a conversion, be it for his own or another person's use."

I think when a Sheriff levies on property he does take possession of it, as against the party, and does convert it. If he exercises control in defiance of the party who had the right, there is a conversion, and he may be sued for the conversion, and, as said by Alderson, B., in Fouldes v. Willoughby^[36],

For this simple reason, that it is an act inconsistent with the general right of dominion which the owner of the chattel has in it, who is entitled to the use of it at all times and in all places. When, therefore, a man takes that chattel, either for the use of himself or another, it is a conversion.

I think the Plaintiff's right of action did not commence at the time of the sale, but so soon as the Sheriff levied upon the goods, and so exercised a claim and dominion over them adverse to the Plaintiff and inconsistent with his general right of dominion.

Under these circumstances, I think the Plaintiff has made out his case, viz.: that the Company, by its officers, was competent to sell the goods in question, that there was evidence to establish the sale of the goods to the Plaintiff, and of a conversion by the Defendant. I state this with hesitancy, only because the views of my learned brethren are at variance with the conclusion at which I have arrived.

STRONG, J.:—

The conversion complained of by the declaration was the sale, not the seizure or taking of the goods. The 4th plea justifies the sale under the order of the Court, and avers that to have been the act complained of in the declaration. The Plaintiff is therefore confined to the sale as the conversion for which he sues. If he wanted to insist on the taking as constituting a conversion he should have new assigned. I should doubt, however, if a mere taking of the goods of a third person under a mesne attachment against a Defendant, to keep them in medio until the termination of the action, is a conversion. A conversion is defined to be a taking of chattels with an intent to deprive the Plaintiff of his property in them, or with an intent to destroy them or change their nature. Taking under a mesne attachment does not, like taking under a writ of feri facias with intent to sell, imply any such intention. But, be that as it may, the conversion here must, on the pleadings, be taken to be the sale. Now, this sale was under an order of the Court, and was the act of the Court, not the act of the

Sheriff. It was not the case of a writ of execution or attachment being placed in the Sheriff's hands against the goods of A, and a seizure under it of the goods of B, which the exigency of the writ did not warrant; but these specific goods being already in the Sheriff's hands, having been seized under the attachment, the Court orders them to be sold. The Sheriff is, therefore, protected by the order for sale. The issue, it is true, on this line of pleading, is narrowed to this: Was the discontinuance after or before the sale? It appears that the sale took place on the 7th November, 1866, and that there was no discontinuance until December 11th, 1874. The issue on the rejoinder to the replication to the plea of justification ought, therefore, to have been found for the Defendant. But it was proper to consider, whether the plea did disclose a good justification, since there would be no use in granting a new trial if in point of law the Sheriff could not justify. As regards the other point argued, there can, in my judgment, be no doubt that the Company was one to which the Rev. Stats. p. 8, (4th Series), ch. 97, was applicable. I am, therefore, of opinion that the verdict ought to have been set aside with costs, and a new trial ordered.

TASCHEREAU and FOURNIER, J. J., concurred.

HENRY, J.:—

The points to be decided in this case are in an action of trover, brought by the Respondent against the Appellant, who, as Sheriff of the County of Cumberland, sold certain chattel property claimed by the Respondent to belong to him to recover its value.

To the charge of conversion in the Respondent's writ the Appellant pleaded:—

1st. That he did not convert to his own use the Plaintiff's goods, as in the writ alleged.

2nd. That the goods were not the property of the Plaintiff.

3rd. That the Plaintiff was not possessed, nor was he entitled to the possession of the said goods.

And by a fourth plea, he justifies the taking of the goods, as and being the goods of the Lawrence Coal Mining Company, under a writ of attachment at the suit of one George Hibbard, against the said Lawrence Coal Mining Company, directed to him as Sheriff of the County of Cumberland; and the subsequent sale thereof under an order issued by the Supreme Court and signed by A. S. Blenkhorn, Esquire, Prothonotary of the said Court at Amherst in the said County of Cumberland, whereby he was ordered and required, amongst other things, as such Sheriff, as aforesaid, to put up and sell the said goods at public auction to respond the judgment which might be obtained. The Plaintiff replied to the latter plea:—

That after the proceedings in the plea mentioned, taken by the said George Hibbard, the suit instituted by the said George Hibbard against the Lawrence Coal Mining Company was discontinued by him, and the attachment and all proceeding thereunder were thereby abandoned; which said discontinuance is on the files of this honorable court.

To that replication the Appellant rejoined, first, that the said cause was not discontinued, and second:—

That the said discontinuance was not filed until after the goods in said writ mentioned were sold under the order in his said plea mentioned, and the proceeds applied as therein mentioned.

On the trial of the issues of fact, leave was given to the Appellant to demur to the replication of the Respondent, which he did, and therein says that the Plaintiff's replication is bad in substance, inasmuch as the Sheriff is justified by his writ of attachment and order for sale, and was bound to execute it:—

That the act of the Plaintiff in the cause under which the attachment was made, in discontinuing the cause after the Sheriff had sold the property in question, cannot and does not affect his justification, as pleaded.

Marginal note on the demurrer:—

Matter of law to be argued—that the Sheriff, being bound to act in obedience to the order of the Court, cannot be affected by a discontinuance of a suit under which property was sold.

Joinder in demurrer by Respondent. Under the charge of the learned Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, before whom the cause was tried in October, 1876, the jury found a verdict for the Plaintiff for $500, and a rule nisi was granted to set it aside on the following grounds:—

- 1st. That the verdict was against law and evidence.
- 2nd. That the learned Chief Justice misdirected the jury.
- 3rd. That evidence was improperly received.
- 4th. That evidence was improperly rejected, and
- 5th. That there was no sufficient evidence of the conversion of the goods.

This rule and the demurrer were argued before the whole Court at Halifax, and by a majority of the Court the rule nisi was discharged with costs, and a judgment on the demurrer given in favor of the Respondent.

In the majority judgment, the fourth plea is pronounced bad, and a doubt expressed as to the sufficiency of the replication to it. Hence the judgment on the demurrer. The appeal to this Court is from that judgment on all the points, both as to the facts and the law.

I will first deal with the demurrer. I would not question the correctness of the judgment if the fourth plea is defective, but I don't think it is.

To decide that point, we must first consider the nature of the position held by the Appellant when he received the order for the sale of the goods. He had previously levied on the goods under the attachment, but had not removed them. Section 6, ch. 97 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, entitled: "Of suits against absent and absconding debtors," provides that:—

Where the goods consist of stock, or are shown by affidavit to be of a perishable nature, and the agent shall not, within three days after notice of the appraisement, give security for their value, a judge, or a prothonotary of the county, in his absence, may, at his discretion, cause the same to be sold at public auction, and the proceeds thereof shall be retained by the Sheriff, or paid into Court, to respond the judgment.

The prothonotary of the county made an order under the provisions of that section, and directed to the Sheriff, to sell the said goods under the terms thereof.

On receipt of that order it was the Sheriff's duty to execute it. He could have been compelled by legal and summary means to do it, and would also be answerable to the Plaintiff in that suit for any resulting loss or damage to the goods, in case he eventually obtained judgment. So far, therefore, as the conversion by the sale, the order to sell the specific goods would be a complete justification and the plea to that extent is a sufficient answer.

If the plea admitted the goods were the property of the Plaintiff it would have been bad; but, on the contrary, it alleges them to have been, when levied upon, the goods of the Lawrence Coal Mining Company, and that, with the other allegations contained in it, forms a perfect answer to the writ; and, as a whole, is consequently a good plea. The Respondent virtually says:— they were not the Plaintiff's goods, but those of the Lawrence Coal Mining Company, and I, as Sheriff, levied upon them under the attachment, and subsequently sold them.

A special plea of justification is only necessary where goods of one party are taken out of the possession of another, and is only necessary as a justification for interfering with the possession. If goods are not taken out of the possession of the Plaintiff the right is tried by a simple denial of ownership. The justification in this case would only be necessary in case the goods in question, were, when taken, in contemplation of law, in the possession of the Respondent.

The replication to the plea is bad, for the simple reason that the Respondent could not, by any possibility, be affected by any subsequent act of the Plaintiff in regard to the discontinuance of the suit. I think, therefore, the judgment on the demurrer must be in favor of the Appellant.

Under that ruling the judgment on the facts submitted to the jury should also be for him, if the order for sale would be a justification to the officer for the original levy on the goods, as well as for the sale, even had they been the property of the Respondent; but, as it is not, the result must be affected by the question as to the ownership of the goods when the levy was made. If, then, they were not the Respondent's, he cannot recover; but the whole case, as far as the rule nisi for a new trial goes, depends altogether on the settlement of that question. The property, as admitted by both parties, was that of the Lawrence Coal Mining Company up to the date of the transfer claimed by the Respondent. Did he, then, obtain the property in the goods by the document signed by "J. W. Hawley, agent." If not, he had no property in them. In determining that point we must see if, in the first place, Hawley had sufficient authority to divest the Company of the ownership. The alleged transfer is signed by him on the 5th of July, 1867. He, the Respondent, and others were appointed Directors of the Company on the 18th of January, 1865, for one year from that date. No subsequent appointment of Directors was ever made, and there is no provision to be found anywhere, as far as the evidence goes, as is sometimes the case in respect of public officers, that the Directors should hold office till others were appointed in their place. There may have been such a provision in the

by-laws of the Company, but evidence of it is wanting. On the 18th of January, 1866, the Directors ceased to be so; and, as such, could not collectively or individually bind the Company. Resolutions of the stockholders were passed in April and December, 1865, authorizing certain Directors named, to sell on certain conditions the real and personal property of the Company; but Hawley was not one of them. On the 26th of February, 1866, at a meeting of the stockholders, a resolution was passed authorizing Messrs. Hawley, W. G. Howe and Alden:—

To sell all the real and personal estate, and also the leasehold of the Company for such sum or sums, and on such terms, as in their judgment will be for the best interest of the Company, and pay the proceeds of such sale into the hands of the Treasurer for the benefit of the creditors of the said Company, and if the amount of such sale exceeds the debts, the balance to be paid pro rata among the stockholders.

No one will pretend for a moment that Hawley alone had power to make the sale to the Respondent, which the document signed by him purports to have been made. The delegated power by the Company was to three, and the three were to exercise their judgment in regard to it; and besides, none of them, nor the three together, had power to give any portion of the property in payment of any particular debt. It was to be sold for cash, and that paid into the hands of the Treasurer. The Respondent was himself a Director; and was quite aware, no doubt, of the nature of the authority given to Hawley, Howe and Alden, and is concluded thereby. There is no evidence of any ratification of the sale by the Company. In fact, there was but one meeting of the Company after that of February, 1866, and that was in 1874, which appears to have been called for the purpose of authorizing a transfer of the lease of the mines to the Respondent, which was done; and that only.

Some oral evidence was offered of the authority of Hawley to sell the personal property; but it was objected to and cannot be received for the obvious reason that no meeting had ever considered the subject. In the absence, then, of legitimate evidence, and when considering, too, that if any Directors existed at the time of the transfer, the Respondent was one, and could not become a purchaser through a sale by the Directors' he having with them a fiduciary authority to sell, if any such existed, I must say I can see no authority for the transfer to bind the Company, even if it had been made in the name of the Company and under its seal.

The instrument in question does not purport to be a transfer by the Company. It contains no words making a transfer. It only says baldly that the Respondent has purchased through T. R. Hawley, authorized to sell the same, the property mentioned in the schedule. A mere naked purchase, without evidence of any consideration given, or any delivery of the property, will not pass it. I cannot think the instrument of any more value than a letter to some person would have been, containing the same substance. It does not say who owned the property, or by whom he was authorized to sell it, and it is signed by "T. R. Hawley, agent." Agent of whom? It discloses no consideration or terms for the purchase. No consideration is shown either by, or dehors, the instrument by any one present at the alleged purchase. I will not say a written transfer was absolutely necessary, but I am of opinion the document per se is insufficient to make it. There is no other evidence of it; for neither of the parties to the transfer, Hawley and Dillingham, or any of the witnesses to it, or any other person present, was examined; and there is, therefore, no legal evidence of it. Alden's hearsay evidence upon this point, objected to at the trial, cannot be received.

The Respondent, in his evidence, says:—

Alden, Dillingham, Hawley and Wentworth, were all creditors of the Company, and were the four interested with me in the transfer of the personal property—under his honorary obligation. Thus, then, was Hawley undertaking to act as the agent of the Company to convey, with the assistance of Dillingham, the property of the Company to the Respondent for his, Hawley's, Dillingham's and Wentworth's benefit. Surely the Company, at any time, could repudiate such a transfer; and, if void, as against the Company, it must be so as against a creditor of the Company, as Hibbard appears to have been.

And, now, in conclusion, as to the seal. I have carefully examined all the authorities, and have had no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that, in the absence of statutory enactment, the contract in question could only be valid under the seal of the Company.

By the registry of the articles of association in evidence, this Company was incorporated, not as a trading company, but:—

For the special purpose of opening and working mines and veins, or deposits of coal and oils in the River Hebert Settlement, * * * and the exporting and making sale thereof, and of constructing and operating railways, tramways, or plank roads, necessary for transporting the said coal, when mined, to tide water, and for the purpose of constructing piers, docks and buildings necessary for carrying on said business, and of doing all other business which may be lawfully undertaken and connected therewith.

This is not, then, a "trading" Company, and therefore rules as to buying and selling stocks in trade will not apply to it.

The "selling" contemplated by this Company was to be of coal and oil, not the houses, buildings, or plant. The intention was to keep the latter as means to enable the Company to carry out the intentions of the charter.

The intention is clear and obvious, and I cannot strain words declaring, as do those of section 15, chap. 53 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, that:—

The acts of incorporated companies performed within the scope of their charters, or acts creating them, shall be valid, notwithstanding they may not be done under, or authenticated by the seal of such corporations, to mean that a company may, without seal, sell and dispose of their whole property, and thereby wind up the company. Such a power is certainly, to my mind, not given by the section just quoted; for that section clearly has reference, as to this Company, to acts done "in the opening and working mines, &c." and the exporting and making sale of "coal and oil, &c." It, in fact, only applies to a going Company, and cannot be applied to the expiring flicker, or final sale of the houses, plant, &c., of a bankrupt company. For the reasons given, I think, the rule for the discharge of the rule nisi herein should itself be discharged and the said rule nisi made absolute with costs.

Appeal allowed with costs, and new trial ordered with costs in the Court below.

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Criminal law — Interim release — Detention review — Accused denied interim release pending trial — Detention status confirmed by judge conducting review under s. 525 of Criminal Code — Proper approach to detention review hearing under s. 525 of Criminal Code — Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 525.

On January 4, 2016, M was arrested and charged with several firearm offences. He sought bail for the first time in respect of these charges on November 9, 2016, but his application was dismissed, as the judge was not satisfied that any terms of release would adequately address the risk that M would, if released, commit other offences or interfere with the administration of justice. Later that month, M sought a review of his detention order under s. 520 of the Criminal Code, which was denied on the basis that the judge saw no significant change that would justify releasing M. In March 2017, Crown counsel asked the defence whether M wished to pursue a 90-day bail review under s. 525 of the Criminal Code. Given the existence of competing lines of authority, the British Columbia Supreme Court heard submissions from both parties on the correct approach to the review under s. 525. It concluded that the correct test at a s. 525 hearing involves a two-step process: the accused must first convince the reviewing judge either that there has been an unreasonable delay in the proceedings on the Crown's part or that the passage of time has had a material impact on the initial basis for detaining the accused, and, if either of these thresholds is met, the judge must then determine whether the detention of the accused remains justified within the meaning of s. 515(10) of the Criminal Code. Because of the formulation of the test, M made no submissions and his detention order was confirmed.

M pled guilty on January 29, 2018 to reduced charges and was sentenced to 30 months' imprisonment. Since M is no longer in pre-trial custody, his appeal to the Court is moot; however, as guidance is needed to establish the correct approach to a detention review hearing under s. 525 of the Criminal Code, the Court exercised its discretion to hear the appeal on the merits.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

In this case, the Court must apply the principles of statutory interpretation to determine the correct approach to a detention review under s. 525, and to explain the place of such a review within the larger context of pre-trial custody in Canada. In Canadian law, the pre-trial release of accused persons is the cardinal rule and detention, the exception. Yet practices vary widely in terms of when s. 525 detention review hearings happen, whether they are mandatory, what factors are considered and which test is applied.

The purpose of the s. 525 hearing is to prevent accused persons from languishing in pre-trial custody and to ensure a prompt trial. Parliament sought to achieve this purpose by subjecting lengthy pre-trial detentions to judicial oversight at set points in time, by affording an opportunity to have a judge consider whether the continued detention of an accused person is justified, and by conferring on the judge a discretion to expedite the trial of an individual in pre-trial detention. The right not to be denied reasonable bail without just cause, which is enshrined in s. 11(e) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, operates as a key organizing principle of Part XVI of the Criminal Code. Release is favoured at the earliest reasonable opportunity and on the least onerous grounds. The experience of pre-trial detention can have serious detrimental impacts on an accused person's ability to raise a defence. It also comes at a significant cost in terms of their loss of liberty, the impact on their mental and physical well-being and on their families, and the loss of their livelihoods. Parliament intended s. 525 to operate as a safeguard. This section imposes an independent responsibility on the reviewing judge to consider whether the continued detention of the accused is justified, and establishes a discretionary mechanism designed to prevent unreasonable delay and to expedite the trials of individuals in remand.

The correct approach to the s. 525 detention review is as follows. First, the jailer has an obligation to apply for the detention review hearing immediately upon the expiration of 90 days following the day on which the accused was initially taken before a justice under s. 503 of the Criminal Code. Where there is an intervening detention order under s. 520, 521 or 524 of the Criminal Code following the initial appearance of the accused and before the end of the 90-day period, the 90-day period begins again. Accused persons who have not had a full bail hearing are also entitled to a review under s. 525, since the fundamental purpose of s. 525 is to afford an opportunity to have a judge scrutinize the detention itself, and these individuals should not be denied that safeguard. Upon receiving the application from the jailer, the judge must fix a date and give notice for the hearing. The s. 525 hearing is an automatic procedure, and the mandatory obligations to make the application and to fix a date lie with the jailer and the judge respectively. Form letters that place the burden on the accused to pursue a s. 525 hearing are inconsistent with the law. The hearing must be held at the earliest opportunity. At the hearing, the reviewing judge may refer to the transcript, exhibits and reasons from any initial judicial interim release hearing and from any subsequent review hearings, and should show respect for any findings of fact made by the first-level decision maker if there is no cause to interfere with them. Both parties are also entitled to make submissions on the basis of any additional credible or trustworthy information which is relevant or material to the judge's analysis, and pre-existing material is subject to the criteria of due diligence and relevance.

At the hearing, unreasonable delay is not a threshold that must be met before the detention of the accused is reviewed. Parliament did not intend to restrict the court's ability to review the detention of an accused at a s. 525 hearing to situations in which there has already been an unreasonable delay. The overarching question is only whether the continued detention of the accused in custody is justified within the meaning of s. 515(10), which sets out three possible grounds on which the detention of an accused in custody may be justified: where it is necessary in order to ensure the attendance of the accused in court; where it is necessary for the protection or safety of the public; and where it is necessary in order to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice. In determining whether the detention of the accused is still justified, the reviewing judge may consider any new evidence or change in the circumstances of the accused, the impact of the passage of time and any unreasonable delay on the proportionality of the detention, and the rationale offered for the original detention order, if one was made. If there was no initial bail hearing, the s. 525 judge is responsible for conducting one, taking into account the time the accused has already spent in pre-trial custody. Ultimately, s. 525 requires a reviewing judge to provide accused persons with reasons why their continued detention is — or is not — justified. Finally, the judge should make use of his or her discretion under ss. 525(9) and 526 to give directions for expediting the trial and related proceedings where it is appropriate to do so. Directions should be given with a view to mitigating the risk of unconstitutional delay and expediting the trials of accused persons who are subject to lengthy pre-trial detention.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE —

I. Overview

[1] The right to liberty and the presumption of innocence are fundamental tenets of our criminal justice system. In the pre-trial context, release — at the earliest opportunity and in the least onerous manner — is the default presumption in Canadian criminal law. Pre-trial detention is the exception, not the rule.

[2] And yet there are a significant number of individuals in remand custody at any given time in Canada. In some cases, accused persons are detained in provincial jails for the entire length of the pre-trial process, which can amount to hundreds of days in custody. This appeal concerns those individuals, and their right to what has become known as the “90-day detention review” under s. 525 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46 (“Cr. C.”).

[3] This Court has addressed issues related to bail and detention on several occasions in recent years. In R. v. Antic, 2017 SCC 27, [2017] 1 S.C.R. 509, it clarified the ladder principle in the law of bail and the framework for authorizing release under s. 515 Cr. C. In R. v. Oland, 2017 SCC 17, [2017] 1 S.C.R. 250, the Court addressed the issues of release pending appeal under s. 679 Cr. C. and the review under s. 680 Cr. C. In R. v. St-Cloud, 2015 SCC 27, [2015] 2 S.C.R. 328, it considered the test for detention under s. 515(10)(c) and bail review under ss. 520 and 521 Cr. C.

[4] In the case at bar, the Court is asked to determine the correct approach to a detention review under s. 525 Cr. C., and to explain the place of such a review within the larger context of pre-trial custody in Canada. For the reasons that follow, I find that Parliament intended s. 525 to operate as a safeguard. This section imposes an independent responsibility on the reviewing judge to consider whether the continued detention of the accused is justified, and establishes a discretionary mechanism designed to prevent unreasonable delay and to expedite the trials of individuals in remand. Given that Mr. Myers' appeal is moot, I would simply allow the appeal and make no further order.

II. Background

A. Arrest and Prior Charges

[5] On January 4, 2016, Mr. Myers was arrested following a high-speed car chase involving gunfire in Surrey and Delta, British Columbia. He was charged with a number of offences, including intentionally discharging a restricted or prohibited firearm; occupying a motor vehicle knowing that there was a firearm in the vehicle; using a firearm in committing an indictable offence; possessing a restricted or prohibited firearm; and possessing a weapon and/or ammunition contrary to a lifetime firearms ban.

[6] Mr. Myers was already on bail for unrelated break and enter charges when he was arrested. He had various prior convictions, was on probation, and was under multiple court-ordered prohibitions against possessing firearms and ammunition. He was also the subject of a Canada-wide warrant for charges that had been laid in Alberta in 2015.

[7] At the time of his arrest, Mr. Myers consented to detention without a bail hearing. About 4 months later, he pled guilty to the outstanding break and enter charges and was sentenced to 14 months incarceration. His release date in relation to those offences would have been in October 2016, taking time served into account. As of October 2016, Mr. Myers was no longer detained on any matter other than the new charges related to his arrest on January 4.

B. Ruling on the Judicial Interim Release Application (Sudeyko Prov. Ct. J.)

[8] Mr. Myers sought bail for the first time in respect of those charges on November 9, 2016. He was in a reverse onus position at the bail hearing: s. 515(6) Cr. C. The judge considered the relative strength of the Crown's case, Mr. Myers' criminal record and, to a lesser extent, his other outstanding charges. The judge noted that Mr. Myers had a history of failing to follow court orders, and of then committing other offences. Defence counsel had submitted that Mr. Myers, who was only 26, had an opiate addiction and that it was the root cause of his criminal history. The defence proposed that Mr. Myers therefore be released into a residential drug treatment facility, and suggested cash bail, a daily reporting requirement, an ankle bracelet and electronic monitoring as additional conditions. However, the judge was not satisfied that any terms of release would adequately address the risk that Mr. Myers would, if released, commit other offences or interfere with the administration of justice. He therefore dismissed the application and ordered that Mr. Myers be detained on the basis of the ground set out in s. 515(10)(b).

C. Ruling on the Section 520 Detention Review (Sudeyko Prov. Ct. J.)

[9] At the preliminary inquiry on November 24, 2016, it was revealed that the Crown's key witness was no longer willing to testify and that the Crown would need to seek admission of his police statement at trial instead. Counsel for Mr. Myers immediately sought a review of Mr. Myers' detention under s. 520 on the basis of this new weakness in the Crown's case. That review application was denied on the basis that the judge saw no significant change that would justify releasing Mr. Myers at that time.

D. Decision of the Supreme Court of British Columbia (Riley J.), 2017 BCSC 1717

[10] In a letter dated March 14, 2017, Crown counsel asked the defence whether Mr. Myers wished to pursue a bail review under s. 525. In the resulting hearing on July 21 of that year, given the existence of competing lines of authority, Riley J. of the British Columbia Supreme Court heard submissions from both parties on the correct approach to take under s. 525. His reasons for judgment were released on September 27, 2017.

[11] Riley J. concluded that the correct test at a s. 525 hearing involves a two-step process. He found that the accused must first convince the reviewing judge either that there has been an unreasonable delay in the proceedings on the Crown's part or that the passage of time has had a material impact on the initial basis for detaining the accused. If either of these thresholds is met, the judge must then determine whether the detention of the accused remains justified within the meaning of s. 515(10).

[12] The review proceeded on October 5, 2017. Because of the formulation of the test, Mr. Myers made no submissions and his detention order was confirmed.

E. Mootness

[13] Mr. Myers filed his application for leave to appeal while he was still in pre-trial custody. However, he pled guilty on January 29, 2018 to one count of occupying a motor vehicle knowing there was a firearm in it under s. 94(1) Cr. C., and one count of possessing ammunition contrary to a prohibition under s. 117.01(1) Cr. C. The Crown entered a stay of proceedings on all the remaining counts on the indictment, and Mr. Myers was sentenced to 30 months' imprisonment. As he is no longer in pre-trial custody, the appeal is moot.

[14] This Court recognized in Oland that bail-related matters are inherently “evasive of appellate review” owing to their temporary nature: para. 17. Despite the fact that pre-trial detention is governed by federal law, there has been a widespread, and systemic, divergence in the approaches taken to 90-day detention reviews by courts across Canada. All the parties have made submissions to the effect that guidance from this Court is needed in order to determine which of these competing approaches should apply and to establish clarity in the law. The Court has therefore exercised its discretion to hear the appeal on the merits: see Borowski v. Canada (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 123 \(SCC\), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 342, at pp. 358-63.

III. Issue

[15] This appeal raises a single question: What is the correct approach to a detention review hearing under s. 525 Cr. C.?

IV. Analysis

A. Two Competing Approaches to Section 525

[16] The parties suggest that the choice before this Court is between two competing approaches to s. 525 hearings. According to the first approach, unreasonable delay in getting the case to trial is a threshold condition. In the absence of an unreasonable delay, the judge at a s. 525 hearing cannot ask whether the detention remains necessary on the basis of the grounds set out in s. 515(10): see, e.g., R. v. Gill, 2005 CanLII 22214 (Ont. S.C.J.); R. v. Kissoon, 2006 CanLII 40493 (Ont. S.C.J.); R. v. Jerace, 2012 BCSC 2007; R. v. Whiteside, 2016 BCSC 131; R. v. Elmi, 2016 BCSC 376; R. v. Russell, 2016 NLTD(G) 208, 34 C.R. (7th) 262; R. v. Cheeseman, 2017 NLTD(G) 114.

[17] Under the alternative approach, unreasonable delay is not a threshold condition. Instead, the judge at a s. 525 hearing simply considers whether the continued detention of the accused is necessary on the basis of s. 515(10), and unreasonable delay is one possible factor in that analysis: see, e.g., R. v. Thorsteinson, 2006 MBQB 184, 206 Man. R. (2d) 188; R. v. Sawrenko, 2008 YKSC 27; R. v. Sarkozi, 2010 BCSC 1410; R. v. McCormack, 2014 ONSC 7123; R. v. Vandewater, 2014 BCSC 2502; R. v. Haleta, 2015 BCSC 850; R. v. Goudreau, 2015 BCSC 1227; R. v. Piazza, 2015 QCCS 707.

[18] Whether or not unreasonable delay operates as a threshold condition is clearly of fundamental importance to this appeal. However, this case requires the Court to do more than simply choose one approach or the other. Like Antic, it concerns a provision of federal law that has been applied inconsistently across the country: paras. 6 and 65-66. Practices vary widely from place to place in terms of when s. 525 hearings happen, whether they are mandatory, what factors are considered and which test is applied. It is up to this Court to apply the principles of statutory interpretation in order to resolve this issue.

[19] The modern approach to statutory interpretation requires the Court to read the words of s. 525, “in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament”: Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, at para. 21; Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership v. Rex, 2002 SCC 42, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 559, at para. 26, both quoting E. Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 87. When Parliament adopted s. 525, its purpose was clear and unambiguous. A straightforward reading of the provision, viewed properly in its legislative context, is the one which best supports that purpose.

[20] For reference purposes, s. 525 is reproduced in its entirety in the attached Appendix together with ss. 515(10) and 526. While I will generally be referring to the “90-day” review, these reasons apply with equal force, and with any necessary modifications, to the “30-day review”, that is, they apply regardless of whether the accused is being prosecuted in proceedings by way of indictment or by way of summary conviction: s. 525(1).

B. Parliament’s Intent and the Bail Reform Act

[21] Section 525 Cr. C. was first introduced in the 1972 Bail Reform Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 37. In a speech at second reading in the House of Commons, then Justice Minister John N. Turner summarized the purposes of the Act as follows:

The objectives of this bill are fourfold: First, to avoid unnecessary pre-trial arrest and detention; second, to ensure that in cases where arrest with or without warrant has taken place, the person accused, whatever his means, is not unnecessarily held in custody until his trial; third, to ensure an early trial for those who have been detained in custody pending trial; fourth, to provide statutory guidelines for decision making in this part of the criminal law process relating to arrest and bail and thereby preclude the possibility of “discretionary injustice”.

(House of Commons Debates, vol. III, 3rd Sess., 28th Parl., February 5, 1971, at p. 3116)

[22] This Court has recognized that Parliament’s overarching vision of the Bail Reform Act was the creation of “a liberal and enlightened system of pre-trial release” in which accused individuals would normally be granted bail: R. v. Morales, 1992 CanLII 53 \(SCC\), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 711, at p. 725, quoting R. v. Bray (1983), 1983 CanLII 1981 \(ON CA\), 40 O.R. (2d) 766 (C.A.), at p. 769; Antic, at para. 29. The purpose of that Act, which was influenced by both the academic work of Professor Martin L. Friedland and the findings of the Ouimet Report, as delivered by the Canadian Committee on Corrections examining the law on bail, was to reform a system that many experts saw as punitive, arbitrary, and inconsistent with the presumption of innocence: M. L. Friedland, Detention before Trial: A Study of Criminal Cases Tried in the Toronto Magistrates’ Courts (1965); Canadian Committee on Corrections, Report of the Canadian Committee on Corrections — Toward Unity: Criminal Justice and Corrections (1969). There was also particular concern regarding the relationship between prolonged pre-trial detentions and induced guilty pleas. In Minister Turner’s words:

. . . there is an indication that those who are held under pre-trial detention will have, on the basis of statistics, a lesser opportunity for an acquittal and, certainly, they will have less of an opportunity to present a reasonable defence and assemble the evidence necessary for that defence. I think that we cannot ignore, either, Mr. Speaker, the high incidence of guilty pleas by persons who are detained and kept in custody under pre-trial detention. [p. 3115]

[23] The third purpose of the Bail Reform Act as articulated by Minister Turner — to ensure an early trial for those who have been detained in custody — is of specific relevance to this appeal. It is a longstanding principle of our criminal justice system that individuals in pre-trial custody should be given a certain priority in scheduling trials. This general guiding premise has not been displaced by R. v. Jordan, 2016 SCC 27, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 631. Sections 525(9) and 526, which confer on the reviewing judge a discretion to give directions for expediting the trial of and any proceedings in relation to an accused, continue to operate as a reflection of that principle. In discussing these provisions, Minister Turner stated specifically:

[T]here are important new proposals in the bill which provide that where an accused does not achieve bail after an arrest, there are methods for expediting his trial The provisions of the bill also ensure that where an accused is being held in custody pending his trial, or pending an appeal of his conviction, the situation must be reviewed by the courts within set periods of time, and directions may be given by the courts for getting the case on to trial. . . . [p. 3117]

[24] Regardless of which test is applied, courts across Canada share an overarching consensus that the purpose of the s. 525 hearing is to prevent accused persons from languishing in pre-trial custody and to ensure a prompt trial: see, e.g., Fraser Regional Correctional Centre v. Canada (Attorney General), 1993 CanLII 354 (B.C.S.C.), at pp. 2-3; Gill, at para. 3; Sawrenko, at para. 26 (CanLII); Sarkozi, at paras. 8-11 (CanLII); Haleta, at paras. 8-10. It is, moreover, clear that Parliament sought to achieve this purpose by subjecting lengthy pre-trial detentions to judicial oversight at set points in time, by affording an opportunity to have a judge consider whether the continued detention of an accused person is justified, and by conferring on the judge a discretion to expedite the trial of an individual in pre-trial detention.

C. Current Context of Pre-trial Detention in Canada

[25] Today, the right not to be denied reasonable bail without just cause, which is enshrined in s. 11\(e\) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, operates as a key organizing principle of Part XVI of the Criminal Code: R. v. Pearson, 1992 CanLII 52 \(SCC\), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 665, at p. 691. This right has also been affirmed repeatedly by this Court, most recently in St-

Cloud, in which the Court held that “in Canadian law, the release of accused persons is the cardinal rule and detention, the exception” (para. 70 (emphasis added)), and in Antic, in which it stated that “release is favoured at the earliest reasonable opportunity and . . . on the least onerous grounds”: para. 29, quoting R. v. Anoussis, 2008 QCCQ 8100, 242 C.C.C. (3d) 113, at para. 23.

[26] Nonetheless, on any given day in Canada, nearly half of the individuals in provincial jails are accused persons in pre-trial custody: Statistics Canada, Adult and youth correctional statistics in Canada, 2016/2017 (June 2018), at p. 7; Statistics Canada, Trends in the use of remand in Canada, 2004/2005 to 2014/2015 (January 2017). In 2016-2017, approximately 7 percent of those in remand were still in custody after 3 months, and some spent upwards of 12 or even 24 months awaiting trial in detention: Statistics Canada, Table 35-10-0024-01 — Adult releases from correctional services by sex and aggregate time served (online). It must be said that the conditions faced by such individuals are often dire. Overcrowding and lockdowns are frequent features of this environment, as is limited access to recreation, health care and basic programming: R. v. Summers, 2014 SCC 26, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 575, at paras. 2 and 28; Canadian Civil Liberties Association and Education Trust, Set Up to Fail: Bail and the Revolving Door of Pre-trial Detention, by A. Deshman and N. Myers (2014) (online). Moreover, as is the case elsewhere in our criminal justice system, Indigenous individuals are overrepresented in the remand population, accounting for approximately one quarter of all adult admissions: Statistics Canada, Trends in the use of remand in Canada, 2004/2005 to 2014/2015.

[27] As this Court has recognized, the experience of pre-trial detention can have serious detrimental impacts on an accused person’s ability to raise a defence: see R. v. Hall, 2002 SCC 64, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 309, at para. 59. It also comes at a significant cost in terms of their loss of liberty, the impact on their mental and physical well-being and on their families, and the loss of their livelihoods: Friedland, at p. 172; Ell v. Alberta, 2003 SCC 35, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 857, at para. 24; Antic, at para. 66. The high cost of pre-trial detention was recognized at the time the Bail Reform Act was before Parliament: House of Commons Debates, at p. 3115. The issue remains just as relevant today.

[28] In the sections that follow, I will outline the correct approach to the s. 525 detention review, beginning with the application for the hearing. However, it is necessary to first dispose of the argument that a threshold condition of unreasonable delay must be met in order for the judge to review the detention itself.

(1) Unreasonable Delay Is Not a Threshold Requirement for Reviewing the Detention

[29] Parliament did not intend to restrict the court's ability to review the detention of an accused at a s. 525 hearing to situations in which there has been an unreasonable delay. In this case, the Crown relies almost exclusively on the heading under which s. 525 appears ("Review of Detention where Trial Delayed") to support an argument that Parliament did intend to do so. In the Crown's view, although the passage of 90 days might have been synonymous with "unreasonable delay" in 1972, this is no longer the case. The Crown suggests that Parliament has simply failed to amend the legislation in order to reflect the modern life cycle of a trial, and that s. 525 hearings were only ever intended to be held in exceptional circumstances involving unreasonable delay.

[30] In line with this view, some courts have developed a test to the effect that unreasonable delay is a precondition to reviewing the detention of the accused at a s. 525 hearing: see, e.g., Jerace, at paras. 8-12 (CanLII). The Crown submits that the result of this interpretation of s. 525 is that the detention of the accused should rarely be scrutinized, because there will rarely have been an unreasonable delay when the 90-day mark is reached. The Attorney General of Ontario argues that the correct approach is one according to which the judge does not schedule a hearing at all unless he or she is satisfied that there has been an unreasonable delay.

[31] With respect, the view that the judge must consider unreasonable delay but that the operative word for reviewing the detention of the accused is only "may" represents precisely the opposite of what the provision says:

525 (1) . . . the person having the custody of the accused shall, forthwith on the expiration of those ninety or thirty days, as the case may be, apply to a judge having jurisdiction in the place in which the accused is in custody to fix a date for a hearing to determine whether or not the accused should be released from custody.

(3) On the hearing described in subsection (1), the judge may, in deciding whether or not the accused should be released from custody, take into consideration whether the prosecutor or the accused has been responsible for any unreasonable delay in the trial of the charge.

(4) If, following the hearing described in subsection (1), the judge is not satisfied that the continued detention of the accused in custody is justified within the meaning of subsection 515(10), the judge shall order that the accused be released

[32] In short, it is perfectly clear from the section that at the hearing, the judge must consider whether the continued detention of the accused is justified, and may consider whether there has been an unreasonable delay: s. 525(1) and s. 525(3) Cr. C.; Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, s. 11. Notably, the heading itself refers only to the trial being “delayed”, and not to an “unreasonable delay”, which suggests that Parliament simply intended the word “delayed” to refer to situations in which “the trial has not commenced” before the prescribed time. As well, the use of the word “any” in s. 525(3) makes it clear that there may or may not have been an unreasonable delay before the s. 525 hearing. Simply put, it is an error of law to treat unreasonable delay as a precondition for a review of the continued detention of the accused.

[33] There is no principled basis for this Court to “read in” a more restrictive test. It does not frustrate Parliament’s purpose to take the provision at face value, nor does it result in absurdity, waste or redundancy to do so. As the intervener Canadian Civil Liberties Association reminds us, “[t]oday, as before, three months is a long time for a person who is presumed innocent to be held in jail awaiting trial”: I.F., at para. 1. The Crown argues that this timeline is no longer realistic given the increased length and complexity of modern criminal trials. But even if that were true, the appropriate solution would be for Parliament to modify these clearly expressed requirements, not for this Court to read in a threshold that was never intended and that the words of the provision do not support. Circumstances that favour the release of the accused, issues related to unreasonable delay, or the need for a court to intervene to expedite the trial will not always have arisen when the 90-day mark is reached. Instead, 90 days following the last detention order against the accused is simply the point at which Parliament has specified that a judge must determine whether the continued detention of the accused is justified. The impact of the passage of time generally (and of unreasonable delay specifically) may be properly considered in the judge's analysis at that time.

(2) Jailer's Obligation to Apply for a Hearing

[34] Subsection 525(1) makes it clear that the obligation to apply to a judge for a hearing lies with the person having the custody of the accused. In some provinces, this obligation is fulfilled by the prosecution rather than the correctional facility ("the jailer") itself.

[35] In proceedings by way of summary conviction, the obligation to make an application is triggered at the 30-day mark: s. 525(1)(b) Cr. C. For indictable offences, as in Mr. Myers' case, the relevant time is 90 days: s. 525(1)(a) Cr. C. The precise timing is made somewhat unclear by the use of the word "forthwith" in s. 525(1), which provides that the application must be made "forthwith on the expiration of those ninety . . . days". The French version of the same passage connotes immediacy — "dès l'expiration de ces quatre-vingt-dix jours" — and indicates more clearly that the obligation to make the application arises as soon as the 90-day period has expired. I would therefore take the provision to mean that the application must be made immediately upon the expiration of 90 days following (i) the date on which the accused was taken before a justice under s. 503, or (ii) the later of the date on which the accused was taken into custody and the date of a detention order under s. 520, 521 or 524.

[36] I would pause to note that it has been suggested that an accused person could apply for a s. 520 review at some point before the end of the 90-day period only to have a s. 525 hearing held just weeks or days later, which would be wasteful or redundant: G. T. Trotter, The Law of Bail in Canada (3rd ed. (loose-leaf)), at pp. 8-51 to 8-55. While this may have been an issue before amendments made to s. 525 in 1997 introduced a reference to s. 520 into s. 525(1)(a)(ii), it is no longer of concern: Criminal Law Improvement Act, 1996, S.C. 1997, c. 18, s. 61(1). Section 525(1)(a)(ii) now indicates that the 90-day period is determined in relation to any order made pursuant to s. 521, 524 or 520.

[37] The rule is therefore as follows: the person having custody of the accused must ordinarily apply to the judge immediately upon the expiration of 90 days following the day on which the accused was initially taken before a justice under s. 503: s. 525(1)(a)(i) Cr. C. Where, however, a new detention order is made against the accused — or a decision is made to continue an existing order — under s. 520, 521 or 524 after the initial appearance of the accused under s. 503, the result of s. 525(1)(a)(ii) is that the 90-day period will effectively begin again. By way of example, if an accused person is taken before a justice under s. 503 and detained in custody on day 1, then applies to a judge for a review of that decision under s. 520 on day 50 and the detention is confirmed, the jailer's obligation to make the application will not arise until 140 days following the day on which the accused person was first detained in custody. In addition to conforming to the words of s. 525(1), this interpretation minimizes the risk of redundancy, addresses any concerns related to the scarcity of judicial resources and limits the applicability of s. 525 to situations in which the accused has actually been in custody for a long period without judicial oversight.

[38] In R. v. Acera, 2017 ABQB 470, Veit J. suggested that at least one correctional facility appeared to be systematically failing to meet its obligation under the Criminal Code to apply for s. 525 hearings, sometimes by a margin of several months: paras. 10-17 and Appendix A (CanLII). The deadlines imposed by Parliament for an application under s. 525 are known to and foreseeable by all involved, including the correctional facility, the Crown and the court. It may well be that administrative reforms are required in order to ensure that s. 525 applications are made on time every time, for every eligible accused person. Delays in routine bail and detention matters are a manifestation of the culture of complacency denounced by this Court in Jordan, and must be addressed.

(3) Judge's Obligation to Fix a Date and Hold the Hearing

[39] Upon receiving the application from the jailer, the judge must fix a date and give notice for the hearing: s. 525(2) Cr. C. How much time the judge has after receiving the application before the date must be fixed is not specified. In fixing a date, the judge does not have a statutory discretion to refrain from holding the hearing until there has been an unreasonable delay or until she or he believes that the test for the release of the accused will be met. For a judge to do so would have the effect of creating a threshold condition for the hearing where it is plain that none exists in the language of s. 525. Moreover, such a practice could easily result in longer periods of unnecessary pre-trial detention than there would have been had the accused simply appeared before the judge at a properly conducted review hearing at the time Parliament intended. Thus, in order for the s. 525 hearing to fulfill its purpose of meaningfully safeguarding the accused person's liberty, the jailer must make the application within the appropriate time limit, and the court must fix the date of the hearing without delay. And upon receiving the application from the jailer, the judge must schedule the hearing for the first available date.

[40] On the hearing date, the Crown and the accused must appear before the judge. In oral argument in this Court, it was suggested that the judge could then routinely exercise his or her discretion to adjourn the s. 525 hearing until a later time. With respect, I disagree with this position. I am prepared to accept that occasionally, and in limited circumstances, an adjournment could be compatible with the purpose of s. 525 and with Parliament's intent. However, as with the process of fixing a date for the hearing, it would be improper to adjourn merely because the judge does not believe that a full review of the detention would result in the release of the accused or because an unreasonable delay has not yet occurred.

[41] That being said, an adjournment should not be precluded where it clearly serves the interests of justice and the underlying purposes of the provision. For example — without limiting the foregoing — where a key piece of information is missing or a key event is pending, it would be entirely appropriate for the judge to adjourn the hearing until such time as the detention of the accused can be meaningfully assessed. The reviewing judge's exercise of this supervisory authority must ultimately be guided by the overarching purpose of the provision, which is to prevent an accused person from languishing in pre-trial custody and to ensure a prompt trial by subjecting lengthy detentions to judicial oversight. As a result, adjournments must always be used in a manner that safeguards and is consistent with the right of the accused to a prompt and thorough review of his or her detention when the 90-day mark is reached. Reviewing judges must rely on good sense and experience in order to ensure that adjournments enhance rather than undermine the purpose of the s. 525 detention review.

(a) Application of Section 525 Where There Has Been No Initial Hearing

[42] There may be some instances in which an accused person has not had a full provincial court bail hearing that resulted in a detention order, but remains in custody after 90 days. This would primarily be the case for individuals in a reverse onus position who have consented to remand, but it could also arise in other narrow circumstances. There is some disagreement over whether such an individual is entitled to a s. 525 hearing: see, e.g., Sarkozi, at para. 32; R. v. Saulnier, 2012 NSSC 45, 314 N.S.R. (2d) 203, at paras. 10-11; R. v. Burgar, 2003 BCCA 426, 186 B.C.A.C. 15, at para. 10.

[43] In my view, there is no principled basis for holding that individuals in this situation are not entitled to a hearing under s. 525. In theory, every accused person in custody will have been “taken before a justice under section 503” within the meaning of s. 525(1) and is therefore entitled to a hearing under s. 525. More to the point, the fundamental purpose of s. 525 is to afford an opportunity to have a judge scrutinize the detention itself, and individuals who find themselves in these exceptional circumstances should not be denied that safeguard. I would echo the view that those who, for whatever reason, do not contest their initial detention “should not be punished for doing so, by depriving them of the potential benefits of s. 525 hearings, especially where their liberty and constitutional right to a trial within ‘a reasonable time’ is implicated”: Saulnier, at para. 10.

(b) No Request Is Required for the Hearing to Take Place

[44] It is clear from the Criminal Code that the s. 525 hearing is an automatic procedure. The mandatory obligations to make the application and to fix a date lie with the jailer and the judge, respectively. In this case, the Crown sent defence counsel a letter in which it invited him to reply in order “to advise whether [Mr. Myers] wishes to pursue a bail review at this time, and if so, to arrange a mutually convenient date”: Appellant’s Condensed Book, Tab 8. Form letters which place the burden on the accused to pursue a s. 525 hearing are inconsistent with the law. Such letters may disproportionately confuse or discourage unrepresented individuals, who are in particular need of the judicial oversight Parliament intended to ensure when it enacted s. 525. There may be circumstances in which an accused person, fully informed of his or her rights and the purpose of the provision, will decline what is intended to be an automatic hearing under s. 525. However, the words, the context and the purpose of the provision do not support an interpretation to the effect that s. 525 hearings are an “opt-in” affair.

(4) Overarching Question at the Hearing

[45] The overarching question at the s. 525 hearing is clear from the words of the provision. Section 525(1) explicitly states that the judge’s role is “to determine whether or not the accused should be released from custody”. Section 525(3) provides that the judge may, “in deciding whether or not the accused should be released from custody”, take any unreasonable delay into consideration. Section 525(4) instructs the judge to order the accused person’s release if the judge “is not satisfied that the continued detention of the accused in custody is justified within the meaning of subsection 515(10)”.

[46] The question that the judge must answer at a s. 525 hearing is therefore as follows: Is the continued detention of the accused in custody justified within the meaning of s. 515(10)? Section 515(10) sets out three possible grounds on which the detention of an accused in custody may be justified: where it is necessary in order to ensure the attendance of the accused in court; where it is necessary for the protection or safety of the public; and where it is necessary in order to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice.

(5) Nature of the Detention Review

[47] The question in the s. 525 review — whether the continued detention of the accused is justified — is somewhat different in nature than the question at the initial bail hearing or in a review under s. 520 or 521. While ss. 520 and 521 exist for the purpose of reviewing a prior order, a review under s. 525 is more properly characterized as a review of the detention itself. Yet there is no indication that Parliament intended the judge presiding a s. 525 detention review hearing to reconduct the original bail hearing in its entirety simply because 90 days have elapsed. Mr. Myers himself concedes as much: he argues only that a s. 525 hearing requires a “multi-factorial analysis”: A.F., at para. 89. This means that the judge at the s. 525 hearing should in his or her analysis show respect for any findings of fact made by the first-level decision maker if there is no cause to interfere with them. Similarly, any balancing exercise or weighing of factors conducted by the initial bail judge must be reviewed in light of the time that has already elapsed and any other relevant considerations, as will be discussed below.

(6) Material Available to the Judge

[48] Section 525 offers little guidance on the record available to the judge at the hearing. However, as Veale J. pointed out in Sawrenko, at para. 31, s. 525(8) serves to incorporate ss. 517 to 519, with any necessary modifications. Under s. 518(1), the prosecutor may show the circumstances of the alleged offence and the judge has a wide discretion to make inquiries, as well as to receive and consider any evidence “considered credible or trustworthy” in the circumstances of the case. The judge at the s. 525 hearing is therefore free to make inquiries about the case, as well as to rely upon the transcript, exhibits and reasons from any initial judicial interim release hearing and from any subsequent review.

[49] Furthermore, both parties are entitled to make submissions on the basis of any additional “credible or trustworthy” information which is relevant or material to the judge’s analysis. The admissibility of any material that existed at the time of the initial bail hearing but was not presented at that point should also be governed by the criteria of due diligence and relevance discussed in St-Cloud, at paras. 130-35. In the context of a s. 525 review, the judge must be particularly attentive to any new evidence or material change in the circumstances of the accused and to its impact on the question whether his or her continued detention in custody is justified. For example, the period of pre-trial detention may have afforded the accused person time to make arrangements for a suitable surety, develop a comprehensive release plan or take other steps that would negate the initial basis for his or her detention under s. 515(10).

(7) Impact of the Passage of Time and Unreasonable Delay

[50] In determining whether the detention remains justified under s. 515(10), the judge should also consider whether the time that has already elapsed has had — or the anticipated passage of time will have — an impact on the appropriateness or proportionality of the detention. In particular, it is necessary to be sensitive to whether the continued detention of the accused person could erode public confidence in the administration of justice: see, e.g., McCormack, at para. 29 (CanLII).

[51] This is ultimately a question of proportionality. In some cases, the passage of time will have no impact on the necessity of continued detention. In other cases, it may be a very strong indicator that the accused should be released, with or without conditions. Reviewing judges must be particularly alert to the possibility that the amount of time spent by an accused in detention has approximated or even exceeded the sentence he or she would realistically serve if convicted: see, e.g., Sawrenko, at para. 43. The assessment must be informed by the need to reduce the risk of induced guilty pleas, which are profoundly detrimental to the integrity of the criminal justice system. As was noted in R. v. White, 2010 ONSC 3164, “public confidence in the administration of justice, and in particular in the judicial interim release regime, would be substantially eroded by pre-trial incarceration of presumptively innocent individuals to the equivalency or beyond the term of what would be a fit sentence if [they were] convicted”: para. 10 (CanLII).

[52] Determining, for the purposes of this analysis, the sentence the accused would potentially receive is not an exact science, nor does it require an exhaustive inquiry. However, the judge’s analysis should account for the circumstances of the case that were known at the time of the hearing and reflect the relevant sentencing principles: St-Cloud, at para. 65.

[53] In other circumstances, accounting for the elapsed time or anticipated passage of time may require a more nuanced analysis of its impact on the three grounds which justify detention under s. 515(10). In St-Cloud, the Court indicated that a lengthy delay between the hearing and the eventual trial may be considered in determining whether detention is necessary to maintain confidence in the administration of justice, which is the tertiary ground: para. 71. In this sense, the analysis is not only retrospective, but also forward-looking. For example, let us consider a scenario in which an individual is detained on the basis of s. 515(10)(c), and at the time of the first detention order his trial is only two months away. If the trial date is then rescheduled for a date two years later and remains many months away at the time of s. 525 hearing, the continued detention of the accused may no longer be proportionate, or necessary, for the purposes of this third ground: see also R. v. Whyte, 2014 ONCA 268, 119 O.R. (3d) 305, at paras. 39-43; Piazza, at paras. 71-81 (CanLII). In an appropriate case, it may also be possible for the judge to conclude that a hypothetical risk in relation to the primary or secondary ground is simply outweighed by the certain cost of the accused person's loss of liberty or of a loss of public confidence in the administration of justice.

[54] As part of this analysis, the judge may consider whether either party has been responsible for any unreasonable delay in the trial of the charge: s. 525(3) Cr. C. If an unreasonable delay in getting the case to trial can be attributed to one of the parties, that factor will be relevant in determining whether the continued detention of the accused is proportionate or appropriate. Thus, if the accused appears to have engineered an unreasonable delay in his or her own trial, the basis for making a release order will clearly be weaker, but if the Crown is responsible for an unreasonable delay, this will weigh in favour of release. While the term "unreasonable delay" in s. 525 clearly cannot have the same meaning as it does in the context of s. 11(b) of the Charter, the two can be seen to be conceptually related. That being said, not every delay in getting a matter to trial will be unreasonable, and the accused does not have a right to be at any particular point in the process when the 90-day mark is reached. The judge must therefore rely on his or her judgment and experience in determining what impact, if any, the passage of time and an unreasonable delay should have on the continued detention of the accused.

[55] Finally, there may be cases in which it is necessary for the reviewing judge to scrutinize the rationale offered for the original detention order against the accused. While any previous bail decisions will be relevant and will likely inform the proceedings, reviewing judges must be careful not to simply “rubber-stamp” such decisions. As I noted above, s. 525 creates an independent safeguard function that is particularly important for unrepresented individuals, who may not have had the means, the capacity or the awareness to apply for a s. 520 review but are now appearing before a judge at a s. 525 hearing. For example, if when the accused appears at the s. 525 hearing it becomes clear that the initial bail judge made an error of law — perhaps by failing to apply the bail principles enunciated by this Court in Antic, at para. 67, — and that this resulted in an unnecessary detention, it would be wasteful to tell the accused at that point to make a separate application for a different review process under s. 520. The need to revisit an initial detention order will not arise in every case, and in the absence of a basis for judicial intervention, there is no need for a s. 525 hearing to become a protracted or formal proceeding. However, the judge must be alive to these issues when they arise, and must be prepared to respond to them appropriately.

(9) Hearing Where There Has Been No Initial Bail Decision

[56] Since s. 525 calls upon the judge to review the detention itself, the existence of an initial decision is not required in order to achieve the core objective of a s. 525 review. As I mentioned above, there may be certain anomalous situations in which an accused person who appears before a judge under s. 525 did not undergo a full initial bail hearing at the time of his or her arrest. To give proper effect to s. 525 in such situations, the judge is required to conduct the full bail hearing “from the ground up” in accordance with the ladder principle articulated in Antic, taking into account the time the accused has already spent in pre-trial custody. I wish to mention here that it has been suggested that allowing a full bail hearing to proceed before a superior court judge at the s. 525 stage would encourage “judge shopping” or would afford the accused some kind of procedural advantage that would for him or her justify spending three months in custody. In my view, this argument strains credulity. To quote O’Neill J. in McCormack, “I am not at all sure that many jailed accused would ever resort to paying the 90 day price for that strategy”: para. 26.

(10) Discretion to Give Directions for Expediting the Trial and Proceedings

[57] Section 525(9) affords the judge a discretion to give directions for expediting the trial of the accused at a s. 525 hearing, and s. 526 confers a more general authority on judges and justices acting under Part XVI of the Criminal Code to give directions for expediting any proceedings in respect of the accused. For these provisions to operate as meaningful safeguards against unreasonable delay and excessively long pre-trial detention, all stakeholders — including the prosecution, defence counsel and the courts — must take an active role in ensuring the timely progress of the trial.

[58] First, s. 525 hearings take on a heightened importance in the post-Jordan era, because they afford an opportunity to have a reviewing judge evaluate the progress of the trial at an early stage. If the judge believes that the case is at a point at which an unreasonable delay prohibited by s. 11(b) of the Charter is likely to result, he or she should consider giving directions for expediting the trial under ss. 525(9) and 526 as a preventative measure.

[59] However, s. 525 must be understood as more than just a “Jordan check-up”. Individuals in pre-trial detention, who are presumed innocent, bear a particularly high cost in terms of loss of liberty while awaiting their day in court. The judge should always determine whether the case presents an appropriate occasion to exercise his or her discretion to give directions for expediting the trial and related proceedings under ss. 525(9) and 526. Also, a judge who finds that the continued detention of the accused is justified on the basis of the grounds set out in s. 515(10) must look ahead to ensure that the accused will not be in a “time served” position before the prospective trial date.

[60] In deciding whether to give directions under s. 525(9) or 526, the reviewing judge must consider all the circumstances of the case and any relevant submissions by the parties. Relevant factors could include the relative complexity of the case, the involvement of co-accused individuals, the completeness of disclosure, problems related to evidence, the presence of any exceptional circumstances and the typical delay in getting comparable matters to trial in the jurisdiction in question. The analysis should be forward-looking. It should also be realistic, as the purpose of s. 525 is not to provide a pretext for judicial micro-management. Usually, the case will be proceeding at an acceptable pace and no directions from the court will be required. However, there may sometimes be a need, for example, to review the state of the Crown's disclosure to the defence, resolve an outstanding procedural issue or inquire into whether an earlier trial date can be secured. In these circumstances, a considered, principled and proactive intervention of a reviewing judge can have a real impact on the fairness and efficiency of the criminal justice process, and meaningfully safeguard the liberty interests of the accused.

(11) Right of the Accused to Know the Case to Meet

[61] Finally, I would note that in oral argument, the Attorney General of Ontario remarked that at s. 525 hearings in that province, “[m]ost of the time the accused do not understand why they are there, most of the time they are unrepresented and it simply gets dismissed”: transcript, at p. 92. This can hardly be what Parliament intended in enacting s. 525. There is no question that accused persons have a right to understand the purpose of the hearing, regardless of whether they are represented by counsel. All participants in our criminal justice system bear a fundamental responsibility for ensuring that this is the case. In reality, the individuals who are at the greatest risk of languishing in custody are those who are unrepresented. Where an accused is fully informed and supported by counsel, a s. 525 hearing may be a brief formality or may be waived altogether. However where the state has not provided for some form of legal assistance and the rights of an unrepresented individual are concerned, the judge must take even greater care to safeguard the liberty of the accused in order to maintain public confidence in the justice system.

(12) Summary of the Correct Approach

[62] I would summarize the correct approach to a detention review under s. 525 as follows. First, the jailer has an obligation to apply for the hearing immediately upon the expiration of 90 days following the day on which the accused was initially taken before a justice under s. 503. Where there is an intervening detention order under s. 520, 521 or 524 following the initial appearance of the accused and before the end of the 90-day period, the 90-day period begins again. Accused persons who have not had a full bail hearing are nonetheless entitled to one under s. 525. Upon receiving the application from the jailer, the judge must fix a date and give notice for the hearing. The hearing must be held at the earliest opportunity. In his or her analysis, the judge may refer to the transcript, exhibits and reasons from any initial judicial interim release hearing and from any subsequent review hearings. Both parties are also entitled to make submissions on the basis of any additional “credible or trustworthy” information which is relevant or material to the judge’s analysis, and pre-existing material is subject to the criteria of due diligence and relevance discussed in St-Cloud, at paras. 130-35.

[63] At the hearing, unreasonable delay is not a threshold that must be met before reviewing the detention of the accused. The overarching question is only whether the continued detention of the accused in custody is justified within the meaning of s. 515(10). In determining whether the detention of the accused is still justified, the reviewing judge may consider any new evidence or change in the circumstances of the accused, the impact of the passage of time and any unreasonable delay on the proportionality of the detention, and the rationale offered for the original detention order, if one was made. If there was no initial bail hearing, the s. 525 judge is responsible for conducting one, taking into account the time the accused has already spent in pre-trial custody. Ultimately, s. 525 requires a reviewing judge to provide accused persons with reasons why their continued detention is — or is not — justified. Finally, the judge should make use of his or her discretion under ss. 525(9) and 526 to give directions for expediting the trial and related proceedings where it is appropriate to do so. Directions should be given with a view to mitigating the risk of unconstitutional delay and expediting the trials of accused persons who are subject to lengthy pre-trial detention.

V. Application

[64] I will not carry out the full exercise of applying the foregoing principles to the facts of this case, given that the appeal is moot and the accused has pled guilty. I will, however, make three brief observations.

[65] First, the 90-day period applicable to Mr. Myers' s. 525 hearing should have begun on November 24, 2016, which was the date of his s. 520 review. At that point, his sentence for the unrelated break and enter charges had been served, and he was not detained on any other matter: ruling on judicial interim release application, at para. 34. However, counsel for Mr. Myers was not contacted with regard to a s. 525 hearing until 110 days later (on March 14, 2017): Appellant's Condensed Book, Tab 8. The hearing itself did not take place until October 5, 2017, over 300 days after Mr. Myers' s. 520 review. While it is true that this case is exceptional in that Riley J. was asked to give a preliminary ruling on s. 525, the fact remains that Mr. Myers waited a very long time for the hearing to occur. I would reiterate that when an accused is not required to be detained in custody in respect of any other matter for 90 days following a review under s. 520, the application for the hearing must be made immediately upon the expiration of 90 days, and the judge has an obligation to schedule that hearing without delay.

[66] Second, I would note that the parties faced various barriers in fixing a date for trial. Dates were offered in March, June, October and November 2017. Counsel for Mr. Myers submits that he offered to re-arrange his caseload to accommodate more dates and proposed to make considerable admissions based on the preliminary inquiry evidence in order to shorten the trial. He also applied unsuccessfully for severance of Mr. Myers from his co-accused, Mr. Richardson. Despite these efforts, a trial that was initially scheduled for late 2016 was ultimately set for March 2018, 4 months before the presumptive 30-month ceiling: Jordan, at para. 5. While this type of scheduling challenge is not uncommon, the delays were, as the Crown concedes, unfortunate. Nevertheless, scheduling issues caused by the fact that the Crown was proceeding jointly against Mr. Myers and Mr. Richardson appeared to have been a more significant factor in the delays than unreasonable behaviour on the part of either the Crown or the accused. It is possible that directions given under s. 525(9) or 526 could have prevented or mitigated the delays.

[67] Third, Mr. Myers was detained exclusively on the basis of the second ground under s. 515(10), despite the fact that he had a release plan involving a closely supervised treatment facility to address his substance abuse problems and multiple proposals to address the concern that he posed a risk to the public. It was within the bail judge's discretion to determine whether the release strategies presented by counsel addressed the risk that if released from custody, Mr. Myers would commit a criminal offence or interfere with the administration of justice within the meaning of s. 515(10)(b). That being said, judges and justices presiding over bail hearings should always give very careful consideration to release plans that involve supervised treatment for individuals with substance abuse and mental health issues. Release into treatment with appropriate conditions will often adequately address any risk raised under s. 515(10), and such a strategy is a less onerous alternative than provincial remand. It may also substantially address the root causes of the accused person's alleged criminal behaviour and reduce the likelihood of future criminal conduct. In accordance with the principles articulated in Antic, we must not lose sight of the fact that pre-trial detention is a measure of last resort.

VI. Disposition

[68] As the case is moot, I would simply allow the appeal and make no further order.

APPENDIX

Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46

Justification for detention in custody

515 (10) For the purposes of this section, the detention of an accused in custody is justified only on one or more of the following grounds:

(a) where the detention is necessary to ensure his or her attendance in court in order to be dealt with according to law;

(b) where the detention is necessary for the protection or safety of the public, including any victim of or witness to the offence, or any person under the age of 18 years, having regard to all the circumstances including any substantial likelihood that the accused will, if released from custody, commit a criminal offence or interfere with the administration of justice; and

(c) if the detention is necessary to maintain confidence in the administration of justice, having regard to all the circumstances, including

(i) the apparent strength of the prosecution's case,

(ii) the gravity of the offence,

(iii) the circumstances surrounding the commission of the offence, including whether a firearm was used, and

(iv) the fact that the accused is liable, on conviction, for a potentially lengthy term of imprisonment or, in the case of an offence that involves, or whose subject-matter is, a firearm, a minimum punishment of imprisonment for a term of three years or more.

Review of Detention where Trial Delayed

Time for application to judge

525 (1) Where an accused who has been charged with an offence other than an offence listed in section 469 and who is not required to be detained in custody in respect of any other matter is being detained in custody pending his trial for that offence and the trial has not commenced

(a) in the case of an indictable offence, within ninety days from

(i) the day on which the accused was taken before a justice under section 503, or

(ii) where an order that the accused be detained in custody has been made under section 521 or 524, or a decision has been made with respect to a review under section 520, the later of the day on which the accused was taken into custody under that order and the day of the decision, or

(b) in the case of an offence for which the accused is being prosecuted in proceedings by way of summary conviction, within thirty days from

(i) the day on which the accused was taken before a justice under subsection 503(1), or

(ii) where an order that the accused be detained in custody has been made under section 521 or 524, or a decision has been made with respect to a review under section 520, the later of the day on which the accused was taken into custody under that order and the day of the decision, the person having the custody of the accused shall, forthwith on the expiration of those ninety or thirty days, as the case may be, apply to a judge having jurisdiction in the place in which the accused is in custody to fix a date for a hearing to determine whether or not the accused should be released from custody.

Notice of hearing

(2) On receiving an application under subsection (1), the judge shall

(a) fix a date for the hearing described in subsection (1) to be held in the jurisdiction

(i) where the accused is in custody, or

(ii) where the trial is to take place; and

(b) direct that notice of the hearing be given to such persons, including the prosecutor and the accused, and in such manner as the judge may specify.

Matters to be considered on hearing

(3) On the hearing described in subsection (1), the judge may, in deciding whether or not the accused should be released from custody, take into consideration whether the prosecutor or the accused has been responsible for any unreasonable delay in the trial of the charge.

Order

(4) If, following the hearing described in subsection (1), the judge is not satisfied that the continued detention of the accused in custody is justified within the meaning of subsection 515(10), the judge shall order that the accused be released from custody pending the trial of the charge on his giving an undertaking or entering into a recognizance described in any of paragraphs 515(2)(a) to (e) with such conditions described in subsection 515(4) as the judge considers desirable.

Warrant of judge for arrest

(5) Where a judge having jurisdiction in the province where an order under subsection (4) for the release of an accused has been made is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the accused

(a) has contravened or is about to contravene the undertaking or recognizance on which he has been released, or

(b) has, after his release from custody on his undertaking or recognizance, committed an indictable offence, he may issue a warrant for the arrest of the accused.

Arrest without warrant by peace officer

(6) Notwithstanding anything in this Act, a peace officer who believes on reasonable grounds that an accused who has been released from custody under subsection (4)

(a) has contravened or is about to contravene the undertaking or recognizance on which he has been released, or

(b) has, after his release from custody on his undertaking or recognizance, committed an indictable offence, may arrest the accused without warrant and take him or cause him to be taken before a judge having jurisdiction in the province where the order for his release was made.

Hearing and order

(7) A judge before whom an accused is taken pursuant to a warrant issued under subsection (5) or pursuant to subsection (6) may, where the accused shows cause why his detention in custody is not justified within the meaning of subsection 515(10), order that the accused be released on his giving an undertaking or entering into a recognizance escribed in any of paragraphs 515(2)(a) to (e) with such conditions, described in subsection 515(4), as the judge considers desirable.

Provisions applicable to proceedings

(8) The provisions of sections 517, 518 and 519 apply with such modifications as the circumstances require in respect of any proceedings under this section.

Directions for expediting trial

(9) Where an accused is before a judge under any of the provisions of this section, the judge may give directions for expediting the trial of the accused.

Directions for expediting proceedings

526 Subject to subsection 525(9), a court, judge or justice before which or whom an accused appears pursuant to this Part may give directions for expediting any proceedings in respect of the accused.

Appeal allowed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ALBERTA

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Right to life, liberty and security of person — Accused charged with dangerous driving causing death, dangerous driving causing bodily harm and parallel charges for impaired driving — Crown and accused entering into plea agreement — Crown subsequently repudiating plea agreement — Whether repudiation amounting to breach of accused's s. 7 Charter rights — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 7.

Criminal law — Plea agreement — Repudiation — Accused charged with dangerous driving causing death, dangerous driving causing bodily harm and parallel charges for impaired driving — Crown and accused entering into plea agreement — Crown subsequently repudiating plea agreement — Whether act of repudiation matter of tactics or conduct before court or matter of prosecutorial discretion — Whether act of repudiation reviewable on grounds of abuse of process.

The accused drove her motor home through an intersection and struck another vehicle, killing a husband and wife and injuring their young son. She was charged with several Criminal Code offences, including dangerous driving causing death, dangerous driving causing bodily harm, and parallel charges for impaired driving. Counsel initially entered into a plea agreement according to which the accused would plead guilty to a charge of careless driving under the provincial Traffic Safety Act with a joint sentence recommendation for an $1,800 fine in return for which the Crown agreed to withdraw the Criminal Code charges. When the Acting Assistant Deputy Minister of the Criminal Justice Division of the Office of the Attorney General saw the proposed resolution, he initiated an inquiry which led him to conclude that Crown counsel's assessment of the strength of the case was flawed. In his view, a plea to careless driving in the circumstances was contrary to the interests of justice and would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. Crown counsel was thus instructed to withdraw the plea agreement and to proceed to trial. In response, the accused brought a s. 7 Charter application alleging abuse of process and seeking a court direction requiring the Crown to complete the plea agreement. The application judge held that negotiations between counsel after charges are laid are matters of tactics or conduct which are subject to review by the court, and that the repudiation of the plea agreement, in this case, was not justified. He concluded that the accused's s. 7 Charter right to security of the person had been breached and he directed the Crown to proceed with the agreement. The Court of Appeal allowed the Crown's appeal, finding that the repudiation of a plea agreement is a matter of prosecutorial discretion not reviewable by the courts, subject to the doctrine of abuse of process.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The crucial importance of the distinction between prosecutorial discretion reviewable only for abuse of process and matters of tactics or conduct before the court governed by the inherent jurisdiction of the criminal trial court to control its own process was fully canvassed and explained in Krieger v. Law Society of Alberta, 2002 SCC 65, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 372. Subject to the abuse of process doctrine, supervising one litigant's decision-making process — rather than the conduct of litigants before the court — is beyond the legitimate reach of the court. The Crown's decision in this case to resile from the plea agreement and to continue the prosecution clearly constituted an act of prosecutorial discretion subject to the principles set out in Krieger: it is only reviewable for abuse of process. Prosecutorial discretion is not spent with the decision to initiate the proceedings, nor does it terminate with a plea agreement. So long as the proceedings are ongoing, the Crown may be required to make further decisions about whether the prosecution should be continued, and if so, in respect of what charges.

There are two categories of abuse of process under s. 7 of the Charter: (1) prosecutorial conduct affecting the fairness of the trial; and (2) prosecutorial conduct that contravenes fundamental notions of justice and thus undermines the integrity of the judicial process. While s. 24(1) of the Charter allows for a wide range of remedies, this does not mean that abuse of process can be made out by demonstrating a lesser degree of harm, either to the accused's fair trial interests or to the integrity of the justice system. Achieving the appropriate balance between societal and individual concerns defines the essential character of abuse of process.

The repudiation of a plea agreement may well constitute an abuse of process, either because it results in trial unfairness or meets the narrow residual category of abuse that undermines the integrity of the judicial process. The more difficult question in this appeal is how the initial exercise of prosecutorial discretion — Crown counsel’s offer to resolve the matter on the basis of a plea to a lesser charge — should figure in the analysis regarding abuse of process. A plea agreement should not be regarded as a contractual undertaking. Vitiating factors, such as mistake, misrepresentation or fraud, which usually inform a private party’s right to resile from a bargain, do not fully capture the public interest considerations which are at play. However, the analogy can usefully underscore the utmost importance of honouring the agreement. The situations in which the Crown can properly repudiate a plea agreement are, and must remain, very rare. Moreover, the reasonably defensible test applied by the application judge to Crown counsel’s decision to enter into a plea agreement is not the appropriate measure to determine whether there is an abuse of process. Indeed, it is the circumstances surrounding the repudiation of a plea agreement which should be reviewed to determine whether that decision amounts to an abuse of process. Reviewing for “reasonableness” a decision made in the exercise of prosecutorial discretion runs contrary to the constitutionally separate role of the Attorney General in the initiation and pursuit of criminal prosecutions as well as the principles set out in Krieger.

Given that acts of prosecutorial discretion are generally beyond the reach of the court, there is good reason to impose a threshold burden on the applicant who alleges abuse of process. A court should not embark on an inquiry into the reasons behind the exercise of prosecutorial discretion without a proper evidentiary foundation. However, evidence that a plea agreement has been entered into and subsequently reneged by the Crown meets the requisite threshold. Further, to the extent that the Crown is the only party who is privy to the information, the evidentiary burden shifts to the Crown to enlighten the court on the circumstances and reasons behind its decision to resile from the agreement. The ultimate burden of proving abuse of process, however, remains on the applicant.

In this case, the Crown’s repudiation conduct cannot be considered so unfair or oppressive to the accused, or so tainted by bad faith or improper motive, that to allow the Crown to now proceed on the dangerous driving Criminal Code charges would tarnish the integrity of the judicial system and thus constitute an abuse of process. Indeed, the Acting Assistant Deputy Minister, in good faith, determined that Crown counsel's assessment of the strength of the evidence was erroneous and, on that basis, having regard to the seriousness of the offences, concluded that it would not be in the public interest to terminate the prosecution on the criminal charges. This can hardly be regarded as evidence of misconduct. Finally, the accused was returned to the position she was in at the conclusion of the preliminary hearing before the plea agreement was entered into and thus suffered no prejudice as a result of the repudiation.

1. Introduction

[1] The question on this appeal is whether the trial judge erred in concluding that the Crown’s repudiation of a plea agreement was an abuse of process in breach of the appellant’s rights under s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. More specifically, the courts below were divided on the appropriate standard against which to measure the repudiation conduct.

[2] The application judge held that the repudiation of a plea agreement is a matter of conduct or tactics which is subject to the usual control of the criminal trial court (2008 ABPC 20, 89 Alta. L.R. (4th) 156). In the case at bar, the repudiation of the plea agreement by the Assistant Deputy Minister of the Criminal Justice Division was not justified, as Crown counsel's decision to enter into a plea agreement was "reasonably defensible". Thus, he concluded that the repudiation of the plea agreement was an abuse of process in breach of the accused's s. 7 security and liberty interests and directed the Crown to honour the agreement. The appellant subsequently pleaded guilty to a lesser offence and was acquitted on the more serious charges.

[3] The Alberta Court of Appeal overturned the application judge's decision, holding that the repudiation of a plea agreement is a matter of prosecutorial discretion, reviewable only for abuse of process (2009 ABCA 269, 8 Alta. L.R. (5th) 384). It held that the application judge erred in testing Crown counsel's decision against a "reasonably defensible" standard. Rather, he should have reviewed the circumstances surrounding the subsequent decision to repudiate. The relevant inquiry for abuse of process under s. 7 of the Charter is whether there is conduct which either causes prejudice to the accused by rendering the trial unfair, or affects the integrity of the justice system itself. In the absence of prejudice which renders the trial unfair, there must be proof of "prosecutorial misconduct, improper motive or bad faith in the approach, circumstances or ultimate decision to repudiate" (para. 49). Applying this test, the Court of Appeal found no evidence to support a finding of abuse of process in the circumstances of this case. The application judge's order, the resulting plea and the acquittals were set aside, and a new trial was ordered.

[4] The appellant, Olga Maria Nixon, appeals to this Court.

[5] For the reasons that follow, I agree with the Court of Appeal that the application judge applied the incorrect test for abuse of process. I also agree that there is no basis for finding that the appellant's s. 7 rights were breached in the circumstances of this case. I would dismiss the appeal.

2. The Proceedings Below

[6] The appellant, Ms. Nixon, was charged with several Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, offences, including dangerous driving causing death, dangerous driving causing bodily harm, and parallel charges for impaired driving. The charges arose as a result of a motor vehicle accident which occurred on September 2, 2006. The Crown alleged that Ms. Nixon drove her motor home through an intersection without stopping and struck another vehicle, killing a husband and wife and injuring their young son. A roadside screening test was administered at the scene, followed by breath samples which resulted in readings of 200 mg of alcohol in 100 mL of blood. Expert extrapolation concluded that Ms. Nixon's blood alcohol level would have been between 225 and 250 mg per 100 mL at the time of the accident.

[7] Given that Ms. Nixon elected trial by judge and jury, the matter proceeded to a preliminary inquiry on March 1, 2007. Crown counsel who had carriage of the case at the time had concerns about some of the evidence, in particular the admissibility of the breathalyzer results and the probative value of the eyewitness evidence that a motor home had been seen driving erratically some time before the accident. Based on his assessment, Crown counsel did not adduce the breath sample results at the preliminary hearing, although he specifically reserved the right to call this evidence at trial. He also informed the presiding judge that the Crown would not be seeking a committal on any charge other than the dangerous driving counts. Ms. Nixon consented to a committal order on the dangerous driving charges.

[8] Following the preliminary inquiry, additional discussions were held between counsel during the first weeks of May 2007 regarding a plea to a charge of careless driving under the Traffic Safety Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. T-6, with a joint sentence recommendation for a $1,800 fine. Counsel ultimately entered into a written agreement to that effect on May 22, and Ms. Nixon re-elected her mode of trial in anticipation of entering a guilty plea to the lesser charge on June 5.

[9] Before making the offer for a plea resolution, Crown counsel had discussed the matter in general terms with some of his colleagues in the Crown's office, including his immediate supervisor who reluctantly agreed with the terms of the proposed agreement. Due to the sensitive nature of the case, a report was also prepared for senior officials in the justice department. When the Acting Assistant Deputy Minister ("ADM") of the Criminal Justice Division of the office of the Attorney General saw the report and the proposed resolution scheduled to be perfected a few days later, he became concerned and initiated an inquiry. This in turn prompted an adjournment of the June 5 date to June 26. The defence was not informed of the reason for the adjournment at the time.

[10] The ADM obtained additional legal opinions about the merits of the Nixon prosecution and about the repudiation of plea agreements. Based on the results of this research, the ADM concluded that Crown counsel's assessment of the strength of the case was flawed as he had failed to consider the totality of the evidence. In his view, a plea to careless driving in the circumstances was contrary to the interests of justice and would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. The ADM also concluded that Ms. Nixon could be restored without prejudice to the position she had been in prior to entering into the plea agreement. Thus, it was resolved that the decision by Crown counsel at the preliminary hearing not to proceed on the impaired driving counts would be maintained. However, the ADM instructed Crown counsel to withdraw the May 22 resolution agreement and to proceed to trial on the dangerous driving charges in accordance with the committal order.

[11] In response to this turn of events, Ms. Nixon brought an application under s. 7 of the Charter, alleging abuse of process and seeking a court direction requiring the Crown to complete the agreement. Ayotte Prov. Ct. J. of the Provincial Court of Alberta embarked on an inquiry into the matter, at the conclusion of which he reserved judgment. At the outset of his written reasons, the application judge noted that the Attorney General has the ultimate power to initiate, conduct and terminate prosecutions, as affirmed by this Court in Krieger v. Law Society of Alberta, 2002 SCC 65, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 372. He also acknowledged that the courts will rarely interfere with the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. In his view, however, "when that discretion is exercised in favour of proceeding, the matter becomes subject to the processes and procedures sanctioned by the court” (para. 12). Thus, he held that negotiations between counsel after charges are laid were matters of tactics or conduct which were subject to review by the court.

[12] The application judge then discussed the standard against which to measure the Crown’s conduct. He concluded that the Crown’s ability to repudiate a plea agreement is akin to the discretion of a trial judge to reject a joint submission on sentence: the determinative test was whether the plea agreement was “reasonably defensible”. Before delving into that issue, however, the application judge dealt with Ms. Nixon’s concern that the decision to repudiate was motivated by political considerations. After reviewing the relevant evidence, he concluded that “there is absolutely no evidence” of political interference (para. 22) and “nothing to suggest that [the ADM’s] action was taken in bad faith or to accommodate a real or perceived political stance of his Minister of Justice” (para. 25).

[13] The application judge emphasized that the relevant test is whether the plea agreement was “reasonably defensible”. In his view, if the Crown is to justify its course of action to repudiate the agreement, then it must do more than establish that others would have reached a different conclusion. In the case at bar, he concluded that the repudiation of the plea agreement was not justified, as Crown counsel’s assessment of the case was “reasonably defensible”. The application judge held further that where the court is satisfied that the original bargain, if honoured, would not be contrary to the public interest and would not bring the administration of justice into disrepute, it is irrelevant whether the accused suffered prejudice. He added that if he were required to find prejudice, he would do so here. In his view, Ms. Nixon was prejudiced because defence counsel was led to believe that the evidence of breath samples would not be adduced at trial and, consequently, did not explore that issue at the preliminary hearing.

[14] The application judge concluded that Ms. Nixon’s s. 7 right to security of the person was breached and, by way of remedy, he directed the Crown to proceed with the agreement before another judge. Ms. Nixon subsequently pleaded guilty to the offence of careless driving, was sentenced to a fine of $1,800, and was acquitted of the Criminal Code offences.

[15] The Crown appealed the acquittals. The Court of Appeal of Alberta allowed the appeal, holding that the application judge erred in law by finding that Ms. Nixon’s s. 7 Charter rights were violated. Paperny J.A. (Côté and Slatter JJ.A. concurring) found that the application judge used the wrong test to distinguish between matters that fall within the scope of prosecutorial discretion and those more properly characterized as a prosecutor’s tactics and conduct before the court. The line cannot be artificially drawn at the courtroom door. Paperny J.A. stated: “Rather, the relevant inquiry is whether the impugned decision falls within the core of the prosecutor’s discretion: is it a decision as to whether a prosecution should be brought, continued or ceased, and if so, what it should be for?” (para. 32). Here, the decision to continue the prosecution is a matter of prosecutorial discretion which is not reviewable by the courts, subject to the doctrine of abuse of process.

[16] Paperny J.A. held that the application judge further erred in finding that a plea agreement can only be repudiated if the original decision is unreasonable or not “reasonably defensible”. Instead of reviewing the initial decision of Crown counsel, he should have reviewed the circumstances surrounding the ADM’s decision to repudiate the plea agreement to determine whether that decision amounted to an abuse of process. The relevant inquiry under s. 7 of the Charter is whether there is conduct which either causes prejudice to the accused by rendering the trial unfair, or affects the integrity of the justice system itself. As she put it, “Due regard to the constitutional role occupied by the Crown demands a deferential standard of review” (para. 49). Absent prejudice which renders the trial unfair, there must be proof of “prosecutorial misconduct, improper motive or bad faith in the approach, circumstances or ultimate decision to repudiate” (para. 49). Applying this test, Paperny J.A. concluded that there was no evidence to support a finding of abuse of process in the circumstances of this case. The acquittals were set aside and a new trial was ordered on the dangerous driving charges.

3. Analysis

3.1 The Scope of Prosecutorial Discretion

[18] Much of the debate between the parties in this Court was centred on whether the Crown's repudiation of a plea agreement is a matter of "prosecutorial discretion" reviewable only for abuse of process, or a matter of "tactics or conduct before the court" governed by the inherent jurisdiction of the criminal trial court to control its own process. The crucial importance of this distinction was fully canvassed and explained in Krieger.

[19] In Krieger, the Law Society of Alberta claimed that it had jurisdiction over all members of the profession within the province, including those employed by the Attorney General of Alberta. Thus, it purported to investigate an allegation of bad faith or dishonesty against Crown counsel in connection with a failure to disclose relevant information to the accused as required by law. The Attorney General and Krieger, who was Crown counsel, challenged the Law Society's jurisdiction, arguing that decisions made by an agent of the Attorney General in the conduct of a prosecution were immune from review under the doctrine of prosecutorial discretion.

[20] Iacobucci and Major JJ., writing for the Court, reviewed the nature and development of the Attorney General's office in Canada and affirmed the independence of the office as "a constitutional principle in this country" (para. 30). The Court explained that the principle of independence requires that the Attorney General "act independently of partisan concerns when supervising prosecutorial decisions" and how it "finds further form in the principle that courts will not interfere with his exercise of executive authority, as reflected in the prosecutorial decision-making process" (paras. 30 and 31). The Court stressed the fundamental importance of the principle of independence in these terms (at para 32):

The court's acknowledgment of the Attorney General's independence from judicial review in the sphere of prosecutorial discretion has its strongest source in the fundamental principle of the rule of law under our Constitution. Subject to the abuse of process doctrine, supervising one litigant's decision-making process — rather than the conduct of litigants before the court — is beyond the legitimate reach of the court. . . . The quasi-judicial function of the Attorney General cannot be subjected to interference from parties who are not as competent to consider the various factors involved in making a decision to prosecute. To subject such decisions to political interference, or to judicial supervision, could erode the integrity of our system of prosecution. Clearly drawn constitutional lines are necessary in areas subject to such grave potential conflict. [Emphasis added.]

[21] The Court ultimately concluded, however, that the Law Society retained jurisdiction over Krieger's alleged misconduct, as it was a matter that fell outside the scope of the doctrine. In explaining the proper contours of prosecutorial discretion, the Court drew the distinction between acts of prosecutorial discretion, and tactics or conduct. This distinction is now at the heart of the division in this appeal. Iacobucci and Major JJ. explained the difference as follows:

“Prosecutorial discretion” is a term of art. It does not simply refer to any discretionary decision made by a Crown prosecutor. Prosecutorial discretion refers to the use of those powers that constitute the core of the Attorney General's office and which are protected from the influence of improper political and other vitiating factors by the principle of independence.

Without being exhaustive, we believe the core elements of prosecutorial discretion encompass the following: (a) the discretion whether to bring the prosecution of a charge laid by police; (b) the discretion to enter a stay of proceedings in either a private or public prosecution, as codified in the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, ss. 579 and 579.1; (c) the discretion to accept a guilty plea to a lesser charge; (d) the discretion to withdraw from criminal proceedings altogether: R. v. Osborne (1975), 1975 CanLII 1357 (NB CA), 25 C.C.C. (2d) 405 (N.B.C.A.); and (e) the discretion to take control of a private prosecution: R. v. Osiowy (1989), 1989 CanLII 4780 (SK CA), 50 C.C.C. (3d) 189 (Sask. C.A.). While there are other discretionary decisions, these are the core of the delegated sovereign authority peculiar to the office of the Attorney General.

Significantly, what is common to the various elements of prosecutorial discretion is that they involve the ultimate decisions as to whether a prosecution should be brought, continued or ceased, and what the prosecution ought to be for. Put differently, prosecutorial discretion refers to decisions regarding the nature and extent of the prosecution and the Attorney General's participation in it. Decisions that do not go to the nature and extent of the prosecution, i.e., the decisions that govern a Crown prosecutor's tactics or conduct before the court, do not fall within the scope of prosecutorial discretion. Rather, such decisions are governed by the inherent jurisdiction of the court to control its own processes once the Attorney General has elected to enter into that forum. [First emphasis added; second and third emphases in original; paras. 43 and 46-47.]

3.2 Submissions of the Parties

[22] On the one hand, Ms. Nixon submits that the Court of Appeal erred when it concluded that the Crown's decision to renege on its agreement with the defence was an aspect of its traditional, constitutionally protected, core discretionary powers. She contends that the Crown's decision to resile from the agreement constitutes a reversal in tactic subject to broader review.

Given that Crown counsel's offer had been accepted by the defence, the resulting plea agreement is akin to a contractual undertaking. A bargain is a bargain, it is argued. Absent some vitiating flaw in the negotiating process, such as mistake, misrepresentation or fraud, the Crown should be held strictly to its word. It is not necessary for the applicant to show that she has been prejudiced, or to establish independent acts of "bad faith" or "flagrant impropriety". Unless the Crown can satisfy the court that implementing the plea agreement would itself bring the administration of justice into disrepute, the repudiation of a valid plea agreement, in and of itself, constitutes an abuse of process. In short, Ms. Nixon argues that the application judge adopted the correct approach and urges the Court to restore his decision.

[23] The intervener Criminal Trial Lawyers' Association ("CTLA") supports Ms. Nixon's argument that the Crown's promise to enter into a plea agreement is an undertaking "like any other given by a lawyer". It argues that the undertaking "must be strictly and scrupulously fulfilled" and that an abuse of process need not be shown before the agreement may be summarily enforced by a court (Factum of the CTLA, at para. 2).

[24] The Criminal Lawyers' Association (Ontario) ("CLA") also supports Ms. Nixon's position that the repudiation of a plea agreement does not fall within "core" Crown discretion identified in Krieger. Thus, the CLA submits that judicial review of a repudiation decision is warranted even in the absence of "flagrant impropriety" or bad faith. Rather, the test for allowing Crown repudiation of a plea agreement should be essentially the same as the test applied for allowing a sentencing judge to reject a joint submission: would the proposed resolution bring the administration of justice into disrepute? The CLA submits that "[r]epudiation is an abuse of process unless the Crown discharges its onus of demonstrating that the contemplated agreement would have brought the administration of justice into disrepute and the accused can be restored to his or her initial position" (Factum of the CLA, at para. 1 (emphasis in original)).

[25] On the other hand, the respondent, the Attorney General of Alberta, takes the position that both the plea agreement and the repudiation are acts that fall within the scope of the doctrine of prosecutorial discretion. As such, neither is open to review or supervision by the courts, except through an allegation of abuse of process. The respondent argues that the test advocated by Ms. Nixon and by the supporting interveners does not meet the high threshold for proving abuse of process. Abuse of process that involves core prosecutorial discretion requires proof of bad faith or flagrant impropriety by the Crown. Here, there was no evidence of any such conduct by the Crown officials in their review and repudiation of the plea agreement. Nor did Ms. Nixon suffer any prejudice as a result of the repudiation, given that she was restored to the position she was in at the conclusion of the preliminary inquiry, before the plea agreement was struck. Therefore, the Court of Appeal rightly concluded that there was no basis for finding a breach of her s. 7 rights.

[26] Attorneys General from three provinces intervened in support of the respondent's position. In particular, they submit that the approach adopted by the application judge runs afoul with the principle of independence affirmed in Krieger. The Attorney General of Ontario submits that this Court's decision in Krieger has been misinterpreted by lower courts. It asks this Court to confirm that Krieger was never intended to narrow the area of protected prosecutorial discretion, or to create a schism in threshold tests for finding an abuse of process depending on whether a decision is considered "core" or "non-core". All acts of prosecutorial discretion are immune from judicial supervision, subject only to the same high threshold for abuse of process.

[27] Along the same lines, the Attorney General of British Columbia ("AGBC") emphasizes the importance of criminal trial courts not proceeding with a review of prosecutorial discretion in the absence of a "threshold determination" that the inquiry is warranted. In the absence of evidence of irremediable impairment to the fair trial interests of the accused, a criminal trial court should only proceed with an application for relief challenging prosecutorial discretion under the residual category of abuse of process if there is an evidentiary record capable of supporting the claim. This approach helps to avoid scenarios such as the case at bar, where the trial judge engaged in a full examination of the reasons behind the decision to renege on the plea agreement, even though there was nothing to suggest that the decision was motivated by improper considerations, or was made in bad faith.

[28] Finally, the Attorney General of Manitoba (“AGM”) intervenes to underscore the importance of the Attorney General’s supervisory role over the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. Acknowledging that the repudiation of plea agreements is and should be rare, it argues that “when the Attorney General, or a senior delegate, makes a bona fide decision to overturn a plea agreement that he or she determines is contrary to the public interest, that decision is part of the proper and usual institutional checks and balances necessary for the justice system to function properly” (Factum of the AGM, at para. 3).

3.3 The Plea Agreement and Its Repudiation Are Acts of Prosecutorial Discretion

[29] None of the participants in this appeal disputes that Crown counsel’s decision to resolve the proceedings by accepting a plea to a lesser offence falls within the scope of prosecutorial discretion as defined in Krieger. To the extent that the application judge’s analysis suggests that anything occurring after the charges are laid falls outside the scope of prosecutorial discretion, it cannot be sustained. If the line were to be drawn at the point seemingly chosen by the application judge, namely “when [the] discretion is exercised in favour of proceeding” (para. 12), Crown counsel’s decision to enter into a plea agreement would itself be subject to review by the court as a matter of conduct or tactic without regard to the principles of judicial restraint set out in Krieger. As noted by Paperny J.A., to artificially draw the line at the courtroom door “effectively neuters some of the primary purposes of prosecutorial discretion, to resolve cases by accepting pleas to lesser charges and to discontinue prosecutions” (para. 32).

[30] In my view, the question of whether the ADM’s decision to repudiate the plea agreement is an act of prosecutorial discretion, although disputed in this appeal, is just as easily resolved. As aptly put by Paperny J.A., in determining whether any impugned decision falls within the core of prosecutorial discretion, it is useful to ask: “. . . is it a decision as to whether a prosecution should be brought, continued or ceased, and if so, what it should be for?” (para. 32). Applying this test, she held that the ADM’s decision to repudiate the plea agreement “fell squarely within the core elements of prosecutorial discretion” (para. 33). I agree. In my respectful view, it is difficult to see how the ADM’s decision could otherwise be characterized. The ADM effectively decided that the prosecution against Ms. Nixon should be continued and that it should be for the Criminal Code offences of dangerous driving, not for the traffic infraction of careless driving. Clearly, the ADM's decision to repudiate the plea agreement also constitutes an act of prosecutorial discretion. Prosecutorial discretion was not spent with the decision to initiate the proceedings, nor did it terminate with the plea agreement. So long as the proceedings are ongoing, the Crown may be required to make further decisions about whether the prosecution should be continued and, if so, in respect of what charges.

[31] Thus, it follows that the Crown's ultimate decision to resile from the plea agreement and to continue the prosecution is subject to the principles set out in Krieger: it is only subject to judicial review for abuse of process.

[32] The more difficult question in this appeal is how the initial exercise of prosecutorial discretion — Crown counsel's offer to resolve the matter on the basis of a plea to a lesser charge — should figure in the analysis regarding abuse of process. As outlined earlier, the parties and interveners present very divergent views on how this question should be answered. Before dealing with these arguments, I will review the law on abuse of process.

3.4 The Doctrine of Abuse of Process

[33] Until this Court's decision in R. v. Jewitt, 1985 CanLII 47 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 128, there was much controversy about whether a court had the power to stay validly instituted criminal proceedings for abuse of process. The inherent jurisdiction of a superior court to control its own process by staying abusive proceedings had long been recognized in Canada. However, it remained uncertain whether criminal courts had the discretion to stay proceedings for abuse of process, or whether this was a power reserved for the Attorney General under s. 508 (now s. 579) of the Criminal Code (pp. 131-32).

[34] Jewitt put an end to the uncertainty by recognizing that a trial court judge had a "residual discretion" to stay proceedings to remedy abuse of process. The Court held that the common law doctrine could be applied in narrow circumstances "where compelling an accused to stand trial would violate those fundamental principles of justice which underlie the community's sense of fair play and decency and to prevent the abuse of a court's process through oppressive or vexatious proceedings" (pp. 136-37).

[35] Initially, the common law doctrine of abuse of process was viewed as analytically distinct from Charter considerations since its focus was more on maintaining confidence in the integrity of the judicial system than on protecting individual rights. The common law and Charter analyses were also kept separate because of the different burdens of proof to successfully make out an abuse of process claim under the two regimes. For an applicant to establish a violation under the Charter, the burden of proof was the balance of probabilities standard. For an applicant to successfully invoke the court's common law power to stay proceedings for abuse of process, the burden of proof was the more onerous "clearest of cases" standard.

[36] Ten years later in R. v. O'Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, the Court noted that there was much overlap between the Charter and the common law doctrine of abuse of process, as the latter had found application in circumstances involving state conduct touching upon both "the integrity of the judicial system and the fairness of the individual accused's trial" (para. 73). Consequently, L'Heureux-Dubé J., writing for a unanimous Court on this point, held that the two regimes should be merged under s. 7 of the Charter. Depending on the circumstances, different Charter guarantees may be engaged by the alleged abuse of process and thus some claims may be better addressed by reference to the specific procedural guarantee. For example, "where the accused claims that the Crown's conduct has prejudiced his ability to have a trial within a reasonable time, abuses may be best addressed by reference to s. 11(b)" (para. 73). The Court identified two categories of abuse of process which would be caught by s. 7 of the Charter: (1) prosecutorial conduct affecting the fairness of the trial; and (2) prosecutorial conduct that "contravenes fundamental notions of justice and thus undermines the integrity of the judicial process" (para. 73).

[37] The Court held further that there was no practical utility in maintaining two distinct analytic regimes based on the different burdens of proof. Even if a violation of s. 7 is proved on a balance of probabilities, the court would still have to determine the appropriate remedy under s.

24(1) of the Charter and the “clearest of cases” burden would still apply to justify the remedy of a judicial stay of proceedings (para. 69). The Court made clear, however, that the fusion of common law and Charter claims of abuse of process under s. 7 of the Charter does not alter “the essential balancing character of abuse of process”. L’Heureux-Dubé J. explained as follows (at para. 69):

Remedies less drastic than a stay of proceedings are of course available under s. 24(1) in situations where the “clearest of cases” threshold is not met but where it is proved, on a balance of probabilities, that s. 7 has been violated. In this respect the Charter regime is more flexible than the common law doctrine of abuse of process. However, this is not a reason to retain a separate common law regime. It is important to recognize that the Charter has now put into judges’ hands a scalpel instead of an axe — a tool that may fashion, more carefully than ever, solutions taking into account the sometimes complementary and sometimes opposing concerns of fairness to the individual, societal interests, and the integrity of the judicial system. Even at common law, courts have given consideration to the societal (not to mention individual) interests in obtaining a final adjudication of guilt or innocence in cases involving serious offences. . . . I see no reason why such balancing cannot be performed equally, if not more, effectively under the Charter, both in terms of defining violations and in terms of selecting the appropriate remedy to perceived violations. [Emphasis added.]

[38] Thus, in defining what constitutes a violation, it is important to recall what kind of harm the common law doctrine of abuse of process was intended to address and, in turn, why this degree of harm called for a stay of proceedings as the appropriate remedy. In other words, while s. 24(1) of the Charter allows for a wide range of remedies, this does not mean that abuse of process can be made out by demonstrating a lesser degree of harm, either to the accused’s fair trial interests or to the integrity of the justice system. Achieving the appropriate balance between societal and individual concerns defines the essential character of abuse of process.

[39] Under the first category of cases, the concern is about the fairness of the accused’s trial. Establishing prejudice of the requisite degree is key to meeting the test; proof of prosecutorial misconduct, while relevant, is not a prerequisite: R. v. Keyowski, 1988 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 657. In Keyowski, the accused’s first two trials ended with the jury failing to agree on a verdict; his third trial was stayed by the trial judge for abuse of process. The narrow issue on appeal was whether a series of trials could, in and of itself, constitute an abuse of process, or whether it was necessary for the accused to show prosecutorial misconduct.

[40] The Court reiterated that the test for abuse of process was whether “compelling an accused to stand trial would violate those fundamental principles of justice which underlie the community’s sense of fair play and decency”, or where the proceedings are “oppressive or vexatious” (pp. 658-59, quoting from Jewitt, at pp. 136-37). While the Court concluded that the Crown’s exercise of discretion to proceed with a third trial did not constitute an abuse of process in the circumstances of the case, the Court held that the test could be made out in the absence of prosecutorial discretion. Wilson J. explained as follows (at p. 659):

To define “oppressive” as requiring misconduct or an improper motive would, in my view, unduly restrict the operation of the doctrine. In this case, for example, where there is no suggestion of misconduct, such a definition would prevent any limit being placed on the number of trials that could take place. Prosecutorial misconduct and improper motivation are but two of many factors to be taken into account when a court is called upon to consider whether or not in a particular case the Crown’s exercise of its discretion to re-lay the indictment amounts to an abuse of process.

[41] Under the residual category of cases, prejudice to the accused’s interests, although relevant, is not determinative. Of course, in most cases, the accused will need to demonstrate that he or she was prejudiced by the prosecutorial conduct in some significant way to successfully make out an abuse of process claim. But prejudice under the residual category of cases is better conceptualized as an act tending to undermine society’s expectations of fairness in the administration of justice. This essential balancing character of abuse of process under the residual category of cases was well captured by the words of L’Heureux-Dubé J. in R. v. Conway, 1989 CanLII 66 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659. She stated the following:

Under the doctrine of abuse of process, the unfair or oppressive treatment of an appellant disentitles the Crown to carry on with the prosecution of the charge. The prosecution is set aside, not on the merits (see Jewitt, supra, at p. 148), but because it is tainted to such a degree that to allow it to proceed would tarnish the integrity of the court. The doctrine is one of the safeguards designed to ensure “that the repression of crime through the conviction of the guilty is done in a way which reflects our fundamental values as a society” (Rothman v. The Queen, 1981 CanLII 23 (SCC), [1981] 1 S.C.R. 640, at p. 689, per Lamer J.) It acknowledges that courts must have the respect and support of the community in order that the administration of criminal justice may properly fulfil its function. Consequently, where the affront to fair play and decency is disproportionate to the societal interest in the effective prosecution of criminal cases, then the administration of justice is best served by staying the proceedings. [Emphasis added; p. 1667.]

[42] The test for granting a stay of proceedings for abuse of process, regardless of whether the abuse causes prejudice to the accused's fair trial interests or to the integrity of the justice system, is that set out in Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Tobiass, 1997 CanLII 322 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 391, and R. v. Regan, 2002 SCC 12, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 297. A stay of proceedings will only be appropriate when: "(1) the prejudice caused by the abuse in question will be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated through the conduct of the trial, or by its outcome; and (2) no other remedy is reasonably capable of removing that prejudice" (Regan, at para. 54, citing O'Connor, at para. 75).

[43] Before applying this framework of analysis to this case, I will address some of the arguments advanced in this appeal on how the plea agreement should impact the analysis of abuse of process.

3.5 The Contractual Undertaking Analogy

[44] As stated earlier, it is argued that a plea agreement should be regarded as a contractual undertaking and enforced just as any other lawyers' undertaking. This argument cannot be sustained. It completely ignores the public dimension of a plea agreement. Indeed, contrary to Ms. Nixon's contention, the Law Society of Alberta specifically recognizes in the comment to Rule 27 of its Code of Professional Conduct that "[a]n agreement between the prosecution and defence regarding the plea to be entered is not considered a usual lawyers' undertaking due to the policy considerations involved" (updated 2009 (online)). Vitiating factors, such as mistake, misrepresentation or fraud, which usually inform a private party's right to resile from a bargain, do not fully capture the public interest considerations which are at play in any decision to repudiate a plea agreement.

[45] A plea agreement cannot be summarily enforced by the court as any other lawyers' undertaking, as Ms. Nixon contends. It is also wrong to suggest that repudiation, in and of itself, warrants a judicial remedy even in the absence of prejudice (as the application judge concluded, at para. 55), or in the absence of conduct amounting to an abuse of process. This argument is founded on the erroneous premise that the decision to repudiate a plea agreement falls outside the scope of prosecutorial discretion and, as such, is not subject to the constitutional principles set out in Krieger.

[46] However, to the extent that the lawyers' undertaking analogy underscores the importance of honouring plea agreements, it can usefully contribute to the analysis. Indeed, in the oft-quoted Ontario Report of the Attorney General's Advisory Committee on Charge Screening, Disclosure, and Resolution Discussions (1993) (the "Martin Committee Report"), the Committee found resolution agreements in criminal proceedings to be "in the nature of undertakings". The duty of counsel to honour resolution agreements was regarded as "a particular example of the duties of integrity and responsibility" that lie "at the heart of counsel's professional obligations". Honouring resolution agreements was not only "ethically imperative", but also a "practical necessity", as these agreements "dispose of the great bulk of the contentious issues that come before the criminal courts in Ontario" (commentary to Recommendation 53, at pp. 312-13 of the Martin Committee Report).

[47] In light of this practical necessity, the binding effect of plea agreements is a matter of utmost importance to the administration of justice. It goes without saying that plea resolutions help to resolve the vast majority of criminal cases in Canada and, in doing so, contribute to a fair and efficient criminal justice system.

[48] Of course, there may be instances where different Crown counsel will invariably disagree about the appropriate plea agreement in a particular case. Given the number of complex factors that must be weighed over the course of plea resolution discussions, this reality is unsurprising. However, the vital importance of upholding such agreements means that, in those instances where there is disagreement, the Crown may simply have to live with the initial decision that has been made. To hold otherwise would mean that defence lawyers would no longer have confidence in the finality of negotiated agreements reached with front-line Crown counsel, with whom they work on a daily basis. Further, if agreements arrived at over the course of resolution discussions cannot be relied upon by the accused, the benefits that resolutions produce for both the accused and the administration of justice cannot be achieved. As a result, I reiterate that the situations in which the Crown can properly repudiate a resolution agreement are, and must remain, very rare.

[49] All Attorneys General who have participated in this appeal agree that a plea agreement should only be repudiated in exceptional and rare circumstances. However, the lawyers' undertaking analogy can only go so far on the question that occupies us. The analogy can usefully underscore the importance of honouring plea agreements, but it cannot inform the standard against which any repudiation conduct is to be measured. The Martin Committee Report made this clear in the same commentary quoted above, stating the following:

Thus, it is plain that resolution agreements must not undermine the integrity of the court, or otherwise bring the administration of justice into disrepute. While the sanctity of agreements entered into is an important principle of the administration of justice, Crown counsel's primary duty is to the integrity of the system. Accordingly, in the rare cases where these two values clash, the latter must prevail. [p. 314]

As a result, the argument that a plea agreement can simply be characterized as a contractual undertaking must fail.

3.6 The Reasonably Defensible Test

[50] This Court was also urged, as was the application judge, "to equate the ability of the Attorney General to resile from a plea agreement to the ability of a trial judge to reject a joint submission on sentence since both are predicated on the concept of bringing the administration of justice into disrepute" (trial decision, at para. 17). The Crown advanced this argument in first instance but subsequently resiled from this position. The application judge accepted this argument and, based on his review of the appellate jurisprudence on joint submissions, crafted the "reasonably defensible test" as the appropriate measure to determine whether there had been an abuse of process in this case. The central question became whether Crown counsel's plea agreement was "reasonably defensible". Having determined that it was, and without further considering the circumstances surrounding the ADM's decision to repudiate, the application judge concluded that the repudiation of the plea agreement amounted to an abuse of process.

[51] The Court of Appeal held that the application judge erred in multiple ways by adopting this approach. I agree with Paperny J.A.'s analysis on this point. As she noted, the application judge's mistaken approach not only had the effect of reversing the onus of proof, his "selected framework for analysis caused him to ask the wrong question". Instead of reviewing Crown counsel's decision to enter into the plea agreement to see if it was defensible, he should have reviewed the circumstances surrounding the repudiation to determine whether that decision amounted to an abuse of process (para. 45).

[52] The selected framework of analysis also occasioned a more fundamental error. The application judge's assessment of a decision made in the exercise of prosecutorial discretion for "reasonableness" runs contrary to the principles set out in Krieger. Paperny J.A. reiterated these principles, and explained that it is not the role of the court to look behind a prosecutor's discretionary decision to see if it is justified or reasonable in itself (paras. 46-49). By straying into the arena and second-guessing the decision, the reviewing court effectively becomes a supervising prosecutor and risks losing its independence and impartiality. Due regard to the constitutionally separate role of the Attorney General in the initiation and pursuit of criminal prosecutions puts such decisions "beyond the legitimate reach of the court" (Krieger, at para. 32). Thus, the court does not assess the reasonableness or correctness of the decision itself; it only looks behind the decision for "proof of the requisite prosecutorial misconduct, improper motive or bad faith in the approach, circumstances or ultimate decision to repudiate" (Court of Appeal decision, at para. 49).

[53] Quite apart from this fundamental difficulty with the reasonably defensible test, I would add that, conceptually, the analogy to the trial judge's rejection of a joint submission on sentencing is not particularly helpful in determining the standard against which to measure the repudiation conduct. The sentencing judge who is faced with a joint submission is engaged in a qualitatively different process than the prosecutorial authority faced with the decision of whether or not to resile from a plea agreement. The role of the sentencing judge is to impose a fit sentence, that is, one that "fits" the circumstances of the offence and of the offender as presented to the court. When there is a trial, these circumstances are largely defined by the findings of the court based on the evidence adduced at trial and at the sentence hearing. When the accused pleads guilty, the circumstances of the offence and of the offender are generally determined on the basis of agreed facts. This is particularly so if the plea of guilty is entered pursuant to a resolution agreement. All contentious issues will usually have been ironed out between the Crown and the defence prior to the plea. Counsel certainly have an ethical obligation not to mislead the court about those circumstances, but the fact remains that the judge is presented with the end product of the plea negotiations, not with the entire set of circumstances or considerations that went into the mix. By contrast, the prosecuting authority who is faced with the decision whether to honour or to resile from a plea agreement must consider the entirety of circumstances, including the public interest, in proceeding to trial. Thus, sentencing principles relating to joint submissions cannot usefully be transposed in this context.

[54] I now turn to the circumstances of this case.

4. Application of the Doctrine of Abuse of Process to This Case

[55] Although it is not entirely clear, Ms. Nixon's claim of abuse of process does not appear to be grounded in an alleged prejudice to her fair trial interests. She certainly alleges that she was prejudiced in various ways by the course of events, but most of the alleged prejudice has nothing to do with trial fairness.

[56] First, she describes in an affidavit the emotional and psychological trauma she suffered following the incident and laying of the criminal charges, and then explains how she suffered increased anxiety as a result of the Crown's change of position. There is no reason to doubt that Ms. Nixon was affected by the course of events as she describes in her affidavit. However, this has no bearing on the fairness of her trial.

[57] In addition, Ms. Nixon relies on the application judge's finding that she was prejudiced because her counsel was led to believe that the evidence of breath samples would not be adduced at trial and, consequently, did not explore that issue at the preliminary hearing. I agree with the Court of Appeal that this finding constitutes a palpable and overriding error, as Crown counsel at the preliminary hearing specifically reserved the right to call the evidence at trial. In any event, as Paperny J.A. rightly noted, there is no obligation on the Crown to present all of its evidence at the preliminary hearing and the evidence can still be tested at trial (para. 51).

[58] Finally, Ms. Nixon argues that, if the criminal charges were to proceed to trial, “the giving up of her right to silence would seriously compromise and diminish her defence because of her admission of identity as the driver and that she drove her vehicle carelessly”. She argues further that those admissions would “also restrict the ability of her present counsel to defend her, perhaps ultimately affecting her right to her choice of counsel” (A.F., at para. 139). I see no merit to this argument. The plea agreement was repudiated before Ms. Nixon entered her plea to the reduced charge. Further, the judgment of the Court of Appeal sets aside not only the application judge’s order, but also the resulting plea. Finally, the alleged effect on her counsel’s ability to defend her is entirely speculative.

[59] The question, therefore, is whether this case falls in the residual category of cases identified in O’Connor. Did the repudiation of the plea agreement, based on all of the circumstances, amount to an abuse of process? In other words, was the Crown’s repudiation conduct so unfair or oppressive to Ms. Nixon, or so tainted by bad faith or improper motive, that to allow the Crown to now proceed on the dangerous driving Criminal Code charges would tarnish the integrity of the judicial system?

[60] Before discussing the merits of the application, I want to address an important preliminary issue. As stated earlier, the AGBC intervened in this case to emphasize the importance of criminal trial courts not proceeding with a review of prosecutorial discretion in the absence of a “threshold determination” that the inquiry is warranted. I agree that a court should not embark on an inquiry into the reasons behind an act of prosecutorial discretion without a proper evidentiary foundation. However, it is my view that evidence that a plea agreement has been entered into and subsequently reneged by the Crown meets the requisite threshold. I will explain.

[61] As the AGBC rightly points out, mandating a preliminary determination on the utility of a Charter-based inquiry is not new: R. v. Pires, 2005 SCC 66, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 343. Similar thresholds are also imposed in other areas of the criminal law, they are not an anomaly. Threshold requirements may be imposed for pragmatic reasons alone. As this Court observed in Pires (at para. 35):

For our justice system to operate, trial judges must have some ability to control the course of proceedings before them. One such mechanism is the power to decline to embark upon an evidentiary hearing at the request of one of the parties when that party is unable to show a reasonable likelihood that the hearing can assist in determining the issues before the court.

[62] Quite apart from any such pragmatic considerations, there is good reason to impose a threshold burden on the applicant who alleges that an act of prosecutorial discretion constitutes an abuse of process. Given that such decisions are generally beyond the reach of the court, it is not sufficient to launch an inquiry for an applicant to make a bare allegation of abuse of process. For example, it would not suffice for an applicant to allege abuse of process based on the fact that the Crown decided to pursue the charges against him but withdrew similar charges against a co-accused. Without more, there would be no basis for the court to look behind the exercise of prosecutorial discretion.

[63] However, the repudiation of a plea agreement is not just a bare allegation. It is evidence that the Crown has gone back on its word. As everyone agrees, it is of crucial importance to the proper and fair administration of criminal justice that plea agreements be honoured. The repudiation of a plea agreement is a rare and exceptional event. In my view, evidence that a plea agreement was entered into with the Crown, and subsequently reneged by the Crown, provides the requisite evidentiary threshold to embark on a review of the decision for abuse of process. Further, to the extent that the Crown is the only party who is privy to the information, the evidentiary burden shifts to the Crown to enlighten the court on the circumstances and reasons behind its decision to resile from the agreement. That is, the Crown must explain why and how it made the decision not to honour the plea agreement. The ultimate burden of proving abuse of process remains on the applicant and, as discussed earlier, the test is a stringent one. However, if the Crown provides little or no explanation to the court, this factor should weigh heavily in favour of the applicant in successfully making out an abuse of process claim.

[64] This approach is consistent with the principles set out in Krieger. Acts of prosecutorial discretion are not immune from judicial review. Rather, they are subject to judicial review for abuse of process. Depending on the circumstances, the repudiation of a plea agreement may well constitute an abuse of process, either because it results in trial unfairness or meets the narrow residual category of abuse that undermines the integrity of the judicial process. In applying the Krieger standard to the repudiation of plea agreements, the principles set out in these reasons, notably at paras. 46-48, on the importance of honouring resolution agreements must be kept in mind. Consider, for example, if the repudiation was made arbitrarily, without inquiry into the circumstances leading to the plea agreement, and without regard to any resulting prejudice to the accused. Alternatively, consider if there was evidence of a systemic problem in a particular jurisdiction where Crown counsel regularly and summarily overruled the preceding Crown counsel's exercise of discretion whenever they disagreed with the terms of the agreed upon plea resolution. In my view, an application judge may well be persuaded in such circumstances that the Crown acted in bad faith or with flagrant impropriety to a degree sufficient to constitute an abuse of process.

[65] Thus, it is my view that a threshold showing must be made before the court embarks on a judicial review of an exercise of prosecutorial discretion. Evidence of repudiation meets that threshold.

[66] In this case, I agree with the Court of Appeal that there is no evidence to support a finding of abuse of process. While the application judge asked the wrong question and applied the wrong test for abuse of process, he did inquire into the considerations that informed the decision to repudiate, the process adopted, and the conduct of all Crown actors who were involved. In rejecting Ms. Nixon's claim that the ADM's decision was made for an improper motive, he concluded that "there is absolutely no evidence" of political interference (para. 22) and "nothing to suggest that [the ADM's] action was taken in bad faith or to accommodate a real or perceived political stance of his Minister of Justice" (para. 25). There was also nothing improper in the considerations that informed the ADM's decision to resile from the agreement. The application judge described these considerations as follows (at para. 26):

Those who influenced [the ADM's] decision to repudiate the resolution agreement took exception to a pair of [Crown counsel's] conclusions: first, that the analyses of the breath samples provided by Ms. Nixon would be inadmissible at trial and second, that the evidence of Ryan Galloway, who had earlier observed erratic driving by a van with the same licence plate as hers, was too remote in the circumstances to be relevant to the prosecution. In view of those two mistakes, the Assistant Deputy Minister was persuaded that any agreement which permitted Ms. Nixon to escape Criminal Code convictions was contrary to the public interest, especially considering that two people had died and another had been orphaned as the result of her driving. He therefore concluded that to honour it would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. [Emphasis added.]

[67] The application judge erred by summarily dismissing the ADM's considered opinion on the ground that the Crown had to show more than "establish that other, even more senior counsel, have reached a different conclusion" than Crown counsel did (para. 27). On this point, the application judge adopted the reasoning of Hill J. in R. v. M. (R.) (2006), 2006 CanLII 32999 (ON SC), 83 O.R. (3d) 349 (S.C.J.). However, the approach adopted in M. (R.) is based on the erroneous view that "the act of repudiation is not an exercise of core prosecutorial discretion" (M. (R.), at para. 65 (emphasis in original)). Hill J. was thus of the view that, while the plea agreement is not reviewable subject only to abuse of process, the repudiation is governed by the inherent jurisdiction of the court to control its own process (para. 62).

[68] As discussed earlier, the ADM's decision to resile from the plea agreement falls within the scope of prosecutorial discretion. In the absence of any prosecutorial misconduct, improper motive or bad faith in the approach, circumstances, or ultimate decision to repudiate, the decision to proceed with the prosecution is the Crown's alone to make. Reasonable counsel may indeed, and often do, differ on whether a particular disposition is in the public interest in the circumstances of the case. The ADM, in good faith, determined that Crown counsel's assessment of the strength of the evidence was erroneous and, on that basis, having regard to the seriousness of the offences, concluded that it would not be in the public interest to terminate the prosecution on the criminal charges. This can hardly be regarded as evidence of misconduct.

[69] This does not mean that plea agreements can be overturned on a whim. The method by which the decision was reached can itself reveal misconduct of a sufficient degree to amount to abuse of process. But that is not what occurred here. The act of repudiation was indeed a rare and exceptional occurrence. The evidence revealed that there have been only two prior occurrences in Alberta, “one in the 1980s and one within the year prior to the trial in this matter” (Court of Appeal decision, at para. 48). There was also no evidence of abusive conduct in the process leading to the decision to repudiate. I agree with the analysis of Paperny J.A. in this regard (at para. 50):

Further, this is not a case where the repudiation was done “unfairly” or when the discretion of the Attorney General was exercised “irrationally, unreasonably or oppressively”. The ADM carefully reviewed the evidence that was the subject of concern and relied on legal opinions and took guidance from the Ontario Attorney General’s policy to instruct himself on the relevant considerations. Having satisfied himself that the original view of the trial prosecutor was incorrect and that the resulting plea resolution agreement would bring the administration of justice into disrepute, he acted expeditiously in communicating the decision to withdraw the plea resolution agreement to the respondent. He also considered possible prejudice to the respondent and concluded that there would be no such prejudice. The ADM’s conduct, viewed in its totality, cannot be characterized as unfair, unreasonable, oppressive or irrational. The high threshold to find abuse of process has not been met here.

[70] Finally, Ms. Nixon was returned to the position she was in at the conclusion of the preliminary hearing before the plea agreement was entered into. There is no merit to the contention that she suffered prejudice as a result of the repudiation.

on appeal from the court of appeal for ontario

Constitutional law -- Charter of Rights -- Trial within a reasonable time -- Twenty-six month pre-trial delay including delays to accommodate defence and Crown -- Stay of proceedings granted -- Eighteen month appellate delay from granting of stay -- Whether pre-trial delay offending s. 11(b) of the Charter -- Whether s. 11(b) applicable to appellate delay -- Whether s. 7 (abuse of process) applicable to appellate delay -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 7, 11(b).

Criminal law -- Constitutional law -- Charter of Rights -- Trial within a reasonable time -- Twenty-six month pre-trial delay including delays to accommodate defence and Crown -- Stay of proceedings granted -- Eighteen month appellate delay from granting of stay -- Whether pre-trial delay offending s. 11(b) of the Charter -- Whether s. 11(b) applicable to appellate delay -- Whether s. 7 (abuse of process) applicable to appellate delay -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 7, 11(b).

The appellant was charged with criminal negligence causing death in an information sworn on September 15, 1988. He was released from custody on an undertaking. A series of lengthy delays occurred (in part to accommodate counsel for both the Crown and the defence) with respect to matters preliminary to a trial and a trial date was finally set at December 3, 1990. Appellant applied on that date for and was granted a stay of proceedings under s. 24(1) of the Charter on the ground that the right to trial within a reasonable time in s. 11(b) of the Charter had been infringed. The Attorney General appealed against the stay of proceedings on December 24, 1990 and the hearing for the appeal was set for April 24, 1992. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal on June 22, 1992, and set aside the stay and remitted the matter for trial on an expedited basis. The issues before this Court were whether the delay preceding the end of the trial was so unreasonable as to offend the provisions of s. 11(b) of the Charter and whether s. 11(b) applied to the delay in respect of the appellate proceedings.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Per L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory and Iacobucci JJ.: The appeal based on pre-trial delay was dismissed for the reasons given by Osborne J.A.

Section 11(b) does not apply to delay in respect of an appeal from conviction by the accused or from an acquittal or stay by the Crown. There is no distinction in this regard between an acquittal after trial and a judicial stay.

The term "[a]ny person charged" under s. 11 does not, as a general rule, include an accused person who is party to an appeal. A particular subsection in s. 11 may, however, apply to appeal proceedings as an exception to the general rule if its purpose and language support this conclusion. Section 11(b), however, has been interpreted as applying only to the consequences of delay flowing from a formal charge and does not extend to the consequences of delay at large. Short of a formal charge, similar consequences proceeding from other aspects of governmental activity in the criminal process do not trigger the protection of the provision.

After an acquittal and before the service of a notice of appeal, the person acquitted is not a person charged because there is no proceeding which seeks to charge the person acquitted. Upon the appeal's being filed there is a possibility that the acquittal will be set aside and the charge will be revived. The plight of the acquitted person is that of one against whom governmental action is directed which may result in a charge. In this respect the former accused is like the suspect against whom an investigation has been completed and charges are contemplated awaiting a decision by the prosecutor. There is even less reason to extend the protection of s. 11(b) to a convicted person who appeals because the appeal is not governmental action.

The conclusion that the words "[a]ny person charged" in s. 11(b) limit the operation of the subsection to the trial process is supported by the use of the word "tried". If the subsection were to apply to final adjudication as well, more apt wording would have been used.

Section 11(b) is not spent when there is an adjudication relating to a charge is appealed. If on the appeal the judgment is set aside and the matter is remitted for trial, the accused reverts to the status of a person charged.

The criminal appellant or respondent is not without a remedy when delay of appeal proceedings affects the fairness of the trial. The court's power to remedy an abuse of process, enshrined as a principle of fundamental justice in s. 7, is simply applied to delay. The criminal appeal rules and provisions of the Criminal Code also afford a litigant in a criminal appeal a range of remedies to eliminate any substantial delay on the part of the adversary.

The appropriate forum for a remedy under s. 7 of the Charter is the court in which the delay occurred. It is in the best position to assess the consequences of the delay. If a further appeal lies from the first appellate court, the issue of delay can be reviewed in the second appellate court along with the consequences of additional delay resulting from the second appeal. This Court does not favour issues being raised for the first time in an appeal to this Court.

Per Lamer C.J. and McLachlin and Major JJ.: "[C]harged with an offence" indicates a person subject to the power of the criminal process. Until the person is finally released from the jeopardy of the criminal process by a final resolution of the "charges", the person remains, for the purposes of s. 11(b), a person charged with an offence.

Many of the rights enumerated in s. 11 are restricted to the early stages of the criminal process. But others, such as s. 11(h) and 11(g), clearly apply after a verdict. Since s. 11 is directed to ensuring fairness at all stages of the criminal process, it cannot be concluded that s. 11(b) must necessarily be confined to the pre-stay, pre-verdict phase.

The rights which s. 11(b) seeks to protect are all engaged in the period between a verdict or a stay and the final disposition of the criminal charges. The language and context of the subsection indicate that it is not confined to the pre-stay or pre-verdict period of the criminal process. The fact that the restriction of the interest which s. 11(b) protects must result from an actual charge does not lead to the conclusion that s. 11(b) does not apply to post-stay or post-verdict appellate delay. If "[a]ny person charged" is read as being synonymous with "a person who is the subject of the criminal process", s. 11(b) would apply even after a verdict. The appeal proceedings result from an actual charge and are dependant upon it for their validity. A person facing the prospect of a new trial as a result of the appellate process, whether the original verdict was an acquittal, conviction or stay, can become subject to unfairness caused by delay.

In light of its objects, s. 11(b) applies to delays after the entry of a stay or a verdict. A complex two-principle scheme for assessing delay in the criminal process is not necessary in a practical sense because the same general principles can and should apply throughout, even though they may impact differently depending on the particulars and the stage of the delay. Interlocutory, trial and appellate proceedings may be so intertwined that it makes little sense to attempt to apply different legal rules according to the stage of the process.

The principles applicable under s. 11(b) are: (1) the length of the delay; (2) waiver, if any, of parts of the delay; (3) the reasons for the delay; and (4) prejudice to the subject of the criminal process. These principles are broad and flexible enough to apply at the post-stay, post-verdict stage of the criminal process.

The many different circumstances which may prevail at the post-verdict, post-stay stage require a flexible approach to remedies. The Charter empowers the court to grant such remedies as may be just in all the circumstances. Factors such as the length and nature of the delay, the seriousness of the offence, the nature of the injury suffered by the accused and any prejudice caused to the accused's defence inherent in the delay should be considered in selecting a remedy.

The choice of forum for the remedy should be flexible. The proceedings would be unnecessarily truncated and complicated if only courts of first instance could deal with pre-stay, pre-verdict delay and courts of second instance with appellate delay.

Per La Forest J.: Section 11\(b\) of the Charter does not apply to appellate delay. Given the interrelationship between ss. 7 and 11(b), s. 7 may in certain contexts provide residual protection to the interests that the s. 11(b) right is designed to protect that goes beyond the specific protection it provides. Those interests are also entitled to protection at the appellate level but subject to the special considerations specific to the appellate process and in consequence the choice of an appropriate remedy. In particular, a stay should not be used as often as the appropriate remedy for appellate delay as for trial delay. The views of McLachlin J. on these matters and on the appropriate court for considering delay were generally shared. However, her concerns about a bifurcated system were not agreed with. Weight may be given to pre-appeal delay at the appellate level and a consideration of appellate delay can figure in the equation when complaints about delay are raised at trial following appellate review. Sections 7 and 11(b) are not mutually exclusive. The Charter is an organic instrument.

//McLachlin J.//

The reasons of Lamer C.J. and McLachlin and Major were delivered by MCLACHLIN J. -- I have read the reasons of my colleague, Justice Sopinka, and must respectfully dissent from his views on how appellate delay is treated under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

My colleague concludes that the criminal process must be divided into distinct phases for the purpose of assessing whether an accused person has been denied the right to have criminal proceedings against him dispatched without undue delay. The first phase, if I understand his reasons, is the period between the laying of charges and the entry of a verdict or stay of proceedings. This is assessed under s. 11\(b\) of the Charter which guarantees the right to be tried within a reasonable time. The next stage lies between the entry of a verdict or stay, and the resolution of appeals from the verdict or stay. Delay in this stage is to be assessed under quite different principles -- s. 7 abuse of process. However, that is not the end of the story. If the result of the appeal is an order for a trial (in the case of a stay) or for a new trial (in the case of a verdict), the clock is wound back. My colleague does not specify precisely what he means by this. One possibility is that the entire analysis, including the period of appellate delay, would be assessed under s. 11(b). The other possibility is that different segments of the process leading to the ordered trial, would be analyzed under different sections of the Charter: s. 11(b) up to the stay or verdict; s. 7 abuse of process from then to the order for a trial; and s. 11(b) once again after that order is made.

My colleague concedes that the objects and purposes of s. 11(b) -- to protect the right to security of the person, the right to liberty and the right to a fair trial -- on their face apply to post-stay and post-verdict appellate delay. He argues, however, that the complicated scenario he proposes is necessitated by the wording and textual context of s. 11(b); by prior decisions of this Court; and by the fact that the entry of a stay or verdict radically changes the interests at stake. In my view, none of these considerations withstands close scrutiny. Until the person charged is released from the prospect of further trials and proceedings by a final resolution of the matter, s. 11(b) and the principles which have been enunciated under it are applicable. To be sure, the factors considered under s. 11(b) may have different weight depending on the circumstances, and different considerations may fall to be considered where appellate proceedings are at issue. Furthermore, the remedies may vary, depending on the stage of the criminal process where one is. But these factors can and should, in my view, all be assessed under the single test imposed by s. 11(b) of the Charter.

The Wording and Context

I turn first to the wording and context of s. 11(b). My colleague argues that the phrases "charged with an offence" and "to be tried" suggest that s. 11(b) applies only to the time of trial. I respectfully disagree. "[C]harged with an offence", should, in my view, be read as indicating a person who is subject to the power of the criminal process. Until the person is finally released from the jeopardy of the criminal process by a final resolution of the "charges" against him or her, the person remains, for the purposes of s. 11(b), a person charged with an offence. This position is consistent with the comments of Lamer J., as he then was, in R. v. Rahey, 1987 CanLII 52 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 588, at pp. 610-11:

... s. 11(b) protects against an overlong subjection to a pending criminal case and aims to relieve against the stress and anxiety which continue until the outcome of the case is final. . . . The computation [of the delay] cannot end as of the moment the trial begins, but rather must continue until the end of the saga, all of which must be within a reasonable time.

The narrower reading of "charge" contended for by my colleague, Sopinka J., produces a scenario of waning and waxing charges. My colleague argues that a stay or verdict ends the charge. But he is then forced to assert that a subsequent order for a trial or new trial "revives" the charge, which has presumably lain dormant even though it has supposedly disappeared. At the verdict after the trial, the charge once more wanes, only to be revived yet again if an appeal court orders yet further trial proceedings. The accused is subject to one criminal process, throughout which his freedom is in jeopardy. Yet the law would tell him that he is charged only part of the time, depending in which particular part of the process he is.

The interpretation my colleague suggests for the phrase "to be tried" is similarly problematic. My colleague asserts that a person's s. 11(b) right to be tried within a reasonable time expires with the entry of a stay. Yet this may occur before the person has ever had a trial. If the stay is set aside on appeal and the accused ordered to stand trial, he or she has no right to complain in the face of egregious Crown delay occurring at the appellate stage that his or her right to be tried within a reasonable time has been breached, even though he or she has never stood trial. The case of an order for a new trial after acquittal is similarly problematic. The first trial is declared invalid. In effect, the accused has not had a proper trial. A new trial is ordered. Notwithstanding that the accused has not enjoyed the right which the Charter expressly gives him or her -- the right to a proper trial within a reasonable time -- he or she would be precluded by the interpretation my colleague suggests of claiming an infringement of s. 11(b) on the basis of unreasonable appellate delay, and confined to the much narrower remedy of s. 7 abuse of process. This cannot, in my view, have been what the framers of the Charter intended.

Nor does the textual context of s. 11(b) dictate the interpretation for which my colleague contends. It is true that many of the rights enumerated in s. 11 are restricted to the early stages of the criminal process. But others, such as s. 11(h) and 11(g), clearly apply after a verdict. So it does not follow, with respect, that "[i]f '[a]ny person charged' in s. 11(b) necessarily includes the accused as a party to an appeal then the same conclusion would have to apply to the other subsections of the section," as my colleague concludes at p. 000. Since s. 11 is directed to ensuring fairness at all stages of the criminal process, it cannot be concluded that s. 11(b) must necessarily be confined to the pre-stay, pre-verdict phase.

My colleague argues that because s. 11(b) has been held not to apply to pre-charge delay (R. v. Kalanj, 1989 CanLII 63 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1594), it cannot be held to apply to appellate delay. He concludes, at p. 000, that "s. 11(b) does not apply unless the restriction of the interests which the subsection protects results from an actual charge." With this I agree. But I do not agree that this leads to the conclusion that s. 11(b) does not apply to post-stay or post-verdict appellate delay. If "[a]ny person charged" is read as synonymous to "a person who is the subject of the criminal process", as I suggest, it follows that s. 11(b) would apply even after a verdict. The appeal proceedings clearly result from an actual charge; indeed, they are dependant upon it for their validity.

The Interests At Stake

My colleague, Sopinka J., argues that consideration of the rights protected by s. 11(b) leads to the conclusion that it does not apply to post-stay or post-verdict appellate proceedings.

The rights protected by s. 11(b), as noted earlier are the right to security of the person, the right to liberty, and the right to a fair trial: R. v. Morin, 1992 CanLII 89 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 771. My colleague considers first the case of an appeal from an acquittal. He concludes, at p. 000, that during this period "[n]o proceeding is on foot which seeks to charge the person acquitted", and states that the "plight of the acquitted person is that of one against whom governmental action is directed which may result in a charge." With respect, this diminishes the seriousness of the position of the acquitted person facing an appeal. Before a charge is laid, the suspect does not, generally speaking, suffer the stigma of criminal proceedings. The same cannot be said of an accused who is the subject of a post-acquittal appeal. He or she has in fact been charged. The law continues to require him or her to defend him- or herself against the charges. He or she must hire lawyers and plead before judges. While he or she has been acquitted, the prosecution continues to aver publicly that the acquittal is invalid. And he or she faces the distinct possibility of an order overturning the acquittal and entering a conviction or directing a new trial, a prospect which is not a speculative possibility but a real danger. The anxiety which an accused who has been acquitted faces while awaiting the possibility of a second trial must be considerable. In all these respects, the situation of an accused on an appeal from an acquittal is much closer to the situation of an accused awaiting trial than to a person who has not been charged. I respectfully cannot agree with my colleague's conclusion, at p. 000, that "[i]t would be incongruous to extend protection to the acquitted accused pending appeal and not to the suspect awaiting a charge. . . ."

The situation of a convicted person who appeals, while less sympathetic than that of the acquitted person who faces an appeal, nevertheless engages the concerns to which s. 11(b) is directed. In the narrow vernacular of trial procedure, the charges against the accused have been resolved. But they have not disappeared. The accused may succeed in showing that the trial was unfair or invalid, and that the apparent resolution of the charges by the conviction was void. Finally, he or she hopes, he or she will get the trial he or she was entitled to in the first place. It would be cold comfort to tell him or her that the intervening delay in obtaining that trial does not fall under s. 11(b) and stands to be remedied, if at all, under the more restrictive application of abuse of process doctrine under s. 7.

The position of a person facing an appeal from a stay of proceedings is no better. My colleague argues that a stay is indistinguishable from an acquittal. If so, I would respond that like a person acquitted, the person against whom proceedings are stayed faces a jeopardy which engages s. 11(b). But I doubt that a stay and an acquittal can be so simply equated. Dickson C.J., speaking for the Court warned against such an assumption in R. v. Jewitt, 1985 CanLII 47 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 128, at p. 148:

We are concerned here with a stay of proceedings because of an abuse of process by the Crown. While a stay of proceedings of this nature will have the same result as an acquittal and will be such a final determination of the issue that it will sustain a plea of autrefois acquit, its assimilation to an acquittal should only be for purposes of enabling an appeal by the Crown. Otherwise, the two concepts are not equated. The stay of proceedings for abuse of process is given as a substitute for an acquittal because, while on the merits the accused may not deserve an acquittal, the Crown by its abuse of process is disentitled to a conviction. No consideration of the merits -- that is whether the accused is guilty independently of a consideration of the conduct of the Crown -- is required to justify a stay.

In one salient respect, the person facing an appeal from a stay is in greater jeopardy than a person who has been acquitted or convicted. He or she has never had any trial. No witnesses have been called, no evidence committed to public record. The risk of not being able to bring forward a valid defence when the trial is finally held may be greater than where one trial, however unfair, has been held.

In short, the rights which s. 11(b) seeks to protect are all engaged in the period between a verdict or a stay and the final disposition of the criminal charges. Security of the person and the right to liberty are engaged. The acquitted person, having been found not guilty, faces the prospect of conviction and incarceration. The person against whom a stay has been entered faces the same possibility. The convicted person, if the appeal succeeds and the conviction is found to be invalid, can equally argue that the law's delay in arriving at that conclusion has deprived him or her of his or her liberty and security of the person during the appellate interval. The right to a fair trial is engaged as well. In all three situations, the acquittal, conviction and stay, the subject of the criminal proceedings faces the prospect of a new trial, whose fairness may be jeopardized by excessive delay.

The narrow remedy proposed by my colleague for post-stay, post-verdict delay would not, with respect, provide a remedy capable of meeting these concerns. He concludes that s. 7 applies where the delay is so long that it constitutes abuse of process. The accused would be entitled to a remedy only where he or she could show that a new trial would be so unfair as to amount to an abuse of the court's process. I have several problems with this conclusion.

I note parenthetically that this conclusion begs the question which Wilson J. left open in R. v. Keyowski, 1988 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 657, at p. 661, of the relationship between s. 7 and the doctrine of abuse of process. Accepting, for purposes of argument, however, Sopinka J.'s conclusion that only post-stay or post-verdict delay which constitute abuse of process can be remedied under s. 7, it presents the following difficulties.

The abuse of process doctrine is a narrow doctrine which has only on rare occasions provided a remedy to accused persons caught overlong in the meshes of the criminal process. Its primary aim is not the rights of the accused person, but the repute of the system of justice. As Lamer J., as he then was, put it in R. v. Mack, 1988 CanLII 24 \(SCC\), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 903, at p. 942, in treating entrapment as abuse of process:

The issuance of the stay obviously benefits the accused but the Court is primarily concerned with a larger issue: the maintenance of public confidence in the legal and judicial process. In this way, the benefit to the accused is really a derivative one.

Moreover, it has repeatedly been held that the doctrine of abuse of process should be applied only in the clearest of cases: R. v. Keyowski, supra, at pp. 659-60. This has been taken to impose a higher standard of proof than would face an accused relying on a breach of rights under the Charter: see Bayda C.J. in R. v. Keyowski (1986), 1986 CanLII 157 \(SK CA\), 49 Sask. R. 64 (C.A.). Without definitively ruling on that question, the fact remains that abuse of process has seldom, in its long history, served as a remedy for delay in the criminal process. It has been stringently and sparingly applied. As one author puts it: "while abuse of process has frequently been argued and its availability increasingly acknowledged, a remedy for the accused has not readily been forthcoming": Morgan, "Controlling Prosecutorial Powers -- Judicial Review, Abuse of Process and Section 7 of the Charter" (1986), 29 Crim. Law Q. 15, at p. 38. To hold that the only remedy for delay in the criminal process after the entry of a stay or acquittal is abuse of process would be to create an anomaly in the law. The rights engaged and the jeopardy experienced are similar before and after the stay or verdict. Yet before the stay or verdict one has a full and easily accessed remedy; after, one has only a narrow and circumscribed hope.

Acceptance of my colleague's conclusion that s. 11\(b\) of the Charter does not apply to post-stay or post-verdict delay leaves two possible options for remedying such delay under the Charter. The first is that post-stay and post-verdict delay are held to be remediable under common law doctrine of abuse of process under s. 7. This is the route chosen by Sopinka J. It is, I have respectfully suggested, too narrow to provide an adequate or just remedy for many of the circumstances which may result from post-stay, post-verdict delay. The alternative might be to seek a distinct and broader remedy for such delay under s. 7 of the Charter. But such an approach should be undertaken only if the Charter provision expressly aimed at delay in the criminal process is inapplicable or inappropriate; the law should not be complicated unnecessarily. I have argued thus far that s. 11(b) by its wording and objects is not inapplicable to post-stay, post-verdict delay. I turn now to the appropriateness from a practical point of view of treating such a delay under s. 11(b) of the Charter.

Applying Section 11(b) to Post-Stay, Post-Verdict Appellate Delay

I have concluded that not only does the language and context of s. 11(b) not mandate that it be confined to the pre-stay, pre-verdict period of the criminal process, but also the objects and goals underlying s. 11(b) suggest that it does apply to delays after the entry of a stay or a verdict. In this section, I argue that there is no need from a practical point of view to adopt a complex two-principle scheme for assessing delay in the criminal process; the same general principles can and should apply throughout, even though they may impact differently depending on the particular considerations which arise at different stages. The reality of the judicial process is that interlocutory, trial and appellate proceedings may be so intertwined in a given case that it makes little sense to attempt to apply different legal rules according to the stage one is at.

The principles applicable under s. 11(b) have been enunciated in R. v. Morin, supra. They are: (1) the length of the delay; (2) waiver, if any, of parts of the delay; (3) the reasons for the delay; and (4) prejudice to the subject of the criminal process. In my view, these principles are broad and flexible enough to apply at the post-stay, post-verdict stage of the criminal process.

The length of the delay must always be taken into account in determining its reasonableness, whether it be trial delay or appellate delay. It may be less easy to set a "normal" yardstick in appellate delay, given the need for deliberation and discussion between members of the panel. But as for delay before verdict or stay, some delays will clearly be within a normal time period, some will clearly be egregious, barring explanations, and some, the most difficult to assess, will lie between the two extremes.

Waiver applies equally to delay before a stay and verdict and delay after a stay and verdict.

The reasons for the delay may be similar before and after a stay or a verdict. Overloaded judicial systems, poor organization, negligence, foot-dragging by the accused -- these and more may play a role at all stages of the judicial process. But the reasons for appellate delay include some which do not figure, or do not figure as importantly, at lower levels. In addition to reaching the just result in the case before it, an appellate court has a duty to settle and articulate principles of law which transcend the needs of the particular case. This may require more preparation, more research, more elaborate reasons and more discussion and debate among members of the appellate tribunal, and as a consequence, more time. The fact that a number of people with different views may be involved in the decision may add to the length of time required to settle the appeal finally. In some cases, counsel may need more time to prepare for a case given the complexity of the issues involved. For example, interveners are often involved at the appellate stage. The proper development of the law is an important goal which must be pursued, even at the expense of some additional delay in the case. This must be taken into account in considering the reasons for the delay.

The final factor set out in Morin, prejudice to the accused, is relevant both before, and after, a stay or a verdict has been ordered. What is protected at all stages is the accused's right to a fair and timely criminal process. As seen above, stigma, anxiety and restrictions on liberty may adversely affect the subject of the proceedings after a stay or verdict, just as before. Similarly, the subject's opportunity to present a full defence at a post-appeal trial may be adversely affected by post-verdict or post-stay delay. The impact of these adverse effects on the accused must be put in the balance in determining whether the delay complained of was reasonable.

This brings me to the matter of remedy. This Court has held in cases of pre-verdict, non-appellate delay, that a stay of proceedings is the minimum and generally appropriate remedy: R. v.

Rahey, supra, at p. 614. However, where a verdict has been entered, a stay may not be appropriate. For example, a stay of proceedings would be useless to a convicted person complaining of appellate delay; indeed, it would deny him or her a just remedy by preventing him or her from proceeding with his or her appeal. The nearest alternative to a stay of proceedings, quashing the conviction, might seem inappropriate given that one would be releasing, not a person presumed to be innocent as at the pre-trial stage, but a convicted felon who has not served his or her sentence. To release a convicted killer into society, for example, without having served his or her sentence, solely because the appeal he or she chose to bring took more time than reasonable, would be to grant a remedy which far outstrips the wrong and which overlooks the important societal interest in the safety and security of members of the public. Confronted with these alternatives, a judge finding unreasonable delay in such a case might wish instead to make a different order. He or she might order that the appeal be expedited, for example. Nor would I rule out other remedies such as damages to compensate for loss of liberty or mental suffering, although I would leave the question of what remedies may be appropriate for resolution on a case-by-case basis.

The many different circumstances which may prevail at the post-verdict, post-stay stage require a flexible approach to remedies. In some cases stays of proceedings may be appropriate. In other cases, other remedies will necessarily arise for consideration. The Charter empowers the court to grant such remedies as may be just in all the circumstances. In selecting a remedy, the judge should bear in mind such factors as the length and nature of the delay, the seriousness of the offence, the nature of the injury suffered by the accused and any prejudice caused to the accused's defence by the delay: see La Forest J. in R.v. Rahey, supra, at p. 648.

I would be flexible as to the forum for the remedy. If it appears to the Court of Appeal that the accused's rights have been violated by excessive pre-verdict and appellate delay, for example, that court should be able to deal with both types of delay without sending the new issue of appellate delay back to a judge of first instance. On the other hand, the subject of a criminal process should not be prevented from applying to a judge of first instance with respect of any delay, including appellate delay. The practical reality, as noted earlier, is that pre-stay, pre-verdict delay and appellate delay are often intertwined and impact upon each other. To say that only courts of first instance can deal with the former and only courts of second instance can deal with the latter would be to unnecessarily truncate and complicate the proceedings.

Application to this Case

Applying s. 11(b) to this case, I conclude with my colleague Sopinka J. that unreasonable delay has not been established. As to the pre-stay delay, while the time period was long, much of it can be explained by a series of interlocutory proceedings which were necessary given the complexity of the case. There were thus good reasons for much of the delay. Waiver is not a factor. As for prejudice, I agree with the Court of Appeal below that the prejudice that may be inferred was minimal.

Nor, in my view, was the post-stay appellate delay unreasonable in this case. The greatest delay in this period was a gap between June 21, 1991, when the appeal book was served and January 15, 1992, when the respondent scheduled the hearing. Thereafter the appeal proceeded with reasonable dispatch, given certain problems with the unavailability of appellant's counsel for the first hearing date. However, there is no suggestion that the appellant was prejudiced by any of this delay, or that he wanted things to move faster. Presumably, he was content to let the stay stand as long as possible. In these circumstances, unreasonable delay in the post-stay period is not made out. I note that the Court of Appeal ordered an accelerated trial, aimed at avoiding any further delay.

I would dismiss the appeal.

//La Forest J.//

The following are the reasons delivered by

LA FOREST J. -- I agree with Justice Sopinka that s. 11(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms does not apply to appellate delay. I find support for this in the French version of the Charter and in the European Court of Human Rights judgment in the Wemhoff case, judgment of 27 June 1968, Series A No. 7, cited by my colleague; see my reasons in R. v. Rahey, 1987 CanLII 52

(SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 588, at pp. 632-33. However, I am of the view, given the interrelationship between ss. 7 and 11(b), that s. 7 may in certain contexts provide residual protection to the interests the right under s. 11(b) is designed to protect that goes beyond the specific protection it provides; see Thomson Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada (Director of Investigation and Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission), 1990 CanLII 135 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 425. Accordingly, those interests are also entitled to protection at the appellate level but subject to the special considerations specific to the appellate process and in consequence the choice of an appropriate remedy. In particular, a stay should not as often be used as the appropriate remedy for appellate delay as for trial delay. On these matters, it will be obvious that I generally share the views of Justice McLachlin. I also agree with her regarding the appropriate court for considering delay.

I should say, however, that I do not share her concerns about a bifurcated system. In considering delay at the appellate level, I do not see why weight should not be given to pre-appeal delay, or why a consideration of appellate delay could not figure in the equation when complaints about delay are raised at trial following appellate review. Sections 7 and 11(b) are not mutually exclusive. The Charter is an organic instrument.

I agree that there was no unreasonable delay in this case and I would accordingly dismiss the appeal.

//Sopinka J.//

The judgment of L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory and Iacobucci was delivered by SOPINKA J. -- This appeal concerns the application of the constitutional guarantee to be tried within a reasonable time contained in s. 11\(b\) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The important question of law to be resolved is whether s. 11(b) applies to appellate proceedings.

Facts

The appellant was charged with criminal negligence causing death in an information sworn on September 15, 1988. He was released from custody on an undertaking, and on consent, the matter was adjourned to October 25, 1988. At that time, counsel for the appellant (not Mr. Greenspan who was counsel before this Court and at the Court of Appeal) advised the Provincial Court judge that the investigation was ongoing and that a disclosure brief was not available. At the suggestion of Crown counsel, the matter was adjourned to November 8, 1988. On November 8, an agent for counsel for the appellant requested an adjournment to permit defence counsel to arrange a pre-trial, and the matter was accordingly adjourned to December 6, 1988.

On December 6, 1988, the charge was further adjourned to January 31, 1989 for a pre-trial. Counsel for the appellant estimated that the preliminary hearing would require five days and that it was likely that a great deal of scientific evidence would be called at that time. Crown counsel requested that the pre-trial judge be permitted to read the Crown brief prior to the pre-trial. The court approved this request as consistent with the "usual practice." Trial counsel for the appellant consented to the request but advised the court that all of the Crown's scientific reports were not yet available and that this evidence was crucial to the resolution of the case. He also indicated that the pre-trial judge would likely require two days to read the Crown brief. Both counsel agreed to January 31, 1989 as a date for the pre-trial conference.

The pre-trial conference was held on January 31, 1989. It was conducted in the pre-trial judge's chambers and no transcript is available. However, court resumed once the pre-trial had been completed, and counsel for the Crown and defence spoke to the provincial judge about setting a date for trial or for a preliminary hearing. The judge indicated that five days would be required for a preliminary and suggested September or October 1989, subject to counsel's availability. Because the appellant was not present in court on this date, the matter was adjourned to February 7, 1989 to set the trial date.

On February 7, 1989 counsel for the appellant advised the court that he would be calling eight or nine witnesses, in addition to the seven witnesses to be called by the Crown and that he was prepared to set a date for the first week of October, 1989. October 2, 1989 through October 6, 1989 were set for the trial or preliminary hearing. Counsel for the appellant declined to elect a trial or preliminary hearing for that date because he did not have all the material, which suggests that some, but not full, disclosure had been made. On February 14, 1989, the appellant appeared in court and the week of October 2 to 6 was confirmed.

On October 2, 1989 the appellant elected to be tried by a court composed of judge and jury and the preliminary hearing commenced. On October 5, 1989, the appellant was committed for trial and re-elected to be tried by judge alone.

The indictment was signed on October 20, 1989. On November 7, 1989, the appellant first appeared in the District Court assignment court. At that time the transcript of the preliminary hearing had not been completed. It was completed on November 14, 1989. On November 7, both counsel agreed that a pre-trial would be worthwhile, and the court suggested December 13, 1989 as a date for the pre-trial. However, counsel for the appellant was not available on that date, and therefore January 17, 1990 was selected.

On January 17, 1990, Crown counsel was unable to attend the pre-trial conference due to a conflicting commitment, and the pre-trial was adjourned. The date of February 6, 1990 was chosen as the date upon which a new pre-trial date would be set. On that date, May 2, 1990 was chosen as a date for the pre-trial. There is no transcript or other evidence to explain why May 2 was selected. Further, while a secretary at the firm representing the appellant, Kelly Annet, stated in her affidavit that she had been informed that Crown counsel advised the court that he wished to have a pre-trial conference, the affidavit of the Crown indicates that Crown counsel does not recall whether he wished to have a pre-trial conference.

The pre-trial conference was held on May 2, 1990. The issues were discussed and the matter was adjourned to June 5, 1990 to set a date for trial.

At assignment court on June 5, 1990, defence counsel indicated to the court that the trial would likely last ten days and that an out-of-town judge was required. According to counsel for the appellant, an out-of-town judge was necessary because all the judges in the jurisdiction knew the family of the deceased. It is agreed that, in the circumstances, this request was reasonable. The trial co-ordinator made it clear that the trial date would be set and that a judge from outside Sudbury would then be found to preside at the trial. The date of December 3, 1990 was suggested as an appropriate date, but defence counsel expressed a preference for a January 1991 date as he had other commitments in December. At defence counsel's suggestion, the matter was adjourned to July 3, 1990 in order for counsel to make appropriate arrangements about a date.

During June, 1990, counsel for the appellant and respondent met with Loukidelis J. in chambers and agreed to the dates of December 3 to 10 for the trial. The affidavit of Greg Rodgers, Assistant Crown Attorney, states that "[i]f the matter was shorter and could be heard by a local Judge a trial date could have been obtained within 3 months". On July 3, 1990, it was decided that the trial would proceed on December 3, 1990.

On December 3, 1990, the appellant applied for a stay of proceedings under s. 24\(1\) of the Charter, arguing that his right to be tried within a reasonable time had been infringed. In the alternative, he sought an order excluding the evidence of a certain witness on the grounds of late disclosure. On December 4, 1990, the trial judge stayed the proceedings on the grounds that the right to trial within a reasonable time in s. 11\(b\) of the Charter had been infringed.

As the respondent noted in its factum, no motion to adduce fresh evidence regarding appellate delay was made at the Court of Appeal or before this Court, and no affidavit evidence regarding this period has been adduced. There is accordingly no evidence before this Court regarding delay during the appellate period, but for the purposes of setting out the time frame, the following dates from the factum of the appellant are accepted as fact. On December 24, 1990, the Attorney General appealed against the stay of proceedings. The transcript of the argument and the judgment were served on counsel for the appellant on February 13, 1991, and on June 21, 1991, the appeal book was served. On January 15, 1992, the respondent scheduled the hearing, suggesting that the appeal proceed on March 13, 1992. Due to the unavailability of counsel for the appellant on that date, counsel for the respondent proposed various dates commencing April 6, 1992, at which point April 24, 1992 was set as the earliest available date. The appeal was heard in the Court of Appeal for Ontario on April 24 during which the issue of appellate delay was raised. On June 22, 1992, the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal, set aside the stay and remitted the matter for trial on an expedited basis. On July 30, 1992, the appellant filed his Notice of Appeal in this Court.

Judgments Below

Ontario Court of Justice -- General Division, Stortini J.

Stortini J. held that the appellant's s. 11(b) rights had been violated. He noted that the total delay in this case was two years and two and a half months from the first appearance to trial, and that four months passed from the accused's arrest to the holding of the pre-trial conference. This latter delay was mostly due to the then-existing system which sought to accommodate counsel in arranging for pre-trial conferences and could not be attributed solely to the prosecutor or to systemic or institutional delay. He considered the argument that the delay was reasonable given the complexities of the case in terms of scientific evidence, the number of witnesses, the length of the preliminary hearing and trial, and the fact that an out-of-town judge was required. Noting that complex cases would justify longer delays than would simple cases, he stated, nonetheless, that lack of institutional resources should not constitute an acceptable excuse for unreasonable delays. He concluded that the delay was unreasonable as it was too long and that the explanations for the delay were either non-existent or insufficient to justify the delay.

Ontario Court of Appeal (1992), 1992 CanLII 12815 \(ON CA\), 74 C.C.C. (3d) 111 (Morden A.C.J.O and Osborne and Weiler JJ.A.)

Osborne J.A., writing for the court, held that the appeal should be allowed. After identifying waiver as a critical issue in the case, Osborne J.A. focused on two periods: the seven and one-half month period preceding the preliminary hearing, which began on October 2, 1989 and the six-month period preceding the trial which began on December 3, 1990. The court concluded that "waver in the entire period from January 31, 1989 to October 2, 1989, has not been established." The court did find that the respondent waived his right to complain of one month of the delay between December 13, 1989 and January 17, 1990 because he expressed a preference for January 17, 1990 rather than the scheduled date of December 13, 1989. The court did not find, however, that the respondent waived his right to complain of the six-month delay between June 1990 and December 1990, although counsel for the appellant did agree to the December trial date. Although there was no evidence before the court with respect to alternative trial dates, Osborne J.A. concluded that the December 3 date was likely the first date available for a ten-day trial.

With respect to the reasons for the delay, the Court of Appeal concluded that the four-month period from the appellant's arrest to the pre-trial conference was attributable to delay inherent in the nature of the case, including some intake delay. Some two months of delay between committal and the first date for the pre-trial was also held to be inherent delay. Osborne J.A. was of the view that neither the Crown nor the accused could be said to be responsible for much of the delay, except that it was Crown counsel's scheduling problems which required the pre-trial to be adjourned from January 17, 1990 to May 2, 1990. The two periods from February 7, 1989 (when the preliminary hearing date was set) to October 2, 1989 (when the preliminary hearing commenced) and from June 5, 1990 (when the trial date was set) to December 3, 1990 (when the trial was to begin) were held to be systemic delay, although it was noted that the lengthy court times necessary justified a longer delay than would be acceptable in a simpler case.

With respect to the issue of prejudice, Osborne J.A. agreed with the trial judge that the respondent suffered no actual or special prejudice as a result of the delay from the time the information was sworn in September, 1988 to the time his trial commenced in December, 1990.

To determine whether the delay was unreasonable, the Court of Appeal weighed the explanation for the delay and prejudice to the accused to determine whether the appellant's constitutional right to be tried within a reasonable time had been breached. Osborne J.A. noted that this Court had held in R. v. Morin, 1992 CanLII 89 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 771, that, although prejudice is only one factor to be taken into account in the balancing process, a conclusion that prejudice was absent or that it was minimal is significant. The rationale for the pre-eminent position given to prejudice was held to be consistent for the purposes of s. 11(b) -- to protect the rights of the accused and the dual societal interest in seeing an accused treated humanely and fairly and in seeing those accused of crimes be brought to trial.

Weighing all the factors, Osborne J.A. found that the delay was not unreasonable. He concluded that the prejudice that may be inferred was minimal, and that there was nothing on the record to suggest that the respondent ever sought an earlier date for the pre-trials, the preliminary hearing or the trial. While noting that "there may be a fine line between acceptance of the inevitability of the pace of proceedings and contentment with the speed of the process", Osborne J.A. held that the guidelines set out in Morin do not establish a limitation period and that a balancing of all aspects of the delay in this case led to the conclusion that the delay was not unreasonable.

Osborne J.A. therefore ordered that the appeal should be allowed, the stay set aside and remitted the matter for trial, on an expedited basis.

The Issues

There are two issues: (1) was the delay preceding the end of the trial unreasonable so as to offend the provisions of s. 11(b) of the Charter; and (2) does s. 11(b) apply to the delay in respect of the appellate proceedings?

Pre-trial Delay

The facts relating to this issue were reviewed in detail in relation to the principles expressed by this Court in R. v. Morin, supra, by Osborne J.A. in the Court of Appeal. Bearing in mind the approach to review of appellate judgments in respect of the application of s. 11(b) adopted by this Court in R. v. Stensrud, 1989 CanLII 9 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 1115, I would adopt the conclusions and reasons of Osborne J.A. and dismiss this ground of appeal.

Appellate Delay

This issue was raised in the Court of Appeal but was not dealt with. I have concluded that s. 11(b) does not apply to delay in respect of an appeal from conviction by the accused nor an appeal from an acquittal by the Crown. Moreover, in my opinion, there is no distinction in this regard between an acquittal after trial and a judicial stay.

Section 11 of the Charter is to be interpreted in a manner that harmonizes as much as possible all of its subsections. In R. v. Lyons, 1987 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 309, at p. 353, La Forest J., for the majority, stated:

As I observed in Canada v. Schmidt, 1987 CanLII 48 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 500, the phrase "Any person charged with an offence" in the opening words of the section must be given a constant meaning that harmonizes with the various paragraphs of the section. It seems clear to me that for the purposes of s. 11 it would be quite inappropriate to conclude that a convicted person is charged with an offence when confronted with a Part XXI application. How can it be said that the right to the presumption of innocence until proven guilty (s. 11(d)) and the right to bail (s. 11(e)), for example, could have any application in the context of the unique post-conviction proceeding mandated by Part XXI? [Emphasis in original.]

Many of the rights found in s. 11 cannot apply to appeals and are restricted to the pre-trial or trial process. If "[a]ny person charged" in s. 11(b) necessarily includes the accused as a party to an appeal then the same conclusion would have to apply to the other subsections of the section. An examination of the various subsections shows s. 11(a), (c), (f) and (i) clearly do not apply to appeals. Section 11(e) could not apply to an appellant who has been acquitted and other subsections are primarily concerned with what occurs at trial although exceptionally they might have some application on appeal.

I conclude from the foregoing that as a general rule "[a]ny person charged" under s. 11 does not include an accused person who is party to an appeal. A particular subsection may apply to appeal proceedings as an exception to the general rule if its purpose and language support this conclusion. After considering the purpose and language of s. 11(b), I have concluded that the interpretation that gives effect to both of these elements and best harmonizes the other subsections is that the subsection applies to the pre-trial period and the trial process but not to appellate proceedings. While I am uncomfortably aware that I expressed a different view in my dissenting reasons in R. v. Conway, 1989 CanLII 66 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659, I have come to this conclusion in light of the considerable additional judicial experience of this Court in the application of s. 11(b) since the judgment in Conway. In particular, I refer to the judgment in R. v. Kalanj, 1989 CanLII 63 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1594, and cases that followed it as to the purpose of s. 11(b).

The general objects and purposes of s. 11(b) were recently re-stated in R. v. Morin, supra, as follows at p. 786:

The individual rights which the section seeks to protect are: (1) the right to security of the person, (2) the right to liberty, and (3) the right to a fair trial.

The right to security of the person is protected in s. 11(b) by seeking to minimize the anxiety, concern and stigma of exposure to criminal proceedings. The right to liberty is protected by seeking to minimize exposure to the restrictions on liberty which result from pre-trial incarceration and restrictive bail conditions. The right to a fair trial is protected by attempting to ensure that proceedings take place while evidence is available and fresh.

If these purposes and objects were embodied in s. 11(b) without restriction, it would be difficult to argue that the section had no application to appeals. The section has, however, been interpreted in a manner that does not extend its protection of these interests against the consequences of delay at large, but only from the consequences of delay flowing from a formal charge. Short of a formal charge, similar consequences proceeding from other aspects of governmental activity in the criminal process do not trigger the protection of the provision. Accordingly, in Kalanj, supra, this Court dealt with a situation in which the accused were arrested after a lengthy investigation. On the day of the arrest the accused were fingerprinted and released but were advised not to leave town, that they would be charged and that a summons would issue. More than eight months later charges were laid. This Court was invited to hold that, because of the involvement of the interests that underlie s. 11(b), it should extend to the pre-charge delay. The invasion of the interests protected by s. 11 in the broad sense could certainly be equated to the consequences of a charge. The stigma and anxiety resulting from arrest and fingerprinting would exceed the consequences flowing from laying of a charge followed by a summons. The restraint on liberty was the equivalent to that which occurs when a charge is laid and the accused is released on bail. The pre-trial delay has the same effect on the freshness of the evidence as post-charge delay. Nonetheless, this Court held that the accused were not persons charged until a formal charge was laid and that s. 11(b) did not apply. This judgment has been applied to rule out review of pre-charge delay unless the accused can establish a breach under s. 7. See R. v. L. (W.K.), 1991 CanLII 54 \(SCC\), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 1091.

It follows from Kalanj that s. 11(b) does not apply unless the restriction of the interests which the subsection protects results from an actual charge. Circumstances which produce the same consequences do not qualify for the protection of this provision unless those consequences proceed from a formal charge. The question which is in issue in this appeal is whether the consequences of delay resulting from an appeal from acquittal or conviction are distinguishable from pre-charge delay and can be attributed to the existence of a formal charge.

Clearly, during the period after an acquittal and the service of a notice of appeal, the person acquitted is not a person charged. No proceeding is on foot which seeks to charge the person acquitted. Upon the appeal's being filed there is a possibility, the strength of which will vary with each case, that the acquittal will be set aside and the charge will be revived. The plight of the acquitted person is that of one against whom governmental action is directed which may result in a charge. In this respect the former accused is like the suspect against whom an investigation has been completed and charges are contemplated awaiting a decision by the prosecutor. Indeed the acquitted accused is somewhat more removed from the prospect of being subject to a charge than the suspect. In the former case, no charge can be revived until the acquittal is set aside by reason of an error of law that a court determines with a reasonable degree of certainty affected the decision at trial. In the latter case, all that stands between the suspect and a charge is the ex parte decision of the prosecutor. It would be incongruous to extend protection to the acquitted accused pending appeal and not to the suspect awaiting a charge who knows he or she is awaiting the decision of the prosecutor.

There is even less reason to extend the protection of s. 11(b) to a convicted person who appeals. The appeal itself is not governmental action. In R. v. CIP Inc., 1992 CanLII 95 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 843, Stevenson J. stated for the Court, at pp. 864-65:

We are reviewing the decision that was made on November 1, 1988. The delay after that motion was granted is appellate delay. The bulk of that delay is attributable to the appellant's decision to pursue appeals. The appellant invoked the processes of which it now complains and must accept the burdens inherent in full appellate review. There is no evidence or argument to support a finding that some extraordinary factor lengthened that review process.

The delay due to some extraordinary factor referred to by Stevenson J. would not be attributed to the fact that the accused was a person charged but rather to the conviction. A convicted person is not a person charged. See Lyons, supra, at p. 353. The effect of such an extraordinary factor would fall to be assessed under s. 7 in light of its impact on the fairness of the proceedings.

This discussion has focused on the interpretation of the words "[a]ny person charged" in s. 11(b) in the context of the purpose of the subsection. The conclusion that those words limit the operation of the subsection to the trial process is supported by the use of the word "tried". It would seem that if it was intended that the subsection apply not only to the trial but also to final adjudication, more apt wording would have been employed. This is illustrated by the decision of the European Court of Human Rights, Wemhoff case, judgment of 27 June 1968, Series A No. 7. The court dealt with two sections of the Convention: s. 5(3) and s. 6(1). The former provided that "[e]veryone ... shall be entitled to a trial within a reasonable time. . ." while the latter provided that "In the determination . . . of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing . . .". The court held that the former section extended only to the trial while the latter extended to the final determination even if this was on appeal. No doubt this language was before the framers of the Charter, and the selection of the more limiting term is significant.

This does not mean that when there is an adjudication relating to a charge which is appealed, s. 11(b) is spent. If on the appeal the judgment is set aside and the matter is remitted for trial, the accused reverts to the status of a person charged. As stated by D.H. Doherty (now a justice of the Court of Appeal for Ontario) in "More Flesh on the Bones: The Continued Judicial Interpretation of s. 11(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms" (1984), Canadian Bar Association - Ontario; Annual Institute on Continuing Legal Education, at p. 9:

Section 11(b) does not appear to operate at the appellate stage. Section 11(b) guarantees a trial within a reasonable time, not a final determination of the matter at an appellate level within that time. If, however, a new trial is ordered on appeal, or some other order is made directing the continuation of the trial proceedings, the constitutional clock should be rewound at the time of the order by the appellate court.

A similar conclusion was reached by the Supreme Court of the United States. In United States v. Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. 302 (1986), it was argued that the speedy trial guarantee in the 6th Amendment applied to an appeal by the government from a dismissal of charges prior to a trial on the merits by reason of excessive delay in prosecuting the charges. The court stated, at pp. 311-12:

During much of the litigation, respondents were neither under indictment nor subject to bail. Further judicial proceedings would have been necessary to subject respondents to any actual restraints As we stated in MacDonald: "(W)ith no charges outstanding, personal liberty is certainly not impaired to the same degree as it is after arrest while charges are pending. After the charges against him have been dismissed, 'a citizen suffers no restraints on his liberty and is (no longer) the subject of public accusation: his situation does not compare with that of a defendant who has been arrested and held to answer'." . . .

Respondents argue that the speedy trial guarantee should apply to this period because the Government's desire to prosecute them was a matter of public record. Public suspicion, however, is not sufficient to justify the delay in favour of a defendant's speedy trial claim. We find that after the District Court dismissed the indictment against respondents and after respondents were freed without restraint, they were "in the same position as any other subject of a criminal investigation" The Speedy Trial Clause does not purport to protect a defendant from all effects flowing from a delay before trial. The Clause does not, for example, limit the length of a preindictment criminal investigation even though "the (suspect's) knowledge of an ongoing criminal investigation will cause stress, discomfort, and perhaps a certain disruption in normal life." [Emphasis added.]

The American courts do not appear to resort to judicial stays but rather dismiss the charges with or without prejudice. The former is the equivalent to a judicial stay and the charges cannot be relaid unless the order dismissing charges is overturned on appeal. The latter allows the charges to be relaid without further judicial action. While the speedy trial provisions of the 6th Amendment apply to appeals from interlocutory orders which do not dismiss the charges, the remedy for appellate delay when charges are dismissed with prejudice lies in the due process guarantee in the 14th Amendment. The conclusion I have reached applies to appeals from acquittals and convictions. Furthermore, I see no valid reason to distinguish between an acquittal on the merits and a judicial stay. In light of the interest protected under s. 11(b), the differences between an acquittal and a judicial stay are purely technical. In both cases the accused can plead autrefois acquit and no proceedings may be brought in respect of the same charge unless the acquittal or stay is set aside on appeal. No restraints can be placed on the liberty of the former accused pending appeal. There is no basis on which to assume that the theoretical existence of a charge that has been stayed carries any greater stigma or causes greater anxiety to the respondent in an appeal from a judicial stay than an appeal from acquittal. Certainly there is no evidence on this point. I doubt that the public understands the difference. An unpopular acquittal generates as much public indignation as a stay. The degree of anxiety is dictated more by the strength of the grounds of appeal than by the form of the verdict. These observations were neatly summed up by Estey J. in Amato v. The Queen, 1982 CanLII 31 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 418, at p. 457:

While the charge may be said to hang over the head of the accused, this is a wholly theoretical observation because there is no forum for its further processing.

The Application of Section 7

This conclusion does not leave the criminal appellant or respondent without a remedy when delay of appeal proceedings affects the fairness of the trial. While s. 11(b) does not apply, s. 7 may in appropriate circumstances afford a remedy. In R. v. L. (W.K.), supra, this Court held that, in respect of pre-charge delay, if the particular circumstances of the case indicated that the fairness of the trial had been affected by the delay, s. 7 can be resorted to. This is simply the application to delay of the court's power to remedy an abuse of process which is enshrined in s. 7 as a principle of fundamental justice. The general principle was expressed in R. v. Jewitt, 1985 CanLII 47 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 128, at pp. 136-37. Dickson C.J. adopted the following passage from the judgment of Dubin J.A. (as he then was) in R. v. Young (1984), 1984 CanLII 2145 (ON CA), 40 C.R. (3d) 289, at p. 329:

... there is a residual discretion in a trial court judge to stay proceedings where compelling an accused to stand trial would violate those fundamental principles of justice which underlie the community's sense of fair play and decency and to prevent the abuse of a court's process through oppressive or vexatious proceedings.

This test has been reaffirmed in R. v. Keyowski, 1988 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 657.

In addition to s. 7, the criminal appeal rules and provisions of the Criminal Code afford a litigant in a criminal appeal a range of remedies at virtually every stage of the appellate proceeding. This enables a party interested in a timely disposition of the appeal to eliminate any substantial delay on the part of the adversary. As for systemic delay, resort can be had to s. 7 in the cases in which real prejudice is occasioned.

This raises the issue of the appropriate forum for a remedy pursuant to s. 7 with respect to appellate delay. In R. v. Gallagher, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 000, counsel for the respondent submitted that an appellate court should not decide matters of first instance which may require factual determinations. While neither solution is perfect I am of the opinion that the appropriate forum is the court in which the delay occurred. That court is in the best position to assess the consequences of delay. Moreover, this approach avoids the necessity of a referral back of the issue to a trial court whenever a serious case of delay is made out. In addition, it avoids the awkwardness inherent in a lower court's passing upon proceedings in a higher court which the latter must then review. While, generally matters of first instance are not decided in an appellate court the nature of the issues and the material in support would not be radically different from the issues and material in other motions which an appellate court is called upon to decide. If a further appeal lies from the first appellate court, the issue of delay can be reviewed in the second appellate court along with the consequences of additional delay resulting from the second appeal. As with other issues in appeal, this Court does not favour issues being raised for the first time in an appeal to this Court.

Application to this case

No evidence was offered nor was any attempt made in this appeal to show that any real prejudice resulted from the appellate delay. Counsel for the appellant quite properly conceded that no breach of s. 7 could be made out and I find none. The appeal is therefore dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

on appeal from the court of appeal for nova scotia

Criminal law – Remedies – Abuse of process – Stay of proceedings – Accused charged with sex-related offences – Police identifying accused as suspect before charges laid – Crown engaging in “judge shopping” and conducting pre-charge interviews of complainants – Trial judge staying some of charges – Court of Appeal overturning stay – Whether conduct of Crown and police amounted to abuse of process – Whether partial stay of proceedings warranted – Whether Court of Appeal entitled to interfere with trial judge’s decision to grant partial stay.

During the police investigation into allegations that the accused, a former Premier of Nova Scotia, had committed numerous sexual offences against a variety of young women who had worked for or with him, a police officer confirmed to a reporter that the accused was under investigation, in violation of police policy to remain silent about individual suspects until charges are laid. At the conclusion of the investigation, a report was submitted to the Director of Public Prosecutions (“DPP”) requesting his opinion about the laying of charges. The DPP recommended that charges should be laid involving four of the eight Nova Scotia-based complainants who were willing to testify. He chose the incidents which involved the most serious physical violations. He also recommended that the police re-contact the six women who had been victims of apparent criminal conduct, but were unwilling to testify. The police did not agree with the DPP’s charging recommendation, being of the view that a more complete picture of the allegations against the accused should be put before the court. After the Crown joined police in re-interviewing most of the original complainants, 19 counts for sex-related offences were laid against the accused. One year after the preliminary inquiry, the Crown decided to prefer a direct indictment setting out 18 counts of sex-related offences, including one new charge (count 16).

After the DPP's written recommendation, one of the Crown Attorneys met with police. At that recorded meeting, she suggested that it would not be "advisable" for charges to be brought before a particular judge, because she thought he might be a political appointment of the same party as the accused. Instead, she said she would "keep monitoring the court docket to see who is sitting when and what would be in our best interest". Police and Crown also agreed to re-interview a number of the complainants.

Citing the cumulative effect of this Crown behaviour combined with the police premature identification of him as a suspect, the accused sought a stay of all of the charges. At trial, a partial stay – 9 of the 18 counts – was granted. One of the charges stayed was count 16, which was similar in fact to an incident alleged to have occurred in Alberta, and the trial judge was suspicious that the Crown's eagerness to put the Alberta facts before a Nova Scotia court motivated the Crown to lay this new, similar, Nova Scotia-based charge. The Court of Appeal, in a majority decision, allowed the Crown's appeal and set aside the stays of the nine counts.

Held (Iacobucci, Major, Binnie and Arbour JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Bastarache and LeBel JJ.: A stay of proceedings will only be granted as a remedy for an abuse of process in the "clearest of cases". Regardless of whether the abuse causes prejudice to the accused, because of an unfair trial, or to the integrity of the justice system, a stay of proceedings will only be appropriate when two criteria are met: (1) the prejudice caused by the abuse in question will be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated through the conduct of the trial, or by its outcome; and (2) no other remedy is reasonably capable of removing that prejudice. The first criterion is critically important, and reflects the fact that a stay of proceedings is a prospective rather than a retroactive remedy. While most cases of abuse of process will cause prejudice by rendering the trial unfair, under s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms a small residual category of abusive action exists which does not affect trial fairness, but still undermines the fundamental justice of the system. When dealing with an abuse which falls into the residual category, a stay of proceedings is generally speaking only appropriate when the abuse is likely to continue or be carried forward. Only in exceptional, relatively very rare cases will the past misconduct be so egregious that the mere fact of going forward in the light of it will be offensive. Where uncertainty persists about whether the abuse is sufficient to warrant the drastic remedy of a stay, a third criterion is considered: the interests that would be served by the granting of a stay of proceedings are balanced against the interest that society has in having a final decision on the merits.

The judge shopping in this case was offensive. Judge shopping is unacceptable both because of its unfairness to the accused, and because it tarnishes the reputation of the justice system. Furthermore, it should not infect the investigative process by involving police in a conspiracy to manipulate the process. The trial judge quite properly was seriously troubled by this evidence. He nevertheless was mindful that this single comment was not acted upon, and did not find it determinative in his ultimate conclusion that the process against the accused had been abusive to the point of necessitating a stay of proceedings.

Wide-ranging pre-charge Crown interviews are not, per se, an abuse of process. While the separation of police and Crown roles is a well-established principle of our criminal justice system, different provinces have implemented this principle in various ways. In some Canadian jurisdictions, pre-charge interviews by the Crown are a regular, even common practice. In these jurisdictions at least, it appears that public policy is served by the practice, and potentially harmful and arbitrary results are avoided by the refusal to draw a hard line at the decision to lay charges, before which Crown counsel may not interview complainants. The pre-charge interviews in this case were done in accordance with the common practice of some other provinces, a practice more wide-ranging than the narrow, exceptional to rare practice the trial judge described. Furthermore, the Crown conducted an understandable review of the potential witnesses, in the wake of an early recommendation by the DPP that was not determinative. Given the uncertainty of the charges at that point, it could not be known whether the re-interviews led to more charges than would otherwise have been laid.

The trial judge was correct in his finding that the police error in releasing the accused's name as a suspect well in advance of any charges does not rise to the level of egregious abuse. While the police policy that the identity of suspects may be released only after charges have been laid is laudable, and a breach of it should not be condoned, other evidence on the record indicates that after this one misstep, the police exercised greater caution in preventing further information leaks until the process was truly public. Moreover, the prejudice experienced by the accused as a result of this early leak — humiliation and stress — cannot be attributed to this police error alone. The serious remedy of a stay of proceedings is not an appropriate method to denounce or punish past police conduct of this nature.

The trial judge erred in finding an abusive or improper purpose behind the laying of count 16. The trial judge's erroneous finding of a loss of Crown objectivity influenced this holding. If the trial judge had not started from the premise that the Crown had lost its objectivity, there would have been no justification for the trial judge to find the similarity between count 16 and the Alberta incident as the primary motivation for count 16, virtually ignoring the reasonable and probable grounds for laying count 16 in its own right.

There was no abuse of process in this case. The cumulative effect of the judge shopping, pre-charge Crown interviews, the improper police announcement, and the addition of count 16 in the direct indictment, while troubling in some respects, does not rise to the level of abuse of process which is egregious, vexatious, oppressive or which would offend the community's sense of decency and fair play. Moreover, this conduct, even if it did amount to an abuse, did not have an ongoing effect on the accused which would jeopardize the fairness of his trial.

The trial judge fell into error when he ordered the ultimate remedy of a partial stay of a number of charges. The trial judge misconceived the governing test for a stay of proceedings. Instead of inquiring into whether the abuse would be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated by ongoing proceedings, and then inquiring into whether any remedy other than a stay could cure this ongoing taint, the trial judge focussed his attention only on the final balancing exercise. The abuse found by the trial judge should be and was addressed by remedies other than a stay. Moreover, even if the trial judge had found an ongoing abuse which could only be remedied by a stay, the cumulative effect of the abuse still left some question about whether this was one of those clearest of cases warranting a stay. In his balancing analysis, the trial judge omitted some significant issues relevant to the public interest. Victims of sexual assault must be encouraged to trust the system and bring allegations to light. As the police saw it, there is evidence of a pattern of an assailant sexually attacking young girls and women who were in a subordinate power relationship with the accused, in some cases bordering on a relationship of trust. When viewed in this light, the charges are very serious and society has a strong interest in having the matter adjudicated, in order to convey the message that if such assaults are committed they will not be tolerated, and that young women must be protected from such abuse. In omitting to consider any of these issues which favour proceeding with charges, the trial judge's discretion was not fully exercised and therefore cannot stand.

The decision to grant a stay is a discretionary one, which should not be lightly interfered with. However, where the trial judge made some palpable and overriding error which affected his assessment of the facts, the decision based on these facts may be reversed. Here, the trial judge made palpable and overriding factual errors which set his assessment of the facts askew. He was in error when he ruled that "pre-charge Crown interviewing in this country is . . . non-existent to rare". As well, the trial judge implied that the loss of Crown objectivity was abusive because it meant that the accused ultimately faced more charges, but no evidence can be found to support this deduction. The trial judge also misdirected himself regarding the law for granting a stay by overlooking key elements of the analysis, thereby committing an error which was properly reversed by the Court of Appeal.

Per Iacobucci, Major, Binnie and Arbour JJ. (dissenting): The trial judge found as a fact that there was no independent and objective review by the Crown prosecutors in this case. The absence of the usual and proper checks and balances would, he thought, shock the conscience of the community. He cited a number of concerns that reflected this institutional failure, but his listing of the symptoms should not be mistaken for his important and central finding of fact that the accused had been denied his constitutional right to a fair pre-trial procedure. No reason has been shown to set aside this critical finding of fact. The conclusion that well-informed people may reasonably take from the continued prosecution of what the former Director of Public Prosecutions described as “minor” allegations 24 to 34 years after the events are said to have taken place is that the accused is being pursued not so much for what he has done as for who he is. Such a perception undermines public confidence in the impartiality and integrity of the criminal justice system.

The courts are very slow to second-guess the exercise of prosecutorial discretion and do so only in narrow circumstances, but these extensive discretionary powers must be exercised with objectivity and dispassion. Here, the failure of the proper and usual institutional checks and balances prevented the objective review of charges laid by the police that, because of their staleness, relatively minor nature (compared with those that did go to trial) and the potentially light sentences even if convicted, would likely have been stopped if an objective review had taken place.

The preferral of a direct indictment by the Attorney General did not “cleanse” the prior errors of judgment of the Crown attorneys. It was motivated by an understandable desire to bring to an end a preliminary inquiry that had lasted almost a year, and cannot be taken as having belatedly supplied the objective and dispassionate review of the original charging decision that, in the trial judge’s view, had never taken place. A stay of proceedings was appropriate in this case.

The absence of the proper checks and balances between police and prosecutor led to an increase in the number of charges laid against the accused. The trial judge concluded that the Crown's loss of objectivity and improper motive will be "manifested, perpetuated or aggravated" through the continued prosecution of the charges to which these abuses of process gave rise. If the trial itself would not have occurred but for the abusive conduct, then the trial itself necessarily perpetuates the abuse. The only way to halt this continued prejudice to the accused is a stay of proceedings.

I. Introduction

1 This case brought before the Court allegations of prosecutorial misdeeds, allegations of sexual interference and the harsh light of publicity surrounding the man at the centre, Nova Scotia's former Premier, Gerald Regan. The appellant Regan was ultimately charged with 18 counts of rape, attempted rape, indecent assault and unlawful confinement involving 13 women. He has already faced trial on eight of these counts, involving three women, for which he was acquitted. At the time of this hearing, one charge involving a fourth woman was still awaiting trial. The remaining charges were stayed by the trial judge because of Regan's claim that the Crown prosecutor was out to get him. The Court of Appeal overturned the stay. The Crown, itself, has since stayed two of the charges, and seven counts of sexual assault against Regan are currently pending.

2 The issue before this Court is whether the Crown and the police did indeed overstep their authority in the proceedings of this case, and if so, whether that abuse of the criminal justice process was so egregious as to warrant a stay of the proceedings. The ultimate question, as far as the appellant Regan is concerned, is whether or not he must return to trial to face the remaining charges of sex-related offences. Thus, the decision to uphold a stay of proceedings is a very serious one, which prevents, forever, the possibility of bringing charges of criminal behaviour before a judge and jury. In this case, the evidence does not disclose any serious abuse of process, or taint of the justice system, that would warrant such a drastic measure. I would dismiss Regan's appeal.

II. Facts

A. Overview

3 On March 15, 1995, Gerald Regan, by that time a former Premier of Nova Scotia, was charged with a long list of sexual offences, against a variety of women who had worked for or with him, dating back to the 1950s. The stories of alleged abuse had taken a long and winding path before finally surfacing. First, a CBC journalist spoke to a number of women who told of abusive acts they had allegedly suffered at the hands of the appellant. But that journalist did not broadcast the story. Several years later, while doing some research of his own, an avowed political foe of the appellant uncovered the information from the aborted news report. This informant took the stories to the police in July of 1993, and in September, an RCMP task force launched an investigation. During the investigation, a police officer responded to a reporter's request to confirm or deny that the appellant was under investigation. The police confirmed — a public admission which was in violation of police policy to remain silent about individual suspects until charges are laid. More than 300 interviews later, and 18 months after the story first broke about the Regan investigation, charges were laid.

B. The Charges

4 The decision to lay charges also has a convoluted history. At the conclusion of the police investigation, a report dated March 30, 1994 was submitted to the province's then Director of Public Prosecutions (“DPP”), John Pearson, with a request for his opinion about the laying of charges. The report identified 22 women complainants. Among them were six women who had been Regan’s babysitters, one who had been his housekeeper, a political intern, a legislative page, a secretary, and a political reporter. The women were all young at the time of the alleged assaults, ranging in age from 14 to 24 years. One woman alleged she was raped when she was 14, two others alleged attempted rape. The other incidents involved sexual touching, exposure and kissing. The police report categorized the charges this way:

- three complainants who “may have been victims of sexual impropriety”, but in the opinion of the police were not victims of criminal acts (although the acts showed a “modus operandi”);
- six complainants who the police believed were victims of criminal offences, but who were “not willing to testify in a court of law”;
- four complainants who were considered victims of criminal offences, but who did not want to testify as complainants, and were only willing to “co-operate by providing similar fact evidence at trial”;
- and nine complainants of criminal acts who were willing to testify as complainants. Of these nine, one of them alleged the attack had occurred in Calgary, Alberta.

5 DPP Pearson responded to police by letter dated June 28, 1994, that he and two other prosecutors had reviewed the file. One of those was Susan Potts, then Senior Crown Attorney in charge of sexual assault prosecutions. Pearson recommended that charges should be laid involving four of the eight Nova Scotia-based complainants who were willing to testify. He chose the incidents which involved the most serious physical violations, including rape, attempted rape, and the one case where it was alleged the appellant had exposed his penis.

6 In the other four local cases of willing complainants, DPP Pearson recommended that the police not proceed with charges. These cases involved many similar accounts of the appellant trying to grope and “French kiss” the victim. DPP Pearson explained that although these acts would have been against the law at the time, “the allegations are minor in nature, especially when placed in the context of societal values at the time”, and the “staleness” of the offences outweighed their “gravity”. He thought that the minor charges could be sanctioned by proceeding against the more major ones, and he feared that otherwise the prosecution might appear to be a “persecution”.

7 In addition, DPP Pearson advised that “the case against Regan would be significantly enhanced if some of the more recent incidents were proceeded with”. He recommended that the police re-contact the six women who had been victims of apparent criminal conduct, but were unwilling to testify. He made no recommendation about the complainants who had apparently been victims of criminal behaviour, but were only willing to give similar fact evidence. Finally, DPP Pearson recommended that the police contact Alberta authorities with regard to the Calgary-based incident. He advised the police that “you are not obliged to accept our opinion and that the final charging decision rests with you. We are also cognizant of the duties and responsibilities of Crown Counsel to consider whether or not it is appropriate to proceed with charges once they have been laid.” He suggested that police investigators “meet with [Crown counsel] Susan Potts to finalize the wording of any charge [the police] decide to proceed with”.

The police did not agree with DPP Pearson's charging recommendation. They were of the view that a more complete picture of the allegations against the appellant should be put before the court. Chief Superintendent Falkingham testified:

. . . over the several years I saw a pattern and an MO that Mr. Regan sexually assaulted, in my view, a number of young teenagers. . . . The MO was with babysitters, the MO was with – when he had an opportunity to be alone with a young girl, and I felt that that was all building into a large picture which indicated to me that there was a continuing criminal offence in my mind, together – as a global investigation.

My view is the matter of charges had to involve the large number of complainants and as a result of them – the continued offences over the years. . . .

9 After the Crown joined police in re-interviewing most of the original complainants, 16 counts for sex-related offences, involving 11 women, were laid against the appellant on March 15, 1995. On May 30, 1995, a revised information was sworn, which added two new complainants and three new counts, for a total of 19 counts related to 13 women.

10 The matter proceeded to a preliminary hearing in April 1996. One year later, the Crown decided to prefer a direct indictment. In that final charging decision, one complainant was dropped, a new one was added (count 16), and the charges concerning a third were amended to drop one count, bringing the final tally to 18 counts of sex-related offences, involving 13 women, laid against the appellant.

C. Crown Conduct

11 After DPP Pearson’s written recommendations, Crown Potts met with police on July 15, 1994. At that recorded meeting, Crown Potts suggested that it would not be “advisable” that charges be brought before a particular judge, because she thought he would have political ties to the appellant. Instead, she said she would “keep monitoring the court docket to see who is sitting when and what would be in our best interest” – an exercise commonly known as “judge shopping”.

12 At the same meeting, Potts requested to read all the investigation reports, because “this would give her a clear picture of what was actually going on”. Notes of a meeting on January 17, 1995, attended by the RCMP Chief Superintendent on the case, confirmed that Potts had by then re-read “the evidence and the victims’ statements”. Police and Crown then agreed that six complainants reluctant to testify “have to be re-interviewed”. In the end, police and Crown counsel together re-interviewed many of the original 22 complainants, as well as five new women who came forward after the Pearson letter.

13 The purpose of the re-interviews was “[f]irstly and primarily, to provide information about the Court process to potential complainants so that they could make an informed decision as to their involvement in these proceedings; and secondly, to make assessments of credibility about these witnesses, including their capacity for recall and general demeanor issues, and to prepare for a preliminary inquiry”. (Trial submissions of the Crown, Appellant’s Record, p. 1089)

14 The re-interviews included 16 of the original 22 complainants: four of the six reluctant witnesses whom DPP Pearson had recommended should be re-approached; three of the four women only willing, at first, to give similar fact evidence; three of the four complainants for whom Pearson had recommended laying charges (the fourth refused to proceed further); all four willing complainants whom the police wanted to charge but for whom DPP Pearson had recommended that no charge be laid; the complainant in the Alberta-based incident; and one of the three complainants for whom, at first, it was thought there was no criminal offence.

15 Crown Potts was removed from the prosecution of this case by the time the preliminary inquiry began in April 1996. Crown Adrian Reid stepped in as lead counsel at the preliminary inquiry and trial. Crown Reid became involved with the case in December 1995 after charges were laid.

16 Citing the cumulative effect of this Crown behaviour combined with the police premature identification of him as a suspect, the appellant sought a global stay of all of the charges. At trial, a partial stay – 9 of the 18 counts – was granted.

III. Judicial History

A. Nova Scotia Supreme Court (1998), 1998 CanLII 14078 \(NS SC\), 21 C.R. (5th) 366

17 Michael MacDonald A.C.J. identified that the appellant was not claiming an abuse of process which had tainted the fairness of the trial, and was therefore seeking relief under the so-called residual category of procedural abuse, which will warrant a stay of proceedings. MacDonald A.C.J. noted, however, that the remedy of a stay remains reserved for only the clearest of cases, where it is the only remedy available to counter the effects of the abuse (Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Tobiass, 1997 CanLII 322 \(SCC\), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 391).

18 MacDonald A.C.J. adopted the test for a stay articulated in Tobiass, at para. 90, where the Court held that in order to grant a stay, two criteria must be satisfied: (1) that the prejudice will be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated through the conduct of the trial or by its outcome, and (2) that no other remedy is reasonably capable of removing the prejudice flowing from the abuse. The Court added a third factor which should be considered in cases where it remains unclear whether the abuse is sufficient to warrant the stay. It requires courts to engage in a weighing of the societal interests involved. Courts must then “balance the interests that would be served by the granting of a stay of proceedings against the interest that society has in having a final decision on the merits. This is not to say, of course, that something akin to an egregious act of misconduct could ever be overtaken by some passing public concern” (Tobiass, at para. 92). MacDonald A.C.J. acknowledged that this third criterion would play a significant part in his analysis. In approaching the issue, MacDonald A.C.J. noted that he had to weigh the cumulative effect of any alleged wrongdoing. He was also mindful that abuse of process need not be driven by evidence of mala fides to warrant a stay, although such evidence was certainly relevant.

19 MacDonald A.C.J. reviewed the respective roles of the police and of the Crown and noted that while performing independent tasks, they must work well together. A strict separation of their functions, however, creates a safeguard against misconduct by either one. This system of checks and balances is achieved by drawing a clear line between the investigation of charges, and their prosecution. He held that police in Nova Scotia are “exclusively responsible for the investigation of crime and deciding what if any charges are to be laid. . . . Here, the Crown’s role is limited to simply providing legal advice; advice which is not binding on the police” (paras. 63 and 65). In contrast, the Crown must function as “a quasi judicial minister of justice who must also serve as advocate” (para. 67).

20 The appellant submitted a list of allegations of police and Crown misconduct, including the premature formation of a police task force to investigate allegations against Regan, and questionable investigative techniques and arrest procedures. MacDonald A.C.J. concluded that these actions had little impact on the appellant. He did consider that the premature confirmation of Regan as a suspect in the police investigation was clearly wrong, as it contravened express police policy. He was troubled by this serious error in judgment.

21 MacDonald A.C.J. then reviewed the allegations of Crown misconduct. He found clear evidence of Crown Potts' blatant attempt at judge shopping, and found this offensive and most troubling. For MacDonald A.C.J., this gave the appearance of a Crown Attorney who was attempting to secure a conviction at all costs. He concluded that Potts' behaviour had the effect of tainting her entire involvement in the process.

22 The pre-charge Crown interviews of complainants were, however, the most contentious issue before MacDonald A.C.J. Crown counsel, particularly Ms. Potts, became heavily involved with pre-charge interviewing. He found that the practice of pre-charge Crown interviewing in this country is not entirely rejected, but where used, its scope is narrow. MacDonald A.C.J. observed that in the provinces like New Brunswick, where pre-charge Crown interviews are done, they serve only as a screen to protect a suspect from the humiliation of being charged, if charges are later dropped or stayed. In this case, he found that the purpose for at least some of the pre-charge Crown interviews was to have reluctant complainants change their minds and come forward to lay charges. MacDonald A.C.J. held that protection of the appellant was never a factor motivating the Crown's pre-charge interviews.

23 As a result, MacDonald A.C.J. found that this process had an impact on the number of charges that were ultimately laid. He held that the Crown was integrally immersed in the decision-making about charges. Cooperation led to consensus and this collaboration homogenized the process which then became a joint charging decision. The Crown had lost its objectivity: the effect was to deny the appellant a hard, objective second look at the charging decision, which is fundamental to the role of the Crown. In MacDonald A.C.J.'s view (at para. 124),

[i]t is impossible to retain the requisite level of objectivity by conducting lengthy (and no doubt emotional) pre-charge interviews with the complainants. Human nature just will not allow it. By doing so you hear first hand only one side of the story. How can you then objectively review the process which includes a consideration of the rights of the applicant?

Nevertheless, MacDonald A.C.J. found that the Crown did not get involved in the investigation, and apart from Crown Potts' inexcusable comment about judge shopping, all other Crown counsel involved in the case were well-intentioned throughout the process, yet they simply lost perspective during the charging procedure.

24 MacDonald A.C.J. found that the Crown had not acted in bad faith when preferring the direct indictment. The preliminary inquiry was very lengthy. If the Crown had been ill-motivated, it could have preferred the direct indictment at the outset or at least sooner than it did.

25 When viewing his concerns cumulatively, about judge shopping, the Crown's pre-charge interviews and to a lesser extent, the RCMP's premature confirmation that

Regan was under investigation, in total this was not one of those clearest of cases of procedural abuse that demanded a global stay of all the charges. Instead, on a case-by-case review, he decided that for the nine charges concerning the most serious allegations there was a strong societal interest in proceeding with the prosecution.

26 However, for the less serious charges, MacDonald A.C.J. pointed out that the Pearson Report was detailed and comprehensive and spoke volumes about what the Crown originally thought was fair to the appellant. The Crown should not be seen to significantly change its position without valid reason. He held that the Crown did change its position: the direct indictment proceeded with charges involving at least four and arguably six complainants who were initially on Mr. Pearson's recommended list to exclude. He concluded that the Pearson recommendations should be given significant deference. He followed the Pearson charging recommendation and also applied its criteria to charges which post-dated the Pearson report. In the end, MacDonald A.C.J. concluded by staying the remaining 9 of the 18 counts before him.

27 MacDonald A.C.J. added a final comment about count 16, which was among those he stayed. He held that the Crown had been motivated by an improper purpose in proceeding with this charge, which was first laid as part of the direct indictment. Count 16 was similar in fact to the incident alleged to have occurred in Alberta. The Alberta allegation could not be pursued in Nova Scotia. MacDonald A.C.J. was suspicious that the Crown's eagerness to put the Alberta facts before a Nova Scotia court motivated the Crown to lay this new, similar, Nova Scotia-based charge. MacDonald A.C.J. considered this an improper purpose which irretrievably tainted this count.

1. Cromwell J.A. (Roscoe J.A. concurring)

28 Cromwell J.A., for a majority of the Court of Appeal, found two significant errors in the trial judge's reasoning. First, the trial judge erred in law by not asking himself whether the continuation of the prosecution of the charges would manifest, perpetuate or aggravate the prejudice caused by the Crown's failure to properly exercise its discretion at the charging stage. Second, the trial judge also erred by treating a judicial stay of proceedings as a remedy for past misconduct.

29 The narrow, residual category of abuse of process applied in this case, because the trial judge had rejected all the appellant's arguments that he could not receive a fair trial. Cromwell J.A. observed that there must be exceptional circumstances here to warrant the granting of a stay, as "[o]nly in rare and unusual circumstances could holding a fair trial, of itself, be damaging to the integrity of the judicial process" (para. 108).

30 Cromwell J.A. recounted the three-step analysis for this residual category (Tobiass, supra). At the first step, the accused must show that there has been misconduct, or circumstances which have arisen apart from misconduct, which render the continuation of the prosecution damaging to the integrity of the judicial process. At the second step, the court must balance the integrity of the judicial process against the societal interest in the prosecution of alleged crimes. This is done by considering whether the prejudice caused by the abuse will be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated by the continuation of the prosecution. If so, then the court considers whether another remedy, short of a stay, is reasonably capable of removing the prejudice. Only if the abuse is ongoing, and no other remedy is tenable, does the balance favour a judicial stay.

31 Further analysing the elements of the second stage, Cromwell J.A. emphasized that the remedy of a stay is prospective rather than retroactive: “a stay of proceedings is not approached as a remedy to redress a wrong that has already been done, but rather as a remedy to prevent further damage to the integrity of the judicial process in the future caused by the continuation of the prosecution” (para. 116). The ongoing harm might be repeated in the future, or might plague the process in the sense that the misconduct is so egregious that the mere going forward with the proceedings is offensive. To these examples in the case law, Cromwell J.A. added a third possibility of ongoing prejudice. This would occur in cases where “the conduct has the effect of setting the prosecution on a fundamentally different path than it would otherwise have followed” (para. 118).

32 The third step in the analysis is only undertaken if, after completing the analysis at the first two stages, it is still unclear whether a stay is required. The third stage reconsiders the balance between society’s interest in proceeding, and the interests served by granting the stay. At this stage, however, the emphasis is on whether the misconduct, on its own, is so egregious that a stay is warranted. Cromwell J.A. pointed out that in theory, such cases might exist, but in practice, it is unlikely that such egregious behaviour would not meet the criterion of ongoing harm at step two. Thus Cromwell J.A. concluded that to grant the remedy of a stay, evidence of ongoing harm from the abuse will almost always be key.

33 Cromwell J.A. noted that abuse of process cases are dependent on their facts. The trial judge made specific findings of misconduct on four matters: the premature announcement of Regan as a suspect, the judge-shopping comment, the Crown’s loss of objectivity at the charging stage, and a fourth specific finding relating to count 16, the so-called similar fact count. Cromwell J.A. went on to outline what the trial judge had specifically not found, including: the Crown was not improperly involved in the investigation; the police did not act wrongly in laying the charges; the Crown had not acted with mala fides or with an improper purpose when preferring the direct indictment; the Crown's loss of objectivity did not extend beyond the charging stage; and the Crown did not encourage the police to lay more charges nor did the Crown disregard police freedom and independence to make a decision on charges.

34 Generally, the trial judge appeared to leave out any direct consideration of the second step in the stay inquiry. There was no finding by the trial judge of a likelihood of future or ongoing misconduct, nor did he find that the cumulative abuse was so egregious, in itself, that a stay was required. Cromwell J.A. added: "However, he appears to have thought that the loss of objectivity had ongoing impact because it may have resulted in more charges proceeding than would have been prosecuted had objectivity been retained" (para. 131). Nevertheless, the trial judge expressly stated that the abuse was not serious enough to warrant a global stay. Furthermore, the trial judge gave no explicit consideration to whether another remedy was capable of removing the prejudice.

35 Cromwell J.A. proceeded to analyze each of the trial judge's findings of abuse. First was the misconduct found in the laying of count 16, the similar fact count. The trial judge concluded that count 16 was added to the direct indictment because of an improper motive. Cromwell J.A. found that this finding was contradicted by the judge's other findings that, aside from Ms. Potts, no Crown had acted improperly or with bad faith, and their perspective was lost only at the charging stage, "the time around which the first charges were laid in March of 1995" (para. 129) (not at the direct indictment, when count 16 was added). There was nothing inherently objectionable in the Crown considering questions of the admissibility of evidence and its impact on the prospects of conviction when deciding to proceed with charges. Cromwell J.A. concluded the evidence surrounding count 16 disclosed no abuse, and thus failed step one of the stay analysis. The trial judge had erred in ordering a stay of count 16.

36 Next Cromwell J.A. dealt with the finding of the loss of Crown objectivity. The trial judge had reached two independent conclusions: at the charging stage, the Crown had lost its objectivity, and at the direct indictment stage, the Crown decision was proper. Cromwell J.A. found these two holdings could not stand together. If the Crown's discretion to prefer the direct indictment was properly exercised, it must be taken to have been exercised with proper regard to the public interest. This was consistent with the trial judge's finding that the Crown's loss of objectivity was confined to the charging stage. Cromwell J.A. also noted that virtually all of the specific findings of misconduct related exclusively or primarily to Ms. Potts. Her involvement in the matter ended at the time of the preliminary inquiry and before the direct indictment was preferred. Cromwell J.A. found that the trial judge erred in generalizing about misconduct by the Crown, given the narrowness of the specific conclusions that the loss of objectivity was at the charging stage, and misconduct was attributed only to Crown Potts.

37 Cromwell J.A. disagreed with the trial judge's finding that collaboration between the Crown and the police in the charging decision is wrong. He found no basis in law for such a conclusion. Provided that the independence and distinct roles of the police and the Crown are respected and that no improper purpose is being pursued, it is desirable for the Crown and police to avoid unnecessary disagreements about whether charges should proceed.

38 The trial judge had reasoned that human nature makes it impossible for the Crown to maintain objectivity if they interview witnesses pre-charge. Cromwell J.A. rejected this. If it were so, the Crown could never conduct witness interviews, pre- or post-charge, and still remain objective. Cromwell J.A. concluded instead that “[t]he obligation to be fair-minded is ongoing” (para. 158). There was nothing “inherently insidious” about the Crown’s pre-charge interviews in this case, and Cromwell J.A. proceeded on the narrower ground identified by the trial judge that the Crown’s pre-charge interviews were conducted without objectivity because they were not done “for the purpose of reviewing whether the charges should proceed in the public interest” (para. 163). In other words, the Crown did something more than charge screening in this case. However, Cromwell J.A. added that neither the trial judge nor he found anything wrong with the Crown encouraging, by ethical means, reluctant complainants to come forward, especially in cases of sexual assault, because those victims’ confidence in the justice system is especially low.

39 Cromwell J.A. noted that the loss of Crown objectivity constituted the central concern regarding abuse of process in this case. The improper police announcement, and the judge-shopping comment appeared to be incidental to the decision to stay the nine charges. As a result, Cromwell J.A. did not deal with these issues at any great length.

40 Turning to the test for a stay of proceedings, Cromwell J.A. was of the view that the trial judge erred fundamentally at step two of this analysis because he focussed on the abuse rather than on the future harm to the integrity of the justice system. The trial judge did not find that the prejudice flowing from the abuse would be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated by the trial, nor did he turn his mind to any acceptable remedy short of a stay. However, the trial judge’s reasons were consistent with a conclusion that Regan was facing more charges than he might have been, if the Crown had not lost its objectivity. In this sense the abuse may have had ongoing effects. But granting a stay on this basis overlooked the proper preferring of the direct indictment.

41 Cromwell J.A. concluded that the trial judge erred in law by relying so heavily on the Pearson recommendation as a guide to his decision to stay some of the charges. The trial judge's approach intended to restore Regan to the position he would have enjoyed but for the Crown's subsequent loss of objectivity. This was wrong, as it was a retroactive cure for past misdeeds, instead of a prospective consideration of whether the abuse was ongoing, and what remedy would be best to address it. The Pearson letter had not crystallized the Crown's position on the charging decision — it was merely advice in response to police questions, and it did not even deal with three new charges, from five new complainants who surfaced after the Pearson letter.

42 Furthermore, the trial judge had not expressly considered the issue of whether another remedy was capable of removing the prejudice. Cromwell J.A. was of the view that this criterion could be satisfied without the need for a stay in this case. Crown Potts' removal from the case and the proper preferring of the direct indictment accrued to provide sufficient remedies to any past misconduct, and to prevent any future harm to the integrity of the judicial process.

43 From the errors committed in the stay inquiry, Cromwell J.A. concluded that the trial judge must have been unsure about the necessity of a stay at the completion of step two, and proceeded on to the balancing exercise at step three, on a case-by-case basis. In contrast, Cromwell J.A. ruled that the inevitable conclusion was that neither of the two criteria at the second stage of the test for a stay of proceedings was satisfied. However, if he was in error and it was necessary to go on to the third stage, Cromwell J.A. thought the trial judge erred in failing to properly consider all of the interests affected by the cases he stayed. It is impossible to do the required balancing of interests if only one side of the scale is considered. The trial judge had considered Regan's interest in granting the stay, but did not consider the societal interests in proceeding. Cromwell J.A. was especially sensitive to the fact that three of the stayed counts involved teenagers, employed as babysitters or a housekeeper by the appellant, and he opined that, in such situations, the integrity of the justice system might be harmed by not proceeding to trial. In the result, he allowed the appeal and set aside the stays of all nine counts.

2. Freeman J.A. (dissenting)

44 Freeman J.A. found that this case turned on the need for police and the Crown to observe the demarcation line between their functions, particularly at the pre-charge stage. The trial judge had found that the police decision to charge and the Crown decision to prosecute the charge had been scrambled together, or homogenized. As a result, neither police nor Crown was able to discharge their constitutional role of protecting the accused and the public perception of the administration of justice. Freeman J.A. reviewed the trial judge's decision and found no fault with the careful manner in which the trial judge instructed himself respecting the role of the police and of the Crown.

45 A trial judge has superior familiarity with the context of a case. This is an important reason for an appeal court to show the trial decision deference. Freeman J.A. observed that the trial judge was shocked by the judge-shopping incident and even more so by the Crown's assumption of the police role in conducting pre-charge interviews to encourage witnesses to pursue charges. The trial judge had also noted the context in which this had all occurred. Following the tragedy of the wrongful imprisonment of Donald Marshall, Jr., the criminal justice system in Nova Scotia was criticized for treating prominent people more favourably. The appellant argued that Regan was the victim of a backlash, specifically that the authorities in this case overreacted by singling him out for special, unfavourable treatment. Freeman J.A. agreed that any citizen knowledgeable of the principles and facts involved would be equally shocked.

46 Freeman J.A. was of the view that the trial judge had correctly applied the legal principles to determine that the appellant had been denied a dispassionate review of the charging decision, by an objective Crown. The result was that the accused faced a multiplicity of charges which had been determined without taking societal interests, including those of decency and fair play, into account. The trial judge had properly found this one of the clearest of cases to warrant a stay of some of the charges. A reduction in the number of charges by pruning out the less serious ones, and by accommodating society's interest by proceeding with the more serious criminal charges of rape and attempted rape, was not only the obvious remedy, but the only effective one. In conclusion, Freeman J.A. found that the trial judge had not misdirected himself and his decision was not so clearly wrong as to amount to an injustice.

IV. Legislation

47 Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

24. (1) Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46

577. In any prosecution,

(a) where a preliminary inquiry has not been held, an indictment shall not be preferred, or

(b) where a preliminary inquiry has been held and the accused has been discharged, an indictment shall not be preferred or a new information shall not be laid before any court without,

(c) where the prosecution is conducted by the Attorney General or the Attorney General intervenes in the prosecution, the personal consent in writing of the Attorney General or Deputy Attorney General, or

(d) where the prosecution is conducted by a prosecutor other than the Attorney General and the Attorney General does not intervene in the prosecution, the written order of a judge of that court.

V. Issues

48 1. Did the conduct of the Crown and police amount to an abuse of process under s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

2. Was a partial stay of proceedings warranted?

3. Was the Court of Appeal entitled to interfere with the trial court's decision to grant a partial stay?

VI. Analysis

A. Abuse of Process

49 In the Charter era, the seminal discussion of abuse of process is found in R. v. O'Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 \(SCC\), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411. The doctrine of abuse of process had been traditionally concerned with protecting society's interest in a fair process. However, in O'Connor, L'Heureux-Dubé J., writing for a unanimous Court on this issue

(Lamer C.J. and Sopinka and Major JJ. dissenting on the application of law to the facts), subsumed the common law doctrine abuse of process into the principles of the Charter in the following terms, at para. 63:

[I]t seems to me that conducting a prosecution in a manner that contravenes the community's basic sense of decency and fair play and thereby calls into question the integrity of the system is also an affront of constitutional magnitude to the rights of the individual accused.

L'Heureux-Dubé J. also acknowledged the existence of a residual category of abuse of process in which the individual's right to a fair trial is not implicated. She described this category, which is invoked in the present appeal, as follows in O'Connor, at para. 73:

This residual category does not relate to conduct affecting the fairness of the trial or impairing other procedural rights enumerated in the Charter, but instead addresses the panoply of diverse and sometimes unforeseeable circumstances in which a prosecution is conducted in such a manner as to connote unfairness or vexatiousness of such a degree that it contravenes fundamental notions of justice and thus undermines the integrity of the judicial process.

50 L'Heureux-Dubé J. thus held that now, when the courts are asked to consider whether the judicial process has been abused, the analysis under the common law and the Charter will dovetail (see O'Connor, at para. 71). In this manner, while it acknowledged that the focus of the Charter had traditionally been the protection of individual right, the O'Connor decision reflected and accommodated the earlier concepts of abuse of process, described at common law as proceedings “unfair to the point that they are contrary to the interest of justice” (R. v. Power, 1994 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 601, at p. 616), and as “oppressive treatment” (R. v. Conway, 1989 CanLII 66 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R.

1659, at p. 1667). In an earlier judgment, McLachlin J. (as she then was) expressed it this way:

. . . abuse of process may be established where: (1) the proceedings are oppressive or vexatious; and, (2) violate the fundamental principles of justice underlying the community's sense of fair play and decency. The concepts of oppressiveness and vexatiousness underline the interest of the accused in a fair trial. But the doctrine evokes as well the public interest in a fair and just trial process and the proper administration of justice. I add that I would read these criteria cumulatively.

51 Under the Charter, the violation of specific fair trial rights may also constitute an abuse of process, as will a breach of the more general right to fundamental justice (see O'Connor, at para. 73).

52 Finally, this Court's most recent consideration of the concept of abuse of process arose in the administrative context. In Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307, 2000 SCC 44, it was held that a 30-month delay in processing a sexual harassment complaint through the British Columbia human rights system was not an abuse of process causing unfairness to the alleged harasser. For the majority, Bastarache J. came to this decision on the basis that abuse of process has a necessary causal element: the abuse "must have caused actual prejudice of such magnitude that the public's sense of decency and fairness is affected" (para. 133). In Blencoe's case, it was held that the humiliation, job loss and clinical depression which he suffered did not flow primarily from the delay, but from the complaint itself, and the publicity surrounding it (Blencoe, at para. 133; see also United States of America v. Cobb, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 587, 2001 SCC 19).

B. Stay of Proceedings

53 A stay of proceedings is only one remedy to an abuse of process, but the most drastic one: “that ultimate remedy”, as this Court in Tobiass, supra, at para. 86, called it. It is ultimate in the sense that it is final. Charges that are stayed may never be prosecuted; an alleged victim will never get his or her day in court; society will never have the matter resolved by a trier of fact. For these reasons, a stay is reserved for only those cases of abuse where a very high threshold is met: “the threshold for obtaining a stay of proceedings remains, under the Charter as under the common law doctrine of abuse of process, the ‘clearest of cases’” (O’Connor, supra, at para. 68).

54 Regardless of whether the abuse causes prejudice to the accused, because of an unfair trial, or to the integrity of the justice system, a stay of proceedings will only be appropriate when two criteria are met:

- (1) the prejudice caused by the abuse in question will be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated through the conduct of the trial, or by its outcome; and
- (2) no other remedy is reasonably capable of removing that prejudice. [O’Connor, at para. 75]

The Court’s judgment in Tobiass, at para. 91, emphasized that the first criterion is critically important. It reflects the fact that a stay of proceedings is a prospective rather than a retroactive remedy. A stay of proceedings does not merely redress a past wrong. It aims to prevent the perpetuation of a wrong that, if left alone, will continue to trouble the parties and the community as a whole, in the future.

55 As discussed above, most cases of abuse of process will cause prejudice by rendering the trial unfair. Under s. 7 of the Charter, however, a small residual category of abusive action exists which does not affect trial fairness, but still undermines the fundamental justice of the system (O'Connor, at para. 73). Yet even in these cases, the important prospective nature of the stay as a remedy must still be satisfied: “[t]he mere fact that the state has treated an individual shabbily in the past is not enough to warrant a stay of proceedings” (Tobiass, at para. 91). When dealing with an abuse which falls into the residual category, generally speaking, a stay of proceedings is only appropriate when the abuse is likely to continue or be carried forward. Only in “exceptional”, “relatively very rare” cases will the past misconduct be “so egregious that the mere fact of going forward in the light of it will be offensive” (Tobiass, at para. 91).

56 Any likelihood of abuse which will continue to manifest itself if the proceedings continue then must be considered in relation to possible remedies less drastic than a stay. Once it is determined that the abuse will continue to plague the judicial process, and that no remedy other than a stay can rectify the problem, a judge may exercise her or his discretion to grant a stay.

57 Finally, however, this Court in Tobiass instructed that there may still be cases where uncertainty persists about whether the abuse is sufficient to warrant the drastic remedy of a stay. In such cases, a third criterion is considered. This is the stage where a traditional balancing of interests is done: “it will be appropriate to balance the interests that would be served by the granting of a stay of proceedings against the interest that society has in having a final decision on the merits”. In these cases, “an egregious act of misconduct could [never] be overtaken by some passing public concern [although] . . . a compelling societal interest in having a full hearing could tip the scales in favour of proceeding” (Tobiass, at para. 92).

C. Application to the Case at Bar

1. Abuse of Process

58 In the case at bar, the trial judge was concerned with the cumulative effect of three elements of the proceedings brought against the appellant: “These include judge shopping; the Crown’s pre-charge interviews, and to a lesser extent, the R.C.M.P.’s premature press release confirming the investigation” (para. 132). In addition to these events early in the proceedings, the trial judge found that the one count added to the direct indictment (count 16) was laid for an improper purpose.

(a) Judge Shopping

59 It is important to understand exactly what the Crown said and did in relation to judge shopping. There is direct evidence that the Senior Crown Attorney assigned to this case during the police investigation said in a meeting with police that the laying of charges should be delayed to avoid bringing them before a particular judge, whom she feared might be sympathetic to the accused. This impropriety was exacerbated by her comment that she would monitor the court docket, looking for a different judge who would be more sympathetic to the laying of charges against the accused. There is no evidence that the comment was made more than once, and no evidence that it was acted upon. Nevertheless, it was said to police involved in the case, and set a tone of overzealous and unfair pursuit of a prosecution against the accused.

60 This Court has adverted to the impropriety of trying to influence the outcome of a proceeding by trying to “select” the judge. Where it appeared that the Crown had abandoned a case before one judge to avoid an unfavourable ruling, and then reinstated charges at a new trial before a new judge, McLachlin J. was quick to point out the affront to the integrity of the system (Scott, supra, at pp. 1008-9):

The concern with “judge-shopping” arises from the use of the stay to avoid the consequences of an unfavourable ruling. Normally, Crown counsel faced with an unfavourable ruling is expected to accept it. The remedy is by way of appeal. . . .

Such conduct also raises concern for the impartiality of the administration of justice, real and perceived. The use of the power to stay, combined with reinstitution of proceedings as a means of avoiding an unfavourable ruling, gives the Crown an advantage not available to the accused.

61 The judge shopping in this case was equally offensive. It illustrated another inequality between the Crown and defence, in that only the Crown has the power to influence which judge will hear its case by manipulating the timing of the laying of the charge. Even if this advantage was not ultimately exploited, it must be reasserted that judge shopping is unacceptable both because of its unfairness to the accused, and because it tarnishes the reputation of the justice system. Furthermore, it should not infect the investigative process by involving police in a conspiracy to manipulate the process. The trial judge quite properly was seriously troubled by this evidence. He nevertheless was mindful that this single comment was not acted upon, and did not find it determinative in his ultimate conclusion that the process against the accused had been abusive to the point of necessitating a stay of proceedings.

(b) The Police/Crown Relationship

62 The appellant contends that a bright line must be drawn at the stage where charges are laid, in order to keep the functions of the police separate from those of the prosecutors. This separation, he argues, is the only way to maintain the Crown's crucial objectivity when reviewing the appropriateness of charges. The trial judge adopted this approach in assessing the administration of justice now practised in Nova Scotia. Citing various studies on the police/Crown relationship, MacDonald A.C.J. identified the police role as limited to pure investigation pre-charge, and the subsequent decision of whether to lay a charge. This reserves for the Crown the role of "Minister of Justice", in the sense that the Crown must be both ardent prosecutor once charges have been laid, and objective defender of the general public interest in determining whether to prosecute the charges recommended by police. Recognizing that in practice the police and Crown must still work together, MacDonald A.C.J. nevertheless emphasized that "the need for co-operation should never interfere [with] their individual autonomy" (para. 72).

63 The trial judge determined that the practice of Crown pre-charge interviewing in this country is "non-existent to rare", and is only done for the benefit of the accused, that is for the purpose of screening out frivolous or unsupportable charges: "[o]n the occasions when it is performed, it serves as a screen designed to protect an accused from going through the embarrassment (humiliation) of being charged only to later have the charges dropped or stayed" (para. 117). Any other pre-charge contact with witnesses would unavoidably undermine the Crown's objectivity – MacDonald A.C.J. reasoned that human nature would prevent the Crown from considering any interest other than that of the witness. The trial judge concluded that in this case, every charge laid subsequent to a Crown interview was suspect, and only DPP Pearson's paper-based assessment of the charges was objective.

64 The question before this Court is whether the Crown's objectivity is necessarily compromised if Crown counsel conduct pre-charge interviews of witnesses without the single, express intention of screening out charges before they are laid. In essence, this Court has been asked to consider whether, at law, Crown prosecutors must be prevented from engaging in wide-ranging pre-charge interviews in order to maintain their essential function as “Ministers of Justice”. First, it is my view that different provinces have answered this question differently, and that the trial judge erred in his evaluation of the standard practice across the country on this issue. Furthermore, while the police tasks of investigation and charge-laying must remain distinct and independent from the Crown role of prosecution, I do not think it is the role of this Court to make a pronouncement on the details of the practice of how that separation must be maintained.

65 The seminal concept of the Crown as “Minister of Justice” is expressed by this Court’s judgment in Boucher v. The Queen, 1954 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1955] S.C.R.16, in which Rand J. explained, at pp. 23-24:

It cannot be over-emphasized that the purpose of a criminal prosecution is not to obtain a conviction, it is to lay before a jury what the Crown considers to be credible evidence relevant to what is alleged to be a crime. Counsel have a duty to see that all available legal proof of the facts is presented: it should be done firmly and pressed to its legitimate strength but it must also be done fairly. The role of prosecutor excludes any notion of winning or losing; his function is a matter of public duty than which in civil life there can be none charged with greater personal responsibility.

The issue before the Court in Boucher, inter alia, was whether the Crown counsel’s personal opinion about the guilt of the accused was improper. It was so found. The exposition of the facts in Boucher helps to draw the distinction between Crown involvement with the case, pre-charge, and whether that inevitably leads to a loss of the Crown’s necessary objectivity (at p. 27, per Locke J.):

The [Crown’s] statements were calculated to impress upon the jury the asserted fact that, before the accused had been arrested, the Crown, with its experts, had made a thorough investigation and was satisfied that he was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Introduced into the record in this manner, there could be no cross-examination to test their accuracy.

The Crown prosecutor, having improperly informed the jury that there had been an investigation by the Crown which satisfied the authorities that the accused was guilty, thus assured them on his own belief in his guilt and employed language calculated to inflame their feelings against him. [Emphasis added.]

Based on the underlined sections, it appears that the Crown was involved in the investigation, before the arrest, thus presumably pre-charge. Yet this alone was not troublesome to the Court. Instead, it was the subsequent Crown's personal conclusion drawn from this investigation, namely that the accused was guilty, which was then put before the jury in the manner of evidence, which the Court found inappropriate. This action revealed that the Crown had lost his objective stance as a Minister of Justice in the process. The example, I believe, helps to differentiate between the fact of pre-charge involvement by the Crown, and the loss of objectivity which may result.

66 The need for a separation between police and Crown functions has been reiterated in reports inquiring into miscarriages of justice which have sent innocent men to jail in Canada. The Royal Commission on the Donald Marshall, Jr., Prosecution, vol. 1, Findings and Recommendations (1989) ("Marshall Report") speaks of the Crown's duty this way: "In addition to being accountable to the Attorney General for the performance of their duties, Crown prosecutors are accountable to the courts and the public. In that sense, the Crown prosecutor occupies what has sometimes been characterized as a quasi-judicial office, a unique position in our Anglo-Canadian legal tradition" (pp. 227-28). The Marshall Report emphasizes that this role must remain distinct from (while still cooperative with) that of the police (at p. 232):

We recognize that cooperative and effective consultation between the police and the Crown is also essential to the proper administration of justice. But under our system, the policing function -- that of investigation and law enforcement -- is distinct from the prosecuting function. We believe the maintenance of a distinct line between these two functions is essential to the proper administration of justice.

67 I note that investigation is not synonymous with interviewing for the purposes at issue in this appeal. The trial judge made a clear ruling that the Crown did not engage in “investigation” in this case. The distinct line appears to be that police, not the Crown, have the ultimate responsibility for deciding which charges should be laid. This can still be true after the Crown has made its own pre-charge assessment, and when the two arms of the criminal justice system disagree on whether to lay charges. (See testimony of Philip Stenning, Appellant’s Record, at p. 975.) The Nova Scotia Solicitor General’s Directive on Laying of Charges (1990), which responded to the Marshall inquiry, states:

All Police Departments must implement the following protocol for the resolution of disputes between police and Crown over the laying of criminal charges:

- (i) no charge shall be laid, contrary to the advice of a Crown Prosecutor, until discussion concerning the matter has taken place between the Police Department and the Crown Prosecutor;
- (ii) if there is no resolution of the disagreement at that level, the matter must be referred to a senior police official of the department, who will discuss the matter with the Regional Crown Prosecutor;
- (iii) if, following such discussion, the police remain of the view that a charge is warranted, the charge shall be laid.

68 The protocol encourages a police and Crown joint assessment pre-charge: there is nothing in these recommendations that indicates that the separation between police and Crown functions must be implemented by preventing Crown contact with potential witnesses pre-charge. Therefore, while the Marshall Report speaks of a distinct line between police and Crown functions, it is one that may be drawn conceptually and figuratively, through conscious practice, rather than literally by the act of laying charges.

The appellant also drew the Court's attention to the 1998 Report of the Commission on Proceedings Involving Guy Paul Morin, which inquired into another recent instance of wrongful conviction, after which Morin spent several years in jail, before his innocence was recognized. This inquiry focussed on the Crown's failure of objectivity throughout the process as a result of too close contact between the Crown counsel and police. Justice Kaufman, who wrote the report, concluded that, at the root of the problems in the Morin case there had been a failure by the Crown prosecutor to assess objectively the reliability of evidence, before charges were laid (vol. 2, at pp. 909, 911 and 1069-70):

The bottom line is this: [the Crown] failed to objectively assess the reliability of evidence which favoured the prosecution. It is difficult to determine the precise extent to which each of the prosecutors appreciated just how unreliable some of the evidence tendered was. . . .

The prosecutors showed little or no introspection about these contaminating influences upon witnesses for two reasons: one, the evidence favoured the prosecution; this coloured their objectivity; two, their relationship with the police which, at times, blinded them, and prevented them from objectively and accurately assessing the reliability of the police officers who testified for the prosecution. . . .

It is also understandable that this belief [of Morin's guilt] would affect the prosecutors' assessment of their own evidence and the evidence tendered by the defence. Their failing was that this belief so pervaded their thinking that they were unable, at times, to objectively view the evidence, and incapable at times to be at all introspective about the very serious reliability problems with a number of their own witnesses. As I have said earlier, their relationship with the police, at times, blinded them to the very serious reliability problems with their own officers. [Emphasis in original.]

The parties agree in the present case that Crown objectivity and the separation of Crown from police functions are elements of the judicial process which must be safeguarded. What the Morin inquiry shows is that objectivity can be lost without the Crown's involvement in pre-charge interviews, and that this loss of objectivity in fact did occur, in part, as a result of post-charge Crown interviews. It does not mean that the absence of pre-charge interviews would be, of itself, a guarantee of fair process or that the restrained use of such interviews may not be consistent with a separation of Crown and police functions.

(c) Other Jurisdictions

71 While the separation of police and Crown roles is a well-established principle of our criminal justice system, different provinces have implemented this principle in various ways. This Court has already recognized that some variation in provincial practices in the administration of the criminal law is to be expected and allowed in certain circumstances. In R. v. S. (S.), 1990 CanLII 65 (SCC), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 254, Dickson C.J. observed, at pp. 289-90:

It is necessary to bear in mind that differential application of federal law can be a legitimate means of forwarding the values of a federal system. In fact, in the context of the administration of the criminal law, differential application is constitutionally fostered by ss. 91(27) and 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The area of criminal law and its application is one in which the balancing of national interests and local concerns has been accomplished by a constitutional structure that both permits and encourages federal-provincial cooperation. A brief review of Canadian constitutional history clearly demonstrates that diversity in the criminal law, in terms of provincial application, has been recognized consistently as a means of furthering the values of federalism. Differential application arises from a recognition that different approaches to the administration of the criminal law are appropriate in different territorially based communities.

An examination of the practices in several Canadian provinces illustrates that different jurisdictions have approached the issue of Crown pre-charge interviews in different ways.

(i) New Brunswick

72 At trial, several witnesses gave evidence about the system of criminal prosecutions in the province of New Brunswick. Glendon Abbott, Director of Public Prosecutions for the province, was one. He described that part of the Crown's function as to provide advice to policing authorities. We in the Province of New Brunswick, at least, exercise a pre-charge screening function. The Attorney General has set out a threshold for charging and we review police files that are brought to us for that purpose, to make a decision on charging. And we exercise the prosecutorial duties to advance the case through the legal system. . . . The short form of the test [to determine whether a prosecution should proceed] is to be satisfied that there is a reasonable prospect of conviction.

73 Mr. Abbott also gave evidence about his understanding of New Brunswick's written policy on initiating prosecutions: "In my view, yes, implicitly it does speak to [Crown pre-charge interviews] and contemplates pre-charge contact with potential witnesses." The policy states:

In making a decision as to sufficiency of evidence, the Crown prosecutor considers such factors as the availability and admissibility of evidence, the credibility of witnesses, and their likely impression on a judge or jury, the admissibility of any confessions, the reliability and admissibility of any identification, and generally will draw on experience to evaluate how strong the case is likely to be when presented in court. In addition, there are public interest factors that may be taken into account.

(New Brunswick Criteria for Prosecutions, Appellant's Record, at pp. 519-520)

Mr. Abbott testified that based on this policy, in some cases . . . the prosecutor and myself from my own experience would want to interview some of the witnesses [pre-charge]. Not in every case, but in some cases. . . .

Over approximately 23 or so years I've been with public prosecutions, this is not an uncommon practice. . . .

I think as a category of offenses or alleged offenses, where there are allegations of sexual assault, this is more common.

Such Crown pre-charge interviews are conducted to assess credibility and weight of the complainant's evidence, for both youthful witnesses, and adults, and to inform potential witnesses of the legal process, while also testing their resolve to pursue the matter. Mr. Abbott acknowledged that as a result of his pre-charge interviews, "there were cases where it aided [him] in drawing a conclusion that there was a reasonable prospect of conviction and – well, not equally, but in many cases where there wasn't a reasonable prospect of conviction". He concluded, "I don't feel that interviewing the witness prior to the approval or not or approval [sic] of charges affects my ability to discharge my duty impartially."

74 Regional Crown Prosecutor for the rural Miramichi district of New Brunswick, Fred Ferguson, testified that he too does pre-charge interviewing, about once a year. In his experience, such interviewing is done for young witnesses, historic sex assault allegations, and "where there's been a question of motive" to prosecute. He said that time and manpower have made it difficult to do more pre-charge interviews.

(ii) Quebec

75 The intervener Attorney General of Quebec made submissions before this Court that it is not unusual in that province for Crown counsel to interview witnesses pre-charge: [TRANSLATION] "[T]he intervener maintains that there is nothing heretical in a representative of the Attorney General meeting with or even questioning witnesses, including victims, before charges are laid" (Intervener's factum, at para. 3). In fact, pre-charge screening has been a “systematic” practice in Quebec for more than 30 years (Intervener’s factum, at para. 4).

76 The system of Crown pre-charge screening in Quebec is much like that in New Brunswick, and was instituted to improve the administration of justice. In particular, the practice is done for a number of reasons:

[TRANSLATION] The prosecutor’s decision to authorize the laying of criminal charges presupposes that the conduct complained of constitutes an offence in law, that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the person under investigation is the perpetrator, that it is legally possible to prove it, and that it is appropriate to prosecute. In exercising prosecutorial discretion, the prosecutor must take into account various policy and social considerations. [Intervener’s factum, at para. 14]

As almost all of the expert witnesses at trial testified, Crown pre-charge interviewing is especially useful in cases of sexual assault allegations. The Quebec experience further supports this:

[TRANSLATION] Generally, the goals are to understand better the victim’s reluctance to lodge a complaint or to testify, to reassure him or her and to create an atmosphere of trust, in order better to assess the witness’s credibility if necessary or to get the witness to relate accurately the circumstances of the offence to the court or, in some cases, simply to explain the proceedings to the victim, including the examination and cross-examination, so that he or she is better prepared to face an experience that is very painful for a number of people. [Intervener’s factum, at para. 36]

In fact, Quebec’s Justice Minister has instructed that contact between sexual assault complainants and Crown counsel should occur at the beginning of the process of laying charges, and in cases of minors (under the age of 18) who make such complaints, pre-charge meetings with the Crown are mandatory. According to the Manuel de directives aux substituts du procureur général (rev. 1997), Directive No. INF-1, at para. 5, with certain exceptions, [TRANSLATION] “[t]he prosecutor must meet with the child before authorizing the laying of an information”. (See also ministère de la Justice du Québec, Crimes à caractère sexuel: Guide du poursuivant (2000), at pp. 13 and 27.)

(iii) British Columbia

77 Several of the witnesses and interveners remarked that British Columbia also uses a system of pre-charge screening, similar to New Brunswick and Quebec. In British Columbia, Crown counsel must approve charges before the police can lay them, and this Crown approval may require witness interviews, pre-charge. The Crown charge screening function is intended to accomplish the same variety of systemic benefits as in New Brunswick, Quebec, and even Ontario (see below). A 1990 study by the Law Reform Commission of Canada, which looked at the role of Crown counsel in the criminal justice system, remarked that the pre-charge screening/interviewing procedures used in New Brunswick, Quebec and British Columbia work well (Law Reform Commission of Canada, Controlling Criminal Prosecutions: The Attorney General and the Crown Prosecutor (1990), Working Paper 62, at pp. 74-75).

(iv) Ontario

78 Michael Code, a witness for the appellant, described the most restrictive role for Crown pre-charge involvement, which he said is the practice in Ontario. According to Mr. Code, a former Assistant Deputy Attorney General — Criminal Law of the province, two dangers arise from pre-charge interviewing by the Crown. First, it can undermine the independence of police in deciding which charges to lay, and second, it can strip the Crown of its necessary objectivity in assessing whether to proceed with the charges laid by police.

(I note here that the trial judge in this case made no finding that the police decision to lay charges was improper. Therefore, only the second concern will be further developed.)

79 To avoid these perversions of our system of police/Crown independence, Mr. Code was of the opinion that Crown counsel should not interview witnesses until after police have laid the charge, and after the Crown has decided to prosecute it. He testified that among the 10 very senior prosecutors he knows, they personally never conduct pre-charge interviews, have never heard of anyone else doing it, and think it is wrong, and inconsistent with their role as Crown counsel.

80 Despite Mr. Code's position, another witness from Ontario, Chief Crown Attorney for Ottawa-Carleton, Andrejs Berzins, testified that some pre-charge Crown interviewing is done in Ontario. Mr. Berzins has done one or two such pre-charge interviews every year.

81 Brian Gover, another expert witness from Ontario, confirmed this practice: "I regard it as an unusual event for a Crown counsel to interview a potential witness at a pre-charge stage. But, nonetheless, it's my view that Crown practice in Ontario is sufficiently flexible to accommodate that occurring." (Appellant's Record, p. 696) He added (at p. 717):

. . . it's important that Crown counsel have paramount in his or her mind the role of the Crown as distinguished from the role of the police. It's essential that the Crown not engage in pre-charge evidence-gathering. But, as I said, there will be circumstances in which it is appropriate for the Crown to engage in a process of confirming in his or her own mind that the evidence attributed to a witness would, in fact, be given by that witness as part of the determination of whether reasonable grounds exist and whether there's a reasonable likelihood of conviction.

82 Therefore, even in Ontario, it cannot be said that Crown pre-charge interviews are non-existent, and in Quebec, New Brunswick and British Columbia they are common, and regularly conducted in sexual assault cases, especially when historic incidents or young complainants are involved.

(d) Policy Considerations

83 A lesson underscored by the report on the Morin case and the events which led to its tragic outcome is that the appellant's proposed "quick fix" to maintain Crown objectivity, by preventing Crown interviews pre-charge, is both misguided, and potentially harmful – because pre-charge Crown interviews may advance the interests of justice (see below), and because the pre- versus post-charge distinction may distract attention away from the necessary vigilance to maintain objectivity throughout the proceedings.

84 It is quite clear that there are many public policy reasons for which Crown counsel in some jurisdictions conduct witness interviews, pre-charge. Mr. Abbott and Mr. Gover both testified about efficiencies which are gained by pre-charge screening which protect the repute of the justice system, not only the personal interests of the accused. Complainants also benefit from a single decision to proceed with or avoid laying charges, rather than having to deal with the stress and publicity of a charge and then face the appearance that they have made a spurious accusation if the charge is later withdrawn. In addition, all of the expert witnesses with knowledge of the Crown practice of pre-charge interviewing told of the interests it serves in assessing witness credibility, demeanour and resolve, especially in sexual assault cases. Such pre-charge interviews are even more important when charges are “historic” or when complainants are young.

85 The evidence in this case also exposes the systemic concerns that sexual assault complainants often have. The RCMP report about the Regan investigation is very telling in this regard:

In some cases, those strongly suspected of being a victim, would not discuss the incident with the investigators, leaving the member with the feeling that the incident had taken place however they preferred not to disclose. . . . [some] who were willing to confirm that an offence was committed. . . . are not in a position to become involved in any court process because of . . . the fear of repercussions. . . .

The fact that the suspect, in some cases being the Premier of the Province or in other cases, a high-profile person within the community, coupled with the victim’s fear and what the public reaction would be, especially in the 1950 ’s, ‘60 ’s and ‘70 ’s, is certainly reason to understand why victims failed to disclose.

(Investigation Report, March 30, 1994, Appellant’s Record, at pp. 1068-69)

Complainants may worry of retribution from the alleged assailant, and from their own families and community. They may also fear being “re-victimized” by the court system. They may not feel comfortable making complaints to police, or feel reassured by police regarding confidentiality, or the process in general. The extensive record of discussion between witnesses, police and Crown (see for example: continuation report, Respondent’s Record, at pp. 716-18) here shows that, in some cases where police failed to assuage the concerns of some complainants, Crown counsel were successful. The interests of justice are not only served by screening out fruitless complaints but also served by encouraging proper charges to go forward, and by signalling to the larger society that complainants can bring sexual assault charges to the courts without further undue trauma, and that where charges are properly laid, they will be prosecuted.

86 Finally, quite apart from the specific aspects of sexual assault allegations, other examples abound of situations where the interests of justice may be served by the Crown conducting pre-charge interviews. For example: the protection of Charter rights during an investigation, cases involving jailhouse informants, and cases which have a statutory requirement for Crown consent to the laying of charges.

(e) The Impact of the Trial Judge's Approach to Policy Issues

87 It is also important that the justice system not be and not appear arbitrary. The trial judge explained the “crucial issue” before him as a narrow one: “It involves firstly, the Crown’s determination to interview complainants pre-charge and secondly, the impact of that process on the number and types of charges that were ultimately laid” (para. 121). But the determination of the appropriateness of Crown influence on the charging decision based on when Crown interviews are conducted reveals a certain arbitrariness. In the case at bar, the trial judge found abuse because the Crown interviewed complainants before charges were laid. The trial judge found that this extinguished the Crown’s objectivity, and he implied that, as a result, more charges were laid than if objectivity had been retained. Yet, if the Crown had waited until after charges were laid to re-interview those complainants who initially had refused to come forward, it would still have been open to the Crown to recommend to police that these additional charges should be laid. It would have remained within police discretion to add charges based on that Crown advice. In fact, the May 30 amendment to the information did add new charges in relation to a new complainant. Yet, again, in the direct indictment, a new complainant was added and other charges were amended or dropped. The conclusion to be drawn from what could have happened and did happen is that the process is a fluid one. The expectation is that both the police and the Crown will act according to their distinct roles in the process, investigating allegations of criminal behaviour, and assessing the public interest in prosecuting, respectively. The exercise of these roles does not seem to be clearly or predictably altered by whether the formal act of the laying of charges has occurred.

The trial judge's more formalistic view might have negative policy consequences. MacDonald A.C.J. said: "The Crown emphasizes the fact that they always interview complainants post-charge in any event. . . . That, with respect, misses the point. The charging decision is crucial. It determines who the complainants will be" (para. 125). This approach, however, does not account for the fact, recognized by the expert witnesses, that in some cases, especially involving sexual assault, complainants may need information from the Crown to properly understand the process in order to decide whether to press charges. In the trial judge's scenario, this could never happen, because Crown counsel would only ever interview complainants who were already pressing charges.

There is another negative implication of arbitrarily drawing a hard line at the decision to lay charges. As Rand J. made clear in Boucher, supra, commitment to the case, belief in the allegations, and the desire to see justice done are not incompatible with objectivity and fairness. Objectivity requires that a rational assessment of facts be brought to bear in making decisions relating to the case. Awareness of one's strong feelings about a case can and should be kept in mind, as a check against tunnel vision. The danger with the trial judge's approach, that of drawing a bright line between pre- and post-charge interviews, is that it risks giving the false impression that remaining personally detached from complainants before charges are laid is the best (or the only necessary) effort to protect objectivity. So how does the Crown protect objectivity after the charge is laid? As all parties accept, objectivity and fairness is an ongoing responsibility of the Crown, at every stage of the process. The Court of Appeal, respondent and interveners point out that if subjectivity is the inevitable consequence of contact between the Crown and complainant, then even post-charge interviews are problematic because they would undermine Crown objectivity for every decision after these interviews have taken place.

90 Finally, the trial judge’s concern about human nature must be addressed. The trial judge held that personal interaction in the form of interviews between the Crown and potential complainants inherently threatens the Crown’s ability to be objective, because it is an inevitable fact of human nature that the Crown will become subjectively involved with the facts of the case. In the result, the trial judge found that a bright line should be drawn between pre- and post-charge interviews by the Crown. Yet he also ruled that pre-charge Crown interviews are quite proper for the limited purpose of charge screening, to spare the potential accused from the unnecessary embarrassment and harm to reputation that comes with a criminal charge. This begs the question, however, of how a Crown in such proper pre-charge interviews would be able to overcome the natural impulse to favour the complainants, in order to reach the objective conclusion to recommend against laying charges.

91 Summing up, the evidence shows that in some Canadian jurisdictions, pre-charge interviews by the Crown are a regular, even common practice. In these jurisdictions at least, it appears that public policy is served by the practice, and potentially harmful and arbitrary results are avoided by the refusal to draw a hard line at the decision to lay charges, before which Crown counsel may not interview complainants. Viewed in this context, I cannot conclude that wide-ranging pre-charge Crown interviews, per se, are an abuse of process.

(f) Police Conduct

92 The trial judge found that the police were “clearly wrong” (para. 86) when they released Regan’s name as a suspect, well in advance of any charges. This was in contravention of the express policy of law enforcement agencies that the identity of suspects may be released only after charges have been laid. However, MacDonald A.C.J. added that this lapse was not done in bad faith, and the judge himself further indicated that this police error influenced his finding of abuse of process “to a lesser extent” (para. 132).

93 This policy was adopted, no doubt, to protect the privacy and other interests of individuals who are merely questioned about a crime, with nothing more. There is no question that such a policy is laudable, and a breach of it should not be condoned. However, other evidence on the record indicates that after this one misstep, the police exercised greater caution in preventing further information leaks until the process was truly public. For example, when the police delivered their investigation report to DPP Pearson, the letter included a control sheet asking that all persons who have control or access to please sign and date, to establish continuity. Throughout this investigation, the media has been diligent and persistent in obtaining information and for this reason security must remain a priority. I have implemented controls within the R.C.M. Police to limit access. I have not allowed any R.C.M. Police documents, pertaining to this investigation, to be disseminated outside this Headquarters, Halifax Sub Division and the Task Force investigators. Therefore, I am now asking that the same restriction occur within your office and this information be carefully protected.

(Letter from Chief Superintendent Falkingham to DPP Pearson, May 19, 1994)

In addition, the police acceded to Regan’s request to hold the arraignment outside Halifax, to try to avoid a media frenzy. In my view, this supports the finding of no bad faith.

94 I would add that following the dictum in Blencoe, the prejudice experienced by the appellant as a result of this early leak – humiliation and stress – cannot be attributed to this police error alone. This impact on Regan was a certainty no matter when his name was finally released in connection with these charges, and there is no question that there was sufficient evidence and subjective belief for the police to ultimately lay at least some of the charges. Furthermore, there is no evidence to suggest that the premature announcement had any effect on the separate question of whether the Crown properly proceeded with the charges. While the media may have been clamouring for information, it does not follow that this put pressure on the authorities to lay any particular number of charges, or any charges at all, for that matter.

95 For these reasons, I think the trial judge was correct in his finding that this police error either alone or in combination with the Crown conduct discussed above does not rise to the level of egregious abuse. The serious remedy of a stay of proceedings is not an appropriate method to denounce or punish past police conduct of this nature.

(g) Count 16

96 This count involved a woman who alleged that when she was a 24-year-old political reporter, she was pushed onto a hotel room bed and groped during an interview with then-Premier Regan. At the time of DPP Pearson’s assessment of the allegations, this complainant was only willing to be a similar fact witness. Pearson suggested that she be re-interviewed. After a re-interview with police and Crown, this witness decided to press charges.

97 The trial judge was “unsettled” by the laying of this charge because it was factually similar to the Alberta-based incident. From this, MacDonald A.C.J. concluded: “The Crown therefore felt it needed [to lay count 16] so that [the Alberta complainant’s] ‘story could be told’. . . . Yet the Crown’s goal as I see it was to have the jury hear and (presumably act upon) the [complaint of the Alberta woman], a similar fact witness” (paras. 157-58).

98 The trial judge did, however, recognize the validity of count 16 in its own right: “I realize that the Crown nonetheless considers [count 16] to be worthy of prosecuting. Yet I do not find this to be their primary motive” (para. 159). The reason the Crown’s motive was improper, in MacDonald A.C.J.’s view, was because of his finding of the Crown’s loss of objectivity: “When the Crown interviews pre-charge a certain amount of objectivity is lost. The Crown’s critical review of the charge list is gone. Perhaps if the Crown had not been so involved with interviewing witnesses pre-charge, they may have seen all this in a different light” (para. 160).

99 As I have already discussed, I find that the trial judge’s finding of a loss of Crown objectivity cannot be supported by the evidence. This erroneous reading of the facts influenced the holding on count 16. If the trial judge had not started from the premise that the Crown had lost its objectivity, there would have been no justification for the trial judge to find the similarity between count 16 and the Alberta incident as the primary motivation for count 16, virtually ignoring the reasonable and probable grounds for laying count 16 in its own right. Furthermore, as Cromwell J.A. observed, in other respects the trial judge held that there was no improper purpose or mala fides underlying the preferral of the direct indictment. The trial judge found a loss of Crown objectivity only at the first charging decision, nearly a year before the direct indictment. Moreover, Cromwell J.A. pointed out, “[t]here is nothing inherently objectionable in the Crown considering questions of the admissibility of evidence and their impact on the prospects of conviction when deciding to proceed with charges” (para. 140). For these reasons I find the trial judge erred in finding an abusive or improper purpose behind the laying of count 16.

(h) Cumulative Effect of Police and Crown Conduct

In assessing the cumulative effect of this evidence of Crown and police misconduct, the trial judge concluded that Crown Potts' objectivity was hopelessly lost, and her influence on the case set other well-meaning Crown counsel astray. The trial judge seemed reinforced in this decision because in addition to Potts' judge-shopping comment, he was troubled by "Ms. Potts' perplexing desire to interview all potential complainants" (para. 100).

On close review of the evidence, however, the Crown's intention to re-interview complainants does not seem perplexing at all. Police were of the opinion that a pattern of criminal behaviour emerged from a view of the full picture of the allegations. They disagreed with DPP Pearson's recommendation to lay charges in respect of only four complainants. Police were urging further review and Crown Potts undertook to read the voluminous, detailed investigation reports (which ultimately took her some six months).

In the course of that review, Crown Potts indicated that re-interviews would be appropriate, according to notes taken by Staff Sergeant Fraser: "Reports being reviewed by Potts. Interested in meeting with victims" (Fraser notes, August 17 and 18, 1994, Respondent's Record, at p. 501; see also Investigation Report, August 22, 1994, Respondent's Record, at p. 498). These re-interviews were done after DPP Pearson had already advised that the case which proceeded would be strengthened if the unwilling complainants with the more recent allegations would change their mind and come forward. Furthermore, DPP Pearson specifically recommended that six of the unwilling complainants should be interviewed, albeit by police. The police attended with the Crown at these re-interviews and appeared to agree that the joint interviews should be done: "It is now the investigators and the Crown's belief that if these persons could be re-interviewed with both the Crown Prosecutor and police investigator present there would be a greater chance of them changing their minds" (Police Transit Slip, January 17, 1995, Appellant's Record, at p. 1084). Finally, the expert testimony of Glendon Abbott, Fred Ferguson, Andrejs Berzins and Philip Stenning indicated that in a case such as this, it would be very likely that in other provinces, some Crown counsel would interview complainants pre-charge: the allegations of sexual assault were historic, the alleged victims were young at the time of the incidents, the alleged perpetrator was high profile and the case was made further controversial by the involvement of the suspect's political enemy. In this context, I fail to see why a thorough re-interview of complainants by the Crown was perplexing, where the Crown would have wanted to assess first-hand the possible charges versus similar fact evidence, and to ensure that complainants fully understood the judicial process before deciding whether to press charges.

103 From this process, the trial judge seemed to infer that the appellant ended up facing more charges than he otherwise would have. Yet I do not see how re-interviewing the complainants for whom DPP Pearson had already recommended charges could have led to more charges in those cases. In the case of the unwilling and similar fact complainants, Pearson had made no charging recommendation. He did, however, generally recommend that some witnesses be re-approached, and that more recent allegations would strengthen the overall case. As some of these complainants decided to press charges, I do not understand why it was inappropriate to reassess the other cases, even where Pearson had initially recommended against laying charges. And of course, during this process, five new complainants surfaced. It is not known to what extent their allegations cast a new light or raised new questions in relation to the earlier list of complainants. In the end, it appears to me that the police had virtually made their charging decision – they wanted to lay charges in respect of the complete picture. The Crown's interviews appear to have provided a basis on which to make their own charging decision – which was also based on an assessment of the full, revised picture. The re-interviews were done to promote many of the policy reasons discussed above: to fully inform potential complainants of the process, to assess their evidence and credibility, for efficiency in the administration of justice, and for the sake of the appearance of decisive action, taken in an already highly public and controversial case. Finally, as the Pearson charging recommendation was clearly preliminary, it is impossible to know whether, as a result of the Crown interviews, the appellant ended up facing more charges.

104 In summary, it is my view that there was no abuse of process in this case. The pre-charge interviews were done in accordance with the common practice of some other provinces, a practice more wide-ranging than the narrow, exceptional to rare practice the trial judge described. Furthermore, the Crown conducted an understandable review of the potential witnesses, in the wake of an early recommendation by DPP Pearson that was not determinative. Given the uncertainty of the charges at that point, it could not be known whether the re-interviews led to more charges than would otherwise have been laid. I conclude that, based on the evidence of judge shopping, pre-charge Crown interviews, the improper police announcement, and the addition of count 16 in the direct indictment, the cumulative effect of these actions, while troubling in some respects, does not rise to the level of abuse of process which is egregious, vexatious, oppressive or which would offend the community's sense of decency and fair play. Moreover, this conduct, even if it did amount to an abuse, did not have an ongoing effect on the accused, which would jeopardize the fairness of his trial. On that basis, I must now turn to the central issue decided by the Court of Appeal, namely the decision to lift the stay of proceedings ordered by the trial judge.

2. Stay of Proceedings

105 Having found an abuse of process under s. 7 of the Charter but ruled that it would not affect trial fairness, the trial judge recognized this put the case in the narrow residual category of abuse where a stay may be granted only in exceptional cases.

However, the trial judge misconceived the governing test for a stay of proceedings as outlined in Tobiass. At this stage of the analysis, instead of inquiring into whether the abuse would be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated by ongoing proceedings, and then inquiring into whether any remedy other than a stay could cure this ongoing taint, the trial judge focussed his attention only on the final balancing exercise (at paras. 58-59):

This balancing act, so common to almost everything we do as judges, will play a significant role in my analysis in the case at bar.

In summary, to justify a stay I must ask myself: Are the alleged wrongdoings so unfair to the applicant or so offensive to society so as to render a stay the only reasonable remedy? Is this one of those “clearest of cases” or, on the other hand, are there societal interests compelling enough to tip the scales in favour of proceeding? [Emphasis in original.]

106 This error was further emphasized when the judge turned his mind to the facts of the abuse of process, as he saw them (at para. 133):

. . . the cumulative effect of these actions would not shock the community’s sense of fair play and decency so as to warrant a stay of all charges outright. It is not one of those “clearest of cases” that demands a global stay. Some of these charges involve very serious allegations that by their very nature present a strong societal interest to have prosecuted through a full and fair hearing. As was explained in Tobiass, supra, I find that this “compelling societal interest . . . tips the scales in favour of proceeding” with at least some of these charges. [Emphasis in original.]

107 There was no discussion in the trial judge’s reasons of any ongoing impact of the abuse he found. As discussed earlier, the embarrassment to the appellant of the premature police announcement was overtaken by the charges which would have been laid in any event. Therefore there was no continuing prejudice from this misconduct. One must also remember that the humiliation flowing from properly laid charges, while unpleasant, is not an abuse of process. As for the trial judge's concern for loss of Crown objectivity, there was no evidence that this was in any way affected by the police misbehaviour. It was also discussed above that the evidence cannot support the inference that Crown pre-interviews or any loss of Crown objectivity inevitably led to the appellant facing more charges. It should be noted that DPP Pearson and the police had expressed a desire to re-interview all but three of the complainants, and that, since then, these three never pressed any charges. Therefore this conduct, even if abusive, cannot be said to be manifested or perpetuated if the process continues. The judge-shopping comment was restricted to one Crown counsel, on one occasion, without further action. In addition, that Crown counsel has long since left the prosecution of this case. Finally, there was simply nothing improper about the inclusion of count 16 in the direct indictment. To speak of ongoing abuse where none was ever apparent makes no sense. All told, even if this conduct did amount to abuse, it falls at the low end of the spectrum of seriousness, and is not significant enough that proceeding in its wake would, in and of itself, shock the community's sense of fairness and decency.

108 Thus, the trial judge fell into error when he ordered the ultimate remedy of a partial stay of a number of charges. The abuse that was found by the trial judge could be and was addressed by remedies other than a stay. Crown Potts was removed from the prosecution. A Crown not involved with the earlier stages of the case became lead counsel for the prosecution. The police instituted strict measures to maintain confidentiality of the investigation. And ultimately, there was a detailed review of the charges, signed by a new Director of Public Prosecutions when the direct indictment was preferred.

(a) The Direct Indictment

109 For the purposes of assessing any ongoing or lingering effects of the abuse of process found by the trial judge, the majority of the Court of Appeal relied heavily on the direct indictment as evidence of a fresh, objective review of the charges. Cromwell J.A. noted that the trial judge’s finding of abuse was at “the charging stage”, that is, when the information was sworn on May 30, 1995. The trial judge also found no impropriety in the Crown’s decision to prefer the direct indictment. Cromwell J.A. therefore reasoned that even if Crown Potts’ involvement in the process, and more generally the Crown’s participation in pre-charge interviews, had tainted the process, by the time of the direct indictment, Crown Potts was no longer on the case, and the direct indictment itself amounted to a remedy which cleansed any earlier abuse.

110 Section 577 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, requires that the Attorney General or his or her Deputy give personal consent in writing to prefer a direct indictment. It is predictable that there will be variation from office to office and province to province on the actual procedure involved to meet this requirement. I think it is fair to assume, however, that the case at bar would not have been treated as any garden variety, pro forma approval of a direct indictment. As Freeman J.A. (dissenting) pointed out, from the outset, this prosecution had been “extraordinary and controversial” (para. 4) as a result of “[t]he prominence of the accused and the high level of media interest in the case” (para. 5).

111 Not only would this sensitive context likely have drawn the close attention of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia (or his or her delegate), but there is direct evidence that the Crown paid close attention to the actual charges contained in the direct indictment. First, one complainant listed on the May 30, 1995 information was completely dropped from the direct indictment. Second, one count under s. 138(2) of the Criminal Code, S.C.

1953-54, c. 51, was dropped from the charges in relation to a second complainant. Third, a count in relation to an entirely new complainant was added to the direct indictment. Furthermore, these changes were ultimately approved by Jerry Pitzul, a new Director of Public Prosecutions, who was not involved in the Pearson review, and was not the acting DPP immediately after Pearson left the post.

112 Finally, there is evidence of objectivity at the stage when the Crown was preparing the direct indictment. Two witnesses were interviewed by the Crown a second time in April 1997. In one case, the woman was included as an unwilling witness on the original list that went to DPP Pearson. At this final meeting, she expressed an interest in pressing charges against Regan, but the Crown decided not to include her in the direct indictment. In the other case, the woman had come forward after the Pearson recommendation with another, similar allegation against the accused. At that time, and at the time of the direct indictment, she was unwilling to get involved in the proceedings, and no charge was laid.

(b) Balancing a Stay Against Proceeding to Trial

113 Even if one assumes that by applying the proper test the trial judge had found an ongoing abuse which could only be remedied by a stay, the cumulative effect of the abuse still left some question about whether this was one of those clearest of cases warranting a stay. Indeed, that prompted the trial judge's charge-by-charge balancing analysis. Yet in his balancing analysis, the trial judge omitted some significant issues relevant to the public interest.

The trial judge “afforded significant deference” (para. 141) to the Pearson charging recommendation when reaching his conclusion about staying half of the total charges. In fact, the decision to proceed with charges relating to only four complainants directly reflected DPP Pearson’s advice. The trial judge explained that he was so highly influenced by Pearson’s position because “the Crown should not be seen to significantly change its position without valid reason” (para. 135). The trial judge, however, did not seem to consider the inconclusive nature of the Pearson recommendation. First, the Pearson letter advised that the case would be strengthened if more complainants with more recent allegations were willing to come forward. Second, the Pearson letter specifically recommended that four complainants be re-interviewed. Police did re-interview those women, and others, accompanied by a Crown counsel. As a result, more women came forward, willing to lay charges. This constituted a valid reason to alter the original opinion regarding charges. Finally, the letter indicated that it was entirely within police discretion to accept or ignore the Pearson recommendation, and it was also open to the Crown to reconsider which charges to proceed with, following the police charging decision. These qualifications all signify a Crown recommendation which anticipated the possibility of change -- not one which was etched in stone. As a result of new complainants surfacing, of further interviews, and ongoing consideration of the charges by both police and the Crown, a charging decision was made which included the Pearson recommendation as well as additional charges. There was no reason to assume that the Pearson view of the matter was the Crown’s final or most appropriate view.

The trial judge’s differentiation between the charges he stayed and those he did not also reflected DPP Pearson’s view of the “seriousness” of the alleged offences. As discussed above, the Pearson view emphasized physical invasiveness and overlooked the complainants’ age, and their socially subordinate and relatively powerless positions in relation to the accused. The Pearson view also reflected the notion of social acceptance (as opposed to illegality) of the alleged crimes some 30 to 40 years ago. Charges brought before a modern court should not be trapped in a social time warp. Once it is determined that past behaviour was an apparent violation of the contemporary law, then the benefit of current social mores should be brought to bear in assessing the advisability of pursuing charges. This approach is especially significant when sexual assault charges are at issue. This Court has recognized the disadvantage that women victims have suffered as a result of stereotypes in society and the justice system. (See, for example, R. v. Seaboyer, 1991 CanLII 76 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 577; O'Connor, supra; R. v. Ewanchuk, 1999 CanLII 711 (SCC), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 330; R. v. Mills, 1999 CanLII 637 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 668; R. v. Darrach, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 443, 2000 SCC 46.) Without revisiting the thoughtful consideration of those judgments in the current case, it suffices to say that those gains would amount to nothing if modern charges of sexual assault for historic acts are viewed with blinkers and through a looking glass that sees an old stereotypic view rather than an enlightened one. It is not for this Court to judge the Crown's assessment of social interests in proceeding with historic sexual assault charges. It is, however, appropriate for this Court to review lower court decisions according to the standards of modern jurisprudence. Furthermore, when exercising their discretion to grant a stay, courts are bound to consider all significant factors, a requirement by which the Crown is not bound when making its charging decisions. It was not sufficient for the trial judge to merely follow the course set by DPP Pearson.

116 There are many societal interests engaged by this case, which the trial judge failed to factor into the balance. Victims of sexual assault must be encouraged to trust the system and bring allegations to light. As the police saw it, there is evidence of a pattern of an assailant sexually attacking young girls and women who were in a subordinate power relationship with the accused, in some cases bordering on a relationship of trust. When viewed in this light, the charges are very serious and society has a strong interest in having the matter adjudicated, in order to convey the message that if such assaults are committed they will not be tolerated, and that young women must be protected from such abuse. In omitting to consider any of these issues which favour proceeding with charges, the trial judge's discretion was not fully exercised and therefore cannot stand.

D. Standard of Review

117 The decision to grant a stay is a discretionary one, which should not be lightly interfered with: “an appellate court will be justified in intervening in a trial judge’s exercise of his discretion only if the trial judge misdirects himself or if his decision is so clearly wrong as to amount to an injustice” (Tobiass, supra, at para. 87; Elsom v. Elsom, 1989 CanLII 100 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1367, at p. 1375). Furthermore, where a trial judge exercises her or his discretion, that decision cannot be replaced simply because the appellate court has a different assessment of the facts (Stein v. The Ship “Kathy K”, 1975 CanLII 146 (SCC), [1976] 2 S.C.R. 802; see also R. v. Oickle, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 3, 2000 SCC 38; R. v. Van der Peet, 1996 CanLII 216 (SCC), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 507).

118 This does not mean, however, that the trial judge is completely insulated from review. It is settled law that where the “trial judge made some palpable and overriding error which affected his assessment of the facts”, the decision based on these facts may be reversed (Kathy K, at p. 808). In the present case, I find that the trial judge made palpable and overriding factual errors which set his assessment of the facts askew. I also find that he misdirected himself regarding the law for granting a stay by overlooking key elements of the analysis, thereby committing an error which was properly reversed by the Court of Appeal.

1. Error of Fact

I find that the trial judge's characterization of the scope of pre-charge interviewing done across the country was narrower than the expert evidence indicates. The trial judge concluded (at para. 117):

Based upon my review of all of the above expert evidence, it seems to me that the scope of pre-charge Crown interviewing in this country is a very narrow one. It ranges from non-existent to rare. On the occasions when it is performed, it serves as a screen designed to protect an accused from going through the embarrassment (humiliation) of being charged only to later have the charges dropped or stayed.

He characterized the practice of pre-charge interviewing conducted by Crowns in New Brunswick, Quebec and British Columbia as "Crown pre-charge screening" (para. 120). By this, MacDonald A.C.J. meant that the only acceptable form of Crown pre-charge meetings with complainants occurs when the Crown is motivated solely by a desire to benefit the accused by screening out frivolous or unsustainable charges. The evidence of Glendon Abbott, Fred Ferguson, Andrejs Berzins and Philip Stenning clearly contradicts this. Pre-charge interviews in New Brunswick are done for a variety of policy reasons, only one of which is the protection of the potential accused. Furthermore, even in Ontario where the practice of Crown pre-charge interviewing is the most circumscribed, it does occur on a regular basis. The trial judge, with respect, was therefore in error when he ruled that "pre-charge Crown interviewing in this country is . . . non-existent to rare" (para. 117). The evidence before him disclosed that Crown pre-charge interviews range from a regularly although infrequently exercised practice in Ontario, to a commonly practised procedure in New Brunswick. While the practice is not used in every case, it appears that it is typically used in cases of sexual assault, especially when allegations are historic, the complainant is young, or there is some other reason for specific concern about the strength of the evidence. This palpable error of fact had significant ramifications on the trial judge's reasoning. Based on his erroneous view, he found the Crown's conduct in this case at variance with standard practice across the country and therefore improper. From this impropriety he deduced a loss of objectivity in the Crown's decision to proceed with charges, and from that finding, he concluded that there was an abuse of process, where the other examples of police and Crown misconduct alone would not have risen to the level of procedural abuse where a stay might be warranted.

120 In addition, I find a second factual error in the trial judge's reasoning. Without ever explicitly stating it, the trial judge implies that the loss of objectivity was abusive because it meant that the appellant ultimately faced more charges. No evidence can be found to support this deduction. The recommendations of DPP Pearson were clearly given as part of a charging decision still in flux. Pearson stated that the police were not bound to follow his advice, nor was the Crown bound to proceed with any charges which the police decided to lay. Pearson expressly recommended that some complainants be reinterviewed and he suggested that more charges would strengthen the case. Finally, he could not have anticipated that five new complainants would come forward, subsequent to his charging recommendation (three of whom ultimately accepted that the Crown proceed with charges). All of these facts point to the conclusion that the Pearson recommendation to proceed with charges related to four complainants was an interim one, and that it would be impossible to know whether the process which followed the Pearson recommendation resulted in the appellant facing more charges – more charges in relation to what? However, this erroneous factual finding was a palpable error which served as a springboard for the trial judge to find an abuse of process, and to launch into the case-by-case assessment of which charges should be stayed. At any rate, it could not have been inappropriate to lay additional charges if they had an adequate factual foundation and probable cause could be ascertained.

2. Error of Law

121 In addition, the trial judge misdirected himself on the test for granting a stay. By incorrectly emphasizing the balancing stage, weighing the interests flowing from a stay against the public interest in proceeding, he skipped over the key assessment of whether the abuse (as he so found it) would be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated in the proceedings if they continued. He also ignored the step of the analysis which requires that other remedies be considered.

122 I agree with the Court of Appeal that if the trial judge had properly applied the law, he would have concluded that the abuse that he had identified was not ongoing, and that indeed, the remedies of removing Crown Potts from the prosecution and of recognizing, in the circumstances of this case, the direct indictment as a fresh, objective review of the charges put an end to any lingering doubt that the appellant was continuing to face a prosecution that was abusive, vexatious, oppressive or in any way an affront to decency and fair play.

123 Finally, if after having properly undertaken this analysis, the trial judge had still been in doubt as to whether a stay of proceedings was the proper remedy for the abuse of process he found, the balancing exercise which he ultimately undertook was also erroneous. The Tobiass test instructs that in such circumstances, the benefits of a stay must be considered in relation to the benefits of continuing the process. An egregious act of misconduct can overtake some passing public concern, but, in other circumstances, a compelling societal interest in proceeding can tip the scales against granting a stay. By the trial judge's own assessment, the case of abuse before him was not egregious enough to warrant a global stay of all the charges. Yet this less serious example of abuse was not fully weighed against the compelling societal interests in signalling that allegations of sexual abuse of young, vulnerable girls and women will be heard, in encouraging all sexual assault complainants to trust the system and come forward, and in protecting the repute of a system of justice that is sensitive to these allegations of crime and the difficulties faced by the complainants who make them. If the societal factors had been fully weighed, the balancing exercise would have led to the conclusion that not one of these allegations was among the clearest of cases where a stay of proceedings was appropriate.

VII. Conclusion

124 As Freeman J.A., dissenting, put it: “On the hearing of the application for the stays, it was incumbent on the appellant to establish not only that he was entitled to a duty of objectivity on the part of the Crown in making its prosecuting decision, but that the duty was infringed so seriously that only a stay of proceedings could remedy the harm.” There is no question, and the Crown readily concedes, that the principles of fairness and fundamental justice entitle an accused to a duty of objectivity exercised by the Crown in deciding to prosecute. However, even if the trial judge was correct in finding an abuse of process, when the facts at bar are correctly understood, and when the proper test for granting a stay of proceedings is applied, the appellant fails to establish that the Crown’s duty of objectivity was infringed so seriously, either by the police, Crown Potts, or the Crown’s involvement in pre-charge interviews, that only a stay can remedy the harm.

125 For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

The reasons of Iacobucci, Major, Binnie and Arbour JJ. were delivered by 126 BINNIE J. (dissenting) — This is an appeal from the discretionary order of Michael MacDonald A.C.J., who stayed the prosecution of nine charges of indecent assault against the appellant while permitting nine more serious charges to proceed. It was his view, after an 18-day hearing, that Crown prosecutors had manifested such a lack of objectivity in seeking the conviction of a prominent politician “at all costs” as to taint the integrity of the administration of justice in Nova Scotia. We ought to defer to his factual conclusions, in my opinion.

127 In the two most serious situations, which were allowed to proceed, the appellant was charged with rape (and attempted rape) and unlawful confinement. In a third situation, which also went to trial, he was charged with exposing his penis to a babysitter while grabbing her hand when driving her home. These charges involved teenage girls, one barely 14 years of age, about half the appellant’s age at the time.

128 A Nova Scotia jury subsequently acquitted the appellant of all eight charges that have thus far gone to trial. One charge of indecent assault is outstanding.

129 The trial judge was favourably impressed by the opinion of the then Director of Public Prosecutions in Nova Scotia, Mr. John Pearson, when advising the RCMP in 1994 prior to the commencement of any proceedings. Mr. Pearson concluded that while the more serious charges should proceed against the appellant, the prosecution of the less serious charges (that are now 24 to 34 years old) “may be seen as ‘persecution’ in light of the facts, the staleness of the offences and the relatively insignificant sentence, which could be anticipated if convictions were entered”. While Mr. Pearson did not say so, it appears he viewed the “lesser” incidents as matters that might have proceeded at the earlier time on summary conviction, in which case the applicable limitation period would have been six months.

The appellant claims that because of strong criticism of the Nova Scotia prosecutors' service in the case of Donald Marshall who served 11 years in jail for a crime he did not commit, and the controversies related to prosecutions arising out of the Westray mining disaster (discussed in part in R. v. Curragh Inc., 1997 CanLII 381 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 537), the prosecutors failed in this case to perform their constitutional role as a check and balance on police power. In their determination not to be seen to be favouring the appellant, a former Premier of Nova Scotia, they leaned over backwards and denied him the "hard objective second look (at the charging decision)" ((1998), 1998 CanLII 14078 \(NS SC\), 21 C.R. (5th) 366, at para. 122) to which every citizen, of whatever rank or station, is entitled. In the trial judge's view the prosecutors, far from acting as a counterbalance to the police team, effectively became part of it.

Since obtaining a favourable decision from the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal the Crown has, on its own motion, stayed two of the nine charges on which it obtained a green light to proceed.

The remaining seven charges that were the subject of the stay involve allegations of sexual assault consisting of unwanted kissing, "French kissing", groping, fondling or similar acts between 1968 and 1978 with different complainants who, at the time, came into contact with the appellant as babysitters, a legislative page, a housekeeper, a hotel dishwasher and a news reporter. The complainants' ages varied from 14 to 24 years old. The trial judge acknowledged that all charges of sexual assault are serious. Nevertheless, he concluded that the Crown's failure to act objectively in this case amounted to an abuse of process. The policy concerns raised by the then Director of Public Prosecutions were never subsequently properly addressed, as they ought to have been, in the trial judge's view.

133 As the charges themselves were the direct product of the abuse, the logical remedy was to stay their further prosecution. No lesser remedy would eliminate the root of the abuse. The trial judge found the prosecution of the additional nine charges to arise out of a fundamentally unfair procedure and to be among the “clearest of cases” calling for a stay of proceedings.

134 In my view, the trial judge instructed himself properly on the law and there is no reversible error in his application of the law to the facts. His decision ought not to have been reversed by the majority judgment of the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal (Freeman J.A. dissenting). That court, in my view, simply substituted their own divided opinion on issues that were given to the trial judge to decide. I would allow the appeal.

I. Abuse of Process

135 Everyone in this country, however prominent or obscure, is entitled to the equal protection of the law. As a politician of some prominence, the appellant was not entitled to be treated any better than other individuals, but nor should he have been treated worse. An important element of the protection of the law is that where the Crown Attorneys are involved they stand independent both of the police and of persons suspected of crimes to determine in a fair and even-handed way whether and how charges laid by the police should proceed.

136 The appellant says that the Crown cannot point to any other instances where it was sought to prosecute a comparable series of 24- to 34-year-old allegations of sexual touching, serious as those allegations are, and his counsel draws the conclusion that if the appellant had remained in obscurity as a sometime lawyer and sports announcer, Nova Scotia would not now be expending its considerable resources to obtain his conviction. The Crown Attorney's office, in his view, is not standing up as they should to the powerful pressures of the media and an aroused public opinion.

137 I agree with the trial judge as a matter of law that the Crown prosecutors must retain objectivity in their review of charges laid by the police, or their pre-charge involvement, and retain both the substance and appearance of even-handed independence from the police investigative role. This is the Crown Attorney's "Minister of Justice" function and its high standards are amply supported in the cases: Boucher v. The Queen, 1954 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1955] S.C.R. 16; Lemay v. The King, 1951 CanLII 27 (SCC), [1952] 1 S.C.R. 232, at p. 257, and R. v. Stinchcombe, 1991 CanLII 45 (SCC), [1991] 3 S.C.R. 326, at p. 341. In Controlling Criminal Prosecutions: The Attorney General and the Crown Prosecutor (1990), Working Paper 62, the Law Reform Commission of Canada rightly observed that "prominent people, such as politicians . . . should be treated neither preferentially nor more harshly than others. If proceedings would not have been commenced against an ordinary individual, they ought also not to be commenced against the prominent individual" (p. 80).

138 The trial judge found as a fact that there was no independent and objective review by the Crown prosecutors in this case. The absence of the usual and proper checks and balances would, he thought, shock the conscience of the community. He cited a number of concerns that reflected this institutional failure (including premature disclosure of the investigation, improper Crown involvement in the charging decisions, laying a charge to bootstrap otherwise inadmissible similar fact evidence, and judge shopping), but his listing of the symptoms should not be mistaken for his important and central finding of fact that the appellant had been denied his constitutional right to a fair pre-trial procedure.

A. Standard of Review

139 I agree with my colleague LeBel J. that the standard of review of the trial judge's decision to grant a remedy under s. 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms was authoritatively stated by Gonthier J. in Elsom v. Elsom, 1989 CanLII 100 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1367, at p. 1375, as follows: "[A]n appellate court will be justified in intervening in a trial judge's exercise of his discretion only if the trial judge misdirects himself or if his decision is so clearly wrong as to amount to an injustice"; see also R. v. Carosella, 1997 CanLII 402 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 80, at para. 48.

140 We should also keep in mind the well-established rule mentioned by La Forest J. in Friends of the Oldman River Society v. Canada (Minister of Transport), 1992 CanLII 110 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 3, at p. 76:

The appellate tribunal is not at liberty merely to substitute its own exercise of discretion for the discretion already exercised by the judge. In other words, appellate authorities ought not to reverse the order merely because they would themselves have exercised the original discretion, had it attached to them, in a different way.

B. Review of Findings of Fact

141 An appellate court should give appropriate deference to the findings of fact of a trial judge, who in this case heard nine days of evidence and nine days of legal argument. The relevant cases are gathered together in R. v. Van der Peet, 1996 CanLII 216 (SCC), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 507, where Lamer C.J. concluded, at para. 81:

It is a well-settled principle of law that when an appellate court reviews the decision of a trial judge that court must give considerable deference to the trial judge's findings of fact, particularly where those findings of fact are based on the trial judge's assessment of the testimony and credibility of witnesses.

I would also note that the principle of appellate court deference has been held to apply equally to findings of fact made on the basis of the trial judge's assessment of the credibility of the testimony of expert witnesses

142 For the reasons that follow, it is my view that the critical findings of fact of the trial judge in this case compel the issuance of a stay of proceedings.

C. Approach of the Court of Appeal

143 I agree with Cromwell J.A. in the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal ((1999), 1999 NSCA 165 \(CanLII\), 179 N.S.R. (2d) 45) that the crux of the trial judge's reasoning was that as a result of the abuse of process which the trial judge found to exist, the appellant is facing charges that otherwise would never have been laid, or if laid would not have been prosecuted. (The excessive charges, to be specific, are the nine charges which are the subject of the stay.)

144 Cromwell J.A. put it this way at para. 128:

Although the judge does not explicitly say so, it appears that he found that the respondent, as a result of the loss of objectivity, may have been facing many more charges than he would have had appropriate objectivity been retained. With respect to Count 16, the judge found that it was prosecuted for an improper motive.

145 On the other hand, with respect, I do not agree with the overall approach of the majority judgment of Cromwell J.A. when it takes the symptoms of institutional failure identified by the trial judge and (as I interpret his opinion) addresses each symptom in isolation from the others with a view to demonstrating that what was done was not necessarily and in all cases wrong. I think, with respect, this approach is incorrect. Quite apart from the trial judge's emphasis on the cumulative effect of the various elements of the conduct complained of, the majority opinion mistakes the symptoms for the diagnosis. The trial judge's concern was not so much at the level of the individual symptoms as it was with the failure in this case of the institutional checks and balances. The failure prevented the objective review of charges laid by the police that, because of their staleness, relatively minor nature (compared with those that did go to trial) and the potentially light sentences even if convicted, would likely have been stopped if an objective review had taken place.

146 As stated, these broader concerns found expression in the report of the then Director of Public Prosecutions for Nova Scotia, Mr. John Pearson, dated June 28, 1994. The trial judge accepted, of course, that Mr. Pearson's opinion was not binding upon the police or on subsequent prosecutors (and certainly not on the court). Still, it represented a bench mark of objectivity and even-handedness that he thought ought to have continued to guide consideration of both the charges Mr. Pearson considered and the others that followed. Mr. Pearson made the following observations about the potential charges that he recommended against proceeding with:

The Other Complainants

Concerning the other four complainants . . . it is our opinion that these allegations should not be proceeded with by way of criminal charges. We have concluded that acts contemplated by the indecent assault section of the Criminal Code of the day were present in these cases. However, consideration of the following public interest factors tips the scale in favour of not proceeding with these matters as criminal charges:

- i) the allegations are minor in nature, especially when placed in the context of societal values at the time (this fact is best illustrated in [the] incident [involving one complainant] where her father, upon learning of the facts, demanded an apology from the accused);
- ii) the “staleness” of the offences when compared with their gravity;
- iii) the prosecution of these charges may be seen as “persecution” in light of the facts, the staleness of the offences and the relatively insignificant sentence, which could be anticipated if convictions were entered;
- iv) other alternatives are available to sanction this behaviour, i.e. the prosecution of the more serious charges; and
- v) the maintenance of public confidence in the administration of justice can be sustained without these four charges proceeding.

147 The charges that were stayed by the trial judge were described by Freeman J.A., dissenting, as historic counts (at para. 20):

Each count alleges a single impulsive act, an isolated incident without repetition, follow-up, or persistency on the part of the respondent. The most recent of the stayed counts was almost 20 years old at the time of the trial, and some were more than 30. None of the complainants had come forward to initiate contact with police. The director of public prosecutions who evaluated the police case before the charging decision was made, and before the Crown’s objectivity had been compromised, had recommended against proceeding with historic counts of this nature.

148 The conclusion that well-informed people may reasonably take from the continued prosecution of what Mr. Pearson described as “minor” allegations 24 to 34 years after the events are said to have taken place is that the appellant is being pursued not so much for what he has done as for who he is. Such a perception undermines public confidence in the impartiality and integrity of the criminal justice system, in my opinion.

D. Law Governing Abuse of Process

149 There is no doubt that the prosecutorial misconduct found by the trial judge would not prevent the accused from receiving a fair trial on all charges. The appellant's complaints in that regard were all properly rejected.

150 The issues relevant to the "abuse of process" claim in this case are:

- (i) the extent to which an objective and even-handed Crown Attorney is essential to the checks and balances at the stages of the criminal justice system in which he or she is involved, and
- (ii) whether preferring a direct indictment and the holding of a subsequent fair trial cures the omission of an essential check and balance in the laying of the charges.

1. The Importance of Checks and Balances

151 It is clear that Crown Attorneys perform an essential "Minister of Justice" role at all stages of their work. Their role in considering or carrying forward a prosecution is of the highest importance for the integrity of our criminal justice system, and was perhaps most famously described by Rand J. in Boucher, supra, at pp. 23-24:

It cannot be over-emphasized that the purpose of a criminal prosecution is not to obtain a conviction, it is to lay before a jury what the Crown considers to be credible evidence relevant to what is alleged to be a crime. Counsel have a duty to see that all available legal proof of the facts is presented: it should be done firmly and pressed to its legitimate strength but it must also be done fairly. The role of prosecutor excludes any notion of winning or losing; his function is a matter of public duty than which in civil life there can be none charged with greater personal responsibility. It is to be efficiently performed with an ingrained sense of the dignity, the seriousness and the justness of judicial proceedings.

Many other statements of the highest authority can be found to the same effect. In Stinchcombe, supra, Sopinka J. for the Court stated as follows, at p. 341:

The tradition of Crown counsel in this country in carrying out their role as “ministers of justice” and not as adversaries has generally been very high.

152 In R. v. Bain, 1992 CanLII 111 \(SCC\), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 91, Gonthier J. for himself, McLachlin and Iacobucci JJ., dissenting on other grounds, stated at p. 118:

The single-minded pursuit of convictions cannot be compatible with the responsibilities of Crown prosecutors.

153 In Nelles v. Ontario, 1989 CanLII 77 \(SCC\), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 170, Lamer J. (as he then was) for himself, Dickson C.J. and Wilson J., stated at p. 191:

Traditionally the Crown Attorney has been described as a “minister of justice” and “ought to regard himself as part of the Court rather than as an advocate”.

154 See also Lemay, supra, per Cartwright J., dissenting on other grounds, at p. 257: “[T]he sole object of the proceedings is to make certain that justice should be done”.

155 The “Minister of Justice” responsibility is not confined to the courtroom and attaches to the Crown Attorney in all dealings in relation to an accused person whether before or after charges are laid. It is a responsibility “that should be conducted without feeling or animus on the part of the prosecution” (R. v. Chamandy (1934), 1934 CanLII 130 (ON CA), 61 C.C.C. 224 (Ont. C.A.), per Riddell J.A., at p. 227).

156 These statements suggest at least three related but somewhat distinct components to the “Minister of Justice” concept. The first is objectivity, that is to say, the duty to deal dispassionately with the facts as they are, uncoloured by subjective emotions or prejudices. The second is independence from other interests that may have a bearing on the prosecution, including the police and the defence. The third, related to the first, is lack of animus – either negative or positive – towards the suspect or accused. The Crown Attorney is expected to act in an even-handed way.

157 In R. v. G.D.B., [2000] 1 S.C.R. 520, 2000 SCC 22, at para. 24, we held that “the right to effective assistance of counsel” in the criminal justice system reflects a principle of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7 of the Charter. The duty of a Crown Attorney to respect his or her “Minister of Justice” obligations of objectivity and independence is no less fundamental. It is an essential protection of the citizen against the sometimes overzealous or misdirected exercise of state power. It is one of the more important checks and balances of our criminal justice system and easily satisfies the criteria first established in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, 1985 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486, at p. 513:

Whether any given principle may be said to be a principle of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7 will rest upon an analysis of the nature, sources, rationale and essential role of that principle within the judicial process and in our legal system, as it evolves.

158 These requirements set a high standard. The courts rightly presume, such are the high traditions of the prosecutorial service in this country, that they are met in the thousands of decisions taken every day that so vitally impact the lives of those who find themselves in trouble – rightly or wrongly – with the law. Unfounded or trivial allegations will be given short shrift. In this case, however, the trial judge found that the departure from the expected standard was neither unfounded nor trivial. The extent of the departure was deeply troubling. The trial judge has much experience in the practicalities of criminal prosecutions. We are thus confronted in this case with a very exceptional set of facts.

159 The police investigate. Their task is to assemble evidence and, assessing it as dispassionately as they can, determine whether in their view it provides reasonable and probable grounds to lay charges. The prosecutors provide the initial checks and balances to the power of the police. As the late Mr. Justice Arthur Martin observed in his Report of the Attorney General's Advisory Committee on Charge Screening, Disclosure, and Resolution Discussions (1993) ("Martin Report"), at p. 117, "[a]s ministers of justice, their ultimate task is to see that the public interest is served, in so far as it can be, through the use, or non-use, of the criminal courts" (emphasis added). Further (at pp. 117-18):

Discharging these responsibilities, therefore, inevitably requires Crown counsel to take into account many factors, discussed above, that may not necessarily have to be considered by even the most conscientious and responsible police officer preparing to swear an information charging someone with a criminal offence.

160 The Crown prosecutor thus stands as a buffer between the police and the citizen. As the Martin Report emphasized, at p. 39:

. . . separating the investigative and prosecutorial powers of the state is an important safeguard against the misuse of both. Such separation of power, by inserting a level of independent review between the investigation and any prosecution that may ensue, also helps to ensure that both investigations and prosecutions are conducted more thoroughly, and thus more fairly. [Emphasis added.]

161 The appellant was as much entitled to this “level of independent review” as any other suspect. The trial judge concluded that the distinct roles of the Crown Attorney and the police became blurred and “homogenized”. In the result, the appellant was deprived of the institutional protection to which he was, and is, entitled. This is how the trial judge put this crucial finding of fact (at para. 122):

The Crown states that it was not involved in the investigation and I accept this. However it is clear to me that the Crown was integrally immersed in the decision-making process as it applied to the laying of charges. In so doing it became heavily involved with interviewing potential complainants. Unlike Mr. Pearson, they did not critically review a police report. Instead they collaborated fully with the police to create what in essence became a joint charging decision. Cooperation led to consensus, but only at the expense of the process which became homogenized. Thus the applicant was denied that hard objective second look (at the charging decision) which is so fundamental to the role of the Crown. [Emphasis added.]

162 These are findings of fact for which there was ample evidence.

163 No reason has been shown, in my view, for any interference in these findings of fact either by the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal or by this Court.

2. The “Residual Category” of the Law on Abuse of Process

164 The jurisprudence is clear that a fair trial cannot always cure an earlier default that taints the integrity of the justice system. In R. v. O’Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, it was said at para. 73 that there is a residual category of conduct caught by s. 7 of the Charter. This residual category does not relate to conduct affecting the fairness of the trial or impairing other procedural rights enumerated in the Charter, but instead addresses the panoply of diverse and sometimes unforeseeable circumstances in which a prosecution is conducted in such a manner as to connote unfairness or vexatiousness of such a degree that it contravenes fundamental notions of justice and thus undermines the integrity of the judicial process.

165 The common law had developed a doctrine of abuse of process long before the Charter. In Canada it is sometimes traced to In re Sproule (1886), 1886 CanLII 51 (SCC), 12 S.C.R. 140. A rationale of the common law doctrine was adopted in R. v. Jewitt, 1985 CanLII 47 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 128, in terms that are pertinent here, at p. 136:

Lord Devlin has expressed the rationale supporting the existence of a judicial discretion to enter a stay of proceedings to control prosecutorial behaviour prejudicial to accused persons in Connelly v. Director of Public Prosecutions, [1964] A.C. 1254 (H.L.) at p. 1354:

Are the courts to rely on the Executive to protect their process from abuse? Have they not themselves an inescapable duty to secure fair treatment for those who come or who are brought before them? To questions of this sort there is only one possible answer. The courts cannot contemplate for a moment the transference to the Executive of the responsibility for seeing that the process of law is not abused.

E. Prosecutorial Discretion

166 The trial judge in this case was careful not to understate or diminish the broad scope traditionally and properly afforded to prosecutorial discretion. Courts are very slow to second-guess the exercise of that discretion and do so only in narrow circumstances. In R. v. Beare, 1988 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 387, for example, the Court noted that a system which did not confer a broad discretion on law enforcement and prosecutorial authorities would be unworkable, per La Forest J., at p. 410:

Discretion is an essential feature of the criminal justice system. A system that attempted to eliminate discretion would be unworkably complex and rigid. Police necessarily exercise discretion in deciding when to lay charges, to arrest and to conduct incidental searches, as prosecutors do in deciding whether or not to withdraw a charge, enter a stay, consent to an adjournment, proceed by way of indictment or summary conviction, launch an appeal and so on.

See also: R. v. Power, 1994 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 601; Smythe v. The Queen, 1971 CanLII 831 (SCC), [1971] S.C.R. 680, at p. 686; R. v. T. (V.), 1992 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 749; and R. v. Lyons, 1987 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 309, at p. 348.

167 Still, the corollary to these extensive discretionary powers is that they must be exercised with objectivity and dispassion. This principle has found its way into the Canadian Bar Association's Code of Professional Conduct (1988); see chapter IX, "The Lawyer as Advocate", s. 9 (Duties of Prosecutor):

The prosecutor exercises a public function involving much discretion and power and must act fairly and dispassionately.

168 Because the exercise of prosecutorial discretion is, within broad limits, effectively non-reviewable by the courts, it is all the more imperative that the discretion be exercised in a fair and objective way. Where objectivity is shown to be lacking, corrective action may be necessary (as here) to protect what O'Connor referred to as “the integrity” of the criminal justice system.

169 Wilson J., in R. v. Keyowski, 1988 CanLII 74 \(SCC\), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 657, developed the notion that abuse of process in this regard does not require a demonstration of prosecutorial bad faith. She wrote that courts should look at all relevant factors. “To define ‘oppressive’ as requiring misconduct or an improper motive would, in my view, unduly restrict the operation of the doctrine. . . . Prosecutorial misconduct and improper motivation are but two of many factors to be taken into account . . .” (p. 659).

170 In the present case, the overriding concern was the failure of the proper and usual institutional checks and balances.

171 The fact that O'Connor brought together the two streams of jurisprudence relating to abuse of power – the common law with its emphasis on the integrity of the criminal justice system and the Charter with its emphasis on individual rights – did not diminish judicial preoccupation with the integrity of the process. It was fairly observed in Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Tobiass, 1997 CanLII 322 \(SCC\), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 391, that cases of abuse of process that do not involve fair trial rights or other individual rights and freedoms can be expected to be few in number. This is because despite the fact that errors are made, the institutional integrity of our system of justice is rarely called into question successfully.

172 In my view, the Crown did not demonstrate that in finding an abuse of process in this case the trial judge either misdirected himself or that “his decision is so clearly wrong as to amount to an injustice” (Elsom, supra, at p. 1375).

173 I agree with Freeman J.A. in dissent when he said, at para. 5, that:

The prominence of the accused and the high level of media interest in the case called for a disciplined and dispassionate approach by the Crown to ensure a perception that Mr. Regan was treated as even-handedly as any citizen has a right to expect. Instead the trial judge identified a number of lapses of judgment indicative of over-zealousness by the police and the Crown, three of which figured in his decision to stay what were considered to be lesser charges to preserve the reputation of the administration of justice.

174 As Freeman J.A. points out, the specific lapses were considered “indicative” (not exhaustive) of over-zealousness.

F. Addressing the Symptoms

175 Much of the reasons for judgment of the majority in the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal is devoted to pointing out what the trial judge did not find, or alleged inconsistencies in what he did find. In my view, with respect, the reasons of the trial judge read as a whole by a mind willing to understand are consistent and coherent. As stated, I disagree with the effort to divide his reasons into airtight compartments and then isolate and attack the compartments one by one. Nevertheless, I proceed with a consideration of the symptoms listed by the trial judge and addressed by the Court of Appeal in the order in which they arose in the earlier judgments.

1. Police Misconduct

176 The trial judge rejected almost all of the appellant's allegations of misconduct against the police, including the allegedly "premature" formation of a task force to investigate rumours and journalistic speculation about the appellant's behaviour, allegedly questionable investigative techniques, missing evidence and arrest procedures. He was nevertheless "troubled" by the "serious error in judgment" (para. 87) by the police in confirming that the appellant was under investigation before any of the complainants had been interviewed let alone charges laid. This was contrary to the express direction of the provincial Solicitor General's Department dated February 6, 1990:

3. No police official shall disclose the fact of a police investigation, other than on a need-to-know basis within the Police Department, so as to maintain confidentiality and secrecy respecting the identity of a person who is the subject of an investigation.

The disclosure was not a slip. The trial judge found that the police officer checked with his superior officer before making the disclosure and issued the disclosure in the form of a press release. The effect, as pointed out by Freeman J.A., was that "[t]he story made national headlines some 17 months before charges were laid" (para. 24).

177 The majority judgment of the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal considered this event to be largely irrelevant to the issues under appeal because it relates to the police, not the prosecutors. I disagree. What this incident should have indicated to the Crown Attorney's office was that the police perceived themselves to be under a great deal of public pressure and that a "hard objective second look" at any charges ultimately laid would be of the highest importance to the fair and even-handed administration of justice. It is in such situations that the system of checks and balances is most severely tested.

2. Conduct of the Crown Prosecutors

178 There were three aspects, in particular, of the conduct of the prosecutors that indicated to the trial judge that the system of checks and balances did not operate in this case.

(a) Judge Shopping

179 The first aspect was the apparent willingness of the Senior Crown Attorney on the case, Ms. Susan Potts, to manipulate the court system to advantage the prosecution. This emerged in the RCMP minute of a meeting on July 15, 1994 between the Crown Attorney and RCMP investigators where she advocated judge shopping, i.e., using the Crown's scheduling privilege to get the case before a judge of its own choosing, a practice which undermines both the reality and the appearance of the impartial administration of justice. The RCMP minute reads:

There was some discussion in regards to where charges are laid and an appearance by Regan in court. [Crown counsel] Potts said that Judge Randall is sitting in Sept and it is not advisable to bring the matter before him – political appointment (Liberals). Oct may be the appropriate month. Potts is to keep monitoring the court docket to see who is sitting when and what would be in our best interest. [Emphasis added.]

180 The trial judge considered the note important because of what it revealed, namely that the Senior Crown Attorney with day-to-day responsibilities for the case had identified herself with the police point of view, and was “attempting to secure a conviction at all costs”. The trial judge wrote (at para. 101):

This entry represents a blatant attempt at judge shopping, pure and simple. It is offensive and most troubling. The reference to avoiding a particular judge is one distressing thing, the flagrant attempt at “monitoring the court docket to see who is sitting when and what would be in our best interest” [emphasis added by MacDonald A.C.J.] is even more disturbing. This gives the appearance of a Crown Attorney who is attempting to secure a conviction at all costs. [Emphasis added.]

181 The Nova Scotia Court of Appeal pointed out that eventually Ms. Potts left the case in 1996. This is true, but the trial judge was concerned about the absence of an objective view at the time the charges were laid, at which point (for example, the critical meeting with the RCMP on January 17, 1995) Ms. Potts was very much the heart and sinews of the prosecution team. The Crown says that the “judge shopping” comment was neither repeated nor acted on. We do not know this. The appellant attempted to subpoena Ms. Potts to testify at the abuse of process hearing but it seems that her appearance was successfully blocked by Crown objections.

(b) Joining Forces with the Police

182 A few years before the investigation in this case, the prosecutorial branch in Nova Scotia was severely shaken by the findings of the Royal Commission on the Donald Marshall, Jr., Prosecution, vol. 1, Findings and Recommendations (1989) (the “Marshall Report”). In the course of inquiring into the wrongful conviction of Mr. Marshall, the Royal Commission found instances of political interference in charging decisions and differential treatment as between prominent citizens and the disadvantaged. The Marshall Report therefore recommended that the problems historically experienced in Nova Scotia be addressed by maintaining a “distinct line” between the police and the Crown law office (at p. 232):

We recognize that cooperative and effective consultation between the police and the Crown is also essential to the proper administration of justice. But under our system, the policing function – that of investigation and law enforcement – is distinct from the prosecuting function. We believe the maintenance of a distinct line between these two functions is essential to the proper administration of justice. [Emphasis added.]

183 The accepted practice in Nova Scotia in the 1994-95 time period (i.e., the “local custom”) was set out in a report submitted to the Minister of Justice for Nova Scotia concerning the status of the Public Prosecution Service in 1994, in which Professors Ghiz and Archibald of Dalhousie Law School stated as follows:

In some Canadian jurisdictions, and in Nova Scotia prior to the Marshall Inquiry, prosecutors claimed the authority to direct the police in their general investigative duties (as well prior to as after the laying of charges), and sometimes purported to have the authority to order the police not to lay charges in specific cases. Pursuant to recommendations 36 and 37 of the Marshall Inquiry, as adopted by the Attorney General and the then Solicitor General, there is now a clearer understanding of the importance of separating the policing and prosecution functions. Fundamentally, one might say the police have the right to investigate and lay charges unimpeded by Crown Prosecutors, while Prosecutors have the right to stop charges once laid. However, there is often a need for both pre-charge and post-charge consultation since the normal scenario is a cooperative rather than antagonistic relationship between Crowns and police, both of whom share common goals in the administration of criminal justice. The nature of this advice sought by police and given by Crowns is usually limited as to the appropriateness of a specific charge under the Criminal Code or the interpretation of a Criminal Code section, but the advice may also extend to whether or not certain evidence that has been gathered would be sufficient to sustain a case in court. [Emphasis in original.]

(J. A. Ghiz and B. P. Archibald, Independence, Accountability and Management in the Nova Scotia Public Prosecution Service: A Review and Evaluation (1994), at pp. 41-42)

184 In my view, the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal did not meet the trial judge's point when it attempted to show that pre-charge involvement of Crown Attorneys with the police varies somewhat from province to province and cannot be regarded as in all circumstances and for all purposes objectionable. I agree that the test is a principled test (i.e., have objectivity and independence been maintained?) rather than mechanical (e.g., did the interview take place pre-charge or post-charge?), and that in principle the charging decision does not represent a "bright line" prior to which the involvement of a Crown Attorney is presumptively suspect.

185 Moreover, I agree with my colleague LeBel J., at para. 83, that:

. . . pre-charge Crown interviews may advance the interests of justice (see below), and because the pre- versus post-charge distinction may distract attention away from the necessary vigilance to maintain objectivity throughout the proceedings. [Emphasis in original.]

186 The trial judge's concern was a principled concern. He deplored what he found to be the absence of independence and objectivity on the part of Ms. Potts and her colleagues in the Crown office working on this case. Those who engaged in the pre-charge interviews had acquired, for whatever reason, tunnel vision under the pressures of a high profile investigation of a politically prominent individual.

187 The trial judge was not opposed to the pre-charge involvement of the Crown. He had no trouble, for example, with the pre-charge involvement of Mr. Pearson, the Director of Public Prosecutions. He stated his concern more narrowly (at para. 121):

The crucial issue before me is a more narrow one. It involves firstly, the Crown's determination to interview complainants pre-charge and secondly, the impact of that process on the number and types of charges that were ultimately laid. [Emphasis added.]

188 Some of the trial judge's observations on the dangers of interviewing complainants pre-charge may have gone beyond the "narrow" issue he had identified for himself. I do not, for example, think he should be taken to say that pre-charge interviews necessarily give rise to a loss of objectivity. Not only did he endorse pre-charge interviews for certain limited purposes but he was dealing with a loss of objectivity that pre-dated even the initial Crown interviews. Ms. Potts made the judge-shopping comment on July 15, 1994, but she did not begin her interviews of the complainants until over four months later, on November 17, 1994.

189 Taking his reasons as a whole, the trial judge appeared to accept (as I do) the correctness of the evidence of Dr. Philip Stenning, which the trial judge summarized as follows (at paras. 115-16):

Dr. Philip Stenning was arguably the Crown's most qualified expert. He has dedicated his entire academic career to studying the role of the Crown and has published extensively on this topic. Like Mr. Gover, he feels it would be an oversimplification to decree that a prosecutor should never interview pre-charge. Everything must be placed in context he feels, and local customs must be acknowledged and respected. Despite what might be stated in the Martin and Marshall Reports, he feels there is still room for the Crown to interview pre-charge in appropriate circumstances.

. . . [He] does concede that such occasions would be rare.

190 The specific problems here, therefore, were breach of what Dr. Stenning termed a “local custom” of maintaining a distinct division of responsibilities that was perhaps more emphasized in Nova Scotia than elsewhere due to well-publicized problems with the Crown Attorney’s office over the preceding ten years or so, and the problematic motive for the breach. As to the former, the trial judge’s concern was not with cross-Canada variations but whether or not the Crown Attorneys in Nova Scotia observed the local rules that had been put in place following the Marshall Report. Their willingness to ignore the “distinct line” between their role and that of the police, accepted by Nova Scotia following the Marshall Report, showed a zeal for the laying of more charges that “homogenized” what were supposed to be distinct and separate functions. Instead of the police laying charges and the Crown providing a “hard objective second look”, the Crown had subordinated itself and become a supporting actor in the initial charging decision, which the trial judge described as a “joint . . . decision”. As to motive, the trial judge recognized several legitimate reasons to interview a complainant pre-charge, for example, to prevent an accused “from going through the embarrassment (humiliation) of being charged only to later have the charges dropped or stayed” (para. 117), rapport building to encourage informed willingness to participate, or assessing victim credibility. He said (at para. 118):

The Crown in the case at bar has given its reasons for interviewing precharge. They include “rapport building” and assessing victim credibility. Yet, despite these stated intentions, it is clear according to one R.C.M.P. file reviewer that the purpose for at least some of these pre-charge Crown interviews was to have reluctant complainants change their minds and come forward. [Emphasis added.]

191 The purpose here, apparently, was not to “build rapport” with complainants who were worried about the court process, which would be a perfectly acceptable reason for a pre-charge interview. The trial judge saw the Crown involvement in “changing their minds” as simply another aspect of the Crown’s joining the police team rather than exercising a “level of independent review”. In this respect, he quoted (at para. 118) a contemporaneous RCMP internal note dated January 17, 1995, which recorded:

It is now the investigators and the Crown’s belief that if these persons could be re-interviewed with both the Crown Prosecutor and police investigator present there would be a greater chance of them changing their minds. [Emphasis added.]

This was to further the police strategy of a “broadly based prosecution”, as it was described by counsel for the Crown in this Court. In my view, the trial judge was correct in his criticism. If the charges were examined and approved one by one, the Crown might wind up with a “broadly based prosecution”, but the Crown ought not to start out with the objective of a broadly based prosecution and then afterwards look to approve individual charges to make it happen. This is what the trial judge criticized (at para. 123):

The Crown’s role in response is to objectively assess the case globally. As ministers of justice they are to dispassionately protect the process which includes protecting the rights of the applicant. In this case the Crown did not review the investigators’ charging decision. They became part of it. They interviewed all potential complainants. Their involvement became subjective by nature. Like the police, it is understandable that they would have strong feelings. Not surprisingly and as Mr. Reid confirmed, they eventually came to see the case the same way the police saw it. That would be fine if their review was totally objective; as was Mr. Pearson's. It becomes problematic when what was to be a review becomes a joint endeavour and a joint decision. That I believe is what happened in the case at bar.

192 On this point, Freeman J.A., dissenting, made the following comment, with which I agree (at para. 67):

While expert opinions varied as to the rare circumstances in which pre-charge interviews may be engaged in by the Crown without imperiling Crown objectivity, there was agreement that Crown objectivity itself was an essential component of Canadian justice. If such a value exists then it must have a home within the system, and there must be remedies for lapses.

In my opinion, such a value exists and its home is in s. 7 of the Charter.

193 The Crown's effort to lay the responsibility for all this on the head of Ms. Susan Potts is unconvincing. As mentioned, when the defence attempted to subpoena Ms. Potts to testify about the extent and depth of alleged loss of objectivity among the prosecutors, the Crown resisted and she never had the opportunity to explain her conduct to the court. I do not say the Crown's objections to her testimony were either unfounded or unreasonable. I say only that the Crown cannot draw a self-serving conclusion from this unfortunate situation when the critical evidence went unheard because of the Crown's objection.

(c) Count 16

194 This count related to a 24-year-old news reporter who says that in 1976 she was forcibly fondled by the appellant in a hotel room while being pushed onto a bed. She was unwilling to become involved as a complainant. The police wanted count 16 before the court because it would enable them to lead “similar fact” evidence of a more significant incident in Alberta in 1990. The police apparently thought this 1990 incident would add credibility to their “broadly based prosecution” strategy by making the series of charges appear less stale and more up to date. This strategy was reflected in Staff Sergeant Fraser’s internal RCMP report of December 9, 1994:

The investigation surfaced many victims and charges to be laid should reflect the whole picture. The report, dated 94-06-28, from the Public Prosecution Service [the Pearson opinion] recommended that charges be laid in respect to four victims. This in effect shows that the subject was active in his early years however the investigation surfaced evidence to support the fact that the offenses continued throughout the period 1960-1990. For this reason, it was requested by C/Supt. FALKINGHAM that Crown review the evidence and consider laying charges in all instances so that the gravity of the subject’s actions be properly presented to give the full picture.

195 The obstacle to this “full picture” strategy is that the only complainant more recent than 1978 was the Alberta allegation that could not be prosecuted in Nova Scotia. The Crown therefore decided to prosecute count 16 as a gateway to introduce the Alberta evidence, thereby extending by 12 years “the full picture”.

196 The majority judgment of the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal considered count 16 to be valid in its own right, and the trial judge’s condemnation of the police strategy to be misconceived. Cromwell J.A. writes, at para. 140:

There is nothing inherently objectionable in the Crown considering questions of the admissibility of evidence and their impact on the prospects of conviction when deciding to proceed with charges.

I agree, but that is not the point taken by the trial judge. His concern with count 16, as was his concern with the judge-shopping comment and the pre-charge interviews, was the Crown's apparent inability or unwillingness to assert its independence from the police strategies. On count 16 the trial judge said (at para. 158):

Yet the Crown's goal as I see it was to have the jury hear and (presumably act upon) the complaint of A.R.S., a similar fact witness. Similar fact evidence is only admissible if relevant to proving the listed charge. You cannot lay a charge in order to get similar fact evidence in. Such a concept would be totally contrary to the very essence of this exclusionary rule.

197 In my view, the trial judge's concern was quite appropriate. Similar fact evidence is generally inadmissible but will be permitted where its probative value exceeds its prejudicial effect: R. v. Sweitzer, 1982 CanLII 23 \(SCC\), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 949, at p. 952, and R. v. B. (C.R.), 1990 CanLII 142 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 717, at p. 735. The trial judge concluded that count 16 was to be used as a vehicle to get otherwise inadmissible evidence before the jury to extend and perhaps distort "the full picture". Whether or not a conviction was entered on count 16 was, according to the trial judge's finding of fact, of secondary importance to the police and the Crown. This was a reversal of the natural and proper order of considerations, and showed to his satisfaction that over-zealousness by the Crown was still operating more than a year after Ms. Potts left the case.

(d) Preferring the Direct Indictment

198 The majority decision of the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal concluded that even if proper procedures were not followed in the laying of the charges in 1995 (and the subsequently added charges), the omission was cured by the preferral of the direct indictment on April 10, 1997. In this respect, Cromwell J.A. in a number of passages interprets the trial judge’s decision as saying the “discretion to prefer a direct indictment, some two years after the initial charges were laid, was properly exercised” (para. 105 (emphasis added); see also paras. 143 and 173). The “cleansing effect” of the direct indictment is endorsed by my colleague LeBel J. at para. 109.

199 I think the so-called “cleansing effect” of a direct indictment is overstated. While s. 577(c) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, requires “the personal consent in writing of the Attorney General or Deputy Attorney General”, the purpose of this provision is to engage the responsibility of senior officials, not necessarily to compel their sustained and undivided attention to the nuts and bolts of a prosecution. Under our notions of ministerial responsibility, much is done on the basis of the signature of a Minister or Deputy Minister that he or she could not possibly have reviewed in any detail. They rely (and it is expected that they rely) on advice from their officials. In this case, the officials were the very people whose conduct the appellant complains about.

200 The extracts of the record before us, which are restricted to factual matters relevant to the legal issues, exceed 1200 pages in length. I do not say that the Attorney General or his Deputy did not master the file, but I would require more evidence than we have been given before accepting as realistic the conclusion that they did so to the point of “cleansing” the failures in the system of checks and balances that had occurred earlier. This is particularly so when the real explanation for the direct indictment is perfectly clear. The direct indictment was recommended to the Attorney General because the preliminary hearing had run the better part of a year and showed no signs of an early conclusion.

201 In any event, I view the trial judge's finding on this point somewhat differently than did the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal majority. What the trial judge said, in fact (at para. 131), is that he was not convinced that the Crown acted mala fides in its decision. The preliminary inquiry was very lengthy. If the Crown was so ill-motivated, it could have preferred the direct indictment at the outset or at least sooner than it did.

202 A finding of mala fides or bad faith is not, of course, a condition precedent to finding an abuse of process: Keyowski, supra, at p. 659. The trial judge found that the Crown had not acted in bad faith to shut down a preliminary inquiry that had already run from April 9, 1996 to February 25, 1997. His comment about mala fides did not address and was not intended to address the appellant's much broader complaint of a failure by the Crown, for whatever reason, to review in an objective and even-handed way the appropriateness of the "minor" charges that Mr. Pearson had earlier rejected, and charges in the same category laid subsequently, in light of all the factors touching on the public interest. As to the direct indictment issue, I agree with Freeman J.A. in dissent (at para. 15):

Whether the decision was fixable at that stage [i.e., of the direct indictment] is not the issue. Justice MacDonald did not find it had been fixed.

203 In light of the trial judge's conclusion that the charging process was fundamentally flawed, and the fact that he eventually entered a stay against nine of the lesser charges, it is apparent that while he did not regard the direct indictment that cut short the preliminary inquiry as tainted with mala fides on that account, he nevertheless concluded that in limited respects it was inappropriate. He specifically so found in relation to count 16, which was not laid until the direct indictment, i.e., long after Ms. Potts had left the prosecution team.

204 The direct indictment in this case was not a cleanser. At best it was a missed opportunity.

205 I would not want to leave this branch of the case without repeating the apposite observations of McLachlin J. (as she then was) and Major J. in Curragh, supra. Although written in dissent, they are sentiments with which no member of the Court would disagree (at para. 120):

[I]t is especially where pursuit of truth is righteous that we must guard against overreaching on the part of those charged with the authority to investigate and prosecute crimes. We cannot be tolerant of abusive conduct and dispose of due process, however serious the crimes charged. High profile trials, by their nature, attract strong public emotions. In our society the Crown is charged with the duty to ensure that every accused person is treated with fairness. . . . When the Crown allows its actions to be influenced by public pressure the essential fairness and legitimacy of our system is lost. We sink to the level of a mob looking for a tree.

206 I would uphold in this case the trial judge's conclusion that the nine charges that he stayed represented, in all the circumstances, an abuse of process.

II. Stay of Proceedings

207 Demonstration of an abuse of process does not, of course, lead to an automatic stay of proceedings.

208 This is particularly true where, as here, the trial judge concluded that notwithstanding the passage of time and the difficulty of getting to the bottom of momentary events that happened 24 to 34 years ago, the appellant's fair trial interests have not been prejudiced by the conduct found to amount to an abuse of process.

209 The inherent power of a superior court to stay proceedings that are an abuse of power was recognized in Canada in the nineteenth century, called into question in R. v. Osborn, 1970 CanLII 22 \(SCC\), [1971] S.C.R. 184, and Rourke v. The Queen, 1977 CanLII 191 \(SCC\), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 1021, but affirmed again with Jewitt, supra. In Rourke, Pigeon J., for the majority, concluded, consistent with earlier statements in Osborn, that "I cannot admit of any general discretionary power in courts of criminal jurisdiction to stay proceedings regularly instituted because the prosecution is considered oppressive" (p. 1043), while also stating that "[i]f there is the power", it "should only be exercised in the most exceptional circumstances" (p. 1044).

210 The controversy over whether the discretion to stay for abuse of process was an option that had been completely foreclosed in Canada remained in doubt until Jewitt, supra, where Dickson C.J., for a unanimous Court, affirmed the availability of a stay of proceedings to remedy an abuse of process and Osborn and Rourke were read narrowly. This Court affirmed the existence of the residual discretion of a trial judge to stay proceedings where "compelling an accused to stand trial would violate those fundamental principles of justice which underlie the community's sense of fair play and decency and to prevent the abuse of a court's process through oppressive or vexatious proceedings" (pp. 136-37). Further, he added, the power can be exercised only in the "clearest of cases".

211 In Jewitt, Dickson C.J. alluded briefly to the concern about the defendant receiving a procedural windfall of sorts. "The stay of proceedings for abuse of process is given as a substitute for an acquittal because, while on the merits the accused may not deserve an acquittal, the Crown by its abuse of process is disentitled to a conviction" (p. 148). That concern was more fully developed, along with an elaboration of the abuse of process doctrine, in R. v. Conway, 1989 CanLII 66 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659, at p. 1667, by L'Heureux-Dubé J. for the majority:

Under the doctrine of abuse of process, the unfair or oppressive treatment of an appellant disentitles the Crown to carry on with the prosecution of the charge. The prosecution is set aside, not on the merits . . . , but because it is tainted to such a degree that to allow it to proceed would tarnish the integrity of the court. The doctrine is one of the safeguards designed to ensure "that the repression of crime through the conviction of the guilty is done in a way which reflects our fundamental values as a society". . . . It acknowledges that courts must have the respect and support of the community in order that the administration of criminal justice may properly fulfil its function. Consequently, where the affront to fair play and decency is disproportionate to the societal interest in the effective prosecution of criminal cases, then the administration of justice is best served by staying the proceedings. [Emphasis added.]

See also R. v. Scott, 1990 CanLII 27 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 979, per McLachlin J., at pp. 1007-8.

212 The residual category of cases where a stay of proceedings is available notwithstanding the fact the abuse of process found to exist does not affect the fairness of the trial (or impair the more specific procedural rights in the Charter) was further elaborated in O'Connor, supra, per L'Heureux-Dubé J., at para. 73:

This residual category does not relate to conduct affecting the fairness of the trial or impairing other procedural rights enumerated in the Charter, but instead addresses the panoply of diverse and sometimes unforeseeable circumstances in which a prosecution is conducted in such a manner as to connote unfairness or vexatiousness of such a degree that it contravenes fundamental notions of justice and thus undermines the integrity of the judicial process.

213 In Tobiass, supra, at para. 89, the Court characterizes the residual category as a “small one” and observes that fairness of the trial will occupy the “vast majority” of the cases. I do not treat that observation as deprecating the importance of the residual category. As previously suggested, it merely reflects the fact that on the whole our system of criminal justice functions justly. The cases where a stay of proceedings is required on this account are rare, not because of judicial fiat to limit their numbers but because the system works. The institutional checks and balances are observed.

214 Tobiass notes that a stay of proceedings is not intended to redress a past wrong but to prevent the perpetuation of a wrong that will continue to trouble the parties and community in the future. The mere fact of “shabby treatment” of an individual in the past does not satisfy the criterion (at para. 96):

A stay is not a form of punishment. It is not a kind of retribution against the state and it is not a general deterrent. If it is appropriate to use punitive language at all, then probably the best way to describe a stay is as a specific deterrent – a remedy aimed at preventing the perpetuation or aggravation of a particular abuse.

215 Accordingly, in a unanimous pronouncement on the subject, this Court in Tobiass laid down a two-part analysis for considering the grant of a stay of proceedings (at para. 90):

If it appears that the state has conducted a prosecution in a way that renders the proceedings unfair or is otherwise damaging to the integrity of the judicial system, two criteria must be satisfied before a stay will be appropriate. They are that:

- (1) the prejudice caused by the abuse in question will be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated through the conduct of the trial, or by its outcome; and
- (2) no other remedy is reasonably capable of removing that prejudice.

To which a potential third step was added at para. 92:

After considering these two requirements, the court may still find it necessary to consider a third factor. As L’Heureux-Dubé J. has written, “where the affront to fair play and decency is disproportionate to the societal interest in the effective prosecution of criminal cases, then the administration of justice is best served by staying the proceedings”. . . . We take this statement to mean that there may be instances in which it will be appropriate to balance the interests that would be served by the granting of a stay of proceedings against the interest that society has in having a final decision on the merits.

216 In my view, with respect, the criteria laid down in these cases, and recited by the trial judge in his reasons for judgment, are amply fulfilled by the findings of fact in this case.

217 The absence of the proper checks and balances between police and prosecutor in this case led to an increase in the number of charges laid against the appellant. The trial judge's reasons can be read in no other way. Cromwell J.A. noted, at paras. 168-69, that the trial judge's reasons are consistent with a conclusion that the respondent may have been facing more charges than he would have been had Crown objectivity been retained at "the charging stage". In other words, had objectivity been retained, some of the charges laid by the police might have been stayed by the Crown. If this is correct, the loss of objectivity found by the judge could be taken to have ongoing effects in the sense that it may have put the prosecution on a fundamentally different path than it would otherwise have followed. The judge sought to remedy the loss of objectivity by staying counts which he thought Mr. Pearson would not have proceeded with had he remained in office.

In my respectful view, this analysis overlooks the proper preferring of the direct indictment.

218 I have already discussed my disagreement with Cromwell J.A.'s interpretation of the trial judge's treatment of the direct indictment.

219 It is clear to me, applying the first stage of the Tobiass test, that the trial judge concluded that the Crown's loss of objectivity and improper motive will be "manifested, perpetuated or aggravated" through the continued prosecution of the charges to which these abuses of process gave rise (Tobiass, at para. 90). If the trial itself would not have occurred but for the abusive conduct, then the trial itself necessarily perpetuates the abuse.

220 Secondly, the only way to halt this continued prejudice to the appellant is by bringing a halt to the charges going forward to trial, i.e., a stay of proceedings.

221 The trial judge’s analysis of these first two elements in the Tobiass analysis draws support, I think, from the scholarly article that initially formulated these elements of the test (see O’Connor, supra, at para. 75):

Where the abuse has caused no prejudice to the fairness of the trial itself, a stay will be appropriate where:

the abuse is in the very fact that a charge was laid, and the abuse in question or the prejudice it has caused is so significant relative to the seriousness of the offence that it is more important to the interests of justice that the court redress the abuse, than try the offence on its merits [Emphasis added.]

(D. M. Paciocco, “The Stay of Proceedings as a Remedy in Criminal Cases: Abusing the Abuse of Process Concept” (1991), 15 Crim. L.J. 315, at p. 350)

222 In this case, “the seriousness” of the offences was characterized as relatively “minor” and the importance which may be attached to their prosecution therefore does not outweigh the prejudice in this case to the integrity of the administration of justice.

223 The majority opinion in the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal largely rested on the view that the trial judge had failed to consider whether the continuation of the prosecution would “manifest, perpetuate or aggravate the prejudice” (para. 101). The trial judge cited that specific aspect of the test at para. 56 of his reasons and in my opinion he applied it and, given his findings of fact, he came to the right conclusion.

224 The Tobiass case, I note parenthetically, was decided on very different facts. Neither the original charges nor the conduct of the prosecutors assigned to the case were criticized. A meeting took place between the Chief Justice of the Federal Court and a senior member of the Justice Department (neither of whom had any direct role in Tobiass or its companion cases). At the meeting, Tobiass and its companion cases, amongst other cases of alleged war crimes, were referred to in terms of alleged scheduling delays. Defence counsel were not made aware of the meeting until after it had occurred. This Court found a serious breach of fairness had occurred, but the prejudice could be eliminated by ensuring that the participants in the meeting at issue had no further participation whatsoever in the case. No such limited remedy is possible in this case. So long as the charges stand, the prejudice will persist.

225 Finally, at the third stage of the Tobiass test, the court is to consider (if it still has any uncertainty) the balance between any harm to the justice system that would result from taking the charges to trial as against the public interest in having these charges disposed of on their merits. As mentioned, the balancing process was described by L'Heureux-Dubé J. in Conway, supra, at p. 1667:

. . . where the affront to fair play and decency is disproportionate to the societal interest in the effective prosecution of criminal cases, then the administration of justice is best served by staying the proceedings.

226 This was expressly noted by the trial judge in this case, who said: “This balancing act, so common to almost everything we do as judges, will play a significant role in my analysis in the case at bar” (para. 58).

227 The key to the trial judge’s “balance” was his view that despite the existence of allegations which, if believed, would constitute the offences charged, the group of charges stayed were less serious than those he allowed to proceed, and had never been objectively reviewed in light of what the Martin Report described as factors “that may not necessarily have to be considered by even the most conscientious and responsible police officer” (p. 118).

228 Society, like the Crown Attorney, has no specific interest in “winning or losing” but it does have an interest in placing the relevant facts before a court for determination on their merits. This factor militates against a stay, but in this case it is a factor that is overwhelmed by competing considerations.

229 The trial judge was clearly of the same view as the former Director of Public Prosecutions, Mr. John Pearson, who said that while on the one hand “acts contemplated by the indecent assault section of the Criminal Code of the day were present in these cases”, nevertheless, on the other side of the ledger, “consideration of the following public interest factors tips the scale in favour of not proceeding” (emphasis added) with the “minor” charges. For ease of reference, I repeat Mr. Pearson’s public interest factors which the trial judge adopted:

- i) the allegations are minor in nature, especially when placed in the context of societal values at the time (this fact is best illustrated in the [C.E.R.] incident where her father, upon learning of the facts, demanded an apology from the accused);
- ii) the “staleness” of the offences when compared with their gravity;
- iii) the prosecution of these charges may be seen as “persecution” in light of the facts, the staleness of the offences and the relatively insignificant sentence, which could be anticipated if convictions were entered;
- iv) other alternatives are available to sanction this behaviour, i.e. the prosecution of the more serious charges; and
- v) the maintenance of public confidence in the administration of justice can be sustained without these four charges proceeding. [Emphasis added.]

The Pearson report was clearly not binding on the Crown or upon Mr. Pearson's successors, and the trial judge never suggested that it was. What he did suggest is that the factors put in the balance by Mr. Pearson were logical and pertinent. It was open to the trial judge to adopt the Pearson criteria as his own, and he did so. As I read his judgment, he concluded, that in light of his decision to send the appellant to trial on the nine more serious charges (eight of which, as stated, have now resulted in the appellant's acquittal), the prosecution of additional charges of a relatively minor nature that allegedly took place 24 to 34 years ago, and which if successful would carry a "relatively insignificant sentence", did not outweigh the public interest in vindicating the importance of the role played by objective and independent Crown prosecutors.

The trial judge thought that in this way an appropriate balance had been struck between the public interest in having all charges dealt with on their merits against the public interest in having all charges stayed to show the court's determination to ensure the continued vigour of checks and balances in the criminal justice system. Whether or not this Court would draw the line precisely where the trial judge drew it is beside the point. After hearing evidence and argument for 18 days, he properly instructed himself on the law, carefully reviewed the facts, and made no palpable or overriding error in the inferences and conclusions that he reached.

III. Conclusion

I would therefore allow the appeal.

In the Matter of a Reference to the Court of Appeal pursuant to The Constitutional Questions Act, R.S.O. 1970, Chapter 79, by Order in Council No. 2089/79, respecting The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO.

Constitutional law—Courts—Landlords and tenants—Provincial commission empowered to evict tenants and to enforce obligations of landlords and tenants—Whether or not grant of powers to Commission ultra vires—The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, 1979 (Ont.), c. 78—British North America Act, R.S.C 1970, s. 96.

The Ontario Legislature enacted The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, to come into effect on proclamation. The Act contained a legislative code to govern landlords and tenants and established the Residential Tenancy Commission to oversee and enforce the newly enunciated rights and obligations. The Executive Council, responding to questions concerning the authority of the Legislature to make orders evicting tenants from residential premises and to require landlords and tenants to comply with obligations imposed under the Act, referred two questions dealing with those issues to the Ontario Court of Appeal. That Court concluded that it was not within the legislative authority of Ontario to make eviction orders and compliance orders as provided in The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979. This Court was only concerned with the constitutional validity of two powers, the subject matter of the reference, and not with the soundness of the overall legislative scheme.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Royal Commission Reports and Reports of Parliamentary Committees made prior to the passing of a statute were admissible to show the factual context and purpose of the legislation. The practice adopted in the Anti-Inflation Reference of giving timely directions establishing the extraneous materials to be admitted should be followed. Material relevant to the issues before the Court and not inherently unreliable or offending against public policy should be admissible, subject to the proviso that such extrinsic materials are not available for the purpose of aiding in statutory construction.

Section 96 of the British North America Act limited provincial competence to make appointments to a tribunal exercising s. 96 judicial powers and implicitly limited provincial competence to endow a provincial tribunal with such powers. That section, however, could no longer be construed as a bar to a province seeking to vest an administrative tribunal with ancillary “judicial” powers formerly exercised by s. 96 courts, subject to the qualification that the judicial function not be isolated from the rest of the administrative structure of the legislation.

The test was to be formulated in three steps. The first involved consideration, in light of the historical conditions existing in 1867, of the particular power or jurisdiction conferred upon the tribunal. The matter ended there if the power was not broadly conformable to the jurisdiction formerly exercised by s. 96 courts. If, however, the power were identical or analogous to a power exercised by a s. 96 court at Confederation it became necessary to proceed to step two. The second step involved consideration of the function within its institutional setting to determine whether the function was still “judicial”. The subject matter rather than the apparatus of adjudication was determinative and only if the power could still be characterized as judicial was it necessary to proceed to the third step—a review of the tribunal’s function as a whole in order to appraise the impugned function in its entire institutional context. A provincial scheme was only invalid where the adjudicative function was a sole or central function of the tribunal so that it could be said to be operating like a s. 96 court.

Applying step one the Court found that the powers conferred on the Commission were in broad conformity with those historically exercised by the s. 96 courts before and after Confederation. The argument that the power to order eviction had been conferred before Confederation on County Court judges as persona designata, and that that power and by analogy the power to make orders of compliance were therefore outside the superior or county court structure, went too far. The jurisdiction over overholding tenants in pre-Confederation legislation was merely a modification of the traditional jurisdiction on ejection exercised by the superior courts. The County Court judges acting under the over-holding tenants provisions were acting qua judge rather than as persona designata. The submission that the Commission’s jurisdiction was analogous to that exercis-able by courts of summary jurisdiction rather than by s. 96 courts was misconceived. Provinces could not avoid the limitations of s. 96 by taking a function of a s. 96 court, simplifying procedural matters, and then transferring the jurisdiction to a non s. 96 tribunal.

Proceeding to step two the Court found that the impugned power to order eviction or compliance, viewed in its institutional setting, remained essentially a “judicial power” exercised in all cases in the context of a lis between parties. The Commission in deciding contractual and property rights as between individual landlords and tenants also determined rights other than those relating to land and property. Each case involved analysis of law, an application of law to the facts, and a judicial decision and subsequent order.

The third step examined the inter-relationship between the impugned “judicial” powers and other powers under the Act. The central function of the Commission was the resolution of disputes, in the final form by a judicial form of hearing between landlords and tenants. The Commission’s other functions were either ancillary to this central function, or were separate and distinct from it and bore no relation to it. There was no broad legislative scheme to subsume the Commission’s judicial functions. The whole of s. 96 court’s jurisdiction in a certain area, however limited, was transferred to provincially appointed officials.

DICKSON J.—The resolution of disputes between landlords and tenants has long been a central preoccupation of the common law courts. As early as 1587, Lord Coke observed that the law of landlord and tenant was vital since, “for the most part, every man is a lessor or a lessee”. (Walker’s Case^[2] at p. 680.)

Within the past few years the Province of Ontario, in common with a number of other provinces, has enacted legislation to redress what was perceived to be an imbalance, in favour of landlords, in the landlord and tenant relationship. On June 21, 1979, the Legislative Assembly of Ontario enacted The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, 1979 (Ont.), c. 78, to come into effect on proclamation. The Act contains a detailed legislative code to govern landlords and tenants and establishes a tribunal, bearing the name the Residential Tenancy Commission, to oversee and enforce the newly enunciated rights and obligations. Questions having been raised as to the authority of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario to empower the Commission to make orders evicting tenants from residential premises and to require landlords and tenants to comply with obligations imposed under the Act, the Executive Council of the Province, pursuant to s. 1 of The Constitution- al Questions Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 79, referred the following questions to the Court of Appeal of Ontario for hearing and consideration:

1. Is it within the legislative authority of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario to empower the Residential Tenancy Commission to make an order evicting a tenant as provided in The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979?
2. Is it within the legislative authority of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario as provided in The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979 to empower the Residential Tenancy Commission to make orders requiring landlords and tenants to comply with obligations imposed under that Act?

The Court of Appeal delivered a careful and scholarly unanimous judgment in which each of these questions was answered in the negative. The court concluded it was not within the legislative authority of Ontario to empower the Residential Tenancy Commission to make eviction orders and compliance orders as provided in The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979. The importance of the issue is reflected in the fact that five judges of the court, including the Chief Justice and Associate Chief Justice, sat on the appeal.

The Attorney General of Ontario appealed to this Court as of right, under s. 37 of the Supreme Court Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. S-19, as amended. The Attorneys General of Quebec, Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta intervened to support the validity of the legislation. Mr. John J. Robinette, Q.C., was invited by the Court of Appeal of Ontario, when the matter came before that court, to argue against the validity of the provisions that were the subject of the reference. Mr. Robinette assisted this Court in like manner during argument of the present appeal.

The Attorney General of Canada intervened to oppose the legislation as did a number of property management associations. The legislation also came under attack from independent community-based legal service clinics and from the Federation of Metro Tenants Association. The Federation is an “umbrella” organization for Metropolitan Toronto, composed of nearly one hundred affiliated tenant associations and some individual tenant members who support and participate in the work of organizing tenants and lobbying in their interests. Owners and tenants alike made common cause in assailing the impugned provisions.

It should be noted that the Court is concerned in this appeal only with the constitutional validity of two powers, the subject matter of the reference, and not with the soundness of the overall legislative scheme or the wisdom of the Legislative Assembly in enacting it. The general subject matter of landlord and tenant rights and obligations is unquestionably within provincial legislative competence and no part of The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, other than those sections empowering the Commission to issue compliance orders and eviction orders, is in issue.

I

In advance of the hearing before the Ontario Court of Appeal, the Attorney General of Ontario filed with the court the 1968 report of the Ontario Law Reform Commission entitled “Interim Report on Landlord and Tenant Law Applicable to Residential Tenancies”; the 1972 report of the Commission on Part IV of The Landlord and Tenant Act; the 1976 report of the Commission entitled “Report on Landlord and Tenant Law”; and a Green Paper published in 1978 by the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations entitled “Policy Options for Continuing Tenant Protection”. In the Court of Appeal, a question was raised as to whether, and the extent to which, this material was properly before the court. Although there was some argument, it was not pressed to the point where the Court of Appeal felt called upon to rule on it. The court was content to receive the material for whatever assistance it might afford as “background”, and to leave its relevance and weight until the conclusion of the submissions advanced during the hearing. In the outcome the Court of Appeal was persuaded that little, if anything, turned on the reception of this material.

The same four documents were before us, and it seems appropriate at this time to rule whether properly so. There is little authority to guide decision.

Professors Whyte and Lederman correctly point out in chapter 4 of their work on Canadian Constitutional Law that a classification process is at the heart of judicial determination of the distribution or limitation of primary legislative powers. That process joins logic with social fact, value decisions and the authority of precedents. A court faces particular difficulty in a constitutional reference when only the bare bones of the statute arrive for consideration. The Chief Justice of this Court made this point in the “chicken and egg” reference, Attorney-General for Manitoba v. Manitoba Egg and Poultry Association^[3]. There is normally a dearth of relevant facts from which to draw logical inferences, determine social impact, make value decisions and select governing precedents. As Whyte and Lederman note, p. 229, “...the challenge of ultra vires raises a need for evidence of facts of social context and legislative effect...”

In my view a court may, in a proper case, require to be informed as to what the effect of the legislation will be. The object or purpose of the Act in question may also call for consideration though, generally speaking, speeches made in the Legislature at the time of enactment of the measure are inadmissible as having little evidential weight.

It now seems reasonably clear that Royal Commission Reports and the Reports of Parliamentary committees made prior to the passing of a statute are admissible to show the factual context and purpose of the legislation although Cartwright J., as he then was, said in Attorney General of Canada. v. Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Ltd.^[4], that the general rule is that if objected to they should be excluded. If the reports are relevant it is not entirely clear why they should be excluded upon objection of one of the parties.

In Home Oil Distributors, Limited v. Attorney-General of British Columbia^[5], Kerwin J., with the concurrence of Rinfret J., took into consideration a report of a Commission under the circumstances there existing, for showing what was in the mind of Parliament. The same course was adopted by the Privy Council in Attorney-General for British Columbia v. Attorney-General for Canada^[6] and in Ladore and Others v. Bennett and Others^[7]. In Reference re Eskimos^[8], in preliminary proceedings, this Court appointed the Registrar to hold hearings and take evidence as to whether Eskimos were "Indians" within the meaning of the B.N.A. Act. In Swait v. Board of Trustees of Maritime Transportation Unions^[9], the Quebec Court of Queen's Bench, Appeal Side, admitted the Norris Report on Disruption of Shipping in the Great Lakes for the purpose of establishing the facts upon which Parliament based the purpose and object of an Act passed essentially to put an end to a danger threatening the national interest.

Although admittedly a far different case from the present, in Reference re Anti-Inflation Act^[10], this Court admitted extrinsic evidence relating to the then prevailing level of inflation, including the White Paper tabled in the House by the Minister of Finance. I think it can be taken from the conduct of the the Anti-Inflation Reference and the use of extrinsic materials by the members of the Court in that case that the exclusionary rule expressed in obiter by Rinfret C.J. in Reference Re Validity of Wartime Leasehold Regulations^[11], can no longer be taken as a correct statement of the law. We should be loathe, it seems to me, to enunciate any inflexible rule governing the admissibility of extrinsic materials in constitutional references. The effect of such a rule might well be to exclude logically relevant and highly probative evidence. It is preferable, I think, to follow the practice adopted in the Anti-Inflation Reference and give timely directions establishing the evidence or extraneous materials to be admitted to serve the ends of the Court in the particular reference.

Generally speaking, for the purpose of constitutional characterization of an act we should not deny ourselves such assistance as Royal Commission reports or Law Reform Commission reports underlying and forming the basis of the legislation under study, may afford. The weight to be given such reports is, of course, an entirely different matter. They may carry great, little, or no weight, but at least they should, in my view, generally be admitted as an aid in determining the social and economic conditions under which the Act was enacted. See Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada and Others^[12] (Alberta Bank Taxation case). The mischief at which the act was directed, the background against which the legislation was enacted and institutional framework in which the act is to operate are all logically relevant. See Letang v. Cooper^[13], at p. 240 and Pillai v. Mudanayake and Others^[14], at p. 528.

A constitutional reference is not a barren exercise in statutory interpretation. What is involved is an attempt to determine and give effect to the broad objectives and purpose of the Constitution, viewed as a “living tree”, in the expressive words of Lord Sankey in Edwards and Others v. Attorney-General for Canada and Others^[15]. Material relevant to the issues before the court, and not inherently unreliable or offending against public policy should be admissible, subject to the proviso that such extrinsic materials are not available for the purpose of aiding in statutory construction. See Laidlaw v. The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto^[16] at p. 743 and generally, Strayer, Judicial Review of Legislation in Canada (1968), c. 6; Hogg, “Proof of Facts in Constitutional Cases” (1976), 26 U. of T.L.J. 386; Buglass, “The Use of

II

In 1964, the Legislature of Ontario enacted The Ontario Law Reform Commission Act, 1964 (Ont.), c. 78, R.S.O. 1970, c. 321, establishing the Ontario Law Reform Commission. The Commission was to inquire into and consider any matter relating to reform of the law having regard to the statute law, the common law and judicial decisions. On December 10, 1968, the Law Reform Commission submitted to the Attorney General of Ontario an Interim Report on Landlord and Tenant Law applicable to Residential Tenancies in which the Commission recommended substantial changes in matters of substantive law governing the relations of landlord and tenant relating to residential tenancies. Following thereon The Landlord and Tenant Act, 1968-69 (Ont.), c. 58, was enacted. This Act added a new Part IV entitled “Residential Tenancies” to The Landlord and Tenant Act. Part IV contained provisions on most of the matters recommended by the Law Reform Commission and some additional matters. Section 106(1) provided:

106. (1) Unless a tenant has vacated or abandoned rented premises, the landlord shall not regain possession of the premises on the grounds he is entitled to possession except under the authority of a writ of possession obtained under section 105 or under Part III.

Thus the landlord’s right of self-help, through direct repossession, was abolished. It became necessary for a landlord to bring proceedings by way of writ to recover possession except in cases where the tenant had given it up. The Act also provided for the establishment of Landlord and Tenant Advisory Bureaux by the councils of municipalities to receive complaints and mediate disputes between landlords and tenants.

The reform in the law of landlord and tenant in 1968-69 preserved the constitutional authority of s. 96 courts to terminate tenancies, issue writs of possession, and enforce compliance.

In 1972 the Law Reform Commission reported upon a review which the Commission had made, at the request of the Attorney General, on certain provisions of the new Part IV of The Landlord and Tenant Act applying to residential tenancies. The Commission made a number of recommendations directed at shortening the time for taking steps in the proceedings for eviction and providing for the entry by the clerk of the court of default judgments where a landlord's application for a writ of possession was not contested. The Landlord and Tenant Amendment Act, 1972, 1972 (Ont.), c. 123, was enacted amending the procedure for applying for writs of possession and providing for default proceedings in the manner recommended by the Law Reform Commission.

In 1975 the Legislature of Ontario introduced The Residential Premises Rent Review Act, 1975, 1975 (Ont.), c. 12, to establish rent control. The ability of the province to administer a rent review system, of course, in no way encroached on the traditional jurisdiction of the s. 96 courts to order termination, eviction and compliance. A companion Act, 1975, (Ont.), c. 13, amended The Landlord and Tenant Act to make substantial changes in the substantive law of landlord and tenant. This latter Act established security of tenure for tenants by providing for automatic renewal of tenancy agreements upon expiration of the term, unless the agreement had been lawfully terminated in accordance with the Act. A tenant might terminate it by agreement or by giving notice in the form and at the time prescribed by the statute. A landlord might terminate only for specified causes and at specified times. The rules for proceedings by the county or district judge were relaxed and simplified. The powers of these judges were expanded to cover most of the issues that might arise between a landlord and a tenant, including power to declare a tenancy agreement terminated.

After the 1975 statutes were passed the courts continued to exercise the functions traditionally performed by s. 96 courts since Confederation, and to the present time, to order termination of leases, make eviction orders and compel compliance with the provisions of a lease of residential premises. See, as examples, Re Apogee Investments Ltd. and Saber^[17] and Re Blok-Glowczynski et al. and Stanga et al.^[18]

On February 10, 1978 a Government Green Paper was released relating to policy options for continuing tenant protection. The Green Paper made reference to the very large number of Ontario citizens whose lives are governed in part by the law of landlord and tenant. From 1961 to 1971 the number of tenants grew by 70 per cent from 483,500 to 825,000. It was estimated that there were more than one million rental households in Ontario constituting about 36 per cent of all households.

A reading of the Green Paper would suggest that at least three factors led to the establishment of the Residential Tenancy Commission. First, the legislature had removed the landlord's traditional right to employ 'self-help' remedies (i.e. repossession) and now required a landlord to apply for an order of eviction. It was felt that the demands of this "new business" would clog an already overburdened court system. A specialized Commission was seen as a convenient method for ensuring prompt and efficient resolution of landlord-tenant disputes. A second major factor was the belief that the regular court system was too formal in structure for the resolution of landlord and tenant disputes; that such disputes could best be adjudicated in an informal, summary proceeding before a tribunal where individual complainants would feel less inhibited in presenting their own cases. Third, the Green Paper saw the creation of a Tenancy Commission as a convenient method of consolidating functions which had previously been performed by different organizations. The new tribunal would be a centralized body which could provide authoritative advice to landlords and tenants. By combining administrative functions with judicial functions, the tribunal would be able to offer a wider range of remedies to individuals than the regular court system. The Paper noted that while many had hailed the development of tenancy boards and tribunals as an effective means of realizing the rights embodied in the residential tenancy legislation, others had pointed out that such "rough justice" might run counter to well-established principles of procedure. The Green Paper recommended a "mediation-adjudication" approach under which authority to mediate would be combined with jurisdiction to adjudicate a dispute. In this approach, an official would listen to both sides of the case and attempt to guide the parties toward a mutually agreeable solution. If agreement could not be reached, the official would convene a hearing with the parties present, hear evidence and arrive at a determination according to the law. The decision would be legally enforceable.

The Residential Tenancies Act was enacted to implement the recommendations of the Green Paper. As I have said, the Act set up a new tribunal, the Residential Tenancy Commission, to oversee and enforce the obligations of landlords and tenants in Ontario. The tribunal is given wide-ranging powers and functions. Some of these are purely administrative in nature, for example, the Commission is charged with the obligation of informing members of the public as to their rights under the legislation. But by far the most significant role to be played is in the resolution of disputes between landlords and tenants. The mechanism for dispute resolution is triggered 'upon application' by either the landlord or the tenant. In one or two circumstances the process is put in motion by application by a third party—e.g. a neighbouring tenant.

The Residential Tenancies Act is not directed solely to low rental housing. It applies to every residential tenancy, including the most expensive housing, and leases of great value, and any length of term, in city or country.

III

As Professor Hogg has noted in his work on Constitutional Law of Canada (1977), p. 129, there is no general “separation of powers” in the British North America Act, 1867. Our Constitution does not separate the legislative, executive, and judicial functions and insist that each branch of government exercise only its own function. Thus it is clear that the Legislature of Ontario may confer non-judicial functions on the courts of Ontario and, subject to s. 96 of the B.N.A. Act, which lies at the heart of the present appeal, confer judicial functions on a body which is not a court.

Under s. 92(14) of the B.N.A. Act the provincial legislatures have the legislative power in relation to the administration of justice in the province. This is a wide power but subject to subtraction of ss. 96 to 100 in favour of the federal authority. Under s. 96 the Governor General has the sole power to appoint the judges of the Superior, District and County Courts in each province. Under s. 97 the judges who are to be appointed to the Superior, District and County Courts are to be selected from the respective bars of each province. Under s. 100 the Parliament of Canada is obliged to fix and provide for their salaries. Section 92(14) and ss. 96 to 100 represent one of the important compromises of the Fathers of Confederation. It is plain that what was sought to be achieved through this compromise, and the intended effect of s. 96, would be destroyed if a province could pass legislation creating a tribunal, appoint members thereto, and then confer on the tribunal the jurisdiction of the superior courts. What was conceived as a strong constitutional base for national unity, through a unitary judicial system, would be gravely undermined. Section 96 has thus come to be regarded as limiting provincial competence to make appointments to a tribunal exercising s. 96 judicial powers and therefore as implicitly limiting provincial competence to endow a provincial tribunal with such powers.

IV

The belief that any function which in 1867 had been vested in a s. 96 court must forever remain in that court reached its apogee in the judgment of Lord Atkin in Toronto Corporation v. York Corporation^[19]. Describing s. 96 as one of the “three principal pillars in the temple of justice... not to be undermined”, Lord Atkin held that the Ontario Municipal Board could not validly receive “judicial authority”. At the same time, he held that the Municipal Board was in ‘pith and substance’ an administrative body, and the impugned ‘judicial functions’ were severable from the administrative powers given to the Board under its enabling legislation. There was no analysis of the inter-relationship between the judicial and administrative features of the legislative scheme; the assumption was that any attempt to confer a s. 96 function on a provincially-appointed tribunal was ultra vires the legislature.

This sweeping interpretation of s. 96, with its accompanying restrictive view of provincial legislative authority under s. 92, was limited almost immediately by the judgment of this Court in the Reference re Adoption Act and Other Acts^[20]. Chief Justice Duff held that the jurisdiction of inferior courts was not “fixed forever as it stood at the date of Confederation”. On his view, it was quite possible to remove jurisdiction from a Superior Court and vest it in a court of summary jurisdiction. The question which must be asked was whether “the jurisdiction conferred upon magistrates under these statutes broadly conform[s] to a type of jurisdiction generally exercisable by courts of summary jurisdiction rather than the jurisdiction exercised by courts within the purview of s. 96”. In the Adoption Reference, Duff C.J. looked to the historical practice in England and concluded that the jurisdiction conferred on magistrates under the legislation before the Court in the Reference was analogous to the jurisdiction under the English Poor Laws, a jurisdiction which had belonged to courts of summary nature rather than to Superior Courts. On this basis, the legislation was upheld. The Adoption Reference represented a liberalization of the view of s. 96 adopted by the Privy Council in Toronto v. York, at least in the context of a transfer of jurisdiction from a Superior Court to an inferior Court.

The same process of liberalization, this time in the context of a transfer of jurisdiction from a Superior Court to an administrative tribunal, was initiated by the Privy Council in Labour Relations Board of Saskatchewan v. John East Iron Works, Limited^[21]. Lord Simonds proposed a two-fold test. The first limb of the test is to ask whether the board or tribunal exercises “judicial power”. Lord Simonds did not propose a ‘final’ answer to the definition of “judicial power”, but he suggested that,

...the conception of the judicial function is inseparably bound up with the idea of a suit between parties, whether between Crown and subject or between subject and subject, and that it is the duty of the court to decide the issue between those parties, with whom alone it rests to initiate or defend or compromise the proceedings. [p. 149]

If the answer to the initial question as to “judicial power” is in the negative, then that concludes the matter in favour of the provincial board. If, however, the power is in fact a judicial power, then it becomes necessary to ask a second question: in the exercise of that power, is the tribunal analogous to a superior, district or county court?

This formulation represented a subtle modification of the test proposed by Duff C.J. in the Adoption Reference. Duff C.J. had suggested it was necessary to determine whether the impugned jurisdiction was more analogous to a summary type of jurisdiction exercised at the time of Confederation rather than to a jurisdiction traditionally exercised by s. 96 courts. The formulation of Duff C.J. froze the provincial jurisdiction to that of summary courts. Lord Simonds in John East suggested that it was not absolutely necessary to consider whether there was a true analogy between the impugned jurisdiction and the jurisdiction of summary courts; it would be sufficient, for constitutional purposes, to establish that the power or jurisdiction was not one traditionally falling within s. 96. Lord Simonds makes this clear in the following passage:

At this stage their Lordships reach the conclusion that the jurisdiction exercisable by the board is not such as to constitute it a court within s. 96 of the British North America Act. They do not think it necessary to consider whether it is a jurisdiction more nearly analogous to that exercised at the time of confederation by justices of the peace—a matter to which much argument was directed—nor would they pursue the comparison with the jurisdiction of the Workmen’s Compensation Board, which was also pressed on them by counsel. It is sufficient to say that it is not, in their opinion, analogous to that of a superior, district or county court, [p. 152]

In John East, the Privy Council did not find it necessary to give any final answer to the initial question, namely, whether the power in issue was ‘judicial’. The case was resolved solely on the ground that, in exercising the power, the tribunal was not analogous to a superior, county or district court.

It is apparent that John East represented a break with the line of jurisprudence developed in Toronto v. York. The approach of Toronto v. York, in which the sole issue was whether the tribunal was being clothed with a s. 96 ‘judicial power’, had been effectively, though not expressly, repudiated.

In Tomko v. Labour Relations Board (Nova Scotia) et al.^[22], the issue was the validity of the Nova Scotia Labour Relations Board’s authority to issue a “cease and desist” order. It was argued that this jurisdiction was analogous to the jurisdiction of s. 96 courts to issue mandatory injunctions to halt illegal activity. The Chief Justice, speaking for eight members of the Court, held that this consideration was not conclusive, since “...it is not the detached jurisdiction or power alone that is to be considered but rather its setting in the institutional arrangements in which it appears and is exercisable under the provincial legislation”. A consideration of the ‘institutional setting’ indicated that the power to make cease and desist orders was merely one aspect of a broad legislative scheme for the peaceful regulation of collective bargaining, an area which the courts had not entered. Thus, the Labour Board had been validly clothed with the power impugned.

The recent decision of this Court, The Corporation of the City of Mississauga v. The Regional Municipality of Peel et al.^[23], is, in the words of the Chief Justice in that case, “...a prime illustration of the proposition laid down in Tomko". In Mississauga, the Ontario Municipal Board had been given certain powers to resolve disputes over assets between amalgamating municipalities. Noting that Toronto v. York must be viewed with 'considerable qualification', it was stated that the power to adjudicate was merely one "...incident ...in the over-all picture of the general restructuring of the municipalities in which the Municipal Board is given an important part to play..." Viewed in their "institutional setting, the 'judicial powers' to determine rights and liabilities under provincial legislation had been validly granted to the Municipal Board".

I do not think it can be doubted that the courts have applied an increasingly broad test of constitutional validity in upholding the establishment of administrative tribunals within provincial jurisdiction. In general terms it may be said that it is now open to the provinces to invest administrative bodies with 'judicial functions' as part of a broader policy scheme. There will still be situations, however, as in Attorney General of Quebec et al. v. Farrah^[24], where a s. 96 'judicial function' is isolated from the rest of the administrative structure of the relevant legislation. In Farrah, a Transport Tribunal was given appellate jurisdiction over the Quebec Transport Commission. The Tribunal performed no function other than deciding questions of law. Since this function was normally performed by s. 96 courts and divorced from the broader institutional framework of the Act, the impugned sections were held to be unconstitutional. Subject to this type of situation, s. 96 can no longer be construed as a bar to a province seeking to vest an administrative tribunal with ancillary 'judicial' powers formerly exercised by s. 96 courts.

The teaching of John East, Tomko, and Mississauga is that one must look to the 'institutional setting' in order to determine whether a particular power or jurisdiction can validly be conferred on a provincial body. But these cases are merely the starting point, rather than the conclusion, of the inquiry in the present case. As the British Columbia Court of Appeal noted in its consideration of s. 96 in Re Pepita and Doukas^[25], at p. 582.

...it is notable that no general tests are offered or established in the Tomko judgment for the characterization of the function, the characterization of the institutional arrangements, and the examination of their interrelationship. Instead the judgment continues with a consideration of the particular function in its context...

The Privy Council in John East suggested that the application of s. 96 required a determination as to whether or not the powers being exercised were judicial or administrative and if judicial, whether or not the administrative body was "broadly analogous" to a Superior, District or County Court. Tomko added a further dimension. An administrative tribunal may be clothed with power formerly exercised by s. 96 courts, so long as that power is merely an adjunct of, or ancillary to, a broader administrative or regulatory structure. If, however, the impugned power forms a dominant aspect of the function of the tribunal, such that the tribunal itself must be considered to be acting ‘like a court’, then the conferral of the power is ultra vires.

The jurisprudence since John East leads one to conclude that the test must now be formulated in three steps. The first involves consideration, in the light of the historical conditions existing in 1867, of the particular power or jurisdiction conferred upon the tribunal. The question here is whether the power or jurisdiction conforms to the power or jurisdiction exercised by superior, district or county courts at the time of Confederation. This temporary segregation, or isolation, of the impugned power is not for the purpose of turning back the clock and restoring Toronto v. York as the governing authority, an approach deplored in Mississauga. It is rather the first step in a three step process.

If the historical inquiry leads to the conclusion that the power or jurisdiction is not broadly conformable to jurisdiction formerly exercised by s. 96 courts, that is the end of the matter. As Rand J. noted in Dupont et al v. Inglis et al.^[26], “Judicial power not of that type, [i.e. that exercised by s. 96 courts at Confederation] such as that exercised by inferior courts, can be conferred on a provincial tribunal whatever its primary character” (p. 542). If, however, the historical evidence indicates that the impugned power is identical or analogous to a power exercised by s. 96 courts at Confederation, then one must proceed to the second step of the inquiry.

Step two involves consideration of the function within its institutional setting to determine whether the function itself is different when viewed in that setting. In particular, can the function still be considered to be a ‘judicial’ function? In addressing the issue, it is important to keep in mind the further statement by Rand J. in Dupont v. Inglis that “...it is the subject-matter rather than the apparatus of adjudication that is determinative”. Thus the question of whether any particular function is ‘judicial’ is not to be determined simply on the basis of procedural trappings. The primary issue is the nature of the question which the tribunal is called upon to decide. Where the tribunal is faced with a private dispute between parties, and is called upon to adjudicate through the application of a recognized body of rules in a manner consistent with fairness and impartiality, then, normally, it is acting in a ‘judicial capacity’. To borrow the terminology of Professor Ronald Dworkin, the judicial task involves questions of ‘principle’, that is, consideration of the competing rights of individuals or groups. This can be contrasted with questions of ‘policy’ involving competing views of the collective good of the community as a whole. (See Dworkin, Taking Rights Seriously (Duckworth, 1977) pp. 82-90.)

If, after examining the institutional context, it becomes apparent that the power is not being exercised as a “judicial power” then the inquiry need go no further for the power, within its institutional context, no longer conforms to a power or jurisdiction exercisable by a s. 96 court and the provincial scheme is valid. On the other hand, if the power or jurisdiction is exercised in a judicial manner, then it becomes necessary to proceed to the third and final step in the analysis and review the tribunal's function as a whole in order to appraise the impugned function in its entire institutional context. The phrase—'it is not the detached jurisdiction or power alone that is to be considered but rather its setting in the institutional arrangements in which it appears'—is the central core of the judgment in Tomko. It is no longer sufficient simply to examine the particular power or function of a tribunal and ask whether this power or function was once exercised by s. 96 courts. This would be examining the power or function in a 'detached' manner, contrary to the reasoning in Tomko. What must be considered is the 'context' in which this power is exercised. Tomko leads to the following result: it is possible for administrative tribunals to exercise powers and jurisdiction which once were exercised by the s. 96 courts. It will all depend on the context of the exercise of the power. It may be that the impugned 'judicial powers' are merely subsidiary or ancillary to general administrative functions assigned to the tribunal (John East; Tomko) or the powers may be necessarily incidental to the achievement of a broader policy goal of the legislature (Mississauga). In such a situation, the grant of judicial power to provincial appointees is valid. The scheme is only invalid when the adjudicative function is a sole or central function of the tribunal (Farrah) so that the tribunal can be said to be operating 'like a s. 96 court'.

The matter was well expressed in the Ontario Court of Appeal:

Where judicial powers are conferred by a provincial Legislature on a provincially constituted and appointed tribunal, the fact that the tribunal may not be curial in its essential functions but rather an administrative tribunal entrusted with the making of decisions that are primarily of an administrative nature will not, of itself, insulate the judicial powers from a finding that the legislation conferring them is, to that extent, invalid. Whether such a finding may be escaped will tend to depend on whether the judicial powers are seen to be merely incidents of, or adjuncts to, a scheme for the administration of a matter that is otherwise within provincial legislative competence, albeit that as incidents of or adjuncts to the scheme they may be necessary for its effective functioning...

V

Step one, the historical inquiry. The Residential Tenancy Commission is given a broad range of powers under the Act: in this reference, as I have noted, we are concerned with only two, power to make an eviction order and power to make a 'compliance' order. These powers recur constantly throughout the Act; there are nineteen separate provisions which empower the Commission to make an eviction order and seventeen separate provisions empowering the Commission to make a compliance order. Illustrations of the former are found in s. 36(2)(c) (eviction for non-payment of rent); s. 38(3)(d) (eviction for interference with safety or enjoyment of landlord or other tenants); s. 41(2)(c) (eviction for carrying on of illegal activity); and s. 51(1) (eviction where landlord requires premises for own use or for sale).

Illustrations of the latter power are found in s. 28(4)(a) (landlord may be ordered to comply with obligation to repair); s. 29(2)(a) (obligation to supply vital services); s. 37(2)(a) (tenant to repair damage wilfully or negligently caused by him). In contrast, the impugned power in Tomko to issue “cease and desist” orders was found in one subs., 49(2), forming part of a legislative scheme of some 103 sections.

Section 84(1) of The Residential Tenancies Act, subject to certain exceptions, gives the Commission “exclusive jurisdiction to examine into, hear and determine all matters and questions arising under this Act and as to any matter or thing in respect of which any power, authority or discretion is conferred upon the Commission”. Section 116(1) permits the filing of a Commission order evicting a tenant in the County or District Court and states that such order once filed: “has the same force and effect and all proceedings may be taken on it, as if it were an order of that court, and the clerk of the court shall issue a writ of possession”.

The Ontario Court of Appeal held that the power to order eviction was analogous to the traditional power of the courts to order the ejectment of a tenant, while the power to order compliance was analogous to the power of the courts to award damages or specific performance or to grant injunctive relief. This finding was not challenged on the hearing of this appeal. The Attorney General for Ontario conceded that the powers given to the Residential Tenancy Commission “... are not merely analogous to those [pre-1867] powers but are the same powers”.

We start therefore with the proposition that the power to order eviction in the 1979 Act is broadly conformable to pre-1867 jurisdiction in ejectment, and the power to order compliance is broadly conformable to the pre-1867 jurisdiction to award damages or specific performance. It is true that the Tenancy Commission ordering an eviction in 1981 would look to different considerations than a court ordering an ejectment in 1867, the rules surrounding the granting of these remedies having altered somewhat since 1867, but mere alteration in rules cannot change the substance of things or prevent the drawing of analogies. In an ejectment in 1867 a landlord was asserting a right of re-entry to his property and was seeking the removal of a tenant from his land. These remain the essentials of an eviction application by a landlord in 1981. Similarly, a landlord seeking an injunction against a tenant in pre-Confederation times is in substantially the same position as a modern landlord seeking compliance under the Act.

The question whether the powers or jurisdiction conferred by the statute are analogous to, in broad conformity with, the kind of powers or jurisdiction historically exercised by the superior, county or district courts admits of only one answer—yes.

It is clear, as appears from the judgment of the Court of Appeal, that prior to 1867 in Upper Canada the only tribunals which could make ejectment orders were the Court of Queen’s Bench, the Court of Common Pleas, and the County Court in limited situations, and that only the Court of Chancery could make orders of specific performance or issue mandatory or prohibitory injunction orders. The settlement of disputes between landlords and tenants, including the termination of tenancies and eviction of tenants, has thus always been within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Superior, District and County Court judges both before and after Confederation.

The Attorney General advances two submissions for the purpose of refuting this conclusion:

1. The power to order eviction of overholding tenants was conferred on County Court judges as persona designata, outside the structure of the Superior or County Courts. Thus this power was recognized as not exclusively a power of the Superior, District or County Courts within the intendment of section 96. By analogy, the power to make orders of compliance is not a power exclusively within the jurisdiction of such Superior, District or County Courts.

2. Even if jurisdiction over landlord and tenant matters was exercised by s. 96 courts in 1867, the jurisdiction conferred on the Residential Tenancy Commission is analogous to “a type of jurisdiction generally exerciseable by courts of summary jurisdiction rather than the jurisdiction exercised by courts within the purview of section 96”.

The Attorney General offers a number of authorities in support of his first submission, including two decisions of this Court, which establish, it is argued, that the jurisdiction of county judges with respect to overholding tenants was exercised as persona designata. The first case cited, Pong v. Quong and Chong^[27], does not really assist appellant. In Pong a County Court judge acting under the Overholding Tenants legislation had dealt with a number of collateral matters as to the relationship between two tenants. On appeal, the Court noted that, “It is perfectly manifest that he [the County Judge] had no jurisdiction to do so—no jurisdiction subject to appeal; that he could entertain such collateral matter only either as persona designata or as arbitrator”. From the context it is clear that this comment was directed to the judge’s possible status as a persona designata by the consent of the parties and not under The Landlord and Tenant Act.

In the more recent case of Pajelle Investments Limited v. Herbold and Herbold^[28], this Court was concerned with the interpretation of The Landlord and Tenant Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 236, and the powers of a judge under that Act. Mr. Justice Spence, opening his judgment, and without elaboration, said “The matter came on for hearing before His Honour Judge MacRae acting as a persona designata under the provisions of The Landlord and Tenant Act”. A passing reference of this nature cannot be considered to be conclusive, particularly in light of the recent extensive consideration of the concept of persona designata by this Court, in a case in which persona designata was directly in issue, Herman et al. v. Deputy Attorney General of Canada^[29]. In Herman, the issue was whether a Superior Court judge acting under s. 232 of the Income Tax Act 1970-71-72 (Can.), c. 63, did so qua judge or as ‘persona designata’. Noting that the concept of persona designata is “little better than a trap for the unwary” and that there is a need for a “greater element of certainty in the application of the notion of persona designata” the Court laid down the following general proposition:

Prima facie, Parliament should be taken to intend a judge to act qua judge whenever by statute it grants powers to a judge. He who alleges that a judge is acting in the special capacity of persona designata must find in the specific legislation provisions which clearly evidence a contrary intention on the part of Parliament. The test to be applied in considering whether such a contrary intention appears in the relevant statute can be cast in the form of a question: is the judge exercising a peculiar, and distinct, and exceptional jurisdiction, separate from and unrelated to the tasks which he performs from day-to-day as a judge, and having nothing in common with the court of which he is a member?

Applying this test, the Court in Herman held that a Superior Court judge deciding a question of solicitor-client privilege under the Income Tax Act did so qua judge and not as persona designata.

The Court of Appeal in the instant case applied the test in Herman, concluding that the County Court judges were acting qua judge under the overholding tenants provisions. The Court was fortified by the fact that the concept of persona designata as applied to judicial powers was not coined until 1849, in Ross v. The York, Newcastle

& Berwick Railway Company^[30] and it was not until 1869 that the principle was applied in Canada: R. v. McIntosh^[31]. With respect, I agree with the Court of Appeal. The jurisdiction over overholding tenants contained in the 1864 Act was merely a modification of the traditional jurisdiction in ejectment exercised by the Superior Courts.

In any event, as was pointed out in argument, the persona designata argument could not be applicable to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Ontario to make orders requiring landlords and tenants to comply with obligations under leases. The point was also made that whether or not the County Court judge was acting as persona designata in eviction proceedings, the power he exercised was broadly analogous to that of the Superior Court and accordingly, even if the powers of the Commission are seen in terms of powers of pre-1867 County Court judges acting as persona designata, they nonetheless remain broadly analogous to those of pre-1867 Superior Courts. Accordingly the first submission of the Attorney General for Ontario on this point must be rejected.

The second submission, as I understand it, relies on the reasoning elaborated by Chief Justice Duff in the Reference re Adoption Act (supra). This Court held that the jurisdiction of the inferior courts could be enlarged, both as to subject matter and as to pecuniary limits, as long as the new jurisdiction “broadly conform[ed] to a type of jurisdiction generally exercisable by courts of summary jurisdiction rather than the jurisdiction exercised by courts within the purview of s. 96”. It is urged that the powers conferred on the Residential Tenancy Commission conform to a type of jurisdiction generally exercisable by courts of summary jurisdiction. As to the question of subject matter, the appellant relies on the form and language in which the statute is enacted. The statute contains non-technical language and its application involves questions of fact or involves the exercise of discretionary factual judgments expressed in ordinary language. It is submitted that no significant jurisprudential questions are involved. As to pecuniary limits, the Residential Tenancy Commission is empowered to make an order for the payment of money only where the amount claimed does not exceed $3,000. The suggestion seems to be that, since the Residential Tenancy Commission proceeds in a summary manner under a statute drafted in ‘layman’s’ language, its jurisdiction is, for constitutional purposes, analogous to the jurisdiction of a summary court. This submission misconceives the import of the reasoning in the Adoption Reference. Provinces cannot avoid the limitations of s. 96 simply by taking a traditional s. 96 function, simplifying procedural matters, and then transferring the jurisdiction to a non-section-96 tribunal. If this could be done, s. 96 would be stripped of all force and effect.

Even putting aside these assumptions, the argument of the appellant on this point cannot be accepted. As to the question of subject matter, I have noted that the Act applies to leases of any value and any term. Moreover, the $3,000 limitation on jurisdiction only applies when a sum of money is being claimed; in all other cases, there will be no pecuniary limit. Thus a landlord may incur costs far in excess of $3,000 in order to ‘comply’ with the Act or with an order of the Commission. As to the submission that the Commission will simply be deciding questions of fact, I would adopt the following comments made by the Court of Appeal:

Clearly, more will be involved than the finding of facts, and the ascertainment of their “real substance”, on the basis of which the next step to be taken will usually be apparent. The law will need to be interpreted in accordance with the accepted rules of law for that purpose, and the proper law will need to be applied, including, where relevant, the proper principles of contract, tort, and real and personal property law, notwithstanding the statutory “codification” earlier mentioned. In at least some cases the issue of the legality or illegality of activities carried on by tenants will arise, and in many cases assessments will have to be made of compensation for loss or injury of various kinds. In the making of orders for the evictions of tenants and requiring compliance with obligations imposed under the legislation, the task of the Commission will be of basically the same complexity and degree of difficulty as the task which has hitherto engaged the attention of the Courts in this Province.

The second submission of the Attorney General for Ontario also fails.

VI

We pass now to the second step of the inquiry, to consideration of the impugned powers within their institutional setting. Is the power to order eviction or compliance when so viewed still a ‘judicial power’? I have already indicated that the hallmark of a judicial power is a lis between parties in which a tribunal is called upon to apply a recognized body of rules in a manner consistent with fairness and impartiality. The adjudication deals primarily with the rights of the parties to the dispute, rather than considerations of the collective good of the community as a whole.

With very few exceptions, the Residential Tenancy Commission is not free to intervene of its own motion in disputes between landlords and tenants. Virtually all of the provisions of the Act require that either a landlord or a tenant apply to the Commission before any action be taken. Moreover, the power to order eviction or compliance will, in all case, be exercised in the context of a lis between parties. This is so even where a third party may invoke the Commission’s intervention. Under s. 29, for example, a Public Utility may notify the Commission that its service has been or is likely to be stopped, and the Commission may intervene. But s. 29 goes on to provide that the Commission shall determine whether a particular landlord is breaching his obligation to supply vital services to his tenants. Thus there will clearly be a lis between parties and an issue to be resolved.

When confronted with a lis, the task of the Commission will be to determine the respective rights and obligations of the parties according to the terms of the legislation. The Commission does not have an untrammelled discretion to ‘set matters right’. The powers which it may invoke and the remedies which it may award are circum-scribed by the terms of the Act. At no point is the individual’s right at law surrendered for the benefit of a common group or policy. The Commission deals exclusively with matters of contract and land law as they arise between landlords and tenants.

It is true that the Commission is given a certain degree of discretion when performing its adjudicative function. Under s. 93(1) for example, the Commission is instructed to decide “upon the real merits and justice of the case”; s. 93(2) provides that the Commission “shall ascertain the real substance of all transactions and activities...”; s. 110(3) states that the Commission “may include in any order terms and conditions it considers proper in all the circumstances”. Yet such terminology is certainly not foreign to courts within the purview of s. 96. The County Court under The Landlord and Tenant Act has the power to “make such further or other order as the judge considers appropriate” (s. 96); to make an order “granting relief against forfeiture on such terms and conditions as the judge may decide” (s. 106(1)), and to “refuse to grant the application [for possession] unless he is satisfied, having regard to all the circumstances, that it would be unfair to do so”. (s. 107(2)).

The Commission has authority to hear and determine disputes in accordance with rules of law, and by the authority of the law. It authorizes actions for which application is made. It has the power to impose penalties and sanctions and to award remedies for the infringement of rights. Disobedience of an order of the Commission is a penal offence. The Commission decides contractual and property rights between individual landlords and tenants and in so doing determines not only the right to land and property, but also other rights. In each case, there is an analysis of the law, an application of the applicable law to the particular facts, and then a judicial decision and a consequent order. It is difficult to conceive that when so acting the Commission acts otherwise than as a curial tribunal. In substance the tribunal is exercising judicial powers roughly in the same way as they are exercised by the courts.

Section 105 is also important. It provides that The Statutory Powers Procedure Act, 1971, applies to proceedings by the Commission in the exercise of a statutory power of decision. That Act assures the right to counsel, the right to call and examine witnesses and present argument and the right to conduct cross-examination of witnesses. The Statutory Powers Procedure Act, 1971, also requires that the tribunal give its final decision and order in writing and shall give reasons in writing if requested by a party. The Commission, at the hearing, is required to question the parties who are in attendance at the hearing and any witnesses with a view to determining the truth concerning the matters in dispute. Apart from this inquisitorial feature, there is little to distinguish the hearing from a hearing conducted by a Superior Court. An appeal lies to the Commission from the decision or order of a Commissioner and a further appeal from the Commission on a question of law, to the Supreme Court of Ontario.

I conclude that the impugned powers, when viewed in their institutional setting, remain essentially ‘judicial powers’.

We now face the most difficult aspect of this appeal—an examination of the inter-relationship between the Commission’s impugned ‘judicial powers’ and the other powers and jurisdiction conferred under the Act.

Prior to 1979, three broad functions were exercised by three separate bodies. The function of giving advice, mediating and educating was handled by the Landlord and Tenant Advisory Bureaux. The function of administering rent review was handled by the Residential Premises Rent Review Board. The function of adjudicating disputes between landlords and tenants was handled by s. 96 courts. The 1979 Act effected relatively minor changes in the substantive law of landlord and tenant. The primary change introduced in 1979 was to transfer the separate and distinct functions of the Advisory Bureaux, the Rent Review Board and the courts to the Residential Tenancy Commission.

The Attorney General for Ontario argues that the Commission is essentially an administrative body charged with “supervising and regulating” the relationship of landlord and tenant in the Province of Ontario. The function of adjudicating disputes, it is contended, is merely a subsidiary or ancillary aspect of the Commission’s role.

The Attorney General must look to s. 81, defining the powers of the Commission to sustain his argument of an overall supervisory and regulatory role in the field of landlord and tenant relations. Section 81 lends little support to the argument. It reads:

81. The Commission shall,

- (a) perform the duties assigned to it by or under this Act and shall administer this Act and the regulations;
- (b) periodically review this Act and the regulations and recommend from time to time amendments or revisions thereof;
- (c) advise and assist the public on all residential tenancy matters including referral where appropriate to social services and public housing agencies;
- (d) take an active role in ensuring that landlords and tenants are aware of the benefits and obligations established by this Act;
- (e) periodically prepare and publish a summary of significant decisions of the Commission and the reasons therefor.

It appears upon reading the Act as a whole that the central function of the Commission is that of resolving disputes, in the final resort by a judicial form of hearing between landlords and tenants. The bulk of the Act is taken up with defining the rights and obligations of landlords and tenants and with prescribing a method for resolving disputes over those obligations. Dispute resolution is achieved through application to the Commission. It is true that the Commission is granted the power to mediate the dispute before it is obliged to hold a hearing, but the Commission will ordinarily have no right or duty to act as mediator unless invited to do so by one of the parties. If one party does not wish to settle, then a judicial hearing must be held and a judgment rendered. The other functions of the Commission are either ancillary to this function (i.e. the power to recommend policy or to advise the parties) or are separate and distinct from this core power, and bear no relation to it (i.e. the power over rent review).

There is no broad legislative scheme as there was in Mississauga, supra, to subsume the judicial functions of the Commission. It was argued that the powers vested in the Residential Tenancy Commission were merely incidental or ancillary to the policy of “security of tenure” for tenants. This submission is unconvincing. The primary purpose and effect of the 1979 Act was to transfer jurisdiction over a large and important body of law, affecting landlords and tenants of one million rental units, from the s. 96 courts where it has been administered since Confederation to a provincially appointed tribunal.

Here the chief role of the Commission is not to administer a policy or to carry out an administrative function. Its primary role is to adjudicate. The administrative features of the legislation can be characterized as ancillary to the main adjudicative function. The power of the Commission to mediate disputes is aimed at the speedy resolution of differences between the parties. So too is the informal nature of the proceedings. The goal of these provisions is to enable the Commission to ‘process’ controversies in an expeditious manner. As such, they are merely incidental to the main purpose of the legislation.

In the case at bar, as the Court of Appeal observed, powers until now exercised by the courts have simply been transferred to the Commission as the “chosen vehicle for their exercise”. In the instant case the impugned powers are the nuclear core around which other powers and functions are collected. In Tomko the tribunal was composed of persons familiar with labour relations matters and presumably better able than the courts to weigh the interests involved and to assess the implications of cease and desist orders upon the parties. In the present case the Act imposes no particular qualifications or experience as essential to appointment to the Commission. There is no requirement of legal training or occupational experience for any member of the Commission and the process of selection is not based on any bipartite or tripartite principle. The Commission is in no way a specialized agency. In the instant case the whole of a s. 96 court’s jurisdiction in a certain area, however limited, has been transferred to provincially appointed officials. The provincial legislature has sought to withdraw historically entrenched and important judicial functions from the superior court and vest them in one of its own tribunals. Although the legislature may undoubtedly contract, as well as enlarge, court jurisdiction it cannot lift wholesale from the superior courts and bestow on a tribunal of its own making the resolution of disputes theretofore handled by superior courts in respect of rights and obligations in the nature of eviction orders and orders for compliance with contractual mandates.

The Residential Tenancy Commission is charged with the function of interpreting contracts and enforcing contractual rights through the exercise of the impugned powers. The Commission is to be empowered to do what a superior court has always done. It is clearly a Superior Court quoad those powers. The statutory provisions conferring those powers are therefore invalid. In Farrah the jurisdiction which the statute sought to transfer was, in the words of Pigeon J. at pp. 656-7 “precisely the same as that which was previously exercised by the Quebec Court of Appeal”. In the present case the jurisdiction sought to be transferred is precisely the same as that which was previously, and is presently, exercised by the courts.

The Attorney General of Ontario in a supplementary factum submitted that the test implicit in the Tomko case may be expressed in this way: where the Legislature enacts legislation that in its “pith and substance” establishes a scheme of substantive law and a scheme for its administration to meet some real social problem within its legislative competence, the Legislature may, as an integral part of the scheme for administration of the statute, confer s. 96 court powers on a non-section-96 tribunal (whether a specialized tribunal or a non-section-96 court) if the conferring of such powers is rationally justifiable or functionally appropriate as part of the scheme. In such case, the statute is characterized as a whole as being in pith and substance in relation to the provincial legislative subject matter. The contention seems to be that if the legislature sets up a social agency to meet a social problem, as seen by the legislature, then that determines the validity of a conferral of s. 96 judicial power upon the agency. If the legislation is not aimed at evasion, it cannot be attacked. Such a contention goes too far and is not supported on the authorities.

Implicit throughout the argument advanced on behalf of the Attorney General of Ontario is the assumption that the court system is too formal, too cumbersome, too expensive and therefore unable to respond properly to the social needs which The Residential Tenancies Act is intended to meet. All statutes respond to social needs. The courts are not unfamiliar with equity and the concepts of fairness, justice, convenience, reasonableness. Since the enactment in 1976 of the legislation assuring “security of tenure” the County Court judges of Ontario have been dealing with matters arising out of that legislation, apparently with reasonable despatch, as both landlords and tenants in the present proceedings have spoken clearly against transfer of jurisdiction in respect of eviction and compliance orders from the courts to a special commission. It is perhaps also of interest that there is no suggestion in the material filed with us that the Law Reform Commission favoured removal from the courts of the historic functions performed for over one hundred years by the courts.

I am neither unaware of, nor unsympathetic to, the arguments advanced in support of a view that s. 96 should not be interpreted so as to thwart or unduly restrict the future growth of provincial administrative tribunals. Yet, however worthy the policy objectives, it must be recognized that we, as a Court, are not given the freedom to choose whether the problem is such that provincial, rather than federal, authority should deal with it. We must seek to give effect to the Constitution as we understand it and with due regard for the manner in which it has been judicially interpreted in the past. If the impugned power is violative of s. 96 it must be struck down.

I conclude by noting that two provincial Courts of Appeal, in addition to the Ontario Court of Appeal, have had occasion recently to consider provincial power to vest jurisdiction over landlord and tenant matters in a specialized tribunal. The Alberta Court of Appeal in Reference Re Proposed Legislation Concerning Leased Premises and Tenancy Agreements^[32] decided that a province could not authorize a provincially appointed tribunal to grant orders for possession to a landlord or to grant orders for specific performance of a tenancy agreement. The difficulty facing the Court, as Morrow J.A. noted in his reasons, was that the questions were referred to the court without any accompanying institutional setting. Accordingly, the reasons of the Court of Appeal must of necessity be of limited application for future cases. The British Columbia Court of Appeal, in Re Pepita and Doukas, supra, held that legislation empowering a ‘rentalsman’ to make an order for possession was intra vires the province. The Ontario Court of Appeal, in its judgment in the instant case, elaborated a number of distinctions between the Ontario and British Columbia legislation; these distinctions, it was said, justified the different conclusions reached by the two courts. While noting that such distinctions are indeed possible, this Court need not, on this occasion, express any opinion as to the validity of the British Columbia legislation.

In the result, I would dismiss the appeal, and answer in the negative the constitutional questions which have been posed by the Executive Council of the Province of Ontario. No question of costs arises.

FRANK RONCARELLI (Plaintiff)

APPELLANT;

AND

THE HONOURABLE MAURICE DUPLESSIS (Defendant)

RESPONDENT

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, APPEAL SIDE, PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

PRESENT: Kerwin C.J. and Taschereau, Rand, Locke, Cartwright, Fauteux, Abbott, Martland and Judson JJ.

Crown-Officers of the Crown-Powers and responsibilities-Prime Minister and Attorney-General-Quebec Liquor Commission-Cancellation of licence to sell liquor-T7rhether made at instigation of Prime Minister and Attorney-General-The Alcoholic Liquor Act, R.S.Q.

1941, c. 255-The Attorney-General's Department Act, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 46-The Executive Power Act, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 7.

Licences-Cancellation-Motives of cancellation---Done on instigation of Prime Minister and Attorney-General-Whether liability in damages-Whether notice under art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure required.

The plaintiff, the proprietor of a restaurant in Montreal and the holder of a licence to sell intoxicating liquor, sued the defendant personally for damages arising out of the cancellation of his licence by the Quebec Liquor Commission. He alleged that the licence had been arbitrarily cancelled at the instigation of the defendant who, without legal powers in the matter, had given orders to the Commission to cancel it before its expiration. This was done, it was alleged, to punish the plaintiff, a member of the Witnesses of Jehovah, because he had acted as bailsmen for a large number of members of his sect charged with the violation of municipal by-laws in connection with the distribution of literature. The trial judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for part of the damages claimed. The defendant appealed and the plaintiff, seeking an increase in the amount of damages, cross-appealed. The Court of Appeal dismissed the action and the cross-appeal.

Held (Taschereau, Cartwright and Fauteux JJ. dissenting) : The action should be maintained and the amount awarded at trial should be increased by $25,000. By wrongfully and without legal justification causing the cancellation of the permit, the defendant became liable for damages under art. 1053 of the Civil Code.

Per Kerwin C.J.: The trial judge correctly decided that the defendant ordered the Commission to cancel the licence, and no satisfactory reason has been advanced for the Court of Appeal setting aside that finding of fact.

Per Kerwin C.J. and Locke and Martland JJ.: There was ample evidence to sustain the finding of the trial judge that the cancellation of the permit was the result of an order given by the defendant to the manager of the Commission. There was, therefore, a relationship of cause and effect between the defendant's acts and the cancellation of the permit.

The defendant was not acting in the exercise of any of his official powers. There was no authority in the Attorney-General's Department Act, the Executive Power Act, or the Alcoholic Liquor Act enabling the defendant to direct the cancellation of a permit under the Alcoholic Liquor Act. The intent and purpose of that Act placed complete control over the liquor traffic in the hands of an independent commission.

Cancellation of a permit by the Commission, at the request or upon the direction of a third party, as was done in this case, was not a proper and valid exercise of the powers conferred upon the Commission by s. 35 of the Act.

The defendant was not entitled to the protection provided by art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure since what he did was not "done by him in the exercise of his functions". To interfere with the administration of the Commission by causing the cancellation of a liquor permit was entirely outside his legal functions. It involved the exercise of powers which in law he did not possess at all. His position was not altered by the fact that he thought it was his right and duty to act as he did.

Per Rand J.: To deny or revoke a permit because a citizen exercises an unchallengeable right totally irrelevant to the sale of liquor in a restaurant is beyond the scope of the discretion conferred upon the Commission by the Alcoholic Liquor Act. What was done here was not competent to the Commission and a fortiori to the government or the defendant. The act of the defendant, through the instrumentality of the Commission, brought about a breach of an implied public statutory duty toward the plaintiff. There was no immunity in the defendant from an action for damages. He was under no duty in relation to the plaintiff and his act was an intrusion upon the functions of a statutory body. His liability was, therefore, engaged. There can be no question of good faith when an act is done with an improper intent and for a purpose alien to the very statute under which the act is purported to be done. There was no need for giving a notice of action as required by art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as the act done by the defendant was quite beyond the scope of any function or duty committed to him so far so that it was one done exclusively in a private capacity however much, in fact, the influence of public office and power may have carried over into it.

Per Abbott J.: The cancellation of the licence was made solely because of the plaintiff's association with the Witnesses of Jehovah and with the object and purpose of preventing him from continuing to furnish bail for members of that sect. This cancellation was made with the express authorization and upon the order of the defendant. In purporting to authorize and instruct the Commission to cancel the licence the defendant was acting, as he was bound to know, without any legal authority whatsoever. A public officer is responsible for acts done by him without legal justification. The defendant was not entitled to avail himself of the exceptional provision of art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure since the act complained of was not "done by him in the exercise of his functions" but was an act done when he had gone outside his functions to perform it. Before a public officer can be held to be acting "in the exercise of his functions" within the meaning of art. 88, it must be established that at the time he performed the act complained of such public officer had reasonable ground for believing that such act was within his legal authority to perform.

Per Taschereau J., dissenting: The action cannot succeed because -the plaintiff did not give the notice required by art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the defendant who was a public officer performing his functions. The failure to fulfil this condition precedent was a total bar to the claim. That failure may be raised by exception to the form or in the written plea to the action, and the words "no judgment may be rendered" indicate that the Court may raise the point proprio motu. Even if what was said by the defendant affected the decision taken by the Commission, the defendant remained, nevertheless, a public officer acting in the performance of his duties. He was surely a public officer, and it is clear that he did not act in his personal quality. It was as legal adviser of the Commission and also as a public officer entrusted with the task of preventing disorders and as protector of the peace in the province, that he was consulted. It was the Attorney-General, acting in the performance of his functions, who was required to give his directives to a govern-mental branch. It is a fallacious principle to hold that an error, committed by a public officer in doing an act connected with the object of his functions, strips that act of its official character and that its author must then be considered as having acted outside the scope of his duties.

Per Cartwright J., dissenting: The loss suffered by the plaintiff was damnum sine injuria. Whether the defendant directed or merely approved the cancellation of the licence, he cannot be answerable in damages since the act of the Commission in cancelling the licence was not an actionable wrong. The Courts below have found, on ample evidence, that the defendant and the manager of the Commission acted throughout in the honest belief that they were fulfilling their duty to the province. On the true construction of the Alcoholic Liquor Act, the Legislature, except in certain specified circumstances which are not present in the case at bar, has not laid down any rules as to the grounds on which the Commission may decide to cancel a permit; that decision is committed to the unfettered discretion of the Commission and its function in making the decision is administrative and not judicial or quasi-judicial. Consequently, the Commission was not bound to give the plaintiff an opportunity to be heard and the Court cannot be called upon to determine whether there existed sufficient grounds for its decision. Even if the function of the Commission was quasi-judicial and its order should be set aside for failure to hear the plaintiff, it is doubtful whether any action for damages would lie.

Per Fauteux J., dissenting : The right to exercise the discretion with respect to the cancellation of the permit, which under the Alcoholic Liquor Act was exclusively that of the Commission, was abdicated by it in favour of the defendant when he made the decision executed by the Commission. The cancellation being illegal, imputable to the defendant, and damageable for the plaintiff, the latter was entitled to succeed on an action under art. 1053 of the Civil Code.

As the notice required by art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure was not given, the action, however, could not be maintained. The failure to give notice, when it should be given, imports nullity and limits the very jurisdiction of the Court. In the present case, the defendant was entitled to the notice since the illegality reproached was committed "in the exercise of his functions". The meaning of this expression in art. 88 was not subject to the limitations attending expressions more or less identical appearing in art. 1054 of the Civil Code. The latter article deals with responsibility whereas art. 88 deals with procedure. Article 88 has its source in s. 8 of An Act for the Protection of Justices of the Peace, Cons. Stat. L.C., c. 101, which provided that the officer "shall be entitled" to the protection of the statute although "he has exceeded his powers or jurisdiction, and has acted clearly contrary to law". That section peremptorily establishes that, in pari materia, a public officer was not considered as having ceased to act within the exercise of his functions by the sole fact that the act committed by him might constitute an abuse of power or excess of jurisdiction, or even a violation of the law. An illegality is assumed under art. 88. The jurisprudence of the province, which has been settled for many years, is to the effect that the incidence of good or bad faith has no bearing on the right to the notice.

The illegality committed by the defendant did not amount to an offence known under the penal law or a delict under art. 1053 of the Civil Code. He did not use his functions to commit this illegality. He did not commit it on the occasion of his functions, but committed it because of his functions. His good faith has not been doubted, and on this fact there was a concurrent finding in the Courts below.

APPEALS from two judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench, Appeal Side, Province of Quebec^[1], reversing a judgment of Mackinnon J. Appeals allowed, Taschereau, Cartwright and Fauteux JJ. dissenting.

F. R. Scott and A. L. Stein, for the plaintiff, appellant.

L. E. Beaulieu, Q.C., and L. Tremblay, Q.C., for the defendant, respondent.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE :- No satisfactory reason has been advanced for the Court of Queen's Bench (Appeal Side[2]) setting aside the finding of fact by the trial judge that the respondent ordered the Quebec Liquor Commission to cancel the appellant's licence. A reading of the testimony of the respondent and of the person constituting the commission at the relevant time satisfies me that the trial judge correctly decided the point. As to the other questions, I agree with Mr. Justice Martland.

The appeals should be allowed with costs here and below and judgment directed to be entered for the appellant against the respondent in the sum of $33,123.53 with interest from the date of the judgment of the Superior Court, together with the costs of the action.

TASCHEREAU J. (dissenting) :-L'intimé est Premier Ministre et Procureur Général de la province de Québec, et il occupait ces hautes fonctions dans le temps où les faits qui ont donné naissance à ce litige se sont passés.

L'appelant, un restaurateur de la Cité de Montréal, et porteur d'un permis de la Commission des Liqueurs pour la vente des spiritueux, lui a réclamé personnellement devant la Cour supérieure la somme de $118,741 en dom-mages. Il a allégué dans son action qu'il est licencié depuis de nombreuses années, qu'il a toujours respecté les lois de la Province se rapportant à la vente des liqueurs alcooliques, que son restaurant avait une excellente réputation, et jouissait de la faveur d'une clientèle nombreuse et recherchée.

Il a allégué en outre qu'il faisait et fait encore partie de la secte religieuse des "Témoins de Jéhovah", et que parce qu'il se serait rendu caution pour quelque 390 de ses coreligionnaires, traduits devant les tribunaux correctionnels de Montréal et accusés de distribution de littérature, sans permis, l'intimé serait illégalement intervenu auprès du gérant de la Commission pour lui faire perdre son permis, qui d'ailleurs lui a été enlevé le 4 décembre 1946. Ce serait comme résultat de l'intervention injustifiée de l'intimé que l'appelant aurait été privé de son permis, et aurait ainsi souffert les dommages considérables qu'il réclame.

La Cour supérieure a maintenu l'action jusqu'à concurrence de $8,123.53, et la Cour du banc de la reine[3], M. le Juge Rinfret étant dissident, aurait pour divers motifs maintenu l'appel et rejeté l'action.

L'intimé a soulevé plusieurs moyens à l'encontre de cette réclamation, mais je n'en examinerai qu'un seul, car je crois qu'il est suffisant pour disposer du présent appel. Le Code de procédure civile de la province de Québec contient la disposition suivante:

Art. 88 C.P.-Nul officier public ou personne remplissant des fonctions ou devoirs publics ne peut être poursuivi pour dommages à raison d'un acte par lui fait dans l'exercice de ses fonctions, et nul verdict ou jugement ne peut être rendu contre lui à moins qu'avis de cette poursuite ne lui ait été donné au moins un mois avant l'émission de l'assignation.

Cet avis doit être par écrit; il doit exposer les causes de l'action, contenir l'indication des noms et de l'étude du procureur du demandeur ou de son agent et être signifié au défendeur personnellement ou à son domicile.

Le défaut de donner cet avis peut être invoqué par le défendeur, soit au moyen d'une exception à la forme ou soit par plaidoyer au fond. Charland v. Kay^[4]; Corporation de la Paroisse de St-David v. Paquet^[5]; Houde v. Benoit^[6].

Les termes mêmes employés par le législateur dans l'art. 88 C.P.C., "nul jugement ne peut être rendu" contre le défendeur, indiquent aussi que la Cour a le devoir de soulever d'office ce moyen, si le défendeur omet ou néglige de le faire par exception à la forme, ou dans son plaidoyer écrit. La signification de cet avis à un officier public, remplissant des devoirs publics, est une condition préalable, essentielle à la réussite d'une procédure judiciaire. S'il n'est pas donné, les tribunaux ne peuvent prononcer aucune condamnation en dommages. Or, dans le cas présent, il est admis qu'aucun avis n'a été donné.

Mais, c'est la prétention de l'appelant que l'intimé ne peut se prévaloir de ce moyen qui est une fin de non recevoir, car, les conseils ou avis qu'il aurait donnés et qui auraient été la cause déterminante de la perte de son permis, ne l'ont pas été en raison d'un acte posé par lui dans l'exercice de ses fonctions.

La preuve révèle que l'appelant était bien licencié de la Commission des Liqueurs depuis de nombreuses années, que la tenue de son restaurant était irréprochable, et que dans le cours du mois de décembre de l'année 1946, alors qu'il était toujours porteur de son permis, celui-ci lui a été enlevé parce qu'il se rendait caution pour plusieurs centaines de ses coreligionnaires, distributeurs de littérature que l'on croyait séditeuse.

C'était avant le jugement de cette Cour dans la cause de Boucher v. Le Roi^[7], alors que la conviction était profondément ancrée parmi la population, que les "Témoins de Jéhovah" étaient des perturbateurs de la paix publique, des sources constantes de trouble et de désordre dans la Province. On jugeait leur mouvement dangereux, susceptible de soulever une partie de la population contre l'autre, et de provoquer de sérieuses agitations. On parlait même de conspiration séditeuse, et ce n'est sûrement pas sans cause raisonnable, car cette opinion fut plus tard unanime-ment confirmée par cinq juges de la Cour du Banc de la Reine dans l'affaire Boucher v. Le Roi^[8], et également par quatre juges dissidents devant cette Cour (Boucher v. Le Roi cité supra),

M. Archambault, alors gérant général de la Commission des Liqueurs, soupçonnait fortement que le "Frank Roncarelli" qui par ses cautionnements aidait financièrement ce mouvement qu'il croyait subversif, était détenteur d'un permis de restaurateur pour la vente de liqueurs alcooliques. Il pensait évidemment qu'il ne convenait pas que les bénéfices que Roncarelli retirait de son permis de la Commission, soient utilisés à servir la cause d'agitateurs religieux, dont les enseignements et les méthodes venaient en conflit avec les croyances populaires. Il en informa l'intimé, procureur général, qui en cette qualité est l'aviseur légal officiel de la province pour toutes les affaires juridiques.

Au cours d'une première conversation téléphonique, M. Archambault suggéra à l'intimé que le permis de Roncarelli lui soit enlevé, ce que d'ailleurs il avait personnellement le droit de faire, en vertu de l'art. 35 de la Loi des Liqueurs, qui est ainsi rédigé:

35.-La Commission peut à sa discrétion annuler un permis en tout temps.

Or, comme l'exécutif de la Commission des Liqueurs ne se compose que d'un gérant général qui était M. Archambault, cette discrétion reposait entièrement sur lui.

L'intimé lui suggéra la prudence, et lui proposa de s'en-quérir avec certitude si le Roncarelli, détenteur de permis, était bien le même Roncarelli qui prodiguait ses cautionnements d'une façon si généreuse. Après enquête, l'affirmative ayant été établie, M. Archambault communiqua de nouveau avec l'intimé, et voici ce que nous dit M. Archambault dans son témoignage au sujet de ces conversations:

Q. Maintenant, ce jour-là, où vous avez reçu une lettre, le 30 novembre 1946, avez-vous décidé, ce jour-là, d'enlever la licence?

R. Certainement, ce jour-là, j'avais appelé le Premier Ministre, en l'occurrence le procureur général, lui faisant part des constatations, c'est-à-dire des renseignements que je possédais, et de mon intention d'annuler le privilège, et le Premier Ministre m'a répondu de prendre mes précautions, de bien vérifier s'il s'agissait bien de la même personne, qu'il pouvait y avoir plusieurs Roncarelli, et coetera. Alors, quand j'ai eu la confirmation de Y3 à l'effet que c'était la même personne, j'ai appelé le Premier Ministre pour l'assurer qu'il s'agissait bien de Frank Roncarelli, détenteur d'un permis de la Commission des Liqueurs; et, là, le Premier Ministre m'a autorisé, il m'a donné son consentement, son approbation, sa permission, et son ordre de procéder.

Voici maintenant la version de l'intimé :

Probablement, à la suite du rapport que l'indicateur Y-3 a fait, le rapport qui est produit, M. le Juge Archambault m'a téléphoné et m'a dit: 'on est sûr, c'est cette personne-là.' Et comme dans l'intervalle j'avais étudié le problème et parcouru les statuts depuis l'institution de la Commission des Liqueurs et tous les amendements qui avaient eu lieu, et j'avais consulté, j'en suis arrivé à la conclusion qu'en mou âme et conscience, mon impérieux devoir c'était d'approuver la suggestion très au point du Juge et d'autoriser la cancellation d'un privilège que cet homme-là ne méritait pas, à mon sens, et dont il n'était pas digne.

Et:

Après avoir mûrement délibéré et conscient et sûr de faire mon devoir, j'ai dit à M. Archambault que j'approuvais sa suggestion d'annuler le permis, d'annuler le privilège.

Et, plus loin :

... j'ai dit au Juge Archambault que j'étais de son opinion, que je ne croyais pas que Roncarelli fût digne d'obtenir des privilèges de la province après son attitude que j'ai mentionnée tout à l'heure.

... et lorsque le Juge Archambault m'a dit, après vérification, que c'était la même personne, j'ai dit: 'Vous avez raison, ôtez le permis, ôtez le privilège.'

Quand on demande à l'intimé s'il a donné un ordre à M. Archambault, voici ce qu'il dit:

Non, je n'ai pas donné un ordre à M. Archambault, je viens de conter ce qui s'est passé.

Que le permis ait été enlevé à Roncarelli comme con-séquence de la seule décision de M. Archambault, ce qu'il avait le droit de faire à sa discrétion, ou que cette discrétion ait été influencée par les paroles de l'intimé, n'a pas je crois d'effet décisif dans la détermination de la présente cause. Je demeure convaincu que même si les paroles de l'intimé. ont pu avoir quelque influence sur la décision qui a été prise, ce dernier demeurerait quand même un officier public, agissant dans l'exercice de ses fonctions, et qu'il était essentiel de lui donner l'avis requis par l'art. 88 C.P.C. L'absence de cet avis interdit aux tribunaux de prononcer aucune condamnation.

L'intimé est sûrement un officier public, et il me semble clair qu'il n'a pas agi en sa qualité personnelle. C'est bien comme aviseur légal de la Commission des Liqueurs, et aussi comme officier public chargé de la prévention des troubles, et gardien de la paix dans la province, qu'il a été consulté. C'est le Procureur Général, agissant dans l'exercice de ses fonctions, qui a été requis de donner ses directives à une branche gouvernementale dont il est l'aviseur. Vide : Loi concernant le Département du Procureur Général, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 46, art. 3, Loi des liqueurs alcooliques, S.R.Q. 1941, c. 255, art 138.

'Certains, à tort ou à raison, peuvent croire que l'intimé se soit trompé, en pensant qu'il devait, pour le maintien de la paix publique et la suppression de troubles existants, et qui menaçaient de se propager davantage, conseiller l'enlèvement du permis de l'appelant. Pour ma part, je ne puis admettre le fallacieux principe qu'une erreur commise par un officier public, en posant un acte qui se rattache cependant à l'objet de son mandat, enlève à cet acte son caractère officiel, et que l'auteur de ce même acte fautif cesse alors d'agir dans l'exécution de ses fonctions.

Parce que l'appelant ne s'est pas conformé aux exigences de l'art. 88 C.P.C., en ne donnant pas l'avis requis à l'intimé qui est un officier public, agissant dans l'exercice de ses fonctions, je crois que l'action ne peut réussir. Le défaut de remplir cette condition préalable, constitue une fin de non recevoir, qui me dispense d'examiner les autres aspects de cette cause.

Je crois donc que l'appel principal, de même que l'appel logé pour faire augmenter le montant accordé par le juge de première instance, doivent être rejetés avec dépens de toutes les Cours.

The judgment of Rand and Judson JJ. was delivered by RAND J. :-The material facts from which my conclusion is drawn are these. The appellant was the proprietor of a restaurant in a busy section of Montreal which in 1946 through its transmission to him from his father had been continuously licensed for the sale of liquor for approximately 34 years; he is of good education and repute and the restaurant was of a superior class. On December 4 of that year, while his application for annual renewal was before the Liquor Commission, the existing license was cancelled and his application for renewal rejected, to which was added a declaration by the respondent that no future license would ever issue to him. These primary facts took place in the following circumstances.

For some years the appellant had been an adherent of a rather militant 'Christian religious sect known as the Witnesses of Jehovah. Their ideology condemns the established church institutions and stresses the absolute and exclusive personal relation of the individual to the Deity without human intermediation or intervention.

The first impact of their proselytizing zeal upon the Roman Catholic church and community in Quebec, as might be expected, produced a violent reaction. Meetings were forcibly broken up, property damaged, individuals ordered out of communities, in one case out of the province, and generally, within the cities and towns, bitter controversy aroused. The work of the Witnesses was carried on both by word of mouth and by the distribution of printed matter, the latter including two periodicals known as "The Watch Tower" and "Awake", sold at a small price.

In 1945 the provincial authorities began to take steps to bring an end to what was considered insulting and offensive to the religious beliefs and feelings of the Roman Catholic population. Large scale arrests were made of young men and women, by whom the publications mentioned were being held out for sale, under local by-laws requiring a licence for peddling any kind of wares. Altogether almost one thousand of such charges were laid. The penalty involved in Montreal, where most of the arrests took place, was a fine of $40, and as the Witnesses disputed liability, bail was in all cases resorted to.

The appellant, being a person of some means, was accepted by the Recorder's Court as bail without question, and up to November 12, 1946, he had gone security in about 380 cases, some of the accused being involved in repeated offences. Up to this time there had been no suggestion of impropriety; the security of the appellant was taken as so satisfactory that at times, to avoid delay when he was absent from the city, recognizances were signed by him in blank and kept ready for completion by the Court officials. The reason for the accumulation of charges was the doubt that they could be sustained in law. Apparently the legal officers of Montreal, acting in concert with those of the Province, had come to an agreement with the attorney for the Witnesses to have a test case proceeded with. Pending that, however, there was no stoppage of the sale of the tracts and this became the annoying circumstance that produced the volume of proceedings.

On or about November 12 it was decided to require bail in cash for Witnesses so arrested and the sum set ranged from $100 to $300. No such bail was furnished by the appellant; his connection with giving security ended with this change of practice; and in the result, all of the charges in relation to which he had become surety were dismissed.

At no time did he take any part in the distribution of the tracts: he was an adherent of the group but nothing more. It was shown that he had leased to another member premises in Sherbrooke which were used as a hall for carrying on religious meetings: but it is unnecessary to do more than mention that fact to reject it as having no bearing on the issues raised. Beyond the giving of bail and being an adherent, the appellant is free from any relation that could be tortured into a badge of character pertinent to his fitness or unfitness to hold a liquor licence.

The mounting resistance that stopped the surety bail sought other means of crushing the propagandist invasion and among the circumstances looked into was the situation of the appellant. Admittedly an adherent, he was enabling these protagonists to be at large to carry on their campaign of publishing what they believed to be the Christian truth as revealed by the Bible; he was also the holder of a liquor licence, a "privilege" granted by the Province, the profits from which, as it was seen by the authorities, he was using to promote the disturbance of settled beliefs and arouse community disaffection generally. Following discussions between the then Mr. Archambault, as the personality of the Liquor Commission, and the chief prosecuting officer in Montreal, the former, on or about November 21, telephoned to the respondent, advised him of those facts, and queried what should be done. Mr. Duplessis answered that the matter was serious and that the identity of the person furnishing bail and the liquor licensee should be put beyond doubt. A few days later, that identity being established through a private investigator, Mr. Archambault again communicated with the respondent and, as a result of what passed between them, the licence, as of December 4, 1946, was revoked.

In the meantime, about November 25, 1946, a blasting answer had come from the Witnesses. In an issue of one of the periodicals, under the heading "Quebec's Burning Hate", was a searing denunciation of what was alleged to be the savage persecution of Christian believers. Immediately instructions were sent out from the department of the Attorney-General ordering the confiscation of the issue and proceedings were taken against one Boucher charging him with publication of a seditious libel.

It is then wholly as a private citizen, an adherent of a religious group, holding a liquor licence and furnishing bail to arrested persons for no other purpose than to enable them to be released from detention pending the determination of the charges against them, and with no other relevant considerations to be taken into account, that he is involved in the issues of this controversy.

The complementary state of things is equally free from doubt. From the evidence of Mr. Duplessis and Mr. Archambault alone, it appears that the action taken by the latter as the general manager and sole member of the Commission was dictated by Mr. Duplessis as Attorney-General and Prime Minister of the province; that that step was taken as a means of bringing to a halt the activities of the Witnesses, to punish the appellant for the part he had played not only by revoking the existing licence but in declaring him barred from one "forever", and to warn others that they similarly would be stripped of provincial "privileges"

if they persisted in any activity directly or indirectly related to the Witnesses and to the objectionable campaign. The respondent felt that action to be his duty, something which his conscience demanded of him; and as representing the provincial government his decision became automatically that of Mr. Archambault and the Commission. The following excerpts of evidence make this clear:

M. DUPLESSIS :

R... . Au mois de novembre 1946, M. Edouard Archambault, qui était alors le gérant général de la Commission des Liqueurs m'a appelé à Québec, téléphone longue distance de Montréal, et il m'a dit que Roncarelli qui multipliait les cautionnements à la Cour du Recorder d'une façon désordonnée, contribuant à paralyser les activités de la Police et à congestionner les tribunaux, que ce nommé Roncarelli détenait un privilège de la Commission des Liqueurs de Québec. De fait, Votre Seigneurie, un permis est un privilège, ce n'est pas un droit. L'article 35 de la Loi des Liqueurs alcooliques, paragraphe 1, a été édicté en 1921 par le statut II, Geo. V, chap. 24, qui déclare ceci:

"La Commission peut, à sa discrétion annuler le permis en tout temps."

"Je vais m'en informer et je vous le dirai." J'ai dit au Juge : "Dans l'intervalle, je vais examiner la question avec des officiers légaux, je vais y penser, je vais réfléchir et je vais voir ce que devrai faire." Quelques jours après, et pendant cet intervalle j'ai étudié le problème, j'ai étudié des dossiers, comme Procureur Général et comme Premier Ministre, quelques jours après le Juge Archambault, M. Edouard Archambault, m'a téléphoné pour me dire qu'il était certain que le Roncarelli en question, qui paralysait les activités de la Cour du Recorder qui accaparait dans une large mesure les services de la force constabulaire de Montréal, dont les journaux disaient avec raison qu'elle n'avait pas le nombre suffisant de policiers, était bien la personne qui détenait un permis. Je lui ai dit: "Dans ces circonstances, je considère que c'est mon devoir, comme Procureur Général et comme Premier Ministre, en conscience, dans l'exercice de mes fonctions officielles et pour remplir le mandat que le peuple m'avait confié et qu'il m'a renouvelé avec une immense majorité en 1948, après la cancellation du permis et après la poursuite intentée contre moi, j'ai cru que c'était mon devoir, en conscience, de dire au Juge que ce permis-là, le Gouvernement de Québec ne pouvait pas accorder un privilège à un individu comme Roncarelli qui tenait l'attitude qu'il tenait."

* * *

J'ai dit: "Il y a peut-être de pauvres personnes, de bonne foi, plus riches d'idéal que d'esprit, de jugement, ces personnes-là sont probable-ment à la merci de quelques-uns qui les exploitent, je vais donner une entrevue pour attirer l'attention de tout le monde sur l'article 69 du Code Criminel, qui déclare que les complices sont responsables au même titre que la personne qui a commis l'offense."

* *

D. Vous n'avez pas reçu d'autres documents, c'est seulement les communications téléphoniques de M. le Juge Archambault?

R. Oui, certainement, un message du Juge Archambault, un autre téléphone au Juge Archambault, des examens de la situation, on en a même parlé au Conseil des Ministres, j'ai discuté le cas, j'ai consulté des officiers en loi et en mon âme et conscience j'ai fait mon devoir comme Procureur Général, j'ai fait la seule chose qui s'imposait, si c'était à recommencer je ferais pareil.

D. Monsieur le Premier Ministre, le 8 février 1947, dans le journal La Presse, paraissait un article intitulé: "Roncarelli subit un second refus". Le sous-titre de cet article se lit comme suit: "L'honorable M. Duplessis refuse au restaurateur, protecteur des Témoins de Jéhovah, la permission de poursuivre la Commission des Liqueurs." Vous trouverez, monsieur le Premier Ministre, presque à la fin de ce rapport, les mots suivants:

"C'est moi-même, à titre de Procureur Général, et de responsable de l'ordre dans cette province, qui ai donné l'ordre à la Commission des Liqueurs d'annuler son permis référant à Roncarelli."

Je vous demande, monsieur le Premier Ministre, si c'est un. rapport exact de vos paroles à cette conférence de presse?

R. Ce que j'ai dit lors de la conférence de presse, c'est ce que je viens de déclarer. Je ne connaissais pas Roncarelli, je ne savais pas que Roncarelli avait un permis, ... lorsqu'il a attiré mon attention sur la situation absolument anormale d'un homme bénéficiant d'un privilège de la province, et multipliant les actes de nature à paralyser les tribunaux de la province et la police municipale de Montréal, c'est là que j'ai approuvé sa suggestion et que j'ai dit, comme Procureur général ...

LA COUR:-C'est une autre question que l'on vous pose, Monsieur le Premier Ministre. Voulez-vous relire la question. (La demande précédente est alors relue.)

R. Ce que j'ai dit à la presse, c'est ce que je viens de dire tout à l'heure. L'article tel que produit n'est pas conforme textuellement à ce que j'ai dit. Ce que j'ai dit, ce que je répète, c'est que le Juge Archambault, gérant de la Commission des Liqueurs m'a mis au fait d'une situation que j'ignorais et comme Procureur Général, pour accomplir mon devoir, j'ai dit au Juge Archambault que j'étais de son opinion, que je ne croyais pas que Roncarelli fut digne d'obtenir des privilèges de la province après son attitude que j'ai mentionnée tout à l'heure.

* *

D. Les mots que je viens de vous lire tout à l'heure, c'est censé être textuellement les mots que vous avez donnés, parce que c'est précédé d'une indication d'un rapport textuel:

"Nous n'avons fait qu'exercer en ce faisant un droit formel et incontestable, nous avons rempli un impérieux devoir. Le permis de Roncarelli a été annulé non pas temporairement mais bien pour toujours."

LE TÉMOIN:- Si j'ai dit cela?

L'AVOCAT :- Oui.

R. Oui. Le permis de Roncarelli a été annulé pour ce temps-là et pour toujours. Je l'ai dit et je considérais que c'était mon devoir et en mon âme et conscience j'aurais manqué à mon devoir si je ne l'avais pas fait.

D. Avec ces renseignements additionnels diriez-vous que les mots: "C'est moi-même, à titre de Procureur Général et de responsable de l'ordre dans cette province qui ai donné l'ordre à la Commission des Liqueurs d'annuler son permis." Diriez-vous que c'est exact?

R. J'ai dit tout à l'heure ce qui en était. J'ai eu un téléphone de M. Archambault me mettant au courant de certains faits que j'ignorais au sujet de Roncarelli. Vérification, identification pour voir si c'était bien la même personne, étude, réflexion, consultation et décision d'approuver la suggestion du gérant de la Commission des Liqueurs d'annuler le privilège de Roncarelli.

* * *

LA COUR:

D. M. Stein veut savoir si vous avez donné un ordre à M. Archambault?

R. Non, je n'ai pas donné un ordre à M. Archambault, je viens de conter ce qui s'est passé. Le juge Archambault m'a mis au courant d'un fait que je ne connaissais pas, je ne connaissais pas les faits, c'est lui qui m'a mis au courant des faits. Je ne sais pas comment on peut appeler ça, quand le Procureur Général, qui est à la tête d'un département, parle à un officier, même à un officier supérieur, et qu'il émet une opinion, ce n'est pas directement un ordre, c'en est un sans l'être. Mais c'est à la suggestion du Juge Archambault, après qu'il eut porté à ma connaissance des faits que j'ignorais, que la décision a été prise.

D. Monsieur le Premier Ministre, excusez-moi si je répète encore la question, mais il me semble que vous n'avez pas répondu à la question que j'ai posée. Il paraît, non seulement dans ce journal, mais aussi dans d'autres journaux, et cela est répété exactement dans les même paroles, dans le Montreal Star, en anglais, dans la Gazette, en anglais, dans Le Canada, en français et aussi dans La Patrie, en français, textuellement les mêmes mots: "C'est moi-même, à titre de Procureur Général, chargé d'assurer le respect de l'ordre et le respect des citoyens paisibles qui ai donné à la Commission des Liqueurs, l'ordre d'annuler le permis." Je vous demande si c'est possible que vous ayez employé presque exactement ces mots en discutant l'affaire avec les journalistes, ce jour-là?

R. Lorsque les journalistes viennent au bureau pour avoir des entrevues, des fois les entrevues durent une demi-heure, des fois une heure, des fois une heure et demie; quels sont les termes exacts qui sont employés, on ne peut pas se souvenir exactement des termes. Mais la vérité vraie c'est ce que j'ai dit tout à l'heure, et c'est cela que j'ai dit aux journalistes, comme Premier Ministre et comme Procureur Général, je prends la responsabilité. Si j'avais dit au Juge Archambault: "Vous ne le ferez pas", il ne l'aurait probablement pas fait. Comme il me suggérait de le faire et qu'après réflexion et vérification je trouvais que c'était correct, que c'était conforme à mon devoir, j'ai approuvé et c'est toujours un ordre que l'on donne. Quand l'officier supérieur parle, c'est un ordre que l'on donne, même s'il accepte la suggestion de l'officier dans son département, c'est un ordre qu'il donne indirectement. Je ne me rappelle pas des expressions exactes, mais ce sont les faits.

D. Référant à l'article contenue dans la Gazette du 5 décembre, c'est-à-dire le jour suivant l'annulation du permis, vous trouvez là les mots en anglais :

"In statement to the press yesterday, the Premier recalled that: 'Two weeks ago, I pointed out that the Provincial Government had the firm intention to take the most rigorous and efficient measures possible to get rid of those who under the names of Witnesses of Jehovah, distribute circulars which in my opinion, are not only injurious for Quebec and its population, but which are of a very libellous and seditious character. The propaganda of the Witnesses of Jehovah cannot be tolerated and there are more than 400 of them now before the courts in Montreal, Quebec, Three Rivers and other centers.'

'A certain Mr. Roncarelli has supplied bail for hundreds of witnesses of Jehovah. The sympathy which this man has shown for the Witnesses, in such an evident, repeated and audacious manner, is a provocation to public order, to the administration of justice and is definitely contrary to the aims of justice.'"

D. Je vous demande, monsieur le Premier Ministre, si ce sont les paroles presque exactes ou exactes que vous avez dites à la conférence de presse?

R. Que j'ai dit ici: "A certain Mr. Roncarelli has supplied bail for hundreds of witnesses of Jehovah. The Sympathy which this man has shown for the Witnesses, in such an evident, repeated and audacious manner, is a provocation to public order, to the administration of justice and is definitely contrary to the aims of justice." Je l'ai dit et je con-sidère que c'est vrai.

* *

M. ARCHAMBAULT:

D. Maintenant, ce jour-là où vous avez reçu une lettre, le 30 novembre 1946, avez-vous décidé, ce jour-là, d'enlever la licence?

R. Certainement, ce jour-là, j'avais appelé le Premier Ministre, en l'occurrence le procureur général, lui faisant part des constatations, c'est-à-dire des renseignements que je possédais, et de mon intention d'annuler le privilège, et le Premier Ministre m'a répondu de prendre mes précautions, de bien vérifier s'il s'agissait bien de la même personne, qu'il pouvait y avoir plusieurs Roncarelli, et coetera. 'Alors, quand j'ai eu la confirmation de Y3 à l'effet que c'était la même personne, j'ai rappelé le Premier Ministre pour l'assurer qu'il s'agissait bien de Frank Roncarelli, détenteur d'un permis de la Commission des Liqueurs; et, là, le Premier Ministre m'a autorisé, il m'a donné son consentement, son approbation, sa permission, et son ordre de procéder.

In these circumstances, when the de facto power of the Executive over its appointees at will to such a statutory public function is exercised deliberately and intentionally to destroy the vital business interests of a citizen, is there legal redress by him against the person so acting? This calls for an examination of the statutory provisions governing the issue, renewal and revocation of liquor licences and the scope of authority entrusted by law to the Attorney-General and the government in relation to the administration of the Act.

The liquor law is contained in R.S.Q. 1941, c. 255, entitled An Act Respecting Alcoholic Liquor. A Commission is created as a corporation, the only member of which is the general manager. By s. 5

The exercise of the functions, duties and powers of the Quebec Liquor Commission shall be vested in one person alone, named by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, with the title of Manager. The remuneration of such person shall be determined by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and be paid out of the revenues of the Liquor Commission. R.S. 1925, c. 37, s. 5; 1 Ed. VII (2), c. 14, es. 1 and 5; 1 Geo. VI, c. 22, es. 1 and 5.

The entire staff for carrying out the duties of the Commission are appointed by the general manager-here Mr. Archambault-who fixes salaries and assigns functions, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council reserving the right of approval of the salaries. Besides the general operation of buying and selling liquor throughout the province and doing all things necessary to that end, the Commission is authorized by s. 9 (e) to "grant, refuse or cancel permits for the sale of alcoholic liquors or other permits in regard thereto and to transfer the permit of any person deceased". By s. 12 suits against the general manager for acts done in the exercise of his duties require the authority of the Chief Justice of the province, and the Commission can be sued only with the consent of the Attorney-General. Every officer of the Commission is declared to be a public officer and by R.S.Q. 1941, c. 10, s. 2, holds office during pleasure. By s. 19 the Commission shall pay over to the Provincial Treasurer any moneys which the latter considers available and by s. 20 the Commission is to account to the Provincial Treasurer for its receipts, disbursements, assets and liabilities. Sections 30 and 32 provide for the issue of permits to sell; they are to be granted to individuals only, in their own names; by s. 34 the Commission "may refuse to grant any permit"; subs. (2) provides for permits in special cases of municipalities where prohibition of sale is revoked in whole or part by by-law; subs. (3) restricts or refuses the grant of permits in certain cities the Council of which so requests; but it is provided that ... If the fying of such by-law takes place after the Commission has granted a permit in such city or town, the Commission shall be unable to give effect to the request before the first of May next after the date of fying.

Subsection (4) deals with a refusal to issue permits in small cities unless requested by a by-law, approved by a majority vote of the electors. By subs. (6) special power is given the Commission to grant permits to hotels in summer resorts for five months only notwithstanding that requests under subss. (2) and (4) are not made. Section 35 prescribes the expiration of every permit on April 30 of each year. Dealing with cancellation, the section provides that the "Commission may cancel any permit at its discretion". Besides the loss of the privilege and without the necessity of legal proceedings, cancellation entails loss of fees paid to obtain it and confiscation of the liquor in the possession of the holder and the receptacles containing it. If the cancellation is not followed by prosecution for an offence under the Act, compensation is provided for certain items of the forfeiture. Subsection (5) requires the Commission to cancel any permit made use of on behalf of a person other than the holder; s. 36 requires cancellation in specified cases. The sale of liquor is, by s. 42, forbidden to various persons. Section 148 places upon the Attorney-General the duty of

1 .Assuring the observance of this 'Act and of the 'Alcoholic Liquor Possession and Transportation 'Act (Chap. 256), and investigating, preventing and suppressing the infringements of such acts, in every way authorized thereby;

2. Conducting the suits or prosecutions for infringements of this Act or of the said Alcoholic Liquor Possession and Transportation 'Act. R.S. 1925, c. 37, s. 78a; 24 Geo. V, c. 17, s. 17.

The provisions of the statute, which may be supplemented by detailed regulations, furnish a code for the complete administration of the sale and distribution of alcoholic liquors directed by the Commission as a public service, for all legitimate purposes of the populace. It recognizes the association of wines and liquors as embellishments of food and its ritual and as an interest of the public. As put in Macbeth, the "sauce to meat is ceremony", and so we have restaurants, cafés, hotels and other places of serving food, specifically provided for in that association.

At the same time the issue of permits has a complementary interest in those so catering to the public. The continuance of the permit over the years, as in this case, not only recognizes its virtual necessity [sic] to a superior class restaurant but also its identification with the business carried on. The provisions for assignment of the permit are to this most pertinent and they were exemplified in the continuity of the business here. As its exercise continues, the economic life of the holder becomes progressively more deeply implicated with the privilege while at the same time his vocation becomes correspondingly dependent on it.

The field of licensed occupations and businesses of this nature is steadily becoming of greater concern to citizens generally. It is a matter of vital importance that a public administration that can refuse to allow a person to enter or continue a calling which, in the absence of regulation, would be free and legitimate, should be conducted with complete impartiality and integrity; and that the grounds for refusing or cancelling a permit should unquestionably be such and such only as are incompatible with the purposes envisaged by the statute: the duty of a Commission is to serve those purposes and those only. A decision to deny or cancel such a privilege lies within the "discretion" of the Commission; but that means that decision is to be based upon a weighing of considerations pertinent to the object of the administration.

In public regulation of this sort there is no such thing as absolute and untrammelled "discretion", that is that action can be taken on any ground or for any reason that can be suggested to the mind of the administrator; no legislative Act can, without express language, be taken to contemplate an unlimited arbitrary power exercisable for any purpose, however capricious or irrelevant, regardless of the nature or purpose of the statute. Fraud and corruption in the 'Commission may not be mentioned in such statutes but they are always implied as exceptions. "Discretion" necessarily implies good faith in discharging public duty; there is always a perspective within which a statute is intended to operate; and any clear departure from its lines or objects is just as objectionable as fraud or corruption. Could an applicant be refused a permit because he had been born in another province, or because of the colour of his hair? The ordinary language of the legislature cannot be so distorted.

To deny or revoke a permit because a citizen exercises an unchallengeable right totally irrelevant to the sale of liquor in a restaurant is equally beyond the scope of the discretion conferred. There was here not only revocation of the existing permit but a declaration of a future, definitive disqualification of the appellant to obtain one: it was to be "forever". This purports to divest his citizenship status of its incident of membership in the class of those of the public to whom such a privilege could be extended. Under the statutory language here, that is not competent to the Commission and a fortiori to the government or the respondent: McGillivray v. Kimber^[9]. There is here an administrative tribunal which, in certain respects, is to act in a judicial manner; and even on the view of the dissenting justices in McGillivray, there is liability: what could be more malicious than to punish this licensee for having done what he had an absolute right to do in a matter utterly irrelevant to the Liquor Act? Malice in the proper sense is simply acting for a reason and purpose knowingly foreign to the administration, to which was added here the element of intentional punishment by what was virtually vocation outlawry.

It may be difficult if not impossible in cases generally to demonstrate a breach of this public duty in the illegal purpose served; there may be no means, even if proceedings against the Commission were permitted by the Attorney-General, as here they were refused, of compelling the Commission to justify a refusal or revocation or to give reasons for its action; on these questions I make no observation; but in the case before us that difficulty is not present: the reasons are openly avowed.

The act of the respondent through the instrumentality of the Commission brought about a breach of an implied public statutory duty toward the appellant; it was a gross abuse of legal power expressly intended to punish him for an act wholly irrelevant to the statute, a punishment which inflicted on him, as it was intended to do, the destruction of his economic life as a restaurant keeper within the province. Whatever may be the immunity of the Commission or its member from an action for damages, there is none in the respondent. He was under no duty in relation to the appellant and his act was an intrusion upon the functions of a statutory body. The injury done by him was a, fault engaging liability within the principles of the underlying public law of Quebec: Mostyn v. Fabrigas^[10], and under art. 1053 of the Civil Code. That, in the presence of expanding administrative regulation of economic activities, such a step and its consequences are to be suffered by the victim without recourse or remedy, that an administration according to law is to be superseded by action dictated by and according to the arbitrary likes, dislikes and irrelevant purposes of public officers acting beyond their duty, would signalize the beginning of disintegration of the rule of law as a fundamental postulate of our constitutional structure. An administration of licences on the highest level of fair and impartial treatment to all may be forced to follow the practice of "first come, first served", which makes the strictest observance of equal responsibility to all of even greater importance; at this stage of developing government it would be a danger of high consequence to tolerate such a departure from good faith in executing the legislative purpose. It should be added, however, that that principle is not, by this language, intended to be extended to ordinary governmental employment: with that we are not here concerned.

It was urged by Mr. Beaulieu that the respondent, as the incumbent of an office of state, so long as he was proceeding in "good faith", was free to act in a matter of this kind virtually as he pleased. The office of Attorney-General traditionally and by statute carries duties that relate to advising the Executive, including here, administrative bodies, enforcing the public law and directing the administration of justice. In any decision of the statutory body in this case, he had no part to play beyond giving advice on legal questions arising. In that role his action should have been limited to advice on the validity of a revocation for such a reason or purpose and what that advice should have been does not seem to me to admit of any doubt. To pass from this limited scope of action to that of bringing about a step by the Commission beyond the bounds prescribed by the legislature for its exclusive action converted what was done into his personal act.

"Good faith" in this context, applicable both to the respondent and the general manager, means carrying out the statute according to its intent and for its purpose; it means good faith in acting with a rational appreciation of that intent and purpose and not with an improper intent and for an alien purpose; it does not mean for the purposes of punishing a person for exercising an unchallengeable right; it does not mean arbitrarily and illegally attempting to divest a citizen of an incident of his civil status.

I mention, in order to make clear that it has not been overlooked, the decision of the House of Lords in Allen v. Flood^[11], in which the principle was laid down that an act of an individual otherwise not actionable does not become so because of the motive or reason for doing it, even maliciously to injure, as distinguished from an act done by two or more persons. No contention was made in the present case based on agreed action by the respondent and Mr. Archambault. In Allen v. Flood, the actor was a labour leader and the victims non-union workmen who were lawfully dismissed by their employer to avoid a strike involving no breach of contract or law. Here the act done was in relation to a public administration affecting the rights of a citizen to enjoy a public privilege, and a duty implied by the statute toward the victim was violated. The existing permit was an interest for which the appellant was entitled to protection against any unauthorized interference, and the illegal destruction of which gave rise to a remedy for the damages suffered. In Allen v. Flood there were no such elements.

Nor is it necessary to examine the question whether on the basis of an improper revocation the appellant could have compelled the issue of a new permit or whether the purported revocation was a void act. The revocation was de facto, it was intended to end the privilege and to bring about the consequences that followed. As against the respondent, the appellant was entitled to treat the breach of duty as effecting a revocation and to elect for damages.

Mr. Scott argued further that even if the revocation were within the scope of discretion and not a breach of duty, the intervention of the respondent in so using the Commission was equally a fault. The proposition generalized is this: where, by a statute restricting the ordinary activities of citizens, a privilege is conferred by an administrative body, the continuance of that enjoyment is to be free from the influence of third persons on that body for the purpose only of injuring the privilege holder. It is the application to such a privilege of the proposition urged but rejected in Allen v. Flood in the case of a private employment. The grounds of distinction between the two cases have been pointed out; but for the reasons given consideration of this ground is unnecessary and I express no opinion for or against it.

A subsidiary defence was that notice of action had not been given as required by art. 88 C.C.P. This provides generally that, without such notice, no public officer or person fulfilling any public function or duty is liable in damages "by reason of any act done by him in the exercise of his functions". Was the act here, then, done by the respondent in the course of that exercise? The basis of the claim, as I have found it, is that the act was quite beyond the scope of any function or duty committed to him, so far so that it was one done exclusively in a private capacity, however much in fact the influence of public office and power may have carried over into it. It would be only through an assumption of a general overriding power of executive direction in statutory administrative matters that any colour of propriety in the act could be found. But such an assumption would be in direct conflict with fundamental postulates of our provincial as well as dominion government; and in the actual circumstances there is not a shadow of justification for it in the statutory language.

The damages suffered involved the vocation of the appellant within the province. Any attempt at a precise computation or estimate must assume probabilities in an area of uncertainty and risk. The situation is one which the Court should approach as a jury would, in a view of its broad features; and in the best consideration I can give to them, the damages should be fixed at the sum of $25,000 plus that allowed by the trial court.

I would therefore allow the appeals, set aside the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench and restore the judgment at trial modified by increasing the damages to the sum of $33,123.53. The appellant should have his costs in the Court of Queen's Bench and in this Court.

The judgment of Locke and Martland JJ. was delivered by MARTLAND J.:—This is an appeal from a judgment of the 'Court of Queen's Bench, Appeal Side, for the Province of Quebec^[12], District of Montreal, rendered on April 12, 1956, overruling the judgment of the Superior Court rendered on May 2, 1951, under the terms of which the appellant had been awarded damages in the sum of $8,123.53 and costs.

The appellant had appealed from the judgment of the Superior Court in respect of the amount of damages awarded. This appeal was dismissed.

The facts which give rise to this appeal are as follows:

The appellant, on December 4, 1946, was the owner of a restaurant and café situated at 1429 Crescent Street in the City of Montreal. At that time he was the holder of a liquor permit, no. 68, granted to him on May 1, 1946, pursuant to the provisions of the Alcoholic Liquor Act of the Province of Quebec and which permitted the sale of alcoholic liquors in the restaurant and café. The permit was valid until April 30, 1947, subject to possible cancellation by the Quebec Liquor Commission (hereinafter sometimes referred to as "the Commission") in accordance with the provisions of s. 35 of that Act. The business operated by the appellant had been founded by his father in the year 1912 and it had been continuously licensed until December 4, 1946. The evidence is that prior to that date the appellant had complied with the requirements of the Alcoholic Liquor Act and had conducted a high-class restaurant business.

The appellant was an adherent of the Witnesses of Jehovah. From some time in 1944 until November 12, 1946, he had, on numerous occasions, given security for Witnesses of Jehovah who had been prosecuted under City of Montreal By-laws numbered 270 and 1643 for minor offences of distributing, peddling and canvassing without a licence. The maximum penalty for these offences was a fine of $40 and costs, or imprisonment for 60 days. The total number of bonds furnished by the appellant was 390. These security bonds were accepted by the City attorney and the Recorder of the City of Montreal without remuneration to the appellant. None of the accused who had been bonded ever defaulted. Subsequently the appellant was released from these bonds at his own request and new security was furnished by others.

As a result of a change of procedure in the Recorder's Court in Montreal by the Attorney in Chief of that Court, the appellant was not accepted as a bondsman in any cases before that Court after November 12, 1946.

Up to November 12, 1946, the security bonds furnished by the appellant were accepted without question. These bonds were based upon the value of the appellant's immovable property containing the restaurant. The appellant did not give any security in any criminal case involving a charge of sedition.

About the 24th or 25th of November 1946 the pamphlet "Quebec's Burning Hate" began to be distributed in the Province of Quebec by the Witnesses of Jehovah. The Chief Crown Prosecutor in Montreal, then Mtre. Oscar Gagnon, K.C., decided that the distribution of this pamphlet should be prevented. There is no evidence that the appellant was at any time a distributor of this pamphlet and his restaurant and café in Montreal was not used for the distribution or storage of these pamphlets by himself or by anyone else. The appellant had ceased to be a bonds-man before the distribution of this pamphlet in the Province of Quebec had commenced.

On November 25, 1946, a number of pamphlets was seized in a building in the City of Sherbrooke owned by the appellant and leased from him, as a place of worship, by Witnesses of Jehovah under the control of the local minister Mr. Raymond Browning. There is no evidence that the appellant was in any way responsible for the activities of this congregation, or that he knew that the pamphlet "Quebec's Burning Hate" was in those premises.]

In the course of his inquiries about the distribution of this pamphlet, Mr. Gagnon learned that the appellant had been giving bail in a large number of cases in the Recorder's Court and also that he was the holder of the liquor permit for his restaurant. These facts were brought by Mr. Gagnon to the attention of Mr. Edouard Archambault, then Chair-man of the Quebec Liquor Commission and subsequently Chief Judge of the Court of Sessions of the Peace. Mr. Archambault then interviewed Recorder Paquette, who informed him that the appellant held a licence from the Quebec Liquor Commission; that he was furnishing bail in a large number of cases of infractions of municipal by-laws; that these were so numerous that a great part of the police of Montreal had been taken from their duties as a consequence and that his Court was congested by the large number of cases pending before it.

Subsequent to the receipt of this information, Mr Archambault communicated by telephone with the respondent. The discussion which took place on that occasion and on the occasion of a subsequent telephone call will be reviewed later. Following the two telephone conversations between Mr. Archambault and the respondent, Mr Archambault, as manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission, issued an order for the cancellation of the appellant's permit with-out any prior notice to the appellant. All the liquor in the possession of the appellant on his restaurant premises was seized and was taken into the custody of the Commission.

The appellant carried on his restaurant business without a liquor licence for a period of approximately six months, after which, finding that the business could not be thus operated profitably, he closed it down and later effected a sale of the premises.

The appellant commenced action against the respondent on June 3, 1947, claiming damages in the total sum of $118,741. He alleged that the respondent, without legal or statutory authority, had caused the cancellation of his liquor permit as an act of reprisal because of his having acted as surety or bondsman for the Witnesses of Jehovah in connection with the charges above mentioned. He alleged that the permit had been arbitrarily and unlawfully cancelled and that, as a result, he had sustained the damages claimed.

By his defence the respondent alleged that the Witnesses of Jehovah, in the years 1945 and 1946, had, with the consent and encouragement of the appellant, organized a propaganda campaign in the Province of Quebec, and particularly in the City of Montreal, where they had distributed pamphlets of a seditious character. The respondent referred to the fact that the appellant had acted as surety for a number of persons under arrest and thus permitted them to repeat their offences and to continue their campaign. He alleged that in his capacity as Attorney-General of the Province of Quebec, after becoming cognizant of the conduct of the appellant and of the fact that he held a permit issued by the Quebec Liquor Commission, he had decided, after careful reflection, that it was contrary to public order to permit the appellant to enjoy the benefit of the privileges of this permit and that he, the respondent, had recommended to the manager of the Quebec

Liquor Commission the cancellation of that permit. It was alleged that the permit did not give any right, but constituted a privilege available only during the pleasure of the Commission. He alleged that in the matter he had acted in his quality of Prime Minister and Attorney-General of the Province of Quebec and, accordingly, could not incur any personal responsibility. He further pleaded the provisions of art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure and alleged that he had not received notice of the action as required by the provisions of that article.

The case came on for trial in the Superior Court before MacKinnon J., who made findings of fact and reached conclusions in law as follows:

1. that the respondent gave an order to the manager of the Commission, Mr. Archambault, to cancel the appellant's permit and that it was the respondent's order which was the determining factor in relation to the cancellation of that permit;

2. that the Commission had acted arbitrarily when it cancelled the permit and had disregarded the rules of reason and justice;
3. that the respondent had failed to show that, in law, he had any authority to interfere with the administration of the Commission, or to order it to cancel a permit;
4. that the respondent was not entitled to receive notice of the action pursuant to art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure because his acts which were complained of were not done in the exercise of his functions.

Damages were awarded in the total amount of $8,123.53.

From this judgment the respondent appealed. The appellant cross-appealed in respect of the matter of damages, asking for an award in an increased amount.

The respondent's appeal on the issue of liability was allowed and the appellant's appeal was dismissed. Rinfret J. dissented in respect of the allowance of the respondent's appeal.

Various reasons were given for the allowance of the appeal by the majority of the Court^[13]. They may be summarized as follows:

Bissonnette J. reached the conclusion that, upon the evidence, the decision to cancel the permit had been made by Mr. Archambault before taking the respondent's advice. He also held that, according to the strict interpretation of the Alcoholic Liquor Act, the Commission was not obliged to justify before any Court the wisdom of its acts in cancelling a liquor permit.

Pratte J. allowed the appeal of the respondent on the first ground advanced by Bissonnette J., finding that there was no relationship of cause and effect as between the acts of the respondent and the cancellation of the permit because Mr. Archambault had already made his decision to cancel before consulting with the respondent.

Casey J. was of the same view with respect to this point. He also held that, although the discretion of the Commission to cancel a permit should not be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously, no individual has an inherent right to engage in the business regulated by the Act and the continuance of a permit was conditional upon the holder being of good moral character and a suitable person to exercise that privilege. In his view the chairman of the Commission had reasonable grounds for believing that the Witnesses of Jehovah were engaged in a campaign of libel and sedition and that the appellant, an active member of the sect, was participating in the group's activities. His -view was that, in the light of this, the Commission could properly cancel the permit.

Martineau J., like the other majority judges in the Court, found that there was no relationship of cause and effect as between what the respondent had done and the cancellation of the permit, also holding that Mr. Archambault had decided to cancel it before communicating with the respondent. He was also of the view that a Minister of the Crown is not liable if, in the exercise of powers granted to him by law, he makes an erroneous decision upon reliable information. He also held that, while the Commission's discretion to cancel a permit was not absolute and had to be exercised in good faith, the discretion is not quasi-judicial but "quasi-illimited" and only restricted by the good faith of its officers. He was of the opinion that the good faith of both the respondent and Mr. Archambault could not be doubted. He found that no order to cancel the permit had been given by the respondent to Mr. Archambault. He also held that, even if an order had been given and had been the determining factor in procuring the cancellation of the permit, there would be no liability upon the respondent, in view of the appellant's participation in the propaganda of the Witnesses of Jehovah.

Rinfret J., who dissented and who would have dismissed the respondent's appeal, in general agreed with the conclusions reached by the trial judge.

In view of the foregoing, it appears that there are four main points which require to be considered in the present appeal, which are as follows:

- 1 Was there a relationship of cause and effect as between the respondent's acts and the cancellation of the appellant's permit?

2. If there was such a relationship, were the acts of the respondent justifiable on the ground that he acted in good faith in the exercise of his official functions as Attorney-General and Prime Minister of the Province of Quebec?

3. Was the cancellation of the appellant's permit a lawful act of the Commission, acting within the scope of its powers as defined in the Alcoholic Liquor Act?

4. Was the respondent entitled to the protection provided by art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure?

It is proposed to consider each of these points in the above sequence.

With respect to the first point, after reviewing the evidence, I am satisfied that there was ample evidence to sustain the finding of the trial judge that the cancellation of the appellant's permit was the result of instructions given by the respondent to the manager of the Commission. Two telephone calls were made by Mr. Archambault to the respondent. According to the evidence of the respondent, Mr. Archambault telephoned him in November 1946 "et il m'a dit que Roncarelli qui multipliait les cautionnements à la Cour du Recorder d'une façon désordonnée, contribuant à paralyser les activités de la police et à congestionner les tribunaux, que ce nommé Roncarelli détenait un privilège de la Commission des Liqueurs de Québec."

In reply the respondent says that he said to Mr. Archambault:

C'est une chose très grave, êtes-vous sûr qu'il s'agit de Roncarelli qui a un permis de la Commission des Liqueurs?

Mr. Archambault then replied that he would inform himself and would communicate with the respondent.

Some time after the first telephone conversation, and apparently about November 30 or December 1, 1946, Mr. Archambault again telephoned the respondent to say:

qu'il était certain que le Roncarelli en question, qui paralysait les activités de la Cour du Recorder, qui accaparait dans une large mesure les services de la force constabulaire de Montréal, dont les journaux disaient avec raison qu'elle n'avait pas le nombre suffisant de policiers, était bien la personne qui détenait un permis.

To this the respondent replied:

Dans ces circonstances, je considère que c'est mon devoir, comme Procureur Général et comme Premier Ministre, en conscience, dans l'exercice de mes fonctions officielles et pour remplir le mandat que le peuple m'avait confié et qu'il m'a renouvelé avec une immense majorité en 1948, après la cancellation du permis et après la poursuite intentée contre moi, j'ai cru que c'était mon devoir, en conscience, de dire au Juge que ce permis-là le Gouvernement de Québec ne pouvait pas accorder un privilège à un individu comme Roncarelli qui tenait l'attitude qu'il tenait.

The respondent further says that he told Mr. Archambault :

Vous avez raison, ôtez le permis, ôtez le privilège.

In February 1947 the respondent, in an interview with the press, stated that the appellant's permit had been cancelled on orders from him. His statement on this point appeared in a news dispatch to the Canadian Press from its Quebec correspondent:

It was I, as Attorney-General of the Province charged with the protection of good order, who gave the order to annul Frank Roncarelli's permit.

Mr. Duplessis said:

By so doing, not only have we exercised a right but we have fulfilled an imperious duty. The permit was cancelled not temporarily but definitely and for always.

It seems to me that the only reason Mr. Archambault could have had for telephoning the respondent in the first place, after his receipt of the information given by Mr. Gagnon and Recorder Paquette, was to obtain the respondent's direction as to what should be done. I find it difficult to accept the proposition that there was no relationship of cause and effect as between what the respondent said to Mr. Archambault and the cancellation of the permit. While it is true that in his evidence Mr. Archambault states that he had decided to cancel the permit on the day he received the written report from his secret agent Y3, dated November 30, 1946 (which was subsequent to the first telephone conversation), he goes on to say:

D. Maintenant, ce jour-là où vous avez reçu une lettre, le 30 novembre 1946, avez-vous décidé, ce jour-là, d'enlever la licence?

R. Certainement, ce jour-là, j'avais appelé le Premier Ministre, en l'occurrence le procureur général, lui faisant part des constatations, c'est-à-dire des renseignements que je possédais, et de mon intention d'annuler le privilège, et le Premier Ministre m'a répondu de prendre mes précautions, de bien vérifier s'il s'agissait bien de la même personne, qu'il pouvait - y avoir plusieurs Roncarelli, et coetera. Alors, quand j'ai eu la confirmation de Y3 à l'effet que c'était la même personne, j'ai rappelé le Premier Ministre pour l'assurer qu'il s'agissait bien de Frank Roncarelli, détenteur d'un permis de la Commission des Liqueurs; et, 1à, le Premier Ministre m'a autorisé, il m'a donné son consentement, son approbation, sa permission, et son ordre de procéder.

I conclude from this evidence that any "decision" of Mr. Archambault's was at most tentative and would only be made effective if he received direction from the respondent to carry it out. I would doubt that, if the respondent had advised against the cancellation of the permit, Mr. Archambault's decision would have been implemented.

The respondent appears to have shared this view because in his evidence he states as follows:

Si j'avais dit au Juge Archambault: "Vous ne le ferez pas", il ne l'aurait probablement pas fait. Comme il me suggérait de le faire et qu'après réflexion et vérification je trouvais que c'était correct, que c'était conforme à mon devoir, j'ai approuvé et, c'est toujours un ordre que l'on donne. Quand l'officier supérieur parle, c'est un ordre que l'on donne, même s'il accepte la suggestion de l'officier dans son département, c'est un ordre qu'il donne indirectement. Je ne me rapelle pas des expressions exactes, mais ce sont les faits.

I, therefore, agree with the learned trial judge that the cancellation of the appellant's permit was the result of an order given by the respondent.

The second point for consideration is as to whether the respondent's acts were justifiable as having been done in good faith in the exercise of his official function as Attorney-General and Prime Minister of the Province of Quebec.

In support of his contention that the respondent had so acted, we were referred by his counsel to the following statutory provisions:

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT ACT, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 46

* * *

3. The 'Attorney-General is the official legal adviser of the Lieutenant-Governor, and the legal member of the Executive Council of the Province of Quebec.

4. The duties of the Attorney-General are the following:

1. To see that the administration of public affairs is in accordance with the law;

2. To exercise a general superintendence over all matters connected with the administration of justice in the Province.

5. The function and powers of the Attorney-General are the following:

1. He has the functions and powers which belong to the office of 'Attorney-General of England, respectively, by law or usage, insofar as the, same are applicable to this Province, and also the functions and powers, which, up to the Union, belonged to such offices in the late Province of Canada, and which, under the provisions of the British North 'America Act, 1867, are within the powers of the Government of this Province;

2. He advises the heads of the several departments of the Government of the Province upon all matters of law concerning such departments, or arising in the administration thereof;

* * *

7. He is charged with superintending the administration or the execution, as the case may be, of the laws respecting police.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER ACT, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 7

* * *

5. The Lieutenant-Governor may appoint, under the Great Seal, from among the members of the Executive Council, the following officials, who shall remain in office during pleasure :

1. A Prime Minister who shall, ex-officio, be president of the Council.

THE ALCOHOLIC LIQUOR ACT, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 255

DIVISION XII

INVESTIGATION AND PROSECUTION OF OFFENCES

148. The Attorney-General shall be charged with:

1. Assuring the observance of this act and of the 'Alcoholic Liquor Possession and Transportation Act (Chap. 256), and investigating, preventing and suppressing the infringements of such acts, in every way authorized thereby;

2. Conducting the suits or prosecutions for infringements of this act or of the said Alcoholic Liquor Possession and Transportation Act.

I do not find, in any of these provisions, authority to enable the respondent, either as Attorney-General or Prime Minister, to direct the cancellation of a permit under the Alcoholic Liquor Act. On the contrary, the intent and purpose of that Act appears to be to place the complete control over the liquor traffic in Quebec in the hands of an independent commission. The only function of the Attorney-General under that statute is in relation to the assuring of the observance of its provisions. There is no evidence of any breach of that Act by the appellant.

However, it is further argued on behalf of the respondent that, as Attorney-General, in order to suppress or to prevent crimes and offences, "He may do so by instituting legal proceedings; he may do so by other methods." This amounts to a contention that he is free to use any methods he chooses; that, on suspicion of participation in what he thinks would be an offence, he may sentence a citizen to economic ruin without trial. This seems to me to be a very dangerous proposition and one which is completely alien to the legal concepts applicable to the administration of public office in Quebec, as well as in the other provinces of Canada.

In my view, the respondent was not acting in the exercise of any official powers which he possessed in doing what he did in this matter.

The third point to be considered is as to whether the appellant's permit was lawfully cancelled by the Commission under the provisions of the Alcoholic Liquor Act. Section 35 of that Act makes provision for the cancellation of a permit in the following terms :

35. 1. Whatever be the date of issue of any permit granted by the Commission, such permit shall expire on the 30th of 'April following, unless it be cancelled by the Commission before such date, or unless the date at which it must expire be prior to the 30th of April following.

The Commission may cancel any permit at its discretion.

It is contended by the respondent, and with considerable force, that this provision gives to the Commission an unqualified administrative discretion as to the cancellation of a permit issued pursuant to that Act. Such a discretion, it is contended, is not subject to any review in the Courts.

The appellant contends that the Commission's statutory discretion is not absolute and is subject to legal restraint. He cites the statement of the law by Lord Halsbury in Sharp v. Wakefield^[14]:

An extensive power is confided to the justices in their capacity as justices to be exercised judicially; and "discretion" means when it is said that something is to be done within the discretion of the authorities that that something is to be done according to the rules of reason and justice, not according to private opinion: Rooke's Case; according to law, and not humour. It is to be, not arbitrary, vague, and fanciful, but legal and regular. And it must be exercised within the limit, to which an honest man competent to the discharge of his office ought to confine himself.

That was a case dealing with the discretionary powers of the licensing justices to refuse renewal of a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors. This statement of the law was approved by Lord Greene M.R. in Minister of National Revenue v. Wrights' Canadian Ropes, Limited^[15].

The appellant further contends that, in exercising this discretion, the rules of natural justice must be observed and points out that no notice of the intention of the Commission to cancel his permit was ever given to the appellant, nor was he given a chance to be heard by the Commission before the permit was cancelled.

With respect to this latter point, it would appear to be somewhat doubtful whether the appellant had a right to a personal hearing, in view of the judgment of Lord Radcliffe in Nakkuda Ali v. Jayaratne^[16]. However, regardless of this, it is my view that the discretionary power to cancel a permit given to the Commission by the Alcoholic Liquor Act must be related to the administration and enforcement of that statute. It is not proper to exercise the power of cancellation for reasons which are unrelated to the carrying into effect of the intent and purpose of the Act. The association of the appellant with the Witnesses of Jehovah and his furnishing of bail for members of that sect, which were admitted to be the reasons for the cancellation of his permit and which were entirely lawful, had no relationship to the intent and purposes of the Alcoholic Liquor Act.

Furthermore, it should be borne in mind that the right of cancellation of a permit under that Act is a substantial power conferred upon what the statute contemplated as an independent commission. That power must be exercised solely by that corporation. It must not and cannot be exercised by any one else. The principle involved is stated by the Earl of Selborne in the following passage in his judgment in Spackman v. Plumstead Board of Works^[17]:

No doubt, in the absence of special provisions as to how the person who is to decide is to proceed, the law will imply no more than that the substantial requirements of justice shall not be violated. He is not a judge in the proper sense of the word; but he must give the parties an opportunity of being heard before him and stating their case and their view. He must give notice when he will proceed with the matter, and he must act honestly and impartially and not under the dictation of some other person or persons to whom the authority is not given by law. There must be no malversation of any kind. There would be no decision within the meaning of the statute if there were anything of that sort done contrary to the essence of justice.

While the Earl of Selborne is here discussing the rules applicable to a quasi-judicial tribunal, that portion of his statement which requires such a tribunal to act honestly and impartially and not under the dictation of some other person or persons is, I think, equally applicable to the performance of an administrative function.

The same principle was applied in respect of the performance of an administrative function by Chief Justice Greenshields in Jaillard v. City of Montreal^[18].

In the present case it is my view, for the reasons already given, that the power was not, in fact, exercised by the Commission, but was exercised by the respondent, acting through the manager of the 'Commission. Cancellation of a permit by the Commission at the request or upon the direction of a third party, whoever he may be, is not a proper and valid exercise of the power conferred upon the Commission by s. 35 of the Act. The Commission cannot abdicate its own functions and powers and act upon such direction.

Finally, there is the question as to the giving of notice of the action by the appellant to the respondent pursuant to art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows :

ACTIONS AGAINST PUBLIC OFFICERS

88. No public officer or other person fulfilling any public function or duty can be sued for damages by reason of any act done by him in the exercise of his functions, nor can any verdict or judgment be rendered against him, unless notice of such action has been given him at least one month before the issue of the writ of summons.

Such notice must be in writing; it must state the grounds of the action, and the name of the plaintiff's attorney or agent, and indicate his office; and must be served upon him personally or at his domicile.

The contention of the respondent is that, as Attorney-General, he was a public official whose function was to maintain law and order in the Province; that he acted as he did in the intended exercise of that function and that he is not deprived of the protection afforded by the article because he had exceeded the powers which, in law, he possessed.

The issue is as to whether those acts were "done by him in the exercise of his functions." For the reasons already given in dealing with the second of the four points under discussion, I do not think that it was a function either of the Prime Minister or of the Attorney-General to interfere with the administration of the Commission by causing the cancellation of a liquor permit. That was something entirely outside his legal functions. It involved the exercise of powers which, in law, he did not possess at all.

Is the position altered by the fact that apparently he thought it was his right and duty to act as he did? I do not think that it is. The question of whether or not his acts were done by him in the exercise of his functions is not to be determined on the basis of his own appreciation of those functions, but must be determined according to law. The respondent apparently assumed that he was justified in using any means he thought fit to deal with the situation which confronted him. In my view, when he deliberately elected to use means which were entirely outside his powers and were unlawful, he did not act in the exercise of his functions as a public official.

The principle which should be applied is stated by Lopes J. in Agnew v. Jobson^[19]. That was an action for assault against a justice of the peace who had ordered a medical examination of the person of the plaintiff. There was no legal authority to make such an order, but it was admitted that the defendant bona fide believed that he had the authority to do that which he did. The defendant relied on absence of notice of the action as required by 11 & 12 Vic., c. 44. Section 8 of that Act provided that "no action shall be brought against any justice of the peace for anything done by him in the execution of his office" unless within six calendar months of the act complained of. Section 9, the one relied on by the defendant, provided that "no such action shall be commenced against any such justice" until a month after notice of action. Lopes J.

held that "such justice" in s. 9 referred to a justice in execution of his office in s. 8. He held that s. 9 did not provide a defence to the defendant in these words (p. 68) :

I am of opinion that the defendant Jobson is not entitled to notice of action. There was a total absence of any authority to do the act, and although he acted bona fide, believing he had authority, there was nothing on which to ground the belief, no knowledge of any fact such a belief might be based on.

Similarly here there was nothing on which the respondent could found the belief that he was entitled to deprive the appellant of his liquor permit.

On the issue of liability, I have, for the foregoing reasons, reached the conclusion that the respondent, by acts not justifiable in law, wrongfully caused the cancellation of the appellant's permit and thus cause damage to the appellant. The respondent intentionally inflicted damage upon the appellant and, therefore, in the absence of lawful justification, which I do not find, he is liable to the appellant for the commission of a fault under art. 1053 of the Civil Code.

I now turn to the matter of damages.

The learned trial judge awarded damages to the appellant in the sum of $8,123.53, made up of $1,123.53 for loss of value of liquor seized by the Commission, $6,000 for loss of profits from the restaurant from December 4, 1946, the date of the cancellation of the permit, to May 1, 1947, the date when the permit would normally have expired, and $1,000 for damages to his personal reputation. No objection is taken by the appellant in respect of these awards, but he contends that he is also entitled to compensation under certain other heads of damage in respect of which no award was made by the learned trial judge. These are in respect of damage to the good will and reputation of his business, loss of property rights in his permit and loss of future profits for a period of at least one year from May 1, 1947. Damages in respect of these items were not allowed by the learned trial judge because of the fact that the appellant's permit was "only a temporary asset."

The appellant contends that, although his permit was not permanent, yet, in the light of the long history of his restaurant and the continuous renewals of the permit previously, he had a reasonable expectation of renewal in the future, had not the cancellation been effected in December 1946. He contends that the value of the good will of his business was substantially damaged by that cancellation.

His position on this point is supported by the reasoning of Duff J. (as he then was) in McGillivray v. Kimber^[20]. That was an action claiming damages for the wrongful cancellation of the appellant's pilot's licence by the Sydney Pilotage Authority. At p. 163 he says:

The statement of defence seems to proceed upon the theory that for the purpose of measuring legal responsibility the consequences of this dismissal came to an end with the expiry of the term and that I shall discuss; but for the present it is sufficient to repeat that the dismissal was an act which being not only calculated, but intended to prevent the appellant continuing the exercise of his calling had in fact this intended effect; and the respondents are consequently answerable in damages unless there was in law justification or excuse for what they did. Per Bowen L.J., Mogul S.S. Co. v. McGregor, 23 Q.B.D. 598.

The statement by Bowen L.J. to which he refers appears at p. 613 of the report and is also of significance in relation to the appellant's right of action in this case. It is as follows:

Now, intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does, in fact, damage another in that other person's properly or trade, is actionable if done without just cause or excuse.

The evidence establishes that there was a substantial reduction in the value of the good will of the appellant's restaurant business as a result of what occurred, apart from the matter of any loss which might have resulted on the sale of the physical assets. It is difficult to assess this loss and there is not a great deal of evidence to assist in so doing. The appellant did file, as exhibits, income tax returns for the three years prior to 1946, which showed in those years a total net income from the business of $23,578.88. The profit-making possibilities of the business are certainly an item to be considered in determining the value of the good will.

However, in all the circumstances, the amount of these damages must be determined in a somewhat arbitrary fashion. I consider that $25,000 should be allowed as damages for the diminution of the value of the good will and for the loss of future profits.

I would allow both appeals, with costs here and below, and order the respondent to pay to the appellant damages in the total amount of $33,123.53, with interest from the date of the judgment in the Superior Court, and costs.

CARTWRIGHT J. (dissenting) :-This appeal is from two judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench (Appeal Side) for the Province of Quebec^[21], of which the first allowed an appeal from a judgment of MacKinnon J. and dismissed the appellant's action, and the second dismissed a cross-appeal asking that the damages awarded by the learned trial judge be increased.

The respondent is, and was at all relevant times, the Prime Minister and Attorney-General of the Province of Quebec.

The appellant on December 4, 1946, was the owner of an immovable property, known as 1429 Crescent Street in the City of Montreal, where he had for many years successfully carried on the business of a restaurant and cafe. He was the holder of liquor permit no. 68 granted to him on May 1, 1946, for the sale of alcoholic liquors in his restaurant and cafe pursuant to the provisions of the Alcoholic Liquor Act, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 255, hereinafter referred to as "the Act". This permit would normally have expired on April 30, 1947. The business carried on by the appellant had been founded by his father in 1912 and had been licensed uninterruptedly from that time until 1946. Prior to December 4, 1946, the appellant had complied with all the requirements of the Act and had carried on his restaurant business in conformity with the laws of the Province.

The appellant was at all relevant times a member of a sect known as "The Witnesses of Jehovah" and from some time in 1944 up to November 12, 1946, had on about 390 occasions, acted as bailsmen for numbers of his co-religionists prosecuted under by-laws of the City of Montreal for distributing literature without a licence. None of those for whom he acted as bailsmen defaulted in appearance, and all of them were ultimately discharged upon the by-laws under which they were charged being held to be invalid.

About the 24th or 25th of November 1946 members of the sect commenced distributing copies of ,a circular entitled "Quebec's burning hate for God and 'Christ and Freedom is the shame of all Canada". Copies of this circular are printed in the record, the English version being exhibit D7 and the French version exhibit D11. The then senior Crown Prosecutor in Montreal, Mtre Oscar Gagnon, formed the opinion that the circular was a seditious libel and that its distribution should be prevented. It results from the judgment of this Court in Boucher v. The King^[22] that the learned Crown Prosecutor was in error in forming the opinion that the circular could be regarded as seditious. It, however, can hardly be denied that it was couched in terms which would outrage the feelings of the great majority of the inhabitants of the Province of Quebec; and the same may be said of a number of other documents circulated by the sect, copies of which form part of the record in the case at bar.

The evidence does not show that the appellant took part in the distribution of any of the circulars mentioned or that he was a leader or chief of the sect. He did not act as bailman for any member of the sect charged in connection with the distribution of the circular, "Quebec's burning hate".

On November 25, 1946, pamphlets, including copies of "Quebec's burning hate" were seized in a building in the City of Sherbrooke owned by the appellant and leased by him to a congregation of Witnesses of Jehovah as a "Kingdom Hall" or place of worship. The appellant was not aware that the pamphlets were in this building.

From his investigations and the reports which he received M. Gagnon concluded that the distribution of the pamphlets "convergeait autour de M. Roncarelli ou de personnes qui étaient près de lui" and he so informed M. Edouard Archambault, the manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission. It may well be that M. Gagnon reached the conclusion mentioned on insufficient evidence. M. Gagnon also informed M. Archambault that the appellant had acted as bailman for a great number of Witnesses of Jehovah.

On receiving this information from M. Gagnon, M. Archambault read the circular, "Quebec's burning hate" and had a conversation with M. Paquette, the Recorder-in-Chief at Montreal, who confirmed the statements as to the appellant furnishing bail.

At this point M. Archambault formed the opinion that he should cancel the permit held by the appellant, but before taking any action he telephoned the respondent at Quebec, told him what information he had received and that he proposed cancelling the permit. The respondent told him to be careful to make sure that the Roncarelli who had furnished bail was in fact the appellant. M. Archambault satisfied himself as to this through the report of an agent "Y3", in whom he had confidence, and thereupon, according to his uncontradicted evidence, decided to cancel the permit. The reasons which brought him to this decision were stated by him as follows:

D. Alors, à ce moment-là, vous aviez déjà décidé d'enlever cette licence?

R. Oui.

D. Vous basant, je suppose, sur les rapports que vous aviez déjà reçus de monsieur Oscar Gagnon et du recorder-en-chef Paquette que monsieur Roncarelli avait fourni des cautionnements?

R. Oui; et, à part de cela, de la littérature que j'avais lue.

D. Et le pamphlet auquel vous avez référé: "Quebec's Burning Hate"?

R. Oui, monsieur.

M. Archambault then telephoned the respondent. The substance of the two telephone conversations between M. Archambault and the respondent is summarized by the former as follows:

D. Maintenant, ce jour-là où vous avez reçu une lettre, le 30 novembre 1946, avez-vous décidé, ce jour-là, d'enlever la licence?

R. Certainement, ce jour-là, j'avais appelé le Premier Ministre, en l'occurrence le procureur général, lui faisant part des constatations, c'est-à-dire des renseignements que je possédais, et de mon intention d'annuler le privilège, et le Premier Ministre m'a répondu de prendre mes précautions, de bien vérifier s'il s'agissait bien de la même personne, qu'il pouvait y avoir plusieurs Roncarelli, et coetera. Alors, quand j'ai eu la confirmation de Y3 à l'effet que c'était la même personne, j'ai rappelé le Premier Ministre pour l'assurer qu'il s'agissait bien de Frank Roncarelli, détenteur d'un permis de la Commission des Liqueurs; et, là le Premier Ministre m'a autorisé, il m'a donné son consentement, son approbation, sa permission, et son ordre de procéder.

The evidence of the respondent is also that the suggestion of cancelling the permit was made by M. Archambault, and there is no evidence to the contrary.

There has been a difference of opinion in the Courts below as to whether what was said by the respondent to M. Archambault amounted to an order to cancel or merely to an "approbation énergique" of a decision already made. I do not find it necessary to choose between these conflicting views as I propose to assume for the purposes of this appeal that what was said by the respondent was so far a determining factor in the cancellation of the permit as to render him liable for the damages caused thereby to the appellant if the cancellation was an actionable wrong giving rise to a right of action for damages.

All of the Judges in the Courts below who have dealt with that aspect of the matter have concluded that the respondent acted throughout in the honest belief that he was fulfilling his duty to the Province, and this conclusion is supported by the evidence.

The opinion of M. Archambault and of the respondent appears to have been that a permit to sell liquor under the Act is a privilege in the gift of the Province which ought not to be given to, or allowed to continue to be enjoyed by, one who was actively supporting members of a group of persons who were engaged in a concerted campaign to vilify the Province and were persistently acting in contravention of existing by-laws. Once it is found, as I think it must be on the evidence, that this opinion was honestly entertained, I have reached the conclusion, for reasons that will appear, that the Court cannot inquire as to whether there was sufficient evidence to warrant its formation or as to whether it constituted a reasonable ground for cancellation of the permit.

The permit was cancelled on December 4, 1946, with-out any prior notice to the appellant and without his being given any opportunity to show cause why it ought not to be cancelled. It is clear that the appellant suffered substantial financial loss as a result of the cancellation.

In determining whether the cancellation of the permit in these circumstances was an actionable wrong on the part of the commission or of M. Archambault, its manager, it is necessary to consider the relevant provisions of the Act. These appear to me to be as follows:

S.5 A Commission is by this act created under the name of "The Quebec Liquor Commission", or "Commission des liqueurs de Québec", and shall constitute a corporation, vested with all the rights and powers belonging generally to corporations.

The exercise of the functions, duties and powers of the Quebec Liquor Commission shall be vested in one person alone, named by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, with the title of manager. The remuneration of such person shall be determined by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and be paid out of the revenues of the Liquor Commission.

* * *

S.9 The function, duties and powers of the Commission shall be the following:

* * *

To control the possession, sale and delivery of alcoholic liquor in accordance with the provisions of this act;

To grant, refuse, or cancel permits for the sale of alcoholic liquor or other permits in regard thereto, and to transfer the permit of any person deceased;

* * *

S.32 No permit shall be granted other than to an individual, and in his personal name.

The application for a permit may be made only by a British subject, must be signed by the applicant before witnesses, and must give his surname, Christian names, age, occupation, nationality and domicile, the kind of permit required and the place where it will be used, and must be accompanied by the amount of the duties payable upon the application for the permit. The applicant must furnish all additional information which the Commission may deem expedient to ask for.

If the permit is to be used for the benefit of a partnership or corporation, the application therefore must likewise be accompanied by a declaration to that effect, and duly signed by such partnership or corporation. In such case, the partnership or corporation shall be responsible for any fine and costs, to which the holder of the permit may be condemned; and the amount thereof may be recovered before any court having jurisdiction, without prejudice to imprisonment, if any.

'All applications for permits must be addressed to the Commission before the 10th of January in each year, to take effect on the 1st of May in the same year.

* * *

S.34 1. The Commission may refuse to grant any permit.

2. The Commission must refuse to grant any permit for the sale of alcoholic liquor in any municipality where a prohibition by-law is in force.

'Subsections 2 to. 6 of s. 34 enumerate special cases in which the 'Commission must refuse a permit.

S.35 1. Whatever be the date of issue of any permit granted by the Commission, such permit shall expire on the 30th day of April following, unless it be cancelled by the Commission before such date, or unless the date at which it must expire be prior to the 30th of April following.

The Commission may cancel any permit at its discretion.

2. Saving the provisions of subsection 4 of this section, the cancellation of a permit shall entail the loss of the privilege conferred by such permit, and of the duties paid to obtain it, and the seizure and confiscation by the Commission of the alcoholic liquor found in the possession of the holder thereof, and the receptacles containing it, without any judicial proceedings being required for such confiscation.

The cancellation of a permit shall be served by a bailiff leaving a duplicate of such order of cancellation, signed by three members of the Commission, with the holder of such permit or with any other reasonable person at his domicile or place of business.

The cancellation shall take effect as soon as the order is served.

* * *

S.35 4. If the cancellation of the permit be not preceded or followed by a conviction for any offence under this act committed by the holder of such permit while it was in force, the Commission shall remit to such holder.

Such part of the duties which such person has paid upon the granting of such permit, proportionate to the number of full calendar months still to run up to the 1st of May following;

The proceeds of every sale by the Commission, after the seizure and confiscation thereof, of beer having an alcoholic content of not more than four per cent, in weight, less ten per cent of such proceeds;

The value, as determined by the Commission, of the other alcoholic liquor seized and confiscated, less ten per cent of such value.

5. Save in the case where a permit is granted to an individual on behalf of a partnership or corporation, in accordance with section 32, the Commission must cancel every permit made use of on behalf of any person other than the holder.

S.36 The Commission must cancel a permit:

Upon the production of a final condemnation, rendered against the permit-holder, his agent or employee, for selling, in the establishment, alcoholic liquor manufactured illegally or purchased in violation of this act;

Upon the production of three final condemnations rendered against the permit-holder for violation of this act;

If it appears that the permit-holder has, without the Commission's authorization, transferred, sold, pledged, or otherwise alienated the rights conferred by the permit.

On a consideration of these sections and of the remainder of the Act I am unable to find that the Legislature has, either expressly or by necessary implication, laid down any rules to guide the commission as to the circumstances under which it may refuse to grant a permit or may cancel a permit already granted. In my opinion the intention of the legislature, to be gathered from the whole Act, was to enumerate (i) certain cases in which the granting of a permit is forbidden, and (ii) certain cases in which the cancellation of a permit is mandatory, and, in all other cases to commit the decision as to whether a permit should be granted, refused or cancelled to the unfettered discretion of the commission. I conclude that the function of the commission in making that decision is administrative and not judicial or quasi-judicial. The submission of counsel for the respondent, made in the following words, appears to me to be well founded:

Under the Statute, no one has a pre-existing right to obtain a permit, and the permit being granted under the condition that it may be cancelled at any time, and no cause of cancellation being mentioned and no form of procedure being indicated, the cancellation is a discretionary decision of a purely administrative character.

I accept as an accurate statement of the distinction between a judicial and an administrative tribunal that adopted by Masten J.A. in giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario in *re Ashby et al*¹[\[23\]](#)

The distinction between a judicial tribunal and an administrative tribunal has been well pointed out by a learned writer in 49 Law Quarterly Review at pp. 106, 107 and 108:

"A tribunal that dispenses justice, i.e. every judicial tribunal, is concerned with legal rights and liabilities, which means rights and liabilities conferred or imposed by 'law'; and 'law' means statute or long-settled principles. These legal rights and liabilities are treated by a judicial tribunal as pre-existing; such a tribunal professes merely to ascertain and give effect to them; it investigates the facts by hearing 'evidence' (as tested by long-settled rules), and it investigates the law by consulting precedents. Rights or liabilities so ascertained cannot, in theory, be refused recognition and enforcement, and no judicial tribunal claims the power of refusal.

In contrast, non-judicial tribunals of the type called 'administrative' have invariably based their decisions and orders, not on legal rights and liabilities, but on policy and expediency.

Leeds (Corp.) v. Ryder (1907) 'A.C. 420, at 423, 424, per Lord Lore-burn L.C.; Shell Co. of Australia v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1931) 'A.C. 275, at 295; Boulter v. Kent JJ., (1897) 'A.C. 556, at 564.

'A judicial tribunal looks for some law to guide it; an 'administrative' tribunal, within its province, is a law unto itself.'

In re Ashby the Court found that the statute there under consideration set up certain fixed standards and prescribed conditions on which persons might have their certificates revoked by the board, and accordingly held its function to be quasi-judicial; in the case at bar, on the contrary, no standards or conditions are indicated and I am forced to conclude that the Legislature intended the commission "to be a law unto itself".

If I am right in the view that in cancelling the permit M. Archambault was performing an administrative act in the exercise of an unfettered discretion given to him by the statute it would seem to follow that he was not bound to give the appellant an opportunity to be heard before deciding to cancel and that the Court cannot be called upon to determine whether there existed sufficient grounds for his decision. If authority is needed for this conclusion it may be found in the judgment of the Judicial Committee, delivered by Lord Radcliffe, in Nakkuda Ali v. M. P. De S. Jayaratne[\[24\]](#) and in the reasons of my brother Martland in Calgary Power Limited et al v. Copithorne[\[25\]](#). The wisdom and desirability of conferring such a power upon an official without specifying the grounds upon which it is to be exercised are matters for the consideration of the Legislature not of the Court.

If, contrary to my conclusion, the function of the commission was quasi-judicial, it may well be that its decision to cancel the permit would be set aside by the Court for failure to observe the rules as to how such tribunals must proceed which are laid down in many authorities and are compendiously stated in the following passage in the judgment of the Earl of Selborne in Spackman v. Plumstead Board of Works[\[26\]](#):

No doubt, in the absence of special provisions as to how the person who is to decide is to proceed, the law will imply no more than that the substantial requirements of justice shall not be violated. He is not a judge in the proper sense of the word; but he must give the parties an opportunity of being heard before him and stating their case and their view. He must give notice when he will proceed with the matter, and he must act honestly and impartially and not under the dictation of some other person or persons to whom the authority is not given by law. There must be no malversation of any kind. There would be no decision within the meaning of the statute if there were anything of that sort done contrary to the essence of justice.

But even if it were assumed that the function of the commission was quasi-judicial and that its order cancelling the permit should be set aside for failure to observe the rules summarized in the passage quoted, I would be far from satisfied that any action for damages would lie.

If that question arose for decision it would be necessary to consider the judgments delivered in this Court in McGillivray v. Kimber[\[27\]](#), the cases cited in Halsbury, 2nd ed.,

vol. 26, pp. 284 and 285,, in support of the following statement:

Persons exercising such quasi-judicial powers ... in the absence of fraud, collusion, or malice, are not liable to any civil action at the suit of any person aggrieved by their decisions ...

and the judgment of Wilmot C.J., concurred in by Gould J. and Blackstone J., in Bassett v. Godschall[\[28\]](#):

The legislature hath intrusted the justices of peace with a discretionary power to grant or refuse licences for keeping inns and alehouses; if they abuse that power, or misbehave themselves in the execution of their office or authority, they are answerable criminally, by way of information, in B.R. I cannot think a justice of peace is answerable in an action to every individual who asks him for a licence to keep an inn or an alehouse, and he refuses to grant one; if he were so, there would be an end of the commission of the peace, for no man would act therein. Indeed he is answerable to the public if he misbehaves himself, and wilfully, knowingly and maliciously injures or oppresses the King's subjects, under colour of his office, and contrary to law: but he cannot be answerable to every individual, touching the matter in question, in an action. Every plaintiff in an action must have an antecedent right to bring it; the plaintiff here has no right to have a licence, unless the justices think proper to grant it, therefore he can have no right of action against the justices for refusing it.

For the above reasons I have reached the conclusion that the heavy financial loss undoubtedly suffered by the appellant was damnum sine injuria. The whole loss flowed directly from the cancellation of the permit which was an act of the commission authorized by law. I have formed this opinion entirely apart from any special statutory protection afforded to the commission or to its, manager M. Archambault, as, for example, by s. 12 of the Act.

The case of James v. Cowan[\[29\]](#), relied upon by counsel for the appellant as supporting the existence of a right of action for damages seems to me to be clearly distinguishable. In that case the right of action asserted was for damages for the wrongful taking of the plaintiff's goods. The only justification put forward was an order held to be ultra vires and therefore void. It may be mentioned in passing that if, contrary to my view, the decision of the commission in the case at bar was made in the exercise of a judicial function, its failure to follow a rule of natural justice would appear to render the order voidable but not void; Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal Proprietors[\[30\]](#).

Having concluded that the act of the commission in cancelling the permit was not an actionable wrong, it appears to me to follow that the respondent cannot be answerable in damages for directing or approving, as the case may be, the doing of that act.

As it was put by Bissonnette J.[\[31\]](#):

D'où il découle, en saine logique, que si dans l'exercice de son pouvoir discrétionnaire, il (M. 'Archambault) ne commettait ni faute, ni illégalité, personne n'est justifié à chercher à atteindre, au delà, de sa personne, un conseiller, voire un chef ou supérieur politique, pour le motif que sans la faute du premier, celle qu'on veut imputer au second ne peut exister.

On this branch of the matter, I should perhaps mention that there is, in the record, no room for any suggestion that the respondent coerced an unwilling Commission into making a decision contrary to the view of the latter as to what that decision should be.

For the above reasons it is my opinion that the appeal fails and it becomes unnecessary for me to consider the alternative defence as to lack of notice of action, based upon art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure or the question of the quantum of damages.

The appeal, as to both of the judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench, should be dismissed with costs.

FAUTEUX J. (dissenting) :-L'appelant se pourvoit à l'en-contre de deux décisions majoritaires de la Cour du banc de la reine^[32], dont la première infirme un jugement de la Cour supérieure condamnant l'intimé à lui payer une somme de $8,123.53 à titre de dommages-intérêts, et dont la seconde rejette l'appel logé par lui-même pour faire augmenter le quantum des dommages ainsi accordés.

Les faits donnant lieu à ce litige se situent dans le cadre des activités poursuivies dans la province de Québec, au cours particulièrement des années 1944, 1945 et 1946, par la secte des Témoins de Jéhovah. Ces activités prenaient forme d'assemblées, de distribution de circulaires, de pamphlets et de livres, et de sollicitation, dans les rues et à domicile. Dirigée ouvertement contre les pratiques des religions professées dans la province et, plus particulière-ment, de la religion catholique, les enseignements de cette secte étaient diffusés dans un langage manifestement, sinon délibérément, insultant et, par suite, provoquèrent dans les cités et les villages où ils étaient propagés, des troubles à la paix publique. Il y eut bris d'assemblées, assauts de personnes et dommages à la propriété. De plus, et partageant l'opinion généralement acceptée que cette campagne provocatrice était l'oeuvre de la licence et non de la liberté sous la loi, plusieurs autorités civiles refusaient d'accorder la protection recherchée par les membres de la secte ou adoptaient des moyens pour paralyser ces activités considérées comme une menace à la paix publique. L'intimé, comme Procureur Général, eut en son ministère, où des plaintes nombreuses affluèrent, tous les échos de cette situation. Devant les tribunaux, actions ou poursuites se multiplièrent. A Montréal, les arrestations pour distribution de littérature, sans permis, atteignirent et dépassèrent plusieurs centaines. Devant la Cour du Recorder, où furent traduits ceux qu'on accusait de violer le règlement municipal, on plaidait l'invalidité ou l'inapplication du règle-ment et attendant le prononcé d'un tribunal supérieur sur le bien-fondé de ces prétentions, on ajournait les causes. C'était l'appelant, l'un des membres de la secte, qui, dans la plupart de ces arrestations, à Montréal, fournissait le cautionnement garantissant la comparution des accusés. Une entente était même intervenue entre lui et les avocats chargés des poursuites, suivant laquelle on le considérait en quelque sorte comme la caution officielle des membres de la secte. L'appelant continua d'agir comme caution jusqu'au 12 novembre 1946 alors que les autorités de la Cour du Recorder, s'inquiétant de la congestion du rôle des causes résultant de la progressive multiplication des arrestations, aussi bien que du fait que le temps de nombre de constables était absorbé par ces enquêtes et ces poursuites, au préjudice de leurs autres devoirs, tentèrent de décourager les activités de la secte en exigeant des cautionnements en argent et plus substantiels, soit de $100 à $300.

Deux semaines après cette décision, apparut dans la province une nouvelle publication de la secte, intitulée: "La haine ardente du Québec pour Dieu, le Christ et la liberté." Ce livre, publié en français, en anglais et en ukrainien, étant, dans les termes les plus provocateurs, une attaque dirigée particulièrement contre les pratiques religieuses de la majorité de la population et contre l'administration de la justice dans la province, fut soumis par la police à la considération de l'avocat en chef de la Couronne, A. Mont réal, Me Gagnon, c.r., lequel émit l'opinion que cette publication constituait, au sens de la loi criminelle, un libelle séditieux.

Ajoutons immédiatement que le mérite de cette opinion fut par la suite judiciairement considéré avec le résultat qui suit. Un certain Aimé Boucher, distributeur de ce livre dans le district judiciaire de St-Joseph de Beauce, fut accusé sous les articles 133, 134 et 318 du Code Criminel et fut trouvé coupable par un jury dont le verdict fut confirmé par une décision majoritaire de la Cour du banc du roi en appel[33]. Sur un pourvoi subséquent devant cinq des membres de cette Cour, une majorité, trouvant justifiés les griefs fondés sur l'adresse du juge au procès, mais étant d'opinion qu'il était loisible à un jury légalement dirigé de juger cette publication séditeuse, ordonna un nouveau procès. Sur une seconde audition du même appel, -cette fois devant les neuf Juges de cette Cour[34]- ces vues furent partagées par quatre des membres de cette Cour. Les cinq autres, d'autre part, acquittèrent l'accusé, en déclarant en substance, suivant le sommaire fidèle du jugé, qu'en droit:

Neither language calculated to promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of His Majesty's subjects nor criticizing the courts is seditious unless there is the intention to incite to violence or resistance to or defiance of constituted authority.

En somme, la majorité écarta, comme étant la loi en la matière, la définition de l'intention séditionnelle, donnée à la page 94 de la 8^e édition de Stephen's Digest of Criminal Law, dans la mesure où cette définition différait de la loi telle que précisée au sommaire ci-dessus. Boucher v. His Majesty the King^[35]. Ainsi appert-il que l'opinion émise par le représentant du Procureur Général à Montréal lors de l'apparition de ce livre en fin de 1946, fut par la suite partagée par une majorité de tous les juges qui eurent à considérer la question mais rejetée par ce qui constitue, depuis 1951, le jugement de cette Cour sur la question.

Ayant donc formé l'opinion que cette publication constituait un libelle séditionnel, M^o Gagnon participa à l'enquête faite pour en rechercher les distributeurs et les traduire en justice. Vers le même temps, la police saisissait en la cité de Sherbrooke, un nombre considérable de pamphlets, livres, y compris le livre en question, dans un établissement appartenant à l'appelant et par lui loué aux membres de la secte. Un examen de la situation et du rôle joué par l'appelant dans les procédures mues devant la Cour du Recorder à Montréal, amena M^o Gagnon à conclure à sa participation dans la distribution. Apprenant, en la même occasion, que ce dernier était propriétaire d'un restaurant et détenteur de permis de la Commission des Liqueurs pour y vendre des spiritueux, il communiqua les faits ci-dessus à M. Archambault, alors gérant général de la Commission des Liqueurs. Après avoir conféré avec le recorder en chef de la cité de Montréal et M^o Gagnon, M. Archambault téléphona au Procureur Général pour lui faire part de ces agissements des membres de la secte, et de l'appelant en particulier, et de son intention d'annuler le permis en faveur de l'appelant. L'intimé demanda à M. Archambault de bien s'assurer que le détenteur du permis était bien la même personne qui, au dire de M. Archambault, "multipliait les cautionnements à la Cour du Recorder de façon désordonnée, contribuait à désorganiser les activités de la police et à congestionner les tribunaux". Et l'intimé ajouta: -"Dans l'intervalle, je vais examiner les questions avec des officiers légaux, je vais y penser, je vais réfléchir et je vais voir à ce que je devrai faire." M. Archambault vérifia l'identité de l'appelant et, de son côté, le Procureur Général étudia le problème, la Loi de la Commission des Liqueurs et ses amendements, discuta de la question au Conseil des Ministres et avec des officiers en loi de son ministère. Quelques jours plus tard, M. Archambault téléphona au Procureur Général confirmant l'identité du détenteur de permis et, témoigne M. Archambault, "là, le Premier Ministre m'a autorisé, il m'a donné son consentement, son approbation, sa permission et son ordre de procéder".

A la suite de cette conversation téléphonique, le permis fut annulé et tous les spiritueux du restaurant furent confisqués. En raison de la perte d'opérations résultant de l'absence de permis, l'appelant, quelques mois plus tard, vendait ce restaurant, licencié pour vente de spiritueux depuis nombre d'années et exploité par son père, d'abord, et lui, par la suite. C'est alors que l'appelant institua la pré-sente action en dommages contre l'intimé personnellement, invoquant en substance que, dans les circonstances, le fait de cette annulation constituait, suivant les dispositions de l'art. 1053 du Code Civil, un fait dommageable, illicite et imputable à l'intimé et, dès lors, donnant droit à réparation.

En défense, et en outre des moyens plaidés sur le mérite de l'action, l'intimé invoqua spécifiquement le défaut de l'appelant de s'être conformé aux prescriptions de l'art. 88 du Code de procédure civile, lequel conditionne impérativement l'exercice du droit d'action contre un officier public à la signification d'un avis d'au moins un mois avant l'émission de l'assignation.

Après considération attentive de la question et pour les motifs donnés ci-après, je suis arrivé à la conclusion que ce moyen est bien fondé. Il convient de dire, cependant, que n'eût été ce défaut de l'appelant, j'aurais, au mérite, conclu au bien-fondé de son action et ce, pour des raisons qu'il suffit, dans les circonstances, de résumer comme suit. Personne ne met en doute que le fait invoqué au soutien de l'action en dommages, c'est-à-dire l'annulation du permis, ait constitué un fait dommageable pour l'appelant. De plus, et suivant la preuve au dossier, il est manifeste que ce fait est imputable, et exclusivement imputable, à l'intimé. Sans doute, lorsque le gérant général de la Commission des Liqueurs téléphona au Procureur Général pour le mettre au courant des faits ci-dessus, il lui indiqua au même temps son intention d'annuler le permis. Il y a loin, cependant, de l'indication d'une intention à la réalisation de cette intention; et à la vérité, dès cette première conversation télé-phonique, c'est le Procureur Général qui prit l'entière responsabilité. Tel que déjà indiqué, il demanda à M. Archambault de vérifier l'identité de personne, l'avisant que, pendant ce temps-là, il étudierait le problème et verrait ce que lui devait faire. C'est d'ailleurs précisément pour décider de l'action à prendre qu'il examina la loi et discuta de l'affaire au 'Conseil des Ministres et avec ses officiers en loi. Lorsque, subséquemment, M. Archambault le rappela pour lui affirmer qu'il s'agissait de la même personne, "c'est là", dit le gérant général, que le Procureur Général "m'a autorisé, il m'a donné son consentement, son approbation, sa permission et son ordre de procéder". Le Juge de la Cour supérieure et tous les Juges de la Cour d'Appel n'ont jeté, et je crois avec raison, aucun doute sur la bonne foi du Procureur Général, pas plus qu'on n'en saurait avoir sur celle du gérant général de la Commission des Liqueurs. Ni l'un ni l'autre n'ont agi malicieusement. Mais, en témoignant que l'intimé l'avait autorisé, lui avait donné son consentement, son approbation, sa permission et son ordre de procéder, le gérant général de la 'Commission a bien indiqué, à mon avis, que, dans un esprit de subordination, il avait, dès la première conversation téléphonique, abdiqué, en faveur du Procureur Général s'en chargeant, le droit d'exercer la discrétion, qu'à l'exclusion de tous autres, il avait suivant l'esprit de la Loi des Liqueurs Alcooliques. Il a exécuté, mais non rendu, une décision arrêtée par le Procureur Général. D'ailleurs, ce dernier ne s'en est pas caché; il s'en est ouvert au public par la voix des journaux. En prenant lui-même cette décision, comme Premier Ministre et Procureur Général, il s'est arrogé un droit que lui nie virtuellement la Loi des Liqueurs Alcooliques; il a commis une illégalité. Dans l'espèce, l'annulation du permis est exclusivement imputable à l'intimé et précisément pour cette raison, constitue, dans les circonstances, un acte illicite donnant droit à l'appelant d'obtenir réparation pour les dommages lui en résultant.

L'article 88 du Code de procédure civile.-Cet article se lit comme suit :

Nul officier public ou personne remplissant des fonctions ou devoirs publics ne peut être poursuivi pour dommages à raison d'un acte par lui fait dans l'exercice de ses fonctions, et nul verdict ou jugement ne peut être rendu contre lui, à moins qu'avis de cette poursuite ne lui ait été donné au moins un mois avant l'émission de l'assignation.

Cet avis doit être par écrit; il doit exposer les causes de l'action, contenir l'indication des noms et de l'étude du procureur du demandeur ou de son agent et être signifié au défendeur personnellement ou à son domicile.

Vu la forme prohibitive de la disposition et la règle de droit édictée en l'art. 14 du Code Civil, le défaut de donner cet avis, lorsqu'il y a lieu de ce faire, emporte nullité. Cette règle de droit est ainsi exprimée :

14. Les lois prohibitives emportent nullité, quoiqu'elle n'y soit pas prononcée.

De plus, et en raison de la prescription que "...nul verdict ou jugement ne peut être rendu ...", ce défaut limite la juridiction même du tribunal. Aussi bien, non seulement, comme il a été reconnu au jugement de première instance, ce défaut peut-il être soulevé dans les plaidoiries, mais la Cour elle-même doit agir proprio motu et se conformer à la prescription.

En l'espèce, il est admis qu'aucun avis ne fut donné au Procureur Général. L'intimé a plaidé spécifiquement ce moyen dans sa défense et il l'a invoqué tant en Cour supérieure et en Cour d'Appel que devant cette Cour. Le juge au procès en disposa dans les termes suivants, dont les soulignés sont siens :

Defendant is not entitled to avail himself of this exceptional provision as the acts complained of were not "done by him in the exercise of his functions", but they were acts performed by him when he had gone outside his functions to perform them. They were not acts "in the exercise of" but "on the occasion of public duties". Defendant was outside his functions in the acts complained of.

En Cour d'Appel[36], seul le Juge dissident, M. le Juge Rinfret, se prononce sur la question. S'inspirant, je crois, de l'interprétation donnée par la jurisprudence à l'expression "dans l'exécution de ses fonctions", apparaissant à l'art. 1054 C.C. et plus particulièrement du critère indiqué dans Plumb v. Cobden Flour Mills[37], il prononce d'abord comme suit, sur le mérite même de l'action:

L'action du défendeur, on l'a vu, ne peut pas être classifiée parmi les actes permis, par les statuts, au procureur général, ni au premier ministre; elle ne peut pas être considérée comme ayant été faite dans l'exercice ou dans l'exécution de ses fonctions comme telles; elle entre dans la catégorie des actes prohibés, des actes commis hors les limites des fonctions, et comme telle, elle engendre la responsabilité personnelle.

puis, précisant que l'art. 88 C.P.C. pose comme condition que le défendeur soit poursuivi "à raison d'un acte par lui fait dans l'exercice de ses fonctions", déclare que l'art. 88 n'a pas d'application en l'espèce.

Les juges de la majorité ont référé à ce moyen sans cependant s'y arrêter vu que dans leur opinion l'action, de toutes façons, était mal fondée.

D'où l'on voit que le droit de l'intimé à l'avis dépend uniquement, dans la présente cause, de la question de savoir si l'acte reproché a été fait par lui "dans l'exercice de ses fonctions" au sens qu'il faut donner à ces expressions dans le contexte de l'art. 88 'C.P.C., et suivant l'esprit et la fin véritables de cet article.

L'article 1054 C.C. prescrit que les maîtres et les commettants sont responsables du dommage causé par leurs domestiques ou ouvriers dans l'exécution des fonctions auxquelles ces derniers sont employés. On est dès lors porté à donner aux expressions, plus ou moins identiques, apparaissant à l'art. 88 C.P.C., le même sens que donne la jurisprudence sur l'art. 1054 'C.C. La règle d'interprétation visant la similarité des expressions n'établit qu'une présomption; cette présomption étant que les expressions similaires ont le même sens lorsqu'elles se trouvent,-ce qui n'est pas le cas en l'espèce,- dans une même loi. On accorde, d'ailleurs, peu de poids à cette présomption. Max-well,

On Interpretation of Statutes, 9^e ed., p. 322 et seq. Les considérations présidant à l'établissement, la fin et la portée de l'art. 88 C.P.C., d'une part, et de l'art. 1054 C.C., d'autre part, sont totalement différentes. Sanctionnant la doctrine Respondeat superior, l'art. 1054 C.C. établit la responsabilité du commettant pour l'acte de son préposé, ce dernier étant considéré le continuateur de la personne juridique du premier. L'intimé, agissant en sa qualité de Procureur Général, n'est le préposé de personne. Il n'a pas de commettant. La fonction qu'il exerce, il la tient de la loi. L'article 88 C.P.C. n'affecte en rien la question de responsabilité. Il accorde, en ce qui concerne la procédure seulement, un traitement spécial au bénéfice des officiers publics en raison de la nature même de la fonction. Les motifs apportés par la jurisprudence pour limiter le champ de l'exercice des fonctions, quant à la responsabilité édictée en l'art. 1054 C.C., sont étrangers à ceux conduisant la Législature à donner, quant à la procédure seulement, une protection aux officiers publics. Aussi bien, et en toute déférence, je ne crois pas que la portée de cette protection soit assujettie aux limitations de la responsabilité frappant les dispositions de l'art. 1054 C.C. L'article 8 du c.101 des Statuts Refondus du Bas Canada, loi-source de l'art. 88 C.P.C., établit péremptoirement à mon avis que, in pari materia, un officier public n'est pas tenu comme ayant cessé d'agir dans l'exercice de ses fonctions du seul fait que l'acte reproché constitue un excès de pouvoir, ou de juridiction, ou une violation à la loi. La version française de cette loi n'étant pas en disponibilité, je cite de la version anglaise qu'on trouve dans Consolidated Statutes, Lower Canada, 1860, l'art. 8 :

Protection to extend to the magistrate only etc., and in what cases to him.

The privileges and protection given by this Act, shall be given to such justice, officer or other person acting as aforesaid, only, and to no other person or persons whatever, and any such justice, officer and other person shall be entitled to such protection and privileges in all cases where he has acted bona fide in the execution of his duty, although in such act done, he has exceeded his powers or jurisdiction, and has acted clearly contrary to law.

L'article 88 C.P.C. assume que ceux au bénéfice desquels il est établi se sont rendus coupables d'une illégalité pour laquelle ils doivent répondre. Tout doute qu'on pourrait avoir sur le point est dissipé par le texte même de l'art. 429 C.P.C. lequel, pourvoyant à un changement de venue dans le cas du procès d'un officier public, édicte :

429. Dans toute poursuite en dommages contre un officier public, à raison de quelque illégalité dans l'exécution de ses fonctions, le juge peut ordonner que le procès ait lieu dans un autre district, s'il est démontré que la cause ne peut être instruite avec impartialité dans le district où l'action a été portée.

On doit donc se garder d'associer au droit à l'avis toute idée de justification pour l'acte reproché ou de déduire du seul fait que l'officier public doive au mérite d'être tenu personnellement responsable, qu'il ait perdu tout droit à l'avis. Dans Beattey v. Kozak^[38], où la nécessité d'éviter cette confusion se présentait, une semblable observation est faite par notre collègue M. le Juge Rand. Il faut ajouter, cependant, que cette décision n'est d'aucune autre assistance sur la question qui nous intéresse; le litige portait, en droit, sur l'interprétation d'une loi différente et fut décidé en donnant effet à la jurisprudence d'un droit également différent sur l'incidence, en la matière, du rôle de la bonne foi.

L'incidence du rôle de la bonne foi de l'officier public dans la commission d'un acte reproché, en ce qui concerne la portée de l'art. 88 C.F.C., et non en ce qui a trait au mérite de l'action, a fait, dans la province de Québec, depuis le jour où la disposition fut établie par l'art. 22 du Code de procédure civile de 1867, dont les termes sont reproduits à l'art. 88 du Code de 1897, l'objet d'un conflit dans la jurisprudence. Suivant certains jugements, la bonne foi conditionnait le droit à l'avis et dès que la déclaration contenait une allégation de mauvaise foi, le défendeur se voyait privé du droit d'invoquer le défaut de l'avis, même si, au mérite, la preuve, révélant que cette allégation était mal fondée, on devait alors rejeter l'action parce que l'avis n'avait pas été donné. Suivant d'autres jugements, on tenait le droit à l'avis absolu dans tous les cas. La bonne foi, disait-on, en s'appuyant sur le principe sanctionné par l'art. 2202 C.C., est toujours présumée et cette présomption ne peut être écartée par une simple allégation mais par une preuve de mauvaise foi. On jugeait qu'une simple allégation aux plaidoiries ne pouvait virtuellement abroger le droit au bénéfice de l'art. 88. Considérant que cet article conditionnait l'exercice même du droit d'action, on décidait que ce droit d'action devait être nié ab initio et non à la fin du procès. Ce conflit n'existe plus. Depuis plus de vingt-cinq ans, la Cour d'Appel y a mis fin en décidant que l'incidence de la bonne ou de la mauvaise foi n'a aucune portée sur le droit à l'avis et que, dans tous les cas, il doit être donné. Acceptant les arguments déjà exprimés en ce sens, la Cour d'Appel s'est particulièrement basée sur la source historique de cette disposition et sur la modification qui y fut apportée lors et par suite de son insertion au Code de procédure civile. Les sources de l'article sont indiquées dans Dame Chaput v. Crépeau^[39] par M. le Juge Bruneau et les modifications faites à la situation antérieure par l'insertion de l'article dans le Code, afin d'en généraliser l'appli-cation à tous les officiers publics, sont indiquées dans cette jurisprudence définitivement arrêtée par la Cour d'Appel dans Charland v. Kay^[40]; Corporation de la Paroisse de St-David-de-l'Auberivière v. Paquette et autres^[41] et Houde v. Benoît^[42].

En somme, et comme le note M. le Juge Hall dans Corporation de la Paroisse de St-David-de-l'Auberivière v. Paquette et autres, supra, l'art. 22 du Code de procédure de 1867, prédécesseur de l'art. 88 du Code de 1897, a sa source dans la Loi pour la protection des juges de paix, c.101 des Status Refondus du Bas 'Canada. Le premier article de cette loi prescrivait l'avis d'action, alors que dans les autres dispositions, d'autres privilèges étaient établis, y compris celui fixant la prescription à six mois. L'article 8 conditionnait le droit aux privilèges y accordés, à la bonne foi. Lors de la confection du Code de procédure, la disposition ayant trait à l'avis fut extraite de la loi pour devenir l'art. 22 du Code de procédure et être déclarée applicable à tous les officiers publics. Dans le procédé, cependant, on laissa la disposition touchant la bonne foi dans la Loi pour la protection des juges de paix et on évita de l'inclure dans l'art. 22 C.P.C. comme condition de l'opération de cet article. D'autres considérations, tel, par exemple, le changement apporté par la Législature, le 4 août 1929, à l'art. 195 C.P.C. par la Loi 19 George V, c. 81, ayant pour effet de prohiber toute ordonnance de preuve avant faire droit qui jusqu'alors réservait au mérite les questions soulevées par l'inscription en droit, militent en faveur de ces vues. C'est ce changement, je crois, qui a provoqué l'occasion amenant la Cour d'Appel à fixer définitivement la jurisprudence. Les motifs déjà mentionnés suffisent pour partager les vues exprimées par la Cour d'Appel dans les causes précitées et pour conclure, comme M. le Juge Dorion dans Charland v. Kay, supra, qu'il faut s'en tenir au texte de la loi et lui donner son effet.

En assumant l'exercice d'un pouvoir discrétionnaire conféré au gérant général par la loi, l'intimé a commis une illégalité mais aucune offense connue de la loi pénale et aucun délit au sens de l'art. 1053 'C.C. Il a fait ce qu'il n'avait pas le droit de faire, fermement et sincèrement con-vaincu, a-t-il affirmé sous serment, que non seulement il en avait le droit, mais qu'il y était tenu pour s'acquitter de ses responsabilités comme Procureur Général chargé de l'administration de la justice, du maintien de l'ordre et de la paix dans la province et de ses devoirs comme conseiller juridique du gouvernement de la province. Il n'a pas pris occasion de sa fonction pour commettre cette illégalité. Il ne l'a pas commise à l'occasion de l'exercice de ses fonctions. Il l'a commise à cause de ses fonctions. Sa bonne foi n'a pas été mise en doute, et sur ce fait, les Juges de la Cour d'Appel, qui ont considéré la question, sont d'accord avec le Juge de première instance. Suivant les décisions considérées par cette Cour dans Beatty v. Kozak, supra, on retient, sous un droit différent de celui de la province de Québec, l'incidence de la bonne foi lorsque celle-ci se fonde sur l'erreur de fait, ou sur l'erreur de fait et de droit à la fois, sinon uniquement sur l'erreur de droit, pour décider du caractère exculpatoire de l'illégalité commise, voire même du droit à l'avis. Exclusivement compétente à légiférer sur la procédure civile, la Législature de Québec, par l'art. 88 C.P.C., n'a pas voulu assujettir le droit à l'avis d'action à l'incidence de la bonne ou de la mauvaise foi. Dans les circonstances de cette cause, je suis d'opinion que l'illégalité commise par l'intimé l'a été dans l'exercice de ses fonctions et que, de plus, ce serait faire indirectement ce que l'art. 88 C.P.C. ne permet pas, suivant l'interprétation de la Cour d'Appel, que de s'appuyer sur la bonne ou la mauvaise foi, que ce soit au sens vulgaire ou technique du mot, pour conclure que l'intimé est sorti de l'exercice de ses fonctions, au sens qu'ont ces expressions dans l'art. 88 C.P.C., et qu'il ait perdu le droit à l'avis d'action.

Pour ces raisons, l'appelant aurait dû être débouté de son action. Je renverrais les appels avec dépens.

ABBOTT J.:—In his action appellant claimed from respondent the sum of $118,741 as damages alleged to have been sustained as a result of the cancellation of a licence 'or permit for the sale of alcoholic liquors held by appellant.

The action was maintained by the learned trial judge to the extent of $8,123.53. From that judgment two appeals were taken, one by respondent asking that the action be dismissed in its entirety, the other by appellant asking that the amount allowed as damages be increased by an amount of $90,000. The Court of Queen's Bench^[43] allowed the respondent's appeal, Rinfret J. dissenting, and dismissed the action. The appeal taken by appellant to increase the amount of the trial judgment was dismissed unanimously. The present appeals are from those two judgments.

The facts are these. On December 4, 1946, appellant was conducting a restaurant business in the City of Montreal, a business which he and his father and mother before him had been carrying on continuously for some thirty-four years prior to that date. The restaurant had been licensed for the sale of alcoholic beverages throughout the entire period.

In 1946 and for many years prior thereto, persons operating establishments of this kind and selling alcoholic beverages had been required to obtain a licence or permit under the Alcoholic Liquor Act, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 255. Unless granted for a shorter period, these were annual licences and expired on April 30 in each year. Moreover, s. 35, subs. 1., of the Act provides as follows:

The Commission may cancel any permit at its discretion.

The Commission referred to is the "Quebec Liquor Commission" established as a corporation under the Act in question and, generally speaking, it has been entrusted by the Legislature with the responsibility of directing and administering the provincial monopoly of the sale and distribution of alcoholic beverages.

On December 4, 1946, without previous notice to the appellant, his licence to sell alcoholic beverages was cancelled by the Quebec Liquor Commission, and at about 2 p.m. on that date the stock of liquor on his premises was seized and removed. The licence was not restored and after operating for some months without such a licence, in 1947 appellant sold the restaurant and the building in which it was located.

Appellant learned from press reports either in the after-noon of December 4 or early the following day, that his licence had been cancelled and the stock of liquor seized because he was an adherent of a religious sect or group known as the Witnesses of Jehovah. It soon became clear from statements made by the respondent to the press and confirmed by him at the trial as having been made by him, that the cancellation of the licence had been made because of the appellant's association with the sect in question and in order to prevent him from continuing to furnish bail for members of that sect summoned before the Recorder's Court on charges of contravening certain city by-laws respecting the distribution of printed material.

It might be added here that in December 1946 and for some time prior thereto the Witnesses of Jehovah appear to have been carrying on in the Montreal district and elsewhere in the Province of Quebec, an active campaign of meetings and the distribution of printed pamphlets and other like material of an offensive character to a great many people of most religious beliefs, and I have no doubt that at that time many people believed this material to be seditious.

The evidence is referred to in detail in the Courts below and I do not propose to do so here. I am satisfied from a consideration of this evidence : First : that the cancellation of the appellant's licence was made for the sole reason which I have mentioned and with the object and purpose to which I have referred; Second: that such cancellation was made with the express authorization and upon the order of the respondent; Third: that the determining cause of the cancellation was that order, and that the manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission would not have cancelled the licence without the order and authorization given by the respondent.

There can be no question as to the first point. It was conceded by respondent in his evidence at the trial and by his counsel at the hearing before us. As to the second and third points, I share the view of the learned trial judge and of Rinfret J. that both were clearly established.

The religious beliefs of the appellant and the fact that he acted as bondsman for members of the sect in question had no connection whatever with his obligations as the holder of a licence to sell alcoholic liquors. The cancellation of his licence upon this ground alone therefore was without any legal justification. Moreover, the religious beliefs of the appellant and his perfectly legal activities as a bondsman had nothing to do with the object and purposes of the Alcoholic Liquor Act, and the powers and responsibilities of the manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission are confined to the administration and enforcement of the provisions of the said Act. This may be one explanation of the latter's decision to consult the respondent before taking the action which he did to cancel appellant's licence.

At all events a careful reading of the evidence and a consideration of the surrounding circumstances has convinced me that without having received the authorization, direction, order, or "approbation énérgique" of the respondent -however one chooses to describe it- the manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission would not have cancelled the licence.

The proposition that in Canada a member of the executive branch of government does not make the law but merely carries it out or administers it requires no citation of authority to support it. Similarly, I do not find it necessary to cite from the wealth of authority supporting the principle that a public officer is responsible for acts done by him without legal justification. I content myself with quoting the well known passage from Dicey's "Law of the Constitution", 9th ed., p. 193, where he says

... every official, from the Prime Minister down to a constable or a collector of taxes, is under the same responsibility for every act done without legal justification as any other citizen. The Reports abound with cases in which officials have been brought before the courts, and made, in their personal capacity, liable to punishment, or to the payment of damages, for acts done in their official character but in excess of their lawful authority. A colonial governor, a secretary of state, a military officer, and all subordinates, though carrying out the commands of their official superiors, are as responsible for any act which the law does not authorize as is any private and unofficial person.

In the instant case, the respondent was given no statutory power to interfere in the administration or direction of the Quebec Liquor Commission although as Attorney-General of the Province the Commission and its officers could of course consult him for legal opinions and legal advice. The Commission is not a department of government in the accepted sense of that term. Under the Alcoholic Liquor Act the Commission is an independent body with corporate status and with the powers and responsibilities conferred upon it by the Legislature. The Attorney-General is given no power under the said Act to intervene in the administration of the affairs of the Commission nor does the Attorney-General's Department Act, R.S.Q. 1941, c. 46, confer any such authority upon him.

I have no doubt that in taking the action which he did, the respondent was convinced that he was acting in what he conceived to be the best interests of the people of his province but this, of course, has no relevance to the issue of his responsibility in damages for any acts done in excess of his legal authority. I have no doubt also that respondent knew and was bound to know as Attorney-General that neither as Premier of the province nor as Attorney-General was he authorized in law to interfere with the administration of the Quebec Liquor Commission or to give an order or an authorization to any officer of that body to exercise a discretionary authority entrusted to such officer by the statute.

It follows, therefore, that in purporting to authorize and instruct the manager of the Quebec Liquor Commission to cancel appellant's licence, the respondent was acting without any legal authority whatsoever. Moreover, as I have said, I think respondent was bound to know that he was acting without such authority.

The respondent is therefore liable under art. 1053 of the Civil Code for the damages sustained by the appellant, by reason of the acts done by respondent in excess of his legal authority.

Respondent also contended that appellant's action must fail because no notice of such action was given under art. 88 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

88. No public officer or other person fulfilling any public function or duty can be sued for damages by reason of any act done by him in the exercise of his functions, nor can any verdict or judgment be rendered against him, unless notice of such action had been given him at least one month before the issue of the writ of summons.

Such notice must be in writing; it must state the grounds of the action, and name of the plaintiff's attorney or agent, and indicate his office; and must be served upon him personally or at his domicile.

None of the learned judges constituting the majority in the Court of Queen's Bench has given as a reason for dismissing appellant's action, the failure to give such notice. The learned trial judge and Rinfret J. held that respondent is not entitled to avail himself of this exceptional provision since the act complained of was not "done by him in the exercise of his functions" but was an act done by him when he had gone outside his functions to perform it. I am in agreement with their views and there is little I need add to what they have said on this point. In this connection, however, reference may usefully be made to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Lachance v. Casault^[44]. In that case a bailiff had attempted to take possession of books and papers in the hands of a judicial guardian without preparing a procès-verbal of the articles seized, as called for by the order of the Court requiring the guardian to give up possession to the seizing creditor. When the bailiff's action was resisted by the guardian as being unauthorized, the bailiff caused the guardian to be arrested. The charge having been subsequently dismissed, the bailiff was sued in damages for false arrest and malicious prosecution. It was held that, even assuming such bailiff was a public officer within the meaning of art. 88 C.C.P., he was not entitled to notice under the said article since at the time the act complained of was committed, he was not "dans l'exercice légal de ses fonctions".

In my opinion before a public officer can be held to be acting "in the exercise of his functions", within the meaning of art. 88 C.C.P., it must be established that at the time he performed the act complained of such public officer had reasonable ground for believing that such act was within his legal authority to perform; Asselin v. Davidson^[45]. In the instant case, as I have said, in my view the respondent was bound to know that the act complained of was beyond his legal authority.

I now deal with the second appeal asking that the amount awarded to appellant by the trial judge be increased by an amount of $90,000. This amount is claimed under three heads, namely :

Damages to goodwill and reputation of business $50,000

Loss of property rights in liquor permit $15,000

Loss of profits for a period of one year, May 1st, 1947 to May 1st, 1948 $25,000

90,000$

The licence to sell alcoholic beverages was, of course, only an annual licence subject to revocation at any time and the renewal of which might have been properly refused for a variety of reasons. Nevertheless, in my view, appellant could reasonably expect that so long as he continued to observe the provisions of the Alcoholic Liquor Act his licence would be renewed from year to year, as in fact it had been for many years past.

There can be no doubt that cancellation of appellant's licence without legal justification resulted in a substantial reduction in the value of the goodwill and profit making possibilities of the restaurant business carried on by him at 1429 Crescent St., Montreal, and in a pecuniary loss to him for which in my opinion he is entitled to recover damages from respondent.

The restaurant business is probably no less hazardous than most other businesses, and damages of this sort are obviously difficult to assess, the amount being of necessity a more or less arbitrary one. The learned trial judge awarded appellant the sum of $6,000 as loss of profits for the period from December 4, 1946, to May 1, 1947, the date on which the licence would have expired, and this would appear to be supported by the evidence. I have reached the conclusion that the amount awarded to the appellant by the learned trial judge should be increased by an amount of $25,000, as damages for diminution in the value of the goodwill of the business and for loss of future profits.

In the result, therefore, I would allow both appeals with costs here and below, and modify the judgment at the trial by increasing the amount of the damages to $33,123.53 with interest from the date of the judgment, in the Superior Court.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR SASKATCHEWAN

Criminal law — Evidence — Admissibility — Confessions rule — Derived confessions rule — Accused's stepdaughter telling school counsellor that accused had touched her in sexually inappropriate manner — Accused apologizing to his stepdaughter in statement to police — Accused charged with sexual assault — Accused subsequently sending e-mail to former wife consenting to her travelling abroad with children — E-mail including second apology to stepdaughter — Trial judge ruling after voir dire that statement to police was inadmissible because police officer had offered inducement by implying that accused would not be charged if he apologized — Contents of e-mail, admitted in evidence without voir dire and without objection from defence counsel, playing crucial role in trial judge's decision to convict accused — Whether trial judge erred by failing to conduct voir dire, on his own motion, to determine admissibility of e-mail — Whether e-mail inadmissible under confessions or derived confessions rules — Whether former wife can be considered a "person in authority" under confessions rule.

A complained to her school counsellor that the accused, her stepfather, had touched her in a sexually inappropriate manner on three occasions during the time she spent at his home. The accused was interviewed by the police on May 27, 2004 and, at the conclusion of the interview, he wrote out an apology to A on the police statement form. The accused was subsequently charged with the offence of sexual assault on June 30, 2004. On July 5, in an e-mail to his former wife, the accused consented to A and his son's travelling abroad with her. In that e-mail, he apologized to A a second time. At trial, the accused's May 27 confession to the police was ruled inadmissible, on the basis that the police officer had offered an inducement by implying that the accused would not be charged if he apologized. A and her mother testified for the Crown. The mother gave evidence about the July 5 e-mail and, when asked by the trial judge, defence counsel said that he did not object to the e-mail being admitted in evidence. No voir dire was conducted. The accused testified in his defence, denying that he had sexually assaulted A and indicating that the apology in the e-mail was related to an incident when he had allowed A and some of her friends to share alcoholic "coolers". Credibility was the main issue at trial and the contents of the e-mail played a crucial role in the trial judge's decision. He disbelieved the accused's explanation and convicted him. The Court of Appeal set aside the conviction and ordered a new trial, concluding that the trial judge had erred by failing to conduct a voir dire, on his own motion, to determine the admissibility of the e-mail.

Held (Binnie and Fish JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed and the order for a new trial set aside. The case should be remitted to the Court of Appeal to consider the accused's remaining grounds of appeal.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Deschamps, Abella, Charron and Rothstein JJ.: The Court of Appeal erred in faulting the trial judge for not embarking on a voir dire in respect of the e-mail, based on the evidence in the actual trial record.

When statements are made by an accused to ordinary persons, they are presumptively admissible, as admissions by an opposing party, without the necessity of a voir dire. It is only where the accused makes a statement to a “person in authority” that the Crown bears the onus of proving the voluntariness of the statement as a prerequisite to its admission, under the confessions rule. To be considered a person in authority, the accused must believe that the recipient of the statement can control or influence the proceedings against him or her, and that belief must be reasonable. The accused must provide an evidential basis for claiming that the receiver of a statement is a person in authority. In this case, the trial judge did not err by failing to hold a voir dire on the question whether A’s mother was a person in authority. The accused did not raise the issue at trial and there is no evidence that A’s mother had any control over the accused’s prosecution or that she was operating on behalf of the investigating authorities. Nothing on the record indicated to the trial judge that she may have been anything other than an ordinary witness in the proceedings.

The “derived confessions rule” serves to exclude statements which, despite not appearing to be involuntary when considered alone, are sufficiently connected to an earlier involuntary confession as to be rendered involuntary and hence inadmissible. It is not necessary, nor would it be appropriate on this record, to decide whether the derived confessions rule extends to admissions made to ordinary persons. It suffices to assume that, given an appropriate evidentiary basis connecting the police inducement and the later e-mail, it would at least be arguable that the subsequent statement could be excluded, if not on the basis of the common law derived confessions rule, perhaps on a Charter basis. The defence, however, neither raised the argument concerning the derived confessions rule at trial nor brought a Charter application seeking the exclusion of the e-mail. In deciding whether there was clear evidence which ought to have triggered the need for the trial judge to raise the issue on his own motion, an appellate court must consider the question from the perspective of the trial judge at the time the decision was made. Here, the most significant circumstance is that defence counsel consented to the admission of the e-mail. In an adversarial system of criminal trials, trial judges must, barring exceptional circumstances, defer to the tactical decisions of counsel, and there was no basis, in this case, to conclude that the trial judge ought to have interfered with the decision of counsel. On the facts, it is difficult to find evidence of a connection between the two statements which should have alerted the trial judge to the need to conduct a voir dire and to question the wisdom of counsel. The initial apology was made on May 27, 2004, while the e-mail was sent over five weeks later on July 5. The inducement held out by the police, as found by the trial judge on the voir dire, was the suggestion that the accused might not be charged if he apologized. However, by the time the accused sent the e-mail, he had been charged notwithstanding his apology in the police statement. It is therefore far from obvious on what basis the inducement could still have been operative in the accused's mind. Additionally, the two statements were made to different persons in entirely different circumstances. Finally, as the accused's later testimony in the trial revealed, it was his contention that the apology in the e-mail concerned a completely unrelated incident. Given that the accused's own version was contrary to any theory of a potential connection between the e-mail and the earlier confession, it is difficult to see on what basis counsel's consent to the admissibility of the e-mail could be faulted.

Per Binnie and Fish JJ. (dissenting): The Court of Appeal's judgment should be affirmed. The trial judge had in the record before him a clear indication that the accused's second "apology" might be a "derived confession" and was legally bound to himself determine its admissibility. His failure to make any independent determination as to the admissibility of the impugned statement is necessarily fatal to the accused's conviction because, according to the trial judge himself, the impugned statement was critical to his conclusion that the accused was guilty as charged.

The derived confessions rule excludes statements that, while not inadmissible when considered in isolation, are excluded because of their temporal or causal connection to another statement found by the court to be inadmissible. The question is whether the tainting features that disqualified the first confession continue to be present or the fact that the first statement was made was a substantial factor contributing to the making of the second statement. Where the evidence raises a concern in this regard, the sufficiency of the required connection must be determined by the trial judge on a voir dire. An objection by counsel is not required to trigger the judge's obligation to conduct the voir dire.

In this case, there was ample evidence on the record to alert the trial judge to the need for a voir dire. During his interrogation, the accused was repeatedly and emphatically urged to apologize to A, and was told that her complaints were “not a big deal” and were “extremely minor”. One officer told the accused an entirely fictional story according to which the officer had himself been arrested for slapping his son, but the matter was resolved once the officer apologized. The officer said the Crown would decide whether to proceed with the charges or simply look at counselling instead, and that the most important thing they looked at was an apology. The accused was told that if he simply apologized the matter might not proceed, and the officer promised to stick with the accused throughout the matter.

The judge had already excluded the initial statement or “apology” written by the accused during the police interrogation, and was thus familiar with the inducements that had provoked it. The e-mail was strikingly similar to the excluded statement. Moreover, whether the Crown would proceed with the charges remained a live issue when it was sent. The improper inducements present when the inadmissible statement was given to the police — notably, the promise of leniency in exchange for a showing of remorse in the form of an apology — were still operative. In these circumstances, cumulatively considered, the connection between the two statements was apparent from the record and should have alerted the trial judge to the need for a voir dire.

The Crown contends that the “person in authority” requirement for exclusion under the confessions rule applies to derived confessions as well. This Court has previously excluded a statement as a derived confession without determining whether it was made to a person in authority, so it cannot be said that a derived confession will only be excluded if it is made to a person in authority. The purpose of the derived confessions rule — to exclude statements that are tainted by their connection to a prior inadmissible statement — would be frustrated if they were excluded only when made to a person in authority. If the statement is prompted by the same police conduct that resulted in exclusion of the earlier confession, or if it discloses the contents of the earlier statement made to authorities, it is a product of the inadmissible confession and is itself inadmissible on that ground alone.

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Deschamps, Abella, Charron and Rothstein JJ. was delivered by

CHARRON J. —

1. Introduction

[1] Following his trial by judge alone, the respondent S.G.T. was convicted of sexually assaulting his stepdaughter. The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal set aside the conviction and ordered a new trial. In its view, the trial judge had erred by failing to conduct a voir dire, on his own motion, to determine the admissibility of an e-mail sent by the accused to his estranged wife, the mother of the complainant. The Crown appeals to this Court with leave.

[2] In my respectful view, the trial judge committed no error in admitting and relying upon the evidence concerning the e-mail. I would therefore allow the appeal, quash the order directing a new trial and, as requested by the Crown, remit the case back to the Court of Appeal to consider the respondent's remaining grounds of appeal.

2. The Facts and the Proceedings Below

[3] The facts and judicial findings can be stated briefly.

[4] The complainant A was born in 1989. She was approximately 11 to 14 years old when the events complained of are alleged to have occurred, and 17 at the time of trial.

[5] S.G.T. met the complainant's mother in 1995. The couple were married in 1996, and had a son, B, in 1997. S.G.T. subsequently adopted A. The couple separated in 2000, agreeing to a joint parenting arrangement according to which the two children would stay with their father two days a week, alternate weekends and one month during the summer. A stayed with her father under this arrangement until 2003 when she claimed she was uncomfortable staying at his place and would only go there if she was with her friends. A complained to her friend about her father's inappropriate sexual behaviour and eventually to her mother in the spring of 2003. Although A's mother contacted the police, she did not follow through when asked to call back, and nothing further was done about the situation at the time.

[6] About a year later, in May 2004, A told her guidance counsellor at school about her father's actions and the police were called. A complained that S.G.T. touched her in a sexually inappropriate manner on three occasions during the time she spent at his home. These incidents form the subject matter of the charge against him.

[7] S.G.T. agreed to be interviewed by the police on May 27, 2004. At the conclusion of the interview with the police, S.G.T. wrote out an apology to A on the police statement form. This apology was ruled inadmissible at trial, on the basis that the police officer had offered an inducement by implying that S.G.T. would not be charged if he apologized. More will be said later about the trial judge's findings on the voir dire.

[8] S.G.T. was charged with the offence of sexual assault on June 30, 2004.

[9] By this time, A's mother had made arrangements to travel to California with A and B on July 6, 2004, to visit her parents. However, in order to travel with A and B, A's mother required, pursuant to their arrangement, S.G.T.'s consent. A's mother sent S.G.T. a number of e-mails in an effort to obtain his consent. He finally responded on July 5, 2004, with the following e-mail:

Relax. When have I ever not done something you've requested for the kids. I'm busy too. I have the letter and it's notarized [sic]. I thought long and hard about keeping [B] back so I could spend this month with him in case I end up going to fucking jail on the 28th, but I wouldn't do that to him. I hope you realize that I will never be able to coach [B] or travel outside Canada for a holiday with him or work. I may loose [sic] my job because of this. I don't care about you, but I very much hope that this will make [A] get and feel better. I am so, so sorry if I caused her emotional pain. I have to live with the fact that I lost someone I cared for deeply over my stupididty [sic]. And now I have to deal with [the] fact that I stand to loose [sic] everything I worked so hard for. I'm sure this makes you happy. You better hope for your sake you never make a mistake bringing up [B].

You can pick the letter up out of my mailbox, I have a commitment I have to be at tonight. Make sure [B] calls me at least once a week, I showed him how to dial collect.

[10] S.G.T.'s trial began on May 8, 2006. Credibility was the main issue in the trial. In addition to the complainant's testimony, two items of evidence emanating from the accused figured prominently in the Crown's case: his confession to the police, which included the written apology to A; and the e-mail he sent to A's mother.

[11] At the commencement of the trial, a voir dire was held regarding the statement to the police. The accused did not testify on the voir dire. Based on the evidence adduced on the voir dire, the trial judge held that "the officer, on several occasions, left the impression to the accused that this was not a significant matter, that it was extremely minor, that the accused would not lose his job, that all that was necessary was an apology" (Appellant's Record, at p. 68). He concluded that the officer "appears to imply that [the accused] may not be charged if he apologizes", and "[i]n so doing the officer held out hope of advantage to the accused" (ibid.). The trial judge ruled the statement involuntary and, consequently, inadmissible. The evidence on the voir dire was not admitted on the trial proper.

[12] The Crown then called two witnesses: A and her mother. During the course of her testimony, the mother gave evidence about her e-mail correspondence with the accused, including his response on July 5, 2004. When asked by the trial judge whether the defence objected to the filing of the e-mails as an exhibit in the trial, counsel for S.G.T. responded "No". Nor was any objection raised concerning the mother's testimony about the July 5th e-mail.

[13] S.G.T. testified in his defence. He denied sexually assaulting his stepdaughter. With respect to the apology in the e-mail, he explained that it had nothing to do with the allegations of sexual assault. His words of regret for any emotional pain he may have caused A were in reference, rather, to an incident when he had allowed the young complainant and some of her friends to share two alcoholic “coolers”, an incident that had caused grief with some of the young girls’ parents.

[14] The contents of the e-mail ultimately played a crucial role in the trial judge’s verdict against the accused. The trial judge disbelieved S.G.T.’s explanation. Since S.G.T. also spoke in the e-mail of the possibility of going to jail and never being able to coach his son or travel outside Canada, the “only possible interpretation” was that the e-mail was “a confession of guilt and one of remorse” in respect of the sexual assaults, which, in turn, confirmed the testimony given by the complainant (2006 SKQB 234 \(CanLII\), at paras. 34-35). The trial judge convicted S.G.T. of sexual assault as charged.

[15] On appeal from conviction and sentence before the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal, S.G.T. raised several grounds, including that “the learned trial judge erred in placing excessive weight on the evidence of [the e-mail] in finding [that he] had a ‘guilty mind’”. He also brought an application to introduce fresh evidence. Among other things, he stated in his affidavit filed in support of the application that he had lied about the e-mail at trial, and that he had given his evidence at the suggestion of his counsel. He explained that he included an apology in the e-mail because he had been told by the police in his interview “that all that was needed to resolve the matter was a form of apology” (Appellant’s Record, at p. 103). He therefore hoped “that the charge would not proceed as promised by the police” (ibid.). In response to S.G.T.’s fresh evidence application, trial counsel filed an affidavit denying ever having “suggested in any way, shape or form that [his] client tell anything but the absolute truth” (ibid., at p. 112) and confirming that S.G.T.’s explanation for the e-mail had always been that offered in his testimony.

[16] The Court of Appeal did not find it necessary to dispose of S.G.T.'s application to admit fresh evidence (2008 SKCA 119, 237 C.C.C. (3d) 55, at para. 109). It allowed the appeal against conviction on the sole ground that the trial judge had erred by failing to conduct a voir dire, on his own motion, to determine the admissibility of the e-mail. The court was of the view that there were three "exclusionary rules or limiting principles that might have been invoked to exclude the e-mail from evidence, or weaken, or neutralize its impact": the confessions rule, provided that the mother could be brought within the characterization of a person in authority; the trial judge's inherent jurisdiction to exclude prejudicial evidence outweighing its probative value; and the derived confessions rule (para. 97). While not faulting trial counsel or the trial judge for not anticipating "every conceivable argument that hindsight and leisurely reflection can serve to devise or construct", given these concerns about the e-mail and the "decisive influence on the result", the court saw no viable alternative other than setting aside the conviction and ordering a new trial (para. 108).

3. Analysis

[17] It is plain from the summary that precedes that the Court of Appeal's concerns about the apology contained in the e-mail can only find root in the theory that the accused would have sent the e-mail as a result of the inducement offered by the police officer some five weeks earlier when, as the trial judge found, the officer appeared to imply that the accused would not be charged if he apologized for the sexual improprieties. The notion that the evidence could potentially be excluded on this theory gives rise to a number of legal questions which I will discuss in a moment. However, the more fundamental difficulty S.G.T. faces in this Court is that, without his fresh evidence poured in the record, there is no evidentiary basis to support the defence theory. Indeed the theory that there is some connection between the inadmissible confession and the e-mail runs counter to S.G.T.'s own evidence and defence at trial that the contents of the e-mail had nothing to do with the allegations of sexual assault.

[18] Having regard to the criteria for the admission of fresh evidence established in Palmer v. The Queen, 1979 CanLII 8 \(SCC\), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 759, S.G.T. faced a rather significant hurdle on his fresh evidence application before the Court of Appeal. However, the Court of Appeal disposed of the appeal on the basis of this potential connection between the inadmissible confession and the e-mail without finding it necessary to rule on the fresh evidence application, and S.G.T. did not renew the application in this Court. This appeal therefore turns, not on whether S.G.T.'s different version of events should be admitted in evidence, but rather on whether the Court of Appeal was correct to fault the trial judge for not embarking on a voir dire in respect of the e-mail, based on the evidence in the actual trial record.

[19] As stated earlier, the Court of Appeal expressed the view that there were three exclusionary rules or limiting principles that might have been invoked in respect of the e-mail, one of which being the trial judge's inherent jurisdiction to exclude prejudicial evidence outweighing its probative value. However, the court did not elaborate on how the court's inherent jurisdiction might have come into play and, in responding to the Crown's appeal before this Court, S.G.T., rightly so in my view, did not rely on this principle. Therefore, I will deal solely with the common law rules relating to the admissibility of confessions and the obligations of the trial judge.

[20] The distinction between an admission and a confession is apposite here. Under the rules of evidence, statements made by an accused are admissions by an opposing party and, as such, fall into an exception to the hearsay rule. They are admissible for the truth of their contents. When statements are made by an accused to ordinary persons, such as friends or family members, they are presumptively admissible without the necessity of a voir dire. It is only where the accused makes a statement to a "person in authority", that the Crown bears the onus of proving the voluntariness of the statement as a prerequisite to its admission. This, of course, is the confessions rule.

[21] The Court affirmed in R. v. Hodgson, 1998 CanLII 798 \(SCC\), [1998] 2 S.C.R. 449, that the “person in authority” requirement is an integral component of the confessions rule and reviewed in considerable detail the law on persons in authority, including the trial judge’s obligation to hold a voir dire. I will briefly reiterate those principles to the extent that they apply here.

[22] A person in authority is typically a person who is “formally engaged in the arrest, detention, examination or prosecution of the accused”: Hodgson, at para. 32. Importantly, there is no category of persons who are automatically considered persons in authority solely by virtue of their status. The question as to who should be considered as a person in authority is determined according to the viewpoint of the accused. To be considered a person in authority, the accused must believe that the recipient of the statement can control or influence the proceedings against him or her, and that belief must be reasonable. Because the evidence necessary to establish whether or not an individual is a person in authority lies primarily with the accused, the person in authority requirement places an evidential burden on the accused. While the Crown bears the burden of proving the voluntariness of a confession beyond a reasonable doubt, the accused must provide an evidential basis for claiming that the receiver of a statement is a person in authority.

[23] As noted in Hodgson, “[i]n the vast majority of cases, the accused will meet this evidential burden by showing [his or her] knowledge of the relationship between the receiver of the statement and the police or prosecuting authorities” (para. 38). Thus, where the receiver of the statement is an obvious state actor, such as a police officer, the fact that the person’s status was known to the accused at the time the statement was made will suffice to meet the evidentiary burden. Whenever the evidence makes clear that a voir dire into admissibility is required, the trial judge must conduct one even if none is requested unless, of course, the defence waives the requirement and consents to the statement's admission. When the receiver of the statement is not a typical or obvious person in authority, it usually falls on the accused, in keeping with the evidential burden, to raise the issue and request a voir dire.

[24] In this case, the recipient of the e-mail, A's mother, was not a conventional person in authority. Further, S.G.T. did not raise the issue at trial. While A's mother may, as a parent of a minor complainant in a criminal trial, be a person in authority, her status alone is not sufficient to render her a person in authority: see R. v. A.B. (1986), 1986 CanLII 4624 \(ON CA\), 50 C.R. (3d) 247 (Ont. C.A.), at pp. 257-59; Hodgson, at para. 36. In those cases where parents have been held to be persons in authority, there has generally been some type of interaction between the parents and the police. For example, in R. v. Trenholme (1920), 30 B.R. 232, the victim's father was held to be person in authority on the basis that he actually "laid the charge" and "had authority and control over the prosecution against the accused" (pp. 249 and 243). More recently, in R. v. Wells, 1998 CanLII 799 \(SCC\), [1998] 2 S.C.R. 517, this Court held that a voir dire was required into whether a parent was a person in authority where the parent had previously spoken to the police about his intention to trick the accused into making a statement. It was on that basis that Wells was one of those "rare cases" where a voir dire was required for an individual who was not a clear person in authority (para. 16). By contrast, in Hodgson, the mere fact that the parents of a young girl confronted the accused about sexually assaulting their daughter did not serve to turn them into persons in authority. The Court emphasized in Hodgson that only rarely will the need for a voir dire be triggered in such circumstances. Moreover, what needs to be shown before the trial judge will be required to hold a voir dire on his or her own motion bears repeating here:

Status or personal authority alone will not as a general rule provide evidence from which it can be inferred that the receiver of a confession is, in the eyes of the accused, a person in authority. Rather, in order to demonstrate the need for a voir dire, the evidence must show that the receiver of the statement was closely associated with the authorities prior to obtaining the statement, and that there was as well a close connection in time between the contact with the authorities and its receipt. The evidence must suggest that the receiver was acting in concert with the police or prosecutorial authorities, or as their agent, or as part of their team. Only in these circumstances will the trial judge be obliged to hold a voir dire of his or her own motion on the person in authority issue, subject to waiver of the voir dire by counsel for the accused. [para. 47]

[25] The question then becomes whether clear evidence existed in the record which should have alerted the trial judge to the need for a voir dire. The relevant circumstances are the following.

[26] S.G.T. did not testify that he believed that A's mother could influence or control the proceedings. Even if he had testified to that effect, any subjective belief has to be reasonably based in fact. There is no evidence that A's mother had any control over the prosecution of S.G.T., or that she was operating on behalf of the investigating authorities. Rather, the record suggests quite the contrary. While A's mother called the police after A disclosed the incidents to her in 2003, she was told to call back later, as the relevant department was not open at that time. She never called back, as she was concerned about the effect that any complaint might have on her son, B. The police only began investigating S.G.T. in 2004 after A disclosed the matter to authorities at her school (Appellant's Record, at p. 80). In these circumstances, there was nothing on the record to indicate to the trial judge that A's mother may have been anything other than an ordinary witness in the proceedings. I therefore conclude that the trial judge did not err by failing to hold a voir dire on the question whether A's mother was a person in authority.

[27] As stated earlier, the Court of Appeal also identified the “derived confessions rule” as another potential field of inquiry into the admissibility of the e-mail. As I read his reasons, it is on this ground that Fish J. would uphold the order for a new trial. Again here, S.G.T. did not raise this argument at trial. Before considering the record on this point to determine whether the trial judge ought to have raised the issue on his own motion, I will briefly recall the rule.

[28] The leading case on the derived confessions rule is R. v. I. (L.R.) and T. (E.), 1993 CanLII 51 (SCC), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 504. In brief, the derived confessions rule serves to exclude statements which, despite not appearing to be involuntary when considered alone, are sufficiently connected to an earlier involuntary confession as to be rendered involuntary and hence inadmissible. For example, in that case, a young offender was charged with second degree murder and gave an inculpatory statement to the police. The next day, after meeting with his lawyer, the accused came to the police, wishing to modify the statement that he had given the previous day. The trial judge excluded the first statement but admitted the second, and the accused was convicted by a jury. The accused appealed the conviction on the basis that the second statement should not have been admitted. His appeal was ultimately successful in this Court.

[29] In outlining the principles applicable to derived confessions, the Court articulated a contextual and fact-based approach to determining whether a subsequent statement is sufficiently connected to a prior, inadmissible confession to also be excluded. In assessing the degree of connection, the Court outlined a number of factors to be considered, including “the time span between the statements, advertence to the previous statement during questioning, the discovery of additional incriminating evidence subsequent to the first statement, the presence of the same police officers at both interrogations and other similarities between the two circumstances” (p. 526). The Court then held:

In applying these factors, a subsequent confession would be involuntary if either the tainting features which disqualified the first confession continued to be present or if the fact that the first statement was made was a substantial factor contributing to the making of the second statement. [p. 526]

The Court was clear in adding that “[n]o general rule excluded subsequent statements on the ground that they were tainted irrespective of the degree of connection to the initial admissible statement” (p. 526).

[30] It is plain from the above principles that the “derived confessions rule” emanates from the common law confessions rule. As such, like its parent, it is clear that it applies to secondary confessions, that is, statements made to a person in authority that are sufficiently connected to a previous involuntary confession to be deemed also involuntary. Whether the derived confessions rule also applies in respect of subsequent admissions made to persons not in authority, however, is not so clear.

[31] S.G.T. claims that this Court’s decision in R. v. G. (B.), 1999 CanLII 690 \(SCC\), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 475, stands for the proposition that a second statement need not be made to a person in authority in order to be excluded, but rather that a second statement will be excluded in any case where there is a sufficient connection between the two statements. The Court of Appeal below also placed much reliance on G. (B.). However, the interpretation that S.G.T. urges this Court to accept remains an open question. The majority in G. (B.) expressly declined to address this point, instead excluding the second statement (made to a psychiatrist) on the basis that it would be impossible to admit the second statement without also indirectly admitting the first statement, as the second statement at issue in that case actually contained the first, inadmissible statement (paras. 22 and 24). Moreover, the dissent in G. (B.), written by McLachlin J. (as she then was), with L’Heureux-Dubé and Gonthier JJ. concurring, explicitly rejected the contention that a second statement need not be made to a person in authority in order to be rendered inadmissible under this rule (para. 61).

[32] I respectfully disagree with Fish J. that “[a]s a matter of principle and logic” it is clear that “derived confessions need not be made to a person in authority in order to be found inadmissible” (para. 85). As a matter of principle, this broad assertion ignores the distinction between confessions and admissions discussed earlier. As for logic, much will depend on the facts of the particular case. Logic may have compelled the conclusion reached in G. (B.) where the later statement, which actually contained the earlier tainted confession given to the police, was made to a psychiatrist during the course of a court-ordered examination into his mental condition. It may not be so compelling in a case where, for example, the accused repeats the contents of the tainted confession to a personal friend who has no connection to the prosecution.

[33] It is not necessary, nor would it be appropriate on this record, to decide whether the derived confessions rule extends to admissions made to ordinary persons. It suffices for our purposes to assume that, given an appropriate evidentiary basis connecting the police inducement and the later e-mail, it would at least be arguable that the subsequent statement could be excluded, if not on the basis of the common law derived confessions rule, perhaps on a Charter basis. The distinction between the two possible bases for exclusion remains important as the application of the common law “derived confessions rule” would result in the automatic exclusion of the tainted statement, whereas under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms the question of exclusion would fall to be determined under s. 24(2). However, the defence did not raise the argument concerning the derived confessions rule at trial, nor did S.G.T. bring a Charter application seeking the exclusion of the e-mail. For example, it would have been an opportune time to raise the argument during the course of the voir dire into the admissibility of the police confession if the defence contended that there was some connection between the police confession and the e-mail. Again, no issue was raised when the trial judge specifically asked whether the defence contested the admissibility of the e-mail at the time the evidence was presented. Quite to the contrary, in answer to the trial judge's inquiry, the defence expressly consented to its admission.

[34] I am not unmindful of the fact that S.G.T. raised the question of competency of counsel before the Court of Appeal and that the court did not dispose of this ground of appeal. It is noteworthy for our purposes, however, that in specifying the grounds in support of his allegation of inadequate representation in his Notice of Appeal, S.G.T. made a number of specific allegations about the alleged inadequacies of his counsel but made no mention of counsel's consent to the admission of the e-mail. The only ground of appeal relating to the e-mail was an allegation that the "trial judge erred in placing excessive weight" on this item of evidence.

[35] More importantly, in deciding whether there was clear evidence that ought to have triggered the need for the trial judge to raise the issue on his own motion, an appellate court must consider the question from the perspective of the trial judge at the time the decision was made.

[36] Here, the most significant circumstance is that the defence consented to the admission of the evidence. In an adversarial system of criminal trials, trial judges must, barring exceptional circumstances, defer to the tactical decisions of counsel: see generally R. v. Lomage (1991), 1991 CanLII 7228 (ON CA), 2 O.R. (3d) 621 (C.A.), at pp. 629-30. There is a "strong presumption" that defence counsel are competent in advancing the interests of their clients: see R. v. G.D.B., 2000 SCC 22, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 520, at para. 27; Hodgson, at para. 99. Moreover, counsel will generally be in a better position to assess the wisdom, in light of their overall trial strategy, of a particular tactical decision than is the trial judge. By contrast, trial judges are expected to be impartial arbiters of the dispute before them; the more a trial judge second-guesses or overrides the decisions of counsel, the greater is the risk that the trial judge will, in either appearance or reality, cease being a neutral arbiter and instead become an advocate for one party. For these reasons, this Court has previously held that the burden to raise evidentiary issues properly rests on the shoulders of counsel: Hodgson, at para. 98.

[37] The corollary of the preceding is that trial judges should seldom take it upon themselves, let alone be required, to second-guess the tactical decisions of counsel. Of course, trial judges are still required to “make sure that [the trial] remains fair and is conducted in accordance with the relevant laws and the principles of fundamental justice”: Lavallee, Rackel & Heintz v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 61, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 209, at para. 68. However, reviewing the record from the perspective of the trial judge and taking into account the factors from I. (L.R.) which were discussed above, I find no basis to conclude that the trial judge ought to have interfered with the decision of counsel to consent to the admission of the evidence. The relevant features of the record are the following.

[38] On the facts, it is difficult to find evidence of a connection between the two statements which should have alerted the trial judge to the need to conduct a voir dire and to question the wisdom of counsel. In terms of the time span between the statements, the initial apology was made on May 27, 2004, while the e-mail was sent over five weeks later on July 5, 2004. The inducement held out by the police, as found by the trial judge on the voir dire, was the suggestion that S.G.T. may not be charged if he apologized. However, by the time S.G.T. sent the e-mail, he had been charged notwithstanding his apology in the police statement. It is therefore far from obvious on what basis the inducement could still be operative in the accused’s mind. Additionally, there was no advertence to the previous inadmissible statement in the e-mail to A’s mother. Finally, the two statements were made to different persons in entirely different circumstances. The first statement was made to a police officer in the context of a custodial interrogation, while the second was made to A’s mother in an e-mail exchange relating to A’s mother's attempt to secure S.G.T.'s permission to allow A and B to travel to California with her. But, more importantly, as the accused's later testimony in the trial revealed, it was his contention that the apology in the e-mail concerned a completely unrelated incident. This exemplifies why trial judges should generally defer to the tactical decisions of counsel who generally know more about the case. Given that the accused's own version was contrary to any theory of a potential connection between the e-mail and the earlier confession, it is difficult to see on what basis counsel's consent to the admissibility of the e-mail could be faulted.

[39] Based on this record, with respect, it is my view that the Court of Appeal erred in overturning the conviction on the basis that it did.

4. Conclusion

[40] For these reasons, I would allow the appeal and set aside the order for a new trial. As requested by both parties, I would remit this case to the Court of Appeal to consider S.G.T.'s remaining grounds of appeal.

The reasons of Binnie and Fish JJ. were delivered by

FISH J. (dissenting) —

I

[41] This appeal is the third chapter in a tale of two statements — closely related in subject matter, purpose and time. Both statements bear a striking resemblance as well to a fable conceived and disingenuously recounted to the respondent by a police interrogator as a “personal experience” of his own. The interrogator’s contrived “confidence” amounted, unmistakably, to an implied promise of leniency in exchange for a contrite admission of guilt. There is no dispute that the purpose and effect of this stratagem was to induce the respondent to make an incriminating statement in the form of an apology to the complainant.

[42] Pursuant to a voir dire, the trial judge excluded the first of the two statements on the ground that it had been rendered involuntary by the police officer’s improper inducement. The trial judge’s conclusion in this regard is not challenged on this appeal by the Crown. Nor was it challenged in the Court of Appeal.

[43] The second statement was admitted without a voir dire and the respondent was ultimately convicted (2006 SKQB 234 (CanLII)).

[44] The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal set aside the respondent’s conviction and ordered a new trial (2008 SKCA 119, 237 C.C.C. (3d) 55). Hence this third chapter of the saga — an appeal by the Crown urging us to reinstate the respondent’s conviction at trial.

[45] Unlike Justice Charron, and with the greatest of respect, I would affirm the unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal.

[46] I agree with the Court of Appeal that the trial judge was legally bound to himself determine the admissibility of the respondent’s second “apology”. It was tendered by the Crown as an incriminating statement by the accused. And the trial judge then had in the record before him a clear indication that this second “apology” might be a “derived confession”, inadmissible on account of its close connection to the statement he had earlier excluded.

[47] The holding of a voir dire for this purpose was not subject to, or conditional upon, an objection by defence counsel: Its necessity was made apparent by the material already on the record when the Crown tendered the statement.

[48] I hasten to add that we are not concerned in this case with a mere matter of form. An informal voir dire will often suffice to determine whether a statement attributed to the accused ought to be admitted in evidence. Here, however, the trial judge made no inquiry at all.

[49] And the total failure of the trial judge to make any independent determination as to the admissibility of the impugned statement is necessarily fatal to the respondent's conviction: According to the trial judge himself, the impugned statement was critical to the trial judge's conclusion that the respondent was guilty as charged.

II

[50] The respondent, S.G.T., was married to A.T. from 1996 until 2000. Their son B was born in 1997. A.T. also had a daughter from a prior relationship, A, whom S.G.T. adopted in 2000.

[51] Shortly thereafter, the couple separated. The split was acrimonious. For the next three years, the children spent two nights each week, every other weekend, and one month in the summer at S.G.T.'s house. A was 11 to 14 years old during that period.

[52] In 2003, A told her mother she was uncomfortable spending the night at S.G.T.'s house. When asked by A.T., she stated that S.G.T. had sexually assaulted her. A.T. phoned the police, but did not call back when she was asked to do so. No further action was taken until the following year when A told a school counsellor about the claimed assault. The counsellor contacted the police, who launched an investigation.

[53] On May 27, 2004, S.G.T. was interviewed by a police officer. During the interview, he was repeatedly told that the matter was “not a big deal” and “extremely minor”. The police officer said that if he apologized it might not proceed any further, and that the biggest factor the Crown looked at was remorse.

[54] One officer told S.G.T. a fabricated story according to which the officer had himself been arrested for slapping his son while on vacation in the United States. In this entirely fictional story, the matter was resolved once the officer apologized.

[55] We do not have the audio or video tapes of S.G.T.'s interrogation. With the benefit of those tapes, the Court of Appeal summarized the relevant facts this way:

On May 27, 2004, the appellant agreed to be interviewed by a police officer regarding the allegations. During a two-hour interview, the officer repeatedly and emphatically urged the appellant to apologize to [A] all the while saying that [A]'s complaints were “not a big deal”, not a “heinous act” and amounted to a “very insignificant contact”, or something “extremely minor”. The officer said it was not unlike smacking a child in public, and illustrated the point by recounting how he had been arrested for slapping his own child while on a holiday in the United States. The officer told the appellant the child welfare authorities had even become involved, but he had taken responsibility for his behaviour, apologized, and all had been forgiven. The story was entirely fabricated.

The officer explained to the appellant that the Crown would look at all the facts and ask whether it was in the public interest to proceed with the charges, or simply look at some kind of counselling instead. The most important thing they looked at was an apology, and if the appellant just apologized the matter might not proceed. He said he wasn't trying to hang the appellant, he just wanted closure for the victim. When the appellant expressed concern for the consequences, the officer assured him he would not lose his son, and he would not lose his job, and that the biggest factor the Crown looked at was remorse. When the appellant thought he should consult with someone, the officer said only dishonest people needed lawyers. The officer gave his word he would stick with the appellant throughout the matter. The appellant then wrote out a form of apology to [A]. [Emphasis added; paras. 15-16.]

[56] The officer's ruse achieved its intended purpose. Believing the officer's invented account of his own arrest to be true, S.G.T. wrote out the suggested apology. Approximately four weeks later, he was charged with sexual assault.

[57] Five days after the charges were laid, and about three weeks before S.G.T.'s first court appearance, he sent the following e-mail to A.T. in response to her requests for his permission to take the children to California to visit A.T.'s parents:

Relax. When have I ever not done something you've requested for the kids. I'm busy too. I have the letter and it's notarized [sic]. I thought long and hard about keeping [B] back so I could spend this month with him in case I end up going to fucking jail on the 28th, but I wouldn't do that to him. I hope you realize that I will never be able to coach [B] or travel outside Canada for a holiday with him or work. I may lose [sic] my job because of this. I don't care about you, but I very much hope that this will make [A] get and feel better. I am so, so sorry if I caused her emotional pain. I have to live with the fact that I lost someone I cared for deeply over my stupidity [sic]. And now I have to deal with [the] fact that I stand to lose [sic] everything I worked so hard for. I'm sure this makes you happy. You better hope for your sake you never make a mistake bringing up [B].

You can pick the letter up out of my mailbox, I have a commitment I have to be at tonight. Make sure [B] calls me at least once a week, I showed him how to dial collect.

S.G.T. was not represented by counsel when he wrote the e-mail.

[58] S.G.T. was tried in the Court of Queen's Bench for Saskatchewan before a judge sitting alone. At trial, Scheibel J. conducted a voir dire regarding the apology S.G.T. had written out under the officer's direction during his interrogation. Understandably, Justice Scheibel found that the apology had been improperly induced by the interrogating officer. He concluded that the Crown had failed to prove its voluntariness, as required by law. Justice Scheibel therefore excluded the apology. As mentioned earlier, the Crown did not attack this finding in the Court of Appeal.

[59] A.T., A, and S.G.T. all testified at trial. During the direct examination of A.T., the Crown asked her to identify and describe the e-mail from S.G.T. The Crown then sought to have the e-mail admitted in evidence. Defence counsel, asked by the trial judge whether there was "any objection", replied "No, My Lord." The e-mail, in effect a second "apology", was held admissible on this basis, without any inquiry or consideration regarding its connection to the previously excluded "apology".

[60] In his reasons convicting S.G.T., Justice Scheibel found that the case turned on credibility and that the e-mail had been crucial to his conclusion that S.G.T. was not credible.

[61] As I have already mentioned, the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal allowed S.G.T.'s appeal. Wilkinson J.A., writing for a unanimous court, held that the trial judge had erred in law by failing to hold a voir dire to determine the admissibility of the e-mail. She found that there was sufficient reason to believe that the e-mail was a tainted statement, or "derived confession", causally connected to the earlier inadmissible statement, and that a voir dire was therefore mandatory.

[62] Wilkinson J.A. rejected the Crown's submission that there was an insufficient connection between the two statements, since the only proper way to test that submission on its merits was by conducting a voir dire — which the trial judge had failed to do.

III

[63] The confessions rule serves to exclude involuntary statements made to persons in authority. The derived confessions rule is a corollary of the confessions rule. It excludes statements that are so closely connected to inadmissible confessions as to be “tainted” by association and, for that reason, inadmissible as well.

[64] The derived confessions rule thus excludes statements that, while not inadmissible when considered in isolation, are excluded because of their temporal or causal connection to another statement found by the court to be inadmissible. This occurs whenever “either the tainting features which disqualified the first confession continued to be present or . . . the fact that the first statement was made was a substantial factor contributing to the making of the second statement”: R. v. I. (L.R.) and T. (E.), 1993 CanLII 51 \(SCC\), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 504, at p. 526.

[65] The question is a contextual one, aimed at determining the degree of connection between the two statements. In I. (L.R.), the Court identified as relevant factors “the time span between the statements, advertence to the previous statement during questioning, the discovery of additional incriminating evidence subsequent to the first statement, the presence of the same police officers at both interrogations and other similarities between the two circumstances” (p. 526).

[66] In short, derived confessions are inadmissible not because they are themselves involuntary statements made or given to a person in authority, within the meaning of Ibrahim v. The King, [1914] A.C. 599 (P.C.), and its progeny, but because they are “tainted”, or contaminated, by another inadmissible statement. The governing principle was well and succinctly put this way by Bastarache J., speaking for the majority in R. v. G. (B.), 1999 CanLII 690 (SCC), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 475, at para. 23:

Ultimately, what matters is that the court is satisfied that the degree of connection between the two statements is sufficient for the second to have been contaminated by the first.

And the sufficiency of the required connection must be determined by the trial judge on a voir dire.

[67] Our concern here is with the admissibility of an e-mail found by the trial judge to be incriminating. Defence counsel did not request a voir dire. Quite properly, the trial judge recognized that no such request was essential.

[68] The trial judge appears to have recognized as well that the admissibility of the e-mail was open to question in view of the circumstances in which it was sent: He would not otherwise have thought it necessary to inquire whether defence counsel objected to its admission. Unfortunately, instead of proceeding with the required voir dire, the trial judge admitted the e-mail upon asking defence counsel whether there was “any objection”, and receiving a negative reply.

[69] Counsel can, of course, make admissions of fact that provide a sufficient evidentiary basis for the judicial determination that is the object of a voir dire. As a matter of principle, however, judicial determinations cannot be delegated to counsel. Thus, while admissions of fact may render unnecessary the calling of evidence, the legal effect of that evidence is for the judge alone to determine.

[70] I nonetheless accept, for present purposes only, that counsel can admit the voluntariness of a statement and even concede its admissibility in appropriate circumstances — for example, where that would be the judge’s inevitable finding on a voir dire.

[71] But that is not our case. Counsel made no admissions of fact concerning the admissibility of the tendered statement. Nor did he expressly concede its admissibility as a matter of law.

[72] And no such determination was made by the trial judge either.

IV

[73] Justice Charron would reverse the decision of the Court of Appeal and reinstate the respondent’s conviction on two grounds: First, because defence counsel did not object to admission of the e-mail; second, because my colleague sees no obvious connection between the e-mail and the earlier inadmissible statement to police. I respectfully disagree with my colleague on both grounds.

[74] With regard to the first ground, I repeat here what I stated earlier: As a matter of law, no objection was required. Where there is reason for concern about a statement tendered by the Crown, on account of its close connection with an earlier statement found on a voir dire to be inadmissible, the admissibility of the second statement also falls to be decided on a voir dire.

[75] This was made clear in G. (B.), which likewise concerned a derived confession, in that case made to a psychiatrist. Speaking for six members of the Court, Bastarache J. noted that defence counsel had “accepted” the psychiatrist’s report containing the incriminating statement in issue and did not object to the Crown’s use of the report on its cross-examination of the accused (para. 48). Justice Bastarache then stated:

The law on the question is clear. Despite s. 672.21(2) and (3) [of the Criminal Code, which deal with “protected statements”], it had to be determined whether the protected statement was admissible in light of its degree of connection with the prior confession which was found to be inadmissible. This degree of connection can only be assessed during a voir dire, which was accordingly mandatory (see [Erven v. The Queen, 1978 CanLII 19 (SCC), [1979] 1 S.C.R. 926]). By this I do not mean that there must be a voir dire on the voluntariness of the protected statement in every case; once again, this is a question that will have to be determined in another case. I am merely confirming that there must be a voir dire where, as here, the issue of whether the admission was derived from a prior inadmissible confession arises.

Whether the possibility of waiving the voir dire or consenting to the use of the protected statement is based on s. 672.21(2) or whether it has a more general foundation (see in this regard R. v. Dietrich (1970), 1970 CanLII 377 (ON CA), 1 C.C.C. (2d) 49 (Ont. C.A.)), it is well established that “[s]ilence or mere lack of objection does not constitute a lawful waiver” (see Park v. The Queen, 1981 CanLII 56 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 64, at p. 74). In the circumstances, the Crown cannot argue that the situation was otherwise. [Emphasis added; paras. 50-51.]

[76] In G. (B.), moreover, the Crown had alleged waiver by the accused of his right to a voir dire; in this case, the Crown, understandably, did not allege waiver either in the Court of Appeal or in this Court.

[77] I turn now to the second ground relied on by Justice Charron in concluding as she does. In my colleague's view, there was no obvious connection between S.G.T.'s e-mail to his former spouse and his earlier inadmissible statement to police.

[78] On the contrary, and with respect, I believe there was ample evidence on the record to alert the trial judge to the need for a voir dire. The judge had already excluded the initial confession written by S.G.T. during the police interrogation, and was thus familiar with the inducements that had provoked it.

[79] The e-mail was strikingly similar to the excluded statement. In both instances, S.G.T. apologizes and expresses regret "if I caused [A] emotional pain", and hopes his apology and expression of regret "will make [A] get and feel better" (I quote here from his e-mail).

[80] The timing of the e-mail should have raised red flags as well. The e-mail was written and sent by S.G.T. shortly before his first appearance in court. In the officer's fabricated story about his own arrest, he "explained to the appellant that the Crown would look at all the facts and ask whether it was in the public interest to proceed with the charges" (Court of Appeal, at para. 16 (emphasis added)). Here, the apology was made after the charges were laid but before the first court appearance, when it remained a live issue whether the Crown would proceed with "some kind of counselling instead" (ibid.) And it must be remembered in this regard that the police officer had "[given] his word he would stick with the appellant throughout the matter" (ibid.).

[81] Moreover, the improper inducements present when the inadmissible statement was given to the police — notably, the promise of leniency in exchange for a showing of remorse — were still operative. It was long ago recognized that promises of this type have a more enduring effect than threats: F. Kaufman, The Admissibility of Confessions (3rd ed. 1979), at p. 146. Nothing had intervened to neutralize its effect on the respondent. And no new evidence had subsequently been discovered, nor had S.G.T. retained counsel in the interval between the statements.

[82] In these circumstances, cumulatively considered, the connection between the two statements was apparent from the record and should have alerted the trial judge to the need for a voir dire to determine whether “the degree of connection between the two statements [was] sufficient for the second to have been contaminated by the first” (G. (B.), at para. 23).

[83] The Crown submits in response that clear evidence of a connection does not suffice to trigger the trial judge’s obligation to hold a voir dire, and this for two reasons. The first centres on the “person in authority” requirement for exclusion under the confessions rule. The Crown contends that this requirement applies to derived confessions as well.

[84] G. (B.) hardly supports this view. In that case, the derived confession was made to a psychiatrist and the Court, in holding that a voir dire was required, found it unnecessary to determine whether the psychiatrist was a person in authority:

The second statement is inadmissible because the first confession contaminated it. Therefore, it is not necessary to decide whether the second statement is a confession made to a person in authority in the present case. [Emphasis added; para. 22.]

If a statement can be excluded as a derived confession without determining whether it was made to a person in authority, it surely cannot be said that a derived confession will only be excluded if it is made to a person in authority. On the contrary, the Court in G. (B.) found the second statement inadmissible whether or not the psychiatrist to whom it was made was a person in authority. The statement was excluded on the sole ground that it was “contaminated” by the earlier confession. In this sense, “contamination” will be established “where there is a sufficient connection between the two statements” (G. (B.), at para. 22). See, to the same effect, I. (L.R.), at pp. 521-22. Nothing in G. (B.) limits this principle to derived confessions that explicitly repeat an earlier confession found to be inadmissible.

[85] As a matter of principle and logic, it seems clear to me that derived confessions need not be made to a person in authority in order to be found inadmissible. The purpose of the rule — to exclude statements with a sufficient connection to a prior inadmissible statement — would be frustrated if such a requirement were strictly enforced. Whether or not the subsequent statement was made to an authority figure, if it is prompted by the same police conduct that resulted in the earlier confession, or if it discloses the contents of the earlier statement made to authorities, it is a product of the inadmissible confession and is itself inadmissible on that ground alone. Of course, whether the statement is made to police will be a relevant factor in determining whether the required connection between the two statements has been made out.

[86] Second, the Crown relies on the fact that the defence offered a different explanation for the e-mail at trial. At trial, it was contended that the apology referred to an unrelated incident in which S.G.T. had allowed A and her friends to drink wine coolers at a sleepover. In this Court, the Crown relied on the wine cooler explanation to argue that there was no need for a voir dire on the admissibility of the e-mail.

[87] I find the Crown's submission regarding these varying explanations unconvincing on its face, and would in any event reject it as a backward-looking justification for the trial judge's failure to determine the admissibility of the apology at the relevant time — when it was tendered as part of the prosecution's case against the respondent.

[88] The Crown cannot now rely on what the trial judge could not then have known — evidence later adduced by the defence — to retroactively validate the judge's failure to hold a voir dire when the record before him required him to do so.

[89] For all of these reasons, as stated at the outset, I would dismiss the appeal and affirm the judgment of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal quashing the respondent's conviction and ordering a new trial.

Constitutional law -- Charter of Rights -- Arbitrary detention or imprisonment -- Accused arrested for aggravated assault and detained 18 hours before charge laid -- Accused kept in custody for the purposes of conducting an identification parade -- Whether accused's arrest lawful -- Whether accused arbitrarily detained -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 9 -- Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, ss. 450(1), 454(1).

Three Americans returning to Michigan were cut off by another vehicle as they approached the border near Windsor and were forced to stop. The driver and passenger of this vehicle got out and came over to the Americans' car. The driver punched one of the Americans while his passenger slashed all three of them with a knife. The victims gave to the police a general description of the assailants and of their vehicle -- a blue Ford, possibly a Thunderbird manufactured during the years 1973 to 1975. Two of the victims were later brought to the police station and, after reviewing some 800 photographs, selected 4 or 5 pictures of men who "looked like" the assailant with the knife. Significantly they both chose the photograph of one Darryl Cameron. Following an investigation, the police eliminated Cameron as a suspect. But the investigating officer's searches revealed that the appellant had been stopped on numerous occasions driving a 1973 blue Thunderbird, that he closely resembled Cameron and that he had a criminal record which included crimes of violence. A police bulletin was issued for his arrest on the charge of aggravated assault. The appellant was found six days later and arrested at 7:25 p.m. He was charged the next day at 1:44 p.m. The officer stated that the 18-hour delay in laying the formal charge was occasioned by the need to bring the victims to Windsor in order to conduct the identification parade which was the only method of identification available. At the line-up, the victims identified the appellant as their assailant. The police also found the ownership for a 1973 blue Thunderbird in the appellant's residence.

At trial, the judge found that the investigating officer had reasonable and probable grounds for the arrest but that the arrest was unlawful because it did not meet the criteria of s. 450\(2\) of the Criminal Code. He concluded that the arrest was arbitrary and in violation of s. 9 of the Canadian Charter of

Rights and Freedoms and ordered a stay of proceedings. The Court of Appeal allowed the Crown's appeal and ordered a new trial. This appeal is to determine whether the appellant's arrest and detention violated s. 9 of the Charter.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The appellant's arrest was lawful and proper. Section 450(1) of the Code is applicable to this case and not s. 450(2). Section 450(1) requires that an arresting officer must subjectively have reasonable and probable grounds on which to base the arrest. Those grounds must, in addition, be justifiable from an objective point of view. That is to say, a reasonable person placed in the position of the officer must be able to conclude that there were indeed reasonable and probable grounds for the arrest. On the other hand, the police need not demonstrate anything more than reasonable and probable grounds. Specifically they are not required to establish a prima facie case for conviction before making the arrest. In this case, the trial judge's finding that the investigating officer had reasonable and probable grounds to make the arrest was amply supported by the evidence. The reasonable grounds could be justified subjectively as well as objectively.

An arrest which is lawfully made does not become unlawful simply because the police intend to continue their investigation after the arrest. Here, the police had reasonable and probable grounds to arrest the appellant and there was nothing improper about their intention to continue the investigation. Neither that intention nor the continued investigation made the arrest unlawful.

The appellant's detention for 18 hours before the charge was laid, primarily for the purpose of furthering the police investigation, did not constitute an arbitrary detention. The identification parade was the fairest means as well as the sole practical means of identification. Since the appellant was arrested in the evening, it is unlikely that the victims, who lived outside the jurisdiction, could be found and brought to the line-up before the next morning. The appellant was brought before a justice of the peace and charged immediately after the line-up. In these circumstances, the delay was not unreasonable and offended neither s. 454(1) of the Code nor s. 9 of the Charter.

//Cory J.//

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

Cory J. -- At issue on this appeal is whether the arrest and detention of the appellant Storrey constituted a breach of the provisions of s. 9 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I. Factual Background

On July 26, 1983 three Americans were driving back to their homes in the State of Michigan. As they approached the International Bridge in Windsor, Ontario, another vehicle suddenly cut them off and forced them to stop. The driver and passenger of this vehicle got out and came over to the Americans' car. The driver punched one of the Americans while his passenger slashed all three of them with a knife. The injuries of one were serious enough to require hospitalization. The assailants then departed before they could be apprehended.

The two less seriously injured victims were taken to the police station shortly after the incident and reviewed some 800 photographs. From these they chose 4 or 5 "look-alikes". Significantly they both chose the photograph of one Darryl Cameron as "looking like" the assailant with the knife. All three of the victims gave a general description of the attackers that was similar. This enabled the police artist to make a composite drawing of the assailants. The victims also described the car used by their attackers as being a Ford, possibly a Thunderbird, blue in colour and manufactured during the years 1973 to 1975.

The ensuing investigation was rightly described by the trial judge as good police work. The officer in charge of the investigation, Detective- Sergeant Larkin, drove the victims about the City of Windsor after the incident. At that time the victims identified the car used by their attackers as a Thunderbird. Larkin then issued a police bulletin which contained a general description of the assailants and the car they used.

Larkin investigated the activities of Cameron whose picture had been identified by two of the victims. He learned that Cameron had not even been in the jurisdiction at the time of the assault. The officer then turned to the "persons investigated" file kept by the Windsor police. He undertook this review in order to locate and trace vehicles similar to that described by the victims, as he knew that a 1973 to 1975 blue Thunderbird was, if not a rare vehicle, certainly not a common one in the City of Windsor. As a result of his searches Larkin discovered that the appellant Storrey had been stopped on a number of occasions driving a 1973 blue Thunderbird. He then obtained a photo of Storrey from the files and compared it to the photo of Cameron. Larkin testified that the photos indicated that the two men were so similar that in his words they could have been brothers or twins. In addition, he found that the appellant had a criminal record which included crimes of violence.

As a result of these investigations, Larkin concluded that he had reasonable and probable grounds for the arrest of the appellant. He issued a bulletin for the arrest of Storrey on August 4. It was not easy to find the appellant. It was not until August 10 at 7:25 p.m. that he was arrested. However, the appellant was not formally charged and brought before a Justice of the Peace until shortly after 1:44 p.m. the next day, a little over eighteen hours from the time of his arrest. While the appellant was in custody, the police obtained a search warrant for his residence and found there the ownership for a 1973 blue Thunderbird car. When Storrey was asked where the car was he replied that he had "sorta" sold the car since he "didn't want it near him".

Larkin frankly stated that the delay in laying the formal charge resulted from his desire to have the victims attend at the police station to witness a line-up to see if they could identify the appellant. He explained that it was difficult to locate the victims because they were in another jurisdiction at some distance from the police station. Furthermore, in his view a police line-up was the only method of identification that was available to see if the victims could identify Storrey. Clearly, it was difficult to find Storrey as exemplified by the week that passed from the issuing of the bulletin to the time of his arrest. A less intrusive method of identification, such as attendance by the witnesses at the appellant's place of work, was thus unavailable.

At the line-up the victims identified the appellant as their assailant. Larkin readily conceded that if Storrey had not been identified at that time he would have been released. Indeed, Keith Girard, who was known to be an associate of the appellant, had also been arrested and had participated in the line-up. He was not identified and was released. It should be noted as well that there has been no suggestion that the police acted in bad faith at any time during the course of their investigation and arrest of the appellant.

II. The Decision on the Voir Dire

At trial it was contended that the arrest and detention of the appellant contravened the right guaranteed to him by s. 9 of the Charter. That section provides that: "Everyone has the right not to be arbitrarily detained or imprisoned". The trial judge then conducted a voir dire to determine whether there had been a breach of s. 9 of the Charter. Unfortunately, the reasons he gave at the conclusion of the proceeding indicate some confusion on his part. The appellant was arrested without a warrant on a charge of aggravated assault. Therefore, the basis for his arrest is to be found within s. 450(1) (now s. 495(1)) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34. That section provides that a peace officer may arrest without a warrant a person who has committed an indictable offence or who, on reasonable and probable grounds, he believes has committed or is about to commit an indictable offence. Nevertheless, the trial judge stated that the arrest was unlawful because it did not comply with the requirements of s. 450(2) of the Criminal Code. That section was inapplicable in this case. It only applies to an offence which is either a summary conviction offence, a hybrid offence or an indictable offence listed in s. 483 (now s. 553) of the Code, which list does not include aggravated assault. Sections 450(1) and 450(2) read as follows:

450. (1) A peace officer may arrest without warrant

- (a) a person who has committed an indictable offence or who, on reasonable and probable grounds, he believes has committed or is about to commit an indictable offence,
- (b) a person whom he finds committing a criminal offence, or
- (c) a person for whose arrest he has reasonable and probable grounds to believe that a warrant is in force within the territorial jurisdiction in which the person is found.

(2) A peace officer shall not arrest a person without warrant for

- (a) an indictable offence mentioned in section 483,
 - (b) an offence for which the person may be prosecuted by indictment or for which he is punishable on summary conviction, or
 - (c) an offence punishable on summary conviction,
- in any case where
- (d) he has reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the public interest, having regard to all the circumstances including the need to
 - (i) establish the identity of the person,
 - (ii) secure or preserve evidence of or relating to the offence, or

- (iii) prevent the continuation or repetition of the offence or the commission of another offence, may be satisfied without so arresting the person, and
- (e) he has no reasonable grounds to believe that, if he does not so arrest the person, the person will fail to attend in court in order to be dealt with according to law.

It can be seen that the requirements for an arrest without warrant are stricter in the circumstances provided for by s. 450(2).

The error made by the trial judge regarding s. 450 was serious enough in itself to question the validity of the ruling. However, there are still further indications of confusion. Early in his reasons, the trial judge stated that while Larkin undoubtedly had reasonable and probable grounds "in his own mind" for an arrest, the purpose of the arrest was strictly "as a further investigative tool to confirm or deny the suspicions of Detective-Sergeant Larkin". But later on, the trial judge appeared to make a clear finding of fact that Larkin objectively had a sufficient basis for making the arrest when he stated that "Detective-Sergeant Larkin had reasonable and probable grounds, based on the evidence he accumulated" to make the arrest, and that the only reason the arrest was unlawful was that it did not meet the criteria of s. 450(2). It was for this reason (the failure to meet the requirements of s. 450(2)) that the trial judge determined that the arrest was arbitrary and therefore in violation of s. 9 of the Charter. He went on to find that the appropriate remedy under s. 24\(1\) of the Charter was a stay of proceedings.

Court of Appeal

The Court of Appeal of Ontario, in unanimous reasons, concluded that the trial judge was in error. It held that there were reasonable and probable grounds for the arrest, that the detention was neither undue nor arbitrary and directed a new trial.

III. Were There Reasonable and Probable Grounds for Arresting the Appellant?

In order to determine whether the appellant was arbitrarily detained or imprisoned in this case, it is necessary to first review the authority under which Detective-Sergeant Larkin was acting when the arrest was made. The relevant provisions of the Code are ss. 450(1) and 454(1) (now ss. 495(1) and 503(1)). These sections read as follows:

450. (1) A peace officer may arrest without warrant

- (a) a person who has committed an indictable offence or who, on reasonable and probable grounds, he believes has committed or is about to commit an indictable offence,
- (b) a person whom he finds committing a criminal offence, or
- (c) a person for whose arrest he has reasonable and probable grounds to believe that a warrant is in force within the territorial jurisdiction in which the person is found.

454. (1) A peace officer who arrests a person with or without warrant or to whom a person is delivered under subsection 449(3) shall cause the person to be detained in custody and, in accordance with the following provisions, to be taken before a justice to be dealt with according to law, namely:

- (a) where a justice is available within a period of twenty-four hours after the person has been arrested by or delivered to the peace officer, the person shall be taken before a justice without unreasonable delay and in any event within that period, and
- (b) where a justice is not available within a period of twenty-four hours after the person has been arrested by or delivered to the peace officer, the person shall be taken before a justice as soon as possible, unless, at any time before the expiration of the time prescribed in paragraph (a) or (b) for taking the person before a justice,

- (c) the peace officer or officer in charge releases the person under any other provision of this Part, or
- (d) the peace officer or officer in charge is satisfied that the person should be released from custody, whether unconditionally under subsection (3) or otherwise conditionally or unconditionally, and so releases him.

Section 450(1) makes it clear that the police were required to have reasonable and probable grounds that the appellant had committed the offence of aggravated assault before they could arrest him. Without such an important protection, even the most democratic society could all too easily fall prey to the abuses and excesses of a police state. In order to safeguard the liberty of citizens, the Criminal Code requires the police, when attempting to obtain a warrant for an arrest, to demonstrate to a judicial officer that they have reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the person to be arrested has committed the offence. In the case of an arrest made without a warrant, it is even more important for the police to demonstrate that they have those same reasonable and probable grounds upon which they base the arrest.

The importance of this requirement to citizens of a democracy is self-evident. Yet society also needs protection from crime. This need requires that there be a reasonable balance achieved between the individual's right to liberty and the need for society to be protected from crime. Thus the police need not establish more than reasonable and probable grounds for an arrest. The vital importance of the requirement that the police have reasonable and probable grounds for making an arrest and the need to limit its scope was well expressed in Dumbell v. Roberts, [1944] 1 All E.R. 326 (C.A.), wherein Scott L.J. stated at p. 329:

The power possessed by constables to arrest without warrant, whether at common law for suspicion of felony, or under statutes for suspicion of various misdemeanours, provided always they have reasonable grounds for their suspicion, is a valuable protection to the community; but the power may easily be abused and become a danger to the community instead of a protection. The protection of the public is safeguarded by the requirement, alike of the common law and, so far as I know, of all statutes, that the constable shall before arresting satisfy himself that there do in fact exist reasonable grounds for suspicion of guilt. That requirement is very limited. The police are not called on before acting to have anything like a prima facie case for conviction; but the duty of making such inquiry as the circumstances of the case ought to indicate to a sensible man is, without difficulty, presently practicable, does rest on them; for to shut your eyes to the obvious is not to act reasonably.

There is an additional safeguard against arbitrary arrest. It is not sufficient for the police officer to personally believe that he or she has reasonable and probable grounds to make an arrest. Rather, it must be objectively established that those reasonable and probable grounds did in fact exist. That is to say a reasonable person, standing in the shoes of the police officer, would have believed that reasonable and probable grounds existed to make the arrest. See R. v. Brown (1987), 1987 CanLII 136 \(NS CA\), 33 C.C.C. (3d) 54 (N.S.C.A.), at p. 66; Liversidge v. Anderson, [1942] A.C. 206 (H.L.), at p. 228.

In summary then, the Criminal Code requires that an arresting officer must subjectively have reasonable and probable grounds on which to base the arrest. Those grounds must, in addition, be justifiable from an objective point of view. That is to say, a reasonable person placed in the position of the officer must be able to conclude that there were indeed reasonable and probable grounds for the arrest. On the other hand, the police need not demonstrate anything more than reasonable and probable grounds. Specifically they are not required to establish a prima facie case for conviction before making the arrest.

In the case at bar, the trial judge specifically stated that "Larkin had reasonable and probable grounds" to make the arrest. In my view there was ample evidence on which the trial judge could very properly make that finding. The reasonable grounds could be based subjectively on the testimony of Larkin and objectively upon the cumulative effect of the following items; (a) the possession and ownership by Storrey of a 1973 blue Thunderbird, which was a relatively unusual and uncommon car and was the type of car used in the infraction; (b) the fact that he had been stopped by the police on several occasions driving that car; (c) his past record of violence; (d) the fact that two of the victims picked out a picture of Cameron as someone who looked like their assailant; and (e) the remarkable resemblance of Storrey to Cameron. These factors taken together clearly were sufficient in their cumulative effect to constitute reasonable and probable grounds for Larkin to arrest the appellant. The Court of Appeal was correct in coming to the conclusion that this was indeed the finding of the trial judge on this issue and that he was correct in making that finding.

It should be noted, as well, that there is nothing to indicate that there was anything in the circumstances of the arrest which would make it suspect on any other ground. That is to say, there is no indication that the arrest was made because a police officer was biased towards a person of a different race, nationality or colour, or that there was a personal enmity between a police officer directed towards the person arrested. These factors, if established, might have the effect of rendering invalid an otherwise lawful arrest. However, the arrest of the appellant was in every respect lawful and proper.

It must next be seen whether the appellant could be detained after his arrest so that the police could continue their investigation.

Did the Professed Intention of the Police to Continue the Investigation After the Arrest Invalidate It?

It is the appellant's position that because the arrest was made in order to put the appellant in a line-up, it was improper. Reliance was placed on the majority decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in R. v. Duguay, Murphy and Sevigny (1985), 1985 CanLII 112 \(ON CA\), 18 C.C.C. (3d) 289, affirmed on other grounds, 1989 CanLII 110 \(SCC\), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 93. In that case, MacKinnon A.C.J.O. at p. 297, quoted Martin J.A. in R. v. Dedman (1981), 1981 CanLII 1631 \(ON CA\), 32 O.R. (2d) 641, at p. 653, wherein he stated:

. . . a police officer has no right to detain a person for questioning or for further investigation. No one is entitled to impose any physical restraint upon the citizen except as authorized by law, and this principle applies as much to police officers as to anyone else. Although a police officer may approach a person on the street and ask him questions, if the person refuses to answer the police officer must allow him to proceed on his way, unless, of course, the officer arrests him on a specific charge or arrests him pursuant to s. 450 of the Code

MacKinnon A.C.J.O. used this quote to support his position that an arrest which is made solely to assist in the investigation is an arrest made for an "improper purpose".

In my view, the judgment of MacKinnon A.C.J.O. must be considered in the context of the case itself. The facts in the Duguay decision were far different from those in the case at bar. In the Duguay case, on the night before the theft of his property the victim saw three young men drinking beer at the house next door. They exhibited an interest in his activities and in particular inquired, as he was putting his dog in the garage, whether the victim always put his dog in the garage. That night when the victim came home he discovered the theft of his belongings. The next morning he told his neighbour of the theft and about the incident of the night before. The neighbour advised him that he knew who the three young men were. The neighbour called the young men and asked them to his house. When they arrived the police arrested the young men and some time later obtained a confession from them that they had committed the theft.

It is important to note that the neighbour did not state and did not know that the three men committed the robbery. The only information the neighbour possessed was that of the identity of the three men the victim had seen drinking beer the night before. There was absolutely no evidence connecting the three accused with the crime. It came as no surprise that the trial judge found that there was no basis for the police statement that they had reasonable and probable grounds to believe the accused had committed the crime. Indeed, one of the officers testified that: "We arrested them to determine whether they actually did it or not". Thus the arrest in the Duguay case could not and did not comply with the requirements of s. 450(1) of the Code and the arrest was unlawful. Against this background of an unlawful arrest, the Court of Appeal then considered whether the detention of the accused violated s. 9 of the Charter. It was in this context that MacKinnon A.C.J.O. stated that an arrest which had been made solely to assist in an investigation was an arrest made for an "improper purpose".

The statement goes no further than confirming that an otherwise unlawful arrest cannot be justified on the grounds that it was necessary in order to further the investigation of the crime. It should not be taken as establishing a principle that whenever a lawful arrest is made, in circumstances where the police intend to do further investigation, that the arrest should then be considered to have been made for an improper purpose.

On the contrary, it has long been the rule in Canada and the United Kingdom that the police can continue their investigation subsequent to an arrest. The essential role of the police is to investigate crimes. That role and function can and should continue after they have made a lawful arrest. The continued investigation will benefit society as a whole and not infrequently the arrested person. It is in the interest of the innocent arrested person that the investigation continue so that he or she may be cleared of the charges as quickly as possible.

This well established principle was reiterated by Lord Denning, M.R., in Dallison v. Caffery, 1906 CanLII 168 (MB KB), [1964] 3 W.L.R. 385 (C.A.), at p. 398:

When a constable has taken into custody a person reasonably suspected of felony, he can do what is reasonable to investigate the matter, and to see whether the suspicions are supported or not by further evidence. He can, for instance, take the person suspected to his own house to see whether any of the stolen property is there; else it may be removed and valuable evidence lost. He can take the person suspected to the place where he says he was working, for there he may find persons to confirm or refute his alibi. The constable can put him up on an identification parade to see if he is picked out by the witnesses. So long as such measures are taken reasonably, they are an important adjunct to the administration of justice. By which I mean, of course, justice not only to the man himself but also to the community at large. The measures must, however, be reasonable.

The same principle was confirmed by the House of Lords in Holgate-Mohammed v. Duke, [1984] A.C. 437, at p. 445.

An arrest which is lawfully made does not become unlawful simply because the police intend to continue their investigation after the arrest. To repeat, in the case at bar the police had reasonable and probable grounds on which to base their decision to arrest the appellant. Further, there was nothing improper about the police intention to continue their investigation of the crime after they had made the arrest. Neither that intention nor the continued investigation made the arrest unlawful. The circumstances of the arrest of the appellant did not constitute an infringement of s. 9 of the Charter.

IV. Did the Detention for 18 Hours Before the Charge Was Laid Constitute an Arbitrary Detention?

It was the appellant's position that his detention for 18 hours before a formal charge was laid was an unreasonable delay caused solely by the desire of the police to further their investigation. It was said that the detention contravened the provisions of s. 454(1) of the Code and s. 9 of the Charter. As noted above, Detective-Sergeant Larkin candidly stated that the delay in laying the formal charge was occasioned by the need to bring the victims to Windsor in order to conduct the identification parade. He conceded that although he had adequate grounds to arrest the appellant, he did not have sufficient evidence to warrant a conviction without a further identification. He readily agreed that if the appellant had not been identified, he would have been released in the same manner as Girard. The issue then is whether in the circumstances of this case the detention of the appellant for the significant period of a little over 18 hours, primarily for the purpose of furthering the police investigation, constituted a violation of s. 9 of the Charter.

For convenience, s. 454(1) is here set out again:

- 454. (1) A peace officer who arrests a person with or without warrant or to whom a person is delivered under subsection 449(3) shall cause the person to be detained in custody and, in accordance with the following provisions, to be taken before a justice to be dealt with according to law, namely:
- (a) where a justice is available within a period of twenty-four hours after the person has been arrested by or delivered to the peace officer, the person shall be taken before a justice without unreasonable delay and in any event within that period, and

unless, at any time before the expiration of the time prescribed in paragraph (a) or (b) for taking the person before a justice,

(c) the peace officer or officer in charge releases the person under any other provision of this Part, or

(d) the peace officer or officer in charge is satisfied that the person should be released from custody, whether unconditionally under subsection (3) or otherwise conditionally or unconditionally, and so releases him.

In R. v. Koszulap (1974), 1974 CanLII 1461 \(ON CA\), 27 C.R.N.S. 226, at p. 234, Martin J.A. of the Ontario Court of Appeal carefully noted that s. 454(1) does not give a police officer "an unqualified right to keep such person in custody for the purposes of investigation for a period of 24 hours before taking such person before a justice". Instead, he observed, the section states that the police must take the person before a justice without unreasonable delay and that the 24 hours is simply the outer limit of the time span.

However, in the circumstances of this case the elapsed time was not unreasonable. It will be remembered that over six days had elapsed from the time of issuing the bulletin for the appellant's arrest until the moment that the arrest was made. This is clearly not a case where the victim could, for example, be taken to the place of employment of the suspect to see if an identification could be made. An identification parade seemed not only the fairest means of identification, but also the sole practical means of identification. Further, the victims themselves lived outside the jurisdiction. It was necessary to make arrangements to bring them across the border to attend the line-up. It will be recalled that the appellant was arrested at 7:25 at night. It would be unlikely that the victims could be found and brought to the line-up before the next morning. The appellant was brought before the justice immediately following the line-up which was held shortly after 1:44 p.m. This was a little more than 18 hours after the arrest.

In R. v. Precourt (1976), 1976 CanLII 692 \(ON CA\), 39 C.C.C. (2d) 311 (Ont. C.A.), Martin J.A. considered a somewhat similar factual situation. In that case the accused was arrested for robbery at 4:30 p.m. He gave an exculpatory statement to the police at 11:30 p.m. and was kept in detention overnight so that he could be placed in a line-up the next morning. On these facts, Martin J.A. at p. 319 stated:

It could not be suggested that there was anything improper in the investigation conducted by the police on the evening of August 21, 1973, with the apparent assistance of the appellant, or that the investigating officers were not justified in holding the appellant at the police station overnight with a view to placing him and [his co-accused] in a line-up the following morning.

It that case, it was held that the only improper conduct on the part of the police consisted in taking the accused back to the police station after he had been remanded in custody by a provincial judge when he should have been taken to a provincial jail. The fact that the accused was kept in custody for the purposes of conducting an identification parade, before taking him before a magistrate, was not deemed to be an unreasonable delay.

Position in Other Jurisdictions

It has been seen that the English authorities permit the police to continue their investigations following the arrest while the accused is detained and before the arrested person is formally charged.

The Australian authorities are of little or no assistance in the consideration of this issue as the wording of the applicable Australian legislation is very different from ours.

The American cases dealing with this issue are also of limited value as most of them deal with Rule 5(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Rule 5(a) reads:

RULE 5. PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSIONER

(a) Appearance before the Commissioner.

An officer making an arrest under a warrant issued upon a complaint or any person making an arrest without a warrant shall take the arrested person without unnecessary delay before the nearest available commissioner or before any other nearby officer empowered to commit persons charged with offenses against the laws of the United States. When a person arrested without a warrant is brought before a commissioner or other officer, a complaint shall be filed forthwith.

The American authorities stress the importance of the factual background to the resolution of each case. Nevertheless, of interest is the case of Ralph v. Pepersack, 335 F.2d 128 (4th Cir. 1964). The court there stressed again the importance of the facts. It then continued at p. 139:

In the circumstances it was reasonable and necessary to hold Ralph in custody until Mrs. Peck could, with reasonable dispatch, come to the station and attempt to identify him Had she been able to positively identify him as her assailant, he should have been formally charged immediately. If, on the other hand, she could say with certainty that he was not the person who attacked her and had not other circumstances justifying his detention developed, he should then have been released. Confrontation by the only witness to the crime for which he was convicted presented the most expeditious, probably the most reliable and perhaps the only, means of determining whether Ralph was telling the truth. [Emphasis in original.]

The court concluded that there was not unreasonable delay in that case and that even if Rule 5(a) was applicable, it had not been violated.

This conclusion was reached even though the reasons noted further at p. 139 that:

The second, and more fundamental, answer . . . is that neither Rule 5(a) nor the McNabb-Mallory rule is applicable to criminal prosecutions in the state courts.

It can be seen that this American decision seems to support the position I have taken.

V. Disposition

In the particular circumstances of the case at bar, the delay was not unreasonable and in my view offended neither the provisions of s. 454\(1\) of the Criminal Code nor s. 9 of the Charter.

In the result, the appeal is dismissed and the order of the Court of Appeal directing a new trial is confirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

In January 1995 the appellants received notices informing them that the respondent Minister intended to seek revocation of their Canadian citizenship on the ground that they had obtained it by failing to divulge to Canadian officials details of their involvement in atrocities committed during the Second World War. At the appellants' request, the cases were referred to the Federal Court -- Trial Division. Numerous procedural disputes then arose. On December 12, 1995 counsel for one of the appellants argued for the whole day on the preliminary motions before the Associate Chief Justice. In January 1996 the court advised the parties that May 15 and 16 had been set aside for the completion of the argument. Counsel for the respondent wrote a letter to the court administrator, a copy of which he sent to counsel for the appellants, complaining in strong terms about the slow progress of the cases. Following a teleconference with the parties, the Associate Chief Justice confirmed that oral argument on the preliminary issues would take place on May 15 and 16, 1996. On March 1, T, the Assistant Deputy Attorney General in charge of civil litigation at the federal Department of Justice, met with the Chief Justice of the Federal Court. The two men discussed the scheduling of the appellants' cases and later that day exchanged letters, neither of which was copied to any of the counsel for the appellants. In his letter to the Chief Justice, T referred to the fact that the Attorney General was being asked to consider taking a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to determine some preliminary points of law primarily because the Trial Division was unable or unwilling to proceed with the cases expeditiously. In his reply, the Chief Justice stated that he had discussed T's concerns with the Associate Chief Justice, and that both were prepared to take all reasonable steps to avoid such a reference. He added that the Associate Chief Justice said he had not fully appreciated "the urgency of dealing with these matters as expeditiously as the Government would like" until he had read T's letter. However, now that he was aware of the Government's concerns he would devote one week from May 15 to deal with the cases not only with respect to the preliminary points but also with respect to the merits. The respondent provided copies of these letters to the appellants. Counsel for the appellants advised the court that they would move for a stay of proceedings on the ground that T and the Chief Justice had interfered with the independence of the Associate Chief Justice. The Associate Chief Justice then recused himself. He directed that the appellants' cases should go forward under a new judge. The appellants' application for a stay of proceedings was granted. The Federal Court of Appeal, having decided that it had jurisdiction to consider the appeal, set aside the stay.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The Federal Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to hear the Crown's appeal in this case. The stay of proceedings ordered was not a decision made "under" s. 18\(1\) of the Citizenship Act. Section 18(1) refers to a very particular kind of decision: a decision as to whether a person "has obtained, retained, renounced or resumed citizenship" by false pretences. Whether s. 18(1) is interpreted narrowly as encompassing only the ultimate decision as to whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences, or more broadly to include the interlocutory decisions made in the context of a s. 18(1) hearing which are related to this determination, it is apparent that it does not encompass an order granting or denying a stay of proceedings. Section 18\(3\) of the Citizenship

Act, which provides that no appeal lies from a decision of the Trial Division made under s. 18(1), thus does not apply. A decision allowing or denying a motion for a stay of proceedings is a decision made under s. 50 of the Federal Court Act and may be appealed according to the rules set out in s. 27 of that Act.

The appearance of judicial independence suffered significantly as a result of the meeting between T and the Chief Justice. The test for determining whether the appearance of judicial independence has been maintained is whether a reasonable observer would perceive that the court was able to conduct its business free from the interference of the government and of other judges. As a general rule of conduct, counsel for one party should not discuss a particular case with a judge except with the knowledge and preferably with the participation of counsel for the other parties to the case. The meeting between T and the Chief Justice, at which counsel for the appellants were not present, violated this rule and was clearly inappropriate, despite the fact that the occasion for the meeting was a highly legitimate concern about the exceedingly slow progress of the cases. Again as a general rule, a judge should not accede to the demands of one party without giving counsel for the other parties a chance to present their views. It was therefore clearly wrong, and seriously so, for the Chief Justice to speak to the Associate Chief Justice at the instance of T. While a chief justice is responsible for the expeditious progress of cases through his or her court and may under certain circumstances be obligated to take steps to correct tardiness, the actions of the Chief Justice here were in the nature of a response to a party rather than to a problem. Similarly, the Associate Chief Justice acted inappropriately by responding as he did to the Chief Justice's intervention without the participation of counsel for the appellants. A reasonable observer apprised of the workings of the Federal Court and of all the circumstances would perceive that the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice were improperly and unduly influenced by a senior officer of the Department of Justice. However, there is no persuasive evidence of bad faith on the part of any of those involved, nor is there any solid evidence that the independence of the judges in question was actually compromised.

An appellate court may not lightly interfere with a trial judge's decision to grant or not to grant a stay of proceedings, which is a discretionary remedy. While a stay is usually sought to remedy some unfairness to the individual that has resulted from state misconduct, there is also a "residual category" of cases in which a stay may be warranted. This residual category comprises cases in which a prosecution is conducted in such an unfair or vexatious manner that it contravenes notions of justice and thus undermines the integrity of the judicial process. For a stay of proceedings to be appropriate in a case falling into the residual category, it must appear that the state misconduct is likely to continue in the future or that the carrying forward of the prosecution will offend society's sense of justice. It must also be shown that no remedy other than a stay is reasonably capable of removing this misconduct. As well, it may be necessary in some cases to balance the interests that would be served by granting a stay of proceedings against the interest that society has in having a final decision on the merits. This balancing process would not be appropriate in the case of an ongoing affront to judicial independence or of a particularly egregious interference, either of which would outweigh any interest society might have in continuing the proceedings. Neither of these circumstances is present here.

A stay of proceedings is not the appropriate remedy in these cases. First, there is no likelihood that the carrying forward of the cases will manifest, perpetuate or aggravate any abuse. Second, the lesser remedy of ordering the cases to go forward under the supervision of a different judge of the Trial Division without any direction or intervention from the Chief Justice or the Associate Chief Justice will suffice. Third, Canada's interest in not giving shelter to those who concealed their wartime participation in acts of atrocities outweighs any foreseeable harm that might be done to the appellants or to the integrity of the system by proceeding with the cases. The appropriate remedy here is to have the cases against the appellants go forward under the supervision of a judge of the Trial Division who has had nothing to do with the affairs that form the subject matter of this appeal. The judge appointed will ignore all directions previously given by the Associate Chief Justice or the Chief Justice in these cases. The Chief Justice and Associate Chief Justice should not have anything further to do with these cases.

//The Court//

1 THE COURT -- This appeal raises three principal questions. The first and threshold question is whether this Court has jurisdiction to hear an appeal from a decision of a judge of the Federal Court -- Trial Division to stay a citizenship revocation proceeding. The second question is whether certain events constituted an actual or apparent affront to judicial independence. The third question is whether, if there was any affront to judicial independence, a stay was, under the circumstances, the appropriate remedy.

I. Facts

2 The facts of this appeal present some difficulties. Much of the relevant evidence was known to Cullen J., who considered the appellants' application at first instance. But other items of evidence emerged only recently, following an order of this Court dated May 5, 1997. The additional evidence was not considered at trial and so has not given rise to any findings of fact. It is accordingly for this Court to determine the weight that should be assigned to it.

A. The Evidence That Was Available to the Trial Division

3 The following was known to the Trial Division and to the Federal Court of Appeal. Both courts based their decisions entirely upon it.

4 On January 27, 1995, the Registrar of Canadian Citizenship sent Notices of Revocation to the appellants, Helmut Oberlander, Johann Dueck and Erichs Tobiass. The purpose of these notices was to inform the appellants that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration ("the Minister") intended to seek revocation of their Canadian citizenship on the ground that they had obtained it by failing to divulge to Canadian officials details of their involvement in atrocities committed during the Second World War. Mr. Oberlander, it was said, had concealed his "membership in the German Sicherheitspolizei und SD and Einsatzkommando 10A during the Second World War and [his] participation in the executions of civilians during that period of time"; Mr. Dueck his "membership in the Selidovka district (ralon) police in German occupied Ukraine during the period 1941 to 1943, and [his] participation in the executions of civilians and prisoners-of-war during that time”; and Mr. Tobias his “membership in the lettische Sicherheitshilfspolizei (commonly known as the Arajs Kommando) subordinate to the German Sicherheitspolizei und SD during the period 1941 to 1943 in German occupied Latvia and [his] participation in the executions of civilians during that time and [his] membership in the Waffen SS during the period 1943 to 1945”.

5 As they were entitled to do under s. 18(1)(a) of the Citizenship Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-29, the appellants asked the Minister to refer their cases to the Federal Court -- Trial Division. By May 1, 1995, the Minister had referred all three cases to the court.

6 There then followed many procedural disputes. In May of 1995, the respondent sought directions from the court about the procedure to be followed and the appellants sought disclosure of the respondent’s case. On June 30, 1995, the respondent’s motions for directions came on for hearing before Jerome A.C.J. During the initial hearing, counsel for the appellants raised many preliminary issues. The Associate Chief Justice ordered the three cases joined for purposes of resolving the preliminary issues and he set a timetable for the filing of arguments in relation to them.

7 Throughout the summer of 1995, the appellants sought disclosure of documents that they judged to be relevant to their preliminary motions. In addition, they pressed the respondent to produce the details of the case against them. On August 25, 1995, Mr. Christopher Amerasinghe, who was counsel for the respondent at the time, informed counsel for the appellant Dueck that many of the relevant documents were in the process of being translated and so were unavailable.

8 On October 4, 1995, Jerome A.C.J. telephoned the parties to schedule the argument of the preliminary motions. Mr. Amerasinghe indicated that he intended to claim that certain documents sought by the appellants were privileged. The parties agreed that the questions of disclosure and privilege had to be settled before the cases could proceed. The Associate Chief Justice chose December 12, 1995 as the date upon which he would hear argument concerning those questions. Mr. Amerasinghe agreed that December 12 was “a reasonable date as scheduling goes in courts in Toronto”.

9 In November, the respondent released some documents to the appellants but withheld others. On December 12, 1995, counsel for the appellant Dueck argued for the whole day. At the end of the day, the matter was set over for continuation.

10 On January 10, 1996, the Federal Court -- Trial Division advised the parties that May 15 and 16, 1996 had been set aside for the completion of the argument that had begun on December 12, 1995. Less than a week later, Mr. Amerasinghe wrote to the Court Administrator to protest the May dates. In the letter, a copy of which he sent to counsel for the appellants, Mr. Amerasinghe pointed out that many of the proposed witnesses were of “advanced age” and “frail in health”. He complained in strong terms about the slow progress of the cases.

11 On February 19, 1996, the parties and the Associate Chief Justice participated in a teleconference. Mr. Amerasinghe repeated the points he had made earlier in his letter to the Court Administrator and offered to make submissions in writing in order to expedite the resolution of the preliminary issues. The Associate Chief Justice decided that he wished to have oral submissions. He confirmed that the oral argument would take place on May 15 and 16, 1996.

The events that form the heart of this appeal took place on March 1, 1996. On that day, Mr. Ted Thompson, who was the Assistant Deputy Attorney General in charge of civil litigation at the federal Department of Justice, met with Isaac C.J. of the Federal Court. The two men discussed the scheduling of the appellants' cases and later that day exchanged letters, neither of which was copied to any of the counsel for the appellants. The letters read as follows:

March 1, 1996

HAND DELIVERED

The Honourable Chief Justice J. A. Isaac
Federal Court of Canada
Supreme Court of Canada Building
Ottawa, Ontario
K1A 0H9

Dear Chief Justice Isaac:

Re: Erichs Tobias, T-569-95, Helmut Oberlander, T-866-95 and Johann Dueck, T-938-95

Further to our meeting of this morning in which I advised you that the Attorney General of Canada is being asked to consider taking a Reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to determine some preliminary points of law primarily because the Federal Court Trial Division is unable or unwilling to proceed with the subject cases expeditiously.

Notices of Intention to revoke the citizenship of the above-named individuals were sent out in January of 1995. They were persons who had been investigated in connection with allegations of war crimes and crimes against humanity during the second world war. Over the course of the next three months the cases were referred to the Federal Court. After complying with the requirements of Rule 920, Motions were brought requesting directions from the Court regarding discovery of evidence and taking evidence on commission. The Motions were filed April 13th (Tobias), May 11th (Oberlander) and May 18th (Dueck), 1995 respectively. These Motions were necessary as there are no procedural rules governing these proceedings. We suggested the procedure followed in the Luitjens case be followed. Our Motion was originally set down for argument on June 30, 1995. Associate Chief Justice Jerome had become seized of the three cases and determined to hear all preliminary motions regarding them. On June 30th, counsel for Dueck argued that the three cases should be joined and also indicated that he wished to bring a Motion to stay the proceedings for abuse of process. Jerome, A.C.J. joined the three cases and granted adjournments over the objections of our counsel. September 15, 1995 was set as the date for the filing of facta and in a tele-conference call on October 4, 1995 he set December 12, 1995 as the date on which argument was to be heard.

On December 12th, counsel for Dueck was permitted to argue all day and it was necessary to set the matter over for continuation. Jerome, A.C.J. indicated that the continuing date would be in February of 1996 despite our request for an earlier date and having regard to the fact that counsel for Dueck was available in early January. The Court declined to fix a date for continuation while all parties were present. When our counsel called the Court in January of 1996 requesting a date for continuation, he was advised several days later that argument had been set down for May 15th and 16th. We wrote the Court expressing concern about the long day [sic] and the urgency of proceeding with this matter. We suggested concluding the argument by written submissions. Counsel for Mr. Dueck objected and Jerome, A.C.J. indicated that even with written submissions he would want oral argument and on February 18th via tele-conference with all parties he ordered that the dates of May 15 and 16 stand.

There are likely to be approximately 12 similar cases brought to the Federal Court with as many as 6 persons being given notice during the course of this year.

We are very concerned if these cases are not dealt with expeditiously they will never be heard on their merits. A crucial witness on the Tobiass case has cancer and may not be able to testify. In the Dueck case one key witness has died, one is in hospital and two others are so ill that they are unable to travel. Our counsel has estimated that at the current pace of proceeding and considering appeals in respect to interlocutory matters it will be years before these matters can be heard on their merits.

As you know, there is great public interest in seeing these cases disposed of on their merits and the potential for embarrassment is very high should it be seen that the Justice system is unable to respond to these urgent cases in a timely way.

I would appreciate any assistance you can offer.

Yours very truly,

J. E. Thompson
Assistant Deputy Attorney General

Mr. J. E. (Ted) Thompson, Q.C.

Assistant Deputy Attorney General
Civil Litigation Section
Department of Justice
Ottawa K1A 0H8

Dear Mr. Thompson:

Re: Erichs Tobiass T-569-95, Helmut Oberlander T-866-95 and
Johann Dueck T-938-95

I refer to our discussions this morning and to your subsequent letter concerning these matters.

I have discussed your concerns with the Associate Chief Justice and, like me, he is prepared to take all reasonable steps possible to avoid a Reference to the Supreme Court of Canada on these matters.

The Associate Chief Justice has informed me that there are now before the Court five citizenship revocation cases -- the three mentioned in your letter which are being dealt with by Mr. Amerasinghe and, two earlier ones: one is being dealt with by Ms. Charlotte Bell (Khalil) and the other by Mr. Amerasinghe (Nemsila). The Associate Chief Justice has heard all of the evidence and argument in Nemsila but he had been asked by counsel for Nemsila to defer judgment in that case until Khalil has been concluded. Argument has commenced in that latter case and has been adjourned to 29 April for continuation.

In light of the concerns expressed in your letter the Associate Chief Justice will meet with Ms. Bell and, Ms. Jackman who appears for the Respondent, early next week to fix an early date for final argument. If an early date cannot be fixed he will give judgment in Nemsila and then deal with Khalil at the earliest possible date.

As regards the three cases about which you wrote, the Associate Chief Justice says firstly, that he did not fully appreciate until he read your letter, the urgency of dealing with these matters as expeditiously as the Government would like. However, now that he is aware he will devote one week from 15 May to deal with these cases not only with respect to the preliminary points but also with respect to the merits. Finally, he has authorized me to say that additional cases of this class coming into the Court will be given the highest priority in light of the concerns expressed in your letter.

Yours truly,

Julius A. Isaac

c.c.-- The Hon. James A. Jerome
Associate Chief Justice

13 On March 7, 1996, the respondent provided copies of these letters to the appellants. In the cover letter, Mr. Amerasinghe explained that Mr. Thompson had approached the Chief Justice at the beginning of March to discuss the conduct of citizenship revocation cases generally and had, in the course of the meeting, happened to mention the appellants' cases.

14 On April 2, 1996, counsel for the appellants Dueck and Oberlander requested disclosure of all documents that related directly or indirectly to the meeting that took place on March 1, 1996. Mr. Amerasinghe answered the next day that "there is no other correspondence between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice relating to this matter". No disclosure was made of any documents besides the letters themselves.

15 On April 10, 1996, the Court Administrator informed counsel that the Associate Chief Justice would hear argument concerning preliminary motions on May 15 and 16, 1996, and if necessary during the following week. The Associate Chief Justice also sent word that he intended to be done with the cases by July of 1996.

16 On April 23, 1996, counsel for the appellants advised the court that they would move for a stay of proceedings on the ground that Mr. Thompson and Isaac C.J. had interfered with the independence of Jerome A.C.J. On April 30, counsel for the appellants Dueck and Oberlander indicated that they would be content to have the Associate Chief Justice remain in charge of the cases. Counsel for the appellant Tobiass had nothing to say on the subject, though he had indicated earlier that he would not object to having the Associate Chief Justice remain to settle the preliminary motions.

17 On May 6, the Associate Chief Justice recused himself. He directed that the appellants' cases should go forward under a new judge on May 15, 1996 and indicated that the new judge's list would be cleared to permit him to deal expeditiously with any remaining questions that the cases might pose.

B. Further Evidence

18 On May 5, 1997, this Court ordered the respondent to produce "[t]he internal Department of Justice documents concerning the fact[s] referred to" in a report prepared for the Government by former Chief Justice of the Ontario Court of Appeal, the Honourable Charles Dubin. On May 22, the Court ordered the respondent to comply fully with the order of May 5. In response to the two orders, the respondent disclosed many internal documents.

19 The following emerges from these documents.

20 Counsel for the respondent objected strongly to the Associate Chief Justice's management of the appellants' cases. It appears that Mr. Amerasinghe had concluded as early as December 14, 1995 that the Associate Chief Justice was a "problematic" judge.

21 On February 27, 1996, the Department of Justice's Litigation Committee decided that "our only option in the circumstances [i.e. in response to delay in the Federal Court -- Trial Division] appears to be a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada of the preliminary questions that have been raised". Mr. Thompson seems not to have been present during the discussion. A reference in a subsequent memorandum reveals that "the Litigation Committee at its meeting on February 27, 1996, specifically recommended that no one should approach the Chief Justice to apprise him of the government's intention to refer certain questions to the Supreme Court".

22 On March 1, 1996, Mr. Amerasinghe made the following note of a telephone conversation between himself and Mr. Thompson:

J.E.T. [J. Edward (Ted) Thompson] Called and informed me he had met with Isaac who told him that he would get Jerome to recuse himself from the cases and would put an efficient judge to deal quickly with the cases. Isaac had said he would ensure any appeals would be dealt with speedily.

According to Mr. Amerasinghe, later that same day the Chief Justice dined at Mr. Thompson's home.

23 More than two months after the meeting between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice took place, Mr. Amerasinghe recorded his suspicion that Mr. Thompson's real intention in approaching the Chief Justice had been to protect a friend from the embarrassment of a reference to the Supreme Court. Indeed, Mr. Amerasinghe indicated that Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice were friends and frequent interlocutors. According to Mr. Amerasinghe's report, the Chief Justice invited Mr. Thompson to inform him of perceived problems with the administration of the Federal Court, and Mr. Thompson obliged.

II. Judgments in Appeal

A. Trial Division, 1996 CanLII 4077 \(FC\), [1996] 2 F.C. 729

24 On the strength of the letters exchanged by Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice on March 1, 1996, Cullen J. concluded that irreparable harm had been done to the appearance of judicial impartiality. He entered a stay of proceedings.

25 Cullen J. thought that a reasonable observer presented with the letters of March 1, 1996 might conclude that, as a result of the meeting between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice, pressure was brought to bear on the Associate Chief Justice to hurry the appellants' cases along, quite possibly to the appellants' detriment. In this way damage was done to the appearance of judicial independence.

26 Because it was the Chief Justice who intervened, and the Chief Justice enjoys some authority over the entire court, Cullen J. thought that a reasonable observer would worry that the independence of all the judges and not only of the Associate Chief Justice had been compromised.

27 Having concluded that the appearance of judicial independence had suffered, Cullen J. considered whether a stay of proceedings was the appropriate remedy. He concluded that no remedy other than a stay of proceedings would cure the wrong done to the appearance of judicial independence. A less radical remedy would only “weaken judicial independence and leave the impression that transgressions of the Court’s integrity may be reprimanded but, ultimately, will be forgotten” (p. 748).

B. Federal Court of Appeal

28 The respondent purported to appeal Cullen J.’s decision.

(i) Motion to Quash for Want of Jurisdiction

29 The appellants moved to quash the appeal for want of jurisdiction. They argued that s. 18(3) of the Citizenship Act placed Cullen J.’s decision to stay the proceedings beyond appeal. The court dismissed the motion over Pratte J.A.’s dissent: (1996), 208 N.R. 49.

(a) Marceau J.A.

30 Marceau J.A. held that Cullen J.’s decision was capable of appeal. He concluded that s. 18(3) bars appeal only of decisions that a person has or has not obtained citizenship by impermissible means. He agreed (at p. 53) that the bar extends also to “all interlocutory rulings and decisions made with a view to ultimately coming to” a decision on the merits. However, he thought that the decision to enter a stay of proceedings did not come within the bar, because such a decision is neither a decision on the merits nor a decision made with a view to coming to a decision on the merits.

(b) Stone J.A.

31 Stone J.A. read s. 18(3) of the Citizenship Act as barring appeal only of decisions made under s. 18(1). Section 18(3), he argued, does not bar appeal of decisions made under other provisions of the Citizenship Act or under other Acts of Parliament. Because Cullen J. entered the stay using a power given by s. 50(1) of the Federal Court Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. F-7, s. 18(3) of the Citizenship Act did not bar an appeal of it.

(c) Pratte J.A. (dissenting)

32 Pratte J.A. interpreted s. 18(3) as barring appeal not only of a final decision on the merits of a citizenship reference but also of “the myriad of decisions that the Trial Division may make in the course of the reference including . . . a decision granting or refusing a stay of the reference proceedings” (p. 52). He judged that any other reading of the provision would lead to absurdities.

(ii) Stay of Proceedings

33 Having decided that it had jurisdiction to consider the appeal, the court unanimously set aside the stay of proceedings: 1997 CanLII 6328 (FCA), [1997] 1 F.C. 828. Each judge offered his own reasons for doing so.

34 Marceau J.A. concluded that the Associate Chief Justice had retained his judicial independence throughout the period in question. He noted that it is part of the role of a chief justice to manage his or her court. A chief justice must ensure that the court provides “timely justice”. Therefore, when a chief justice learns, by whatever means, that the pace of a proceeding is abnormally slow, he or she has a positive duty to investigate, though care must be taken not to interfere with the adjudicative functions of the presiding judge. In the light of this understanding of the role of a chief justice, Marceau J.A. could find no evidence to support the conclusion that the Chief Justice had done anything improper in approaching the Associate Chief Justice to discuss the pace of the appellants’ case.

35 Marceau J.A. likewise concluded that the appearance of judicial independence had not suffered as a result of the Chief Justice’s intervention with the Associate Chief Justice.

36 Although in Marceau J.A.’s view there had been no affront to judicial independence, he nevertheless considered whether, if there had been an affront, a stay of proceedings would have been the appropriate remedy. He concluded that it would not have been.

37 The question, in Marceau J.A.’s mind, was whether going ahead with the proceedings would perpetuate the appearance of impropriety. The inquiry was forward-looking. What happened in the past could not justify a stay unless its ill effects were likely to persist. Marceau J.A. concluded that if the proceedings were to go ahead under some other judge, the appearance of an affront to judicial independence would be dispelled. It was quite unreasonable to suppose, as Cullen J. did, that the entire bench of the Trial Division had been tainted.

38 Because he concluded that Cullen J. had exercised his discretion to grant a stay on the basis of a mistaken understanding of the governing principles, Marceau J.A. held that the stay should be set aside.

(b) Pratte J.A.

39 Pratte J.A. wrote only to add two observations to Marceau J.A.'s reasons. The first was that no reasonable person would ever conclude from the Chief Justice's intervention in the appellants' cases that the independence of every member of the Trial Division had been compromised. The second was that Cullen J. was wrong to conclude that there was nothing unusually slow about the pace of the proceedings. The pace of the proceedings before the Associate Chief Justice "had been so slow as to certainly give rise to a suspicion that justice was not rendered with reasonable diligence" (p. 835). Thus, when the Chief Justice learned of the situation, regardless of how the information came to him, he was "duty bound to intervene".

(c) Stone J.A.

40 Although concurring with his colleagues, Stone J.A. took an approach slightly different from theirs. He agreed with them there was "nothing in the record to suggest that the motivation for the meeting with and the letter to the Chief Justice was other than to convey the concern of a party for perceived delay in the progress of the cases in view of the age and state of health of the respondents and of potential witnesses" (p. 867). However, he believed that the appearance of judicial independence had suffered as a result of the events of March 1, 1996.

41 Having found some apprehension of bias, Stone J.A. had to consider what the appropriate remedy might be. He was not persuaded that what he had before him amounted to one of the “clearest of cases”, in which a stay of proceedings was warranted. Although what transpired was improper, there was no evidence that either Mr. Thompson or the Chief Justice had acted in bad faith. Stone J.A. agreed with Marceau J.A. that the lesser remedy of a new proceeding before a new judge would sufficiently answer any affront that the appearance of judicial independence had suffered.

III. Issues

42 This appeal presents three issues. The first is whether an appeal lies from a decision of a judge of the Trial Division to grant a stay of proceedings in a citizenship revocation proceeding commenced under s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act. The second is whether judicial independence, or the appearance of it, suffered as a result of the meeting between Mr. Thompson and Isaac C.J. The third is whether, if any damage was done to the appearance of judicial independence, the trial judge properly exercised his discretion to enter a stay of proceedings.

IV. Analysis

43 We conclude that an appeal lies from a decision of the Trial Division to grant a stay of proceedings in a case such as this one. We further conclude that the appearance, but not the fact, of judicial independence suffered as a result of the meeting between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice, but that a stay of proceedings is not the appropriate remedy.

A. Jurisdiction

44 The appellants contend that, in light of s. 18(3) of the Citizenship Act, Cullen J.'s order was final and could not be appealed either to the Federal Court of Appeal or to this Court. To properly assess the merits of this submission, the interplay between s. 18 of the Citizenship Act and ss. 27 and 50 of the Federal Court Act must be considered.

45 Section 18 of the Citizenship Act provides that:

18. (1) The Minister shall not make a report under section 10 unless the Minister has given notice of his intention to do so to the person in respect of whom the report is to be made and

(a) that person does not, within thirty days after the day on which the notice is sent, request that the Minister refer the case to the Court; or

(b) that person does so request and the Court decides that the person has obtained, retained, renounced or resumed citizenship by false representation or fraud or by knowingly concealing material circumstances.

(3) A decision of the Court made under subsection (1) is final and, notwithstanding any other Act of Parliament, no appeal lies therefrom. [Emphasis added.]

Section 2 of the same Act makes it clear that the “Court” referred to in s. 18 is the Federal Court -- Trial Division.

46 Sections 27 and 50 of the Federal Court Act provide that:

27. (1) An appeal lies to the Federal Court of Appeal from any

(a) final judgment,

- (b) judgment on a question of law determined before trial,
- (c) interlocutory judgment, or
- (d) determination on a reference made by a federal board, commission or other tribunal or the Attorney General of Canada,

of the Trial Division.

50. (1) The Court may, in its discretion, stay proceedings in any cause or matter,

- (b) where for any . . . reason it is in the interest of justice that the proceedings be stayed.

47 Section 27 of the Federal Court Act provides a general right of appeal from final and interlocutory judgments of the Federal Court -- Trial Division. Section 18(3) of the Citizenship Act, however, provides that “notwithstanding any other Act of Parliament”, no appeal lies from any decision of the Federal Court -- Trial Division made “under” s. 18(1). Thus, s. 18(3) of the Citizenship Act effectively removes the general right of appeal set out at s. 27 of the Federal Court Act with respect to all decisions made “under” s. 18(1).

48 No doubt Parliament may validly limit the jurisdiction of the Federal Court of Appeal in this manner. As this Court held in Roberts v. Canada, 1989 CanLII 122 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 322, at p. 331, “the Federal Court is without any inherent jurisdiction such as that existing in provincial superior courts”. See also: ITO--International Terminal Operators Ltd. v. Miida Electronics Inc., 1986 CanLII 91 (SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 752, at p. 766; Quebec North Shore Paper Co. v. Canadian Pacific Ltd., 1976 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1977] 2 S.C.R. 1054; and McNamara Construction (Western) Ltd. v. The Queen, 1977 CanLII 13 (SCC), [1977] 2 S.C.R. 654. There is no appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal save in those circumstances specifically provided by statute.

49 Nevertheless, during the oral hearing and in the submissions made subsequently, some doubt was expressed as to whether s. 18(3) of the Citizenship Act had the effect of ousting the jurisdiction conferred upon this Court by s. 40 of the Supreme Court Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. S-26 (assuming without deciding that this provision would otherwise apply). Furthermore, it was suggested that, if s. 18(3) had such an effect, s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms may be the source of a right of appeal directly to this Court in certain circumstances. However, in light of the conclusion reached as to the interpretation of s. 18(3) of the Citizenship Act, it will not be necessary to address these issues.

50 We agree with the conclusion of the Federal Court of Appeal that the stay of proceedings ordered by Cullen J. was not a decision made “under” s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act. Section 18(3) of the Citizenship Act therefore does not apply to it and an appeal lies to the Federal Court of Appeal pursuant to s. 27 of the Federal Court Act.

51 This conclusion flows from the wording of s. 18. Section 18(1) refers to a very particular kind of decision: a decision as to whether a person “has obtained, retained, renounced or resumed citizenship” by false pretences. However, a stay of proceedings is entered for reasons which are completely unrelated to the circumstances surrounding the obtaining, retaining, renouncing or resuming of citizenship. Indeed, a decision to order (or not to order) a stay of proceedings is different from the type of determination that the Court is called upon to make under subsection 18(1).

52 This point was recognized by the Federal Court of Appeal in Luitjens v. Canada (Secretary of State) (1992), 9 C.R.R. (2d) 149, where it was held that a decision under s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act is not a “final judgment” of the Federal Court -- Trial Division for the purposes of s. 27 of the Federal Court Act (at p. 152):

. . . there is no conflict at all between s. 18(3) and s. 27(1). First, this decision is not a “final judgment” of the court, nor is it an “interlocutory judgment”. Although the decision followed a hearing at which much evidence was adduced, it was merely a finding of fact by the court, which was to form the basis of a report by the minister and, eventually, a decision by the Governor in Council, as described by ss. 10 and 18(1). The decision did not finally determine any legal rights.

53 By way of contrast, a stay of proceedings is most definitely a “final judgment” of the Federal Court -- Trial Division. It has the effect of permanently bringing the proceedings to an end. It is a decision made under s. 50 of the Federal Court Act and not under s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act.

54 It may be argued that a literal interpretation of s. 18(1) leads to the absurd and inequitable result that only a decision that a person obtained citizenship by false pretences would be final and without appeal. The opposite decision, namely that a person did not obtain citizenship by false pretences, could be appealed by the Minister.

55 Yet the language of s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act should not be taken to mean that this subsection encompasses only a positive decision that citizenship was obtained by false pretences. It is true that s. 18(1) provides that the Minister may issue a report under s. 10 only if the court decides that citizenship was in fact obtained by false pretences. However, this language necessarily implies that the court may arrive at the opposite conclusion. Therefore, on its plain meaning, s. 18(1) empowers the Federal Court -- Trial Division to decide whether citizenship was “obtained, retained, renounced or resumed” by false pretences. Such a decision, be it affirmative or negative, is a decision made “under” s. 18(1). It may not be appealed either by the person who is the subject of the reference or by the Minister.

56 Although the issue does not arise here, there is a great deal of force to the argument that s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act encompasses not only the ultimate decision as to whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences, but also those decisions made during the course of a s. 18 reference which are related to this determination. This would encompass all the interlocutory decisions which the court is empowered to make in the context of a s. 18 reference (see, for instance, s. 46 of the Federal Court Act and Rules 5, 450-455, 461, 477, 900-920, 1714 and 1715 of the Federal Court Rules, C.R.C., c. 663). This interpretation of s. 18(1) was adopted by the Federal Court of Appeal in Luitjens, supra, where it was held that interlocutory decisions made in the context of s. 18(1) reference are decisions made “under” s. 18(1). It is not necessary for the purpose of this decision to determine whether this conclusion should be varied. That should only be done in an appeal where the issue arises from the facts.

57 However, whether s. 18(1) is interpreted narrowly as encompassing only the ultimate decision as to whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences, or more broadly to include the interlocutory decisions made in the context of a s. 18(1) hearing which are related to this determination, it is apparent that it does not encompass an order granting or denying a stay of proceedings.

58 Unlike interlocutory decisions, a stay of proceedings will not be made in order to more efficiently determine the ultimate question of whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences. An order staying proceedings is therefore not related to this ultimate decision.

Furthermore, it may be that allowing appeals from interlocutory decisions made in the context of a s. 18 reference would effectively defeat Parliament's goal of finality in citizenship matters. As McLachlin J. observed in R. v. Seaboyer, 1991 CanLII 76 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 577, there is a valid policy concern to control the "plethora of interlocutory appeals and the delays which inevitably flow from them" (p. 641). This same concern will not, however, generally apply to orders staying proceedings. Stays of proceedings are granted but rarely and only in the "clearest of cases". They are granted for reasons unrelated to the merits of the s. 18 reference and are usually divorced from the "citizenship" context of the reference. Allowing appeals from stays of proceedings would therefore not seriously threaten the goal of finality in citizenship matters.

It should be noted that, even if s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act were to be interpreted as encompassing not only the final determination as to whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences but also any decisions related to this determination, an exception should be made for a decision to deny a motion for a stay of proceedings. It is arguable that a decision denying a stay of proceedings is "related" to the question of whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences insofar as it has the effect of allowing the inquiry on the merits to proceed. However, it would appear to be fundamentally unfair, and contrary to the rules of natural justice, to allow appeals to be taken from a decision to order a stay of proceedings but not from a decision refusing to order a stay. Such a result could not have been intended by Parliament.

It follows that a decision allowing or denying a motion for a stay of proceedings is not a decision made "under" s. 18(1). It is a decision made under s. 50 of the Federal Court Act and may be appealed according to the rules set out at s. 27 of that Act. The appellants contend that this is at odds with the principles set out in R. v. Jewitt, 1985 CanLII 47 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 128. They argue that the better interpretation of s. 18 of the Citizenship Act is that all decisions made in the context of a s. 18 reference, be they final or interlocutory, "on the merits" or procedural, should be considered to have been made “under” s. 18(1) and therefore are subject to s. 18(3).

62 At issue in Jewitt was s. 605(1)(a) (now s. 676(1)(a)) of the Criminal Code which provided for a right of appeal by the Crown “against a judgment or verdict of acquittal” in certain circumstances. It was held that any order of the Court, regardless of the terminology used, which effectively brings proceedings to a final conclusion in favour of the accused is tantamount to a verdict of acquittal for the purposes of appeal. Such an order includes a stay of proceedings.

63 The appellants contend that if, in the criminal law context, a stay of proceedings is for the purposes of appeal tantamount to a decision on the merits, there is no reason for holding that it is not tantamount to a decision as to whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences under s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act. The principle underlying Jewitt, it is argued, is that substance ought to triumph over form. If the order has the effect of bringing the proceedings to a close, it should, for the purposes of appeal, be considered a decision on the merits in favour of the person against whom the proceedings were instituted.

64 On their face the reasons in Jewitt appear to be compelling authority in favour of the appellants’ position. However, Jewitt must be read in light of the more recent judgment of R. v. Hinse, 1995 CanLII 54 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 597. There, the accused sought leave to appeal a judgment of the court of appeal setting aside his conviction and entering a stay of proceedings. The issue was whether such a judgment is tantamount, for the purposes of appeal, to a judgment setting aside a conviction and entering a verdict of acquittal or ordering a new trial. The majority of this Court held that it was not.

The statutory basis of the court of appeal's power to order a stay of proceedings was held to be not s. 686(2) of the Criminal Code (which empowers the court to set aside a conviction and from which no appeal by the accused lies), but s. 686(8) (which empowers the court to make ancillary orders). Furthermore, it was held that, as an order made under s. 686(8) of the Criminal Code, a stay of proceedings does not represent "a functionally integral part of a 'judgment . . . setting aside or affirming a conviction' " (p. 626). Rather, it was held that "an order rendered under s. 686(8) represents a separate, divisible judicial act from which the accused or the Crown may independently seek leave to appeal under s. 40(1) of the Supreme Court Act" (p. 626). On this point, Lamer C.J. held, at pp. 619-20, that:

The power of an appellate court to impose a stay of criminal proceedings, similar to a trial court, derives its origin from the inherent jurisdiction of a superior court of record at common law. But given the breadth of the language of the residual order provision, I believe that the concrete exercise of that inherent power necessarily manifests itself through the statutory font of s. 686(8). . . . While the power of a court of appeal to order a stay of proceedings for abuse of process traces its origins to the common law, the actual exercise of that authority inevitably carries a statutory gloss by virtue of s. 686(8) of the Criminal Code. . . .

But while an appellate court's power to direct a stay of criminal proceedings ought to be properly understood as an exercise of its authority to enter an order under s. 686(8) of the Code, an order under s. 686(8) nonetheless represents a fundamentally distinct judicial order from an order for a new trial in accordance with s. 686(2)(b) within the structure of the appeals regime of the Criminal Code. As such, I do not believe that both types of orders are necessarily jointly excluded from this Court's general jurisdiction to grant leave by virtue of s. 40(3) of the Supreme Court Act.
[Emphasis added.]

This reasoning applies with equal force in the context of the Citizenship Act. The power to order a stay does not flow by necessary implication from the power to decide if citizenship was obtained by false pretences, set out at s. 18(1). Rather, it is a power which not only has its source in a different statutory provision (s. 50 of the Federal Court Act) but is also unrelated to the power set out at s. 18(1). To borrow the words of Lamer C.J. in Hinse, it is a “separate, divisible judicial act” (p. 626). Appeals from a decision to stay proceedings (or to refuse to enter a stay) should therefore be governed by the rules applicable to the statutory provision empowering the court to make this decision. Those rules are set out at s. 27 of the Federal Court Act and they provide expressly for a right of appeal. It follows that the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to hear the Crown’s appeal in this case.

B. Judicial Independence

67 We conclude that the meeting between Mr. Thompson and Isaac C.J. and the subsequent conduct of officials of the Department of Justice did indeed cause damage to the appearance of judicial independence. The question remains as to the extent of that damage and how it should be weighed in considering whether a stay should be granted in these significant and important proceedings.

68 The independence of judges has two aspects: an institutional aspect and a personal aspect. As Le Dain J. wrote in Valente v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 673, at p. 691:

. . . the word “independent” in s. 11(d) of the Charter is to be understood as referring to the status or relationship of judicial independence as well as to the state of mind or attitude of the tribunal in the actual exercise of its judicial function.

The parties agree that it is the personal aspect of judicial independence -- what is sometimes called “impartiality” -- that is at issue here. No one alleges, and indeed there is no credible evidence to suggest, that the integrity of the Federal Court as an institution has been compromised.

69 Though it is very important that the judiciary should actually remain independent, it is equally important that the judiciary should be seen to be independent. In our view, there is not sufficient evidence to support the conclusion that the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice did not in fact remain independent. However, the evidence does compel us to conclude that the appearance of judicial independence suffered significantly as a result of what happened on March 1, 1996.

70 The test for determining whether the appearance of judicial independence has been maintained is an objective one. The question is whether a well-informed and reasonable observer would perceive that judicial independence has been compromised. As Lamer C.J. wrote in R. v. Lippé, 1990 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 114, at p. 139, “[t]he overall objective of guaranteeing judicial independence is to ensure a reasonable perception of impartiality”.

71 The essence of judicial independence is freedom from outside interference. Dickson C.J., in Beauregard v. Canada, 1986 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 56, described the concept in these words, at p. 69:

Historically, the generally accepted core of the principle of judicial independence has been the complete liberty of individual judges to hear and decide the cases that come before them: no outsider -- be it government, pressure group, individual or even another judge -- should interfere in fact, or attempt to interfere, with the way in which a judge conducts his or her case and makes his or her decision. This core continues to be central to the principle of judicial independence.

72 What emerges from all of this is a simple test for determining whether the appearance of judicial independence has been maintained: whether a reasonable observer would perceive that the court was able to conduct its business free from the interference of the government and of other judges.

73 There are many principles of professional conduct that must be observed in order to maintain the appearance of judicial independence. Two of these are particularly relevant here.

74 First, and as a general rule of conduct, counsel for one party should not discuss a particular case with a judge except with the knowledge and preferably with the participation of counsel for the other parties to the case. See the Honourable J. O. Wilson, A Book for Judges (1980), at p. 52. The meeting between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice, at which counsel for the appellants were not present, violated this rule and was clearly inappropriate, and this despite the fact that the occasion for the meeting was a highly legitimate concern about the exceedingly slow progress of the cases.

75 Second, and again as a general rule, a judge should not accede to the demands of one party without giving counsel for the other parties a chance to present their views. It was therefore clearly wrong, and seriously so, for the Chief Justice to speak to the Associate Chief Justice at the instance of Mr. Thompson. We agree with Pratte J.A. that a chief justice is responsible for the expeditious progress of cases through his or her court and may under certain circumstances be obligated to take steps to correct tardiness. Yet, the actions of Isaac C.J. were more in the nature of a response to a party rather than to a problem. Thus, an action that might have been innocuous and even obligatory under other circumstances acquired an air of impropriety as a result of the events that preceded it. Quite simply, it was inappropriate.

In similar fashion, by responding as he did to the Chief Justice's intervention without the participation of counsel for the appellants, Jerome A.C.J. acted inappropriately. We believe that there is ample evidence that might lead a reasonable observer to conclude that the Associate Chief Justice was not able to conduct the appellants' cases free from the interference of the federal Department of Justice and of the Chief Justice of his court. Before March 1, 1996, the Associate Chief Justice was content with the pace at which the appellants' cases were advancing through his court. Indeed, even after Mr. Amerasinghe wrote to the Court Administrator to complain about the slow pace of the proceedings, the Associate Chief Justice resolved not to expedite consideration of the preliminary motions. Instead, he insisted on hearing oral argument according to the original, exceedingly dilatory schedule. It was only after the March 1, 1996 meeting between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice that Jerome A.C.J. acquired an appreciation of the Government's position. In his letter of March 1, 1996, the Chief Justice wrote:

As regards the three cases about which you wrote, the Associate Chief Justice says firstly, that he did not fully appreciate until he read your letter, the urgency of dealing with these matters as expeditiously as the Government would like. However, now that he is aware he will devote one week from 15 May to deal with these cases not only with respect to the preliminary points but also with respect to the merits. Finally, he has authorized me to say that additional cases of this class coming into the Court will be given the highest priority in light of the concerns expressed in your letter.
[Emphasis added.]

Subsequent developments confirmed that the Associate Chief Justice had indeed finally received the Government's message. On April 10, 1996, the Associate Chief Justice retreated from his earlier position and announced that he would set aside sufficient time in May to dispose of all the preliminary issues in the appellants' cases. He also indicated that he would bring the cases to a final conclusion by July.

78 We do not see how a reasonable observer could fail at least to wonder whether the Government, through Mr. Thompson, had succeeded in influencing the Associate Chief Justice to take a position more favourable to the Government's interests than he would otherwise have done. Making this conclusion even more likely is the undertaking of the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice to Mr. Thompson that all reasonable steps would be taken to avoid a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada.

79 The respondent tries to resist this conclusion by saying that the impetus to efficiency came not from Mr. Thompson and the Government but from the Chief Justice. The Chief Justice, the respondent says, was duty-bound to look into what was, by any objective standard, a serious delay in proceedings in his court. The respondent thus offers the Chief Justice as a kind of novus actus interveniens who stands between the Government and the Associate Chief Justice and, by the propriety of his own intentions, severs what would otherwise be an improper link between them.

80 What the respondent's submission overlooks is that the Chief Justice was not able to exercise his administrative function entirely free from outside interference. Mr. Thompson approached the Chief Justice and told him that if the Associate Chief Justice did not pick up the pace, the Federal Court would face the embarrassment of having the Government go "over its head" to this Court. The Chief Justice's letter to Mr. Thompson suggests that this "threat" carried some weight with him and with the Associate Chief Justice as well:

I have discussed your concerns with the Associate Chief Justice and, like me, he is prepared to take all reasonable steps possible to avoid a Reference to the Supreme Court of Canada on these matters.

It is reasonable to suppose that the threat of appeal to a higher authority influenced the Chief Justice and Associate Chief Justice to act in a way that would otherwise have been unpalatable to them. In this we agree entirely with Stone J.A., who found that “an informed person would conclude that this decision, by which the hearing of all preliminary motions and the trials would be compressed into a relatively short time frame, would redound to the disadvantage of the individual respondents [now appellants] and was taken so as ‘to avoid’ a reference to the Supreme Court” (p. 868). To interfere with the scheduling of cases because of delay is one thing but to pledge to take all reasonable steps to avoid a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada is quite another. It is wrong and improper for a judge to give such an undertaking. What is pertinent is to avoid delays, not to avoid appeals or recourse to higher courts.

81 However, the respondent is quite right to observe that the delay in the Federal Court -- Trial Division was inordinate and arguably inexcusable, and posed a real problem for the Department of Justice and for the Chief Justice. The fact is that in the space of a year, the Associate Chief Justice heard only one day of argument, and that on a preliminary motion. In our view, the Associate Chief Justice’s dilatoriness defies explanation. The appellants attempt nevertheless to explain it, saying that the Associate Chief Justice had reason to delay the proceedings until judgment had been given by himself in a case called Nemsila, which might have cast some light on citizenship revocation cases generally. The Chief Justice for his part mentioned the Nemsila case in his letter of March 1, 1996, though he did not attempt to offer it as a justification for delay in the appellants’ cases.

82 However, even accepting that there was reason to await the rendering of judgment in Nemsila, the proper procedure would have been to hear argument on the appellants’ motion and, if necessary, to reserve judgment. To call three cases to a halt awaiting the outcome of another case strikes us as a procedure calculated to create unnecessary delay. The appellants also point out that the respondent was not ready to proceed to a hearing on the merits. Apparently the respondent had not finished translating certain witness statements. But no one has suggested that the matter should have been brought to a conclusion on the merits before May 15, 1996, only that some progress should have been made toward resolving the preliminary questions before that date, and to settle the preliminary questions would not have required that all the witness statements should be available. Therefore, the fact that the respondent was not yet ready to proceed to trial cannot excuse the delay in the Associate Chief Justice's consideration of the preliminary questions.

83 What all this means is that Mr. Thompson went to the Chief Justice with a legitimate grievance. This fact does not excuse what Mr. Thompson did -- he assuredly chose an impermissible means of presenting his grievance -- but it does cast into very real doubt the sinister interpretation that the appellants have attempted to place on his conduct. Given the vexing delay that the respondent had faced in the Trial Division, it is quite understandable that Mr. Thompson would have wished to do something about it. We believe that Mr. Thompson's motives were proper. It was his judgment that is questionable. What Mr. Thompson did was not wicked or done in bad faith. It is enough to say that what he did was inappropriate. As senior counsel in the Department of Justice, he arranged to speak privately -- without opposing counsel present -- to the Chief Justice, concerning cases which were pending. This he should not have done.

84 The appellants suggest that there was a "conspiracy" to have the Associate Chief Justice recuse himself from the cases. Clearly there is insufficient evidence before this Court to dispose of this question fully, and we do not believe that it is crucial to the outcome of this appeal. Still, in our view, to accept that suggestion would stretch the bounds of credulity. Although Mr. Amerasinghe recorded that Mr. Thompson had gotten the Chief Justice to agree to have the Associate Chief Justice recuse himself, the evidence is all inconsistent with the existence of any such agreement. As events developed, the Associate Chief Justice did not recuse himself. Quite the contrary, on April 10, 1996, the Associate Chief Justice indicated that he wished to hear argument concerning the preliminary motions on May 15 and 16, as previously scheduled. It was only after the appellants indicated that they would seek a stay of proceedings on the ground that the Associate Chief Justice's independence had been compromised that the Associate Chief Justice recused himself. In the light of these events, the only way that the suggestion of a conspiracy can be credited is on the supposition that Mr. Thompson, the Chief Justice, and the Associate Chief Justice orchestrated the whole affair, from the disclosure of the March 1 correspondence through to the appellants' motion for a stay of proceedings. Again, we would emphasize that we lack the evidence necessary to decide this question and do not purport to do so. But that supposition passes all belief. Certainly no reasonable observer, apprised of all the facts, would believe it. Therefore, all that Mr. Amerasinghe's note shows is that Mr. Amerasinghe believed that some arrangement had been made to have the Associate Chief Justice recuse himself. The outcome of this appeal cannot turn on what Mr. Amerasinghe believed.

85 In short, the evidence supports the conclusion that the appearance of judicial independence suffered a serious affront as a result of the March 1, 1996 meeting between Mr. Thompson and Isaac C.J. This affront very seriously compromised the appearance of judicial independence. A reasonable observer apprised of the workings of the Federal Court and of all the circumstances would perceive that the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice were improperly and unduly influenced by a senior officer of the Department of Justice. However, there is no persuasive evidence of bad faith on the part of any of the actors in this drama, nor is there any solid evidence that the independence of the judges in question was actually compromised.

C. The Remedy

86 Although the meeting and subsequent exchange of letters between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice were very serious matters that compromised the appearance of the Chief Justice's and the Associate Chief Justice's independence, on balance the damage was not sufficiently serious to warrant the granting of that ultimate remedy of a stay of proceedings. The lesser remedy of ordering the appellants' cases to proceed before a different judge of the Federal Court -- Trial Division will, together with the additional conditions, suffice.

(i) The Standard of Review

87 A stay of proceedings is a discretionary remedy. Accordingly, an appellate court may not lightly interfere with a trial judge's decision to grant or not to grant a stay. The situation here is just as our colleague Gonthier J. described it in Elsom v. Elsom, 1989 CanLII 100 \(SCC\), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1367, at p. 1375:

[A]n appellate court will be justified in intervening in a trial judge's exercise of his discretion only if the trial judge misdirects himself or if his decision is so clearly wrong as to amount to an injustice.

See also R. v. Carosella, 1997 CanLII 402 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 80, at para. 48.

(ii) The Legal Principles

88 Though Cullen J. derived his power to enter a stay of proceedings from s. 50\(1\)\(b\) of the Federal Court Act and not from the Charter or the common law, the same principles that govern stays of proceedings under the latter heads of power apply equally well here. The "interest of justice" referred to in s. 50\(1\)\(b\) of the Federal Court Act is not fundamentally different from the concerns that animate the jurisprudence developed under s. 24\(2\) of the Charter, although the context in which s. 50\(1\)\(b\) operates may be different.

Most often a stay of proceedings is sought to remedy some unfairness to the individual that has resulted from state misconduct. However, there is a “residual category” of cases in which a stay may be warranted. L’Heureux-Dubé J. described it this way, in R. v. O’Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, at para. 73:

This residual category does not relate to conduct affecting the fairness of the trial or impairing other procedural rights enumerated in the Charter, but instead addresses the panoply of diverse and sometimes unforeseeable circumstances in which a prosecution is conducted in such a manner as to connote unfairness or vexatiousness of such a degree that it contravenes fundamental notions of justice and thus undermines the integrity of the judicial process.

The residual category, it bears noting, is a small one. In the vast majority of cases, the concern will be about the fairness of the trial.

If it appears that the state has conducted a prosecution in a way that renders the proceedings unfair or is otherwise damaging to the integrity of the judicial system, two criteria must be satisfied before a stay will be appropriate. They are that:

- (1) the prejudice caused by the abuse in question will be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated through the conduct of the trial, or by its outcome; and
- (2) no other remedy is reasonably capable of removing that prejudice.

(O’Connor, supra, at para. 75.)

The first criterion is critically important. It reflects the fact that a stay of proceedings is a prospective remedy. A stay of proceedings does not redress a wrong that has already been done. It aims to prevent the perpetuation of a wrong that, if left alone, will continue to trouble the parties and the community as a whole in the future. See O'Connor, at para. 82. For this reason, the first criterion must be satisfied even in cases involving conduct that falls into the residual category. See O'Connor, at para. 75. The mere fact that the state has treated an individual shabbily in the past is not enough to warrant a stay of proceedings. For a stay of proceedings to be appropriate in a case falling into the residual category, it must appear that the state misconduct is likely to continue in the future or that the carrying forward of the prosecution will offend society's sense of justice. Ordinarily, the latter condition will not be met unless the former is as well -- society will not take umbrage at the carrying forward of a prosecution unless it is likely that some form of misconduct will continue. There may be exceptional cases in which the past misconduct is so egregious that the mere fact of going forward in the light of it will be offensive. But such cases should be relatively very rare.

92 After considering these two requirements, the court may still find it necessary to consider a third factor. As L'Heureux-Dubé J. has written, "where the affront to fair play and decency is disproportionate to the societal interest in the effective prosecution of criminal cases, then the administration of justice is best served by staying the proceedings": R. v. Conway, 1989 CanLII 66 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659, at p. 1667. We take this statement to mean that there may be instances in which it will be appropriate to balance the interests that would be served by the granting of a stay of proceedings against the interest that society has in having a final decision on the merits. This is not to say, of course, that something akin to an egregious act of misconduct could ever be overtaken by some passing public concern. Rather, it merely recognizes that in certain cases, where it is unclear whether the abuse is sufficient to warrant a stay, a compelling societal interest in having a full hearing could tip the scales in favour of proceeding.

(iii) Application of the Law to the Facts

93 For several reasons, a stay of proceedings is not the appropriate remedy in these cases. First, there is no likelihood that the carrying forward of the cases will manifest, perpetuate or aggravate any abuse. Second, the lesser remedy of ordering the cases to go forward under the supervision of a different judge of the Trial Division without any direction or intervention from the Chief Justice or the Associate Chief Justice will suffice. In this connection, we believe that, if Isaac C.J. or Jerome A.C.J. considered the situation and the possible perception of bias by reasonable observers, they would agree that it would be preferable if they did not participate in any future cases dealing with the same or related issues. Third, Canada's interest in not giving shelter to those who concealed their wartime participation in acts of atrocities outweighs any foreseeable harm that might be done to the appellants or to the integrity of the system by proceeding with the cases. To the extent that he thought otherwise, the trial judge was in error.

(a) No Likelihood That Any Abuse Will Be Manifested in the Future

94 Although damage was done to the appearance of judicial independence, there is no indication that it will be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated by any future proceeding. Therefore, a stay of proceedings is not an appropriate remedy.

95 The appellants' best argument is that this case falls into the "residual category" mentioned in O'Connor because the state conducted its case against them so unfairly and vexatiously that harm was done to the very integrity of the judicial system. To carry forward in the light of what was done, they submit, would be to condone official misconduct and thereby to aggravate the abuse.

96 The problem with the appellants' submission is that it reflects a misunderstanding of the stay of proceedings as a remedy. When one looks at the criteria identified by L'Heureux-Dubé

J. in O'Connor, supra, at para. 75, and the accompanying discussion, what emerges, in our view, are the following propositions. A stay is not a form of punishment. It is not a kind of retribution against the state and it is not a general deterrent. If it is appropriate to use punitive language at all, then probably the best way to describe a stay is as a specific deterrent -- a remedy aimed at preventing the perpetuation or aggravation of a particular abuse. Admittedly, if a past abuse were serious enough, then public confidence in the administration of justice could be so undermined that the mere act of carrying forward in the light of it would constitute a new and ongoing abuse sufficient to warrant a stay of proceedings. However, only an exceedingly serious abuse could ever bring such continuing disrepute upon the administration of justice. It is conceivable, we suppose, that something so traumatic could be done to an individual in the course of a proceeding that to continue the prosecution of him, even in an otherwise unexceptionable manner, would be unfair. Similarly, if the authorities were to fabricate and plant evidence at the scene of a crime, the continued pursuit of a criminal prosecution might well be damaging to the integrity of the judicial system.

97 However, the damage that the appearance of judicial independence suffered as a result of the meeting between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice was not so serious that to proceed despite it would constitute an abuse. A reasonable, fully-informed member of the public, confronted with a continuation of the proceedings, would not think that an injustice was being perpetuated. Mr. Thompson, the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice acted imprudently, but not to such an extent that they undermined public confidence in the justice system. Nothing was done that could have rendered the proceedings oppressive for the appellants. Undoubtedly, the appellants had a legitimate concern that the judge who had charge of their cases and the Chief Justice had become partial to the state. But that concern had to do only with the particular judges involved and not with the justice system as a whole. Thus it is clear that remedies other than a stay will rectify this unfortunate situation.

98 The appellants further submit that the appearance of judicial partiality will continue in the future if the cases are allowed to proceed. In our view, there is no prospect of judicial partiality in the future. The Chief Justice intervened only with the Associate Chief Justice. His conduct did not compromise the integrity of any other judges. The taint is confined to the Associate Chief Justice and the Chief Justice and can be readily contained.

99 Despite these rather obvious facts, Cullen J. found that a reasonable person would worry that the Chief Justice would exercise an improper influence over any judge appointed to hear the appellants' cases. With respect, we do not agree. His finding rests on an incomplete view of the law. Contrary to public perception, it is clear that a chief justice is only "primus inter pares in the court". Ruffo v. Conseil de la magistrature, 1995 CanLII 49 \(SCC\), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 267, at para. 59. He or she enjoys no particular authority over other judges, save an administrative one. See Federal Court Act, s. 6(1).

100 Any influence that the Chief Justice might have had over the Associate Chief Justice might have been by virtue of some particular quality of their personal relationship. In this respect, we cannot refrain from commenting that the formal structural relationship between the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice is not clear and in the aftermath of these events, perhaps the appropriate authorities might wish to consider the matter further to clarify the situation. But that aside, what happened between the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice should not be taken as a reflection of the institutional relationship between them. A reasonable observer would understand this, and would understand also that the individual judges of the Trial Division "have nothing to gain by not deciding as their consciences dictate and nothing to lose by doing justice": Ruffo, supra, at para. 101.

101 The sturdy resolve that Cullen J. himself demonstrated in deciding to grant a stay of proceedings was no aberration. It is precisely what any reasonably intelligent person, apprised of the workings of the Federal Court, would expect. However, by failing to credit the reasonable observer with sufficient understanding to recognize what was apparent even in his own conduct, Cullen J. committed an error of law. His exercise of discretion was founded on a misdirection and so cannot be allowed to stand.

102 The decision of this Court in R. v. Vermette, 1988 CanLII 87 \(SCC\), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 985, affords a good illustration of the correct approach to problems of apparent partiality. Vermette involved certain inflammatory and well-publicized remarks made by the Premier of Quebec about a case that was then before the courts. The trial judge entered a stay of proceedings, in part on the ground that the Premier's remarks had infringed the accused's right to a fair trial by making it unlikely that an impartial panel of jurors could be found. This Court set aside the stay. It held that the trial judge had founded his decision on impermissible speculation. La Forest J., for the majority, observed that there was "no evidence indicating that it will be impossible to select an impartial jury in a reasonable time" (p. 992). He further emphasized that, in the words of the Ontario Court of Appeal, "[t]here is an initial presumption that a juror . . . will perform his duties in accordance with his oath". See R. v. Hubbert (1975), 1975 CanLII 53 \(ON CA\), 29 C.C.C. (2d) 279, at p. 289.

103 The same kind of reasoning applies here. It is mere speculation that no impartial judge can be found. There is an initial presumption of fundamental importance that judges will be faithful to their solemn oath of office and not pay heed to any ill-advised interventions of a chief justice whose authority to intervene is limited to administrative matters. This serves as an answer not only to the suggestion that Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice will persist in their improper behaviour but also to the recent suggestion that Mr. Thompson's interference in the affairs of the Federal Court was more extensive than previously believed. Even if it is true that Mr. Thompson served as a sort of informer for the Chief Justice, reporting to him on judges whose performance was not acceptable to the federal government, still there is no reason to believe that such chicanery has impaired or will impair the ability of the judges of the Federal Court to function independently and in accordance with their oaths. The judge's oath is a solemn and weighty covenant, not lightly betrayed. Until some evidence appears that the independence of a particular judge may have been compromised, as happened with respect to the Associate Chief Justice as a result of the Chief Justice's letter of March 1, 1996, it remains a matter of speculation that a judge will be anything less than entirely faithful to the office.

(b) A Lesser Remedy Is Sufficient

104 For reasons similar to the ones we have already given, the abuse will be sufficiently remedied if we order that the cases against the appellants should go forward under a different judge of the Trial Division. There is every reason to think that the example of independence set by Cullen J. below will be followed by his successor.

105 If any illustration is needed of the sufficiency of a new trial as a remedy for bias, no better one can be found than the recent decision of this Court in R. v. Latimer, 1997 CanLII 405 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 217. In that case, it emerged following the trial that Crown counsel and the police had administered a sort of litmus test to prospective jurors. In particular, they had sought to discover what prospective jurors thought about moral issues that would arise in the course of the trial. Five of the jurors who had been questioned in this way became members of the jury. This Court condemned the actions of Crown counsel as “nothing short of a flagrant abuse of process and interference with the administration of justice” (para. 43).

106 The reasonable inference to be drawn is that if the lesser remedy of a new trial was adequate in Latimer, which arguably involved a more serious apprehension of bias than this appeal does, then a fortiori it is adequate here.

(c) Society's Interests Weigh Against a Stay

107 If we had concluded that having regard to the other factors it was unclear whether the abuse was sufficient to warrant a stay, we would have found that the societal interest in seeing these cases through to their conclusion tips the balance against a stay. The following words of L'Heureux-Dubé J., in O'Connor, supra, at para. 81, are apt:

. . . in determining whether the prejudice to the integrity of the judicial system is remediable, consideration must be given to the societal and individual interests in obtaining a determination of guilt or innocence. It goes without saying that these interests will increase commensurately to the seriousness of the charges against the accused.

108 Perhaps the first thing to notice is that what is at stake for the appellants in this case is arguably different from what is at stake for the typical accused in the typical criminal case. The state is trying to deprive the appellants of their citizenship and not of their liberty. Canadian citizenship is undoubtedly a very “valuable privilege” (see Benner v. Canada (Secretary of State), 1997 CanLII 376 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 358, at para. 72). For some, such as those who might become stateless if deprived of their citizenship, it may be valued as highly as liberty. Yet for most, liberty is more valuable still. Therefore, the interests on the appellants’ side of the balance do not weigh quite so heavily as they would if the proceedings were purely criminal in nature.

On the other side of the balance, society's interest in having a final decision on the merits is obvious. It is imperative that the truth should come to light. If it is not proven that the appellants did the things they are said to have done, then they will retain their citizenship. But if some or all of the alleged acts are proven then the appropriate action must be taken. What is at stake here, in however small a measure, is Canada's reputation as a responsible member of the community of nations. In our view, this concern is of the highest importance

An ongoing affront to judicial independence may be such that any further proceedings in the case would lack the appearance that justice would be done. In such a case the societal interest would not be served by a decision on the merits that is tainted by an appearance of injustice. The interest in preserving judicial independence will trump any interest in continuing the proceedings. Even in the absence of an ongoing appearance of injustice, the very severity of the interference with judicial independence could weigh so heavily against any societal interest in continuing the proceedings that the balancing process would not be engaged. This would occur rarely and only in the clearest of cases. Neither of these circumstances is present here. We have concluded that continuing the proceedings under the conditions we have outlined will not result in an ongoing appearance of injustice. Moreover, the affronts to judicial independence were serious but not so serious as to warrant a stay without balancing the harm to the image of the justice system against the interest of society in seeing alleged war criminals brought to justice. The crimes involved rank among the most heinous in history, and the civilized world's resolve to apply the appropriate sanctions should not be interfered with lightly. What transpired between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice on March 1, 1996 cannot justify such an interference, wrong and improper as it was. If it were established that Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice had acted in bad faith and not out of a legitimate concern for the expeditious conduct of the appellants' cases, then this might well have constituted one of those rare and clearest of cases. But this was not the case. As matters stand, society's interest in seeing the cases through to their conclusion is of a most pressing nature and outweighs the affront to the appearance of judicial independence.

111 Therefore, the only just decision under the circumstances is that the cases should be allowed to proceed. To paraphrase the remarks of our colleague La Forest J. in Vermette, supra, at p. 994, “judicial abdication is not the remedy”. It is in the public interest that allegations of the most wicked kinds of criminal activity should be scrutinized by the judiciary. In all the circumstances, the imprudent actions of Mr. Thompson, the Chief Justice, and the Associate Chief Justice should not be permitted to frustrate the judicial process.

(iv) Conclusion

112 A stay of proceedings should not be granted in this case. Rather, the appropriate remedy is to have the cases against the appellants go forward under the supervision of a judge of the Trial Division, one who has, up to this point, had nothing to do with the affairs that form the subject matter of this appeal. The judge appointed will ignore all directions previously given by the Associate Chief Justice or the Chief Justice in these cases. Isaac C.J. and Jerome A.C.J. should not have anything further to do with these cases.

113 Before we conclude, there is one final matter that bears mentioning. It is this.

114 A well-known rule of Parliamentary practice holds that no Member of the House of Commons should comment upon any matter that is pending before the courts. The following account of what is called the “sub judice rule” appears in Beauchesne’s Rules & Forms of the House of Commons of Canada (6th ed. 1989), at p. 153 (para. 505):

Members are expected to refrain from discussing matters that are before the courts or tribunals which are courts of records. The purpose of this sub judice convention is to protect the parties in a case awaiting or undergoing trial and persons who stand to be affected by the outcome of a judicial inquiry. It is a voluntary restraint imposed by the House upon itself in the interest of justice and fair play.

Though the rule is a matter of Parliamentary convention and not of statutory law, “[i]t is desirable that the convention of Parliament as to matters sub judice should, so far as possible, be the same as the law administered in the courts”, or, in other words, that parliamentarians should act in a way that does not render more difficult the administration of the law by judges. See Attorney-General v. Times Newspapers Ltd., [1973] 1 Q.B. 710 (C.A.), at pp. 740-41, per Lord Denning M.R.

115 It seems to us that the decision to make public the report of the Honourable Charles Dubin on communications between Department of Justice officials and the courts while the matter was before the courts raises concerns about the sub judice rule. The Honourable Mr. Dubin was under retainer to the Department of Justice. He was responsible to the Minister of Justice. If Parliamentary convention did not permit the Minister to speak about the conduct of Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice, then arguably it did not permit him to retain a third party to speak on his behalf about important aspects of the same subject matter that was before the courts.

116 The release of the report complicated the conduct of the appeal. Once it was released the appellants moved for production of many documents that the Department of Justice had handed over to Mr. Dubin. Their demands involved first the Federal Court of Appeal and later this Court in difficult and time-consuming inquiries into questions of privilege, and ultimately placed this Court in the awkward position of having to consider without the benefit of a trial judge’s findings of fact the credibility of certain items of evidence. These difficulties could easily have been avoided had the report not been released until after the conclusion of proceedings in the courts.

117 Nevertheless, the sub judice rule was not raised as a ground of appeal. Therefore, it is not for us to say whether the Minister violated the rule. However, we can say that even if the release of the report did constitute a violation of the rule, still that would not be a sufficient reason to grant a stay of proceedings in the circumstances of this case. As La Forest J. wrote in Vermette, supra, at p. 994, “judicial abdication is not the remedy for an infringement of the sub judice rule”.

118 Also of concern is the intervention of the Canadian Judicial Council. We understand that one of the Council’s committees issued a report in which comments were made about the conduct of Isaac C.J. and Jerome A.C.J. in connection with the appellants’ cases. Although the Canadian Judicial Council is not bound by the sub judice rule, it might have been preferable in these circumstances for the Council to have refrained from making its report while the matter of the stay of proceedings was still working its way through the courts. There is a further complication arising from the premature release of these reports. It arises because these reasons could be taken as indicating that we take a more serious view of these events than did either the Honourable Mr. Dubin or the Judicial Council although the Council did not have the benefit of all the material that was before this Court.

V. Disposition

119 We would dismiss the appeal. The stay of proceedings is set aside and the cases against the appellants are directed to proceed before a judge of the Trial Division. In accordance with s. 6(3) of the Federal Court Act, which provides for the precedence of judges in the event that the Chief Justice and Associate Chief Justice are unable to act, the senior judge who is able to act should choose a presiding judge from among those judges of the Trial Division who have heretofore had nothing to do with the conduct of these cases. The judge thus chosen will ignore any undertakings that Isaac C.J. or Jerome A.C.J. made to Mr. Thompson. Neither Isaac C.J. nor Jerome A.C.J. will have anything further to do with these cases.

120 Under all the circumstances, we would award costs to the appellants here and in the courts below.

Appeal dismissed with costs to the appellants.

In January 1995 the appellants received notices informing them that the respondent Minister intended to seek revocation of their Canadian citizenship on the ground that they had obtained it by failing to divulge to Canadian officials details of their involvement in atrocities committed during the Second World War. At the appellants' request, the cases were referred to the Federal Court -- Trial Division. Numerous procedural disputes then arose. On December 12, 1995 counsel for one of the appellants argued for the whole day on the preliminary motions before the Associate Chief Justice. In January 1996 the court advised the parties that May 15 and 16 had been set aside for the completion of the argument. Counsel for the respondent wrote a letter to the court administrator, a copy of which he sent to counsel for the appellants, complaining in strong terms about the slow progress of the cases. Following a teleconference with the parties, the Associate Chief Justice confirmed that oral argument on the preliminary issues would take place on May 15 and 16, 1996. On March 1, T, the Assistant Deputy Attorney General in charge of civil litigation at the federal Department of Justice, met with the Chief Justice of the Federal Court. The two men discussed the scheduling of the appellants' cases and later that day exchanged letters, neither of which was copied to any of the counsel for the appellants. In his letter to the Chief Justice, T referred to the fact that the Attorney General was being asked to consider taking a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to determine some preliminary points of law primarily because the Trial Division was unable or unwilling to proceed with the cases expeditiously. In his reply, the Chief Justice stated that he had discussed T's concerns with the Associate Chief Justice, and that both were prepared to take all reasonable steps to avoid such a reference. He added that the Associate Chief Justice said he had not fully appreciated "the urgency of dealing with these matters as expeditiously as the Government would like" until he had read T's letter. However, now that he was aware of the Government's concerns he would devote one week from May 15 to deal with the cases not only with respect to the preliminary points but also with respect to the merits. The respondent provided copies of these letters to the appellants. Counsel for the appellants advised the court that they would move for a stay of proceedings on the ground that T and the Chief Justice had interfered with the independence of the Associate Chief Justice. The Associate Chief Justice then recused himself. He directed that the appellants' cases should go forward under a new judge. The appellants' application for a stay of proceedings was granted. The Federal Court of Appeal, having decided that it had jurisdiction to consider the appeal, set aside the stay.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The Federal Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to hear the Crown's appeal in this case. The stay of proceedings ordered was not a decision made "under" s. 18\(1\) of the Citizenship Act. Section 18(1) refers to a very particular kind of decision: a decision as to whether a person "has obtained, retained, renounced or resumed citizenship" by false pretences. Whether s. 18(1) is interpreted narrowly as encompassing only the ultimate decision as to whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences, or more broadly to include the interlocutory decisions made in the context of a s. 18(1) hearing which are related to this determination, it is apparent that it does not encompass an order granting or denying a stay of proceedings. Section 18\(3\) of the Citizenship

Act, which provides that no appeal lies from a decision of the Trial Division made under s. 18(1), thus does not apply. A decision allowing or denying a motion for a stay of proceedings is a decision made under s. 50 of the Federal Court Act and may be appealed according to the rules set out in s. 27 of that Act.

The appearance of judicial independence suffered significantly as a result of the meeting between T and the Chief Justice. The test for determining whether the appearance of judicial independence has been maintained is whether a reasonable observer would perceive that the court was able to conduct its business free from the interference of the government and of other judges. As a general rule of conduct, counsel for one party should not discuss a particular case with a judge except with the knowledge and preferably with the participation of counsel for the other parties to the case. The meeting between T and the Chief Justice, at which counsel for the appellants were not present, violated this rule and was clearly inappropriate, despite the fact that the occasion for the meeting was a highly legitimate concern about the exceedingly slow progress of the cases. Again as a general rule, a judge should not accede to the demands of one party without giving counsel for the other parties a chance to present their views. It was therefore clearly wrong, and seriously so, for the Chief Justice to speak to the Associate Chief Justice at the instance of T. While a chief justice is responsible for the expeditious progress of cases through his or her court and may under certain circumstances be obligated to take steps to correct tardiness, the actions of the Chief Justice here were in the nature of a response to a party rather than to a problem. Similarly, the Associate Chief Justice acted inappropriately by responding as he did to the Chief Justice's intervention without the participation of counsel for the appellants. A reasonable observer apprised of the workings of the Federal Court and of all the circumstances would perceive that the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice were improperly and unduly influenced by a senior officer of the Department of Justice. However, there is no persuasive evidence of bad faith on the part of any of those involved, nor is there any solid evidence that the independence of the judges in question was actually compromised.

An appellate court may not lightly interfere with a trial judge's decision to grant or not to grant a stay of proceedings, which is a discretionary remedy. While a stay is usually sought to remedy some unfairness to the individual that has resulted from state misconduct, there is also a "residual category" of cases in which a stay may be warranted. This residual category comprises cases in which a prosecution is conducted in such an unfair or vexatious manner that it contravenes notions of justice and thus undermines the integrity of the judicial process. For a stay of proceedings to be appropriate in a case falling into the residual category, it must appear that the state misconduct is likely to continue in the future or that the carrying forward of the prosecution will offend society's sense of justice. It must also be shown that no remedy other than a stay is reasonably capable of removing this misconduct. As well, it may be necessary in some cases to balance the interests that would be served by granting a stay of proceedings against the interest that society has in having a final decision on the merits. This balancing process would not be appropriate in the case of an ongoing affront to judicial independence or of a particularly egregious interference, either of which would outweigh any interest society might have in continuing the proceedings. Neither of these circumstances is present here.

A stay of proceedings is not the appropriate remedy in these cases. First, there is no likelihood that the carrying forward of the cases will manifest, perpetuate or aggravate any abuse. Second, the lesser remedy of ordering the cases to go forward under the supervision of a different judge of the Trial Division without any direction or intervention from the Chief Justice or the Associate Chief Justice will suffice. Third, Canada's interest in not giving shelter to those who concealed their wartime participation in acts of atrocities outweighs any foreseeable harm that might be done to the appellants or to the integrity of the system by proceeding with the cases. The appropriate remedy here is to have the cases against the appellants go forward under the supervision of a judge of the Trial Division who has had nothing to do with the affairs that form the subject matter of this appeal. The judge appointed will ignore all directions previously given by the Associate Chief Justice or the Chief Justice in these cases. The Chief Justice and Associate Chief Justice should not have anything further to do with these cases.

//The Court//

1 THE COURT -- This appeal raises three principal questions. The first and threshold question is whether this Court has jurisdiction to hear an appeal from a decision of a judge of the Federal Court -- Trial Division to stay a citizenship revocation proceeding. The second question is whether certain events constituted an actual or apparent affront to judicial independence. The third question is whether, if there was any affront to judicial independence, a stay was, under the circumstances, the appropriate remedy.

I. Facts

2 The facts of this appeal present some difficulties. Much of the relevant evidence was known to Cullen J., who considered the appellants' application at first instance. But other items of evidence emerged only recently, following an order of this Court dated May 5, 1997. The additional evidence was not considered at trial and so has not given rise to any findings of fact. It is accordingly for this Court to determine the weight that should be assigned to it.

A. The Evidence That Was Available to the Trial Division

3 The following was known to the Trial Division and to the Federal Court of Appeal. Both courts based their decisions entirely upon it.

4 On January 27, 1995, the Registrar of Canadian Citizenship sent Notices of Revocation to the appellants, Helmut Oberlander, Johann Dueck and Erichs Tobiass. The purpose of these notices was to inform the appellants that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration ("the Minister") intended to seek revocation of their Canadian citizenship on the ground that they had obtained it by failing to divulge to Canadian officials details of their involvement in atrocities committed during the Second World War. Mr. Oberlander, it was said, had concealed his "membership in the German Sicherheitspolizei und SD and Einsatzkommando 10A during the Second World War and [his] participation in the executions of civilians during that period of time"; Mr. Dueck his "membership in the Selidovka district (ralon) police in German occupied Ukraine during the period 1941 to 1943, and [his] participation in the executions of civilians and prisoners-of-war during that time”; and Mr. Tobiaß his “membership in the lettische Sicherheitshilfspolizei (commonly known as the Arajs Kommando) subordinate to the German Sicherheitspolizei und SD during the period 1941 to 1943 in German occupied Latvia and [his] participation in the executions of civilians during that time and [his] membership in the Waffen SS during the period 1943 to 1945”.

5 As they were entitled to do under s. 18(1)(a) of the Citizenship Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-29, the appellants asked the Minister to refer their cases to the Federal Court -- Trial Division. By May 1, 1995, the Minister had referred all three cases to the court.

6 There then followed many procedural disputes. In May of 1995, the respondent sought directions from the court about the procedure to be followed and the appellants sought disclosure of the respondent’s case. On June 30, 1995, the respondent’s motions for directions came on for hearing before Jerome A.C.J. During the initial hearing, counsel for the appellants raised many preliminary issues. The Associate Chief Justice ordered the three cases joined for purposes of resolving the preliminary issues and he set a timetable for the filing of arguments in relation to them.

7 Throughout the summer of 1995, the appellants sought disclosure of documents that they judged to be relevant to their preliminary motions. In addition, they pressed the respondent to produce the details of the case against them. On August 25, 1995, Mr. Christopher Amerasinghe, who was counsel for the respondent at the time, informed counsel for the appellant Dueck that many of the relevant documents were in the process of being translated and so were unavailable.

8 On October 4, 1995, Jerome A.C.J. telephoned the parties to schedule the argument of the preliminary motions. Mr. Amerasinghe indicated that he intended to claim that certain documents sought by the appellants were privileged. The parties agreed that the questions of disclosure and privilege had to be settled before the cases could proceed. The Associate Chief Justice chose December 12, 1995 as the date upon which he would hear argument concerning those questions. Mr. Amerasinghe agreed that December 12 was “a reasonable date as scheduling goes in courts in Toronto”.

9 In November, the respondent released some documents to the appellants but withheld others. On December 12, 1995, counsel for the appellant Dueck argued for the whole day. At the end of the day, the matter was set over for continuation.

10 On January 10, 1996, the Federal Court -- Trial Division advised the parties that May 15 and 16, 1996 had been set aside for the completion of the argument that had begun on December 12, 1995. Less than a week later, Mr. Amerasinghe wrote to the Court Administrator to protest the May dates. In the letter, a copy of which he sent to counsel for the appellants, Mr. Amerasinghe pointed out that many of the proposed witnesses were of “advanced age” and “frail in health”. He complained in strong terms about the slow progress of the cases.

11 On February 19, 1996, the parties and the Associate Chief Justice participated in a teleconference. Mr. Amerasinghe repeated the points he had made earlier in his letter to the Court Administrator and offered to make submissions in writing in order to expedite the resolution of the preliminary issues. The Associate Chief Justice decided that he wished to have oral submissions. He confirmed that the oral argument would take place on May 15 and 16, 1996.

The events that form the heart of this appeal took place on March 1, 1996. On that day, Mr. Ted Thompson, who was the Assistant Deputy Attorney General in charge of civil litigation at the federal Department of Justice, met with Isaac C.J. of the Federal Court. The two men discussed the scheduling of the appellants' cases and later that day exchanged letters, neither of which was copied to any of the counsel for the appellants. The letters read as follows:

March 1, 1996

HAND DELIVERED

The Honourable Chief Justice J. A. Isaac
Federal Court of Canada
Supreme Court of Canada Building
Ottawa, Ontario
K1A 0H9

Dear Chief Justice Isaac:

Re: Erichs Tobias, T-569-95, Helmut Oberlander, T-866-95 and Johann Dueck, T-938-95

Further to our meeting of this morning in which I advised you that the Attorney General of Canada is being asked to consider taking a Reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to determine some preliminary points of law primarily because the Federal Court Trial Division is unable or unwilling to proceed with the subject cases expeditiously.

Notices of Intention to revoke the citizenship of the above-named individuals were sent out in January of 1995. They were persons who had been investigated in connection with allegations of war crimes and crimes against humanity during the second world war. Over the course of the next three months the cases were referred to the Federal Court. After complying with the requirements of Rule 920, Motions were brought requesting directions from the Court regarding discovery of evidence and taking evidence on commission. The Motions were filed April 13th (Tobias), May 11th (Oberlander) and May 18th (Dueck), 1995 respectively. These Motions were necessary as there are no procedural rules governing these proceedings. We suggested the procedure followed in the Luitjens case be followed. Our Motion was originally set down for argument on June 30, 1995. Associate Chief Justice Jerome had become seized of the three cases and determined to hear all preliminary motions regarding them. On June 30th, counsel for Dueck argued that the three cases should be joined and also indicated that he wished to bring a Motion to stay the proceedings for abuse of process. Jerome, A.C.J. joined the three cases and granted adjournments over the objections of our counsel. September 15, 1995 was set as the date for the filing of facta and in a tele-conference call on October 4, 1995 he set December 12, 1995 as the date on which argument was to be heard.

On December 12th, counsel for Dueck was permitted to argue all day and it was necessary to set the matter over for continuation. Jerome, A.C.J. indicated that the continuing date would be in February of 1996 despite our request for an earlier date and having regard to the fact that counsel for Dueck was available in early January. The Court declined to fix a date for continuation while all parties were present. When our counsel called the Court in January of 1996 requesting a date for continuation, he was advised several days later that argument had been set down for May 15th and 16th. We wrote the Court expressing concern about the long day [sic] and the urgency of proceeding with this matter. We suggested concluding the argument by written submissions. Counsel for Mr. Dueck objected and Jerome, A.C.J. indicated that even with written submissions he would want oral argument and on February 18th via tele-conference with all parties he ordered that the dates of May 15 and 16 stand.

There are likely to be approximately 12 similar cases brought to the Federal Court with as many as 6 persons being given notice during the course of this year.

We are very concerned if these cases are not dealt with expeditiously they will never be heard on their merits. A crucial witness on the Tobiass case has cancer and may not be able to testify. In the Dueck case one key witness has died, one is in hospital and two others are so ill that they are unable to travel. Our counsel has estimated that at the current pace of proceeding and considering appeals in respect to interlocutory matters it will be years before these matters can be heard on their merits.

As you know, there is great public interest in seeing these cases disposed of on their merits and the potential for embarrassment is very high should it be seen that the Justice system is unable to respond to these urgent cases in a timely way.

I would appreciate any assistance you can offer.

Yours very truly,

J. E. Thompson
Assistant Deputy Attorney General

Mr. J. E. (Ted) Thompson, Q.C.

Assistant Deputy Attorney General
Civil Litigation Section
Department of Justice
Ottawa K1A 0H8

Dear Mr. Thompson:

Re: Erichs Tobiass T-569-95, Helmut Oberlander T-866-95 and
Johann Dueck T-938-95

I refer to our discussions this morning and to your subsequent letter concerning these matters.

I have discussed your concerns with the Associate Chief Justice and, like me, he is prepared to take all reasonable steps possible to avoid a Reference to the Supreme Court of Canada on these matters.

The Associate Chief Justice has informed me that there are now before the Court five citizenship revocation cases -- the three mentioned in your letter which are being dealt with by Mr. Amerasinghe and, two earlier ones: one is being dealt with by Ms. Charlotte Bell (Khalil) and the other by Mr. Amerasinghe (Nemsila). The Associate Chief Justice has heard all of the evidence and argument in Nemsila but he had been asked by counsel for Nemsila to defer judgment in that case until Khalil has been concluded. Argument has commenced in that latter case and has been adjourned to 29 April for continuation.

In light of the concerns expressed in your letter the Associate Chief Justice will meet with Ms. Bell and, Ms. Jackman who appears for the Respondent, early next week to fix an early date for final argument. If an early date cannot be fixed he will give judgment in Nemsila and then deal with Khalil at the earliest possible date.

As regards the three cases about which you wrote, the Associate Chief Justice says firstly, that he did not fully appreciate until he read your letter, the urgency of dealing with these matters as expeditiously as the Government would like. However, now that he is aware he will devote one week from 15 May to deal with these cases not only with respect to the preliminary points but also with respect to the merits. Finally, he has authorized me to say that additional cases of this class coming into the Court will be given the highest priority in light of the concerns expressed in your letter.

Yours truly,

Julius A. Isaac

c.c.-- The Hon. James A. Jerome
Associate Chief Justice

13 On March 7, 1996, the respondent provided copies of these letters to the appellants. In the cover letter, Mr. Amerasinghe explained that Mr. Thompson had approached the Chief Justice at the beginning of March to discuss the conduct of citizenship revocation cases generally and had, in the course of the meeting, happened to mention the appellants' cases.

14 On April 2, 1996, counsel for the appellants Dueck and Oberlander requested disclosure of all documents that related directly or indirectly to the meeting that took place on March 1, 1996. Mr. Amerasinghe answered the next day that "there is no other correspondence between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice relating to this matter". No disclosure was made of any documents besides the letters themselves.

15 On April 10, 1996, the Court Administrator informed counsel that the Associate Chief Justice would hear argument concerning preliminary motions on May 15 and 16, 1996, and if necessary during the following week. The Associate Chief Justice also sent word that he intended to be done with the cases by July of 1996.

16 On April 23, 1996, counsel for the appellants advised the court that they would move for a stay of proceedings on the ground that Mr. Thompson and Isaac C.J. had interfered with the independence of Jerome A.C.J. On April 30, counsel for the appellants Dueck and Oberlander indicated that they would be content to have the Associate Chief Justice remain in charge of the cases. Counsel for the appellant Tobiass had nothing to say on the subject, though he had indicated earlier that he would not object to having the Associate Chief Justice remain to settle the preliminary motions.

17 On May 6, the Associate Chief Justice recused himself. He directed that the appellants' cases should go forward under a new judge on May 15, 1996 and indicated that the new judge's list would be cleared to permit him to deal expeditiously with any remaining questions that the cases might pose.

B. Further Evidence

18 On May 5, 1997, this Court ordered the respondent to produce "[t]he internal Department of Justice documents concerning the fact[s] referred to" in a report prepared for the Government by former Chief Justice of the Ontario Court of Appeal, the Honourable Charles Dubin. On May 22, the Court ordered the respondent to comply fully with the order of May 5. In response to the two orders, the respondent disclosed many internal documents.

19 The following emerges from these documents.

20 Counsel for the respondent objected strongly to the Associate Chief Justice's management of the appellants' cases. It appears that Mr. Amerasinghe had concluded as early as December 14, 1995 that the Associate Chief Justice was a "problematic" judge.

21 On February 27, 1996, the Department of Justice's Litigation Committee decided that "our only option in the circumstances [i.e. in response to delay in the Federal Court -- Trial Division] appears to be a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada of the preliminary questions that have been raised". Mr. Thompson seems not to have been present during the discussion. A reference in a subsequent memorandum reveals that "the Litigation Committee at its meeting on February 27, 1996, specifically recommended that no one should approach the Chief Justice to apprise him of the government's intention to refer certain questions to the Supreme Court".

22 On March 1, 1996, Mr. Amerasinghe made the following note of a telephone conversation between himself and Mr. Thompson:

J.E.T. [J. Edward (Ted) Thompson] Called and informed me he had met with Isaac who told him that he would get Jerome to recuse himself from the cases and would put an efficient judge to deal quickly with the cases. Isaac had said he would ensure any appeals would be dealt with speedily.

According to Mr. Amerasinghe, later that same day the Chief Justice dined at Mr. Thompson's home.

23 More than two months after the meeting between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice took place, Mr. Amerasinghe recorded his suspicion that Mr. Thompson's real intention in approaching the Chief Justice had been to protect a friend from the embarrassment of a reference to the Supreme Court. Indeed, Mr. Amerasinghe indicated that Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice were friends and frequent interlocutors. According to Mr. Amerasinghe's report, the Chief Justice invited Mr. Thompson to inform him of perceived problems with the administration of the Federal Court, and Mr. Thompson obliged.

II. Judgments in Appeal

A. Trial Division, 1996 CanLII 4077 \(FC\), [1996] 2 F.C. 729

24 On the strength of the letters exchanged by Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice on March 1, 1996, Cullen J. concluded that irreparable harm had been done to the appearance of judicial impartiality. He entered a stay of proceedings.

25 Cullen J. thought that a reasonable observer presented with the letters of March 1, 1996 might conclude that, as a result of the meeting between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice, pressure was brought to bear on the Associate Chief Justice to hurry the appellants' cases along, quite possibly to the appellants' detriment. In this way damage was done to the appearance of judicial independence.

26 Because it was the Chief Justice who intervened, and the Chief Justice enjoys some authority over the entire court, Cullen J. thought that a reasonable observer would worry that the independence of all the judges and not only of the Associate Chief Justice had been compromised.

27 Having concluded that the appearance of judicial independence had suffered, Cullen J. considered whether a stay of proceedings was the appropriate remedy. He concluded that no remedy other than a stay of proceedings would cure the wrong done to the appearance of judicial independence. A less radical remedy would only “weaken judicial independence and leave the impression that transgressions of the Court’s integrity may be reprimanded but, ultimately, will be forgotten” (p. 748).

B. Federal Court of Appeal

28 The respondent purported to appeal Cullen J.’s decision.

(i) Motion to Quash for Want of Jurisdiction

29 The appellants moved to quash the appeal for want of jurisdiction. They argued that s. 18(3) of the Citizenship Act placed Cullen J.’s decision to stay the proceedings beyond appeal. The court dismissed the motion over Pratte J.A.’s dissent: (1996), 208 N.R. 49.

(a) Marceau J.A.

30 Marceau J.A. held that Cullen J.’s decision was capable of appeal. He concluded that s. 18(3) bars appeal only of decisions that a person has or has not obtained citizenship by impermissible means. He agreed (at p. 53) that the bar extends also to “all interlocutory rulings and decisions made with a view to ultimately coming to” a decision on the merits. However, he thought that the decision to enter a stay of proceedings did not come within the bar, because such a decision is neither a decision on the merits nor a decision made with a view to coming to a decision on the merits.

(b) Stone J.A.

31 Stone J.A. read s. 18(3) of the Citizenship Act as barring appeal only of decisions made under s. 18(1). Section 18(3), he argued, does not bar appeal of decisions made under other provisions of the Citizenship Act or under other Acts of Parliament. Because Cullen J. entered the stay using a power given by s. 50(1) of the Federal Court Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. F-7, s. 18(3) of the Citizenship Act did not bar an appeal of it.

(c) Pratte J.A. (dissenting)

32 Pratte J.A. interpreted s. 18(3) as barring appeal not only of a final decision on the merits of a citizenship reference but also of “the myriad of decisions that the Trial Division may make in the course of the reference including . . . a decision granting or refusing a stay of the reference proceedings” (p. 52). He judged that any other reading of the provision would lead to absurdities.

(ii) Stay of Proceedings

33 Having decided that it had jurisdiction to consider the appeal, the court unanimously set aside the stay of proceedings: 1997 CanLII 6328 (FCA), [1997] 1 F.C. 828. Each judge offered his own reasons for doing so.

34 Marceau J.A. concluded that the Associate Chief Justice had retained his judicial independence throughout the period in question. He noted that it is part of the role of a chief justice to manage his or her court. A chief justice must ensure that the court provides “timely justice”. Therefore, when a chief justice learns, by whatever means, that the pace of a proceeding is abnormally slow, he or she has a positive duty to investigate, though care must be taken not to interfere with the adjudicative functions of the presiding judge. In the light of this understanding of the role of a chief justice, Marceau J.A. could find no evidence to support the conclusion that the Chief Justice had done anything improper in approaching the Associate Chief Justice to discuss the pace of the appellants’ case.

35 Marceau J.A. likewise concluded that the appearance of judicial independence had not suffered as a result of the Chief Justice’s intervention with the Associate Chief Justice.

36 Although in Marceau J.A.’s view there had been no affront to judicial independence, he nevertheless considered whether, if there had been an affront, a stay of proceedings would have been the appropriate remedy. He concluded that it would not have been.

37 The question, in Marceau J.A.’s mind, was whether going ahead with the proceedings would perpetuate the appearance of impropriety. The inquiry was forward-looking. What happened in the past could not justify a stay unless its ill effects were likely to persist. Marceau J.A. concluded that if the proceedings were to go ahead under some other judge, the appearance of an affront to judicial independence would be dispelled. It was quite unreasonable to suppose, as Cullen J. did, that the entire bench of the Trial Division had been tainted.

38 Because he concluded that Cullen J. had exercised his discretion to grant a stay on the basis of a mistaken understanding of the governing principles, Marceau J.A. held that the stay should be set aside.

(b) Pratte J.A.

39 Pratte J.A. wrote only to add two observations to Marceau J.A.'s reasons. The first was that no reasonable person would ever conclude from the Chief Justice's intervention in the appellants' cases that the independence of every member of the Trial Division had been compromised. The second was that Cullen J. was wrong to conclude that there was nothing unusually slow about the pace of the proceedings. The pace of the proceedings before the Associate Chief Justice "had been so slow as to certainly give rise to a suspicion that justice was not rendered with reasonable diligence" (p. 835). Thus, when the Chief Justice learned of the situation, regardless of how the information came to him, he was "duty bound to intervene".

(c) Stone J.A.

40 Although concurring with his colleagues, Stone J.A. took an approach slightly different from theirs. He agreed with them there was "nothing in the record to suggest that the motivation for the meeting with and the letter to the Chief Justice was other than to convey the concern of a party for perceived delay in the progress of the cases in view of the age and state of health of the respondents and of potential witnesses" (p. 867). However, he believed that the appearance of judicial independence had suffered as a result of the events of March 1, 1996.

41 Having found some apprehension of bias, Stone J.A. had to consider what the appropriate remedy might be. He was not persuaded that what he had before him amounted to one of the “clearest of cases”, in which a stay of proceedings was warranted. Although what transpired was improper, there was no evidence that either Mr. Thompson or the Chief Justice had acted in bad faith. Stone J.A. agreed with Marceau J.A. that the lesser remedy of a new proceeding before a new judge would sufficiently answer any affront that the appearance of judicial independence had suffered.

III. Issues

42 This appeal presents three issues. The first is whether an appeal lies from a decision of a judge of the Trial Division to grant a stay of proceedings in a citizenship revocation proceeding commenced under s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act. The second is whether judicial independence, or the appearance of it, suffered as a result of the meeting between Mr. Thompson and Isaac C.J. The third is whether, if any damage was done to the appearance of judicial independence, the trial judge properly exercised his discretion to enter a stay of proceedings.

IV. Analysis

43 We conclude that an appeal lies from a decision of the Trial Division to grant a stay of proceedings in a case such as this one. We further conclude that the appearance, but not the fact, of judicial independence suffered as a result of the meeting between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice, but that a stay of proceedings is not the appropriate remedy.

A. Jurisdiction

44 The appellants contend that, in light of s. 18(3) of the Citizenship Act, Cullen J.'s order was final and could not be appealed either to the Federal Court of Appeal or to this Court. To properly assess the merits of this submission, the interplay between s. 18 of the Citizenship Act and ss. 27 and 50 of the Federal Court Act must be considered.

45 Section 18 of the Citizenship Act provides that:

18. (1) The Minister shall not make a report under section 10 unless the Minister has given notice of his intention to do so to the person in respect of whom the report is to be made and

(a) that person does not, within thirty days after the day on which the notice is sent, request that the Minister refer the case to the Court; or

(b) that person does so request and the Court decides that the person has obtained, retained, renounced or resumed citizenship by false representation or fraud or by knowingly concealing material circumstances.

(3) A decision of the Court made under subsection (1) is final and, notwithstanding any other Act of Parliament, no appeal lies therefrom. [Emphasis added.]

Section 2 of the same Act makes it clear that the “Court” referred to in s. 18 is the Federal Court -- Trial Division.

46 Sections 27 and 50 of the Federal Court Act provide that:

27. (1) An appeal lies to the Federal Court of Appeal from any

(a) final judgment,

- (b) judgment on a question of law determined before trial,
- (c) interlocutory judgment, or
- (d) determination on a reference made by a federal board, commission or other tribunal or the Attorney General of Canada,

of the Trial Division.

50. (1) The Court may, in its discretion, stay proceedings in any cause or matter,

- (b) where for any . . . reason it is in the interest of justice that the proceedings be stayed.

47 Section 27 of the Federal Court Act provides a general right of appeal from final and interlocutory judgments of the Federal Court -- Trial Division. Section 18(3) of the Citizenship Act, however, provides that “notwithstanding any other Act of Parliament”, no appeal lies from any decision of the Federal Court -- Trial Division made “under” s. 18(1). Thus, s. 18(3) of the Citizenship Act effectively removes the general right of appeal set out at s. 27 of the Federal Court Act with respect to all decisions made “under” s. 18(1).

48 No doubt Parliament may validly limit the jurisdiction of the Federal Court of Appeal in this manner. As this Court held in Roberts v. Canada, 1989 CanLII 122 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 322, at p. 331, “the Federal Court is without any inherent jurisdiction such as that existing in provincial superior courts”. See also: ITO--International Terminal Operators Ltd. v. Miida Electronics Inc., 1986 CanLII 91 (SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 752, at p. 766; Quebec North Shore Paper Co. v. Canadian Pacific Ltd., 1976 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1977] 2 S.C.R. 1054; and McNamara Construction (Western) Ltd. v. The Queen, 1977 CanLII 13 (SCC), [1977] 2 S.C.R. 654. There is no appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal save in those circumstances specifically provided by statute.

49 Nevertheless, during the oral hearing and in the submissions made subsequently, some doubt was expressed as to whether s. 18(3) of the Citizenship Act had the effect of ousting the jurisdiction conferred upon this Court by s. 40 of the Supreme Court Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. S-26 (assuming without deciding that this provision would otherwise apply). Furthermore, it was suggested that, if s. 18(3) had such an effect, s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms may be the source of a right of appeal directly to this Court in certain circumstances. However, in light of the conclusion reached as to the interpretation of s. 18(3) of the Citizenship Act, it will not be necessary to address these issues.

50 We agree with the conclusion of the Federal Court of Appeal that the stay of proceedings ordered by Cullen J. was not a decision made “under” s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act. Section 18(3) of the Citizenship Act therefore does not apply to it and an appeal lies to the Federal Court of Appeal pursuant to s. 27 of the Federal Court Act.

51 This conclusion flows from the wording of s. 18. Section 18(1) refers to a very particular kind of decision: a decision as to whether a person “has obtained, retained, renounced or resumed citizenship” by false pretences. However, a stay of proceedings is entered for reasons which are completely unrelated to the circumstances surrounding the obtaining, retaining, renouncing or resuming of citizenship. Indeed, a decision to order (or not to order) a stay of proceedings is different from the type of determination that the Court is called upon to make under subsection 18(1).

52 This point was recognized by the Federal Court of Appeal in Luitjens v. Canada (Secretary of State) (1992), 9 C.R.R. (2d) 149, where it was held that a decision under s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act is not a “final judgment” of the Federal Court -- Trial Division for the purposes of s. 27 of the Federal Court Act (at p. 152):

. . . there is no conflict at all between s. 18(3) and s. 27(1). First, this decision is not a “final judgment” of the court, nor is it an “interlocutory judgment”. Although the decision followed a hearing at which much evidence was adduced, it was merely a finding of fact by the court, which was to form the basis of a report by the minister and, eventually, a decision by the Governor in Council, as described by ss. 10 and 18(1). The decision did not finally determine any legal rights.

53 By way of contrast, a stay of proceedings is most definitely a “final judgment” of the Federal Court -- Trial Division. It has the effect of permanently bringing the proceedings to an end. It is a decision made under s. 50 of the Federal Court Act and not under s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act.

54 It may be argued that a literal interpretation of s. 18(1) leads to the absurd and inequitable result that only a decision that a person obtained citizenship by false pretences would be final and without appeal. The opposite decision, namely that a person did not obtain citizenship by false pretences, could be appealed by the Minister.

55 Yet the language of s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act should not be taken to mean that this subsection encompasses only a positive decision that citizenship was obtained by false pretences. It is true that s. 18(1) provides that the Minister may issue a report under s. 10 only if the court decides that citizenship was in fact obtained by false pretences. However, this language necessarily implies that the court may arrive at the opposite conclusion. Therefore, on its plain meaning, s. 18(1) empowers the Federal Court -- Trial Division to decide whether citizenship was “obtained, retained, renounced or resumed” by false pretences. Such a decision, be it affirmative or negative, is a decision made “under” s. 18(1). It may not be appealed either by the person who is the subject of the reference or by the Minister.

56 Although the issue does not arise here, there is a great deal of force to the argument that s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act encompasses not only the ultimate decision as to whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences, but also those decisions made during the course of a s. 18 reference which are related to this determination. This would encompass all the interlocutory decisions which the court is empowered to make in the context of a s. 18 reference (see, for instance, s. 46 of the Federal Court Act and Rules 5, 450-455, 461, 477, 900-920, 1714 and 1715 of the Federal Court Rules, C.R.C., c. 663). This interpretation of s. 18(1) was adopted by the Federal Court of Appeal in Luitjens, supra, where it was held that interlocutory decisions made in the context of s. 18(1) reference are decisions made “under” s. 18(1). It is not necessary for the purpose of this decision to determine whether this conclusion should be varied. That should only be done in an appeal where the issue arises from the facts.

57 However, whether s. 18(1) is interpreted narrowly as encompassing only the ultimate decision as to whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences, or more broadly to include the interlocutory decisions made in the context of a s. 18(1) hearing which are related to this determination, it is apparent that it does not encompass an order granting or denying a stay of proceedings.

58 Unlike interlocutory decisions, a stay of proceedings will not be made in order to more efficiently determine the ultimate question of whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences. An order staying proceedings is therefore not related to this ultimate decision.

Furthermore, it may be that allowing appeals from interlocutory decisions made in the context of a s. 18 reference would effectively defeat Parliament's goal of finality in citizenship matters. As McLachlin J. observed in R. v. Seaboyer, 1991 CanLII 76 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 577, there is a valid policy concern to control the "plethora of interlocutory appeals and the delays which inevitably flow from them" (p. 641). This same concern will not, however, generally apply to orders staying proceedings. Stays of proceedings are granted but rarely and only in the "clearest of cases". They are granted for reasons unrelated to the merits of the s. 18 reference and are usually divorced from the "citizenship" context of the reference. Allowing appeals from stays of proceedings would therefore not seriously threaten the goal of finality in citizenship matters.

It should be noted that, even if s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act were to be interpreted as encompassing not only the final determination as to whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences but also any decisions related to this determination, an exception should be made for a decision to deny a motion for a stay of proceedings. It is arguable that a decision denying a stay of proceedings is "related" to the question of whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences insofar as it has the effect of allowing the inquiry on the merits to proceed. However, it would appear to be fundamentally unfair, and contrary to the rules of natural justice, to allow appeals to be taken from a decision to order a stay of proceedings but not from a decision refusing to order a stay. Such a result could not have been intended by Parliament.

It follows that a decision allowing or denying a motion for a stay of proceedings is not a decision made "under" s. 18(1). It is a decision made under s. 50 of the Federal Court Act and may be appealed according to the rules set out at s. 27 of that Act. The appellants contend that this is at odds with the principles set out in R. v. Jewitt, 1985 CanLII 47 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 128. They argue that the better interpretation of s. 18 of the Citizenship Act is that all decisions made in the context of a s. 18 reference, be they final or interlocutory, "on the merits" or procedural, should be considered to have been made “under” s. 18(1) and therefore are subject to s. 18(3).

62 At issue in Jewitt was s. 605(1)(a) (now s. 676(1)(a)) of the Criminal Code which provided for a right of appeal by the Crown “against a judgment or verdict of acquittal” in certain circumstances. It was held that any order of the Court, regardless of the terminology used, which effectively brings proceedings to a final conclusion in favour of the accused is tantamount to a verdict of acquittal for the purposes of appeal. Such an order includes a stay of proceedings.

63 The appellants contend that if, in the criminal law context, a stay of proceedings is for the purposes of appeal tantamount to a decision on the merits, there is no reason for holding that it is not tantamount to a decision as to whether citizenship was obtained by false pretences under s. 18(1) of the Citizenship Act. The principle underlying Jewitt, it is argued, is that substance ought to triumph over form. If the order has the effect of bringing the proceedings to a close, it should, for the purposes of appeal, be considered a decision on the merits in favour of the person against whom the proceedings were instituted.

64 On their face the reasons in Jewitt appear to be compelling authority in favour of the appellants’ position. However, Jewitt must be read in light of the more recent judgment of R. v. Hinse, 1995 CanLII 54 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 597. There, the accused sought leave to appeal a judgment of the court of appeal setting aside his conviction and entering a stay of proceedings. The issue was whether such a judgment is tantamount, for the purposes of appeal, to a judgment setting aside a conviction and entering a verdict of acquittal or ordering a new trial. The majority of this Court held that it was not.

The statutory basis of the court of appeal's power to order a stay of proceedings was held to be not s. 686(2) of the Criminal Code (which empowers the court to set aside a conviction and from which no appeal by the accused lies), but s. 686(8) (which empowers the court to make ancillary orders). Furthermore, it was held that, as an order made under s. 686(8) of the Criminal Code, a stay of proceedings does not represent "a functionally integral part of a 'judgment . . . setting aside or affirming a conviction' " (p. 626). Rather, it was held that "an order rendered under s. 686(8) represents a separate, divisible judicial act from which the accused or the Crown may independently seek leave to appeal under s. 40(1) of the Supreme Court Act" (p. 626). On this point, Lamer C.J. held, at pp. 619-20, that:

The power of an appellate court to impose a stay of criminal proceedings, similar to a trial court, derives its origin from the inherent jurisdiction of a superior court of record at common law. But given the breadth of the language of the residual order provision, I believe that the concrete exercise of that inherent power necessarily manifests itself through the statutory font of s. 686(8). . . . While the power of a court of appeal to order a stay of proceedings for abuse of process traces its origins to the common law, the actual exercise of that authority inevitably carries a statutory gloss by virtue of s. 686(8) of the Criminal Code. . . .

But while an appellate court's power to direct a stay of criminal proceedings ought to be properly understood as an exercise of its authority to enter an order under s. 686(8) of the Code, an order under s. 686(8) nonetheless represents a fundamentally distinct judicial order from an order for a new trial in accordance with s. 686(2)(b) within the structure of the appeals regime of the Criminal Code. As such, I do not believe that both types of orders are necessarily jointly excluded from this Court's general jurisdiction to grant leave by virtue of s. 40(3) of the Supreme Court Act.

This reasoning applies with equal force in the context of the Citizenship Act. The power to order a stay does not flow by necessary implication from the power to decide if citizenship was obtained by false pretences, set out at s. 18(1). Rather, it is a power which not only has its source in a different statutory provision (s. 50 of the Federal Court Act) but is also unrelated to the power set out at s. 18(1). To borrow the words of Lamer C.J. in Hinse, it is a “separate, divisible judicial act” (p. 626). Appeals from a decision to stay proceedings (or to refuse to enter a stay) should therefore be governed by the rules applicable to the statutory provision empowering the court to make this decision. Those rules are set out at s. 27 of the Federal Court Act and they provide expressly for a right of appeal. It follows that the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to hear the Crown’s appeal in this case.

B. Judicial Independence

67 We conclude that the meeting between Mr. Thompson and Isaac C.J. and the subsequent conduct of officials of the Department of Justice did indeed cause damage to the appearance of judicial independence. The question remains as to the extent of that damage and how it should be weighed in considering whether a stay should be granted in these significant and important proceedings.

68 The independence of judges has two aspects: an institutional aspect and a personal aspect. As Le Dain J. wrote in Valente v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 673, at p. 691:

. . . the word “independent” in s. 11(d) of the Charter is to be understood as referring to the status or relationship of judicial independence as well as to the state of mind or attitude of the tribunal in the actual exercise of its judicial function.

The parties agree that it is the personal aspect of judicial independence -- what is sometimes called “impartiality” -- that is at issue here. No one alleges, and indeed there is no credible evidence to suggest, that the integrity of the Federal Court as an institution has been compromised.

69 Though it is very important that the judiciary should actually remain independent, it is equally important that the judiciary should be seen to be independent. In our view, there is not sufficient evidence to support the conclusion that the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice did not in fact remain independent. However, the evidence does compel us to conclude that the appearance of judicial independence suffered significantly as a result of what happened on March 1, 1996.

70 The test for determining whether the appearance of judicial independence has been maintained is an objective one. The question is whether a well-informed and reasonable observer would perceive that judicial independence has been compromised. As Lamer C.J. wrote in R. v. Lippé, 1990 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 114, at p. 139, “[t]he overall objective of guaranteeing judicial independence is to ensure a reasonable perception of impartiality”.

71 The essence of judicial independence is freedom from outside interference. Dickson C.J., in Beauregard v. Canada, 1986 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 56, described the concept in these words, at p. 69:

Historically, the generally accepted core of the principle of judicial independence has been the complete liberty of individual judges to hear and decide the cases that come before them: no outsider -- be it government, pressure group, individual or even another judge -- should interfere in fact, or attempt to interfere, with the way in which a judge conducts his or her case and makes his or her decision. This core continues to be central to the principle of judicial independence.

72 What emerges from all of this is a simple test for determining whether the appearance of judicial independence has been maintained: whether a reasonable observer would perceive that the court was able to conduct its business free from the interference of the government and of other judges.

73 There are many principles of professional conduct that must be observed in order to maintain the appearance of judicial independence. Two of these are particularly relevant here.

74 First, and as a general rule of conduct, counsel for one party should not discuss a particular case with a judge except with the knowledge and preferably with the participation of counsel for the other parties to the case. See the Honourable J. O. Wilson, A Book for Judges (1980), at p. 52. The meeting between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice, at which counsel for the appellants were not present, violated this rule and was clearly inappropriate, and this despite the fact that the occasion for the meeting was a highly legitimate concern about the exceedingly slow progress of the cases.

75 Second, and again as a general rule, a judge should not accede to the demands of one party without giving counsel for the other parties a chance to present their views. It was therefore clearly wrong, and seriously so, for the Chief Justice to speak to the Associate Chief Justice at the instance of Mr. Thompson. We agree with Pratte J.A. that a chief justice is responsible for the expeditious progress of cases through his or her court and may under certain circumstances be obligated to take steps to correct tardiness. Yet, the actions of Isaac C.J. were more in the nature of a response to a party rather than to a problem. Thus, an action that might have been innocuous and even obligatory under other circumstances acquired an air of impropriety as a result of the events that preceded it. Quite simply, it was inappropriate.

In similar fashion, by responding as he did to the Chief Justice's intervention without the participation of counsel for the appellants, Jerome A.C.J. acted inappropriately. We believe that there is ample evidence that might lead a reasonable observer to conclude that the Associate Chief Justice was not able to conduct the appellants' cases free from the interference of the federal Department of Justice and of the Chief Justice of his court. Before March 1, 1996, the Associate Chief Justice was content with the pace at which the appellants' cases were advancing through his court. Indeed, even after Mr. Amerasinghe wrote to the Court Administrator to complain about the slow pace of the proceedings, the Associate Chief Justice resolved not to expedite consideration of the preliminary motions. Instead, he insisted on hearing oral argument according to the original, exceedingly dilatory schedule. It was only after the March 1, 1996 meeting between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice that Jerome A.C.J. acquired an appreciation of the Government's position. In his letter of March 1, 1996, the Chief Justice wrote:

As regards the three cases about which you wrote, the Associate Chief Justice says firstly, that he did not fully appreciate until he read your letter, the urgency of dealing with these matters as expeditiously as the Government would like. However, now that he is aware he will devote one week from 15 May to deal with these cases not only with respect to the preliminary points but also with respect to the merits. Finally, he has authorized me to say that additional cases of this class coming into the Court will be given the highest priority in light of the concerns expressed in your letter.
[Emphasis added.]

Subsequent developments confirmed that the Associate Chief Justice had indeed finally received the Government's message. On April 10, 1996, the Associate Chief Justice retreated from his earlier position and announced that he would set aside sufficient time in May to dispose of all the preliminary issues in the appellants' cases. He also indicated that he would bring the cases to a final conclusion by July.

78 We do not see how a reasonable observer could fail at least to wonder whether the Government, through Mr. Thompson, had succeeded in influencing the Associate Chief Justice to take a position more favourable to the Government's interests than he would otherwise have done. Making this conclusion even more likely is the undertaking of the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice to Mr. Thompson that all reasonable steps would be taken to avoid a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada.

79 The respondent tries to resist this conclusion by saying that the impetus to efficiency came not from Mr. Thompson and the Government but from the Chief Justice. The Chief Justice, the respondent says, was duty-bound to look into what was, by any objective standard, a serious delay in proceedings in his court. The respondent thus offers the Chief Justice as a kind of novus actus interveniens who stands between the Government and the Associate Chief Justice and, by the propriety of his own intentions, severs what would otherwise be an improper link between them.

80 What the respondent's submission overlooks is that the Chief Justice was not able to exercise his administrative function entirely free from outside interference. Mr. Thompson approached the Chief Justice and told him that if the Associate Chief Justice did not pick up the pace, the Federal Court would face the embarrassment of having the Government go "over its head" to this Court. The Chief Justice's letter to Mr. Thompson suggests that this "threat" carried some weight with him and with the Associate Chief Justice as well:

I have discussed your concerns with the Associate Chief Justice and, like me, he is prepared to take all reasonable steps possible to avoid a Reference to the Supreme Court of Canada on these matters.

It is reasonable to suppose that the threat of appeal to a higher authority influenced the Chief Justice and Associate Chief Justice to act in a way that would otherwise have been unpalatable to them. In this we agree entirely with Stone J.A., who found that “an informed person would conclude that this decision, by which the hearing of all preliminary motions and the trials would be compressed into a relatively short time frame, would redound to the disadvantage of the individual respondents [now appellants] and was taken so as ‘to avoid’ a reference to the Supreme Court” (p. 868). To interfere with the scheduling of cases because of delay is one thing but to pledge to take all reasonable steps to avoid a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada is quite another. It is wrong and improper for a judge to give such an undertaking. What is pertinent is to avoid delays, not to avoid appeals or recourse to higher courts.

81 However, the respondent is quite right to observe that the delay in the Federal Court -- Trial Division was inordinate and arguably inexcusable, and posed a real problem for the Department of Justice and for the Chief Justice. The fact is that in the space of a year, the Associate Chief Justice heard only one day of argument, and that on a preliminary motion. In our view, the Associate Chief Justice’s dilatoriness defies explanation. The appellants attempt nevertheless to explain it, saying that the Associate Chief Justice had reason to delay the proceedings until judgment had been given by himself in a case called Nemsila, which might have cast some light on citizenship revocation cases generally. The Chief Justice for his part mentioned the Nemsila case in his letter of March 1, 1996, though he did not attempt to offer it as a justification for delay in the appellants’ cases.

82 However, even accepting that there was reason to await the rendering of judgment in Nemsila, the proper procedure would have been to hear argument on the appellants’ motion and, if necessary, to reserve judgment. To call three cases to a halt awaiting the outcome of another case strikes us as a procedure calculated to create unnecessary delay. The appellants also point out that the respondent was not ready to proceed to a hearing on the merits. Apparently the respondent had not finished translating certain witness statements. But no one has suggested that the matter should have been brought to a conclusion on the merits before May 15, 1996, only that some progress should have been made toward resolving the preliminary questions before that date, and to settle the preliminary questions would not have required that all the witness statements should be available. Therefore, the fact that the respondent was not yet ready to proceed to trial cannot excuse the delay in the Associate Chief Justice's consideration of the preliminary questions.

83 What all this means is that Mr. Thompson went to the Chief Justice with a legitimate grievance. This fact does not excuse what Mr. Thompson did -- he assuredly chose an impermissible means of presenting his grievance -- but it does cast into very real doubt the sinister interpretation that the appellants have attempted to place on his conduct. Given the vexing delay that the respondent had faced in the Trial Division, it is quite understandable that Mr. Thompson would have wished to do something about it. We believe that Mr. Thompson's motives were proper. It was his judgment that is questionable. What Mr. Thompson did was not wicked or done in bad faith. It is enough to say that what he did was inappropriate. As senior counsel in the Department of Justice, he arranged to speak privately -- without opposing counsel present -- to the Chief Justice, concerning cases which were pending. This he should not have done.

84 The appellants suggest that there was a "conspiracy" to have the Associate Chief Justice recuse himself from the cases. Clearly there is insufficient evidence before this Court to dispose of this question fully, and we do not believe that it is crucial to the outcome of this appeal. Still, in our view, to accept that suggestion would stretch the bounds of credulity. Although Mr. Amerasinghe recorded that Mr. Thompson had gotten the Chief Justice to agree to have the Associate Chief Justice recuse himself, the evidence is all inconsistent with the existence of any such agreement. As events developed, the Associate Chief Justice did not recuse himself. Quite the contrary, on April 10, 1996, the Associate Chief Justice indicated that he wished to hear argument concerning the preliminary motions on May 15 and 16, as previously scheduled. It was only after the appellants indicated that they would seek a stay of proceedings on the ground that the Associate Chief Justice's independence had been compromised that the Associate Chief Justice recused himself. In the light of these events, the only way that the suggestion of a conspiracy can be credited is on the supposition that Mr. Thompson, the Chief Justice, and the Associate Chief Justice orchestrated the whole affair, from the disclosure of the March 1 correspondence through to the appellants' motion for a stay of proceedings. Again, we would emphasize that we lack the evidence necessary to decide this question and do not purport to do so. But that supposition passes all belief. Certainly no reasonable observer, apprised of all the facts, would believe it. Therefore, all that Mr. Amerasinghe's note shows is that Mr. Amerasinghe believed that some arrangement had been made to have the Associate Chief Justice recuse himself. The outcome of this appeal cannot turn on what Mr. Amerasinghe believed.

85 In short, the evidence supports the conclusion that the appearance of judicial independence suffered a serious affront as a result of the March 1, 1996 meeting between Mr. Thompson and Isaac C.J. This affront very seriously compromised the appearance of judicial independence. A reasonable observer apprised of the workings of the Federal Court and of all the circumstances would perceive that the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice were improperly and unduly influenced by a senior officer of the Department of Justice. However, there is no persuasive evidence of bad faith on the part of any of the actors in this drama, nor is there any solid evidence that the independence of the judges in question was actually compromised.

C. The Remedy

86 Although the meeting and subsequent exchange of letters between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice were very serious matters that compromised the appearance of the Chief Justice's and the Associate Chief Justice's independence, on balance the damage was not sufficiently serious to warrant the granting of that ultimate remedy of a stay of proceedings. The lesser remedy of ordering the appellants' cases to proceed before a different judge of the Federal Court -- Trial Division will, together with the additional conditions, suffice.

(i) The Standard of Review

87 A stay of proceedings is a discretionary remedy. Accordingly, an appellate court may not lightly interfere with a trial judge's decision to grant or not to grant a stay. The situation here is just as our colleague Gonthier J. described it in Elsom v. Elsom, 1989 CanLII 100 \(SCC\), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1367, at p. 1375:

[A]n appellate court will be justified in intervening in a trial judge's exercise of his discretion only if the trial judge misdirects himself or if his decision is so clearly wrong as to amount to an injustice.

See also R. v. Carosella, 1997 CanLII 402 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 80, at para. 48.

(ii) The Legal Principles

88 Though Cullen J. derived his power to enter a stay of proceedings from s. 50\(1\)\(b\) of the Federal Court Act and not from the Charter or the common law, the same principles that govern stays of proceedings under the latter heads of power apply equally well here. The “interest of justice” referred to in s. 50\(1\)\(b\) of the Federal Court Act is not fundamentally different from the concerns that animate the jurisprudence developed under s. 24\(2\) of the Charter, although the context in which s. 50\(1\)\(b\) operates may be different.

Most often a stay of proceedings is sought to remedy some unfairness to the individual that has resulted from state misconduct. However, there is a “residual category” of cases in which a stay may be warranted. L’Heureux-Dubé J. described it this way, in R. v. O’Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, at para. 73:

This residual category does not relate to conduct affecting the fairness of the trial or impairing other procedural rights enumerated in the Charter, but instead addresses the panoply of diverse and sometimes unforeseeable circumstances in which a prosecution is conducted in such a manner as to connote unfairness or vexatiousness of such a degree that it contravenes fundamental notions of justice and thus undermines the integrity of the judicial process.

The residual category, it bears noting, is a small one. In the vast majority of cases, the concern will be about the fairness of the trial.

If it appears that the state has conducted a prosecution in a way that renders the proceedings unfair or is otherwise damaging to the integrity of the judicial system, two criteria must be satisfied before a stay will be appropriate. They are that:

- (1) the prejudice caused by the abuse in question will be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated through the conduct of the trial, or by its outcome; and
- (2) no other remedy is reasonably capable of removing that prejudice.

(O’Connor, supra, at para. 75.)

The first criterion is critically important. It reflects the fact that a stay of proceedings is a prospective remedy. A stay of proceedings does not redress a wrong that has already been done. It aims to prevent the perpetuation of a wrong that, if left alone, will continue to trouble the parties and the community as a whole in the future. See O'Connor, at para. 82. For this reason, the first criterion must be satisfied even in cases involving conduct that falls into the residual category. See O'Connor, at para. 75. The mere fact that the state has treated an individual shabbily in the past is not enough to warrant a stay of proceedings. For a stay of proceedings to be appropriate in a case falling into the residual category, it must appear that the state misconduct is likely to continue in the future or that the carrying forward of the prosecution will offend society's sense of justice. Ordinarily, the latter condition will not be met unless the former is as well -- society will not take umbrage at the carrying forward of a prosecution unless it is likely that some form of misconduct will continue. There may be exceptional cases in which the past misconduct is so egregious that the mere fact of going forward in the light of it will be offensive. But such cases should be relatively very rare.

92 After considering these two requirements, the court may still find it necessary to consider a third factor. As L'Heureux-Dubé J. has written, "where the affront to fair play and decency is disproportionate to the societal interest in the effective prosecution of criminal cases, then the administration of justice is best served by staying the proceedings": R. v. Conway, 1989 CanLII 66 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659, at p. 1667. We take this statement to mean that there may be instances in which it will be appropriate to balance the interests that would be served by the granting of a stay of proceedings against the interest that society has in having a final decision on the merits. This is not to say, of course, that something akin to an egregious act of misconduct could ever be overtaken by some passing public concern. Rather, it merely recognizes that in certain cases, where it is unclear whether the abuse is sufficient to warrant a stay, a compelling societal interest in having a full hearing could tip the scales in favour of proceeding.

(iii) Application of the Law to the Facts

93 For several reasons, a stay of proceedings is not the appropriate remedy in these cases. First, there is no likelihood that the carrying forward of the cases will manifest, perpetuate or aggravate any abuse. Second, the lesser remedy of ordering the cases to go forward under the supervision of a different judge of the Trial Division without any direction or intervention from the Chief Justice or the Associate Chief Justice will suffice. In this connection, we believe that, if Isaac C.J. or Jerome A.C.J. considered the situation and the possible perception of bias by reasonable observers, they would agree that it would be preferable if they did not participate in any future cases dealing with the same or related issues. Third, Canada's interest in not giving shelter to those who concealed their wartime participation in acts of atrocities outweighs any foreseeable harm that might be done to the appellants or to the integrity of the system by proceeding with the cases. To the extent that he thought otherwise, the trial judge was in error.

(a) No Likelihood That Any Abuse Will Be Manifested in the Future

94 Although damage was done to the appearance of judicial independence, there is no indication that it will be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated by any future proceeding. Therefore, a stay of proceedings is not an appropriate remedy.

95 The appellants' best argument is that this case falls into the "residual category" mentioned in O'Connor because the state conducted its case against them so unfairly and vexatiously that harm was done to the very integrity of the judicial system. To carry forward in the light of what was done, they submit, would be to condone official misconduct and thereby to aggravate the abuse.

96 The problem with the appellants' submission is that it reflects a misunderstanding of the stay of proceedings as a remedy. When one looks at the criteria identified by L'Heureux-Dubé

J. in O'Connor, supra, at para. 75, and the accompanying discussion, what emerges, in our view, are the following propositions. A stay is not a form of punishment. It is not a kind of retribution against the state and it is not a general deterrent. If it is appropriate to use punitive language at all, then probably the best way to describe a stay is as a specific deterrent -- a remedy aimed at preventing the perpetuation or aggravation of a particular abuse. Admittedly, if a past abuse were serious enough, then public confidence in the administration of justice could be so undermined that the mere act of carrying forward in the light of it would constitute a new and ongoing abuse sufficient to warrant a stay of proceedings. However, only an exceedingly serious abuse could ever bring such continuing disrepute upon the administration of justice. It is conceivable, we suppose, that something so traumatic could be done to an individual in the course of a proceeding that to continue the prosecution of him, even in an otherwise unexceptionable manner, would be unfair. Similarly, if the authorities were to fabricate and plant evidence at the scene of a crime, the continued pursuit of a criminal prosecution might well be damaging to the integrity of the judicial system.

97 However, the damage that the appearance of judicial independence suffered as a result of the meeting between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice was not so serious that to proceed despite it would constitute an abuse. A reasonable, fully-informed member of the public, confronted with a continuation of the proceedings, would not think that an injustice was being perpetuated. Mr. Thompson, the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice acted imprudently, but not to such an extent that they undermined public confidence in the justice system. Nothing was done that could have rendered the proceedings oppressive for the appellants. Undoubtedly, the appellants had a legitimate concern that the judge who had charge of their cases and the Chief Justice had become partial to the state. But that concern had to do only with the particular judges involved and not with the justice system as a whole. Thus it is clear that remedies other than a stay will rectify this unfortunate situation.

98 The appellants further submit that the appearance of judicial partiality will continue in the future if the cases are allowed to proceed. In our view, there is no prospect of judicial partiality in the future. The Chief Justice intervened only with the Associate Chief Justice. His conduct did not compromise the integrity of any other judges. The taint is confined to the Associate Chief Justice and the Chief Justice and can be readily contained.

99 Despite these rather obvious facts, Cullen J. found that a reasonable person would worry that the Chief Justice would exercise an improper influence over any judge appointed to hear the appellants' cases. With respect, we do not agree. His finding rests on an incomplete view of the law. Contrary to public perception, it is clear that a chief justice is only "primus inter pares in the court". Ruffo v. Conseil de la magistrature, 1995 CanLII 49 \(SCC\), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 267, at para. 59. He or she enjoys no particular authority over other judges, save an administrative one. See Federal Court Act, s. 6(1).

100 Any influence that the Chief Justice might have had over the Associate Chief Justice might have been by virtue of some particular quality of their personal relationship. In this respect, we cannot refrain from commenting that the formal structural relationship between the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice is not clear and in the aftermath of these events, perhaps the appropriate authorities might wish to consider the matter further to clarify the situation. But that aside, what happened between the Chief Justice and the Associate Chief Justice should not be taken as a reflection of the institutional relationship between them. A reasonable observer would understand this, and would understand also that the individual judges of the Trial Division "have nothing to gain by not deciding as their consciences dictate and nothing to lose by doing justice": Ruffo, supra, at para. 101.

101 The sturdy resolve that Cullen J. himself demonstrated in deciding to grant a stay of proceedings was no aberration. It is precisely what any reasonably intelligent person, apprised of the workings of the Federal Court, would expect. However, by failing to credit the reasonable observer with sufficient understanding to recognize what was apparent even in his own conduct, Cullen J. committed an error of law. His exercise of discretion was founded on a misdirection and so cannot be allowed to stand.

102 The decision of this Court in R. v. Vermette, 1988 CanLII 87 \(SCC\), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 985, affords a good illustration of the correct approach to problems of apparent partiality. Vermette involved certain inflammatory and well-publicized remarks made by the Premier of Quebec about a case that was then before the courts. The trial judge entered a stay of proceedings, in part on the ground that the Premier's remarks had infringed the accused's right to a fair trial by making it unlikely that an impartial panel of jurors could be found. This Court set aside the stay. It held that the trial judge had founded his decision on impermissible speculation. La Forest J., for the majority, observed that there was "no evidence indicating that it will be impossible to select an impartial jury in a reasonable time" (p. 992). He further emphasized that, in the words of the Ontario Court of Appeal, "[t]here is an initial presumption that a juror . . . will perform his duties in accordance with his oath". See R. v. Hubbert (1975), 1975 CanLII 53 \(ON CA\), 29 C.C.C. (2d) 279, at p. 289.

103 The same kind of reasoning applies here. It is mere speculation that no impartial judge can be found. There is an initial presumption of fundamental importance that judges will be faithful to their solemn oath of office and not pay heed to any ill-advised interventions of a chief justice whose authority to intervene is limited to administrative matters. This serves as an answer not only to the suggestion that Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice will persist in their improper behaviour but also to the recent suggestion that Mr. Thompson's interference in the affairs of the Federal Court was more extensive than previously believed. Even if it is true that Mr. Thompson served as a sort of informer for the Chief Justice, reporting to him on judges whose performance was not acceptable to the federal government, still there is no reason to believe that such chicanery has impaired or will impair the ability of the judges of the Federal Court to function independently and in accordance with their oaths. The judge's oath is a solemn and weighty covenant, not lightly betrayed. Until some evidence appears that the independence of a particular judge may have been compromised, as happened with respect to the Associate Chief Justice as a result of the Chief Justice's letter of March 1, 1996, it remains a matter of speculation that a judge will be anything less than entirely faithful to the office.

(b) A Lesser Remedy Is Sufficient

104 For reasons similar to the ones we have already given, the abuse will be sufficiently remedied if we order that the cases against the appellants should go forward under a different judge of the Trial Division. There is every reason to think that the example of independence set by Cullen J. below will be followed by his successor.

105 If any illustration is needed of the sufficiency of a new trial as a remedy for bias, no better one can be found than the recent decision of this Court in R. v. Latimer, 1997 CanLII 405 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 217. In that case, it emerged following the trial that Crown counsel and the police had administered a sort of litmus test to prospective jurors. In particular, they had sought to discover what prospective jurors thought about moral issues that would arise in the course of the trial. Five of the jurors who had been questioned in this way became members of the jury. This Court condemned the actions of Crown counsel as “nothing short of a flagrant abuse of process and interference with the administration of justice” (para. 43).

106 The reasonable inference to be drawn is that if the lesser remedy of a new trial was adequate in Latimer, which arguably involved a more serious apprehension of bias than this appeal does, then a fortiori it is adequate here.

(c) Society's Interests Weigh Against a Stay

107 If we had concluded that having regard to the other factors it was unclear whether the abuse was sufficient to warrant a stay, we would have found that the societal interest in seeing these cases through to their conclusion tips the balance against a stay. The following words of L'Heureux-Dubé J., in O'Connor, supra, at para. 81, are apt:

. . . in determining whether the prejudice to the integrity of the judicial system is remediable, consideration must be given to the societal and individual interests in obtaining a determination of guilt or innocence. It goes without saying that these interests will increase commensurately to the seriousness of the charges against the accused.

108 Perhaps the first thing to notice is that what is at stake for the appellants in this case is arguably different from what is at stake for the typical accused in the typical criminal case. The state is trying to deprive the appellants of their citizenship and not of their liberty. Canadian citizenship is undoubtedly a very “valuable privilege” (see Benner v. Canada (Secretary of State), 1997 CanLII 376 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 358, at para. 72). For some, such as those who might become stateless if deprived of their citizenship, it may be valued as highly as liberty. Yet for most, liberty is more valuable still. Therefore, the interests on the appellants’ side of the balance do not weigh quite so heavily as they would if the proceedings were purely criminal in nature.

On the other side of the balance, society's interest in having a final decision on the merits is obvious. It is imperative that the truth should come to light. If it is not proven that the appellants did the things they are said to have done, then they will retain their citizenship. But if some or all of the alleged acts are proven then the appropriate action must be taken. What is at stake here, in however small a measure, is Canada's reputation as a responsible member of the community of nations. In our view, this concern is of the highest importance

An ongoing affront to judicial independence may be such that any further proceedings in the case would lack the appearance that justice would be done. In such a case the societal interest would not be served by a decision on the merits that is tainted by an appearance of injustice. The interest in preserving judicial independence will trump any interest in continuing the proceedings. Even in the absence of an ongoing appearance of injustice, the very severity of the interference with judicial independence could weigh so heavily against any societal interest in continuing the proceedings that the balancing process would not be engaged. This would occur rarely and only in the clearest of cases. Neither of these circumstances is present here. We have concluded that continuing the proceedings under the conditions we have outlined will not result in an ongoing appearance of injustice. Moreover, the affronts to judicial independence were serious but not so serious as to warrant a stay without balancing the harm to the image of the justice system against the interest of society in seeing alleged war criminals brought to justice. The crimes involved rank among the most heinous in history, and the civilized world's resolve to apply the appropriate sanctions should not be interfered with lightly. What transpired between Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice on March 1, 1996 cannot justify such an interference, wrong and improper as it was. If it were established that Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice had acted in bad faith and not out of a legitimate concern for the expeditious conduct of the appellants' cases, then this might well have constituted one of those rare and clearest of cases. But this was not the case. As matters stand, society's interest in seeing the cases through to their conclusion is of a most pressing nature and outweighs the affront to the appearance of judicial independence.

111 Therefore, the only just decision under the circumstances is that the cases should be allowed to proceed. To paraphrase the remarks of our colleague La Forest J. in Vermette, supra, at p. 994, “judicial abdication is not the remedy”. It is in the public interest that allegations of the most wicked kinds of criminal activity should be scrutinized by the judiciary. In all the circumstances, the imprudent actions of Mr. Thompson, the Chief Justice, and the Associate Chief Justice should not be permitted to frustrate the judicial process.

(iv) Conclusion

112 A stay of proceedings should not be granted in this case. Rather, the appropriate remedy is to have the cases against the appellants go forward under the supervision of a judge of the Trial Division, one who has, up to this point, had nothing to do with the affairs that form the subject matter of this appeal. The judge appointed will ignore all directions previously given by the Associate Chief Justice or the Chief Justice in these cases. Isaac C.J. and Jerome A.C.J. should not have anything further to do with these cases.

113 Before we conclude, there is one final matter that bears mentioning. It is this.

114 A well-known rule of Parliamentary practice holds that no Member of the House of Commons should comment upon any matter that is pending before the courts. The following account of what is called the “sub judice rule” appears in Beauchesne’s Rules & Forms of the House of Commons of Canada (6th ed. 1989), at p. 153 (para. 505):

Members are expected to refrain from discussing matters that are before the courts or tribunals which are courts of records. The purpose of this sub judice convention is to protect the parties in a case awaiting or undergoing trial and persons who stand to be affected by the outcome of a judicial inquiry. It is a voluntary restraint imposed by the House upon itself in the interest of justice and fair play.

Though the rule is a matter of Parliamentary convention and not of statutory law, “[i]t is desirable that the convention of Parliament as to matters sub judice should, so far as possible, be the same as the law administered in the courts”, or, in other words, that parliamentarians should act in a way that does not render more difficult the administration of the law by judges. See Attorney-General v. Times Newspapers Ltd., [1973] 1 Q.B. 710 (C.A.), at pp. 740-41, per Lord Denning M.R.

115 It seems to us that the decision to make public the report of the Honourable Charles Dubin on communications between Department of Justice officials and the courts while the matter was before the courts raises concerns about the sub judice rule. The Honourable Mr. Dubin was under retainer to the Department of Justice. He was responsible to the Minister of Justice. If Parliamentary convention did not permit the Minister to speak about the conduct of Mr. Thompson and the Chief Justice, then arguably it did not permit him to retain a third party to speak on his behalf about important aspects of the same subject matter that was before the courts.

116 The release of the report complicated the conduct of the appeal. Once it was released the appellants moved for production of many documents that the Department of Justice had handed over to Mr. Dubin. Their demands involved first the Federal Court of Appeal and later this Court in difficult and time-consuming inquiries into questions of privilege, and ultimately placed this Court in the awkward position of having to consider without the benefit of a trial judge’s findings of fact the credibility of certain items of evidence. These difficulties could easily have been avoided had the report not been released until after the conclusion of proceedings in the courts.

117 Nevertheless, the sub judice rule was not raised as a ground of appeal. Therefore, it is not for us to say whether the Minister violated the rule. However, we can say that even if the release of the report did constitute a violation of the rule, still that would not be a sufficient reason to grant a stay of proceedings in the circumstances of this case. As La Forest J. wrote in Vermette, supra, at p. 994, “judicial abdication is not the remedy for an infringement of the sub judice rule”.

118 Also of concern is the intervention of the Canadian Judicial Council. We understand that one of the Council’s committees issued a report in which comments were made about the conduct of Isaac C.J. and Jerome A.C.J. in connection with the appellants’ cases. Although the Canadian Judicial Council is not bound by the sub judice rule, it might have been preferable in these circumstances for the Council to have refrained from making its report while the matter of the stay of proceedings was still working its way through the courts. There is a further complication arising from the premature release of these reports. It arises because these reasons could be taken as indicating that we take a more serious view of these events than did either the Honourable Mr. Dubin or the Judicial Council although the Council did not have the benefit of all the material that was before this Court.

V. Disposition

119 We would dismiss the appeal. The stay of proceedings is set aside and the cases against the appellants are directed to proceed before a judge of the Trial Division. In accordance with s. 6(3) of the Federal Court Act, which provides for the precedence of judges in the event that the Chief Justice and Associate Chief Justice are unable to act, the senior judge who is able to act should choose a presiding judge from among those judges of the Trial Division who have heretofore had nothing to do with the conduct of these cases. The judge thus chosen will ignore any undertakings that Isaac C.J. or Jerome A.C.J. made to Mr. Thompson. Neither Isaac C.J. nor Jerome A.C.J. will have anything further to do with these cases.

120 Under all the circumstances, we would award costs to the appellants here and in the courts below.

Appeal dismissed with costs to the appellants.

Solicitor for the appellant Tobiass: Gesta J. Abols, Toronto.

Solicitors for the appellant Dueck: Bayne Sellar Boxall, Ottawa.

Solicitors for the appellant Oberlander: Sack Goldblatt Mitchell, Toronto.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Enforcement — Damage award as remedy for breach of rights — Quantum — Claimant strip searched and his car seized in violation of his constitutional rights — Whether claimant entitled to damages as remedy under s. 24(1) of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — If so, how should quantum of damages be assessed.

During a ceremony in Vancouver, the city police department received information that an unknown individual intended to throw a pie at the Prime Minister who was in attendance. Based on his appearance, police officers mistakenly identified W as the would-be pie-thrower, chased him down and handcuffed him. W, who loudly protested his detention and created a disturbance, was arrested for breach of the peace and taken to the police lockup. Upon his arrival, the corrections officers conducted a strip search. While W was at the lockup, police officers impounded his car for the purpose of searching it once a search warrant had been obtained. The detectives subsequently determined that they did not have grounds to obtain the required search warrant or evidence to charge W for attempted assault. W was released approximately 4.5 hours after his arrest. He brought an action in tort and for breach of his rights guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms against several parties, including the Province and the City. With respect to the strip search and the car seizure, the trial judge held that, although the Province and the City did not act in bad faith and were not liable in tort for either incident, the Province's strip search and the City's vehicle seizure violated W's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter. The trial judge assessed damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter at $100 for the seizure of the car and $5,000 for the strip search. The Court of Appeal, in a majority decision, upheld the trial judge's ruling.

Held: The appeal should be allowed in part.

The language of s. 24(1) is broad enough to include the remedy of constitutional damages for breach of a claimant's Charter rights if such remedy is found to be appropriate and just in the circumstances of a particular case. The first step in the inquiry is to establish that a Charter right has been breached; the second step is to show why damages are a just and appropriate remedy, having regard to whether they would fulfill one or more of the related functions of compensation, vindication of the right, and/or deterrence of future breaches.

Once the claimant has established that damages are functionally justified, the state has the opportunity to demonstrate, at the third step, that countervailing factors defeat the functional considerations that support a damage award and render damages inappropriate or unjust. Countervailing considerations include the existence of alternative remedies. Claimants need not show that they have exhausted all other recourses. Rather, it is for the state to show that other remedies including private law remedies or another Charter remedy are available in the particular case that will sufficiently address the Charter breach. Concern for effective governance may also negate the appropriateness of s. 24(1) damages. In some situations, the state may establish that an award of Charter damages would interfere with good governance such that damages should not be awarded unless the state conduct meets a minimum threshold of gravity.

If the state fails to negate that the award is “appropriate and just”, the final step is to assess the quantum of the damages. To be “appropriate and just”, an award of damages must represent a meaningful response to the seriousness of the breach and the objectives of s. 24(1) damages. Where the objective of compensation is engaged, the concern is to restore the claimant to the position he or she would have been in had the breach not been committed. With the objectives of vindication and deterrence, the appropriate determination is an exercise in rationality and proportionality. Generally, the more egregious the breach and the more serious the repercussions on the claimant, the higher the award for vindication or deterrence will be. In the end, s. 24(1) damages must be fair to both the claimant and the state. In considering what is fair to both, a court may take into account the public interest in good governance, the danger of deterring governments from undertaking beneficial new policies and programs, and the need to avoid diverting large sums of funds from public programs to private interests. Damages under s. 24(1) should also not duplicate damages awarded under private law causes of action, such as tort, where compensation of personal loss is at issue.

Here, damages were properly awarded for the strip search of W. This search violated his s. 8 Charter rights and compensation is required, in this case, to functionally fulfill the objects of constitutional damages. Strip searches are inherently humiliating and degrading and the Charter breach significantly impacted on W’s person and rights. The correction officers’ conduct which caused the breach was also serious. Minimum sensitivity to Charter concerns within the context of the particular situation would have shown the search to be unnecessary and violative. Combined with the police conduct, the impingement on W also engages the objects of vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches. The state did not establish countervailing factors and damages should be awarded for the breach. Considering the seriousness of the injury and the finding that the corrections officers’ actions were not intentional, malicious, high-handed or oppressive, the trial judge’s $5,000 damage award was appropriate.

With respect to the seizure of the car, W has not established that damages under s. 24(1) are appropriate and just from a functional perspective. The object of compensation is not engaged as W did not suffer any injury as a result of the seizure. Nor are the objects of vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches compelling. While the seizure was wrong, it was not of a serious nature. A declaration under s. 24(1) that the vehicle seizure violated W's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter adequately serves the need for vindication of the right and deterrence of future improper car seizures.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE —

I. Introduction

[1] The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the fundamental rights and freedoms of all Canadians and provides remedies for their breach. The first and most important remedy is the nullification of laws that violate the Charter under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. This is supplemented by s. 24(2), under which evidence obtained in breach of the Charter may be excluded if its admission would bring the administration of justice into disrepute, and s. 24(1) — the provision at issue in this case — under which the court is authorized to grant such remedies to individuals for infringement of Charter rights as it “considers appropriate and just in the circumstances”.

[2] The respondent Ward’s Charter rights were violated by Vancouver and British Columbia officials who detained him, strip searched his person and seized his car without cause. The trial judge awarded Mr. Ward damages for the Charter breaches, and the majority of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia upheld that award.

[3] This appeal raises the question of when damages may be awarded under s. 24(1) of the Charter, and what the amount of such damages should be. Although the Charter is 28 years old, authority on this question is sparse, inviting a comprehensive analysis of the object of damages for Charter breaches and the considerations that guide their award.

[4] I conclude that damages may be awarded for Charter breach under s. 24(1) where appropriate and just. The first step in the inquiry is to establish that a Charter right has been breached. The second step is to show why damages are a just and appropriate remedy, having regard to whether they would fulfill one or more of the related functions of compensation, vindication of the right, and/or deterrence of future breaches. At the third step, the state has the opportunity to demonstrate, if it can, that countervailing factors defeat the functional considerations that support a damage award and render damages inappropriate or unjust. The final step is to assess the quantum of the damages.

[5] I conclude that damages were properly awarded for the strip search of Mr. Ward, but not justified for the seizure of his car. I would therefore allow the appeal in part.

II. Facts

[6] On August 1, 2002, Prime Minister Chrétien participated in a ceremony to mark the opening of a gate at the entrance to Vancouver's Chinatown. During the ceremony, the Vancouver Police Department ("VPD") received information that an unknown individual intended to throw a pie at the Prime Minister, an event that had occurred elsewhere two years earlier. The suspected individual was described as a white male, 30 to 35 years, 5' 9", with dark short hair, wearing a white golf shirt or T-shirt with some red on it.

[7] Mr. Ward is a Vancouver lawyer who attended the August 1 ceremony. On the day, Mr. Ward, a white male, had grey, collar-length hair, was in his mid-40s and was wearing a grey T-shirt with some red on it. Based on his appearance, Mr. Ward was identified — mistakenly — as the would-be pie-thrower. When the VPD officers noticed him, Mr. Ward was running and appeared to be avoiding interception. The officers chased Mr. Ward down and handcuffed him. Mr. Ward loudly protested his detention and created a disturbance, drawing the attention of a local television camera crew. The television broadcast showed that Mr. Ward had a "very agitated look on his face", "appeared to be yelling for the benefit of the onlookers" and was "holding back" as he was being escorted down the street.

[8] Mr. Ward was arrested for breach of the peace and taken to the police lockup in Vancouver, which was under the partial management of provincial corrections officers. Upon his arrival, the corrections officers instructed Mr. Ward to remove all his clothes in preparation for a strip search. Mr. Ward complied in part but refused to take off his underwear. The officers did not insist on complete removal and Mr. Ward was never touched during the search. After the search was completed, Mr. Ward was placed in a small cell where he spent several hours before being released.

[9] While Mr. Ward was at the lockup, VPD officers impounded his car for the purpose of searching it once a search warrant had been obtained. VPD detectives subsequently determined that they did not have grounds to obtain the required search warrant or evidence to charge Mr. Ward for attempted assault. Mr. Ward was released from the lockup approximately 4.5 hours after he was arrested and several hours after the Prime Minister had left Chinatown following the ceremony.

III. Judicial History

A. Supreme Court of British Columbia, 2007 BCSC 3, 63 B.C.L.R. (4th) 361

[10] Mr. Ward brought an action in tort and for breach of his Charter rights against the City, the Province, and individual police and corrections officers for his arrest, detention, strip search, and car seizure. Justice Tysoe found Mr. Ward's arrest for breach of the peace to be lawful and dismissed the action against the individual police and corrections officers. However, Tysoe J. held that — although they did not act in bad faith and were not liable in tort for either incident — the Province's strip search and the City's vehicle seizure violated Mr. Ward's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter. In addition, Tysoe J. found that the City breached Mr. Ward's rights under s. 9 of the Charter and committed the tort of wrongful imprisonment by keeping Mr. Ward in the police lockup longer than necessary.

[11] Tysoe J. assessed damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter at $100 for the seizure of the car and $5,000 for the strip search. He rejected the governments' argument that damages were an inappropriate remedy for Charter breaches absent bad faith, abuse of power, or tortious conduct. In addition, Tysoe J. awarded $5,000 in damages for the wrongful imprisonment. This award is not at issue on this appeal.

B. British Columbia Court of Appeal, 2009 BCCA 23, 89 B.C.L.R. (4th) 217

[12] Justice Low, Finch C.J.B.C. concurring, upheld Tysoe J.'s ruling, agreeing with Mr. Ward that bad faith, abuse of power, or tortious conduct are not necessary requirements for the awarding of Charter damages.

[13] Justice Saunders, dissenting, would have allowed the Province and City appeals, holding that damages cannot be awarded where the police did not act in bad faith and simply made a mistake as to the proper course of action.

IV. Constitutional Provisions

[14] Section 24(1) of the Charter provides as follows:

Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

V. Issues

[15] The issues are the following:

A. When are damages under s. 24(1) available?

1. The language of s. 24(1) and the nature of Charter damages;
2. Step one: Proof of a Charter breach;
3. Step two: Functional justification of damages;
4. Step three: Countervailing factors;
5. Step four: Quantum of s. 24(1) damages;
6. Forum and procedure.

B. Application to the Facts

1. Damages for the strip search;
2. Damages for the car seizure.

VI. Analysis

A. When Are Damages Under Section 24(1) Available?

(1) The Language of Section 24(1) and the Nature of Charter Damages

[16] Section 24(1) empowers courts of competent jurisdiction to grant “appropriate and just” remedies for Charter breaches. This language invites a number of observations.

[17] First, the language of the grant is broad. As McIntyre J. observed, “[i]t is difficult to imagine language which could give the court a wider and less fettered discretion”: Mills v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 17 (SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863, at p. 965. The judge of “competent jurisdiction” has broad discretion to determine what remedy is appropriate and just in the circumstances of a particular case.

[18] Second, it is improper for courts to reduce this discretion by casting it in a strait-jacket of judicially prescribed conditions. To quote McIntyre J. in Mills once more, “[i]t is impossible to reduce this wide discretion to some sort of binding formula for general application in all cases, and it is not for appellate courts to pre-empt or cut down this wide discretion”: Mills, at p. 965.

[19] Third, the prohibition on cutting down the ambit of s. 24(1) does not preclude judicial clarification of when it may be “appropriate and just” to award damages. The phrase “appropriate and just” limits what remedies are available. The court’s discretion, while broad, is not unfettered. What is appropriate and just will depend on the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Prior cases may offer guidance on what is appropriate and just in a particular situation.

[20] The general considerations governing what constitutes an appropriate and just remedy under s. 24(1) were set out by Iacobucci and Arbour JJ. in Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3. Briefly, an appropriate and just remedy will: (1) meaningfully vindicate the rights and freedoms of the claimants; (2) employ means that are legitimate within the framework of our constitutional democracy; (3) be a judicial remedy which vindicates the right while invoking the function and powers of a court; and (4) be fair to the party against whom the order is made: Doucet-Boudreau, at paras. 55-58.

[21] Damages for breach of a claimant’s Charter rights may meet these conditions. They may meaningfully vindicate the claimant’s rights and freedoms. They employ a means well-recognized within our legal framework. They are appropriate to the function and powers of a court. And, depending on the circumstances and the amount awarded, they can be fair not only to the claimant whose rights were breached, but to the state which is required to pay them. I therefore conclude that s. 24(1) is broad enough to include the remedy of damages for Charter breach. That said, granting damages under the Charter is a new endeavour, and an approach to when damages are appropriate and just should develop incrementally. Charter damages are only one remedy amongst others available under s. 24(1), and often other s. 24(1) remedies will be more responsive to the breach.

[22] The term “damages” conveniently describes the remedy sought in this case. However, it should always be borne in mind that these are not private law damages, but the distinct remedy of constitutional damages. As Thomas J. notes in Dunlea v. Attorney-General, [2000] NZCA 84, [2000] 3 N.Z.L.R. 136, at para. 81, a case dealing with New Zealand’s Bill of Rights Act 1990, an action for public law damages “is not a private law action in the nature of a tort claim for which the state is vicariously liable but [a distinct] public law action directly against the state for which the state is primarily liable”. In accordance with s. 32 of the Charter, this is equally so in the Canadian constitutional context. The nature of the remedy is to require the state (or society writ large) to compensate an individual for breaches of the individual’s constitutional rights. An action for public law damages — including constitutional damages — lies against the state and not against individual actors. Actions against individual actors should be pursued in accordance with existing causes of action. However, the underlying policy considerations that are engaged when awarding private law damages against state actors may be relevant when awarding public law damages directly against the state. Such considerations may be appropriately kept in mind.

(2) Step One: Proof of a Charter Breach

[23] Section 24(1) is remedial. The first step, therefore, is to establish a Charter breach. This is the wrong on which the claim for damages is based.

(3) Step Two: Functional Justification of Damages

[24] A functional approach to damages finds damages to be appropriate and just to the extent that they serve a useful function or purpose. This approach has been adopted in awarding non-pecuniary damages in personal injury cases (Andrews v. Grand & Toy Alberta Ltd., 1978 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 229), and, in my view, a similar approach is appropriate in determining when damages are “appropriate and just” under s. 24(1) of the Charter.

[25] I therefore turn to the purposes that an order for damages under s. 24(1) may serve. For damages to be awarded, they must further the general objects of the Charter. This reflects itself in three interrelated functions that damages may serve. The function of compensation, usually the most prominent function, recognizes that breach of an individual’s Charter rights may cause personal loss which should be remedied. The function of vindication recognizes that Charter rights must be maintained, and cannot be allowed to be whittled away by attrition. Finally, the function of deterrence recognizes that damages may serve to deter future breaches by state actors.

[26] These functions of s. 24(1) damages are supported by foreign constitutional jurisprudence and, by analogy, foreign jurisprudence arising in the statutory human rights context.

[27] Compensation has been cited by Lord Woolf C.J. (speaking of the European Convention of Human Rights) as “fundamental”. In most cases, it is the most prominent of the three functions that Charter damages may serve. The goal is to compensate the claimant for the loss caused by the Charter breach; “[t]he applicant should, in so far as this is possible, be placed in the same position as if his Convention rights had not been infringed”: Anufrijeva v. Southwark

London Borough Council, [2003] EWCA Civ 1406, [2004] Q.B. 1124, at para. 59, per Lord Woolf C.J. Compensation focuses on the claimant's personal loss: physical, psychological and pecuniary. To these types of loss must be added harm to the claimant's intangible interests. In the public law damages context, courts have variously recognized this harm as distress, humiliation, embarrassment, and anxiety: Dunlea; Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971); Taunoa v. Attorney-General, [2007] NZSC 70, [2008] 1 N.Z.L.R. 429. Often the harm to intangible interests effected by a breach of rights will merge with psychological harm. But a resilient claimant whose intangible interests are harmed should not be precluded from recovering damages simply because she cannot prove a substantial psychological injury.

[28] Vindication, in the sense of affirming constitutional values, has also been recognized as a valid object of damages in many jurisdictions: see Fose v. Minister of Safety and Security, 1997 (3) SA 786 (C.C.), at para. 55, for a summary of the international jurisprudence. Vindication focuses on the harm the infringement causes society. As Didcott J. observed in Fose, violations of constitutionally protected rights harm not only their particular victims, but society as a whole. This is because they "impair public confidence and diminish public faith in the efficacy of the [constitutional] protection": Fose, at para. 82. While one may speak of vindication as underlining the seriousness of the harm done to the claimant, vindication as an object of constitutional damages focuses on the harm the Charter breach causes to the state and to society.

[29] Finally, deterrence of future breaches of the right has also been widely recognized as a valid object of public law damages: e.g., Attorney General of Trinidad and Tobago v. Ramanoop, [2005] UKPC 15, [2006] 1 A.C. 328, at para. 19; Taunoa, at para. 259; Fose, at para. 96; Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30 (1983), at p. 49. Deterrence, like vindication, has a societal purpose. Deterrence seeks to regulate government behaviour, generally, in order to achieve compliance with the Constitution. This purpose is similar to the criminal sentencing object of “general deterrence”, which holds that the example provided by the punishment imposed on a particular offender will dissuade potential criminals from engaging in criminal activity. When general deterrence is factored in the determination of the sentence, the offender is punished more severely, not because he or she deserves it, but because the court decides to send a message to others who may be inclined to engage in similar criminal activity: R. v. B.W.P., 2006 SCC 27, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 941. Similarly, deterrence as an object of Charter damages is not aimed at deterring the specific wrongdoer, but rather at influencing government behaviour in order to secure state compliance with the Charter in the future.

[30] In most cases, all three objects will be present. Harm to the claimant will evoke the need for compensation. Vindication and deterrence will support the compensatory function and bolster the appropriateness of an award of damages. However, the fact that the claimant has not suffered personal loss does not preclude damages where the objectives of vindication or deterrence clearly call for an award. Indeed, the view that constitutional damages are available only for pecuniary or physical loss has been widely rejected in other constitutional democracies: see, e.g., Anufrijeva; Fose; Taunoa; Smith; and Ramanoop.

[31] In summary, damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter are a unique public law remedy, which may serve the objectives of: (1) compensating the claimant for loss and suffering caused by the breach; (2) vindicating the right by emphasizing its importance and the gravity of the breach; and (3) deterring state agents from committing future breaches. Achieving one or more of these objects is the first requirement for “appropriate and just” damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter.

(4) Step Three: Countervailing Factors

[32] As discussed, the basic requirement for the award of damages to be “appropriate and just” is that the award must be functionally required to fulfill one or more of the objects of compensation, vindication of the right, or deterrence of future Charter breaches.

[33] However, even if the claimant establishes that damages are functionally justified, the state may establish that other considerations render s. 24(1) damages inappropriate or unjust. A complete catalogue of countervailing considerations remains to be developed as the law in this area matures. At this point, however, two considerations are apparent: the existence of alternative remedies and concerns for good governance.

[34] A functional approach to damages under s. 24(1) means that if other remedies adequately meet the need for compensation, vindication and/or deterrence, a further award of damages under s. 24(1) would serve no function and would not be “appropriate and just”. The Charter entered an existent remedial arena which already housed tools to correct violative state conduct. Section 24(1) operates concurrently with, and does not replace, these areas of law. Alternative remedies include private law remedies for actions for personal injury, other Charter remedies like declarations under s. 24(1), and remedies for actions covered by legislation permitting proceedings against the Crown.

[35] The claimant must establish basic functionality having regard to the objects of constitutional damages. The evidentiary burden then shifts to the state to show that the engaged functions can be fulfilled through other remedies. The claimant need not show that she has exhausted all other recourses. Rather, it is for the state to show that other remedies are available in the particular case that will sufficiently address the breach. For example, if the claimant has brought a concurrent action in tort, it is open to the state to argue that, should the tort claim be successful, the resulting award of damages would adequately address the Charter breach. If that were the case, an award of Charter damages would be duplicative. In addition, it is conceivable that another Charter remedy may, in a particular case, fulfill the function of Charter damages.

[36] The existence of a potential claim in tort does not therefore bar a claimant from obtaining damages under the Charter. Tort law and the Charter are distinct legal avenues. However, a concurrent action in tort, or other private law claim, bars s. 24(1) damages if the result would be double compensation: Simpson v. Attorney-General, [1994] 3 N.Z.L.R. 667 (C.A.), at p. 678.

[37] Declarations of Charter breach may provide an adequate remedy for the Charter breach, particularly where the claimant has suffered no personal damage. Considering declarations in Taunoa, at para. 368, McGrath J. writes:

The court's finding of a breach of rights and a declaration to that effect will often not only be appropriate relief but may also in itself be a sufficient remedy in the circumstances to vindicate a plaintiff's right. That will often be the case where no damage has been suffered that would give rise to a claim under private causes of action and, in the circumstances, if there is no need to deter persons in the position of the public officials from behaving in a similar way in the future. If in all the circumstances the court's pronouncement that there has been a breach of rights is a sufficiently appropriate remedy to vindicate the right and afford redress then, subject to any questions of costs, that will be sufficient to meet the primary remedial objective.

[38] Another consideration that may negate the appropriateness of s. 24(1) damages is concern for effective governance. Good governance concerns may take different forms. At one extreme, it may be argued that any award of s. 24(1) damages will always have a chilling effect on government conduct, and hence will impact negatively on good governance. The logical conclusion of this argument is that s. 24(1) damages would never be appropriate. Clearly, this is not what the Constitution intends. Moreover, insofar as s. 24(1) damages deter Charter breaches, they promote good governance. Compliance with Charter standards is a foundational principle of good governance.

[39] In some situations, however, the state may establish that an award of Charter damages would interfere with good governance such that damages should not be awarded unless the state conduct meets a minimum threshold of gravity. This was the situation in Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance), 2002 SCC 13, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 405, where the claimant sought damages for state conduct pursuant to a valid statute. The Court held that the action must be struck on the ground that duly enacted laws should be enforced until declared invalid, unless the state conduct under the law was “clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power”: para. 78. The rule of law would be undermined if governments were deterred from enforcing the law by the possibility of future damage awards in the event the law was, at some future date, to be declared invalid. Thus, absent threshold misconduct, an action for damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter cannot be combined with an action for invalidity based on s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982: Mackin, at para. 81.

[40] The Mackin principle recognizes that the state must be afforded some immunity from liability in damages resulting from the conduct of certain functions that only the state can perform. Legislative and policy-making functions are one such area of state activity. The immunity is justified because the law does not wish to chill the exercise of policy-making discretion. As Gonthier J. explained:

The limited immunity given to government is specifically a means of creating a balance between the protection of constitutional rights and the need for effective government. In other words, this doctrine makes it possible to determine whether a remedy is appropriate and just in the circumstances. Consequently, the reasons that inform the general principle of public law are also relevant in a Charter context. [para. 79]

[41] The government argues that the Mackin principle applies in this case, and, in the absence of state conduct that is at least “clearly wrong”, bars Mr. Ward’s claim. I cannot accept this submission. Mackin stands for the principle that state action taken under a statute which is subsequently declared invalid will not give rise to public law damages because good governance requires that public officials carry out their duties under valid statutes without fear of liability in the event that the statute is later struck down. The present is not a situation of state action pursuant to a valid statute that was subsequently declared invalid. Nor is the rationale animating the Mackin principle — that duly enacted laws should be enforced until declared invalid — applicable in the present situation. Thus, the Mackin immunity does not apply to this case.

[42] State conduct pursuant to a valid statute may not be the only situation in which the state might seek to show that s. 24(1) damages would deter state agents from doing what is required for effective governance, although no others have been established in this case. It may be that in the future other situations may be recognized where the appropriateness of s. 24(1) damages could be negated on grounds of effective governance.

[43] Such concerns may find expression, as the law in this area matures, in various defences to s. 24(1) claims. Mackin established a defence of immunity for state action under valid statutes subsequently declared invalid, unless the state conduct is “clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power” (para. 78). If and when other concerns under the rubric of effective governance emerge, these may be expected to give rise to analogous public law defences. By analogy to Mackin and the private law, where the state establishes that s. 24(1) damages raise governance concerns, it would seem a minimum threshold, such as clear disregard for the claimant's Charter rights, may be appropriate. Different situations may call for different thresholds, as is the case at private law. Malicious prosecution, for example, requires that "malice" be proven because of the highly discretionary and quasi-judicial role of prosecutors (Miazga v. Kvello Estate, 2009 SCC 51, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 339), while negligent police investigation, which does not involve the same quasi-judicial decisions as to guilt or innocence or the evaluation of evidence according to legal standards, contemplates the lower "negligence" standard (Hill v. Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police Services Board, 2007 SCC 41, [2007] 3 S.C.R. 129). When appropriate, private law thresholds and defences may offer guidance in determining whether s. 24(1) damages would be "appropriate and just". While the threshold for liability under the Charter must be distinct and autonomous from that developed under private law, the existing causes of action against state actors embody a certain amount of "practical wisdom" concerning the type of situation in which it is or is not appropriate to make an award of damages against the state. Similarly, it may be necessary for the court to consider the procedural requirements of alternative remedies. Procedural requirements associated with existing remedies are crafted to achieve a proper balance between public and private interests, and the underlying policy considerations of these requirements should not be negated by recourse to s. 24(1) of the Charter. As stated earlier, s. 24(1) operates concurrently with, and does not replace, the general law. These are complex matters which have not been explored on this appeal. I therefore leave the exact parameters of future defences to future cases.

[44] I find it useful to add a comment on the judgment of our Court in Béliveau St-Jacques v. Fédération des employées et employés de services publics inc., 1996 CanLII 208 (SCC), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 345. Béliveau St-Jacques is not determinative of the availability of the public law remedy of damages under s. 24(1). The judgment raised specific issues concerning the interpretation of ss. 49 and 51 of the Quebec Charter of human rights and freedoms, R.S.Q., c. C-12, and its interaction with the statutory regime set up under the Act respecting industrial accidents and occupational diseases, R.S.Q., c. A-3.001.

[45] If the claimant establishes breach of his Charter rights and shows that an award of damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter would serve a functional purpose, having regard to the objects of s. 24(1) damages, and the state fails to negate that the award is “appropriate and just”, the final step is to determine the appropriate amount of the damages.

(5) Step Four: Quantum of Section 24(1) Damages

[46] The watchword of s. 24(1) is that the remedy must be “appropriate and just”. This applies to the amount, or quantum, of damages awarded as much as to the initial question of whether damages are a proper remedy.

[47] As discussed earlier, damages may be awarded to compensate the claimant for his loss, to vindicate the right or to deter future violations of the right. These objects, the presence and force of which vary from case to case, determine not only whether damages are appropriate, but also the amount of damages awarded. Generally, compensation will be the most important object, and vindication and deterrence will play supporting roles. This is all the more so because other Charter remedies may not provide compensation for the claimant’s personal injury resulting from the violation of his Charter rights. However, as discussed earlier, cases may arise where vindication or deterrence play a major and even exclusive role.

[48] Where the objective of compensation is engaged, the concern is to restore the claimant to the position she would have been in had the breach not been committed, as discussed above. As in a tort action, any claim for compensatory damages must be supported by evidence of the loss suffered.

[49] In some cases, the Charter breach may cause the claimant pecuniary loss. Injuries, physical and psychological, may require medical treatment, with attendant costs. Prolonged detention may result in loss of earnings. Restitutio in integrum requires compensation for such financial losses.

[50] In other cases, like this one, the claimant's losses will be non-pecuniary. Non-pecuniary damages are harder to measure. Yet they are not by that reason to be rejected. Again, tort law provides assistance. Pain and suffering are compensable. Absent exceptional circumstances, compensation is fixed at a fairly modest conventional rate, subject to variation for the degree of suffering in the particular case. In extreme cases of catastrophic injury, a higher but still conventionally determined award is given on the basis that it serves the function purpose of providing substitute comforts and pleasures: Andrews v. Grand & Toy.

[51] When we move from compensation to the objectives of vindication and deterrence, tort law is less useful. Making the appropriate determinations is an exercise in rationality and proportionality and will ultimately be guided by precedent as this important chapter of Charter jurisprudence is written by Canada's courts. That said, some initial observations may be made.

[52] A principal guide to the determination of quantum is the seriousness of the breach, having regard to the objects of s. 24(1) damages. The seriousness of the breach must be evaluated with regard to the impact of the breach on the claimant and the seriousness of the state misconduct: see, in the context of s. 24(2), R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 353. Generally speaking, the more egregious the conduct and the more serious the repercussions on the claimant, the higher the award for vindication or deterrence will be.

[53] Just as private law damages must be fair to both the plaintiff and the defendant, so s. 24(1) damages must be fair — or “appropriate and just” — to both the claimant and the state. The court must arrive at a quantum that respects this. Large awards and the consequent diversion of public funds may serve little functional purpose in terms of the claimant’s needs and may be inappropriate or unjust from the public perspective. In considering what is fair to the claimant and the state, the court may take into account the public interest in good governance, the danger of deterring governments from undertaking beneficial new policies and programs, and the need to avoid diverting large sums of funds from public programs to private interests.

[54] Courts in other jurisdictions where an award of damages for breach of rights is available have generally been careful to avoid unduly high damage awards. This may reflect the difficulty of assessing what is required to vindicate the right and deter future breaches, as well as the fact that it is society as a whole that is asked to compensate the claimant. Nevertheless, to be “appropriate and just”, an award of damages must represent a meaningful response to the seriousness of the breach and the objectives of compensation, upholding Charter values, and deterring future breaches. The private law measure of damages for similar wrongs will often be a useful guide. However, as Lord Nicholls warns in Ramanoop, at para. 18, “this measure is no more than a guide because . . . the violation of the constitutional right will not always be coterminous with the cause of action at law”.

[55] In assessing s. 24(1) damages, the court must focus on the breach of Charter rights as an independent wrong, worthy of compensation in its own right. At the same time, damages under s. 24(1) should not duplicate damages awarded under private law causes of action, such as tort, where compensation of personal loss is at issue.

[56] A final word on exemplary or punitive damages. In Mackin, Justice Gonthier speculated that “[i]n theory, a plaintiff could seek compensatory and punitive damages by way of ‘appropriate and just’ remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter”: para. 79. The reality is that public law damages, in serving the objects of vindication and deterrence, may assume a punitive aspect. Nevertheless, it is worth noting a general reluctance in the international community to award purely punitive damages: see Taunoa, at paras. 319-21.

[57] To sum up, the amount of damages must reflect what is required to functionally serve the objects of compensation, vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches, insofar as they are engaged in a particular case, having regard to the impact of the breach on the claimant and the seriousness of the state conduct. The award must be appropriate and just from the perspective of the claimant and the state.

(6) Forum and Procedure

[58] For a tribunal to grant a Charter remedy under s. 24(1), it must have the power to decide questions of law and the remedy must be one that the tribunal is authorized to grant: R. v. Conway, 2010 SCC 22, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 765. Generally, the appropriate forum for an award of damages under s. 24(1) is a court which has the power to consider Charter questions and which by statute or inherent jurisdiction has the power to award damages. Provincial criminal courts are not so empowered and thus do not have the power to award damages under s. 24(1).

[59] As was done here, the claimant may join a s. 24(1) claim with a tort claim. It may be useful to consider the tort claim first, since if it meets the objects of Charter damages, recourse to s. 24(1) will be unnecessary. This may add useful context and facilitate the s. 24(1) analysis.

This said, it is not essential that the claimant exhaust her remedies in private law before bringing a s. 24(1) claim.

B. Application to the Facts

[60] At trial, Justice Tysoe held that the provincial correction officers' strip search and the Vancouver Police Department's vehicle seizure violated Mr. Ward's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter. There are thus two distinct claims to consider.

(1) Damages for the Strip Search

[61] The first question is whether Mr. Ward has established entitlement to the s. 24(1) remedy of damages. This requires him to show: (1) a breach of his Charter rights; and (2) that an award of damages would serve a functional purpose in the circumstances, having regard to the objects of s. 24(1) damages. If these are established, the burden shifts to the state (step 3) to show why, having regard to countervailing factors, an award of damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter would be inappropriate. If the state fails to negate s. 24(1) damages, the inquiry moves to the final step, assessment of the appropriate amount of the damages.

[62] Here the first step is met. Justice Tysoe found that the strip search violated Mr. Ward's personal rights under s. 8 of the Charter. This finding is not challenged on this appeal. Nor is it suggested that the British Columbia Supreme Court is not an appropriate forum for the action.

[63] The second question is whether damages would serve a functional purpose by serving one or more of the objects of s. 24(1) damages — compensation, vindication and deterrence.

[64] In this case, the need for compensation bulks large. Mr. Ward's injury was serious. He had a constitutional right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure, which was violated in an egregious fashion. Strip searches are inherently humiliating and degrading regardless of the manner in which they are carried out and thus constitute significant injury to an individual's intangible interests: R. v. Golden, 2001 SCC 83, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 679, at para. 90.

[65] The corrections officers' conduct which caused the breach of Mr. Ward's Charter rights was also serious. Minimum sensitivity to Charter concerns within the context of the particular situation would have shown the search to be unnecessary and violative. Mr. Ward did not commit a serious offence, he was not charged with an offence associated with evidence being hidden on the body, no weapons were involved and he was not known to be violent or to carry weapons. Mr. Ward did not pose a risk of harm to himself or others, nor was there any suggestion that any of the officers believed that he did. In these circumstances, a reasonable person would understand that the indignity resulting from the search was disproportionate to any benefit which the search could have provided. In addition, without asking officers to be conversant with the details of court rulings, it is not too much to expect that police would be familiar with the settled law that routine strip searches are inappropriate where the individual is being held for a short time in police cells, is not mingling with the general prison population, and where the police have no legitimate concerns that the individual is concealing weapons that could be used to harm themselves or others: Golden, at para. 97.

[66] In sum, the Charter breach significantly impacted on Mr. Ward's person and rights and the police conduct was serious. The impingement on Mr. Ward calls for compensation. Combined with the police conduct, it also engages the objects of vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches. It follows that compensation is required in this case to functionally fulfill the objects of public law damages.

[67] The next question is whether the state has established countervailing factors that would render s. 24(1) damages inappropriate or unjust.

[68] The state has not established that alternative remedies are available to achieve the objects of compensation, vindication or deterrence with respect to the strip search. Mr. Ward sued the officers for assault, as well as the City and the Province for negligence. These claims were dismissed and their dismissal was not appealed to this Court. While this defeated Mr. Ward's claim in tort, it did not change the fact that his right under s. 8 of the Charter to be secure against unreasonable search and seizure was violated. No tort action was available for that violation and a declaration will not satisfy the need for compensation. Mr. Ward's only recourse is a claim for damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter. Nor has the state established that an award of s. 24(1) damages is negated by good governance considerations, such as those raised in Mackin.

[69] I conclude that damages for the strip search of Mr. Ward are required in this case to functionally fulfill the objects of public law damages, and therefore are prima facie "appropriate and just". The state has not negated this. It follows that damages should be awarded for this breach of Mr. Ward's Charter rights.

[70] This brings us to the issue of quantum. As discussed earlier, the amount of damages must reflect what is required to functionally fulfill the relevant objects of s. 24(1) compensation, while remaining fair to both the claimant and the state.

[71] The object of compensation focuses primarily on the claimant's personal loss: physical, psychological, pecuniary, and harm to intangible interests. The claimant should, in so far as possible, be placed in the same position as if his Charter rights had not been infringed. Strip searches are inherently humiliating and thus constitute a significant injury to an individual's intangible interests regardless of the manner in which they are carried out. That said, the present search was relatively brief and not extremely disrespectful, as strip searches go. It did not involve the removal of Mr. Ward's underwear or the exposure of his genitals. Mr. Ward was never touched during the search and there is no indication that he suffered any resulting physical or psychological injury. While Mr. Ward's injury was serious, it cannot be said to be at the high end of the spectrum. This suggests a moderate damages award.

[72] The objects of vindication and deterrence engage the seriousness of the state conduct. The corrections officers' conduct was serious and reflected a lack of sensitivity to Charter concerns. That said, the officers' action was not intentional, in that it was not malicious, high-handed or oppressive. In these circumstances, the objects of vindication and deterrence do not require an award of substantial damages against the state.

[73] Considering all the factors, including the appropriate degree of deference to be paid to the trial judge's exercise of remedial discretion, I conclude that the trial judge's $5,000 damage award was appropriate.

(2) Damages for the Car Seizure

[74] As with the strip search, we must determine whether Mr. Ward has established entitlement to the s. 24(1) remedy of damages to compensate for the constitutional wrong he suffered due to the City's seizure of his vehicle. Again, this requires determining: (1) breach of Charter right; (2) whether an award of damages would serve a functional purpose, having regard to the objects of s. 24(1) damages; (3) whether the state has established countervailing factors negating an award of s. 24(1) damages; and (4) quantum, if the right to damages is established.

[75] The trial judge found that the seizure of the car violated Mr. Ward's rights under s. 8 of the Charter. This finding is not contested and thus satisfies the first requirement.

[76] The next question is whether Mr. Ward has established that damages under s. 24(1) for the car seizure are appropriate and just from a functional perspective.

[77] The object of compensation is not engaged by the seizure of the car. The trial judge found that Mr. Ward did not suffer any injury as a result of the seizure. His car was never searched and, upon his release from lockup, Mr. Ward was driven to the police compound to pick up the vehicle. Nor are the objects of vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches compelling. While the seizure was wrong, it was not of a serious nature. The police officers did not illegally search the car, but rather arranged for its towing under the impression that it would be searched once a warrant had been obtained. When the officers determined that they did not have grounds to obtain the required warrant, the vehicle was made available for pickup.

[78] I conclude that a declaration under s. 24(1) that the vehicle seizure violated Mr. Ward's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter adequately serves the need for vindication of the right and deterrence of future improper car seizures.

VII. Disposition

[79] The appeal is allowed in part. The award against the City in the amount of $100 is set aside, substituted by a declaration under s. 24(1) that the vehicle seizure violated Mr. Ward's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter. The award of damages against the Province in the sum of $5,000 for breach of Mr. Ward's s. 8 Charter rights is confirmed.

[80] We have been informed of a pre-existing agreement between Mr. Ward and the Province regarding costs and, as such, no cost order is made between Mr. Ward and the Province. No costs are awarded to or against the City.

Appeal allowed in part.

on appeal from the supreme court of nova scotia, appeal division

Evidence -- Exhibits -- Access -- Audio and video tapes admitted in evidence in criminal trial resulting in conviction -- Appeal court finding evidence inadmissible and overturning conviction -- Whether member of public entitled to access to tapes.

Courts -- Administration -- Exhibits -- Access -- Audio and video tapes admitted in evidence in criminal trial resulting in conviction -- Appeal court finding evidence inadmissible and overturning conviction -- Whether member of public entitled to access to tapes.

Respondent N was convicted of second degree murder on the basis of audio cassettes containing an alleged confession and a video cassette of an alleged re-enactment of the killing. The trial, the admission of the tapes into evidence and information about their contents were reported in the media. On appeal the majority found that the audio and video evidence had not been freely and voluntarily obtained from N, that it had been obtained in violation of his right to counsel, and that its admission into evidence brought the administration of justice into disrepute. As a result of the exclusion of the evidence, N's conviction was overturned. Appellant, a journalist, requested a copy of the tapes, but the respondent prothonotary refused to release them. The Nova Scotia Supreme Court, Trial Division, granted appellant's application, as a member of the public, to obtain the tapes. The Appeal Division reversed the judgment.

Held (L'Heureux-Dubé, Cory and McLachlin JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Lamer C.J. and Wilson, La Forest, Sopinka, Gonthier and Stevenson JJ.: N's privacy interests as a person acquitted of a crime outweigh the public right of access to exhibits judicially determined to be inadmissible against him. The court, as custodian of the exhibits, is bound to inquire into the use to be made of them and is fully entitled to regulate that use. Such exhibits are frequently the property of non-parties and there is ordinarily a proprietary interest in them. In this case N was a participant in the creation of the tapes, a creation found to have been in violation of his constitutional rights, and the court ought to take steps to protect his legitimate interests. In the face of obvious prejudice and with no proposed use being specified, the order for unrestricted access should not have been made. The exhibits were produced at trial and were open to public scrutiny and discussion, so that the open justice requirement had been met. Further, while those subjected to judicial proceedings must undergo public scrutiny of what is said at trial or on appeal, and contemporaneous reporting is protected, different considerations may govern when the process is at an end and the discussion removed from the hearing context. While fair, accurate, contemporaneous reports are likely to be balanced, to display the full context, and to expose the arguments on both sides, the subsequent release and publication of selected exhibits is fraught with the risk of unfairness. The courts must be careful not to become unwitting parties to N's harassment by facilitating the broadcasting of material which was found to have been obtained in violation of his fundamental rights.

In short, curtailment of public accessibility is justified where there is a need to protect the innocent, and N must be considered an innocent person for this purpose. Someone who has been accused and convicted of a serious crime on the basis of self-incriminating evidence obtained in violation of his Charter rights should not be made to bear the stigma resulting from unrestricted repetition of the very same illegally obtained evidence.

The Court should not entertain appellant's argument that the prohibition of access was an infringement of his rights under s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, since that point was not developed in the courts below. Had the point been raised, the parties would have had the right to lead evidence, the Court would have had the benefit of the reasoning of the courts below, and interested parties might have sought to intervene.

Per L'Heureux-Dubé, Cory and McLachlin JJ. (dissenting): Two principles of fundamental importance to our democratic society must be weighed in the balance in this case: the right to privacy and the principle of open courts. Here the openness of the courts must prevail. This result is necessary to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice. Further, appellate deference should be accorded to the trial judge's discretionary order concerning access, which was reasonable and should be upheld.

There is a strong presumption in favour of access to ensure judicial accountability. Criminal appeals, like criminal trials, should be as open as possible. The media, as the public's representative, should have access to all the exhibits which are part of the appeal proceedings and which may form the basis for the appellate court's decision. In particular, access should not be denied on the grounds that the tapes were found to be inadmissible. The public has a right to know what was excluded by the appellate court and the reason for its exclusion. To prohibit access to all evidence which has been ruled inadmissible would permit the courts to operate in secret. The trial judge in this case admitted all the tapes and the dissenting member of the court of appeal would have admitted the videotape and most of the audio tapes. This diversity of views on the issue of admissibility further supports the case for access, since the public is entitled to know the actual evidence that was the subject of differing judicial opinion.

Finally, the production of the tapes at trial did not satisfy the common law right of access and the underlying open court principle. The fact that the tapes have been played before should not weaken any claim for access, and makes the privacy interest less compelling. The right of access to court documents, which includes the opportunity to inspect and copy such records, facilitates the openness of court processes. While it is not necessary in this case to consider whether it is guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Charter, this right also promotes and advances the constitutional values of freedom of expression.

The judgment of Lamer C.J. and Wilson, La Forest, Sopinka, Gonthier and Stevenson JJ. was delivered by STEVENSON J. -- The appellant appeals a judgment of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia Appeal Division refusing him access to electronic tapes filed as exhibits in the criminal trial of the respondent Nugent. The issue is whether the appellant, a journalist, is entitled to have access and copy those tapes which, while admitted at a trial, were held to be inadmissible by that Appeal Division, which acquitted Nugent.

In May 1987, Nugent was convicted, at trial, of second degree murder. At that trial, two forms of electronic tapes, prepared by the R.C.M.P., were admitted into evidence. One form of tape was audio cassettes, containing an alleged confession by Nugent to the killing of the victim. The other form was a video cassette of an alleged re-enactment of the killing by Nugent. These tapes became the basis of the Crown's case against Nugent and, ultimately, the basis of his conviction. The trial, the admission of the tapes into evidence, and information of their content, were reported in the media.

On May 10, 1988, in a four-to-one decision, the Appeal Division allowed Nugent's appeal of his conviction, set the conviction aside, and entered an acquittal. The majority of the Appeal Division ruled that the audio and video evidence was not obtained freely and voluntarily from Nugent, that it was obtained in violation of his right to counsel, and that its admission into evidence brought the administration of justice into disrepute.

On May 16, 1988, the appellant wrote to the Attorney General's Department requesting a copy of the audio and video tapes which were admitted at Nugent's trial. The appellant was advised to contact the Registrar of the Appeal Division, as custodian of such exhibits. The Registrar, by letter of May 19, 1988, indicated that he would not release the exhibits, either before or after the appeal period, which was still running. This refusal on the part of the Registrar eventually led to the appellant's bringing an application, as a member of the public, to obtain the tapes from the Registrar, as Prothonotary of the Supreme Court at Halifax.

In his application the appellant swore that he was a television producer "currently doing research on the topic of video tapes and their use by the police in recording confessions, re-enactments of crime and recording of surveillance activities". He swore that he had been denied access by the prothonotary, who proposed releasing the exhibits to the Crown, but invited the appellant to apply to a Supreme Court judge in chambers.

The prothonotary, in making his ruling, referred to Nova Scotia Civil Procedure Rule 30.11(6):

On the expiration of the time for appeal or on the disposition of the appeal, the prothonotary or registrar on his or her own initiative shall return the exhibits to the respective solicitors or parties who put the exhibits in evidence at the trial. . . .

Glube C.J.T.D. heard the application, hearing counsel for Nugent on the application as well as counsel for the appellant and the prothonotary: (1988), 1988 CanLII 7126 \(NS SC\), 87 N.S.R. (2d) 29. She concluded that the appellant was entitled to access, including the right to make copies. In the course of her ruling she said, at p. 34:

I was not asked to rule on, nor does this application relate to, whether or not these videotapes and copies of audiotapes could be played on television. If that issue was before me, I would be prepared to put restrictions on the viewing, such as nondisclosure of the individual and location of the event, as well as blocking off the face of Mr. Nugent. However, on the actual application, I was unable to accept the argument of Mr. Coady on behalf of Mr. Nugent that the ends of justice require that I refuse the application in spite of the decision of the Court of Appeal and the remarks in MacIntyre Attorney General of Nova Scotia v. MacIntyre, [1982 CanLII 14 \(SCC\), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 175] about protection of the innocent. Any violation of that protection has already occurred and controls over future publication could be imposed if the appropriate application is made.

Based on the case law cited, namely, MacIntyre and Lortie Re Regina and Lortie (1985), [1985 CanLII 3637 \(QC CA\), 21 C.C.C. (3d) 436 (Que. C.A.)], I concluded that this was an appropriate case in which to grant the application for access to and permitting copying of the audio and videotapes as requested. I find their release does not bring the administration of justice into disrepute. The public interest outweighs any private interest. Had an application been made during the trial, it might well have been granted.

The appeal was argued before us on the basis that the issue was one of access; no question was raised regarding the right to copy if access were properly permitted. Moreover, counsel for the appellant suggested other uses that might be made of the copied tapes, for example, to criticize the decision of the Attorney General not to appeal the decision acquitting Nugent. The order of the chambers judge makes no restriction on the use to be made, and the appellant seeks an order from this Court, free of any restrictions upon the use of the copies. That order does not reserve any questions of use nor reserve any right of further application. Counsel for Vickery declined, during argument, to delineate the use to which the copies would be put.

Nugent was given party status in order to appeal the judgment of Glube C.J.T.D. Macdonald J.A. speaking for the Appeal Division reversed the judgment: (1989), 1989 CanLII 198 \(NS CA\), 91 N.S.R. (2d) 126. After referring to MacIntyre, supra, and Solomon v. McLaughlin, 1982 CanLII 1161 \(AB KB\), [1982] 4 W.W.R. 415 (Alta. Q.B.), he recognized the principle that the court is the keeper of its records and may exercise its discretion in excluding them from public access where the circumstances require. He added the following (at pp. 132-33):

The acquittal of Mr. Nugent . . . is equivalent to a finding of innocence with respect to any subsequent criminal proceedings. As a matter of public policy, it is my opinion that the acquittal should also be treated as the equivalent of a finding of innocence with respect to the right of the public to inspect, copy and publish the prejudicial material contained in the [respondent's] confessions. I recognize that the rule is that the public have a general right to inspect judicial records and documents. This right is not absolute but rather is one where, as Chief Justice Dickson said in MacIntyre (p. 149), "Every court has a supervisory and protecting power over its own records."

In my opinion, Mr. Nugent comes within the exception to the general access rule with respect to innocent persons referred to in the MacIntyre case. There the fundamental principle that the innocent must be protected from unnecessary harm was held to override the public access interest in those cases where nothing is found upon the execution of a valid search warrant. That being so, in my view the protection of the innocent from unnecessary harm should prevail here and override the public access interest in Mr. Nugent's confessions.

In the hearing before us the appellant sought to argue that the prohibition of access was an infringement of his rights under s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

That point was not pursued in the courts below. While this Court undoubtedly has a discretion to entertain arguments not developed in the courts below, I would not extend that privilege to the appellant in this case. Had the point been raised in chambers, the parties would have had the right to lead evidence. We would have had the benefit of the reasoning of the courts below. If the issue had been clearly raised, interested parties might have sought to intervene even though no constitutional question in the technical sense of that term was raised. I note in passing, however, that if the appellant were to succeed on the Charter ground, the effect would be to impose a gloss upon rule 30.11(6).

In my view this Court should not entertain the Charter argument at this stage.

I turn then to the matters to be considered in judging whether to grant access to filed exhibits. In my view, the Appeal Division was correct in concluding that Nugent's privacy interests as a person acquitted of a crime outweigh the public right of access to exhibits judicially determined to be inadmissible against him.

The case of Re Regina and Lortie, 1985 CanLII 3637 \(QC CA\), [1985] C.A. 451, 21 C.C.C. (3d) 436, to which the chambers judge referred, is distinguishable. In that case, the question was whether, pending the disposition of an appeal, there should be a temporary prohibition against the showing of tapes which were exhibits and had been copied. The majority of the Quebec Court of Appeal granted the prohibition. L'Heureux-Dubé J.A. (as she then was) dissented. Her comments were stressed before us. Her strong defence of the openness concept accords with the views of this Court in MacIntyre. In Lortie, the accused, whose privacy interests would be of paramount concern, supported the showing of the tapes. L'Heureux-Dubé J.A. was very careful to note (at p. 443 C.C.C.) that the question of copying and broadcasting of the tapes after the court of appeal had given its decision was not before the court. That question was before the Nova Scotia Appeal Division and is before us.

In MacIntyre, the other case to which the chambers judge referred, the press sought access to search warrants and supporting material. Dickson J. (as he then was), speaking for the majority, noted that it was unwise to attempt any comprehensive definition of the right of access (p. 183), and pointed out the competing policy considerations of respect for individual privacy and the need for "openness" in respect of judicial acts. This Court concluded that protection of the innocent would override public access, but that where the warrant was executed and something found the parties affected and the public should have access to the material upon which the warrant had been issued. Because a search warrant is issued in camera, allowing access to the materials in those circumstances serves public accessibility and concomitant judicial accountability (p. 186).

In this appeal, the exhibits were presented at an open trial to which there was public access and, indeed, information relating to them was publicly discussed.

I have already noted that the heart of MacIntyre is public accessibility as an important ingredient of judicial accountability. The applicant, in his sworn affidavit in support of this application, makes no claim to serve that interest. He does not indicate that these tapes are to be used to engage in some scrutiny of the judicial process. Public access to the trial and appellate process in which these exhibits were discussed was in no way impeded and there is no basis on the material before us for concluding that unrestricted dissemination of them would make any meaningful contribution to scrutiny.

I believe that the Appeal Division was correct in applying the principles in MacIntyre and concluding that the interests of Nugent outweighed those put forward by the appellant.

In my view, the chambers judgment fails to recognize four significant factors that come into play in deciding whether the appellant should be given access to (and thus the ability to copy and disseminate) these exhibits. (I note that these points may not have been put to the chambers judge in argument). The factors are:

- 1) The nature of exhibits as part of the court "record".
- 2) The right of the court to inquire into the use to be made of access, and to regulate it.
- 3) The fact that the exhibits were produced at trial and open to public scrutiny and discussion so that the open justice requirement had been met.
- 4) That those subjected to judicial proceedings must undergo public scrutiny of what is said at trial or on appeal and contemporaneous discussion is protected, but different considerations may govern when the process is at an end and the discussion removed from the hearing context.

1) The Nature of Exhibits as Part of the Court "Record"

An exhibit is not a court record of the same order as records produced by the court, or pleadings and affidavits prepared and filed to comply with court requirements. Exhibits are frequently the property of non-parties and there is, ordinarily, a proprietary interest in them. When they have served the purpose for their filing they are ordinarily at the disposition of the person who produced them. While they remain in its custody, the court has a duty to pass upon any request for access. That function is ordinarily exercised by its officers, such as the prothonotary here, but the court having custody of the exhibits has supervision over their use. The chambers judge here noted the Nova Scotia rule which directs that exhibits be turned over to the party producing them (Rule 30.11(6), supra). She observed that the reason for the rule was to relieve the court of the task of storing unwanted exhibits. The rule, however, reflects the fact that exhibits are not the property of the court.

While proprietary interests are not stressed by any of the parties before us, they are relevant to characterizing the nature of exhibits in balancing the interests of competing parties. Ordinarily the person entitled to possession would be a party to any application for access to them. Here, Nugent was a party to their creation.

I note that counsel here suggested that someone might want access to the tapes for the purpose of preparing educational programmes for the police. If that were the object of the request, the police, who probably own them, might well have some view to express.

Once exhibits have served their purpose in the court process, the argument based on unfettered access as part of the open process lying at the heart of the administration of justice loses some of its pre-eminence.

2)The Right of the Court to Inquire Into the Use to be Made of Access, and to Regulate It

It follows that the court, as the custodian of the exhibits, is bound to inquire into the use that is to be made of them and, in my view, is fully entitled to regulate that use by securing appropriate undertakings and assurances if those be advisable to protect competing interests. Nugent has put forward a genuine interest in the disposition of the tapes. He was a participant in their creation, a creation found to have been a violation of his constitutional rights, and the court ought to take steps to protect his legitimate interests.

In exercising its supervisory powers over material surrendered into its care, the court may regulate the use made of it. In circumstances such as these I do not think it right to say, as the chambers judge suggested, that Nugent must initiate other proceedings to protect or promote his privacy interests. While subsequent proceedings might lie, the court is, on the application, able to obviate that step. There is no need for a multiplicity of proceedings, nor should someone in the position of Nugent run the risk of bolting the laboratory door after the virus has not only been removed, but reproduced. In an application of this nature the court must protect the respondent and accommodate the public interest in access. This can only be done in terms of the actual purpose and, in the face of obvious prejudice and the absence of a specific purpose, the order for unrestricted access and reproduction should not have been made.

3) The Fulfillment of the Open Justice Requirement

The exhibits were produced at trial and open to public scrutiny and discussion so that the open justice requirement had been met.

I do not, for one moment, gainsay the importance of the principle that justice must be administered openly, but I am inclined to agree with the observation of Powell J. of the United States Supreme Court, quoted by Macdonald J.A. in the judgment appealed from, at p. 131, that "[t]he requirement of a public trial is satisfied by the opportunity of members of the public and the press to attend the trial and to report what they have observed." (Nixon v. Warner Communications, Inc., 435 U.S. 589 (1978), at p. 610.)

In the course of that judgment, Powell J. noted that the court having custody of records and other material has a responsibility to exercise an informed discretion "with a sensitive appreciation of the circumstances that led to their production" (p. 603). As none of the United States authorities to which I have been referred deal with the copying of inadmissible exhibits, I am unable to say what conclusion a court in the United States would reach, but I am persuaded that conclusion is, in the United States, as here, reached upon a balancing of the interests at the time access is sought.

I am not persuaded that the court appealed from erred in its conclusion that the chambers judge had given insufficient weight to Nugent's privacy rights, rights he holds after a judicial acquittal. He surrendered that privacy during the trial process, but he did not surrender it for all time.

4) Non-Contemporaneous Public Scrutiny

Those subjected to judicial proceedings must undergo public scrutiny of what is said at trial or on appeal and contemporaneous discussion is protected, but different considerations may govern when the process is at an end and the discussion removed from the hearing context.

Nugent's privacy was surrendered to the judicial process. Public access to and reporting of those proceedings is a price that he and any other accused must pay in the interests of ensuring the accountability of those engaged in the administration of justice. This principle is reflected in the special privilege that our law has traditionally accorded those who report judicial proceedings. Yet, modern defamation statutes restrict that privilege to contemporaneous reporting (see for example s. 13(1)(b) of the Defamation Act, R.S.N.S. 1967, c. 72, which is also c. D-3 of the C.S.N.S.). The reason, I suggest, is obvious. Fair, accurate, contemporaneous reports are likely to be balanced, to display the full context, and to expose the arguments on both sides. The subsequent release and publication of selected exhibits is fraught with risk of partiality, with a lack of fairness. Those policy considerations which form our attitude towards the openness of the administration of justice are relevant to an application such as this. Nugent cannot escape from proceedings in which he was involved, nor from the fair and accurate reporting of them, but the courts must be careful not to become unwitting parties to his harassment by facilitating the broadcasting of material which was found to have been obtained in violation of his fundamental rights.

As Dickson J. observed in MacIntyre, at p. 184:

In short, what should be sought is maximum accountability and accessibility but not to the extent of harming the innocent

Before us counsel suggested that there might be scope for challenging the decision of the Attorney General not to appeal Nugent's acquittal by the Appeal Division and the tapes could be used to that end. I am by no means persuaded that it is necessary to go beyond the proceedings in the trial and appeal to make that challenge.

Conclusion

While MacIntyre did not address access to or copying of exhibits, the principles discussed there must, a fortiori, apply to them.

In MacIntyre, Dickson J. said this (at pp. 186-87):

In my view, curtailment of public accessibility can only be justified where there is present the need to protect social values of superordinate importance. One of these is the protection of the innocent.

The appellant would have us interpret the expression "innocent person" extremely narrowly. Dickson J. did not claim to define exhaustively the limitations of rights of access. He said this (at p. 183):

By reason of the relatively few judicial decisions it is difficult, and probably unwise, to attempt any comprehensive definition of the right of access to judicial records or delineation of the factors to be taken into account in determining whether access is to be permitted.

He also spoke of innocent persons who were the subject of search warrants as entitled to protection from "the stigmatization to name and reputation which would follow publication of the search" (p. 187).

I find it difficult to fathom how Nugent could be considered anything other than an innocent person within MacIntyre. Someone who has been accused and convicted of a serious crime on the basis of self-incriminating evidence obtained in violation of his Charter rights should not be made to bear the stigma resulting from unrestricted repetition of the very same illegally obtained evidence.

The Appeal Division was correct in concluding that Nugent's privacy interests outweighed the appellant's interests in viewing and disseminating the exhibits.

It may be said that the order of the chambers judge was discretionary in nature. I am not satisfied that it should be so characterized and, as the point was not made by the appellant, authorities supporting that characterization were not advanced. However, assuming the order was "discretionary", the chambers judge did not have all the relevant considerations before her, gave insufficient weight to Nugent's innocence and should have insisted upon the proposed use being specified so that any order could be crafted accordingly. In my view it was wrong to give an order, let alone an unrestricted order.

I would dismiss the appeal, with costs to the respondent Nugent, with no costs for or against the prothonotary or the Attorney General.

The Principles that Must be Weighed in the Balance

There are two principles of fundamental importance to our democratic society which must be weighed in the balance in this case. The first is the right to privacy which inheres in the basic dignity of the individual. This right is of intrinsic importance to the fulfilment of each person, both individually and as a member of society. Without privacy it is difficult for an individual to possess and retain a sense of self-worth or to maintain an independence of spirit and thought.

The second principle is that courts must, in every phase and facet of their processes, be open to all to ensure that so far as is humanly possible, justice is done and seen by all to be done. If court proceedings, and particularly the criminal process, are to be accepted, they must be completely open so as to enable members of the public to assess both the procedure followed and the final result obtained. Without public acceptance, the criminal law is itself at risk.

In this appeal an appropriate balance must be struck between the right to privacy and the principle of open courts.

The American Experience

At the outset, it may be of assistance to consider the American experience in the field. This review should be conducted carefully and cautiously, bearing in mind the differences between the American Constitution and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, as well as the differences in the history and background of the two countries. The examination is undertaken not with the aim of slavishly following the American decisions, but rather to benefit from the discussions and learning which have emanated from the American jurisprudence and scholarship.
