

ONTARIO SUPERIOR COURT OF JUSTICE

(TORONTO REGION) (CRIMINAL DIVISION)

BETWEEN:

HIS MAJESTY THE KING

RESPONDENT

AND

Kevin Alexander McLean

ACCUSED (APPLICANT)

BOOK OF AUTHORITIES SUBMITTED ON BEHALF OF THE APPLICANT

DATE AND PLACE OF FILING: SCJ 361 University Avenue Courthouse (1st floor): March 23, 2026

Tab	Authority	Citation
1.	R v Araujo	2000 SCC 65
2.	R v Anderson	2014 SCC 41
3.	R v Babos	2014 SCC 16
4.	Baker v Canada	[1999] 2 SCR 817
5.	Blencoe v BC	2000 SCC 44
6.	R v Côté	2011 SCC 46
7.	R v Conway	2010 SCC 22
8.	R v Deschamplain	2004 SCC 76
9.	Doucet-Boudreau	2003 SCC 62
10.	R v Dudley	2009 SCC 58
11.	Dunsmuir v New Brunswick	2008 SCC 9
12.	R v Evans	[1991] 1 SCR 869
13.	R v Feeney	[1997] 2 SCR 13
14.	R v Grant	2009 SCC 32
15.	Henry v BC	2015 SCC 24
16.	Hinse v Canada	2015 SCC 35
17.	R v Jordan	2016 SCC 27

18.	R. v. Krannenburg,	1980 CanLII 179 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 1053,
19.	British Columbia (Attorney General) v. Lafarge Canada Inc., 2007 SCC 23 (CanLII), [2007] 2 SCR 86,	2007 SCC 23
20.	Landreville v Boucherville	[1978] 2 SCR 801
21.	R v MacNeil	2009 SCC 3
22.	Mackin v New Brunswick	2002 SCC 13
23.	McLean v Bradley	1878 CanLII 22
24.	R v Myers	2019 SCC 18
25.	R v Nixon	2011 SCC 34
26.	R v O'Connor	[1995] 4 SCR 411
27.	R v Potvin	[1993] 2 SCR 880
28.	R v Regan	2002 SCC 12
29.	Ref re Residential Tenancies Act	1981 CanLII 24
30.	Roncarelli v Duplessis	1959 CanLII 50
31.	R v S.G.T.	2010 SCC 20
32.	R v Stinchcombe	[1991] 3 SCR 326
33.	R v Storrey	[1990] 1 SCR 241
34.	Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Tobiass, 1997 CanLII 322 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 391	1997 CanLII 322
35.	Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov,	2019 SCC 65
36.	Vancouver v Ward	2010 SCC 27
37.	Wewaykum Indian Band v. Canada, 2003 SCC 45 (CanLII), [2003] 2 SCR 259,	2003 SCC 45
38.	Vickery v. Nova Scotia Supreme Court (Prothonotary)	[1991] 1 S.C.R. 671
39.	Andrews v. Grand and Toy Alberta Ltd.	[1978] 2 S.C.R. 229
40.	Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto	[1995] 2 S.C.R. 1130

41.	Young v. Bella	2006 SCC 3
42.	Mustapha v. Culligan of Canada Ltd.	2008 SCC 27
43.	Cinar Corporation v. Robinson	2013 SCC 73
44.	Saadati v. Moorhead	2017 SCC 28
45.	Ontario (Criminal Code Review Board) v. Hale	1999 CanLII 3805 (ON CA)
46.	R v Tsekouras	2017 ONCA 290
47.	R v Gauthier	2013 SCC 32
48.	R v Quesnelle	2013 ONCA 180
49.	R v Cole	2012 SCC 53 (CanLII) , [2012] 3 SCR 34 ,
50.	R v N.M.	2007 CanLII 31570 (ON SC)
51.	R v Rajkovic	2021 ONCA 11
52.	R. v. Schertzer	2015 ONCA 259
53.	R. v. Hansen	2018 ONCA 46
54.	Koukounakis v. Stainrod	1995 CanLII 621 (ON CA)
55.	McIntyre v. Grigg	2006 CanLII 37326 (ON CA)
56.	Rizzi v. Mavros	2008 ONCA 172
57.	Nissen v. Durham Regional Police Services Board	2017 ONCA 10
58.	Nissen v. Durham Regional Police Services Board (ONSC)	2015 ONSC 1268
59.	The Constitution Act, 1982, Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (UK), 1982, c 11
60.	The Constitution Act, 1867, 30 & 31 Vict, c 3,
61.	Courts of Justice Act	RSO 1990, c C.43
62.	Interpretation Act	RSC 1985, c I-21
63.	Evidence Act	RSO 1990, c E.23
64.	Certification of Recordings and Transcripts	O Reg 158/03

65.	Criminal Code	RSC 1985, c C-46
66.	Canada Evidence Act	RSC 1985, c C-5
67.	Judges Act	RSC 1985, c J-1
68.	Canadian Judicial Council Inquiries and Investigations By-laws	SOR/2015-203
69.	Public Service of Ontario Act, 2006 , SO 2006, c 35, Sch A	SO 2006, c 35, Sch A
70.	Conflict of Interest Commissioner: Powers, Duties and Functions	O Reg 384/07
71.	Dismissal Without Cause (Part III of the Act)	O Reg 380/07
72.	Ethics Executive: Additional Powers, Duties and Functions	O Reg 383/07
73.	Oaths and Affirmations	O Reg 373/07
74.	Provision of Legal Services Under Section 147 of the Act	O Reg 385/07
75.	Public Bodies and Commission Public Bodies - Definitions	O Reg 146/10
76.	Suspension Pending Investigation (Part III of the Act)	O Reg 379/07
77.	Administration of Justice Act	RSO 1990, c A.6
78.	Superior Court of Justice and Court of Appeal Fees	Reg 293/92
79.	Ontario (Attorney General) (Re)	2008 CanLII 68865 (ON IPC)
80.	Friends of the Oldman River v. Canada	[1992] 1 SCR 3
81.	RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd.	1986 CanLII 5
82.	Young v. Young	[1993] 4 SCR 3
83.	Temoin v. Martin	2012 BCCA 250
84.	Slaight Communications v. Davidson (NTD: INCLUDE TAB 84)	[1989] 1 SCR 1038
85.	The Queen v. Beauregard	1986 CanLII 24
86.	McEvoy v. AG for New Brunswick	1983 CanLII 149
87.	MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson	1995 CanLII 57

88.	Crevier v. A.G. (Québec)	1981 CanLII 30
89.	Doré v. Barreau du Québec	2012 SCC 12
90.	Trial Lawyers Assoc v. BC (AG)	2014 SCC 59
91.	Ontario (AG) v. $25,610 Currency	2017 ONCA 251
92.	Uhrik v Terrigno	2024 ABCA 383
93.	Timm v. Canada	2019 FC 238
94.	Larouche v Court of Queen's Bench (AB)	2015 ABQB 25
95.	Trisura Guarantee Insurance v Duchnij	2021 ABCA 78
96.	Chisan v Fielding	2017 ABQB 233
97.	R. v. Liⁱ	2008 CanLII 92006
98.	Long v. Red Branch Investments	2018 BCCA 115
99.	Smith v. Canada (Attorney General)	2020 FC 629
100.	Faber c. R.,	2015 QCCS 12ⁱⁱ , at para 111
101.	R. v. Q.H.T.	2004 ABQB 526
102.	Gillespie v. Manitoba (Attorney General)ⁱⁱⁱ	2000 CanLII 26952
103.	Reilly v. Wachowich	1999 ABQB 309
104.	Toronto (City) v. Ontario (AG)	2021 SCC 34
105.	Alfano et al v. Piersanti et al	2014 ONSC 60
106.	König v. Hobza	2015 ONCA 885
107.	Smith Bus Lines Ltd. v. BMO	1987 CanLII 4190
108.	Yatar v. TD Insurance Meloche Monnex	2024 SCC 8
109.	Sugar v. Peat Marwick Ltd.	1988 CanLII 4635
110.	Enbridge Gas v. Marinaccio	2012 ONCA 650
111.	Jones v. Tsige	2012 ONCA 32
112.	R. v. Davis	1999 CanLII 638
113.	R. v. Alexander	2005 CanLII 32566
114.	R. v. Barros	2016 ABQB 243
115.	Ontario Realty Corp. v. Gabriele	2000 CanLII 22697

116.	Newfoundland Telephone v. NL (Board)	1992 CanLII 84
117.	Benedict v. Ontario	2000 CanLII 16884
118.	Donovan v. Waterloo (Police Services Board)	2022 ONCA 199
119.	Serra v. Serra	2009 ONCA 105
120.	Toronto Star v. AG Ontario	2018 ONSC 2586
121.	The Queen v. Teskey	2007 SCC 25
122.	Galambos v. Perez	2009 SCC 48
123.	Laiken v. Carey	2011 ONSC 5892
124.	Soleil Hospitality Inc. v. Louie	2010 BCSC 1183
125.	Report re: The Honourable D.E. Spiro	CJC Decision
126.	Decision re: The Hon. Andrew J. Goodman	CJC 24-0799
127.	Decision re: The Hon. Charles C. Chang	CJC 23-0488
128.	Decision re: The Honourable Arthur Doyle	CJC 24-0144
129.	Decision re: The Hon. Marc St-Pierre	CJC 24-0784
130.	Ethical Principles for Judges	2023
131.	Model Definition of Judicial Information by the Canadian Judicial Council	2020
132.	Classification of Court Information	2020
133.	Retention of Court Information	2022
134.	Ruffo v. Conseil de la magistrature (SCC)	1995 CanLII 49
135.	R. v. Baldovi et al	2016 MBQB 90
136.	High-Crest Enterprises v. Canada	2017 FCA 88
137.	The Role of a Chief Justice in Canada	Peter W. Hogg
138.	Regina v. Spezzano (ONCA) as per Martin JA ^{iv} Arnup and Dublin JJA) ^{iv}	1977 CanLII 1371
139.	R. v. Zeck	1980 CanLII 2849
140.	Baxter Student Housing v. College Housing	[1976] 2 SCR 475
141.	Steiner v. Canada	1981 CanLII 4581
142.	Information Commissioner v. Canada (MEI)	1986 CanLII 6836

143.	Halton v. Rezaizadeh	2004 CanLII 6236
144.	Sunrise North Senior Living v. Sheriff	2020 ONSC 469
145.	407 ETR Concession Co. v. Ontario (RMV)	2005 CanLII 49963
146.	Quong v. Pong , 1925 CanLII 11 (ON CA)	1925 CanLII 11
147.	Pong v. Quong , 1926 CanLII 6 (SCC), [1926] SCR 651, Present: Anglin C.J.C. and Idington, Duff, Mignault, Newcombe and Rinfret JJ.	1926 CanLII 6
148.	Pong v. Quong , 1927 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1927] SCR 271	1927 CanLII 2
149.	Turigan v. Alberta	1988 ABCA 333
150.	R v Codrington	2023 ONSC 6352
151.	Evans v. Sproule	2008 CanLII 58428 (ON SC)
152.	C.S. (I) v. J.S. (Shaw v. Staples)	2013 ONSC 3290
153.	Snowball v. Ornge	2017 ONSC 4601
154.	Merrifield v. Canada (Attorney General)	2017 ONSC 1333
155.	Galea v. Wal-Mart	2017 ONSC 245
156.	R.B. v. E.S. (Litigation Guardian of)	2017 ONSC 7866
157.	AA v. BB et al	2018 ONSC 4173
158.	R. v. Barry ,	2021 BCPC 59
159.	R. v. Hampton ,	2020 ABQB 429
160.	R. v. Denny ,	2020 NSPC 14
161.	Prosecutor Handbook from the Federal Government	Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada, represented by the Attorney General of Canada, 2014-2020. Catalogue No. J79-2/2014E-PDF ISBN No. 978-1-100-23610-0 PPSC No. 2020-1

162.	Crown Prosecutor Manual	Effective date, November 14, 2017
163.	R v Awad , 2014 NSSC 44 (CanLII), per Edwards J
164.	R v Ellis , 2009 ONCA 483 (CanLII), 244 CCC (3d) 438, per Gillese JA
165.	R v Awad , 2015 NSCA 10 (CanLII), 1126 APR 116, per Beveridge JA, at para 49 (see: The swearing of information commences "criminal proceedings" against the accused. ^[4] The commencement of proceedings does not require the issuance of process. ^[5])
166.	R v McHale , 2010 ONCA 361 (CanLII), 256 CCC (3d) 26, per Watt JA, at para 85 ("Laying or receipt of an information commences criminal proceedings")
167.

End of BOA as of March 24, 2026

ⁱ Judicial Pre-Trial Notes Protected by Judicial Immunity

ⁱⁱ No new element or exceptional circumstance justifies the reopening of the investigations or trials, since the accused voluntarily closed their evidence without reserving their rights despite the legal uncertainties raised by the Supreme Court's decision in St-Onge Lamoureux (paras. 158-160)

ⁱⁱⁱ The majority found that the inherent jurisdiction of a superior court is traditionally invoked as an adjunct to an existing right and is not intended to create new substantive law

^{iv} Per Martin J.A. (Arnup and Dubin J.J.A. concurring):

Scope of s. 127(2): The Court held that s. 127(2) of the Criminal Code is not limited to judicial proceedings that are existing or proposed. The phrase "the course of justice" includes attempts to obstruct investigations that may lead to prosecution, even if no decision to prosecute has been made. The legislative history and case law support this broad interpretation.

False Statement as Obstruction: The accused's false identification to the police was intended to mislead the investigation and avoid prosecution for driving while disqualified. This conduct fell within the scope of s. 127(2) as it obstructed the "course of justice".

Tab 1

R. v. Araujo, 2000 SCC 65 (CanLII), [2000] 2 SCR 992

Source:	Supreme Court of Canada
Date:	2000-12-14
File number:	26898; 26943; 26968; 26904; 26899
Other citations:	193 DLR (4th) 440 — 262 NR 346 — 235 WAC 257 — 149 CCC (3d) 449 — 38 CR (5th) 307 — 143 BCAC 257 — 48 WCB (2d) 65 — 79 CRR (2d) 1 — [2000] CarswellBC 2440 — EYB 2000-21474 — JE 2001-74 — [2000] SCJ No 65 (QL) — [2000] ACS no 65
Citation:	R. v. Araujo, 2000 SCC 65 (CanLII), [2000] 2 SCR 992, < https://canlii.ca/t/5231 >, retrieved on 2026-03-20

R. v. Araujo, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 992

Angela Araujo, Spencer Leslie,
Neil Grandmaison, Christina Khoury, Victor Camara, Robert Jenkins, Tiffany Muriel Leslie,
Kevin Lathangue and Jolene Irons

Appellants

v.

Her Majesty The Queen

Respondent

Indexed as: R. v. Araujo

Neutral citation: 2000 SCC 65.

File Nos.: 26898, 26899, 26904, 26943, 26968.

2000: April 11, 12; 2000: December 14.

Present: McLachlin C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache, Binnie, Arbour and LeBel JJ.

on appeal from the court of appeal for british columbia

Criminal law -- Appeals -- Question of law -- Crown's appeal against acquittals -- Issues on appeal concerning application and interpretation of legal standard of investigative necessity for obtaining wiretap authorization -- Whether Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to hear Crown's appeal -- Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, s. 676\(1\)\(a\).

Criminal law -- Interception of communications -- Investigative necessity requirement -- Nature and interpretation of requirement -- Whether affidavit materials submitted to obtain wiretap authorization established investigative necessity -- Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, s. 186\(1\)\(b\).

Criminal law -- Interception of communications -- Standard of review for wiretap authorization -- Whether trial judge applied proper standard -- Approach to amplification.

Criminal law -- Interception of communications -- Affidavits -- Kind of affidavit to be submitted on application for wiretap authorization.

The accused faced multiple charges related to their cocaine-trafficking ring. Much of the Crown's evidence against them was gleaned from information captured through wiretapping. The Crown had obtained ex parte authorizations for its wiretaps from a judge by submitting a 130-page affidavit, prepared and signed by R, a member of the RCMP. The affidavit contained information from 10 confidential sources denoted “A” through “J”. Information from these sources came to R by way of other officers who were their handlers. On a voir dire at trial, R was cross-examined on the affidavit. After confused attempts at explaining inconsistencies in the affidavit, R admitted that in several places the affidavit referred erroneously to source “E”, rather than to source “F”. He later testified that the reference should have been to source “C”. R admitted that he had known about this error several weeks before the trial. He affirmed that he had forgotten about the matter, but suddenly remembered it during the cross-examination. The trial judge indicated that R’s lack of credibility “permeate[d] the issue of reasonable and probable grounds”, one of the preconditions to the authorization, and concluded that the affidavit should fall in its entirety. The Court of Appeal set aside the acquittals of the accused and ordered a new trial.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The Court of Appeal had jurisdiction under s. 676\(1\)\(a\) of the Criminal Code to hear the Crown’s appeal. The Court of Appeal examined the combined interpretation and application of the legal standard of investigative necessity. It also discussed the interpretation and application of the standard of review for a judge reviewing a wiretap authorization. The interpretation or application of a legal standard has been recognized as a question of law.

Under s. 186\(1\)\(b\) of the Code, wiretapping may be accepted as an appropriate investigative tool where “other investigative procedures are unlikely to succeed”. The correct interpretation of s. 186\(1\)\(b\)’s investigative necessity requirement must be based on the text of the provision read with a simultaneous awareness of two potentially competing considerations: enabling criminal investigations and protecting privacy rights. Wiretapping is highly intrusive and a judge should protect citizens against unwanted fishing expeditions by the state and its law enforcement agencies by granting an authorization only as far as need is demonstrated by the material submitted by the applicant. In order to meet the investigative necessity requirement, the applicant must establish in the affidavit that, practically speaking, there is no other reasonable alternative method of investigation, in the circumstances of the particular criminal inquiry. Here, the Court of Appeal applied a standard inconsistent with the words of the Criminal Code. In concluding that “in the case at bar, there is no reason to impeach the choice of investigative techniques”, the court applied an “efficiency” rather than a “necessity” standard. This approach is wrong in law and has the potential to subvert the safeguards of privacy interests that are an essential component of the regulation of wiretapping in the Code. Using the efficiency standard, wiretapping would always be available to the police and would replace a standard of necessity with one of opportunity at the discretion of law enforcement bodies. However, the application of the proper test supports the conclusion reached by the Court of Appeal that the authorizing judge could properly have issued an authorization based on the facts disclosed in the affidavit. The facts as set out in the affidavit met the investigative necessity standard. The affidavit attested to the failure of police efforts in spite of the use of physical surveillance and search warrants. It also provided evidence as to why the use of informants or undercover agents trying to infiltrate the drug ring would be ineffective and potentially dangerous. There was thus evidence in the affidavit to negate arguments for other investigative techniques and to make the case that wiretapping was, practically speaking, the only reasonable alternative, taking into account the nature and purpose of this particular investigation. The objective of a police investigation -- to bring the higher-ups in a drug ring to justice -- rightly informs the investigative necessity analysis. The police had more need for wiretapping given that they were trying to move up the chain and catch the higher-ups in the operation.

As a practical matter, in seeking permission to use wiretapping, the police should submit an affidavit that sets out the facts fully and frankly for the authorizing judge in order that he or she can make an assessment of whether these rise to the standard required in the legal test for the authorization. In addition, an affidavit should be clear and concise. It should never attempt to trick its readers. On this point, the use of boiler-plate language should be avoided. Finally, the affidavits should be gathered from those with the best firsthand knowledge of the facts. This would strengthen the material by making it more reliable.

The trial judge did not correctly apply the standard of review for a wiretap authorization. A reviewing judge does not conduct a rehearing of the application for the wiretap.

The test is whether there was reliable evidence that might reasonably be believed on the basis of which the authorization could have issued. In considering the evidence, the reviewing judge must exclude erroneous information. Amplification may correct such information where the police had the requisite reasonable and probable grounds and demonstrated investigative necessity but, in good faith, made some minor, technical error in the drafting of their affidavit material. There is no need to seek to amplify the record if sufficient reliable material remains even after excising the erroneous material. In this case, although the trial judge found R to lack credibility on the issue of why he had not disclosed a minor drafting mistake, there is no suggestion that there was ever any untruthfulness in the substance of the information in the affidavit itself. In these circumstances, a global finding against the entire affidavit was unreasonable. Even without the information from sources “C” and “E”, the affidavit would have provided ample evidence to an issuing judge and evidenced the existence of probable grounds and investigative necessity. Moreover, amplification would allow for the reading of the information from the now correctly attributed sources “C” and “E” as well. The Court of Appeal was correct in upholding the issuing judge’s authorization.

Cases Cited

Followed: R. v. Garofoli, 1990 CanLII 52 \(SCC\), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1421; R. v. Bisson, 1994 CanLII 46 \(SCC\), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 1097, aff’g 1994 CanLII 5328 \(QC CA\), [1994] R.J.Q. 308, 87 C.C.C. (3d) 440; R. v. Grant, 1993 CanLII 68 \(SCC\), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 223; approved: R. v. Hiscock, 1992 CanLII 2959 \(QC CA\), [1992] R.J.Q. 895, 72 C.C.C. (3d) 303, leave to appeal refused, [1993] 1 S.C.R. vi; R. v. Monroe (1997), 1997 CanLII 3034 \(BC CA\), 8 C.R. (5th) 324; R. v. Morris (1998), 1998 NSCA 229 \(CanLII\), 134 C.C.C. (3d) 539; disapproved: R. v. Paulson (1995), 1995 CanLII 2224 \(BC CA\), 97 C.C.C. (3d) 344; R. v. Cheung (1997), 1997 CanLII 3763 \(BC CA\), 119 C.C.C. (3d) 507; referred to: R. v. Ewanchuk, 1999 CanLII 711 \(SCC\), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 330; R. v. Biniaris, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 381, 2000 SCC 15; Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 \(SCC\), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145; R. v. Duarte, 1990 CanLII 150 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 30; R. v. Comisso, 1983 CanLII 160 \(SCC\), [1983] 2 S.C.R. 121; R. v. Thompson, 1990 CanLII 43 \(SCC\), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1111; R. v. Lachance, 1990 CanLII 53 \(SCC\), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1490; R. v.

Finlay (1985), 1985 CanLII 117 \(ON CA\), 23 C.C.C. (3d) 48; R. v. Playford (1987), 1987 CanLII 125 \(ON CA\), 40 C.C.C. (3d) 142; R. v. Smyk (1993), 1993 CanLII 3370 \(MB CA\), 86 C.C.C. (3d) 63; R. v. Barbeau (1996), 1996 CanLII 6391 \(QC CA\), 110 C.C.C. (3d) 69; R. v. Grant (1998), 1998 CanLII 17678 \(MB CA\), 130 C.C.C. (3d) 53; Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), 1998 CanLII 837 \(SCC\), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27; CanadianOxy Chemicals Ltd. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1999 CanLII 680 \(SCC\), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 743; R. v. Madsen, 1987 CanLII 8603 \(NWT SC\), [1988] N.W.T.R. 82; R. v. Todoruk (1992), 1992 CanLII 12773 \(BC SC\), 78 C.C.C. (3d) 139; R. v. McCreery, 1996 CanLII 8496 \(BC SC\), [1996] B.C.J. No. 2405 (QL); R. v. Shalala (2000), 2000 CanLII 20260 \(NB CA\), 224 N.B.R. (2d) 118; Berger v. New York, 388 U.S. 41 (1967); Katz v. U.S., 389 U.S. 347 (1967); U.S. v. London, 66 F.3d 1227 (1995); U.S. v. Torres, 901 F.2d 205 (1990); U.S. v. Commito, 918 F.2d 95 (1990); U.S. v. Guerra-Marez, 928 F.2d 665 (1991); U.S. v. Milton, 153 F.3d 891 (1998); U.S. v. Smith, 31 F.3d 1294 (1994); U.S. v. Green, 40 F.3d 1167 (1994); DalGLISH v. Jarvie (1850), 2 Mac. & G. 231, 42 E.R. 89; R. v. Kensington Income Tax Commissioners, [1917] 1 K.B. 486; Re Church of Scientology and The Queen (No. 6) (1987), 31 C.C.C. (3d) 449; United States of America v. Friedland, [1996] O.J. No. 4399 (QL); Mitton v. British Columbia Securities Commission (1999), 1999 BCCA 186 \(CanLII\), 123 B.C.A.C. 263; R. v. Allain (1998), 1998 CanLII 12250 \(NB CA\), 205 N.B.R. (2d) 201; R. v. Krist (1998), 1998 CanLII 6105 \(BC CA\), 113 B.C.A.C. 176; R. v. Plant, 1993 CanLII 70 \(SCC\), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 281; R. v. Madrid (1994), 1994 CanLII 1682 \(BC CA\), 48 B.C.A.C. 271; R. v. Harris (1987), 1987 CanLII 181 \(ON CA\), 35 C.C.C. (3d) 1, leave to appeal refused, [1987] 2 S.C.R. vii.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 8.

Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, ss. 186 [am. 1993, c. 40, s. 6], 676(1)(a) [am. c. 27 (1st Supp.), s. 139].

Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, 18 U.S.C. §§ 2510-2522 (1994 & Supp. IV 1998).

Authors Cited

Driedger, Elmer A. Construction of Statutes, 2nd ed. Toronto: Butterworths, 1983.

APPEAL from a judgment of the British Columbia Court of Appeal (1998), 1998 CanLII 6287 \(BC CA\), 109 B.C.A.C. 131, 127 C.C.C. (3d) 315, [1998] B.C.J. No. 1558 (QL), allowing the Crown's appeal from the acquittal of the accused on various charges, and ordering a new trial. Appeal dismissed.

Adrian F. Brooks, for the appellant Araujo.

David N. Lyon, for the appellant S. Leslie.

Michael Code and Jonathan Dawe, for the appellant Grandmaison.

Robert C. Claus, for the appellant Khoury.

Michael J. B. Munro, for the appellant Camara.

Sidney B. Simons, for the appellants Jenkins, T. M. Leslie and Irons.

D. Mayland McKimm, for the appellant Lathangue.

S. David Frankel, Q.C., and Peter W. Hogg, for the respondent.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

LEBEL J. –

I. Introduction

1 This appeal involves the electronic interception of private communications, popularly known as “wiretapping”. Under what circumstances can the police satisfy the investigative necessity requirement in s. 186(1) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, and obtain an authorization to intercept private communications by electronic means? On what basis can a trial judge review the decision to issue such an authorization? These questions at the heart of this appeal have given rise to controversy and varying appellate court approaches since our Court last considered them. The reasons that follow will outline what I consider to be the proper approach to these issues.

2 It should be noted that these reasons will not discuss the new s. 186(1.1) and related amendments adopted in 1997 which target criminal organizations. These amendments were not invoked or examined in the case at bar. The interpretation of the investigative necessity requirement in s. 186(1) and the issue of the standard of review on a wiretap authorization are significant enough issues, which will affect many people.

3 The answers of our Court to these questions may have a substantial impact on the privacy rights of a number of Canadians. Although we suggest dismissing the appeal on the facts before our Court and affirm the Court of Appeal’s decision to order a new trial, the language used in the Court of Appeal’s reasons could lead courts to permit undue infringements on privacy in other factual circumstances. These reasons must then discuss the nature and interpretation of the investigative necessity requirement before turning to an examination of the function of the reviewing judge at trial. These reasons will also offer some suggestions as to how the police and other participants in the justice system can avoid some of the problems of the sort that have given rise to this appeal.

II. Factual Background

4 The appellants faced multiple trafficking, possession, conspiracy, and weapons charges related to their cocaine-trafficking ring. Much of the Crown's evidence against the appellants was gleaned, directly or indirectly, from information captured through a wiretap. As is usual, the Crown had obtained ex parte authorizations for its wiretaps by submitting affidavit material to an authorizing judge. The main material in support of the application was a long affidavit of some 130 pages, prepared and signed by a member of the RCMP, Constable Rosset. This affidavit was largely based on information gathered by Rosset from the handlers of ten police informers. No affidavits were obtained from these handlers.

5 According to the affidavit material, a number of sources had identified the appellants as running a drug-trafficking operation in Victoria with possible connections to a major, violent cocaine-trafficking gang operating in Vancouver and the Lower Mainland. The appellants, who were the primary targets of the potential wiretap, allegedly trafficked cocaine in quantities up to the kilogram range. The police had conducted previous investigations and executed warrants against some of the appellants. They had also conducted a substantial surveillance operation on the appellants. There was evidence that some of the appellants were engaging at times in counter-surveillance tactics to throw investigators off their tails. There was also reason to believe that standard investigative procedures on their own would not be likely to catch the higher-ups in the drug operation. In seeking an authorization for wiretapping, the police hoped to use wiretaps in conjunction with other investigative techniques in order to pursue the higher-ups in the trafficking ring and to be able to gather evidence on not only trafficking and possession charges but also on laundering and conspiracy offences.

6 At trial, when the Crown brought forth its authorizations under Part VI of the Criminal Code for gathering wiretap evidence, counsel for the accused cross-examined Constable Rosset in the voir dire, challenging the validity of the wiretap. During cross-examination by defence counsel, it emerged then that there were some serious problems with the affidavit submitted to obtain the first authorization. It became clear that the affidavit contained a number of errors of varying importance. In a number of places, boiler-plate language used in the affidavit might have created a mistaken impression that certain statements had been confirmed in ways that they had not. However, the most important problem with the affidavit concerned references to some of the sources.

7 The affidavit contained information from ten confidential sources denoted “A” through “J”. Information from these sources came to Constable Rosset by way of other officers who were their handlers. There had been no direct contact between Rosset and the informers. In the second day of cross-examination, after repeated denials and confused attempts at explaining inconsistencies in the affidavit and in his own evidence, Constable Rosset had to admit that in several places the affidavit referred erroneously to source “E”, rather than to source “F”. Later, during the same cross-examination, Constable Rosset testified that the reference should have been to source “C”. Rosset admitted then that he had known about this error several weeks before the trial, but had not mentioned it either to his superiors or to the Crown prosecutor. In his testimony, he affirmed that he had forgotten about the matter, but suddenly remembered it during the cross-examination. The trial judge, Filmer Prov. Ct. J., did not believe him. This finding of fact on the credibility of Constable Rosset during the voir dire had a catastrophic impact on the Crown’s case and played a major role in the dismissal of the charges against the appellants.

III. Judicial History.

A. British Columbia Provincial Court

8 In his factual findings at the voir dire, the trial judge found that the mistake of Constable Rosset had been inadvertent but that his failure to reveal it earlier had cast a “pall over Officer Rosset’s credibility”. Filmer Prov. Ct. J. would then go on to extend his finding on Constable Rosset’s credibility to the entire affidavit, although he accepted that the police officer had become aware of the error only well after the submission of the affidavit. He stated, “[c]ross-examination of the deponent here has led to testimony which tends to discredit the existence of one of the preconditions to the authorization: to wit, the existence of reasonable and probable grounds”. Filmer Prov. Ct. J. considered that Constable Rosset’s credibility “permeates the issue of reasonable and probable grounds” and thus concluded that the affidavit should fall in its entirety. In his opinion, the testimony of Constable Rosset tainted the whole affidavit and rendered it unreliable.

9 Although he considered this sufficient reason to invalidate the authorization, Filmer Prov. Ct. J. also discussed two other arguments. First, he criticized the boiler-plate language in the affidavit, calling it potentially confusing but not characterizing it as so confusing as to call for rejecting the authorization if it had been the sole problem. Second, he considered that the authorization had not been necessary because the investigative necessity had not been made out, especially given the possibility that the police might have conducted specifically directed surveillance with a special investigative team of the RCMP, the Special Operations Group. Thus, he decided that the authorization should be rejected.

10 In the end, because he was of the opinion that the police had acted in bad faith and because the courts cannot condone such conduct, Filmer Prov. Ct. J. was prepared to exclude all evidence coming directly or indirectly from the wiretaps. As a result, there was no evidence against the accused, and Filmer Prov. Ct. J. acquitted the accused.

11 The Court of Appeal unanimously set aside the acquittals and ordered a new trial. In a judgment by Braidwood J.A., it rejected Filmer Prov. Ct. J.’s application of the standard of review to the wiretap authorization and of the investigative necessity test.

12 According to Braidwood J.A., the trial judge had erred in applying an inappropriate standard of review to the authorization. In his opinion, the trial judge had failed to consider the nature of the errors, their impact on the affidavit as a whole and whether there remained any further evidence left on the basis of which the authorization could have been granted. As Braidwood J.A. viewed it, the correct standard of review was “whether, on the evidence, there was any basis on which the authorization could have been granted . . .” (para. 10 (emphasis in original)). In the circumstances, the error in denoting the sources was easily remedied by reading the correct letters on review (para. 22). An inadvertent mechanical error, even in combination with a non-credible explanation of why the error was not corrected, did not take away from the existence of reasonable and probable grounds that existed at the time the police sought the authorization and that continued to exist at the time of the review (para. 23).

13 Braidwood J.A. went on to reject the trial judge’s conclusion that the affidavit had not satisfied the requirements of investigative necessity. Based on previous case law from the British Columbia Court of Appeal, Braidwood J.A. considered that “the key issue was whether or not the authorizing judge could have concluded that the most efficacious way of fully investigating all those involved was to permit the police to employ wiretapping along with other investigative techniques” (para. 30 (italics in original; underlining added)). On this standard, there was “no reason to impeach the choice of investigative techniques given the nature and background of the numerous investigations, the prior experience with a number of the accused, the counter-surveillance employed by some of the accused, and the extent of the investigations in terms of time and resources” (para. 33). He held that the trial judge had erred in applying the correct legal test, that the authorization could have been granted and that it should not have been disturbed.

14 Braidwood J.A. thus was of the view that the trial judge had erred in law by not applying the appropriate test to the facts on the voir dire and that the Court of Appeal should allow the appeal, set aside the acquittals, and order a new trial.

IV. Relevant Statutory Provisions

15 Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46

186. (1) An authorization under this section may be given if the judge to whom the application is made is satisfied

(a) that it would be in the best interests of the administration of justice to do so; and

(b) that other investigative procedures have been tried and have failed, other investigative procedures are unlikely to succeed or the urgency of the matter is such that it would be impractical to carry out the investigation of the offence using only other investigative procedures.

V. Issues

16 There are several issues on this appeal, which will be considered successively. First, there is one preliminary issue: (A) whether there was a jurisdictional bar to the Crown’s appeal to the Court of Appeal. Second, there are two main issues: (B) whether the factual circumstances revealed in the affidavit met the s. 186(1) requirement of investigative necessity; and (C) whether the trial judge applied correctly the standard of review for a wiretap authorization, including the correct approach on amplification.

VI. Analysis

A. Was There a Jurisdictional Bar to the Crown's Appeal to the Court of Appeal?

17 Before considering the central issues in this appeal, a preliminary argument must be addressed. The appellants have argued that the Crown's appeal to the British Columbia Court of Appeal did not raise a question of law and that, therefore, the Court of Appeal did not have jurisdiction under s. 676(1)(a) of the Code to hear the appeal.

18 It is clear that this argument must fail. The interpretation of a legal standard has always been recognized as a question of law: R. v. Ewanchuk, 1999 CanLII 711 (SCC), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 330, at para. 21. Moreover, our Court has recently recognized that if a question is about the application of a legal standard, that is enough to make it a question of law: R. v. Biniaris, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 381, 2000 SCC 15, at para. 23. In the case before us, the Court of Appeal examined the combined interpretation and application of the legal standard of investigative necessity. It also discussed the interpretation and application of the standard of review for a judge reviewing a wiretap authorization. There is no question that the Court of Appeal was dealing with questions of law. Thus, there was no jurisdictional bar to the Crown's appeal.

B. Did the Factual Circumstances Revealed in the Affidavit Meet the Section 186(1) Requirement of Investigative Necessity?

The first major issue in the case at bar is whether the factual circumstances revealed in the affidavit even met the s. 186(1) requirement of investigative necessity. This is a facial validity question. On the face of the affidavit material, could the contents of the affidavit support an authorization? In order to answer this question, the meaning of the investigative necessity requirement must be explored in order to determine whether the factual circumstances revealed in the affidavit met this standard.

As will appear below, this case does not raise a question of interpretation of s. 186(1) (a), which requires that the issue of an authorization be in the interest of the administration of justice. Courts have found that this requirement meant that in accordance with s. 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms there had to be reasonable and probable grounds on which to believe that an offence had been committed (Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145; R. v. Garofoli, 1990 CanLII 52 (SCC), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1421; and R. v. Duarte, 1990 CanLII 150 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 30). It is not in dispute that this first basic requirement was satisfied when the wiretap authorization was issued. On the other hand, the investigative necessity standard remains at the heart of the present appeal.

1. The Meaning of the Investigative Necessity Requirement

The meaning of the investigative necessity requirement is of critical importance by reason of the conflict between the privacy interests involved in wiretapping operations and the needs of law enforcement agencies in their difficult fight against some forms of sophisticated and dangerous criminality. Wiretapping is highly intrusive. It may affect human relations in the sphere of very close, if not intimate communications, even in the privacy of the home. La Forest J. was alert to the importance of the societal values involved in wiretapping and the risks to essential privacy interests. Writing for the Court, in Duarte, supra, at p. 44, La Forest J. emphasized the potential danger to privacy rights arising from the use of such modern investigative techniques:

The reason for this protection is the realization that if the state were free, at its sole discretion, to make permanent electronic recordings of our private communications, there would be no meaningful residuum to our right to live our lives free from surveillance. The very efficacy of electronic surveillance is such that it has the potential, if left unregulated, to annihilate any expectation that our communications will remain private. A society which exposed us, at the whim of the state, to the risk of having a permanent electronic recording made of our words every time we opened our mouths might be superbly equipped to fight crime, but would be one in which privacy no longer had any meaning. As Douglas J., dissenting in United States v. White, supra, put it, at p. 756: “Electronic surveillance is the greatest leveler of human privacy ever known”. If the state may arbitrarily record and transmit our private communications, it is no longer possible to strike an appropriate balance between the right of the individual to be left alone and the right of the state to intrude on privacy in the furtherance of its goals, notably the need to investigate and combat crime.

22 An appropriate balance must be found between the need to safeguard privacy interests and the realities and difficulties of law enforcement. The investigative necessity requirement found in s. 186(1)(b) has proved to be a critical but delicate component of the legal framework set up to regulate wiretapping in order to strike this appropriate but often elusive balance between the interests of the State and those of its citizens.

23 This Court has not issued a definitive statement on the meaning of the investigative necessity requirement in s. 186(1). The closest that it has come is in La Forest J.’s reasons in Duarte, supra. In considering a problem of surveillance conducted with the consent of one party, La Forest J. referred in passing, at p. 55, to the investigative necessity requirement for wiretapping:

. . . authorizations for electronic surveillance are only to be given on a showing that there is no real practical alternative (s. 178.13(1)); in other words, as put by the Ontario Court of Appeal in R. v. Playford (1987), 1987 CanLII 125 \(ON CA\), 40 C.C.C. (3d) 142, at p. 185: “. . . it is treated as a last resort investigative mechanism”, and can only be obtained for investigation of the most serious offences in the Code (s. 178.1);

However, this obiter comment did not distinguish between a “last resort” test and a “no real practical alternative” test.

24 Our Court has remained divided between these two descriptions of the test: see R. v. Commisso, 1983 CanLII 160 \(SCC\), [1983] 2 S.C.R. 121 (in which the dissent of Dickson J. (as he then was) used a “last resort” standard at p. 135); R. v. Thompson, 1990 CanLII 43 \(SCC\), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1111 (in which La Forest J.’s dissent referred to a “last resort” standard at p. 1160); and R. v. Lachance, 1990 CanLII 53 \(SCC\), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1490 (in which an obiter reference at p. 1502 of Sopinka J.’s judgment implied that the standard was “the only practical investigative technique available”). Thus, our Court has left open the question of the exact nature of the test of investigative necessity.

25 Over the years, other Canadian courts seem not to have been entirely sure which strand of this case law they should use. Sometimes, they have approved of words such as “last resort” to describe the degree of necessity required to meet the standard: e.g., R. v. Finlay (1985), 1985 CanLII 117 \(ON CA\), 23 C.C.C. (3d) 48 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 69; R. v. Playford (1987), 1987 CanLII 125 \(ON CA\), 40 C.C.C. (3d) 142 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 185; and R. v. Smyk (1993), 1993 CanLII 3370 \(MB CA\), 86 C.C.C. (3d) 63 (Man. C.A.), at p. 81, per Twaddle J.A. Other times, they have talked more about reasonable practical alternatives or similar practical tests: e.g., Smyk, supra, at p. 73, per Philp J.A.; R. v. Barbeau (1996), 1996 CanLII 6391 \(QC CA\), 110 C.C.C. (3d) 69 (Que. C.A.); R. v. Grant (1998), 1998 CanLII 17678 \(MB CA\), 130 C.C.C. (3d) 53 (Man. C.A.).

26 The correct interpretation of s. 186(1)’s investigative necessity requirement must be based on the text of the provision read with a simultaneous awareness of two potentially competing considerations. First, as stated by E. A. Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 87, as affirmed by our Court (Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), 1998 CanLII 837 \(SCC\), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, at para. 21), and as accepted in the analogous context of interpreting the search warrant provisions of the Criminal Code (CanadianOxy Chemicals Ltd. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1999 CanLII 680 (SCC), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 743, at para. 14), “Today there is only one principle or approach, namely, the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament.” In other words, we need to give the section a fair and liberal reading as part of our country’s criminal justice legislation. Second, however, we must not forget that the text of s. 186(1) represents a type of constitutional compromise. In particular, the investigative necessity requirement embodied in s. 186(1) is one of the safeguards that made it possible for this Court to uphold these parts of the Criminal Code on constitutional grounds (Duarte, supra, at p. 45; Garofoli, supra, at p. 1444). As a result, s. 186(1) must be read with a simultaneous awareness of the competing values of enabling criminal investigations and protecting privacy rights.

27 With a proper awareness of these values, I must turn to the text of s. 186(1)(b). This provision states that wiretapping may be appropriate as where “other investigative procedures have been tried and have failed, other investigative procedures are unlikely to succeed or the urgency of the matter is such that it would be impractical to carry out the investigation of the offence using only other investigative procedures” (emphasis added). With the use of the disjunctive “or”, the text of the section makes clear that there are three kinds of circumstances in which wiretapping may be accepted as an appropriate investigative tool (see, e.g., Smyk, supra, at pp. 70-71). The third branch of the subsection seems to refer to an emergency situation, and the first branch refers to a true “last resort” situation where other investigative methods “have been tried and have failed”. These branches not having been argued, it is the second branch, which speaks of the likelihood of success of other investigative procedures, that must be considered in the case before us.

The words of the second branch ought not to be read in a vacuum. The disjunctive nature of the three branches does not remove the need to read the subsection together as a whole (see R. v. Madsen, 1987 CanLII 8603 \(NWT SC\), [1988] N.W.T.R. 82 (S.C.), at p. 86). Indeed, the nature of the other branches properly emphasizes the gravity of wiretapping and suggests that we should not read the term “unlikely” in the second branch in a weak way. But, ultimately, it is sufficient to satisfy one branch of s. 186(1)(b). Also, the words ought properly to be read in their context in light of the values that were acknowledged at the outset and how any particular investigation meshes with these values.

In the final analysis, the potentially competing values in this area must be acknowledged. The words of the Code must be read with some common sense having regard both to the nature and purpose of the particular investigation which the police wish to undertake. A pure last resort test would turn the process of authorization into a formalistic exercise that would take no account of the difficulties of police investigations targeting sophisticated crime. But the authorizing judge must look with attention at the affidavit material, with an awareness that constitutional rights are at stake and carefully consider whether the police have met the standard. All this must be performed within a procedural framework where certain actions are authorized on an ex parte basis. Thus, the authorizing judge stands as the guardian of the law and of the constitutional principles protecting privacy interests. The judge should not view himself or herself as a mere rubber stamp, but should take a close look at the material submitted by the applicant. He or she should not be reluctant to ask questions from the applicant, to discuss or to require more information or to narrow down the authorization requested if it seems too wide or too vague. The authorizing judge should grant the authorization only as far as need is demonstrated by the material submitted by the applicant. The judge should remember that the citizens of his country must be protected against unwanted fishing expeditions by the state and its law enforcement agencies. Parliament and the courts have indeed recognized that the interception of private communications is a serious matter, to be considered only for the investigation of serious offences, in the presence of probable grounds, and with a serious testing of the need for electronic interception in the context of the particular investigation and its objects (cf. Smyk, supra, at p. 74). There must be, practically speaking, no other reasonable alternative method of investigation, in the circumstances of the particular criminal inquiry.

30 This approach is consistent with much of the Canadian jurisprudence analyzing the investigative necessity requirement: e.g., R. v. Todoruk (1992), 1992 CanLII 12773 \(BC SC\), 78 C.C.C. (3d) 139 (B.C.S.C.), at p. 145; Smyk, supra, at p. 74; R. v. McCreery, 1996 CanLII 8496 \(BC SC\), [1996] B.C.J. No. 2405 (QL) (S.C.), at paras. 47-53; Barbeau, supra, at pp. 84-85; R. v. Shalala (2000), 2000 CanLII 20260 \(NB CA\), 224 N.B.R. (2d) 118 (C.A.), at para. 87.

31 Moreover, although I am wary of applying our southern neighbour's quite different Fourth Amendment jurisprudence in the Canadian context, I note that American courts have approached their almost identical legislation governing the use of wiretapping not on the basis of an absolutist "last resort" theory but in a similarly commonsensical fashion.

32 Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, 18 U.S.C. §§ 2510-2522 (1994 & Supp. IV 1998), implements the standards for the use of electronic surveillance as required by the Fourth Amendment, according to the United States Supreme Court decisions in Berger v. New York, 388 U.S. 41 (1967), and Katz v. U.S., 389 U.S. 347 (1967). This legislation includes a necessity requirement not unlike that found in s. 186(1). A judge may issue a court order authorizing a wiretap only if he or she has determined "on the basis of the facts submitted by the applicant that . . . normal investigative procedures have been tried and have failed or reasonably appear to be unlikely to succeed if tried or to be too dangerous": 18 U.S.C. § 2518(3) (c).

Recent jurisprudence has confirmed that such language is to be interpreted in a practical commonsense fashion, so that courts may issue wiretap orders even when the government has not pursued all other investigative techniques. Courts have found a variety of grounds for allowing that normal investigative techniques are unlikely to succeed. These include: a showing by the government that those techniques would not reveal key information (U.S. v. London, 66 F.3d 1227 (1st Cir. 1995), at p. 1237); when it can be shown that those techniques are ineffective against a large-scale crime organization (U.S. v. Torres, 901 F.2d 205 (2d Cir. 1990), at p. 232; U.S. v. Commito, 918 F.2d 95 (9th Cir. 1990), at p. 98), a close-knit family (U.S. v. Guerra-Marez, 928 F.2d 665 (5th Cir. 1991), at p. 670) or a drug conspiracy (U.S. v. Milton, 153 F.3d 891 (8th Cir. 1998), at pp. 897-98); or when counter-surveillance methods employed by the defendants made such methods unlikely to succeed (U.S. v. Smith, 31 F.3d 1294 (4th Cir. 1994), at p. 1299; U.S. v. Green, 40 F.3d 1167 (11th Cir. 1994), at p. 1172).

Canadian jurisprudence has reflected this approach. Writing for the Quebec Court of Appeal in R. v. Hiscock, 1992 CanLII 2959 \(QC CA\), [1992] R.J.Q. 895, 72 C.C.C. (3d) 303, leave to appeal refused, [1993] 1 S.C.R. vi, I asserted the relevance of the actual text of s. 186(1) as follows (at p. 325 C.C.C.):

[TRANSLATION] . . . s. 186 does not require that all alternative investigative techniques have been tried. It is not simply a recourse of last resort. It is a technique which must not be used in the absence of serious, probable grounds, but which can be employed not only when the other methods have failed, but also, when they appear to have little chance of success or when the urgency of the matter would otherwise render the investigation unsuccessful. [Emphasis added.]

But, in so doing, I also recognized the importance of giving meaning to the requirements for a wiretap authorization (at p. 319 C.C.C.):

[TRANSLATION] In his role, and in order to avoid inadmissible intrusions into the private lives of citizens, the authorizing judge must ensure that the application is based on reasonable and probable cause. It must not constitute a mere fishing expedition based on pure suspicion. He must also be convinced that it is necessary to have recourse to this particular investigative technique. [Emphasis added.]

35 This approach is founded on statutory interpretation and supported by a strong strand of case law. Through this combination of text and context, it allows judges to apply in a balanced way the requirement of investigative necessity for wiretapping. In so doing, the judge must keep important values of Canadian society in sight and look seriously at whether there is, practically speaking, no other reasonable alternative method of investigation.

2. Application of the Standard to the Case at Bar

36 How, then, should this approach be applied in the context of the case at bar? There are two aspects of this application to consider. First, we must determine whether the reasoning used by the British Columbia Court of Appeal strays too far from the text of the Criminal Code and the important constitutional values that this text protects, thereby endangering privacy interests in other contexts. Second, when applying the correct test, we must consider whether the Court of Appeal nevertheless correctly concluded that the authorizing judge could properly have issued an authorization based on the facts disclosed in the affidavit.

37 The proper test, as I have set out above, concerns whether, practically speaking, there is no other reasonable means of investigation. The judgment from the British Columbia Court of Appeal does not follow this language and, indeed, seems to use a far laxer standard. The approach taken by the Court of Appeal has the potential to subvert the safeguards of privacy interests that are an essential component of the regulation of wiretapping in the Criminal Code.

38 In concluding that “in the case at bar, there is no reason to impeach the choice of investigative techniques” (para. 33 (emphasis added)), Braidwood J.A. reasoned, based on earlier British Columbia Court of Appeal precedents, that the question was whether the authorizing judge “despite the fact that other investigative techniques may have had promise . . . could have concluded that the most efficacious way of fully investigating all those involved was to permit the police to employ wiretapping along with other investigative techniques” (para. 30 (italics in original; underlining added); see also para. 32). The British Columbia Court of Appeal’s decisions have gradually moved in this direction, with prior precedents each lowering the bar another notch (see R. v. Paulson (1995), 1995 CanLII 2224 (BC CA), 97 C.C.C. (3d) 344; and R. v. Cheung (1997), 1997 CanLII 3763 (BC CA), 119 C.C.C. (3d) 507). The question essentially becomes one of whether wiretapping is a more effective, rather than necessary, means of investigation, in the context of the particular criminal investigation.

39 This approach is wrong in law. A standard of “most efficacious” strays far from the text of s. 186(1)(b) and the privacy rights that it protects. Such language does not match with the test enunciated above. Indeed, in the end, one might well argue, using such an efficiency standard, that wiretapping should always be available to the police, since it might often help catch more criminals. Such a result would rightly send a chill down the spine of every freedom-loving Canadian. We would replace a standard of necessity with one of opportunity at the discretion of law enforcement bodies. The British Columbia Court of Appeal’s test must thus be rejected as inconsistent with the very words of the Criminal Code.

Nevertheless, this disagreement with the approach of the Court of Appeal does not mean that the appeal must succeed on this point. On the contrary, we must apply the proper test to the circumstances of the case at bar in order to ascertain whether its application would support the conclusion reached by the Court of Appeal. More precisely, the question is whether the factual circumstances revealed in the affidavit could have provided a sufficient basis for the issuance of the authorization.

The facts as set out in the affidavit met this standard. Catching the ringleaders in drug rings and conspiracies is never an easy task. This is particularly so when, as here, they use counter-surveillance measures and behave in a clandestine fashion. The affidavit attested to the failure of the police efforts in spite of the use of physical surveillance and search warrants. It also provided evidence as to why the use of informants or undercover agents trying to infiltrate the drug ring would be ineffective and potentially dangerous. There was, in my view, evidence in the affidavit to negate arguments for other investigative techniques and to make the case that wiretapping was, practically speaking, the only reasonable alternative, taking into account the nature and purpose of this particular investigation.

The appellants made much of arguments that the cross-examination on the affidavit seemed to reveal the availability of another surveillance team, the Special Operations Group, that the police could have used. The availability of another surveillance team was, in reality, of little consequence in the circumstances of the case at bar. The fact is that the police had done extensive surveillance. By doing so, they obtained some information. But their surveillance efforts were occasionally met by counter-surveillance, whose presence can obviously affect the effectiveness of investigative methods, and by the clear reality that surveillance efforts alone would not bring them into contact with higher-ups in the drug organization. Indeed, I am quite uncertain how surveillance alone would ever have given good proof of laundering and conspiracy. By showing that the police were already conducting surveillance and that this was not accomplishing everything required, the affidavit materials established investigative necessity.

43 The objective of the police investigation here was to bring the higher-ups in a drug ring to justice, not simply to remove a few replaceable street dealers. Among their various arguments, the appellants challenged the right of the police to define the objectives of their investigation, alleging that the police could manipulate the objectives in order to get the chance to use a wiretap. However, it is clear that the police here had probable grounds to investigate the serious crimes that they were investigating. This part of the test for wiretapping – probable grounds for believing that serious crimes would likely occur – removes the need for concern about the kinds of suspicions that the appellants raise. If the police have probable grounds to investigate a serious crime, then they may use wiretapping to do so, provided they meet the investigative necessity requirement. There is nothing pernicious about the fact that the objective of their investigation rightly informs the investigative necessity analysis. Here, the police had more need for wiretapping given that they were trying to move up the chain and catch the higher-ups in the operation. This rightly reinforces the investigative necessity made plain by the affidavit materials.

44 The facts set out in the affidavit in the case at bar establish investigative necessity on the required standard. Any argument that an authorization could not have issued based on the facts set out in the affidavits must fail. On its face, the affidavit was sufficient to support an authorization.

45 This being said, it is clear that the affidavit was not perfect, even on its face. Prior to moving on to the subfacial review required by the last issue in the case at bar, it may be useful to discuss some practical suggestions about the form of affidavits on an application for a wiretap authorization in order to reduce needless litigation on similar matters and in better serving the interests of all parties.

Looking at matters practically in order to learn from this case for the future, what kind of affidavit should the police submit in order to seek permission to use wiretapping? The legal obligation on anyone seeking an ex parte authorization is full and frank disclosure of material facts: cf. Dalglish v. Jarvie (1850), 2 Mac. & G. 231, 42 E.R. 89; R. v. Kensington Income Tax Commissioners, [1917] 1 K.B. 486 (C.A.); Re Church of Scientology and The Queen (No. 6) (1987), 31 C.C.C. (3d) 449 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 528; United States of America v. Friedland, [1996] O.J. No. 4399 (QL) (Gen. Div.), at paras. 26-29, per Sharpe J. So long as the affidavit meets the requisite legal norm, there is no need for it to be as lengthy as À la recherche du temps perdu, as lively as the Kama Sutra, or as detailed as an automotive repair manual. All that it must do is set out the facts fully and frankly for the authorizing judge in order that he or she can make an assessment of whether these rise to the standard required in the legal test for the authorization. Ideally, an affidavit should be not only full and frank but also clear and concise. It need not include every minute detail of the police investigation over a number of months and even of years.

A corollary to the requirement of an affidavit being full and frank is that it should never attempt to trick its readers. At best, the use of boiler-plate language adds extra verbiage and seldom anything of meaning; at worst, it has the potential to trick the reader into thinking that the affidavit means something that it does not. Although the use of boiler-plate language will not automatically prevent a judge from issuing an authorization (there is, after all, no formal legal requirement to avoid it), I cannot stress enough that judges should deplore it. There is nothing wrong – and much right – with an affidavit that sets out the facts truthfully, fully, and plainly. Counsel and police officers submitting materials to obtain wiretapping authorizations should not allow themselves to be led into the temptation of misleading the authorizing judge, either by the language used or strategic omissions.

48 Finally, while there is no legal requirement for it, those gathering affidavit material should give consideration to obtaining affidavits directly from those with the best firsthand knowledge of the facts set out therein, like the police officers carrying on the criminal investigation or handling the informers. This would strengthen the material by making it more reliable. In the present case, it might have prevented this case from turning into the mess it is now, still in appeal, after years of litigation on preliminary matters, without any final judgment on the guilt or innocence of the appellants.

49 This brings me to the adverse credibility finding against the affiant in the case at bar. Practically speaking, these issues and much of the resulting litigation could have been largely avoided if the police had taken the simple step of having each of the handlers sign an affidavit on those matters within his or her particular knowledge. This would almost certainly have ensured a more careful verification of the facts sworn in the affidavit material, potentially avoiding some of the needless errors that the affidavit ended up containing, and would also have made the application for an authorization less tied to the credibility of the one officer who ultimately attested to everything in it.

C. Did the Trial Judge Apply Correctly the Standard of Review for a Wiretap Authorization, Including Amplification?

50 Given that the police did not take such steps that might have prevented these problems from ever arising, I must now focus on the arguments that challenge the affidavit from a subfacial perspective. Subfacial challenges to an affidavit go behind the form of the affidavit to attack the reliability of its content. The issue here is whether the trial judge correctly applied the standard of review for a wiretap authorization in the face of the subfacial challenge that arose through cross-examination on the affidavit.

The reviewing judge does not stand in the same place and function as the authorizing judge. He or she does not conduct a rehearing of the application for the wiretap. This is the starting place for any reviewing judge, as our Court stated in Garofoli, supra, at p. 1452:

The reviewing judge does not substitute his or her view for that of the authorizing judge. If, based on the record which was before the authorizing judge as amplified on the review, the reviewing judge concludes that the authorizing judge could have granted the authorization, then he or she should not interfere. In this process, the existence of fraud, non-disclosure, misleading evidence and new evidence are all relevant, but, rather than being a prerequisite to review, their sole impact is to determine whether there continues to be any basis for the decision of the authorizing judge. [Emphasis added.]

As I noted as a judge at the Quebec Court of Appeal in Hiscock, supra, at p. 326 C.C.C., even a basis that is schematic in nature may suffice. However, as our Court has recognized, it must be a basis founded on reliable information. In R. v. Bisson, 1994 CanLII 46 \(SCC\), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 1097, at p. 1098, the requirement was described as “sufficient reliable information to support an authorization” (emphasis added). The Court concluded that this requirement had still been met despite the excision of retracted testimony. In looking for reliable information on which the authorizing judge could have granted the authorization, the question is simply whether there was at least some evidence that might reasonably be believed on the basis of which the authorization could have issued.

In oral argument, counsel for the appellant Grandmaison made much of a passage in R. v. Grant, 1993 CanLII 68 \(SCC\), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 223, at p. 251, where Sopinka J. explained the test applicable on a review of a search warrant when some of the information supporting the warrant had been obtained in violation of the Constitution. Sopinka J. wrote that “it is necessary for reviewing courts to consider whether the warrant would have been issued had the improperly obtained facts been excised from the information sworn to obtain the warrant: Garofoli, supra” (emphasis added). In using the word “would”, Sopinka J. did not set out to alter the test that comes from Garofoli, given that he cited this judgment in the same sentence. I take the word in this context not as setting a different standard of review but simply as suggesting the sincerity of the inquiry that a reviewing judge should undertake. As this Court confirmed in Bisson, supra, the reviewing judge must carefully consider the existence of sufficient reliable information, that is, information that may reasonably be believed on the basis of which the authorization could have issued.

53 Other appellate court jurisprudence confirms this understanding. In the context of reviewing a search warrant, appellate courts have looked to whether the authorization could have issued: e.g., Mitton v. British Columbia Securities Commission (1999), 1999 BCCA 186 (CanLII), 123 B.C.A.C. 263; R. v. Allain (1998), 1998 CanLII 12250 (NB CA), 205 N.B.R. (2d) 201 (C.A.), at p. 217; and R. v. Krist (1998), 1998 CanLII 6105 (BC CA), 113 B.C.A.C. 176, at p. 179. But they look at this in context. For example, in R. v. Monroe (1997), 1997 CanLII 3034 (BC CA), 8 C.R. (5th) 324 (B.C.C.A.), at p. 333, Esson J.A. stated that, after looking for whether there was sufficient grounds on which the judge could have authorized a warrant, “The judge was then required to assess the evidence placed before the justice, in the light of the evidence brought out at trial, in order to determine whether, after expunging any misleading or erroneous information, sufficient reliable information remained to support the warrant” (emphasis added).

54 The authorities stress the importance of a contextual analysis. The Nova Scotia Court of Appeal, while reviewing the cases from our Court cited above, explains this in a judgment dealing with problems arising out of errors committed in good faith by the police in the material submitted to the authorizing justice of the peace:

These cases stress that errors, even fraudulent errors, do not automatically invalidate the warrant.

This does not mean that errors, particularly deliberate ones, are irrelevant in the review process. While not leading to automatic vitiation of the warrant, there remains the need to protect the prior authorization process. The cases just referred to do not foreclose a reviewing judge, in appropriate circumstances, from concluding on the totality of the circumstances that the conduct of the police in seeking prior authorization was so subversive of that process that the resulting warrant must be set aside to protect the process and the preventive function it serves. [Emphasis added.]

(R. v. Morris (1998), 1998 NSCA 229 (CanLII), 134 C.C.C. (3d) 539, at p. 553)

An approach based on looking for sufficient reliable information in the totality of the circumstances appropriately balances the need for judicial finality and the need to protect prior authorization systems. Again, the test is whether there was reliable evidence that might reasonably be believed on the basis of which the authorization could have issued, not whether in the opinion of the reviewing judge, the application should have been granted at all by the authorizing judge.

55 Of course, this statement of the test does not fully explain the matter of which evidence the reviewing judge should consider in a situation where some of the original information was erroneous and there is an attempt to amplify it on review, a possibility which Sopinka J. in Garofoli, supra, at p. 1452, but briefly mentioned. The Nova Scotia Court of Appeal in Morris, supra, at pp. 555-69, undertakes a careful examination of these questions based on our Court's analyses in R. v. Plant, 1993 CanLII 70 (SCC), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 281, and Bisson, supra.

56 In Plant, supra, our Court considered a situation where the information on a search warrant application compressed two parts of the police investigation by stating that an informant had supplied the police with a particular address when the informant actually supplied a precise description of the house that enabled the police to identify its address. The address itself would be excised from the information on review, but Sopinka J., at pp. 298-99, allowed for the amplification of the information obtained from the informant and concluded that, given that there was no deliberate attempt to mislead, the information concerning the description of the house and the fact that the police had found such a house at the address in question could still contribute to the existence of reasonable and probable grounds. As Morris, supra, at p. 556 notes, only erroneous information “needs to be excluded from consideration and that material, provided it is not part of a deliberate attempt to mislead the Justice of the Peace, may be amplified by evidence on review showing the true facts”.

57 In Bisson, supra, at p. 1098, our Court gave very short reasons but also affirmed the reasons of Proulx J.A. in the Quebec Court of Appeal, 1994 CanLII 5328 \(QC CA\), [1994] R.J.Q. 308, 87 C.C.C. (3d) 440. In his judgment, Proulx J.A. was clear that a court must look at non-disclosure of any material fact [TRANSLATION] “with respect to the affidavit considered as a whole, or even with respect to the remaining parts of it” (p. 455 C.C.C.). He quoted at p. 457 C.C.C. from the Ontario Court of Appeal in Church of Scientology, supra, at pp. 528-29: “[T]he function of the reviewing judge is to determine whether there is any evidence remaining, after disregarding the allegations found to be false and taking into consideration the facts found to have been omitted by the informant, upon which the justice could be satisfied that a search warrant should issue” (emphasis added) also affirmed in Morris, supra, at p. 558. Again, erroneous information is properly excised. In Bisson, supra, of course, the recanted information obviously had to be excised entirely and the remaining information then assessed in the totality of the circumstances. Where the erroneous information results from a simple error and not from a deliberate attempt to mislead the authorizing judge, amplification may be in order. Nonetheless, there would be no need to seek to amplify the record if sufficient reliable material remains even after excising the erroneous material.

58 Thus, in looking for evidence that might reasonably be believed on the basis of which the authorization could have issued, the reviewing court must exclude erroneous information. However, if it was erroneous despite good faith on the part of the police, then amplification may correct this information.

When using amplification, courts must strike a balance between two fundamental principles of search and seizure law that come into a rather unique tension in these kinds of situations: see Morris, supra, at pp. 567-68. As a result of this tension, the cases disclose divergent attitudes to incomplete or incorrect affidavits and amplification thereof: see Morris, at pp. 560-67; cf. R. v. Madrid (1994), 1994 CanLII 1682 \(BC CA\), 48 B.C.A.C. 271, at pp. 285-90, and R. v. Harris (1987), 1987 CanLII 181 \(ON CA\), 35 C.C.C. (3d) 1 (Ont. C.A.), at pp. 23 and 27 (leave to appeal refused, [1987] 2 S.C.R. vii). The danger inherent in amplification is that it might become a means of circumventing a prior authorization requirement. Since a prior authorization is fundamental to the protection of everyone's privacy interests (Hunter v. Southam Inc., supra, at p. 160), amplification cannot go so far as to remove the requirement that the police make their case to the issuing judge, thereby turning the authorizing procedure into a sham. On the other hand, to refuse amplification entirely would put form above substance in situations where the police had the requisite reasonable and probable grounds and had demonstrated investigative necessity but had, in good faith, made some minor, technical error in the drafting of their affidavit material. Courts must recognize (along with investigative necessity) the two principles of prior authorization and probable grounds, the verification of which may require a close examination of the information available to the police at the time of the application for a wiretap, in considering the jurisprudence on amplification. The approach set out earlier to erroneous information in an affidavit on a wiretap application attempts to reconcile these principles. Courts should take a similar approach to amplification.

In this case, any credibility issue related to the police officer was temporally and logically far removed from the affidavit itself. More than a year after the swearing of the affidavit, Constable Rosset was found to lack credibility on the issue of why he had not disclosed a drafting mistake, perhaps a very minor typographical error. There is no suggestion that there was ever any untruthfulness in the substance of the information in the affidavit itself: see the Court of Appeal judgment at para. 23. In these circumstances, a global finding against the entire affidavit was unreasonable. That there were some errors of a typographical nature in a 130-page affidavit is not even entirely surprising. The trial judge accepted that these errors were inadvertent. Although it is regrettable that the police did not adopt procedures as outlined above that might have lessened the possibility of these kinds of errors, that they did not do so does not provide grounds for jettisoning all the results of a careful and lengthy investigation.

61 Even without the information from sources “C” and “E”, the affidavit would have provided ample evidence to an issuing judge and evidenced the existence of probable grounds and investigative necessity. Moreover, amplification would allow for the reading of the information from the now correctly attributed sources “C” and “E” as well, which could make only slight differences on the weight given to small pieces of the evidence. There was still ample evidence in the rest of the affidavit to suggest that the appellants were trafficking substantial quantities of cocaine. Thus, given that the affidavit met the requisite investigative necessity requirement, as it was established above, there was no basis on which to overturn the authorization. The Court of Appeal was correct in upholding the issuing judge’s authorization.

VII. Conclusion

62 For these reasons, which differ in part from those of the British Columbia Court of Appeal, I would dismiss the appeal. In the result, the judgment of the Court of Appeal setting aside the acquittals and ordering a new trial would thus be upheld.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant Araujo: Adrian F. Brooks, Victoria.

Solicitor for the appellant S. Leslie: David N. Lyon, Victoria.

Solicitors for the appellant Grandmaison: Sack Goldblatt Mitchell, Toronto.

Solicitors for the appellant Khoury: Green & Claus, Victoria.

Solicitor for the appellant Camara: Michael J. B. Munro, Victoria.

Solicitors for the appellants Jenkins, T. M. Leslie and Irons: Simons McKenzie Law Corp., Victoria.

Solicitors for the appellant Lathangue: Mayland McKimm & Associates, Victoria.

Solicitor for the respondent: The Attorney General of Canada, Vancouver.

Tab 2

R. v. Anderson, 2014 SCC 41 (CanLII), [2014] 2 SCR 167

Source: Supreme Court of Canada
Date: 2014-06-06
File number: 35246
Other citations: 350 Nfld & PEIR 289 — 373 DLR (4th) 577 — 458 NR 1 —
1088 APR 289 — [2014] EXP 1824 — 11 CR (7th) 1 —
311 CCC (3d) 1 — 114 WCB (2d) 278 —
[2014] 3 CNLR 267 — 310 CRR (2d) 197 —
[2014] CarswellNfld 166 — EYB 2014-238146 —
JE 2014-1034 — [2014] SCJ No 41 (QL) — 60 MVR (6th) 1
Citation: R. v. Anderson, 2014 SCC 41 (CanLII), [2014] 2 SCR 167, <<https://canlii.ca/t/g784t>>, retrieved on 2026-03-20

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

CITATION: R. v. Anderson, 2014 SCC 41, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 167

DATE: 20140606

DOCKET: 35246

BETWEEN:

Her Majesty The Queen

Appellant
and

Frederick Anderson

Respondent
and

Director of Public Prosecutions of Canada,
Attorney General of Ontario,
Attorney General of New Brunswick,
Attorney General of British Columbia,
David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights and Aboriginal Legal Services of Toronto Inc.
Intervenors

CORAM: McLachlin C.J. and LeBel, Abella, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis and Wagner JJ.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT: Moldaver J. (McLachlin C.J. and LeBel, Abella, Cromwell, (paras. 1 to 65) Karakatsanis and Wagner JJ. concurring)

R. v. ANDERSON, 2014 SCC 41, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 167

Her Majesty The Queen

Appellant

v.

Frederick Anderson

Respondent

and

Director of Public Prosecutions of Canada,
Attorney General of Ontario,
Attorney General of New Brunswick,
Attorney General of British Columbia,
David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights and Aboriginal Legal Services of Toronto Inc.

Interveners

Indexed as: R. v. Anderson

2014 SCC 41

File No.: 35246.

2014: March 19; 2014: June 6.

Present: McLachlin C.J. and LeBel, Abella, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis and Wagner JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR NEWFOUNDLAND AND LABRADOR

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Right to life, liberty and security of the person — Criminal law — Sentencing — Aboriginal offenders — Mandatory minimum sentence — Accused convicted of impaired driving for fifth time — Crown prosecutor seeking mandatory minimum sentence — Whether s. 7 of the Charter requires the Crown to consider Aboriginal status of accused when seeking minimum sentence for impaired driving — Whether consideration of Aboriginal status is a principle of fundamental justice — Whether decision to seek mandatory minimum sentence is a matter of core prosecutorial discretion — Standard of review for Crown decision making — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 7 — Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, ss. 253(1)(b), 255(1)(a)(iii), 727(1).

The accused was convicted of impaired driving. The offence of impaired driving carries with it a minimum sentence of 30 days' imprisonment for a second offence and 120 days' imprisonment for a subsequent offence. These mandatory minimum sentences apply only if the Crown notifies the accused of its intention to seek a greater punishment prior to any plea. Crown counsel served a Notice of intent to seek greater punishment by reason of the accused's four previous impaired driving convictions. The trial judge held that Crown counsel breached s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms by tendering the Notice without considering the accused's Aboriginal status. The accused was sentenced to a 90-day intermittent sentence. The Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal from sentence.

Held: The appeal should be allowed and a term of imprisonment of 120 days should be substituted, with service of the remainder of the sentence stayed in accordance with the concession of the Crown.

This appeal raises two issues: (1) whether s. 7 of the Charter requires the Crown to consider an accused's Aboriginal status when making decisions that limit the sentencing options available to a judge — here, the decision to seek a mandatory minimum sentence for impaired driving; and (2) whether the decision to tender the Notice is a matter of “core” prosecutorial discretion, and if so, the standard by which it may be reviewed.

No constitutional obligation

Crown prosecutors are not constitutionally required to consider the Aboriginal status of an accused when deciding whether or not to seek a mandatory minimum sentence for impaired driving for two reasons.

First, while it is a principle of fundamental justice that a sentence be proportionate to the gravity of the offence and the degree of responsibility of the offender, the duty to impose a proportionate sentence rests upon judges, not Crown prosecutors. The proportionality principle requires judges to consider systemic and background factors, including Aboriginal status, which may bear on the culpability of the offender. There is no basis in law to support equating the distinct roles of the judge and the prosecutor in the sentencing process.

Second, the principle of fundamental justice that the accused asks this Court to recognize does not meet the test which governs principles of fundamental justice. A principle of fundamental justice must be a legal principle, enjoy consensus that the rule or principle is fundamental to the way in which the legal system ought fairly to operate, and be identified with sufficient precision to yield a manageable standard against which to measure deprivations of life, liberty or security of the person. The principle advanced by the accused does not meet the second requirement as it is contrary to a long-standing and deeply-rooted approach to the division of responsibility between the Crown prosecutor and the courts. It would greatly expand the scope of judicial review of discretionary decisions made by prosecutors and put at risk the adversarial nature of our criminal justice system by inviting judicial oversight of the numerous decisions that Crown prosecutors make on a daily basis.

Prosecutorial discretion

Decisions by Crown prosecutors are either exercises of prosecutorial discretion or tactics and conduct before the court. Subsequent to this Court's decision in Krieger v. Law Society of Alberta, 2002 SCC 65, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 372, confusion has arisen as to what is meant by "prosecutorial discretion" and the law has become cloudy. In particular, the use of the word "core" in Krieger has led to a narrow definition of prosecutorial discretion. The present appeal provides an opportunity for clarification.

"Prosecutorial discretion" is an expansive term. It covers all decisions regarding the nature and extent of the prosecution and the Attorney General's participation in it. Prosecutorial discretion is entitled to considerable deference. It must not be subjected to routine second-guessing by the courts. Judicial non-interference is a matter of principle based on the doctrine of separation of powers. In contrast, tactics and conduct before the court are governed by the inherent jurisdiction of the court to control its own processes. Deference is not owed to counsel who behave inappropriately in the courtroom, but a high degree of deference is accorded to the tactical decisions of counsel. Abuse of process is not a precondition for judicial intervention in relation to a party's tactics and conduct before the court.

Prosecutorial discretion is reviewable for abuse of process. The abuse of process doctrine is available where there is evidence that the Crown's conduct is egregious and seriously compromises trial fairness or the integrity of the justice system. The burden of proof lies on the accused to establish, on a balance of probabilities, a proper evidentiary foundation to proceed with an abuse of process claim, before requiring the Crown to provide reasons justifying its decision.

Tendering the Notice was a matter of prosecutorial discretion. In the complete absence of any evidence to support it, the accused's abuse of process argument must fail.

Cases Cited

Applied: R. v. D.B., 2008 SCC 25, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 3; explained: Krieger v. Law Society of Alberta, 2002 SCC 65, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 372; R. v. Gill, 2012 ONCA 607, 112 O.R. (3d)

423; distinguished: R. v. Gladue, 1999 CanLII 679 (SCC), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 688; R. v. Ipeelee, 2012 SCC 13, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 433; United States of America v. Leonard, 2012 ONCA 622, 112 O.R. (3d) 496, leave to appeal refused, [2013] 1 S.C.R. v; referred to: Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law v. Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 4, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 76; R. v. Beare, 1988 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 387; R. v. Power, 1994 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 601; R. v. T. (V.), 1992 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 749; R. v. Cook, 1997 CanLII 392 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 1113; Miazga v. Kvello Estate, 2009 SCC 51, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 339; Sriskandarajah v. United States of America, 2012 SCC 70, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 609; R. v. Nixon, 2011 SCC 34, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 566; R. v. O'Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411; R. v. Jolivet, 2000 SCC 29, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 751; Application under s. 83.28 of the Criminal Code (Re), 2004 SCC 42, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 248; R. v. Beaudry, 2007 SCC 5, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 190; R. v. Cunningham, 2010 SCC 10, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 331; Ontario v. Criminal Lawyers' Association of Ontario, 2013 SCC 43, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 3; R. v. S.G.T., 2010 SCC 20, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 688; R. v. Auclair, 2014 SCC 6, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 83.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 1, 7, 15(1).

Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19, ss. 5, 6.

Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, ss. 92, 94, 95, 151, 152, 253(1), 255, 267(b), 271, 344, 718.1, 718.2, 727(1).

Extradition Act, S.C. 1999, c. 18, s. 44(1)(a).

Authors Cited

Code, Michael. "Judicial Review of Prosecutorial Decisions: A Short History of Costs and Benefits, in Response to Justice Rosenberg" (2009), 34 Queen's L.J. 863.

Frater, Robert J. Prosecutorial Misconduct. Aurora, Ont.: Canada Law Book, 2009.

Vanek, David. "Prosecutorial Discretion" (1988), 30 Crim. L.Q. 219.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Newfoundland and Labrador Court of Appeal (Green C.J.N.L. and Welsh and Rowe JJ.A.), 2013 NLCA 2, 331 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 308, 1027 A.P.R. 308, 41 M.V.R. (6th) 194, 275 C.R.R. (2d) 127, 295 C.C.C. (3d) 262, [2013] 4 C.N.L.R. 209, [2013] N.J. No. 13 (QL), 2013 CarswellNfld 11, affirming a sentencing decision of English Prov. Ct. J., 2011 NLPC 1709A00569. Appeal allowed.

Iain R. W. Hollett, for the appellant.

Derek Hogan and Darlene Neville, for the respondent.

David Schermbrucker and Carole Sheppard, for the intervener the Director of Public Prosecutions of Canada.

Philip Perlmutter and Lorna Bolton, for the intervener the Attorney General of Ontario.

Kathryn A. Gregory and Cameron Gunn, Q.C., for the intervener the Attorney General of New Brunswick.

Joyce DeWitt-Van Oosten, Q.C., for the intervener the Attorney General of British Columbia.

Kent Roach and Cheryl Milne, for the intervener the David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights.

Jonathan Rudin and Emily Hill, for the intervener the Aboriginal Legal Services of Toronto Inc.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

I. Introduction

[1] This appeal raises the following question: Are Crown prosecutors constitutionally required to consider the Aboriginal status of an accused when deciding whether or not to seek a mandatory minimum sentence for impaired driving? The answer, in my view, must be no. There is no principle of fundamental justice that supports the existence of such a constitutional obligation. Absent such an obligation, the prosecutor’s decision is a matter of prosecutorial discretion which is reviewable by the courts only for abuse of process.

[2] The present appeal involves a scheme of escalating, mandatory minimum sentences for impaired driving convictions. These mandatory minimums are set out in s. 255 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46 (“Code”). Section 727\(1\) of the Code states that the mandatory minimums set out in s. 255 are applicable only if the Crown, in advance of any plea, notifies the accused of its intention to seek a greater punishment by reason of previous convictions (the “Notice”) and tenders proof at the sentencing hearing that the Notice was served. It is the Crown’s discretionary decision to tender the Notice at the sentencing hearing that is the subject of the current debate.

[3] The respondent, Mr. Anderson, submits that the Crown is constitutionally obligated under s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to consider the accused’s Aboriginal status in deciding whether or not to tender the Notice. According to Mr. Anderson, for sentencing purposes, consideration of Aboriginal status is a principle of fundamental justice. It follows that the Crown must consider it when making decisions that limit the sentencing options available to a judge.

[4] The Crown denies the existence of any such obligation. The Crown submits that the decision to tender the Notice is a matter of prosecutorial discretion. As such, it can only be reviewed for abuse of process. The Crown further submits that if mandatory minimum sentences within a statutory scheme prevent a judge from imposing a fit and just sentence that accords with the fundamental principle of proportionality, it is the scheme that should be challenged, not the exercise of prosecutorial discretion that has triggered it.

[5] For the reasons that follow, I conclude that Crown prosecutors are under no constitutional duty to consider the accused's Aboriginal status when tendering the Notice. As a matter of prosecutorial discretion, the decision is only reviewable for abuse of process.

II. Background

[6] Mr. Anderson was charged with the offence of driving with more than 80 milligrams of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood contrary to s. 253(1)(b) of the Code. Before pleading guilty, he was served with a Notice. He later learned that the Crown intended to prove the Notice at the sentencing hearing. As this was Mr. Anderson's fifth impaired driving-related conviction, tendering the Notice meant that he would be subject to a mandatory minimum sentence of not less than 120 days' imprisonment under s. 255(1)(a)(iii) of the Code.

A. Provincial Court of Newfoundland and Labrador, 2011 NLPC 1709A00569

[7] Prior to the sentencing hearing, Mr. Anderson filed a Charter application in which he argued that ss. 255(1) and 727(1) of the Code violate s. 7 of the Charter because "the combined effect of the [provisions] is to transfer what is a judicial function to the prosecutor, namely, the setting of the floor or minimum sentence in a given case" (motion judgment, at para. 21). He also argued that the statutory scheme violated s. 15(1) of the Charter because it deprived an Aboriginal person of the opportunity to argue for a non-custodial sentence in an appropriate case.

[8] The trial judge, English Prov. Ct. J., accepted Mr. Anderson's Charter arguments and concluded that the infringements of ss. 7 and 15(1) were not saved by s. 1 of the Charter. In order to ensure compliance with s. 7 of the Charter, he held that the Crown must in all cases, including those involving non-Aboriginal offenders, provide justification for relying on the Notice. As for the violation of s. 15(1), he declared the statutory scheme to be of no force and effect as it applied to Aboriginal offenders. Having determined that he was not bound by the minimums set out in s. 255(1), the trial judge sentenced Mr. Anderson to a 90-day intermittent sentence followed by two years' probation. A five-year driving prohibition was also imposed.

B. Newfoundland and Labrador Court of Appeal, 2013 NLCA 2, 331 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 308

[9] The Newfoundland and Labrador Court of Appeal rejected the Crown's appeal. All members of the court held that where the Crown tenders the Notice at the sentencing hearing without considering the accused's Aboriginal status, this renders the sentencing hearing fundamentally unfair, leading to a s. 7 Charter breach. According to the court, there would be no breach of s. 7 if the Crown's policy statement^[1] regarding the decision to tender the Notice included a specific direction to consider the offender's Aboriginal status. The absence of such a direction, and the lack of explanation on the part of the Crown for its decision to tender the Notice in this case, led the court to conclude that s. 7 of the Charter had been breached.

[10] The court split on how the Crown's decision to tender the Notice should be characterized. Welsh J.A. considered it to be a matter of "core" prosecutorial discretion; Green C.J.N.L. and Rowe J.A. maintained that it was "outside a core prosecutorial function": para. 49 (emphasis deleted). In the end, this difference of opinion did not affect the result and the Crown's appeal was dismissed.

III. Relevant Statutory Provisions

[11] Section 253(1) of the Code sets out the offence of impaired driving:

253. (1) [Operation while impaired] Every one commits an offence who operates a motor vehicle or vessel or operates or assists in the operation of an aircraft or of railway equipment or has the care or control of a motor vehicle, vessel, aircraft or railway equipment, whether it is in motion or not,

(a) while the person's ability to operate the vehicle, vessel, aircraft or railway equipment is impaired by alcohol or a drug; or

(b) having consumed alcohol in such a quantity that the concentration in the person's blood exceeds eighty milligrams of alcohol in one hundred millilitres of blood.

[12] Section 255 of the Code sets out the escalating mandatory minimum penalties for impaired driving. For the purposes of this appeal, the relevant portion of s. 255 is the following:

255. (1) [Punishment] Every one who commits an offence under section 253 or 254 is guilty of an indictable offence or an offence punishable on summary conviction and is liable,

(a) whether the offence is prosecuted by indictment or punishable on summary conviction, to the following minimum punishment, namely,

(i) for a first offence, to a fine of not less than $1,000,

(ii) for a second offence, to imprisonment for not less than 30 days, and

(iii) for each subsequent offence, to imprisonment for not less than 120 days;

[13] Section 727(1) of the Code sets out the requirement to give notice to the accused of the Crown's intention to seek the mandatory minimum punishment:

727. (1) [Previous conviction] Subject to subsections (3) and (4), where an offender is convicted of an offence for which a greater punishment may be imposed by reason of previous convictions, no greater punishment shall be imposed on the offender by reason thereof unless the prosecutor satisfies the court that the offender, before making a plea, was notified that a greater punishment would be sought by reason thereof.

[14] Section 718.2(e) of the Code states:

718.2 [Other sentencing principles] A court that imposes a sentence shall also take into consideration the following principles:

...

(e) all available sanctions other than imprisonment that are reasonable in the circumstances should be considered for all offenders, with particular attention to the circumstances of aboriginal offenders.

[15] Lastly, s. 7 of the Charter states:

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

IV. Issues

[16] This appeal raises two issues: (1) whether s. 7 of the Charter requires the Crown to consider an accused's Aboriginal status when making decisions that limit the sentencing options available to a judge — here, the decision to seek a mandatory minimum sentence for impaired driving; and (2) whether the decision to tender the Notice is a matter of “core” prosecutorial discretion, and if so, the standard by which it may be reviewed.

[17] Before analyzing these two issues, a brief explanation of how they are connected is warranted. The respondent argues that all state actors (including Crown prosecutors) must consider Aboriginal status where a decision affects the liberty interest of an Aboriginal person. He maintains that this is a principle of fundamental justice. If this argument is accepted, it matters not whether the decision is one of prosecutorial discretion. The principle of fundamental justice — perhaps more aptly described as a constitutional duty — would apply regardless. As will be discussed in greater detail, prosecutorial discretion provides no answer to the breach of a constitutional duty. If, on the other hand, the respondent's argument is rejected, the distinction between prosecutorial discretion and tactics and conduct before the Court becomes important, as the categorization affects the standard of review to be applied to the decision.

V. Analysis

A. Does Section 7 of the Charter Require the Crown to Consider an Accused's Aboriginal Status When Making Decisions That Limit the Sentencing Options Available to a Judge?

[18] Mr. Anderson submits that consideration of Aboriginal status in sentencing is a principle of fundamental justice that applies to all state actors, including Crown prosecutors. It follows that Crown prosecutors are constitutionally required to consider an accused's Aboriginal status when making a discretionary decision that limits the sentencing options available to a judge, including the decision to tender the Notice. In support of this argument, Mr. Anderson relies on s. 718.2(e) of the Code, as well as this Court's decisions in R. v. Gladue, 1999 CanLII 679 (SCC), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 688, and R. v. Ipeelee, 2012 SCC 13, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 433.

[19] The Crown submits that Mr. Anderson's argument stretches s. 718.2(e) of the Code beyond its intended purpose. According to the Crown, a statutory direction to sentencing judges cannot be transformed into a constitutional obligation on the Crown to take Aboriginal status into account when making a discretionary decision that limits a judge's sentencing options.

[20] In my view, there are two reasons why Mr. Anderson's argument must fail. First, it conflates the role of the prosecutor and the sentencing judge by imposing on prosecutors a duty that applies only to judges — the duty to impose a proportionate sentence. Second, the principle of fundamental justice that Mr. Anderson seeks does not meet the test that governs such principles, set out in R. v. D.B., 2008 SCC 25, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 3.

(1) Imposing a Proportionate Sentence Is the Judge's Responsibility

[21] As LeBel J., for the majority of this Court, stated in Ipeelee, “[p]roportionality is the sine qua non of a just sanction” and a principle of fundamental justice: paras. 36-37. Proportionality means that the sentence must be “proportionate to both the gravity of the offence and the degree of responsibility of the offender” (Ipeelee, at para. 39 (emphasis deleted); see also s. 718.1 of the Code). “[S]ystemic and background factors [which include Aboriginal status] may bear on the culpability of the offender, [that is, the degree of responsibility of the offender,] to the extent that they shed light on his or her level of moral blameworthiness”: Ipeelee, at para. 73.

[22] The fundamental principle of proportionality has been codified. Section 718.1 of the Code states that “[a] sentence must be proportionate to the gravity of the offence and the degree of responsibility of the offender.” Section 718.2 of the Code lists numerous factors that sentencing judges must consider when crafting a fair and just sentence that accords with the fundamental principle of proportionality. Aboriginal status is one of these factors and is found in s. 718.2(e).

[23] In Gladue, this Court discussed s. 718.2(e) of the Code at length, noting that it was enacted to ameliorate the serious problem of overrepresentation of Aboriginal people in Canadian prisons and to encourage a restorative approach to sentencing: para. 93. The Court explained that “sentencing judges should pay particular attention to the circumstances of aboriginal offenders because those circumstances are unique, and different from those of non-aboriginal offenders” (Gladue, at para. 37 (emphasis deleted)). The Court held that, pursuant to s. 718.2(e), a judge must consider: “(A) The unique systemic or background factors which may have played a part in bringing the particular aboriginal offender before the courts; and (B) [t]he types of sentencing procedures and sanctions which may be appropriate in the circumstances for the offender because of his or her particular aboriginal heritage or connection”: Gladue, at para. 66.

[24] Section 718.2(e) was also central to the discussion in Ipeelee. In that case, the Court noted that the Gladue principles bear on the ultimate question of what is a fit and proper sentence and assist the judge in crafting a sentence that accords with the fundamental principle of proportionality. The failure of a sentencing judge to consider the unique circumstances of Aboriginal offenders thus breaches both the judge’s statutory obligations, under ss. 718.1 and 718.2 of the Code, and the principle of fundamental justice that sentences be proportionate: Ipeelee, at para. 87.

[25] Importantly, both Gladue and Ipeelee speak to the sentencing obligations of judges to craft a proportionate sentence for Aboriginal offenders. They make no mention of prosecutorial discretion and do not support Mr. Anderson’s argument that prosecutors must consider Aboriginal status when making a decision that limits the sentencing options available to a judge. Mr. Anderson’s argument in effect equates the duty of the judge and the prosecutor, but there is no basis in law to support equating their distinct roles in the sentencing process. It is the judge’s responsibility to impose sentence; likewise, it is the judge’s responsibility, within the applicable legal parameters, to craft a proportionate sentence. If a mandatory minimum regime requires a judge to impose a disproportionate sentence, the regime should be challenged.

[26] In so concluding, I have not ignored United States of America v. Leonard, 2012 ONCA 622, 112 O.R. (3d) 496, leave to appeal refused, [2013] 1 S.C.R. v, a case upon which Mr. Anderson relies. In Leonard, the United States sought the extradition of two Aboriginal Canadians. Sharpe J.A. held that in deciding whether or not to surrender the accused, the Minister of Justice was required to consider their Aboriginal status, noting that the Gladue factors are not limited to criminal sentencing but . . . should be considered by all “decision-makers who have the power to influence the treatment of aboriginal offenders in the justice system” (Gladue, at para. 65) whenever an Aboriginal person’s liberty is at stake in criminal and related proceedings. That category includes extradition. [para. 85]

[27] Mr. Anderson submits that, like the Minister of Justice in Leonard, Crown prosecutors should be required to consider Aboriginal status as they are “decision-makers” who “have the power to influence the treatment of aboriginal offenders in the justice system” (Gladue, at para. 65). With respect, I cannot agree. The excerpt from Leonard upon which Mr. Anderson relies should not be taken out of context. Pursuant to s. 44(1)(a) of the Extradition Act, S.C. 1999, c. 18, the Minister of Justice must refuse to surrender an individual if “the surrender would be unjust or oppressive having regard to all the relevant circumstances”. As Sharpe J.A. notes, determining whether the surrender would be unjust or oppressive requires the Minister of Justice to compare the likely sentence that would be imposed in a foreign state with the likely sentence that would be imposed in Canada — a task which is impossible to do without reference to the Gladue principles. As Sharpe J.A. explained, the proper exercise of the Minister’s discretion in this context requires an assessment of the likely result if the case were prosecuted domestically and a comparison of that result to the likely outcome in the foreign state if the individual sought were surrender[ed]. In the case of an Aboriginal offender, I fail to see how that assessment and comparison could be accomplished without reference to the Gladue principles. [para. 87]

[28] It follows, in my view, that Leonard does not support the much broader application of Gladue that Mr. Anderson seeks.

(2) The R. v. D.B. Test Is Not Satisfied

[29] There is a further reason why Mr. Anderson's s. 7 argument must fail. The principle of fundamental justice that Mr. Anderson asks this Court to recognize — that Crown prosecutors must consider the Aboriginal status of the accused prior to making decisions that limit a judge's sentencing options — does not meet the test which governs principles of fundamental justice. As Abella J. observed for the majority in D.B., at para. 46, a principle of fundamental justice must (1) be a legal principle, (2) enjoy consensus that the rule or principle is fundamental to the way in which the legal system ought fairly to operate, and (3) be identified with sufficient precision to yield a manageable standard against which to measure deprivations of life, liberty or security of the person. See also Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law v. Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 4, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 76, at para. 8.

[30] The principle contended for by Mr. Anderson does not meet the second requirement that it enjoy consensus as a principle that is fundamental to the way in which the legal system ought to fairly operate. In fact, the principle is contrary to a long-standing and deeply rooted approach to the division of responsibility between the Crown prosecutor and the courts.

[31] We must begin by acknowledging that the principle advanced by Mr. Anderson would enormously expand the scope of judicial review of discretionary decisions made by prosecutors. In doing so, it puts at risk the adversarial nature of our criminal justice system by hobbling Crown prosecutors in the performance of their work and by inviting judicial oversight of the numerous decisions that Crown prosecutors make on a daily basis. As the Crown has pointed out, the situations where Crown decisions have the potential to limit the sentencing judge's options and therefore the judge's ability to take s. 718.2(e) into account are many: A.F., at para. 145. These decisions include: proceeding with charges that attract a mandatory minimum sentence when other related offences have no mandatory minimum sentence (e.g. s. 95 as opposed to s. 92 or s. 94 of the Code); proceeding by indictment rather than summary conviction when different mandatory minimum sentences are required (e.g. ss. 151, 152 and 271 of the Code); and proceeding by indictment rather than by summary conviction when that decision precludes the possibility of a conditional sentence (e.g. s. 267(b) of the Code). Moreover, there are several provisions of the Code and the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19, where a mandatory minimum is triggered by the Crown's decision to prove a particular aggravating factor — such as evidence of a firearm used in the commission of the offence (e.g. s. 344 of the Code; ss. 5 and 6 of the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act). As with the other examples provided, the decision to prove the aggravating factor limits the sentencing judge's options.

[32] Apart from the sheer volume of decisions that would be opened up for review, the Crown's decision to seek the mandatory minimum penalty — as we shall see — is a matter of prosecutorial discretion. There has been a long-standing and deeply engrained reluctance to permit routine judicial review of the exercise of that discretion. As affirmed in R. v. Beare, 1988 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 387, at p. 411, the Court “has already recognized that the existence of prosecutorial discretion does not offend the principles of fundamental justice”. And, as L'Heureux-Dubé J., for the majority of this Court, noted in R. v. Power, 1994 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 601, “the Crown cannot function as a prosecutor before the court while also serving under its general supervision. The court, in turn, cannot both supervise the exercise of prosecutorial discretion and act as an impartial arbitrator of the case presented to it” (p. 627). The imposition of a sweeping duty that opens up for routine judicial review all of the aforementioned decisions is contrary to our constitutional traditions. It cannot be a principle that is considered fundamental to the way in which our legal system ought fairly to operate.

[33] In sum, the principle of fundamental justice sought by Mr. Anderson must be rejected.

B. Is the Crown's Decision to Tender the Notice Against an Aboriginal Offender Reviewable?

[34] Having concluded that the Crown is not under a constitutional obligation to consider the accused's Aboriginal status when making a decision that limits the sentencing options available to a judge, the next question is whether the Crown's decision to tender the Notice is reviewable in some other way, and if so, under what standard.

Review of Crown Decision Making

[35] There are two distinct avenues for judicial review of Crown decision making. The analysis will differ depending on which of the following is at issue: (1) exercises of prosecutorial discretion; or (2) tactics and conduct before the court.

[36] All Crown decision making is reviewable for abuse of process. However, as I will explain, exercises of prosecutorial discretion are only reviewable for abuse of process. In contrast, tactics and conduct before the court are subject to a wider range of review. The court may exercise its inherent jurisdiction to control its own processes even in the absence of abuse of process.

(a) Prosecutorial Discretion

[37] This Court has repeatedly affirmed that prosecutorial discretion is a necessary part of a properly functioning criminal justice system: Beare, at p. 410; R. v. T. (V.), 1992 CanLII 88 \(SCC\), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 749, at pp. 758-62; R. v. Cook, 1997 CanLII 392 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 1113, at para. 19. In Miazga v. Kvello Estate, 2009 SCC 51, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 339, at para. 47, the fundamental importance of prosecutorial discretion was said to lie, “not in protecting the interests of individual Crown attorneys, but in advancing the public interest by enabling prosecutors to make discretionary decisions in fulfilment of their professional obligations without fear of judicial or political interference, thus fulfilling their quasi-judicial role as ‘ministers of justice’”. More recently, in Sriskandarajah v. United States of America, 2012 SCC 70, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 609, at para. 27, this Court observed that “[n]ot only does prosecutorial discretion accord with the principles of fundamental justice — it constitutes an indispensable device for the effective enforcement of the criminal law”.

[38] Unfortunately, subsequent to this Court's decision in Krieger v. Law Society of Alberta, 2002 SCC 65, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 372, confusion has arisen as to what is meant by "prosecutorial discretion" and the law has become cloudy. The present appeal provides an opportunity for clarification.

[39] In Krieger, this Court provided the following description of prosecutorial discretion:

"Prosecutorial discretion" is a term of art. It does not simply refer to any discretionary decision made by a Crown prosecutor. Prosecutorial discretion refers to the use of those powers that constitute the core of the Attorney General's office and which are protected from the influence of improper political and other vitiating factors by the principle of independence. [para. 43]

[40] The Court went on to provide the following examples of prosecutorial discretion: whether to bring the prosecution of a charge laid by police; whether to enter a stay of proceedings in either a private or public prosecution; whether to accept a guilty plea to a lesser charge; whether to withdraw from criminal proceedings altogether; and whether to take control of a private prosecution (para. 46). The Court continued:

Significantly, what is common to the various elements of prosecutorial discretion is that they involve the ultimate decisions as to whether a prosecution should be brought, continued or ceased, and what the prosecution ought to be for. Put differently, prosecutorial discretion refers to decisions regarding the nature and extent of the prosecution and the Attorney General's participation in it. Decisions that do not go to the nature and extent of the prosecution, i.e., the decisions that govern a Crown prosecutor's tactics or conduct before the court, do not fall within the scope of prosecutorial discretion. Rather, such decisions are governed by the inherent jurisdiction of the court to control its own processes once the Attorney General has elected to enter into that forum. [Emphasis added; emphasis in original deleted; para. 47.]

[41] Since Krieger, courts have struggled with the distinction between prosecutorial discretion, and tactics and conduct. The use of the word "core" in Krieger has led to a narrow definition of prosecutorial discretion, notwithstanding the expansive language used in Krieger to define the term, namely: ". . . decisions regarding the nature and extent of the prosecution and the Attorney General's participation in it" (para. 47). Difficulty in defining the term has also led to confusion regarding the standard of review by which particular Crown decisions are to be assessed.

[42] The current appeal presents a good illustration of both problems. As noted earlier, the Newfoundland and Labrador Court of Appeal split on the issue of how to characterize the Crown's decision to tender the Notice. Welsh J.A. held that it was a matter of "core" prosecutorial discretion, whereas Green C.J.N.L. and Rowe J.A. (following R. v. Gill, 2012 ONCA 607, 112 O.R. (3d) 423, at paras. 54-56), considered it to be a tactical decision and thus "outside [the] core" (para. 49).

[43] The court also diverged on the applicable standard of review. Welsh J.A. held that the distinction between core decisions and decisions falling outside the core was of no consequence as both types of decisions were reviewable on the same standard — the standard articulated in Gill, in which the Ontario Court of Appeal held that the decision to tender the Notice was reviewable if it (1) undermined the integrity of the administration of justice; (2) operated in a manner that rendered the sentencing proceedings fundamentally unfair; (3) was arbitrary; or (4) resulted in a limit on the accused's liberty that was grossly disproportionate to the state interest in pursuing a particular course of action (Gill, at para. 59). Green C.J.N.L. and Rowe J.A. disagreed. In their view, tactical decisions (decisions "outside the core") were reviewable according to the Gill standard, whereas "core" prosecutorial discretion was reviewable solely for abuse of process. The diverging views present in this case, and in many others, demonstrate the unsatisfactory state of the law.

[44] In an effort to clarify, I think we should start by recognizing that the term "prosecutorial discretion" is an expansive term that covers all "decisions regarding the nature and extent of the prosecution and the Attorney General's participation in it" (Krieger, at para. 47). As this Court has repeatedly noted, "[p]rosecutorial discretion refers to the discretion exercised by the Attorney-General in matters within his authority in relation to the prosecution of criminal offences" (Krieger, at para. 44, citing Power, at p. 622, quoting D. Vanek, "Prosecutorial Discretion" (1988), 30 Crim. L.Q. 219, at p. 219 (emphasis added)). While it is likely impossible to create an exhaustive list of the decisions that fall within the nature and extent of a prosecution, further examples to those in Krieger include: the decision to repudiate a plea agreement (as in R. v. Nixon, 2011 SCC 34, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 566); the decision to pursue a dangerous offender application; the decision to prefer a direct indictment; the decision to charge multiple offences; the decision to negotiate a plea; the decision to proceed summarily or by indictment; and the decision to initiate an appeal. All pertain to the nature and extent of the prosecution. As can be seen, many stem from the provisions of the Code itself, including the decision in this case to tender the Notice.

[45] In sum, prosecutorial discretion applies to a wide range of prosecutorial decision making. That said, care must be taken to distinguish matters of prosecutorial discretion from constitutional obligations. The distinction between prosecutorial discretion and the constitutional obligations of the Crown was made in Krieger, where the prosecutor’s duty to disclose relevant evidence to the accused was at issue:

In Stinchcombe, supra, the Court held that the Crown has an obligation to disclose all relevant information to the defence. While the Crown Attorney retains the discretion not to disclose irrelevant information, disclosure of relevant evidence is not, therefore, a matter of prosecutorial discretion but, rather, is a prosecutorial duty. [Emphasis added; para. 54.]

Manifestly, the Crown possesses no discretion to breach the Charter rights of an accused. In other words, prosecutorial discretion provides no shield to a Crown prosecutor who has failed to fulfill his or her constitutional obligations such as the duty to provide proper disclosure to the defence.

(i) The Standard of Review for Prosecutorial Discretion

[46] The many decisions that Crown prosecutors are called upon to make in the exercise of their prosecutorial discretion must not be subjected to routine second-guessing by the courts. The courts have long recognized that decisions involving prosecutorial discretion are unlike other decisions made by the executive: see M. Code, “Judicial Review of Prosecutorial Decisions: A Short History of Costs and Benefits, in Response to Justice Rosenberg” (2009), 34 Queen’s L.J. 863, at p. 867. Judicial non-interference with prosecutorial discretion has been referred to as a “matter of principle based on the doctrine of separation of powers as well as a matter of policy founded on the efficiency of the system of criminal justice” which also recognizes that prosecutorial discretion is “especially ill-suited to judicial review”: Power, at p. 623. In Krieger, the Court discussed the separation of powers doctrine as a basis for judicial deference to prosecutorial discretion:

In our theory of government, it is the sovereign who holds the power to prosecute his or her subjects. A decision of the Attorney General, or of his or her agents, within the authority delegated to him or her by the sovereign is not subject to interference by other arms of government. An exercise of prosecutorial discretion will, therefore, be treated with deference by the courts and by other members of the executive [para. 45]

[47] The Court also noted the more practical problems associated with regular review of prosecutorial discretion:

The quasi-judicial function of the Attorney General cannot be subjected to interference from parties who are not as competent to consider the various factors involved in making a decision to prosecute. To subject such decisions to political interference, or to judicial supervision, could erode the integrity of our system of prosecution. [para. 32]

[48] Manifestly, prosecutorial discretion is entitled to considerable deference. It is not, however, immune from all judicial oversight. This Court has repeatedly affirmed that prosecutorial discretion is reviewable for abuse of process: Krieger, at para. 32; Nixon, at para. 31; Miazga, at para. 46.

[49] The jurisprudence pertaining to the review of prosecutorial discretion has employed a range of terminology to describe the type of prosecutorial conduct that constitutes abuse of process. In Krieger, this Court used the term “flagrant impropriety” (para. 49). In Nixon, the Court held that the abuse of process doctrine is available where there is evidence that the Crown’s decision “undermines the integrity of the judicial process” or “results in trial unfairness” (para. 64). The Court also referred to “improper motive[s]” and “bad faith” in its discussion (para. 68).

[50] Regardless of the precise language used, the key point is this: abuse of process refers to Crown conduct that is egregious and seriously compromises trial fairness and/or the integrity of the justice system. Crown decisions motivated by prejudice against Aboriginal persons would certainly meet this standard.

[51] In sum, prosecutorial discretion is reviewable solely for abuse of process. The Gill test applied by the Newfoundland and Labrador Court of Appeal was developed at a time when courts were struggling with the post-Krieger “core” versus “outside the core” dichotomy. To the extent the Gill test suggests that conduct falling short of abuse of process may form a basis for reviewing prosecutorial discretion, respectfully, it should not be followed.

(ii) The Threshold Evidentiary Burden

[52] The burden of proof for establishing abuse of process lies on the claimant, who must prove it on a balance of probabilities: Cook, at para. 62; R. v. O'Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, at para. 69, per L’Heureux-Dubé J.; R. v. Jolivet, 2000 SCC 29, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 751, at para. 19. However, given the unique nature of prosecutorial discretion — specifically, the fact that the Crown will typically (if not always) be the only party who will know why a particular decision was made — this Court in Nixon recognized that where prosecutorial discretion is challenged, the Crown may be required to provide reasons justifying its decision where the claimant establishes a proper evidentiary foundation: para. 60.

[53] In Nixon, this Court noted the following reasons as to why there must be a “proper evidentiary foundation” before the abuse of process claim should proceed:

. . . mandating a preliminary determination on the utility of a Charter-based inquiry is not new: R. v. Pires, 2005 SCC 66, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 343. Similar thresholds are also imposed in other areas of the criminal law, they are not an anomaly. Threshold requirements may be imposed for pragmatic reasons alone. As this Court observed in Pires (at para. 35):

For our justice system to operate, trial judges must have some ability to control the course of proceedings before them. One such mechanism is the power to decline to embark upon an evidentiary hearing at the request of one of the parties when that party is unable to show a reasonable likelihood that the hearing can assist in determining the issues before the court.

Quite apart from any such pragmatic considerations, there is good reason to impose a threshold burden on the applicant who alleges that an act of prosecutorial discretion constitutes an abuse of process. Given that such decisions are generally beyond the reach of the court, it is not sufficient to launch an inquiry for an applicant to make a bare allegation of abuse of process. [Emphasis added; paras. 61-62.]

[54] Nixon involved the Crown’s repudiation of a plea agreement. The Court held that the repudiation of a plea agreement was “a rare and exceptional event” that met the evidentiary threshold and justified an inquiry into the propriety of the Crown’s decision: Nixon, at para. 63. Indeed, the evidence in Nixon was that only two other plea agreements had been repudiated in Alberta’s history. As a result, the Court held that to the extent that the Crown is the only party who is privy to the information, the evidentiary burden shifts to the Crown to enlighten the court on the circumstances and reasons behind its decision to resile from the agreement. That is, the Crown must explain why and how it made the decision not to honour the plea agreement. The ultimate burden of proving abuse of process remains on the applicant and, as discussed earlier, the test is a stringent one. However, if the Crown provides little or no explanation to the court, this factor should weigh heavily in favour of the applicant in successfully making out an abuse of process claim. [para. 63]

[55] Requiring the claimant to establish a proper evidentiary foundation before embarking on an inquiry into the reasons behind the exercise of prosecutorial discretion respects the presumption that prosecutorial discretion is exercised in good faith: Application under s. 83.28 of the Criminal Code (Re), 2004 SCC 42, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 248, at para. 95. It also accords with this Court’s statement in Sriskandarajah, at para. 27, that “prosecutorial authorities are not bound to provide reasons for their decisions, absent evidence of bad faith or improper motives” (emphasis added).

[56] Finally, I note that the content of a Crown policy or guideline may be relevant when a court is considering a challenge to the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. Policy statements or guidelines are capable of informing the debate as to whether a Crown prosecutor’s conduct was appropriate in the particular circumstances. See R. J. Frater, Prosecutorial Misconduct (2009), at p.

259. For example, a decision by a Crown prosecutor that appears to contravene a Crown policy or guideline may provide some evidence that assists the claimant in establishing the threshold evidentiary foundation. However, as the intervener the Director of Public Prosecutions of Canada submits, Crown policies and guidelines do not have the force of law, and cannot themselves be subjected to Charter scrutiny in the abstract: see R. v. Beaudry, 2007 SCC 5, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 190, at para. 45 (discussing police practices manuals).

(b) Tactics and Conduct Before the Court

[57] The second category in the framework for review of Crown activity was referred to in Krieger as “tactics or conduct before the court”: para. 47. As stated in Krieger, “such decisions are governed by the inherent jurisdiction of the court to control its own processes once the Attorney General has elected to enter into that forum” (para. 47).

[58] Superior courts possess inherent jurisdiction to ensure that the machinery of the court functions in an orderly and effective manner: R. v. Cunningham, 2010 SCC 10, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 331, at para. 18; Ontario v. Criminal Lawyers’ Association of Ontario, 2013 SCC 43, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 26. Similarly, in order to function as courts of law, statutory courts have implicit powers that derive from the court’s authority to control its own process: Cunningham, at para. 18. This jurisdiction includes the power to penalize counsel for ignoring rulings or orders, or for inappropriate behaviour such as tardiness, incivility, abusive cross-examination, improper opening or closing addresses or inappropriate attire. Sanctions may include orders to comply, adjournments, extensions of time, warnings, cost awards, dismissals, and contempt proceedings.

[59] While deference is not owed to counsel who are behaving inappropriately in the courtroom, our adversarial system does accord a high degree of deference to the tactical decisions of counsel. In other words, while courts may sanction the conduct of the litigants, they should generally refrain from interfering with the conduct of the litigation itself. In R. v. S.G.T., 2010 SCC 20, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 688, at paras. 36-37, this Court explained why judges should be very cautious before interfering with tactical decisions:

In an adversarial system of criminal trials, trial judges must, barring exceptional circumstances, defer to the tactical decisions of counsel [C]ounsel will generally be in a better position to assess the wisdom, in light of their overall trial strategy, of a particular tactical decision than is the trial judge. By contrast, trial judges are expected to be impartial arbiters of the dispute before them; the more a trial judge second-guesses or overrides the decisions of counsel, the greater is the risk that the trial judge will, in either appearance or reality, cease being a neutral arbiter and instead become an advocate for one party. . . .

The corollary of the preceding is that trial judges should seldom take it upon themselves, let alone be required, to second-guess the tactical decisions of counsel. Of course, trial judges are still required to “make sure that [the trial] remains fair and is conducted in accordance with the relevant laws and the principles of fundamental justice”: Lavallee, Rackel & Heintz v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 61, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 209, at para. 68.

[60] Crown counsel is entitled to have a trial strategy and to modify it as the trial unfolds, provided that the modification does not result in unfairness to the accused: Jolivet, at para. 21. Likewise, as this Court recently held in R. v. Auclair, 2014 SCC 6, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 83, a judge may exceptionally override a Crown tactical decision in order to prevent a Charter violation.

[61] Finally, as with all Crown decision making, courtroom tactics or conduct may amount to abuse of process, but abuse of process is not a precondition for judicial intervention as it is for matters of prosecutorial discretion.

VI. Conclusion

[62] Parliament has expressly conferred on the Crown the discretion to tender the Notice at the sentencing hearing through the governing provisions of the Code. This discretion is consistent with our constitutional traditions. As the Crown points out, tendering the Notice is not simply a decision as to what submissions will be made at a sentencing hearing (A.F., at para. 119). Tendering the Notice fundamentally alters the extent of prosecution — specifically, the extent of the jeopardy facing the accused. In this respect, the Crown’s decision to tender the Notice is analogous to the decision to proceed with charges that attract a mandatory minimum sentence when other related offences have no mandatory minimum sentence; the decision to proceed by indictment rather than summary conviction when different mandatory minimum sentences are involved; and the decision to proceed by indictment rather than by summary conviction when that decision precludes certain sentencing options.

[63] For these reasons, I conclude that tendering the Notice is a matter of prosecutorial discretion. As a result, it is reviewable only for abuse of process. In the complete absence of any evidence to support it, Mr. Anderson's abuse of process argument must fail.

[64] As a final matter, I note that the s. 15\(1\) Charter challenge to the constitutionality of the statutory scheme was not pursued before this Court. These reasons should not be taken as endorsing the trial judge's analysis or conclusion with respect to that issue.

[65] Accordingly, I would allow the appeal. The order of the Newfoundland and Labrador Court of Appeal is set aside and a term of imprisonment of 120 days is substituted, with service of the remainder of the sentence stayed in accordance with the concession of the Crown.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellant: Attorney General of Newfoundland and Labrador, St. John's.

Solicitor for the respondent: Newfoundland and Labrador Legal Aid Commission, St. John's.

Solicitor for the intervener the Director of Public Prosecutions of Canada: Public Prosecution Service of Canada, Halifax.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General of Ontario: Attorney General of Ontario, Toronto.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General of New Brunswick: Attorney General of New Brunswick, Fredericton.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General of British Columbia: Attorney General of British Columbia, Vancouver.

Solicitor for the intervener the David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights: University of Toronto, Toronto.

Solicitor for the intervener the Aboriginal Legal Services of Toronto Inc.: Aboriginal Legal Services of Toronto Legal Clinic, Toronto.

[1] Crown policy statements are designed to assist Crown prosecutors in the performance of their functions. In this case, there was a Crown policy statement pertaining to the decision of whether or not to tender the Notice. The policy statement stated that “service of the notice should be considered in all cases, in light of all circumstances of the offence and the background and circumstances of the offender” (Court of Appeal decision, at para. 19 (emphasis deleted)). The policy statement did not specifically reference Aboriginal status.

Tab 3

R. v. Babos, 2014 SCC 16 (CanLII), [2014] 1 SCR 309

Source:	Supreme Court of Canada
Date:	2014-02-21
File number:	34824
Other citations:	367 DLR (4th) 575 — 454 NR 86 — AZ-51046916 — [2014] EXP 660 — 308 CCC (3d) 445 — 8 CR (7th) 1 — 112 WCB (2d) 68 — 300 CRR (2d) 153 — [2014] CarswellQue 575 — EYB 2014-233436 — JE 2014-343 — [2014] SCJ No 16 (QL)
Citation:	R. v. Babos, 2014 SCC 16 (CanLII), [2014] 1 SCR 309, < https://canlii.ca/t/g36g4 >, retrieved on 2026-03-20
Most recent unfavourable mention	R. v. General , 2024 ONSC 7076 (CanLII) [...] Recall that the main category under Babos is inapplicable in the current circumstances. [...]

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

CITATION: R. v. Babos, 2014 SCC 16, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 309

DATE: 20140221

DOCKET: 34824

BETWEEN:

Antal Babos
Appellant
and
Her Majesty The Queen
Respondent

AND BETWEEN:

Sergio Piccirilli
Appellant
and

Her Majesty The Queen
Respondent

CORAM: McLachlin C.J. and LeBel, Abella, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis and Wagner JJ.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT: Moldaver J. (McLachlin C.J. and LeBel, Cromwell, Karakatsanis and Wagner JJ. concurring)
(paras. 1 to 74)

DISSENTING REASONS: Abella J.
(paras. 75 to 87)

R. v. Babos, 2014 SCC 16, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 309

Antal Babos

Appellant

v.

Her Majesty The Queen

Respondent

- and -

Sergio Piccirilli

Appellant

v.

Her Majesty The Queen

Respondent

Indexed as: R. v. Babos

2014 SCC 16

File No.: 34824.

2013: October 9; 2014: February 21.

Present: McLachlin C.J. and LeBel, Abella, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis and Wagner JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR QUEBEC

Criminal law — Stay of proceedings — Abuse of process — Accused charged with offences related to firearms and importation, production and trafficking of methamphetamine — Accused alleging Crown misconduct in obtaining medical records, police collusion to mislead court, and Crown threats pressuring accused to plead guilty — Trial judge staying proceedings — Whether stay of proceedings necessary to protect integrity of justice system.

The accused were charged with numerous firearms offences, as well as offences related to the importation, production and trafficking of methamphetamine. During the course of the trial, the accused brought an application to stay the proceedings for abuse of process. They took issue with three forms of state misconduct: attempts by the Crown to intimidate them into foregoing their right to a trial by threatening them with additional charges should they choose to plead not guilty, collusion on the part of two police officers to mislead the court about the seizure of a firearm, and improper means used by the Crown in obtaining the medical records of one of the accused. The trial judge stayed the proceedings. The Court of Appeal set aside the stay and ordered a new trial.

Held (Abella J. dissenting): The appeals should be dismissed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and LeBel, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis and Wagner JJ.: A stay of proceedings for an abuse of process will only be warranted in the clearest of cases. Two types of state conduct may warrant a stay. The first is conduct that compromises the fairness of an accused's trial (the "main" category). The second is conduct that does not threaten trial fairness but risks undermining the integrity of the judicial process (the "residual" category). The test for determining whether a stay of proceedings is warranted is the same for both categories and consists of three requirements: (1) there must be prejudice to the accused's right to a fair trial or to the integrity of the justice system that will be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated through the conduct of the trial, or by its outcome, (2) there must be no alternative remedy capable of redressing the prejudice, and (3) where there is still uncertainty over whether a stay is warranted after steps 1 and 2, the court must balance the interests in favour of granting a stay against the interest that society has in having a final decision on the merits.

When the residual category is invoked, the first stage of the test is met when it is established that the state has engaged in conduct that is offensive to societal notions of fair play and decency, and that proceeding with a trial in the face of that conduct would be harmful to the integrity of the justice system. At the second stage of the test, the focus is on whether an alternate remedy short of a stay of proceedings will adequately dissociate the justice system from the impugned state conduct going forward. Finally, the court must decide whether staying the proceedings or having a trial despite the impugned conduct better protects the integrity of the justice system. This inquiry necessarily demands balancing. The court must consider such things as the nature and seriousness of the impugned conduct, whether the conduct is isolated or reflects a systemic and ongoing problem, the circumstances of the accused, the charges he or she faces, and the interests of society in having the charges disposed of on the merits.

In the instant case, the three forms of state misconduct that are at issue fall squarely within the residual category. The trial judge erred in his assessment of the impugned misconduct and in concluding that a stay of proceedings was warranted. As regards the medical records, the trial judge made a palpable and overriding error in finding that the Crown's conduct occasioned prejudice to the integrity of the justice system. With respect to the police collusion, apart from its limited extent, the trial judge failed to consider the existence of another remedy that would have overcome the threat posed to the integrity of the justice system — namely, excluding the firearm from evidence in respect of both accused. As for the threats made by the Crown, while they were reprehensible and should not be repeated, the trial judge failed to consider that they were made more than a year before the trial began, and that the accused took no steps for over a year to address the Crown's conduct. These factors shed light on how seriously the accused took the threats. The trial judge also failed to consider that the Crown prosecutor who made the threats was removed from the case months before the trial started. Moreover, the trial judge failed to balance the need for a stay against society's interest in a trial on the merits. When the impugned misconduct is weighed against society's interest in a trial, this is not one of the clearest of cases where the exceptional remedy of a stay of proceedings is warranted.

Per Abella J. (dissenting): A stay of proceedings may be imposed when the state conduct is so profoundly and disproportionately inconsistent with the public perception of what a fair justice system requires, that proceeding with a trial means condoning unforgiveable conduct. A Crown who makes threats intended to bully an accused into foregoing his or her right to a trial, takes fatal aim at the heart of the public's confidence in that integrity.

The unjustifiable nature of the Crown's conduct in this case was not mitigated by the length of time between the threats and the trial. Time is not a legal remedy for a fundamental breach of the Crown's role and the passage of time does not attenuate her unpardonable conduct. It was the mere fact that the threats were made at all that was key, not when they were made.

Moreover, a further balancing exercise was not required in the circumstances. The trial judge was unequivocal in concluding that the conduct justified a stay, and there was none of the uncertainty as to the propriety of a stay that is a condition precedent to the need for a balancing exercise. When a trial judge has found that the conduct cannot be condoned because it is such an exceptional assault on the public's sense of justice, it is conceptually inconsistent to ask the court to undermine its own conclusion by re-weighing the half of the scale that contains the public's interest in trials on the merits. The public has an interest not only in trials on the merits, it has an even greater interest in knowing that when the state is involved in proceedings, particularly those that can result in an individual's loss of liberty, it will put fairness above expedience. Justice is not only about results, it is about how those results are obtained. When a Crown threatens an accused with additional offences if he or she does not plead guilty, the public's interest in the results of a trial must yield to the transcendent interest in protecting the public's confidence in the integrity of the justice system.

Cases Cited

By Moldaver J.

Referred to: R. v. Regan, 2002 SCC 12, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 297; R. v. O'Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 \(SCC\), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411; Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Tobiass, 1997 CanLII 322 \(SCC\), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 391; R. v. Keyowski, 1988 CanLII 74 \(SCC\), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 657; R. v. Waugh (1985), 1985 CanLII 3557 \(NS CA\), 68 N.S.R. (2d) 247; R. v. Bellusci, 2012 SCC 44, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 509; R. v. Zarinchang, 2010 ONCA 286, 99 O.R. (3d) 721; R. v. Conway, 1989 CanLII 66 \(SCC\), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659; R. v. Bjelland, 2009 SCC 38, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 651; Boucher v. The Queen, 1954 CanLII 3 \(SCC\), [1955] S.C.R. 16; United States of America v. Cobb, 2001 SCC 19, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 587.

By Abella J. (dissenting)

R. v. O'Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 \(SCC\), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411; Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Tobiass, 1997 CanLII 322 \(SCC\), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 391; R. v. Conway, 1989 CanLII 66 \(SCC\), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659; United States of America v. Shulman, 2001 SCC 21, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 616; R. v. Regan, 2002 SCC 12, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 297; R. v. Bellusci, 2012 SCC 44, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 509.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 8, 11\(b\), 24.

Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, ss. 574(1)(b), 577.

APPEALS from a judgment of the Quebec Court of Appeal (Duval Hesler C.J. and Chamberland and Doyon JJ.A.), 2012 QCCA 471, [2012] J.Q. n° 2107 (QL), 2012 CarswellQue 1987, SOQUIJ AZ-50839397, setting aside the stay of proceedings entered by Garneau J. and ordering a new trial, 2008 QCCQ 11373, [2008] J.Q. n° 12838 (QL), 2008 CarswellQue 12200, SOQUIJ AZ-50525272. Appeals dismissed, Abella J. dissenting.

Franco Schiro and Xuan Trung Nguyen, for the appellant Antal Babos.

Guylaine Tardif, Jean-Pierre Pilon and Maxime Wilkins, for the appellant Sergio Piccirilli.

Gilles Villeneuve and François Lacasse, for the respondent.

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and LeBel, Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis and Wagner JJ. was delivered by

MOLDAVER J. —

I. Introduction

[1] This appeal provides the Court with an opportunity to revisit the law of abuse of process as it relates to state conduct that impinges on the integrity of the justice system but does not affect trial fairness — sometimes referred to as the “residual category” of cases for which a judicial stay of proceedings may be ordered. In particular, we are tasked with clarifying the approach to be followed when determining whether a stay of proceedings should be ordered where such conduct is uncovered.

[2] As we shall see, the appellants, Antal Babos and Sergio Piccirilli, complain about three forms of state misconduct:

- (1) Attempts by the original provincial Crown Attorney to intimidate them into foregoing their right to a trial by threatening them with additional charges should they choose to plead not guilty;

- (2) Collusion on the part of two police officers to mislead the court about the seizure of a firearm from Mr. Babos's car; and
- (3) Improper means used by a federal Crown Attorney in obtaining Mr. Piccirilli's medical records from the detention centre where he was being detained pending trial.

[3] Notably, the appellants do not argue that they cannot receive a fair trial as a result of the alleged incidents of misconduct — they accept that they can. They submit instead that this is one of the clearest of cases in which a stay of proceedings is necessary to preserve and protect the integrity of the justice system. Anything short of that would amount to judicial condonation of egregious misconduct and erode the public's confidence in the administration of justice.

[4] And that, the appellants say, is the basis upon which the trial judge ordered a stay of proceedings in their case. In doing so, he made no error. His decision was discretionary and entitled to deference, and the Quebec Court of Appeal should not have interfered. Hence, the appellants seek to have the order of the trial judge reinstated.

[5] For the reasons that follow, I would not give effect to the appellants' submissions. In my respectful view, the trial judge committed errors in assessing all three forms of state misconduct. As regards Mr. Piccirilli's medical records, he made a palpable and overriding error in assessing the Crown's conduct. With respect to the police collusion, apart from its limited extent, the trial judge failed to consider that excluding the firearm found in Mr. Babos's trunk would have overcome whatever threat it posed to the integrity of the justice system. As for the threats by the provincial Crown, while they were reprehensible and should not be repeated, the trial judge overstated their seriousness and failed to balance the need for a stay against society's interest in a trial on the merits.

[6] When the impugned misconduct is properly considered and the correct legal framework is applied, a stay is unwarranted. Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeals.

II. Background Facts

[7] On February 17, 2006, Mr. Babos was pulled over by Constables Guy Brière and Marc Sénéchal. The officers believed that Mr. Babos was transporting guns. Upon searching the trunk of his car, they found a semi-automatic firearm. Mr. Babos was arrested.

[8] On June 21, 2006, Mr. Piccirilli was arrested. Both he and Mr. Babos were ultimately charged with numerous firearms related offences, as well as offences related to the importation, production and trafficking of methamphetamine.

[9] The instances of threatening conduct by Crown counsel are said to have occurred between June 2006 and February 2007. Specifically, the provincial prosecutor assigned to the case, Ms. Valérie Tremblay, was accused of threatening Mr. Piccirilli on three separate occasions with additional charges if he did not plead guilty.

[10] According to Mr. Patrice Duliot, Mr. Piccirilli's former lawyer, Ms. Tremblay told him, in the presence of Mr. Piccirilli, that [TRANSLATION] "if your client doesn't settle, he's gonna be hit by a train" (A.R., vol. V, at p. 5). Mr. Piccirilli claimed that on another occasion, either in June or September 2006, Ms. Tremblay threatened him personally in the courtroom. According to Mr. Piccirilli, she said "if you proceed, we'll bring other charges against you" and that she would "use section 577" and go "straight to trial" (pp. 65 and 69).^[1] Another of Mr. Piccirilli's counsel, Ms. Guylaine Tardif, deposed in an affidavit that in November 2006 or February 2007, Ms. Tremblay told her that Mr. Piccirilli would be charged with money laundering and organized crime offences if he did not plead guilty. Ms. Tremblay asked Ms. Tardif to relay this message to her client. Although Mr. Babos was not threatened directly, no issue is taken with the fact that the threats conveyed to Mr. Piccirilli would have come to his attention.

[11] The appellants' trial began in April 2008. Notably, by February 2008, Ms. Tremblay was no longer on the file. She had been removed for health reasons and replaced by a federal prosecutor, Ms. Kovacevich, when the charges against the appellants were joined in a single indictment. It was at this juncture that the appellants were charged with four additional offences relating to organized crime, firearms and drug trafficking. The additional charges stemmed from evidence led at the appellants' preliminary hearings. By this point, neither the appellants nor their counsel had mentioned the alleged threats made by Ms. Tremblay. Indeed, the threats did not surface until they were brought to the attention of the trial judge some six months into the trial and at least eighteen months after they were made.

[12] At the outset of the trial, Mr. Babos alleged that the police had illegally searched the trunk of his car and he sought to have the firearm they seized excluded from evidence under s. 24(2) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. On the s. 24(2) application, a key factual issue was whether Mr. Babos consented to the search and opened the trunk himself. Constables Brière and Sénéchal testified at the hearing. Cst. Brière testified that it was Mr. Babos who opened the trunk of the car. This testimony differed from the version of events he had given at the preliminary inquiry.[2] When defence counsel confronted Cst. Brière with the change, Cst. Brière explained that he had spoken to Cst. Sénéchal while they were waiting to testify, and that Cst. Sénéchal had [TRANSLATION] "convinced" him that the new version of events was the truth.

[13] The trial judge concluded that the trunk had been illegally searched and that Mr. Babos's rights under s. 8 of the Charter had been violated. He also found that the officers had colluded for the purpose of misleading the court. The firearm found in the trunk was excluded.

[14] In June 2008, during the continuation of the trial, the Crown attempted to adduce the same firearm against Mr. Piccirilli. Mr. Piccirilli objected. The Crown took the position that Mr. Piccirilli had no standing to allege a violation of his s. 8 rights because the car from which the firearm was seized belonged to Mr. Babos. Again Cst. Brière testified, and again his evidence was somewhat different than before.[3] The trial judge ruled in favour of the Crown on the issue of standing, but did so provisionally; he reserved to Mr. Piccirilli the right to present another motion [TRANSLATION] "in due course if necessary" (A.R., vol. III, at p. 124).[4]

[15] On October 3, 2008, with the trial still ongoing, Mr. Babos brought an application to stay the charges for unreasonable delay under s. 11(b) of the Charter. That same week, on October 7, 2008, Mr. Piccirilli had a heart attack and the trial was adjourned. Mr. Piccirilli applied for bail, alleging that the detention centre in which he was being held was unable to adequately care for his health. As part of his application, Mr. Piccirilli undertook to provide the court with his medical report and list of medications.

[16] Ms. Kovacevich contacted the detention centre directly and spoke to Mr. Piccirilli's doctor. Ms. Kovacevich asked him to provide an affidavit explaining whether medical staff at the detention centre had followed up on Mr. Piccirilli's health since his heart attack and whether Mr. Piccirilli had been receiving his medication since his hospitalization. On October 23, 2008, Mr. Piccirilli's doctor provided the Crown with medical documents pertaining to Mr. Piccirilli. Ms. Kovacevich immediately disclosed these documents to Mr. Piccirilli's counsel, but she initially refused to divulge their source. A few days later, in an affidavit dated October 30, 2008, she explained that the medical records had been sent from the detention centre by Mr. Piccirilli's doctor.

[17] When Mr. Babos's s. 11(b) application resumed in late October, Mr. Babos's former counsel (Mr. Duliot) testified. It was in the course of his testimony that Ms. Tremblay's threatening conduct came to light for the first time. After hearing evidence regarding Ms. Tremblay's conduct, the trial judge asked Ms. Kovacevich if she wanted to call any witnesses or have Ms. Tremblay prepare an affidavit. Ms. Kovacevich declined. She explained that the only response she could make was that the state of Ms. Tremblay's health did not allow her to testify, that the alleged threats were not admitted, and that no postponement was requested to have her testify.

[18] Both appellants brought an application to stay the proceedings for abuse of process shortly thereafter. On November 14, 2008, the trial judge granted the application and the charges against the appellants were stayed.

III. Judgments Below

A. The Quebec Court, 2008 QCCQ 11373 (CanLII)

[19] Garneau J. stayed the proceedings against both appellants. He based his decision to do so on three instances of state misconduct: (1) Ms. Tremblay's threats to the appellants that they would face additional charges if they did not plead guilty; (2) collusion on the part of Constables Brière and Sénéchal to mislead the court; and (3) Ms. Kovacevich's improper conduct in securing Mr. Piccirilli's medical records from the detention centre without first obtaining his consent.

[20] Commencing with Ms. Tremblay's threatening conduct, the trial judge described the threats as [TRANSLATION] "unacceptable, intolerable, unjustifiable, illegal and, above all, undemocratic" (para. 59). The trial judge was also critical of the Crown attorney's office for failing to take any steps to address Ms. Tremblay's conduct, noting that "nothing, absolutely nothing had been done by the representative of the Attorney General to remedy or even try to remedy the situation" (para. 66). Instead, the Crown had "remained entrenched in its position" (para. 66). The trial judge found that the threats had tarnished the reputation of the judicial system and impacted the fairness of the accused's trial. Allowing the trial to continue in the face of these threats would be "shocking and outrageous" (para. 78). According to the trial judge, Ms. Tremblay's misconduct was sufficient in and of itself to warrant a stay of proceedings.

[21] With respect to collusion, the trial judge made a finding that Constables Brière and Sénéchal colluded in order to mislead the court. This finding was based on Cst. Brière's admission that he had spoken to Cst. Sénéchal before testifying, and that Cst. Sénéchal had [TRANSLATION] "convinced" him that Mr. Babos had opened the trunk of the car (para. 12). The trial judge also found that the Crown's later attempt to lead the firearm seized from the trunk against Mr. Piccirilli perpetuated the officers' collusion.

[22] Finally, regarding Mr. Piccirilli's medical records, the trial judge concluded that the Crown should have taken the [TRANSLATION] "necessary precautions" to ensure that the confidentiality of Mr. Piccirilli's records was respected (para. 53). The trial judge also found that there had been a "lack of transparency" because the Crown had "always refused" to disclose the source of the information once she had obtained it (para. 56).

[23] In the face of these three instances of misconduct, but particularly Ms. Tremblay's threats, the trial judge stayed the proceedings against both appellants.

B. The Quebec Court of Appeal, 2012 QCCA 471 (CanLII)

[24] Doyon J.A., writing for a unanimous court, set aside the stay of proceedings and ordered a new trial. A stay of proceedings was only to be granted in [TRANSLATION] "extreme cases" where no other remedy was possible (para. 56). This was not such a case.

[25] Acknowledging that Ms. Tremblay's threats were [TRANSLATION] "unacceptable" and "outrageous", Doyon J.A. noted that the impact of the threats was lessened by the fact that they were made over a year before the trial began and that Ms. Tremblay had long since been replaced as the prosecutor in charge of the case (paras. 59 and 73).

[26] As for the trial judge's finding that Constables Brière and Sénéchal colluded to mislead the court, Doyon J.A. considered this finding to be a palpable and overriding error. Cst. Brière explained why his testimony had changed. The trial judge's determination that the officers' conduct amounted to collusion lacked an evidentiary foundation.

[27] With respect to Ms. Kovacevich's conduct in securing Mr. Piccirilli's medical records, Doyon J.A. concluded that there was no misconduct and that the trial judge committed another palpable and overriding error in finding otherwise. Mr. Piccirilli put his medical condition in issue and at least implicitly waived his right to invoke confidentiality in the information. The Crown was free to seek evidence to contradict Mr. Piccirilli's assertions for purposes of resisting his application for interim release.

[28] Having reassessed the facts, Doyon J.A. observed that Ms. Tremblay's threats remained the sole cause of concern. In assessing whether those threats warranted a stay, he noted that they were uttered months before trial, by a Crown who was replaced before trial, and about whom the appellants did not complain until after their trial had been in progress for at least six months. In his view, this did not amount to an extreme case that required a stay of proceedings.

IV. Issues

[29] The narrow issue on appeal is whether the trial judge erred in granting a stay of proceedings. More broadly, we are tasked with clarifying the proper analysis to be undertaken when a stay of proceedings is sought for prior state conduct that is said to impinge on the integrity of the justice system.

V. Analysis

A. Abuse of Process and Stays of Proceedings

[30] A stay of proceedings is the most drastic remedy a criminal court can order (R. v. Regan, 2002 SCC 12, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 297, at para. 53). It permanently halts the prosecution of an accused. In doing so, the truth-seeking function of the trial is frustrated and the public is deprived of the opportunity to see justice done on the merits. In many cases, alleged victims of crime are deprived of their day in court.

[31] Nonetheless, this Court has recognized that there are rare occasions —the “clearest of cases” — when a stay of proceedings for an abuse of process will be warranted (R. v. O’Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, at para. 68). These cases generally fall into two categories: (1) where state conduct compromises the fairness of an accused’s trial (the “main” category); and (2) where state conduct creates no threat to trial fairness but risks undermining the integrity of the judicial process (the “residual” category) (O’Connor, at para. 73). The impugned conduct in this case does not implicate the main category. Rather, it falls squarely within the latter category.

[32] The test used to determine whether a stay of proceedings is warranted is the same for both categories and consists of three requirements:

- (1) There must be prejudice to the accused's right to a fair trial or the integrity of the justice system that "will be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated through the conduct of the trial, or by its outcome" (Regan, at para. 54);
- (2) There must be no alternative remedy capable of redressing the prejudice; and
- (3) Where there is still uncertainty over whether a stay is warranted after steps (1) and (2), the court is required to balance the interests in favour of granting a stay, such as denouncing misconduct and preserving the integrity of the justice system, against "the interest that society has in having a final decision on the merits" (ibid., at para. 57).

[33] The test is the same for both categories because concerns regarding trial fairness and the integrity of the justice system are often linked and regularly arise in the same case. Having one test for both categories creates a coherent framework that avoids "schizophrenia" in the law (O'Connor, at para. 71). But while the framework is the same for both categories, the test may — and often will — play out differently depending on whether the "main" or "residual" category is invoked.

[34] Commencing with the first stage of the test, when the main category is invoked, the question is whether the accused's right to a fair trial has been prejudiced and whether that prejudice will be carried forward through the conduct of the trial; in other words, the concern is whether there is ongoing unfairness to the accused.

[35] By contrast, when the residual category is invoked, the question is whether the state has engaged in conduct that is offensive to societal notions of fair play and decency and whether proceeding with a trial in the face of that conduct would be harmful to the integrity of the justice system. To put it in simpler terms, there are limits on the type of conduct society will tolerate in the prosecution of offences. At times, state conduct will be so troublesome that having a trial — even a fair one — will leave the impression that the justice system condones conduct that offends society’s sense of fair play and decency. This harms the integrity of the justice system. In these kinds of cases, the first stage of the test is met.

[36] In Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Tobias, 1997 CanLII 322 \(SCC\), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 391, this Court described the residual category in the following way:

For a stay of proceedings to be appropriate in a case falling into the residual category, it must appear that the state misconduct is likely to continue in the future or that the carrying forward of the prosecution will offend society’s sense of justice. Ordinarily, the latter condition will not be met unless the former is as well — society will not take umbrage at the carrying forward of a prosecution unless it is likely that some form of misconduct will continue. There may be exceptional cases in which the past misconduct is so egregious that the mere fact of going forward in the light of it will be offensive. But such cases should be relatively very rare. [para. 91]

[37] Two points of interest arise from this description. First, while it is generally true that the residual category will be invoked as a result of state misconduct, this will not always be so. Circumstances may arise where the integrity of the justice system is implicated in the absence of misconduct. Repeatedly prosecuting an accused for the same offence after successive juries have been unable to reach a verdict stands as an example (see, e.g., R. v. Keyowski, 1988 CanLII 74 \(SCC\), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 657), as does using the criminal courts to collect a civil debt (see, e.g., R. v. Waugh (1985), 1985 CanLII 3557 \(NS CA\), 68 N.S.R. (2d) 247 (S.C., App. Div.)).

[38] Second, in a residual category case, regardless of the type of conduct complained of, the question to be answered at the first stage of the test is the same: whether proceeding in light of the impugned conduct would do further harm to the integrity of the justice system. While I do not question the distinction between ongoing and past misconduct, it does not completely resolve the question of whether carrying on with a trial occasions further harm to the justice system. The court must still consider whether proceeding would lend judicial condonation to the impugned conduct.

[39] At the second stage of the test, the question is whether any other remedy short of a stay is capable of redressing the prejudice. Different remedies may apply depending on whether the prejudice relates to the accused's right to a fair trial (the main category) or whether it relates to the integrity of the justice system (the residual category). Where the concern is trial fairness, the focus is on restoring an accused's right to a fair trial. Here, procedural remedies, such as ordering a new trial, are more likely to address the prejudice of ongoing unfairness. Where the residual category is invoked, however, and the prejudice complained of is prejudice to the integrity of the justice system, remedies must be directed towards that harm. It must be remembered that for those cases which fall solely within the residual category, the goal is not to provide redress to an accused for a wrong that has been done to him or her in the past. Instead, the focus is on whether an alternate remedy short of a stay of proceedings will adequately dissociate the justice system from the impugned state conduct going forward.

[40] Finally, the balancing of interests that occurs at the third stage of the test takes on added significance when the residual category is invoked. This Court has stated that the balancing need only be undertaken where there is still uncertainty as to whether a stay is appropriate after the first two parts of the test have been completed (Tobiass, at para. 92). When the main category is invoked, it will often be clear by the time the balancing stage has been reached that trial fairness has not been prejudiced or, if it has, that another remedy short of a stay is available to address the concern. In those cases, no balancing is required. In rare cases, it will be evident that state conduct has permanently prevented a fair trial from taking place. In these "clearest of cases", the third and final balancing step will often add little to the inquiry, as society has no interest in unfair trials.

[41] However, when the residual category is invoked, the balancing stage takes on added importance. Where prejudice to the integrity of the justice system is alleged, the court is asked to decide which of two options better protects the integrity of the system: staying the proceedings, or having a trial despite the impugned conduct. This inquiry necessarily demands balancing. The court must consider such things as the nature and seriousness of the impugned conduct, whether the conduct is isolated or reflects a systemic and ongoing problem, the circumstances of the accused, the charges he or she faces, and the interests of society in having the charges disposed of on the merits.^[5] Clearly, the more egregious the state conduct, the greater the need for the court to dissociate itself from it. When the conduct in question shocks the community's conscience and/or offends its sense of fair play and decency, it becomes less likely that society's interest in a full trial on the merits will prevail in the balancing process. But in residual category cases, balance must always be considered.

[42] This Court's recent decision in R. v. Bellusci, 2012 SCC 44, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 509, attests to the need for balancing when the conduct in question falls solely within the residual category. In Bellusci, the accused was assaulted in the back of a van by a prison guard while he was shackled and handcuffed. The accused was charged with assaulting the guard and intimidating a justice system participant. Fish J., writing for a unanimous Court, upheld the trial judge's decision to issue a stay of proceedings for state misconduct falling in the residual category. In doing so, he noted that the trial judge had appreciated the need to balance the competing interests at play in contemplating a stay of proceedings. He expressly took into account the difficult position of prison guards, the importance to the justice system of ensuring their protection, the seriousness of the charges against the accused, the integrity of the justice system, and the nature and gravity of the violation of Mr. Bellusci's rights. Only then did he conclude that a stay was warranted. [Emphasis added; para. 29.]

[43] The Ontario Court of Appeal has also recently emphasized the importance of the balancing stage when the residual category is in issue:

In some sense, an accused who is granted a stay under the residual category realizes a windfall. Thus, it is important to consider if the price of the stay of a charge against a particular accused is worth the gain. Does the advantage of staying the charges against this accused outweigh the interest in having the case decided on the merits? In answering that question, a court will almost inevitably have to engage in the type of balancing exercise that is referred to in the third criterion. [Emphasis added.]

(R. v. Zarinchang, 2010 ONCA 286, 99 O.R. (3d) 721, at para. 60)

[44] Undoubtedly, the balancing of societal interests that must take place and the “clearest of cases” threshold presents an accused who seeks a stay under the residual category with an onerous burden. Indeed, in the residual category, cases warranting a stay of proceedings will be “exceptional” and “very rare” (Tobiass, at para. 91). But this is as it should be. It is only where the “affront to fair play and decency is disproportionate to the societal interest in the effective prosecution of criminal cases” that a stay of proceedings will be warranted (R. v. Conway, 1989 CanLII 66 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659, at p. 1667).

[45] To recapitulate, while the framework is the same for both categories, the test may — and often will — play out differently depending on whether the “main” or “residual” category is invoked.

[46] The following hypothetical may serve as a useful illustration. Take a case where it is discovered, after trial, that the police have tampered with the jury in order to secure the conviction of an accused. Manifestly, the police conduct would impinge on the accused’s right to a fair trial — but it would also impinge on the integrity of the justice system.

[47] Ordering a new trial would probably redress the unfairness of the original trial. But the inquiry would not end there. The court would also have to decide whether ordering a new trial, or some other remedy, would suffice to dissociate it from the prejudice occasioned to the integrity of the justice system by the police misconduct. If no remedy would suffice, the court would have to engage in the balancing process and determine whether the integrity of the justice system would be better served by a stay of proceedings or a full trial on the merits. Given the seriousness of the misconduct — jury tampering strikes at the very heart of the criminal justice system — the residual category might well necessitate a stay of proceedings to redress the threat to the integrity of the justice system, even though the unfairness that marred the first trial could be cured by a second trial.

B. Whether a Stay of Proceedings Was Warranted in the Instant Case

[48] The standard of review for a remedy ordered under s. 24(1) of the Charter is well established. Appellate intervention is warranted only where a trial judge misdirects him or herself in law, commits a reviewable error of fact, or renders a decision that is “so clearly wrong as to amount to an injustice” (Bellusci, at para. 19; Regan, at para. 117; Tobiass, at para. 87; R. v. Bjelland, 2009 SCC 38, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 651, at paras. 15 and 51).

[49] In the instant case, the appellants acknowledge that trial fairness is not in issue. They accept that the trial judge viewed the misconduct as coming within the residual category. Approaching the matter from that perspective, I am respectfully of the view that the trial judge erred in assessing all three forms of alleged state misconduct.

(1) The Medical Records

[50] In order for the Crown’s conduct in securing Mr. Piccirilli’s medical records to factor into a decision to stay proceedings, it must pass the first stage of the test. That is, the appellants must show that Ms. Kovacevich’s conduct was prejudicial to the integrity of the justice system. The trial judge appears to have found that this requirement was met when, after considering her conduct, he held that [TRANSLATION] “[t]his conduct will be taken into consideration in reviewing the abuse of process motion” (para. 57).

[51] The trial judge committed a palpable and overriding error in reaching the conclusion that this conduct impinged on the integrity of the justice system. In the first place, he erred in concluding that the Crown’s conduct was marked by a lack of transparency because the Crown had [TRANSLATION] “always refused to disclose the source of the information” (para. 56). In fact, the Crown disclosed the source of the information within a matter of days. In addition, the trial judge failed to consider that Mr. Piccirilli had put his health in issue in his application for interim release and had undertaken to provide the court with his medical records. The trial judge also failed to consider that Ms. Kovacevich had asked the medical staff at the jail to provide an affidavit explaining the medical care Mr. Piccirilli had received since his heart attack. It appears that Mr. Piccirilli’s doctor took it upon himself to forward the appellant’s medical records to the Crown.

[52] In my view, when the Crown's conduct is considered free of the trial judge's errors, it is clear that it occasioned no prejudice to the integrity of the justice system. Mr. Piccirilli had put the state of his health in issue. Ms. Kovacevich sought an affidavit from the jail Mr. Piccirilli was being held in. When she received more than she asked for — Mr. Piccirilli's confidential medical records — she immediately disclosed the information to Mr. Piccirilli's counsel. Within a matter of days, she also disclosed the source of the information.^[6] Accordingly, the appellants' argument fails at the first stage of the test.

(2) The Police Collusion

[53] The Court of Appeal disagreed with the trial judge's finding that Constables Brière and Sénéchal colluded to mislead the court. I too have serious reservations with the trial judge's finding. Indeed, had I been the trial judge, I doubt that I would have reached the same conclusion. However, having seen the witnesses, the trial judge was in a better position to assess the matter. Accordingly, his finding is entitled to deference.

[54] That said, at the first stage of the test, the officers' conduct must be looked at in context. Cst. Brière changed his testimony on a central issue: whether he or Mr. Babos opened the trunk of the car. He did so, however, after having testified at the preliminary inquiry. As an officer, he surely knew that this change would be the subject of questioning by defence counsel. Changes in an officer's testimony are routinely exposed in cross-examination. And when Cst. Brière was predictably questioned about why his story had changed, he immediately explained that he had spoken with Cst. Sénéchal and had been [TRANSLATION] "convinced" of the true version of events. There was no attempt by the officers to cover up their discussions or to hide anything from the court. To the extent this amounts to collusion, it does so in the most technical sense. Whatever threat it poses to the integrity of the justice system must surely be slight.

[55] However, given the trial judge's finding, it is necessary to proceed to the second stage of the test and ask whether there is another remedy, short of a stay, capable of redressing the prejudice to the integrity of the judicial system occasioned by the collusion.

[56] Two concerns to the integrity of the justice system arise out of the trial judge's finding of collusion: (1) the impropriety of police collusion designed to mislead the court, and (2) the Crown's attempt to introduce the firearm against Mr. Piccirilli in the wake of the trial judge's finding of collusion. Manifestly, both are improper. But there was another remedy before the trial judge that would have addressed both, namely: refusing to admit the firearm against Mr. Piccirilli even though he had no standing under s. 8 of the Charter to challenge its admissibility. The trial judge erred in failing to consider that alternative.

[57] Excluding the firearm against Mr. Piccirilli would serve to dissociate the court from the officers' collusion and the Crown's misguided attempt, in the face of that finding, to introduce the firearm against Mr. Piccirilli. Both forms of misconduct were intended to achieve the same end — admission of the firearm into evidence. Excluding the firearm against Mr. Piccirilli — even though it was likely admissible against him — purges the problematic evidence from the trial, thereby dissociating the court from the misconduct in question. By doing so, it cannot be said that the misconduct has a lingering effect on the integrity of the justice system. In my view, this remedy fully addresses any prejudice occasioned to the justice system by the impugned conduct. Hence, there is no need to go further in the analysis.

(3) The Crown's Threatening Conduct

[58] In the end, I view this case as turning on the Crown's threatening conduct.

[59] The distinction between the Crown's conduct in this case and legitimate plea bargaining practices should be made clear at the outset. It is perfectly proper for the Crown to indicate that it will drop certain charges, grounded in the evidence, if the accused pleads guilty. It is also proper for a Crown to advise counsel that if evidence arises at the preliminary inquiry that would support additional charges, they may be added to the indictment under s. 574(1)(b) of the Criminal Code.^[7] Where discussions of this sort occur with counsel after substantial disclosure has been provided, the accused and his or her lawyer are able to make an informed decision as to how to proceed and nothing improper has occurred.

[60] The Crown's conduct in this case was of a different nature. The impugned comments were made early on in the proceedings, before the appellants and their counsel had sufficient disclosure to make an informed decision as to how they wished to proceed. Moreover, in at least one instance, the comments occurred in the presence of one of the appellants, Mr. Piccirilli. And the Crown's language was nothing short of threatening. Mr. Piccirilli was told, for example, that if he did not settle, he was going to be [TRANSLATION] "hit by a train". Put simply, the Crown's threats were intended to pressure the appellants into foregoing their right to a trial.

[61] Without question, the bullying tactic to which Ms. Tremblay resorted was reprehensible and unworthy of the dignity of her office. It should not be repeated by her or any other Crown. In her capacity as a Crown, Ms. Tremblay's role was that of a quasi-judicial officer. Her function was to be "assistant to the Court in the furtherance of justice, and not to act as counsel for any particular person or party" (Boucher v. The Queen, 1954 CanLII 3 \(SCC\), [1955] S.C.R. 16, at p. 25). In threatening to charge Mr. Piccirilli with more offences if he did not plead guilty, Ms. Tremblay betrayed her role as a Crown. Manifestly it is the type of conduct the court should dissociate itself from.

[62] However, the threats must be considered in their context. With respect, the trial judge did not do so. Here, there were several factors which the trial judge failed to consider. With respect, he erred in this regard.

[63] The threats were made more than a year before the trial began. The 18-month long silence of the appellants and their counsel sheds some light on how seriously they took the threats. Had they been taken seriously, one might have expected counsel to respond immediately. Surely the proper course of action was not to sit back for over a year before applying, mid-trial, for a stay of proceedings. Instead, counsel should have confronted Ms. Tremblay and, failing an adequate response by her, brought the matter immediately to the attention of a senior Crown or a judge. That way, Ms. Tremblay could have been removed from the file during the early stages of the proceedings. Be that as it may, as it turned out, she was removed from the case months before the trial started — and it was not until six months after the trial was underway that the threats first came to light.

[64] As indicated, context is essential in considering the seriousness of the threatening conduct. By the time the misconduct came to light, Ms. Tremblay had long since been removed from the case and no longer played any part in it. The trial judge acknowledged this fact but did not consider it to be an attenuating factor because the Crown’s office had taken no steps [TRANSLATION] “to remedy or even try to remedy the situation” once the threats were revealed and had instead “remained entrenched in its position” (para. 66). With respect, this observation does not accurately reflect the facts. At the point when the threats first came to light, they were unproven and Ms. Tremblay’s health did not allow her to testify.^[8] The Crown’s office did not condone Ms. Tremblay’s actions, but simply left it to the appellants to prove the threats. Surely the Crown’s office cannot be faulted for taking that approach, especially in the absence of any evidence suggesting that Ms. Tremblay’s conduct was systemic.

[65] Moreover, the trial judge did not consider the passage of time between when the threats were made and when they were first brought to light. He made no mention of this in his reasons. In this regard, while I agree in general with Justice Abella that the passage of time itself cannot “retroactively cure intolerable state conduct” (para. 82), its significance here is that it serves as a yardstick against which to measure just how serious Ms. Tremblay’s conduct was perceived by the defence. The fact that defence counsel took no steps for over a year to raise concerns — and then, almost by accident in the context of a s. 11(b) delay motion — sheds important light on this subject. The trial judge erred in failing to take this into account.

[66] Manifestly, Ms. Tremblay’s misconduct was serious enough to warrant proceeding to the second stage of the test. That said, in my respectful view, when the mitigating factors which the trial judge failed to consider are taken into account, the trial judge’s conclusion that the threats amounted to [TRANSLATION] “an abuse of the worst kind” is simply not borne out (para. 78).

[67] Turning to the second stage of the test, as no argument was made that there was an alternate remedy capable of redressing the particular harm caused to the integrity of the justice system by the threats, I need not finally decide whether such a remedy was available. Instead, I turn to the third stage of the test, namely, whether Ms. Tremblay's conduct was sufficiently egregious to warrant a stay of proceedings.

[68] The answer lies in the balancing process — an exercise which the trial judge did not undertake. The question at this stage is whether the integrity of the justice system is better preserved by staying the proceedings, or proceeding to a trial in the face of the Crown's threatening conduct.

[69] This balancing requires weighing the seriousness of the misconduct against the societal interest in having a trial. At this stage, the very serious nature of the charges facing the appellants — 22 charges concerning firearms, illegal drugs, and organized crime — looms large. Society has a profound interest in seeing justice done by having the guilt or innocence of the appellants determined through a full trial on the merits. When the impugned misconduct — threats uttered more than a year before trial by a Crown no longer on the case — is weighed against society's interest in a trial, I am satisfied that this is not one of the "clearest of cases" where the exceptional remedy of a stay of proceedings is warranted.

[70] The appellants contend that this case is analogous to United States of America v. Cobb, 2001 SCC 19, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 587, a case in which this Court upheld a stay of proceedings. In Cobb, the accused were facing extradition proceedings from Canada to the United States. They were granted a stay after the American prosecutor on the file hinted to the media that uncooperative fugitives would be subjected to rape in prison, and the judge presiding over their trial in the United States commented that uncooperative defendants would get the maximum jail sentence legally available.

[71] This case is a far cry from Cobb. In Cobb, the American prosecutor had threatened the accused with sexual violence. Here, the Crown threatened to charge the accused with additional offences if they did not plead guilty. While that was improper, the threats related to something she could have done legally under s. 574(1)(b) of the Criminal Code. Moreover, the decision to stay the proceedings in Cobb was motivated in large part by the fact that the prosecutor who made the threats remained in charge of the prosecutions. This Court noted that extraditing the accused would return them to an “ominous climate” in which the American prosecutor and judge would play a “large, if not decisive role” in determining their “ultimate fate” (Cobb, at para. 43). Here, Ms. Tremblay was off the case long before trial. In my view, Cobb provides little or no assistance to the appellants.

VI. Conclusion

[72] In deciding that a stay of proceedings is unwarranted in this case, I have assessed the three forms of alleged misconduct individually. The Crown’s conduct in securing Mr. Piccirilli’s medical records occasioned no prejudice to the integrity of the justice system. The harm caused by the finding of police collusion was curable through an alternate remedy: excluding the firearm from evidence against both appellants. And the Crown’s threatening conduct, while reprehensible, did not approximate the type of shocking conduct needed to justify a stay.

[73] This case lent itself to an individualistic approach. The three alleged instances of misconduct were separate and distinct, committed at different times by different players. There was no link between them. And in only one instance — the Crown’s threatening behaviour — was it necessary to consider the third stage of the test and balance the Crown’s misconduct against society’s interest in a trial on the merits. That said, I should not be taken as suggesting that an individualistic approach should always be followed. Indeed, a judge who is required to balance several instances of misconduct against the societal interest in a trial will almost certainly wish to consider the conduct cumulatively and in its full context. As well, there may be cases where the nature and number of incidents, though individually unworthy of a stay, will require one when considered together. But this is not such a case.

[74] For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeals.

The following are the reasons delivered by

[75] ABELLA J. (dissenting) — A stay should only be imposed in the clearest of cases, as Justice Moldaver points out, since it has the effect of precluding proceedings which determine the merits of a case, something to which the public — and the parties — are entitled. But the public is also entitled to have confidence in the integrity of the justice system. A Crown who makes threats intended to bully an accused into foregoing his or her right to a trial, takes fatal aim at the heart of the public’s confidence in that integrity.

Analysis

[76] A stay may be justified for an abuse of process under the residual category when the state’s conduct “contravenes fundamental notions of justice and thus undermines the integrity of the judicial process” (R. v. O’Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 \(SCC\), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, at para. 73). A stay may be justified, in exceptional circumstances, when the conduct “is so egregious that the mere fact of going forward [with the trial] in the light of it [would] be offensive” (Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Tobiass, 1997 CanLII 322 \(SCC\), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 391, at para. 91).

[77] There are two public interests at play: “the affront to fair play and decency” and “the effective prosecution of criminal cases”. Where the affront is “disproportionate”, the administration of justice is “best served by staying the proceedings” (R. v. Conway, 1989 CanLII 66 \(SCC\), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659, at p. 1667).

[78] In other words, when the conduct is so profoundly and demonstrably inconsistent with the public perception of what a fair justice system requires, proceeding with a trial means condoning unforgivable conduct.

[79] The Crown who is the focus of this appeal threatened one of the co-accused, Sergio Piccirilli, on three separate occasions. The threats were made twice to Mr. Piccirilli personally and once to his lawyer. All were to the effect that if Mr. Piccirilli did not plead guilty, he would be charged with additional, serious offences. By the time the trial started several months after the last threat, the Crown was on medical leave and a new Crown was assigned to the case. New charges were in fact brought.

[80] The trial judge concluded that the Crown's conduct was in "bad faith", "unacceptable", "intolerable", "unjustifiable", and was one of the "exceptional and rare cases" that justified a stay.

[81] The Court of Appeal agreed that the threats were "unacceptable" and "outrageous", but found that the trial judge erred in imposing a stay because he did not undertake a sufficient balancing or sufficiently consider the context. That context included the fact that the threats were made more than a year before the trial began, that counsel did not react immediately, and that the Crown was replaced for health reasons months before the trial started. In other words, the impact of the threats was mitigated by the passage of time and the change in personnel.

[82] With great respect, however, the passage of time does not operate to attenuate what was unpardonable conduct. Time is not a legal remedy for a fundamental breach of the Crown's role, and cannot retroactively cure intolerable state conduct. The reason, therefore, that the trial judge did not mention the passage of time in assessing the impact of the threats on the public's confidence in a fair justice system, is that it was not relevant. It was the fact that the threats were made at all that was key, not when they were made (United States of America v. Shulman, 2001 SCC 21 (CanLII), [2001] 1 S.C.R. 616).

[83] Moreover, I am not persuaded that a balancing exercise was required here. The trial judge was unequivocal in concluding that the abuse justified a stay. There was none of the uncertainty as to the propriety of a stay that this Court said was a condition precedent to the need for a balancing exercise (Tobiass, at para. 92; R. v. Regan, 2002 SCC 12 (CanLII), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 297, at para. 57).

[84] But in any event, it is not at all clear to me how one goes about such a balancing. When a trial judge has concluded that conduct is “so egregious that the mere fact of going forward in the light of it will be offensive” (Tobiass, at para. 91), against what does one balance that singularly egregious state conduct? When a trial judge has found that the conduct cannot be condoned because it is such an exceptional assault on the public’s sense of justice, it seems to me to be conceptually inconsistent to nonetheless ask the court to undermine its own conclusion by reweighing the half of the scale that contains the public’s interest in trials on the merits. It is one thing to require that trial judges look at the “competing interests at play” (R. v. Bellusci, 2012 SCC 44 (CanLII), [2012] 2 S.C.R. 509, at para. 29) before concluding that the state conduct could not be condoned, but how, having concluded that it could not be condoned, can such conduct be subjected to yet another balancing of factors to determine whether it is nonetheless pardonable?

[85] Of course the public has an interest in trials on the merits, but it has an even greater interest in knowing that when the state is involved in proceedings, particularly those that can result in an individual’s loss of liberty, it will put fairness above expedience. Justice is not only about results, it is about how those results are obtained. When a Crown threatens an accused with additional offences if he or she does not plead guilty, the public’s interest in the results of a trial must yield to the transcendent interest in protecting the public’s confidence in the integrity of the justice system.

[86] In Bellusci, this Court cautioned appellate courts to exercise restraint with respect to the findings of the trial judge, intervening only if the trial judge “misdirects himself or if his decision is so clearly wrong as to amount to an injustice” (para. 17; see also Regan, at para. 117; Tobiass, at para. 87). There was no such misdirection or injustice here. On the contrary, the trial judge concluded that a stay was justified in order to prevent an injustice to the justice system itself. I agree.

[87] I would allow the appeals.

Solicitors for the appellant Antal Babos: Étude Légale Franco Schiro, Montréal.

Solicitors for the appellant Sergio Piccirilli: Pilon & Associés, Montréal.

Solicitor for the respondent: Public Prosecution Service of Canada, Montréal and Ottawa.

[1] “577” is a reference to s. 577 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, which empowers a Crown to prefer a “direct indictment”, bypassing an accused’s right to a preliminary inquiry.

[2] At the preliminary inquiry, Cst. Brière testified that he had opened the trunk of the car.

[3] Cst. Brière testified that Mr. Babos opened the trunk most of the way, and that he opened the trunk [TRANSLATION] “a little bit” (A.R., vol. III, at p. 217).

[4] As matters turned out, the trial judge never did make a final ruling on the admissibility of the firearm against Mr. Piccirilli. Instead, he ended up staying the proceedings against Mr. Piccirilli and in doing so, he took into account the Crown’s attempt to introduce the firearm against him despite his earlier finding of collusion on the part of the officers.

[5] At this stage, whether the impugned conduct is a systemic and ongoing problem or lies purely in the past may also become relevant. Where the conduct is ongoing and systemic, it may be more difficult for the court to dissociate itself from it with anything less than a stay.

[6] Admittedly, the Crown’s initial refusal to disclose the source of the information was bizarre, but this refusal was short-lived.

[7] Section 574(1)(b) of the Criminal Code allows the Crown to lay additional charges, supported by the evidence that has been adduced at the preliminary inquiry.

[8] Fresh evidence was tendered before this Court in which Ms. Tremblay denies ever having made the threats in question. Given the disposition of the appeal, this evidence is irrelevant and there is no need to consider the Crown’s motion to adduce it.

Tab 4

Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 817

Source:	Supreme Court of Canada
Date:	1999-07-09
File number:	25823
Other citations:	174 DLR (4th) 193 — 243 NR 22 — 89 ACWS (3d) 777 — AZ-99111041 — 14 Admin LR (3d) 173 — 1 Imm LR (3d) 1 — [1999] CarswellNat 1124 — EYB 1999-13279 — JE 99-1412 — [1999] FCJ No 39 (QL) — [1999] SCJ No 39 (QL) — [1999] ACS no 39
Citation:	Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 817, < https://canlii.ca/t/1fqjk >, retrieved on 2026-03-20
Most recent unfavourable mention	Saeedy v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration) , 2025 FC 354 (CanLII) [...] [23] Given that the Applicant was self represented, many of the issues he discussed related to procedural fairness despite not using the term. Baker outlines several factors that are relevant in determining the content of the duty of fairness, including the nature of the decision, the statutory scheme, the importance of the [...]

Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817

Mavis Baker

Appellant

and

The Canadian Council of Churches, the Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law, the Defence for Children International-Canada,
the Canadian Council for Refugees, and the Charter Committee on Poverty Issues

Interveners

Indexed as: Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration)

File No.: 25823.

1998: November 4; 1999: July 9.

Present: L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci, Bastarache and Binnie JJ.

on appeal from the federal court of appeal

Immigration -- Humanitarian and compassionate considerations -- Children's interests -- Woman with Canadian-born dependent children ordered deported -- Written application made on humanitarian and compassionate grounds for exemption to requirement that application for immigration be made abroad -- Application denied without hearing or formal reasons -- Whether procedural fairness violated -- Immigration Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. I-2, ss. 82.1(1), 114(2) -- Immigration Regulations, 1978, SOR/93-44, s. 2.1 -- Convention on the Rights of the Child, Can. T.S. 1992 No. 3, Arts. 3, 9, 12.

Administrative law -- Procedural fairness -- Woman with Canadian-born dependent children ordered deported -- Written application made on humanitarian and compassionate grounds for exemption to requirement that application for immigration be made abroad -- Whether participatory rights accorded consistent with duty of procedural fairness -- Whether failure to provide reasons violated principles of procedural fairness -- Whether reasonable apprehension of bias.

Courts -- Appellate review -- Judge on judicial review certifying question for consideration of Court of Appeal -- Legal effect of certified question -- Immigration Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. I-2, s. 83(1).

Immigration -- Humanitarian and compassionate considerations -- Standard of review of humanitarian and compassionate decision -- Best interests of claimant's children -- Approach to be taken in reviewing humanitarian and compassionate decision where children affected.

Administrative law -- Review of discretion -- Approach to review of discretionary decision making.

The appellant, a woman with Canadian-born dependent children, was ordered deported. She then applied for an exemption, based on humanitarian and compassionate considerations under s. 114(2) of the Immigration Act, from the requirement that an application for permanent residence be made from outside Canada. This application was supported by letters indicating concern about the availability of medical treatment in her country of origin and the effect of her possible departure on her Canadian-born children. A senior immigration officer replied by letter stating that there were insufficient humanitarian and compassionate reasons to warrant processing the application in Canada. This letter contained no reasons for the decision. Counsel for the appellant, however, requested and was provided with the notes made by the investigating immigration officer and used by the senior officer in making his decision. The Federal Court -- Trial Division, dismissed an application for judicial review but certified the following question pursuant to s. 83(1) of the Act: "Given that the Immigration Act does not expressly incorporate the language of Canada's international obligations with respect to the International Convention on the Rights of the Child, must federal immigration authorities treat the best interests of the Canadian child as a primary consideration in assessing an applicant under s. 114(2) of the Immigration Act?” The Court of Appeal limited its consideration to the question and found that the best interests of the children did not need to be given primacy in assessing such an application. The order that the appellant be removed from Canada, which was made after the immigration officer’s decision, was stayed pending the result of this appeal.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

Per L’Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, McLachlin, Bastarache and Binnie JJ.: Section 83(1) of the Immigration Act does not require the Court of Appeal to address only the certified question. Once a question has been certified, the Court of Appeal may consider all aspects of the appeal lying within its jurisdiction.

The duty of procedural fairness is flexible and variable and depends on an appreciation of the context of the particular statute and the rights affected. The purpose of the participatory rights contained within it is to ensure that administrative decisions are made using a fair and open procedure, appropriate to the decision being made and its statutory, institutional and social context, with an opportunity for those affected to put forward their views and evidence fully and have them considered by the decision-maker. Several factors are relevant to determining the content of the duty of fairness: (1) the nature of the decision being made and process followed in making it; (2) the nature of the statutory scheme and the terms of the statute pursuant to which the body operates; (3) the importance of the decision to the individual or individuals affected; (4) the legitimate expectations of the person challenging the decision; (5) the choices of procedure made by the agency itself. This list is not exhaustive.

A duty of procedural fairness applies to humanitarian and compassionate decisions. In this case, there was no legitimate expectation affecting the content of the duty of procedural fairness. Taking into account the other factors, although some suggest stricter requirements under the duty of fairness, others suggest more relaxed requirements further from the judicial model.

The duty of fairness owed in these circumstances is more than minimal, and the claimant and others whose important interests are affected by the decision in a fundamental way must have a meaningful opportunity to present the various types of evidence relevant to their case and have it fully and fairly considered. Nevertheless, taking all the factors into account, the lack of an oral hearing or notice of such a hearing did not constitute a violation of the requirement of procedural fairness. The opportunity to produce full and complete written documentation was sufficient.

It is now appropriate to recognize that, in certain circumstances, including when the decision has important significance for the individual, or when there is a statutory right of appeal, the duty of procedural fairness will require a written explanation for a decision. Reasons are required here given the profound importance of this decision to those affected. This requirement was fulfilled by the provision of the junior immigration officer's notes, which are to be taken to be the reasons for decision. Accepting such documentation as sufficient reasons upholds the principle that individuals are entitled to fair procedures and open decision-making, but recognizes that, in the administrative context, this transparency may take place in various ways.

Procedural fairness also requires that decisions be made free from a reasonable apprehension of bias, by an impartial decision-maker. This duty applies to all immigration officers who play a role in the making of decisions. Because they necessarily relate to people of diverse backgrounds, from different cultures, races, and continents, immigration decisions demand sensitivity and understanding by those making them. They require a recognition of diversity, an understanding of others, and an openness to difference. Statements in the immigration officer's notes gave the impression that he may have been drawing conclusions based not on the evidence before him, but on the fact that the appellant was a single mother with several children and had been diagnosed with a psychiatric illness. Here, a reasonable and well-informed member of the community would conclude that the reviewing officer had not approached this case with the impartiality appropriate to a decision made by an immigration officer. The notes therefore give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias.

The concept of discretion refers to decisions where the law does not dictate a specific outcome, or where the decision-maker is given a choice of options within a statutorily imposed set of boundaries. Administrative law has traditionally approached the review of decisions classified as discretionary separately from those seen as involving the interpretation of rules of law. Review of the substantive aspects of discretionary decisions is best approached within the pragmatic and functional framework defined by this Court's decisions, especially given the difficulty in making rigid classifications between discretionary and non-discretionary decisions. Though discretionary decisions will generally be given considerable respect, that discretion must be exercised in accordance with the boundaries imposed in the statute, the principles of the rule of law, the principles of administrative law, the fundamental values of Canadian society, and the principles of the Charter.

In applying the applicable factors to determining the standard of review, considerable deference should be accorded to immigration officers exercising the powers conferred by the legislation, given the fact-specific nature of the inquiry, its role within the statutory scheme as an exception, and the considerable discretion evidenced by the statutory language. Yet the absence of a privative clause, the explicit contemplation of judicial review by the Federal Court -- Trial Division, and the individual rather than polycentric nature of the decision also suggest that the standard should not be as deferential as "patent unreasonableness". The appropriate standard of review is, therefore, reasonableness simpliciter.

The wording of the legislation shows Parliament's intention that the decision be made in a humanitarian and compassionate manner. A reasonable exercise of the power conferred by the section requires close attention to the interests and needs of children since children's rights, and attention to their interests, are central humanitarian and compassionate values in Canadian society. Indications of these values may be found in the purposes of the Act, in international instruments, and in the Minister's guidelines for making humanitarian and compassionate decisions. Because the reasons for this decision did not indicate that it was made in a manner which was alive, attentive, or sensitive to the interests of the appellant's children, and did not consider them as an important factor in making the decision, it was an unreasonable exercise of the power conferred by the legislation. In addition, the reasons for decision failed to give sufficient weight or consideration to the hardship that a return to the appellant's country of origin might cause her.

Per Cory and Iacobucci JJ.: The reasons and disposition of L'Heureux-Dubé J. were agreed with apart from the effect of international law on the exercise of ministerial discretion under s. 114(2) of the Immigration Act. The certified question must be answered in the negative. The principle that an international convention ratified by the executive is of no force or effect within the Canadian legal system until incorporated into domestic law does not survive intact the adoption of a principle of law which permits reference to an unincorporated convention during the process of statutory interpretation.

Cases Cited

By L'Heureux-Dubé J.

Applied: Pushpanathan v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1998 CanLII 778 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 982; Committee for Justice and Liberty v. National Energy Board, 1976 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 369; disapproved: Liyanagamage v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) (1994), 176 N.R. 4; Shah v. Minister of Employment and Immigration (1994), 1994 CanLII 19725 (FCA), 170 N.R. 238; not followed: Tylo v. Minister of Employment and Immigration (1995), 90 F.T.R. 157; Gheorlan v. Canada (Secretary of State) (1995), 1995 CanLII 19485 (FC), 26 Imm. L.R. (2d) 170; Chan v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) (1994), 87 F.T.R. 62; Marques v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) (No. 1) (1995), 116 F.T.R. 241; Northwestern Utilities Ltd. v. City of Edmonton, 1978 CanLII 17 (SCC), [1979] 1 S.C.R. 684; Supermarchés Jean Labrecque Inc. v. Flamand, 1987 CanLII 19 (SCC), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 219; Public Service Board of New South Wales v. Osmond

(1986), 159 C.L.R. 656; Williams v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1997 CanLII 4972 (FCA), [1997] 2 F.C. 646; referred to: Ramoutar v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), 1993 CanLII 2972 (FC), [1993] 3 F.C. 370; Minister of Employment and Immigration v. Jiminez-Perez, 1984 CanLII 127 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 565; Cardinal v. Director of Kent Institution, 1985 CanLII 23 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 643; Sobrie v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) (1987), 1987 CanLII 9887 (FC), 3 Imm. L.R. (2d) 81; Said v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) (1992), 1992 CanLII 14729 (FC), 6 Admin. L.R. (2d) 23; Knight v. Indian Head School Division No. 19, 1990 CanLII 138 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 653; Old St. Boniface Residents Assn. Inc. v. Winnipeg (City), 1990 CanLII 31 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1170; Russell v. Duke of Norfolk, [1949] 1 All E.R. 109; Syndicat des employés de production du Québec et de l'Acadie v. Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission), 1989 CanLII 44 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 879; Kane v. Board of Governors of the University of British Columbia, 1980 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1105; R. v. Higher Education Funding Council, ex parte Institute of Dental Surgery, [1994] 1 All E.R. 651; Reference re Canada Assistance Plan (B.C.), 1991 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 525; Qi v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship & Immigration) (1995), 1995 CanLII 19400 (FC), 33 Imm. L.R. (2d) 57; Mercier-Néron v. Canada (Minister of National Health and Welfare) (1995), 98 F.T.R. 36; Bendahmane v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), 1989 CanLII 9488 (FCA), [1989] 3 F.C. 16; Canada (Attorney General) v. Human Rights Tribunal Panel (Canada) (1994), 1994 CanLII 18483 (FC), 76 F.T.R. 1; IWA v. Consolidated-Bathurst Packaging Ltd., 1990 CanLII 132 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 282; Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3; R. v. Civil Service Appeal Board, ex parte Cunningham, [1991] 4 All E.R. 310; R. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex parte Doody, [1994] 1 A.C. 531; Norton Tool Co. v. Tewson, 1905 CanLII 109 (NWT SC), [1973] 1 W.L.R. 45; Alexander Machinery (Dudley) Ltd. v. Crabtree, [1974] I.C.R. 120; Orlowski v. British Columbia (Attorney-General) (1992), 1992 CanLII 878 (BC CA), 94 D.L.R. (4th) 541; R.D.R. Construction Ltd. v. Rent Review Commission (1982), 1982 CanLII 3265 (NS CA), 55 N.S.R. (2d) 71; Taabaa v. Refugee Status Advisory Committee, 1980 CanLII 4166 (FC), [1980] 2 F.C. 316; Boyle v. Workplace Health, Safety and Compensation Commission (N.B.) (1996), 1996 CanLII 4829 (NB CA), 179 N.B.R. (2d) 43; R. v. S. (R.D.), 1997 CanLII 324 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 484; Newfoundland Telephone Co. v. Newfoundland (Board of Commissioners of Public Utilities), 1992 CanLII 84 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 623; U.E.S., Local 298 v. Bibeault, 1988 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 1048; Canada (Attorney General) v. Mossop, 1993 CanLII 164 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 554; Pezim v. British Columbia (Superintendent of Brokers), 1994 CanLII 103 (SCC), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 557; Canada (Director of Investigation and Research) v. Southam Inc., 1997 CanLII 385 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 748; Maple Lodge Farms Ltd. v. Government of Canada, 1982 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 2; Shell Canada Products Ltd. v. Vancouver (City), 1994 CanLII 115 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 231; Associated Provincial Picture Houses, Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corporation, [1948] 1 K.B. 223; Roncarelli v. Duplessis, 1959 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1959] S.C.R. 121; Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038; R. v. Gladue, 1999 CanLII 679 (SCC), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 688; Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27; Francis v. The Queen, 1956 CanLII 79 (SCC), [1956] S.C.R. 618; Capital Cities Communications Inc. v. Canadian Radio-Television Commission, 1977 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 141; Tavita v. Minister of Immigration, [1994] 2 N.Z.L.R. 257; Vishaka v. Rajasthan, [1997] 3 L.R.C. 361; R. v. Keegstra, 1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697; Young v. Young, 1993 CanLII 34 (SCC), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 3.

By Iacobucci J.

Applied: Capital Cities Communications Inc. v. Canadian Radio-Television Commission, 1977 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 141; referred to: Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Convention on the Rights of the Child, Can. T.S. 1992 No. 3, preamble, Arts. 3(1), (2), 9, 12.

Declaration of the Rights of the Child (1959), preamble.

Immigration Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. I-2, ss. 3(c), 9(1), 82.1(1) [rep. & sub. 1992, c. 49, s. 73], 83(1) [idem], 114(2) [ibid., s. 102].

Authors Cited

- Brown, Donald J. M., and John M. Evans. Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada. Toronto: Canvasback, 1998 (loose-leaf).
- Canada. Employment and Immigration Canada. Immigration Manual: Examination and Enforcement. Ottawa: Employment and Immigration Canada, 1983 (loose-leaf updated 1991, release 2).
- Davis, Kenneth Culp. Discretionary Justice: A Preliminary Inquiry. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1969.
- de Smith, Stanley A. Judicial Review of Administrative Action, 5th ed. By Lord Woolf and Jeffrey Jowell. London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1995.
- Dyzenhaus, David. "The Politics of Deference: Judicial Review and Democracy", in Michael Taggart, ed., The Province of Administrative Law. Oxford: Hart Publishing, 1997, 279.
- Macdonald, Roderick A., and David Lametti. "Reasons for Decision in Administrative Law" (1990), 3 C.J.A.L.P. 123.
- Morris, Michael H. "Administrative Decision-makers and the Duty to Give Reasons: An Emerging Debate" (1997), 11 C.J.A.L.P. 155.
- Mullan, David J. Administrative Law, 3rd ed. Scarborough, Ont.: Carswell, 1996.
- Shapiro, Debra. "Legitimate Expectation and its Application to Canadian Immigration Law" (1992), 8 J.L. & Social Pol'y 282.
- Sullivan, Ruth. Driedger on the Construction of Statutes, 3rd ed. Toronto: Butterworths, 1994.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal, 1996 CanLII 3884 \(FCA\), [1997] 2 F.C. 127, 207 N.R. 57, 142 D.L.R. (4th) 554, [1996] F.C.J. No. 1726 (QL), dismissing an appeal from a judgment of Simpson J. (1995), 1995 CanLII 19414 \(FC\), 101 F.T.R. 110, 31 Imm. L.R. (2d) 150, [1995] F.C.J. No. 1441 (QL), dismissing an application for judicial review. Appeal allowed.

Roger Rowe and Rocco Galati, for the appellant.

Urszula Kaczmarczyk and Cheryl D. Mitchell, for the respondent.

Sheena Scott and Sharryn Aiken, for the interveners the Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law, the Defence for Children International-Canada, and the Canadian Council for Refugees.

John Terry and Craig Scott, for the intervener the Charter Committee on Poverty Issues.

Barbara Jackman and Marie Chen, for the intervener the Canadian Council of Churches.

The judgment of L’Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, McLachlin, Bastarache and Binnie JJ. was delivered by 1 L’HEUREUX-DUBÉ J. -- Regulations made pursuant to s. 114(2) of the Immigration Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. I-2, empower the respondent Minister to facilitate the admission to Canada of a person where the Minister is satisfied, owing to humanitarian and compassionate considerations, that admission should be facilitated or an exemption from the regulations made under the Act should be granted. At the centre of this appeal is the approach to be taken by a court to judicial review of such decisions, both on procedural and substantive grounds. It also raises issues of reasonable apprehension of bias, the provision of written reasons as part of the duty of fairness, and the role of children’s interests in reviewing decisions made pursuant to s. 114(2).

I. Factual Background

2 Mavis Baker is a citizen of Jamaica who entered Canada as a visitor in August of 1981 and has remained in Canada since then. She never received permanent resident status, but supported herself illegally as a live-in domestic worker for 11 years. She has had four children

(who are all Canadian citizens) while living in Canada: Paul Brown, born in 1985, twins Patricia and Peter Robinson, born in 1989, and Desmond Robinson, born in 1992. After Desmond was born, Ms. Baker suffered from post-partum psychosis and was diagnosed with paranoid schizophrenia. She applied for welfare at that time. When she was first diagnosed with mental illness, two of her children were placed in the care of their natural father, and the other two were placed in foster care. The two who were in foster care are now again under her care, since her condition has improved.

3 The appellant was ordered deported in December 1992, after it was determined that she had worked illegally in Canada and had overstayed her visitor's visa. In 1993, Ms. Baker applied for an exemption from the requirement to apply for permanent residence outside Canada, based upon humanitarian and compassionate considerations, pursuant to s. 114(2) of the Immigration Act. She had the assistance of counsel in filing this application, and included, among other documentation, submissions from her lawyer, a letter from her doctor, and a letter from a social worker with the Children's Aid Society. The documentation provided indicated that, although she was still experiencing psychiatric problems, she was making progress. It also stated that she might become ill again if she were forced to return to Jamaica, since treatment might not be available for her there. Ms. Baker's submissions also clearly indicated that she was the sole caregiver for two of her Canadian-born children, and that the other two depended on her for emotional support and were in regular contact with her. The documentation suggested that she too would suffer emotional hardship if she were separated from them.

4 The response to this request was contained in a letter dated April 18, 1994 and signed by Immigration Officer M. Caden, stating that a decision had been made that there were insufficient humanitarian and compassionate grounds to warrant processing Ms. Baker's application for permanent residence within Canada. This letter contained no reasons for the decision.

5 Upon request of the appellant's counsel, she was provided with the notes made by Immigration Officer G. Lorenz, which were used by Officer Caden when making his decision. After a summary of the history of the case, Lorenz's notes read as follows:

PC is unemployed - on Welfare. No income shown - no assets. Has four Cdn.-born children- four other children in Jamaica- HAS A TOTAL OF EIGHT CHILDREN

Says only two children are in her "direct custody". (No info on who has ghe [sic] other two).

There is nothing for her in Jamaica - hasn't been there in a long time - no longer close to her children there - no jobs there - she has no skills other than as a domestic - children would suffer - can't take them with her and can't leave them with anyone here. Says has suffered from a mental disorder since '81 - is now an outpatient and is improving. If sent back will have a relapse.

Letter from Children's Aid - they say PC has been diagnosed as a paranoid schizophrenic. - children would suffer if returned -

Letter of Aug. '93 from psychiatrist from Ont. Govm't.

Says PC had post-partum psychosis and had a brief episode of psychosis in Jam. when was 25 yrs. old. Is now an out-patient and is doing relatively well - deportation would be an extremely stressful experience.

Lawyer says PS [sic] is sole caregiver and single parent of two Cdn born children. Pc's mental condition would suffer a setback if she is deported etc.

This case is a catastrophe [sic]. It is also an indictment of our "system" that the client came as a visitor in Aug. '81, was not ordered deported until Dec. '92 and in APRIL '94 IS STILL HERE!

The PC is a paranoid schizophrenic and on welfare. She has no qualifications other than as a domestic. She has FOUR CHILDREN IN JAMAICA AND ANOTHER FOUR BORN HERE. She will, of course, be a tremendous strain on our social welfare systems for (probably) the rest of her life. There are no H&C factors other than her FOUR CANADIAN-BORN CHILDREN. Do we let her stay because of that? I am of the opinion that Canada can no longer afford this type of generosity. However, because of the circumstances involved, there is a potential for adverse publicity. I recommend refusal but you may wish to clear this with someone at Region.

There is also a potential for violence - see charge of "assault with a weapon" [Capitalization in original.]

6 Following the refusal of her application, Ms. Baker was served, on May 27, 1994, with a direction to report to Pearson Airport on June 17 for removal from Canada. Her deportation has been stayed pending the result of this appeal.

II. Relevant Statutory Provisions and Provisions of International Treaties

7 Immigration Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. I-2

-
-

82.1 (1) An application for judicial review under the Federal Court Act with respect to any decision or order made, or any matter arising, under this Act or the rules or regulations thereunder may be commenced only with leave of a judge of the Federal Court -- Trial Division.

83. (1) A judgment of the Federal Court -- Trial Division on an application for judicial review with respect to any decision or order made, or any matter arising, under this Act or the rules or regulations thereunder may be appealed to the Federal Court of Appeal only if the Federal Court -- Trial Division has at the time of rendering judgment certified that a serious question of general importance is involved and has stated that question.

114. . . .

(2) The Governor in Council may, by regulation, authorize the Minister to exempt any person from any regulation made under subsection (1) or otherwise facilitate the admission of any person where the Minister is satisfied that the person should be exempted from that regulation or that the person's admission should be facilitated owing to the existence of compassionate or humanitarian considerations.

Immigration Regulations, 1978, SOR/78-172, as amended by SOR/93-44

2.1 The Minister is hereby authorized to exempt any person from any regulation made under subsection 114(1) of the Act or otherwise facilitate the admission to Canada of any person where the Minister is satisfied that the person should be exempted from that regulation or that the person's admission should be facilitated owing to the existence of compassionate or humanitarian considerations.

Convention on the Rights of the Child, Can. T.S. 1992 No. 3

Article 3

1. In all actions concerning children, whether undertaken by public or private social welfare institutions, courts of law, administrative authorities or legislative bodies, the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration.

2. States Parties undertake to ensure the child such protection and care as is necessary for his or her well-being, taking into account the rights and duties of his or her parents, legal guardians, or other individuals legally responsible for him or her, and, to this end, shall take all appropriate legislative and administrative measures.

Article 9

1. States Parties shall ensure that a child shall not be separated from his or her parents against their will, except when competent authorities subject to judicial review determine, in accordance with applicable law and procedures, that such separation is necessary for the best interests of the child. Such determination may be necessary in a particular case such as one involving abuse or neglect of the child by the parents, or one where the parents are living separately and a decision must be made as to the child's place of residence.
2. In any proceedings pursuant to paragraph 1 of the present article, all interested parties shall be given an opportunity to participate in the proceedings and make their views known.
3. States Parties shall respect the right of the child who is separated from one or both parents to maintain personal relations and direct contact with both parents on a regular basis, except if it is contrary to the child's best interests.
4. Where such separation results from any action initiated by a State Party, such as the detention, imprisonment, exile, deportation or death (including death arising from any cause while the person is in the custody of the State) of one or both parents or of the child, that State Party shall, upon request, provide the parents, the child or, if appropriate, another member of the family with the essential information concerning the whereabouts of the absent member(s) of the family unless the provision of the information would be detrimental to the well-being of the child. States Parties shall further ensure that the submission of such a request shall of itself entail no adverse consequences for the person(s) concerned.

Article 12

1. States Parties shall assure to the child who is capable of forming his or her own views the right to express those views freely in all matters affecting the child, the views of the child being given due weight in accordance with the age and maturity of the child.
2. For this purpose, the child shall in particular be provided the opportunity to be heard in any judicial and administrative proceedings affecting the child, either directly, or through a representative or an appropriate body, in a manner consistent with the procedural rules of national law.

III. Judgments

A. Federal Court -- Trial Division (1995), 1995 CanLII 19414 \(FC\), 101 F.T.R. 110

8 Simpson J. delivered oral reasons dismissing the appellant's judicial review application. She held that since there were no reasons given by Officer Caden for his decision, no affidavit was provided, and no reasons were required, she would assume, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that he acted in good faith and made a decision based on correct principles. She rejected the appellant's argument that the statement in Officer Lorenz's notes that

Ms. Baker would be a strain on the welfare system was not supported by the evidence, holding that it was reasonable to conclude from the reports provided that Ms. Baker would not be able to return to work. She held that the language of Officer Lorenz did not raise a reasonable apprehension of bias, and also found that the views expressed in his notes were unimportant, because they were not those of the decision-maker, Officer Caden. She rejected the appellant's argument that the Convention on the Rights of the Child mandated that the appellant's interests be given priority in s. 114(2) decisions, holding that the Convention did not apply to this situation, and was not part of domestic law. She also held that the evidence showed the children were a significant factor in the decision-making process. She rejected the appellant's submission that the Convention gave rise to a legitimate expectation that the children's interests would be a primary consideration in the decision.

9 Simpson J. certified the following as a "serious question of general importance" under s. 83(1) of the Immigration Act: "Given that the Immigration Act does not expressly incorporate the language of Canada's international obligations with respect to the International Convention on the Rights of the Child, must federal immigration authorities treat the best interests of the Canadian child as a primary consideration in assessing an applicant under s. 114(2) of the Immigration Act?"

B. Federal Court of Appeal, 1996 CanLII 3884 \(FCA\), [1997] 2 F.C. 127

10 The reasons of the Court of Appeal were delivered by Strayer J.A. He held that pursuant to s. 83(1) of the Immigration Act, the appeal was limited to the question certified by Simpson J. He also rejected the appellant's request to challenge the constitutional validity of s. 83(1). Strayer J.A. noted that a treaty cannot have legal effect in Canada unless implemented through domestic legislation, and that the Convention had not been adopted in either federal or provincial legislation. He held that although legislation should be interpreted, where possible, to avoid conflicts with Canada's international obligations, interpreting s. 114(2) to require that the discretion it provides for must be exercised in accordance with the Convention would interfere with the separation of powers between the executive and legislature. He held that such a principle could also alter rights and obligations within the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures. Strayer J.A. also rejected the argument that any articles of the Convention could be interpreted to impose an obligation upon the government to give primacy to the interests of the children in a proceeding such as deportation. He held that the deportation of a parent was not a decision "concerning" children within the meaning of article 3. Finally, Strayer J.A. considered the appellant's argument based on the doctrine of legitimate expectations. He noted that because the doctrine does not create substantive rights, and because a requirement that the best interests of the children be given primacy by a decision-maker under s. 114(2) would be to create a substantive right, the doctrine did not apply.

IV. Issues

11 Because, in my view, the issues raised can be resolved under the principles of administrative law and statutory interpretation, I find it unnecessary to consider the various Charter issues raised by the appellant and the interveners who supported her position. The issues raised by this appeal are therefore as follows:

(1) What is the legal effect of a stated question under s. 83(1) of the Immigration Act on the scope of appellate review?

(2) Were the principles of procedural fairness violated in this case?

(i) Were the participatory rights accorded consistent with the duty of procedural fairness?

(ii) Did the failure of Officer Caden to provide his own reasons violate the principles of procedural fairness?

(iii) Was there a reasonable apprehension of bias in the making of this decision?

(3) Was this discretion improperly exercised because of the approach taken to the interests of Ms. Baker's children?

-
-

I note that it is the third issue that raises directly the issues contained in the certified question of general importance stated by Simpson J.

-

V. Analysis

A. Stated Questions Under Section 83(1) of the Immigration Act

12 The Court of Appeal held, in accordance with its decision in Liyanagamage v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) (1994), 176 N.R. 4, that the requirement, in s. 83(1), that a “serious question of general importance” be certified for an appeal to be permitted restricts an appeal court to addressing the issues raised by the certified question. However, in Pushpanathan v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1998 CanLII 778 \(SCC\), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 982, at para. 25, this Court held that s. 83(1) does not require that the Court of Appeal address only the stated question and issues related to it:

The certification of a “question of general importance” is the trigger by which an appeal is justified. The object of the appeal is still the judgment itself, not merely the certified question.

Rothstein J. noted in Ramoutar v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), 1993 CanLII 2972 \(FC\), [1993] 3 F.C. 370 (T.D.), that once a question has been certified, all aspects of the appeal may be considered by the Court of Appeal, within its jurisdiction. I agree. The wording of s. 83(1) suggests, and Pushpanathan confirms, that if a “question of general importance” has been certified, this allows for an appeal from the judgment of the Trial Division which would otherwise not be permitted, but does not confine the Court of Appeal or this Court to answering the stated question or issues directly related to it. All issues raised by the appeal may therefore be considered here.

B. The Statutory Scheme and the Nature of the Decision

-

13 Before examining the various grounds for judicial review, it is appropriate to discuss briefly the nature of the decision made under s. 114(2) of the Immigration Act, the role of this decision in the statutory scheme, and the guidelines given by the Minister to immigration officers in relation to it.

14 Section 114(2) itself authorizes the Governor in Council to authorize the Minister to exempt a person from a regulation made under the Act, or to facilitate the admission to Canada of any person. The Minister's power to grant an exemption based on humanitarian and compassionate (H & C) considerations arises from s. 2.1 of the Immigration Regulations, which I reproduce for convenience:

The Minister is hereby authorized to exempt any person from any regulation made under subsection 114(1) of the Act or otherwise facilitate the admission to Canada of any person where the Minister is satisfied that the person should be exempted from that regulation or that the person's admission should be facilitated owing to the existence of compassionate or humanitarian considerations.

For the purpose of clarity, I will refer throughout these reasons to decisions made pursuant to the combination of s. 114(2) of the Act and s. 2.1 of the Regulations as "H & C decisions".

15 Applications for permanent residence must, as a general rule, be made from outside Canada, pursuant to s. 9(1) of the Act. One of the exceptions to this is when admission is facilitated owing to the existence of compassionate or humanitarian considerations. In law, pursuant to the Act and the Regulations, an H & C decision is made by the Minister, though in practice, this decision is dealt with in the name of the Minister by immigration officers: see, for example, Minister of Employment and Immigration v. Jiminez-Perez, 1984 CanLII 127 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 565, at p. 569. In addition, while in law, the H & C decision is one that provides for an exemption from regulations or from the Act, in practice, it is one that, in cases like this one, determines whether a person who has been in Canada but does not have status can stay in the country or will be required to leave a place where he or she has become established. It is an important decision that affects in a fundamental manner the future of individuals' lives. In addition, it may also have an important impact on the lives of any Canadian children of the person whose humanitarian and compassionate application is being considered, since they may be separated from one of their parents and/or uprooted from their country of citizenship, where they have settled and have connections.

16 Immigration officers who make H & C decisions are provided with a set of guidelines, contained in chapter 9 of the Immigration Manual: Examination and Enforcement. The guidelines constitute instructions to immigration officers about how to exercise the discretion delegated to them. These guidelines are also available to the public. A number of statements in the guidelines are relevant to Ms. Baker's application. Guideline 9.05 emphasizes that officers have a duty to decide which cases should be given a favourable recommendation, by carefully considering all aspects of the case, using their best judgment and asking themselves what a reasonable person would do in such a situation. It also states that although officers are not expected to "delve into areas which are not presented during examination or interviews, they should attempt to clarify possible humanitarian grounds and public policy considerations even if these are not well articulated".

17 The guidelines also set out the bases upon which the discretion conferred by s. 114(2) and the Regulations should be exercised. Two different types of criteria that may lead to a positive s. 114(2) decision are outlined -- public policy considerations and humanitarian and compassionate grounds. Immigration officers are instructed, under guideline 9.07, to assure themselves, first, whether a public policy consideration is present, and if there is none, whether humanitarian and compassionate circumstances exist. Public policy reasons include marriage to a Canadian resident, the fact that the person has lived in Canada, has become established, and has become an “illegal de facto resident”, and the fact that the person may be a long-term holder of employment authorization or has worked as a foreign domestic. Guideline 9.07 states that humanitarian and compassionate grounds will exist if “unusual, undeserved or disproportionate hardship would be caused to the person seeking consideration if he or she had to leave Canada”. The guidelines also directly address situations involving family dependency, and emphasize that the requirement that a person leave Canada to apply from abroad may result in hardship for close family members of a Canadian resident, whether parents, children, or others who are close to the claimant, but not related by blood. They note that in such cases, the reasons why the person did not apply from abroad and the existence of family or other support in the person’s home country should also be considered.

C. Procedural Fairness

-

18 The first ground upon which the appellant challenges the decision made by Officer Caden is the allegation that she was not accorded procedural fairness. She suggests that the following procedures are required by the duty of fairness when parents have Canadian children and they make an H & C application: an oral interview before the decision-maker, notice to her children and the other parent of that interview, a right for the children and the other parent to make submissions at that interview, and notice to the other parent of the interview and of that person’s right to have counsel present. She also alleges that procedural fairness requires the provision of reasons by the decision-maker, Officer Caden, and that the notes of Officer Lorenz give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias.

19 In addressing the fairness issues, I will consider first the principles relevant to the determination of the content of the duty of procedural fairness, and then address Ms. Baker’s arguments that she was accorded insufficient participatory rights, that a duty to give reasons existed, and that there was a reasonable apprehension of bias.

20 Both parties agree that a duty of procedural fairness applies to H & C decisions. The fact that a decision is administrative and affects “the rights, privileges or interests of an individual” is sufficient to trigger the application of the duty of fairness: Cardinal v. Director of Kent Institution, 1985 CanLII 23 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 643, at p. 653. Clearly, the determination of whether an applicant will be exempted from the requirements of the Act falls within this category, and it has been long recognized that the duty of fairness applies to H & C decisions: Sobrie v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) (1987), 1987 CanLII 9887 (FC), 3 Imm. L.R. (2d) 81 (F.C.T.D.), at p. 88; Said v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) (1992), 1992 CanLII 14729 (FC), 6 Admin. L.R. (2d) 23 (F.C.T.D.); Shah v. Minister of Employment and Immigration (1994), 1994 CanLII 19725 (FCA), 170 N.R. 238 (F.C.A.).

(1) Factors Affecting the Content of the Duty of Fairness

21 The existence of a duty of fairness, however, does not determine what requirements will be applicable in a given set of circumstances. As I wrote in Knight v. Indian Head School Division No. 19, 1990 CanLII 138 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 653, at p. 682, “the concept of procedural fairness is eminently variable and its content is to be decided in the specific context of each case”. All of the circumstances must be considered in order to determine the content of the duty of procedural fairness: Knight, at pp. 682-83; Cardinal, supra, at p. 654; Old St. Boniface Residents Assn. Inc. v. Winnipeg (City), 1990 CanLII 31 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1170, per Sopinka J.

22 Although the duty of fairness is flexible and variable, and depends on an appreciation of the context of the particular statute and the rights affected, it is helpful to review the criteria that should be used in determining what procedural rights the duty of fairness requires in a given set of circumstances. I emphasize that underlying all these factors is the notion that the purpose of the participatory rights contained within the duty of procedural fairness is to ensure that administrative decisions are made using a fair and open procedure, appropriate to the decision being made and its statutory, institutional, and social context, with an opportunity for those affected by the decision to put forward their views and evidence fully and have them considered by the decision-maker.

23 Several factors have been recognized in the jurisprudence as relevant to determining what is required by the common law duty of procedural fairness in a given set of circumstances. One important consideration is the nature of the decision being made and the process followed in making it. In Knight, supra, at p. 683, it was held that “the closeness of the administrative process to the judicial process should indicate how much of those governing principles should be imported into the realm of administrative decision making”. The more the process provided for, the function of the tribunal, the nature of the decision-making body, and the determinations that must be made to reach a decision resemble judicial decision making, the more likely it is that procedural protections closer to the trial model will be required by the duty of fairness. See also Old St. Boniface, supra, at p. 1191; Russell v. Duke of Norfolk, [1949] 1 All E.R. 109 (C.A.), at p. 118; Syndicat des employés de production du Québec et de l’Acadie v. Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission), 1989 CanLII 44 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 879, at p. 896, per Sopinka J.

24 A second factor is the nature of the statutory scheme and the “terms of the statute pursuant to which the body operates”: Old St. Boniface, supra, at p. 1191. The role of the particular decision within the statutory scheme and other surrounding indications in the statute help determine the content of the duty of fairness owed when a particular administrative decision is made. Greater procedural protections, for example, will be required when no appeal procedure is provided within the statute, or when the decision is determinative of the issue and further requests cannot be submitted: see D. J. M. Brown and J. M. Evans, Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada (loose-leaf), at pp. 7-66 to 7-67.

25 A third factor in determining the nature and extent of the duty of fairness owed is the importance of the decision to the individual or individuals affected. The more important the decision is to the lives of those affected and the greater its impact on that person or those persons, the more stringent the procedural protections that will be mandated. This was expressed, for example, by Dickson J. (as he then was) in Kane v. Board of Governors of the University of British Columbia, 1980 CanLII 10 \(SCC\), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1105, at p. 1113:

A high standard of justice is required when the right to continue in one's profession or employment is at stake. . . . A disciplinary suspension can have grave and permanent consequences upon a professional career.

As Sedley J. (now Sedley L.J.) stated in R. v. Higher Education Funding Council, ex parte Institute of Dental Surgery, [1994] 1 All E.R. 651 (Q.B.), at p. 667:

In the modern state the decisions of administrative bodies can have a more immediate and profound impact on people's lives than the decisions of courts, and public law has since Ridge v. Baldwin [1963] 2 All E.R. 66, [1964] A.C. 40 been alive to that fact. While the judicial character of a function may elevate the practical requirements of fairness above what they would otherwise be, for example by requiring contentious evidence to be given and tested orally, what makes it "judicial" in this sense is principally the nature of the issue it has to determine, not the formal status of the deciding body.

The importance of a decision to the individuals affected, therefore, constitutes a significant factor affecting the content of the duty of procedural fairness.

Fourth, the legitimate expectations of the person challenging the decision may also determine what procedures the duty of fairness requires in given circumstances. Our Court has held that, in Canada, this doctrine is part of the doctrine of fairness or natural justice, and that it does not create substantive rights: Old St. Boniface, supra, at p. 1204; Reference re Canada Assistance Plan (B.C.), 1991 CanLII 74 \(SCC\), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 525, at p. 557. As applied in Canada, if a legitimate expectation is found to exist, this will affect the content of the duty of fairness owed to the individual or individuals affected by the decision. If the claimant has a legitimate expectation that a certain procedure will be followed, this procedure will be required by the duty of fairness: Qi v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) (1995), 1995 CanLII 19400 \(FC\), 33 Imm. L.R. (2d) 57 (F.C.T.D.); Mercier-Néron v. Canada (Minister of National Health and Welfare) (1995), 98 F.T.R. 36; Bendahmane v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), 1989 CanLII 9488 \(FCA\), [1989] 3 F.C. 16 (C.A.). Similarly, if a claimant has a legitimate expectation that a certain result will be reached in his or her case, fairness may require more extensive procedural rights than would otherwise be accorded: D. J. Mullan, Administrative Law (3rd ed. 1996), at pp. 214-15; D. Shapiro, “Legitimate Expectation and its Application to Canadian Immigration Law” (1992), 8 J.L. & Social Pol’y 282, at p. 297; Canada (Attorney General) v. Human Rights Tribunal Panel (Canada) (1994), 1994 CanLII 18483 \(FC\), 76 F.T.R. 1. Nevertheless, the doctrine of legitimate expectations cannot lead to substantive rights outside the procedural domain. This doctrine, as applied in Canada, is based on the principle that the “circumstances” affecting procedural fairness take into account the promises or regular practices of administrative decision-makers, and that it will generally be unfair for them to act in contravention of representations as to procedure, or to backtrack on substantive promises without according significant procedural rights.

Fifth, the analysis of what procedures the duty of fairness requires should also take into account and respect the choices of procedure made by the agency itself, particularly when the statute leaves to the decision-maker the ability to choose its own procedures, or when the agency has an expertise in determining what procedures are appropriate in the circumstances: Brown and Evans, supra, at pp. 7-66 to 7-70. While this, of course, is not determinative, important weight must be given to the choice of procedures made by the agency itself and its institutional constraints: IWA v. Consolidated-Bathurst Packaging Ltd., 1990 CanLII 132 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 282, per Gonthier J.

28 I should note that this list of factors is not exhaustive. These principles all help a court determine whether the procedures that were followed respected the duty of fairness. Other factors may also be important, particularly when considering aspects of the duty of fairness unrelated to participatory rights. The values underlying the duty of procedural fairness relate to the principle that the individual or individuals affected should have the opportunity to present their case fully and fairly, and have decisions affecting their rights, interests, or privileges made using a fair, impartial, and open process, appropriate to the statutory, institutional, and social context of the decision.

(2) Legitimate Expectations

-

29 I turn now to an application of these principles to the circumstances of this case to determine whether the procedures followed respected the duty of procedural fairness. I will first determine whether the duty of procedural fairness that would otherwise be applicable is affected, as the appellant argues, by the existence of a legitimate expectation based upon the text of the articles of the Convention and the fact that Canada has ratified it. In my view, however, the articles of the Convention and their wording did not give rise to a legitimate expectation on the part of Ms. Baker that when the decision on her H & C application was made, specific procedural rights above what would normally be required under the duty of fairness would be accorded, a positive finding would be made, or particular criteria would be applied. This Convention is not, in my view, the equivalent of a government representation about how H & C applications will be decided, nor does it suggest that any rights beyond the participatory rights discussed below will be accorded. Therefore, in this case there is no legitimate expectation affecting the content of the duty of fairness, and the fourth factor outlined above therefore does not affect the analysis. It is unnecessary to decide whether an international instrument ratified by Canada could, in other circumstances, give rise to a legitimate expectation.

(3) Participatory Rights

-
-

30 The next issue is whether, taking into account the other factors related to the determination of the content of the duty of fairness, the failure to accord an oral hearing and give notice to Ms. Baker or her children was inconsistent with the participatory rights required by the duty of fairness in these circumstances. At the heart of this analysis is whether, considering all the circumstances, those whose interests were affected had a meaningful opportunity to present their case fully and fairly. The procedure in this case consisted of a written application with supporting documentation, which was summarized by the junior officer (Lorenz), with a recommendation being made by that officer. The summary, recommendation, and material was then considered by the senior officer (Caden), who made the decision.

31 Several of the factors described above enter into the determination of the type of participatory rights the duty of procedural fairness requires in the circumstances. First, an H & C decision is very different from a judicial decision, since it involves the exercise of considerable discretion and requires the consideration of multiple factors. Second, its role is also, within the statutory scheme, as an exception to the general principles of Canadian immigration law. These factors militate in favour of more relaxed requirements under the duty of fairness. On the other hand, there is no appeal procedure, although judicial review may be applied for with leave of the Federal Court -- Trial Division. In addition, considering the third factor, this is a decision that in practice has exceptional importance to the lives of those with an interest in its result -- the claimant and his or her close family members -- and this leads to the content of the duty of fairness being more extensive. Finally, applying the fifth factor described above, the statute accords considerable flexibility to the Minister to decide on the proper procedure, and immigration officers, as a matter of practice, do not conduct interviews in all cases. The institutional practices and choices made by the Minister are significant, though of course not determinative factors to be considered in the analysis. Thus, it can be seen that although some of the factors suggest stricter requirements under the duty of fairness, others suggest more relaxed requirements further from the judicial model.

32 Balancing these factors, I disagree with the holding of the Federal Court of Appeal in Shah, supra, at p. 239, that the duty of fairness owed in these circumstances is simply “minimal”. Rather, the circumstances require a full and fair consideration of the issues, and the claimant and others whose important interests are affected by the decision in a fundamental way must have a meaningful opportunity to present the various types of evidence relevant to their case and have it fully and fairly considered.

33 However, it also cannot be said that an oral hearing is always necessary to ensure a fair hearing and consideration of the issues involved. The flexible nature of the duty of fairness recognizes that meaningful participation can occur in different ways in different situations. The Federal Court has held that procedural fairness does not require an oral hearing in these circumstances: see, for example, Said, supra, at p. 30.

34 I agree that an oral hearing is not a general requirement for H & C decisions. An interview is not essential for the information relevant to an H & C application to be put before an immigration officer, so that the humanitarian and compassionate considerations presented may be considered in their entirety and in a fair manner. In this case, the appellant had the opportunity to put forward, in written form through her lawyer, information about her situation, her children and their emotional dependence on her, and documentation in support of her application from a social worker at the Children’s Aid Society and from her psychiatrist. These documents were before the decision-makers, and they contained the information relevant to making this decision. Taking all the factors relevant to determining the content of the duty of fairness into account, the lack of an oral hearing or notice of such a hearing did not, in my opinion, constitute a violation of the requirements of procedural fairness to which Ms. Baker was entitled in the circumstances, particularly given the fact that several of the factors point toward a more relaxed standard. The opportunity, which was accorded, for the appellant or her children to produce full and complete written documentation in relation to all aspects of her application satisfied the requirements of the participatory rights required by the duty of fairness in this case.

(4) The Provision of Reasons

35 The appellant also submits that the duty of fairness, in these circumstances, requires that reasons be given by the decision-maker. She argues either that the notes of Officer Lorenz should be considered the reasons for the decision, or that it should be held that the failure of Officer Caden to give written reasons for his decision or a subsequent affidavit explaining them should be taken to be a breach of the principles of fairness.

36 This issue has been addressed in several cases of judicial review of humanitarian and compassionate applications. The Federal Court of Appeal has held that reasons are unnecessary: Shah, supra, at pp. 239-40. It has also been held that the case history notes prepared by a subordinate officer are not to be considered the decision-maker's reasons: see Tylo v. Minister of Employment and Immigration (1995), 90 F.T.R. 157, at pp. 159-60. In Gheorlan v. Canada (Secretary of State) (1995), 1995 CanLII 19485 \(FC\), 26 Imm. L.R. (2d) 170 (F.C.T.D.), and Chan v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) (1994), 87 F.T.R. 62, it was held that the notes of the reviewing officer should not be taken to be the reasons for decision, but may help in determining whether a reviewable error exists. In Marques v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) (No. 1) (1995), 116 F.T.R. 241, an H & C decision was set aside because the decision-making officer failed to provide reasons or an affidavit explaining the reasons for his decision.

37 More generally, the traditional position at common law has been that the duty of fairness does not require, as a general rule, that reasons be provided for administrative decisions: Northwestern Utilities Ltd. v. City of Edmonton, 1978 CanLII 17 \(SCC\), [1979] 1 S.C.R. 684; Supermarchés Jean Labrecque Inc. v. Flamand, 1987 CanLII 19 \(SCC\), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 219, at p. 233; Public Service Board of New South Wales v. Osmond (1986), 159 C.L.R. 656 (H.C.A.), at pp. 665-66.

38 Courts and commentators have, however, often emphasized the usefulness of reasons in ensuring fair and transparent decision-making. Though Northwestern Utilities dealt with a statutory obligation to give reasons, Estey J. held as follows, at p. 706, referring to the desirability of a common law reasons requirement:

This obligation is a salutary one. It reduces to a considerable degree the chances of arbitrary or capricious decisions, reinforces public confidence in the judgment and fairness of administrative tribunals, and affords parties to administrative proceedings an opportunity to assess the question of appeal. . . .

The importance of reasons was recently reemphasized by this Court in Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 \(SCC\), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3, at paras. 180-81.

39 Reasons, it has been argued, foster better decision making by ensuring that issues and reasoning are well articulated and, therefore, more carefully thought out. The process of writing reasons for decision by itself may be a guarantee of a better decision. Reasons also allow parties to see that the applicable issues have been carefully considered, and are invaluable if a decision is to be appealed, questioned, or considered on judicial review: R. A. Macdonald and D. Lametti, “Reasons for Decision in Administrative Law” (1990), 3 C.J.A.L.P. 123, at p. 146; Williams v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1997 CanLII 4972 (FCA), [1997] 2 F.C. 646 (C.A.), at para. 38. Those affected may be more likely to feel they were treated fairly and appropriately if reasons are given: de Smith, Woolf, & Jowell, Judicial Review of Administrative Action (5th ed. 1995), at pp. 459-60. I agree that these are significant benefits of written reasons.

40 Others have expressed concerns about the desirability of a written reasons requirement at common law. In Osmond, supra, Gibbs C.J. articulated, at p. 668, the concern that a reasons requirement may lead to an inappropriate burden being imposed on administrative decision-makers, that it may lead to increased cost and delay, and that it “might in some cases induce a lack of candour on the part of the administrative officers concerned”. Macdonald and Lametti, supra, though they agree that fairness should require the provision of reasons in certain circumstances, caution against a requirement of “archival” reasons associated with court judgments, and note that the special nature of agency decision-making in different contexts should be considered in evaluating reasons requirements. In my view, however, these concerns can be accommodated by ensuring that any reasons requirement under the duty of fairness leaves sufficient flexibility to decision-makers by accepting various types of written explanations for the decision as sufficient.

41 In England, a common law right to reasons in certain circumstances has developed in the case law: see M. H. Morris, “Administrative Decision-makers and the Duty to Give Reasons: An Emerging Debate” (1997), 11 C.J.A.L.P. 155, at pp. 164-68; de Smith, Woolf & Jowell, supra, at pp. 462-65. In R. v. Civil Service Appeal Board, ex parte Cunningham, [1991] 4 All E.R. 310 (C.A.), reasons were required of a board deciding the appeal of the dismissal of a prison official. The House of Lords, in R. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex parte Doody, [1994] 1

A.C. 531, imposed a reasons requirement on the Home Secretary when exercising the statutory discretion to decide on the period of imprisonment that a prisoner who had been imposed a life sentence should serve before being entitled to a review. Lord Mustill, speaking for all the law lords on the case, held that although there was no general duty to give reasons at common law, in those circumstances, a failure to give reasons was unfair. Other English cases have held that reasons are required at common law when there is a statutory right of appeal: see Norton Tool Co. v. Tewson, 1905 CanLII 109 (NWT SC), [1973] 1 W.L.R. 45 (N.I.R.C.), at p. 49; Alexander Machinery (Dudley) Ltd. v. Crabtree, [1974] I.C.R. 120 (N.I.R.C.).

42 Some Canadian courts have imposed, in certain circumstances, a common law obligation on administrative decision-makers to provide reasons, while others have been more reluctant. In Orlowski v. British Columbia (Attorney-General) (1992), 1992 CanLII 878 (BC CA), 94 D.L.R. (4th) 541 (B.C.C.A.), at pp. 551-52, it was held that reasons would generally be required for decisions of a review board under Part XX.1 of the Criminal Code, based in part on the existence of a statutory right of appeal from that decision, and also on the importance of the interests affected by the decision. In R.D.R. Construction Ltd. v. Rent Review Commission (1982), 1982 CanLII 3265 (NS CA), 55 N.S.R. (2d) 71 (C.A.), the court also held that because of the existence of a statutory right of appeal, there was an implied duty to give reasons. Smith D.J., in Taabaa v. Refugee Status Advisory Committee, 1980 CanLII 4166 (FC), [1980] 2 F.C. 316 (T.D.), imposed a reasons requirement on a ministerial decision relating to refugee status, based upon the right to apply to the Immigration Appeal Board for redetermination. Similarly, in the context of evaluating whether a statutory reasons requirement had been adequately fulfilled in Boyle v. Workplace Health, Safety and Compensation Commission (N.B.) (1996), 1996 CanLII 4829 (NB CA), 179 N.B.R. (2d) 43 (C.A.), Bastarache J.A. (as he then was) emphasized, at p. 55, the importance of adequate reasons when appealing a decision. However, the Federal Court of Appeal recently rejected the submission that reasons were required in relation to a decision to declare a permanent resident a danger to the public under s. 70(5) of the Immigration Act: Williams, supra.

43

In my opinion, it is now appropriate to recognize that, in certain circumstances, the duty of procedural fairness will require the provision of a written explanation for a decision. The strong arguments demonstrating the advantages of written reasons suggest that, in cases such as this where the decision has important significance for the individual, when there is a statutory right of appeal, or in other circumstances, some form of reasons should be required. This requirement has been developing in the common law elsewhere. The circumstances of the case at bar, in my opinion, constitute one of the situations where reasons are necessary. The profound importance of an H & C decision to those affected, as with those at issue in Orlowski, Cunningham, and Doody, militates in favour of a requirement that reasons be provided. It would be unfair for a person subject to a decision such as this one which is so critical to their future not to be told why the result was reached.

44

In my view, however, the reasons requirement was fulfilled in this case since the appellant was provided with the notes of Officer Lorenz. The notes were given to Ms. Baker when her counsel asked for reasons. Because of this, and because there is no other record of the reasons for making the decision, the notes of the subordinate reviewing officer should be taken, by inference, to be the reasons for decision. Accepting documents such as these notes as sufficient reasons is part of the flexibility that is necessary, as emphasized by Macdonald and Lametti, supra, when courts evaluate the requirements of the duty of fairness with recognition of the day-to-day realities of administrative agencies and the many ways in which the values underlying the principles of procedural fairness can be assured. It upholds the principle that individuals are entitled to fair procedures and open decision-making, but recognizes that in the administrative context, this transparency may take place in various ways. I conclude that the notes of Officer Lorenz satisfy the requirement for reasons under the duty of procedural fairness in this case, and they will be taken to be the reasons for decision.

(5) Reasonable Apprehension of Bias

45

Procedural fairness also requires that decisions be made free from a reasonable apprehension of bias by an impartial decision-maker. The respondent argues that Simpson J. was correct to find that the notes of Officer Lorenz cannot be considered to give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias because it was Officer Caden who was the actual decision-maker, who was simply reviewing the recommendation prepared by his subordinate. In my opinion, the duty to act fairly and therefore in a manner that does not give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias applies to all immigration officers who play a significant role in the making of decisions, whether they are subordinate reviewing officers, or those who make the final decision. The subordinate officer plays an important part in the process, and if a person with such a central role does not act impartially, the decision itself cannot be said to have been made in an impartial manner. In addition, as discussed in the previous section, the notes of Officer Lorenz constitute the reasons for the decision, and if they give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias, this taints the decision itself.

46

The test for reasonable apprehension of bias was set out by de Grandpré J., writing in dissent, in Committee for Justice and Liberty v. National Energy Board, 1976 CanLII 2 \(SCC\), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 369, at p. 394:

. . . the apprehension of bias must be a reasonable one, held by reasonable and right minded persons, applying themselves to the question and obtaining thereon the required information. . . [T]hat test is “what would an informed person, viewing the matter realistically and practically -- and having thought the matter through -- conclude. Would he think that it is more likely than not that [the decision-maker], whether consciously or unconsciously, would not decide fairly.”

This expression of the test has often been endorsed by this Court, most recently in R. v. S. (R.D.), 1997 CanLII 324 \(SCC\), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 484, at para. 11, per Major J.; at para. 31, per L’Heureux-Dubé and McLachlin JJ.; and at para. 111, per Cory J.

It has been held that the standards for reasonable apprehension of bias may vary, like other aspects of procedural fairness, depending on the context and the type of function performed by the administrative decision-maker involved: Newfoundland Telephone Co. v. Newfoundland (Board of Commissioners of Public Utilities), 1992 CanLII 84 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 623; Old St. Boniface, supra, at p. 1192. The context here is one where immigration officers must regularly make decisions that have great importance to the individuals affected by them, but are also often critical to the interests of Canada as a country. They are individualized, rather than decisions of a general nature. They also require special sensitivity. Canada is a nation made up largely of people whose families migrated here in recent centuries. Our history is one that shows the importance of immigration, and our society shows the benefits of having a diversity of people whose origins are in a multitude of places around the world. Because they necessarily relate to people of diverse backgrounds, from different cultures, races, and continents, immigration decisions demand sensitivity and understanding by those making them. They require a recognition of diversity, an understanding of others, and an openness to difference.

In my opinion, the well-informed member of the community would perceive bias when reading Officer Lorenz's comments. His notes, and the manner in which they are written, do not disclose the existence of an open mind or a weighing of the particular circumstances of the case free from stereotypes. Most unfortunate is the fact that they seem to make a link between Ms. Baker's mental illness, her training as a domestic worker, the fact that she has several children, and the conclusion that she would therefore be a strain on our social welfare system for the rest of her life. In addition, the conclusion drawn was contrary to the psychiatrist's letter, which stated that, with treatment, Ms. Baker could remain well and return to being a productive member of society. Whether they were intended in this manner or not, these statements give the impression that Officer Lorenz may have been drawing conclusions based not on the evidence before him, but on the fact that Ms. Baker was a single mother with several children, and had been diagnosed with a psychiatric illness. His use of capitals to highlight the number of Ms. Baker's children may also suggest to a reader that this was a reason to deny her status. Reading his comments, I do not believe that a reasonable and well-informed member of the community would conclude that he had approached this case with the impartiality appropriate to a decision made by an immigration officer. It would appear to a reasonable observer that his own frustration with the “system” interfered with his duty to consider impartially whether the appellant’s admission should be facilitated owing to humanitarian or compassionate considerations. I conclude that the notes of Officer Lorenz demonstrate a reasonable apprehension of bias.

D. Review of the Exercise of the Minister’s Discretion

49 Although the finding of reasonable apprehension of bias is sufficient to dispose of this appeal, it does not address the issues contained in the “serious question of general importance” which was certified by Simpson J. relating to the approach to be taken to children’s interests when reviewing the exercise of the discretion conferred by the Act and the Regulations. Since it is important to address the central questions which led to this appeal, I will also consider whether, as a substantive matter, the H & C decision was improperly made in this case.

50 The appellant argues that the notes provided to her show that, as a matter of law, the decision should be overturned on judicial review. She submits that the decision should be held to a standard of review of correctness, that principles of administrative law require this discretion to be exercised in accordance with the Convention, and that the Minister should apply the best interests of the child as a primary consideration in H & C decisions. The respondent submits that the Convention has not been implemented in Canadian law, and that to require that s. 114(2) and the Regulations made under it be interpreted in accordance with the Convention would be improper, since it would interfere with the broad discretion granted by Parliament, and with the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments.

(1) The Approach to Review of Discretionary Decision-Making

51 As stated earlier, the legislation and Regulations delegate considerable discretion to the Minister in deciding whether an exemption should be granted based upon humanitarian and compassionate considerations. The Regulations state that “[t]he Minister is . . . authorized to” grant an exemption or otherwise facilitate the admission to Canada of any person “where the Minister is satisfied that” this should be done “owing to the existence of compassionate or humanitarian considerations”. This language signals an intention to leave considerable choice to the Minister on the question of whether to grant an H & C application.

52 The concept of discretion refers to decisions where the law does not dictate a specific outcome, or where the decision-maker is given a choice of options within a statutorily imposed set of boundaries. As K. C. Davis wrote in Discretionary Justice (1969), at p. 4:

A public officer has discretion whenever the effective limits on his power leave him free to make a choice among possible courses of action or inaction.

It is necessary in this case to consider the approach to judicial review of administrative discretion, taking into account the “pragmatic and functional” approach to judicial review that was first articulated in U.E.S., Local 298 v. Bibeault, 1988 CanLII 30 \(SCC\), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 1048, and has been applied in subsequent cases including Canada (Attorney General) v. Mossop, 1993 CanLII 164 \(SCC\), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 554, at pp. 601-7, per L’Heureux-Dubé J., dissenting, but not on this issue; Pezim v. British Columbia (Superintendent of Brokers), 1994 CanLII 103 \(SCC\), [1994] 2 S.C.R. 557; Canada (Director of Investigation and Research) v. Southam Inc., 1997 CanLII 385 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 748; and Pushpanathan, supra.

Administrative law has traditionally approached the review of decisions classified as discretionary separately from those seen as involving the interpretation of rules of law. The rule has been that decisions classified as discretionary may only be reviewed on limited grounds such as the bad faith of decision-makers, the exercise of discretion for an improper purpose, and the use of irrelevant considerations: see, for example, Maple Lodge Farms Ltd. v. Government of Canada, 1982 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 2, at pp. 7-8; Shell Canada Products Ltd. v. Vancouver (City), 1994 CanLII 115 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 231. A general doctrine of “unreasonableness” has also sometimes been applied to discretionary decisions: Associated Provincial Picture Houses, Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corporation, [1948] 1 K.B. 223 (C.A.). In my opinion, these doctrines incorporate two central ideas -- that discretionary decisions, like all other administrative decisions, must be made within the bounds of the jurisdiction conferred by the statute, but that considerable deference will be given to decision-makers by courts in reviewing the exercise of that discretion and determining the scope of the decision-maker’s jurisdiction. These doctrines recognize that it is the intention of a legislature, when using statutory language that confers broad choices on administrative agencies, that courts should not lightly interfere with such decisions, and should give considerable respect to decision-makers when reviewing the manner in which discretion was exercised. However, discretion must still be exercised in a manner that is within a reasonable interpretation of the margin of manoeuvre contemplated by the legislature, in accordance with the principles of the rule of law (Roncarelli v. Duplessis, 1959 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1959] S.C.R. 121), in line with general principles of administrative law governing the exercise of discretion, and consistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038).

It is, however, inaccurate to speak of a rigid dichotomy of “discretionary” or “non-discretionary” decisions. Most administrative decisions involve the exercise of implicit discretion in relation to many aspects of decision making. To give just one example, decision-makers may have considerable discretion as to the remedies they order. In addition, there is no easy distinction to be made between interpretation and the exercise of discretion; interpreting legal rules involves considerable discretion to clarify, fill in legislative gaps, and make choices among various options.

As stated by Brown and Evans, supra, at p. 14-47:

The degree of discretion in a grant of power can range from one where the decision-maker is constrained only by the purposes and objects of the legislation, to one where it is so specific that there is almost no discretion involved. In between, of course, there may be any number of limitations placed on the decision-maker's freedom of choice, sometimes referred to as "structured" discretion.

55 The "pragmatic and functional" approach recognizes that standards of review for errors of law are appropriately seen as a spectrum, with certain decisions being entitled to more deference, and others entitled to less: Pezim, supra, at pp. 589-90; Southam, supra, at para. 30; Pushpanathan, supra, at para. 27. Three standards of review have been defined: patent unreasonableness, reasonableness simpliciter, and correctness: Southam, at paras. 54-56. In my opinion the standard of review of the substantive aspects of discretionary decisions is best approached within this framework, especially given the difficulty in making rigid classifications between discretionary and non-discretionary decisions. The pragmatic and functional approach takes into account considerations such as the expertise of the tribunal, the nature of the decision being made, and the language of the provision and the surrounding legislation. It includes factors such as whether a decision is "polycentric" and the intention revealed by the statutory language. The amount of choice left by Parliament to the administrative decision-maker and the nature of the decision being made are also important considerations in the analysis. The spectrum of standards of review can incorporate the principle that, in certain cases, the legislature has demonstrated its intention to leave greater choices to decision-makers than in others, but that a court must intervene where such a decision is outside the scope of the power accorded by Parliament. Finally, I would note that this Court has already applied this framework to statutory provisions that confer significant choices on administrative bodies, for example, in reviewing the exercise of the remedial powers conferred by the statute at issue in Southam, supra.

Incorporating judicial review of decisions that involve considerable discretion into the pragmatic and functional analysis for errors of law should not be seen as reducing the level of deference given to decisions of a highly discretionary nature. In fact, deferential standards of review may give substantial leeway to the discretionary decision-maker in determining the “proper purposes” or “relevant considerations” involved in making a given determination. The pragmatic and functional approach can take into account the fact that the more discretion that is left to a decision-maker, the more reluctant courts should be to interfere with the manner in which decision-makers have made choices among various options. However, though discretionary decisions will generally be given considerable respect, that discretion must be exercised in accordance with the boundaries imposed in the statute, the principles of the rule of law, the principles of administrative law, the fundamental values of Canadian society, and the principles of the Charter.

(2) The Standard of Review in This Case

I turn now to an application of the pragmatic and functional approach to determine the appropriate standard of review for decisions made under s. 114(2) and Regulation 2.1, and the factors affecting the determination of that standard outlined in Pushpanathan, supra. It was held in that case that the decision, which related to the determination of a question of law by the Immigration and Refugee Board, was subject to a standard of review of correctness. Although that decision was also one made under the Immigration Act, the type of decision at issue was very different, as was the decision-maker. The appropriate standard of review must, therefore, be considered separately in the present case.

The first factor to be examined is the presence or absence of a privative clause, and, in appropriate cases, the wording of that clause: Pushpanathan, at para. 30. There is no privative clause contained in the Immigration Act, although judicial review cannot be commenced without leave of the Federal Court -- Trial Division under s. 82.1. As mentioned above, s. 83(1) requires the certification of a “serious question of general importance” by the Federal Court -- Trial Division before that decision may be appealed to the Court of Appeal. Pushpanathan shows that the existence of this provision means there should be a lower level of deference on issues related to the certified question itself. However, this is only one of the factors involved in determining the standard of review, and the others must also be considered.

59 The second factor is the expertise of the decision-maker. The decision-maker here is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration or his or her delegate. The fact that the formal decision-maker is the Minister is a factor militating in favour of deference. The Minister has some expertise relative to courts in immigration matters, particularly with respect to when exemptions should be given from the requirements that normally apply.

60 The third factor is the purpose of the provision in particular, and of the Act as a whole. This decision involves considerable choice on the part of the Minister in determining when humanitarian and compassionate considerations warrant an exemption from the requirements of the Act. The decision also involves applying relatively “open-textured” legal principles, a factor militating in favour of greater deference: Pushpanathan, supra, at para. 36. The purpose of the provision in question is also to exempt applicants, in certain circumstances, from the requirements of the Act or its Regulations. This factor, too, is a signal that greater deference should be given to the Minister. However, it should also be noted, in favour of a stricter standard, that this decision relates directly to the rights and interests of an individual in relation to the government, rather than balancing the interests of various constituencies or mediating between them. Its purpose is to decide whether the admission to Canada of a particular individual, in a given set of circumstances, should be facilitated.

61 The fourth factor outlined in Pushpanathan considers the nature of the problem in question, especially whether it relates to the determination of law or facts. The decision about whether to grant an H & C exemption involves a considerable appreciation of the facts of that person's case, and is not one which involves the application or interpretation of definitive legal rules. Given the highly discretionary and fact-based nature of this decision, this is a factor militating in favour of deference.

62 These factors must be balanced to arrive at the appropriate standard of review. I conclude that considerable deference should be accorded to immigration officers exercising the powers conferred by the legislation, given the fact-specific nature of the inquiry, its role within the statutory scheme as an exception, the fact that the decision-maker is the Minister, and the considerable discretion evidenced by the statutory language. Yet the absence of a privative clause, the explicit contemplation of judicial review by the Federal Court -- Trial Division and the Federal Court of Appeal in certain circumstances, and the individual rather than polycentric nature of the decision, also suggest that the standard should not be as deferential as "patent unreasonableness". I conclude, weighing all these factors, that the appropriate standard of review is reasonableness simpliciter.

(3) Was this Decision Unreasonable?

63 I will next examine whether the decision in this case, and the immigration officer's interpretation of the scope of the discretion conferred upon him, were unreasonable in the sense contemplated in the judgment of Iacobucci J. in Southam, supra, at para. 56:

An unreasonable decision is one that, in the main, is not supported by any reasons that can stand up to a somewhat probing examination. Accordingly, a court reviewing a conclusion on the reasonableness standard must look to see whether any reasons support it. The defect, if there is one, could presumably be in the evidentiary foundation itself or in the logical process by which conclusions are sought to be drawn from it.

In particular, the examination of this question should focus on the issues arising from the “serious question of general importance” stated by Simpson J.: the question of the approach to be taken to the interests of children when reviewing an H & C decision.

64 The notes of Officer Lorenz, in relation to the consideration of “H & C factors”, read as follows:

The PC is a paranoid schizophrenic and on welfare. She has no qualifications other than as a domestic. She has FOUR CHILDREN IN JAMAICA AND ANOTHER FOUR BORN HERE. She will, of course, be a tremendous strain on our social welfare systems for (probably) the rest of her life. There are no H&C factors other than her FOUR CANADIAN-BORN CHILDREN. Do we let her stay because of that? I am of the opinion that Canada can no longer afford this type of generosity.

65 In my opinion, the approach taken to the children’s interests shows that this decision was unreasonable in the sense contemplated in Southam, supra. The officer was completely dismissive of the interests of Ms. Baker’s children. As I will outline in detail in the paragraphs that follow, I believe that the failure to give serious weight and consideration to the interests of the children constitutes an unreasonable exercise of the discretion conferred by the section, notwithstanding the important deference that should be given to the decision of the immigration officer. Professor Dyzenhaus has articulated the concept of “deference as respect” as follows:

Deference as respect requires not submission but a respectful attention to the reasons offered or which could be offered in support of a decision. . . .

(D. Dyzenhaus, “The Politics of Deference: Judicial Review and Democracy”, in M. Taggart, ed., The Province of Administrative Law (1997), 279, at p. 286.)

The reasons of the immigration officer show that his decision was inconsistent with the values underlying the grant of discretion. They therefore cannot stand up to the somewhat probing examination required by the standard of reasonableness.

66 The wording of s. 114(2) and of Regulation 2.1 requires that a decision-maker exercise the power based upon “compassionate or humanitarian considerations” (emphasis added). These words and their meaning must be central in determining whether an individual H & C decision was a reasonable exercise of the power conferred by Parliament. The legislation and regulations direct the Minister to determine whether the person’s admission should be facilitated owing to the existence of such considerations. They show Parliament’s intention that those exercising the discretion conferred by the statute act in a humanitarian and compassionate manner. This Court has found that it is necessary for the Minister to consider an H & C request when an application is made: Jiminez-Perez, supra. Similarly, when considering it, the request must be evaluated in a manner that is respectful of humanitarian and compassionate considerations.

67 Determining whether the approach taken by the immigration officer was within the boundaries set out by the words of the statute and the values of administrative law requires a contextual approach, as is taken to statutory interpretation generally: see R. v. Gladue, 1999 CanLII 679 (SCC), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 688; Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, at paras. 20-23. In my opinion, a reasonable exercise of the power conferred by the section requires close attention to the interests and needs of children. Children’s rights, and attention to their interests, are central humanitarian and compassionate values in Canadian society. Indications of children’s interests as important considerations governing the manner in which H & C powers should be exercised may be found, for example, in the purposes of the Act, in international instruments, and in the guidelines for making H & C decisions published by the Minister herself.

(a) The Objectives of the Act

68 The objectives of the Act include, in s. 3(c):

to facilitate the reunion in Canada of Canadian citizens and permanent residents with their close relatives from abroad;

Although this provision speaks of Parliament's objective of reuniting citizens and permanent residents with their close relatives from abroad, it is consistent, in my opinion, with a large and liberal interpretation of the values underlying this legislation and its purposes to presume that Parliament also placed a high value on keeping citizens and permanent residents together with their close relatives who are already in Canada. The obligation to take seriously and place important weight on keeping children in contact with both parents, if possible, and maintaining connections between close family members is suggested by the objective articulated in s. 3(c).

(b) International Law

69 Another indicator of the importance of considering the interests of children when making a compassionate and humanitarian decision is the ratification by Canada of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, and the recognition of the importance of children's rights and the best interests of children in other international instruments ratified by Canada. International treaties and conventions are not part of Canadian law unless they have been implemented by statute: Francis v. The Queen, 1956 CanLII 79 (SCC), [1956] S.C.R. 618, at p. 621; Capital Cities Communications Inc. v. Canadian Radio-Television Commission, 1977 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 141, at pp. 172-73. I agree with the respondent and the Court of Appeal that the Convention has not been implemented by Parliament. Its provisions therefore have no direct application within Canadian law.

Nevertheless, the values reflected in international human rights law may help inform the contextual approach to statutory interpretation and judicial review. As stated in R. Sullivan, Driedger on the Construction of Statutes (3rd ed. 1994), at p. 330:

[T]he legislature is presumed to respect the values and principles enshrined in international law, both customary and conventional. These constitute a part of the legal context in which legislation is enacted and read. In so far as possible, therefore, interpretations that reflect these values and principles are preferred. [Emphasis added.]

The important role of international human rights law as an aid in interpreting domestic law has also been emphasized in other common law countries: see, for example, Tavita v. Minister of Immigration, [1994] 2 N.Z.L.R. 257 (C.A.), at p. 266; Vishaka v. Rajasthan, [1997] 3 L.R.C. 361 (S.C. India), at p. 367. It is also a critical influence on the interpretation of the scope of the rights included in the Charter: Slaight Communications, supra; R. v. Keegstra, 1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697.

The values and principles of the Convention recognize the importance of being attentive to the rights and best interests of children when decisions are made that relate to and affect their future. In addition, the preamble, recalling the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, recognizes that “childhood is entitled to special care and assistance”. A similar emphasis on the importance of placing considerable value on the protection of children and their needs and interests is also contained in other international instruments. The United Nations Declaration of the Rights of the Child (1959), in its preamble, states that the child “needs special safeguards and care”. The principles of the Convention and other international instruments place special importance on protections for children and childhood, and on particular consideration of their interests, needs, and rights. They help show the values that are central in determining whether this decision was a reasonable exercise of the H & C power.

Third, the guidelines issued by the Minister to immigration officers recognize and reflect the values and approach discussed above and articulated in the Convention. As described above, immigration officers are expected to make the decision that a reasonable person would make, with special consideration of humanitarian values such as keeping connections between family members and avoiding hardship by sending people to places where they no longer have connections. The guidelines show what the Minister considers a humanitarian and compassionate decision, and they are of great assistance to the Court in determining whether the reasons of Officer Lorenz are supportable. They emphasize that the decision-maker should be alert to possible humanitarian grounds, should consider the hardship that a negative decision would impose upon the claimant or close family members, and should consider as an important factor the connections between family members. The guidelines are a useful indicator of what constitutes a reasonable interpretation of the power conferred by the section, and the fact that this decision was contrary to their directives is of great help in assessing whether the decision was an unreasonable exercise of the H & C power.

The above factors indicate that emphasis on the rights, interests, and needs of children and special attention to childhood are important values that should be considered in reasonably interpreting the “humanitarian” and “compassionate” considerations that guide the exercise of the discretion. I conclude that because the reasons for this decision do not indicate that it was made in a manner which was alive, attentive, or sensitive to the interests of Ms. Baker’s children, and did not consider them as an important factor in making the decision, it was an unreasonable exercise of the power conferred by the legislation, and must, therefore, be overturned. In addition, the reasons for decision failed to give sufficient weight or consideration to the hardship that a return to Jamaica might cause Ms. Baker, given the fact that she had been in Canada for 12 years, was ill and might not be able to obtain treatment in Jamaica, and would necessarily be separated from at least some of her children.

74 It follows that I disagree with the Federal Court of Appeal's holding in Shah, supra, at p. 239, that a s. 114(2) decision is "wholly a matter of judgment and discretion" (emphasis added). The wording of s. 114(2) and of the Regulations shows that the discretion granted is confined within certain boundaries. While I agree with the Court of Appeal that the Act gives the applicant no right to a particular outcome or to the application of a particular legal test, and that the doctrine of legitimate expectations does not mandate a result consistent with the wording of any international instruments, the decision must be made following an approach that respects humanitarian and compassionate values. Therefore, attentiveness and sensitivity to the importance of the rights of children, to their best interests, and to the hardship that may be caused to them by a negative decision is essential for an H & C decision to be made in a reasonable manner. While deference should be given to immigration officers on s. 114(2) judicial review applications, decisions cannot stand when the manner in which the decision was made and the approach taken are in conflict with humanitarian and compassionate values. The Minister's guidelines themselves reflect this approach. However, the decision here was inconsistent with it.

75 The certified question asks whether the best interests of children must be a primary consideration when assessing an applicant under s. 114(2) and the Regulations. The principles discussed above indicate that, for the exercise of the discretion to fall within the standard of reasonableness, the decision-maker should consider children's best interests as an important factor, give them substantial weight, and be alert, alive and sensitive to them. That is not to say that children's best interests must always outweigh other considerations, or that there will not be other reasons for denying an H & C claim even when children's interests are given this consideration. However, where the interests of children are minimized, in a manner inconsistent with Canada's humanitarian and compassionate tradition and the Minister's guidelines, the decision will be unreasonable.

E. Conclusions and Disposition

76 Therefore, both because there was a violation of the principles of procedural fairness owing to a reasonable apprehension of bias, and because the exercise of the H & C discretion was unreasonable, I would allow this appeal.

77 The appellant requested that solicitor-client costs be awarded to her if she were successful in her appeal. The majority of this Court held as follows in Young v. Young, 1993 CanLII 34 (SCC), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 3, at p. 134:

Solicitor-client costs are generally awarded only where there has been reprehensible, scandalous or outrageous conduct on the part of one of the parties.

There has been no such conduct on the part of the Minister shown during this litigation, and I do not believe that this is one of the exceptional cases where solicitor-client costs should be awarded. I would allow the appeal, and set aside the decision of Officer Caden of April 18, 1994, with party-and-party costs throughout. The matter will be returned to the Minister for redetermination by a different immigration officer.

The reasons of Cory and Iacobucci JJ. were delivered by 78 IACOBUCCI J. - I agree with L'Heureux-Dubé J.'s reasons and disposition of this appeal, except to the extent that my colleague addresses the effect of international law on the exercise of ministerial discretion pursuant to s. 114(2) of the Immigration Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. I-2. The certified question at issue in this appeal concerns whether federal immigration authorities must treat the best interests of the child as a primary consideration in assessing an application for humanitarian and compassionate consideration under s. 114(2) of the Act, given that the legislation does not implement the provisions contained in the Convention on the Rights of the Child, Can.

T.S. 1992 No. 3, a multilateral convention to which Canada is party. In my opinion, the certified question should be answered in the negative.

79 It is a matter of well-settled law that an international convention ratified by the executive branch of government is of no force or effect within the Canadian legal system until such time as its provisions have been incorporated into domestic law by way of implementing legislation: Capital Cities Communications Inc. v. Canadian Radio-Television Commission, 1977 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 141. I do not agree with the approach adopted by my colleague, wherein reference is made to the underlying values of an unimplemented international treaty in the course of the contextual approach to statutory interpretation and administrative law, because such an approach is not in accordance with the Court's jurisprudence concerning the status of international law within the domestic legal system.

80 In my view, one should proceed with caution in deciding matters of this nature, lest we adversely affect the balance maintained by our Parliamentary tradition, or inadvertently grant the executive the power to bind citizens without the necessity of involving the legislative branch. I do not share my colleague's confidence that the Court's precedent in Capital Cities, supra, survives intact following the adoption of a principle of law which permits reference to an unincorporated convention during the process of statutory interpretation. Instead, the result will be that the appellant is able to achieve indirectly what cannot be achieved directly, namely, to give force and effect within the domestic legal system to international obligations undertaken by the executive alone that have yet to be subject to the democratic will of Parliament.

81 The primacy accorded to the rights of children in the Convention, assuming for the sake of argument that the factual circumstances of this appeal are included within the scope of the relevant provisions, is irrelevant unless and until such provisions are the subject of legislation enacted by Parliament. In answering the certified question in the negative, I am mindful that the result may well have been different had my colleague concluded that the appellant's claim fell within the ambit of rights protected by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Had this been the case, the Court would have had an opportunity to consider the application of the interpretive presumption, established by the Court's decision in Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038, and confirmed in subsequent jurisprudence, that administrative discretion involving Charter rights be exercised in accordance with similar international human rights norms.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellant: Roger Rowe and Rocco Galati, North York.

Solicitor for the respondent: The Deputy Attorney General of Canada, Toronto.

Solicitor for the interveners the Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law, the Defence for Children International-Canada, and the Canadian Council for Refugees: The Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law, Toronto.

Solicitors for the intervener Charter Committee on Poverty Issues: Tory, Tory, DesLauriers & Binnington, Toronto.

Solicitors for the intervener the Canadian Council of Churches: Jackman and Associates, Toronto.

Tab 5

The British Columbia Human Rights Commission, the Commissioner of Investigation and Mediation, the British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal and Andrea Willis Appellants

v.

Robin Blencoe Respondent

and

Irene Schell Intervener

and

The Attorney General for Ontario, the Attorney General of British Columbia, the Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission, the Ontario Human Rights Commission, the Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission, the Manitoba Human Rights Commission, the Canadian Human Rights Commission, the Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse, the British Columbia Human Rights Coalition and the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund Interveners

INDEXED AS: BLENCOE v. BRITISH COLUMBIA (HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION)

Neutral citation: 2000 SCC 44.

File No.: 26789.

2000: January 24; 2000: October 5.

Present: McLachlin C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache, Binnie, Arbour and LeBel JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE BRITISH COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEAL

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Application — Human Rights Commission — Commission implementing specific governmental program and exercising statutory authority — Commission independent

La British Columbia Human Rights Commission, le Commissioner of Investigation and Mediation, le British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal et Andrea Willis Appelants

c.

Robin Blencoe Intimé

et

Irene Schell Intervenante

et

Le procureur général de l'Ontario, le procureur général de la Colombie-Britannique, la Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission, la Commission ontarienne des droits de la personne, la Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission, la Commission des droits de la personne du Manitoba, la Commission canadienne des droits de la personne, la Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse, la British Columbia Human Rights Coalition et le Fonds d'action et d'éducation juridiques pour les femmes Intervenants

RÉPERTORIÉ: BLENCOE c. COLOMBIE-BRITANNIQUE (HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION)

Référence neutre: 2000 CSC 44.

Nº du greffe: 26789.

2000: 24 janvier; 2000: 5 octobre.

Présents: Le juge en chef McLachlin et les juges L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache, Binnie, Arbour et LeBel.

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DE LA COLOMBIE-BRITANNIQUE

Droit constitutionnel — Charte des droits — Application — Commission des droits de la personne — Commission mettant en œuvre un programme gouvernemental particulier et exerçant un pouvoir conféré par la loi from government and acting judicially — Whether Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applicable to Commission's actions — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 32.

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Liberty and security of person — Sexual harassment complaints filed against respondent before Human Rights Commission — Lengthy delay in processing complaints — Whether respondent's constitutional rights to liberty and security of person engaged — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 7.

Administrative law — Abuse of process — Delay — Sexual harassment complaints filed against respondent before Human Rights Commission — Lengthy delay in processing complaints — Whether respondent's ability to have fair hearing compromised — Whether lengthy delay amounted to denial of natural justice or abuse of process.

In March 1995, while serving as a minister in the Government of British Columbia, the respondent was accused by one of his assistants of sexual harassment. A month later, the premier removed the respondent from Cabinet and dismissed him from the NDP caucus. In July and August of 1995, two complaints of discriminatory conduct in the form of sexual harassment were filed with the British Columbia Council of Human Rights (now the British Columbia Human Rights Commission) against the respondent by two other women, W and S. The complaints centered around various incidents of sexual harassment alleged to have occurred between March 1993 and March 1995. The respondent was informed of the first complaint in July 1995 and of the second in September 1995. After the Commission's investigation, hearings were scheduled before the British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal in March 1998, over 30 months after the initial complaints were filed.

Following the allegations against the respondent, media attention was intense. He suffered from severe depression. He did not stand for re-election in 1996. Considering himself "unemployable" in British Columbia due to the outstanding human rights complaints against him, the respondent commenced judicial review proceedings in November 1997 to have the complaints stayed. He claimed that the Commission had lost jurisdiction due to unreasonable delay in processing the complaints. The respondent alleged that the unreasona-— Commission indépendante du gouvernement et agissant de manière judiciaire — La Charte canadienne des droits et libertés s'applique-t-elle aux actes de la Commission? — Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, art. 32.

Droit constitutionnel — Charte des droits — Liberté et sécurité de la personne — Plaintes de harcèlement sexuel déposées contre l'intimé auprès de la Commission des droits de la personne — Long délai écoulé dans le traitement des plaintes — Les droits constitutionnels de l'intimé à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne s'appliquent-ils? — Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, art. 7.

Droit administratif — Abus de procédure — Délai — Plaintes de harcèlement sexuel déposées contre l'intimé auprès de la Commission des droits de la personne — Long délai écoulé dans le traitement des plaintes — La capacité de l'intimé d'obtenir une audience équitable a-t-elle été compromise? — Le long délai écoulé constituait-il un déni de justice naturelle ou un abus de procédure?

En mars 1995, alors qu'il était ministre au sein du gouvernement de la Colombie-Britannique, l'intimé a été accusé de harcèlement sexuel par l'une de ses adjointes. Un mois plus tard, le premier ministre l'excluait du Cabinet et du caucus du NPD. En juillet et en août 1995, deux autres femmes, W et S, ont déposé devant le British Columbia Council of Human Rights (maintenant la British Columbia Human Rights Commission) deux plaintes de discrimination sous forme de harcèlement sexuel contre l'intimé. Les plaintes concernaient divers épisodes de harcèlement sexuel qui seraient survenus entre mars 1993 et mars 1995. L'intimé a été informé de la première plainte en juillet 1995 et de la seconde en septembre 1995. À la suite de l'enquête de la Commission, des audiences devant le British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal ont été fixées au mois de mars 1998, soit plus de 30 mois après le dépôt des plaintes initiales.

Les allégations formulées contre l'intimé ont suscité une attention intense de la part des médias. Il a fait une grave dépression. Il n'a pas sollicité un nouveau mandat en 1996. Se disant «inapte au travail» en Colombie-Britannique en raison des plaintes fondées sur les droits de la personne qui pesaient toujours contre lui, l'intimé a présenté, en novembre 1997, une demande de contrôle judiciaire en vue d'obtenir l'arrêt des procédures relatives aux plaintes. Il a fait valoir que la Commission avait perdu compétence en raison d'un délai déraisonnable delay caused serious prejudice to him and his family which amounted to an abuse of process and a denial of natural justice. His petition was dismissed by the Supreme Court of British Columbia. A majority of the Court of Appeal allowed the respondent's appeal and directed that the human rights proceedings against him be stayed. The majority found that the respondent had been deprived of his right under s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to security of the person in a manner which was not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Held (Iacobucci, Binnie, Arbour and LeBel JJ. dissenting in part): The appeal should be allowed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Major and Bastarache JJ.: The Charter applies to the actions of the British Columbia Human Rights Commission. The Commission is created by statute and all of its actions are taken pursuant to statutory authority. Bodies exercising statutory authority are bound by the Charter even though they may be independent of government. The Commission in this case is both implementing a specific government program and exercising powers of statutory compulsion. Further, the Commission cannot escape Charter scrutiny merely because it exercises judicial functions. The ultimate source of authority is government. The Commission is carrying out the legislative scheme of the Human Rights Code and must act within the limits of its enabling statute. There is clearly a "governmental quality" to the functions of a human rights commission which is created by government to promote equality in society generally. It is the administration of a governmental program that calls for Charter scrutiny.

Section 7 of the Charter can extend beyond the sphere of criminal law, at least where there is state action which directly engages the justice system and its administration. If a case arises in the human rights context which, on its facts, meets the usual s. 7 threshold requirements, there is no specific bar against such a claim and s. 7 may be engaged.

In order for s. 7 to be triggered, one must first establish that the interest in respect of which the respondent asserted his claim falls within the ambit of s. 7. The liberty interest protected by s. 7 is no longer restricted to mere freedom from physical restraint. "Liberty" is engaged where state compulsions or prohibitions affect ble dans le traitement des plaintes. L'intimé a allégué que ce délai déraisonnable avait causé à sa famille et à lui-même un préjudice grave équivalant à un abus de procédure et à un déni de justice naturelle. Sa demande a été rejetée par la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique. La Cour d'appel, à la majorité, a accueilli l'appel de l'intimé et a ordonné l'arrêt des procédures en matière de droits de la personne qui avaient été engagées contre lui. Les juges majoritaires ont conclu que l'intimé avait été privé, d'une manière non conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale, du droit à la sécurité de sa personne que lui garantit l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés.

Arrêt (les juges Iacobucci, Binnie, Arbour et LeBel sont dissidents en partie): Le pourvoi est accueilli.

Le juge en chef McLachlin et les juges L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Major et Bastarache: La Charte s'applique aux actes de la British Columbia Human Rights Commission. La Commission a été créée par une loi et elle accomplit tous ses actes en vertu du pouvoir que lui confère la loi en cause. L'organisme qui exerce un pouvoir conféré par une loi est assujéti à la Charte même s'il peut être indépendant du gouvernement. La Commission dont il est question en l'espèce met en œuvre un programme gouvernemental particulier et exerce des pouvoirs de contrainte émanant de la loi. En outre, la Commission ne peut pas échapper à un examen fondé sur la Charte du seul fait qu'elle exerce des fonctions judiciaires. L'origine du pouvoir accordé est en fin de compte le gouvernement. La Commission applique le régime législatif du Human Rights Code et doit agir dans les limites de sa loi habilitante. Les fonctions d'une commission des droits de la personne créée par le gouvernement pour promouvoir l'égalité dans la société en général sont clairement de «nature gouvernementale». C'est l'application d'un programme gouvernemental qui commande l'examen fondé sur la Charte.

L'article 7 de la Charte peut déborder le cadre du droit criminel, au moins dans le cas d'un acte gouvernemental intéressant directement le système judiciaire et l'administration de la justice. Rien ne s'oppose à ce que cet article s'applique à une affaire en matière de droits de la personne qui, sur le plan des faits, respecte les conditions préliminaires de son application.

Pour que l'art. 7 s'applique, il faut d'abord prouver que le droit visé par l'allégation de l'intimé relève de l'art. 7. Le droit à la liberté garanti par l'art. 7 ne s'entend plus uniquement de l'absence de toute contrainte physique. La «liberté» est en cause lorsque des contraintes ou des interdictions de l'État influent sur les important and fundamental life choices. The s. 7 liberty interest protects an individual's personal autonomy. In our free and democratic society, individuals are entitled to make decisions of fundamental importance free from state interference. Such personal autonomy, however, is not synonymous with unconstrained freedom. Here, the state has not prevented the respondent from making any "fundamental personal choices". Therefore, the interests sought to be protected in this case do not fall within the "liberty" interest protected by s. 7.

The right to security of the person guaranteed by s. 7 protects the psychological integrity of an individual. However, in order for this right to be triggered, the psychological harm must result from the actions of the state and it must be serious. In this case, the direct cause of the harm to the respondent was not the state-caused delay in the human rights process. While the respondent has suffered serious prejudice in connection with the allegations of sexual harassment against him, for s. 7 to be engaged there must be a sufficient causal connection between the state-caused delay and the prejudice suffered. The most prejudicial impact on the respondent was caused not by the actions of the Commission but rather by the events prior to the complaints — the allegations of the respondent's assistant — which caused the respondent to be ousted from Cabinet and caucus as well as the actions by non-governmental actors such as the press. The harm to the respondent resulted from the publicity surrounding the allegations themselves, coupled with the political fallout which ensued. When the respondent began to experience stigma, the human rights proceedings had yet to commence. Further, there is a pending civil suit against the respondent for sexual harassment and W's complaint against the Government on these very same issues. The prolongation of stigma from ongoing publicity was likely regardless of the delay in the human rights proceedings. At best, the respondent was deprived of a speedy opportunity to clear his name. Lastly, the human rights process did not seriously exacerbate the respondent's prejudice. It is difficult to see how procedural delay could have seriously increased damage already done to the respondent's reputation.

Even accepting that the outstanding complaints may have contributed to the respondent's stigma to some degree, thereby causing some of his suffering, and assuming without deciding that there is a sufficient nexus between the state-caused delay and the prejudice to the respondent, the state interference with the respon-choix importants et fondamentaux qu'une personne peut faire dans sa vie. Le droit à la liberté garanti par l'art. 7 protège l'autonomie personnelle. Dans notre société libre et démocratique, chacun a le droit de prendre des décisions d'importance fondamentale sans intervention de l'État. Cette autonomie personnelle n'est toutefois pas synonyme de liberté illimitée. Dans la présente affaire, l'État n'a pas empêché l'intimé de faire des «choix personnels fondamentaux». Par conséquent, les droits que l'on cherche à protéger en l'espèce ne font pas partie du droit «à la liberté» garanti par l'art. 7.

Le droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti par l'art. 7 protège l'intégrité psychologique d'une personne. Cependant, pour que ce droit soit en cause, le préjudice psychologique doit résulter d'un acte de l'État et doit être grave. En l'espèce, la cause directe du préjudice subi par l'intimé n'était pas le délai imputable à l'État dans le déroulement du processus en matière de droits de la personne. Bien que les allégations de harcèlement sexuel dont l'intimé a fait l'objet lui aient causé un préjudice grave, il doit y avoir un lien de causalité suffisant entre le délai imputable à l'État et le préjudice subi pour que l'art. 7 s'applique. L'effet le plus préjudiciable sur l'intimé résulte non pas des actes de la Commission, mais plutôt d'événements antérieurs au dépôt des plaintes — les allégations de l'adjointe de l'intimé — qui ont entraîné son expulsion du Cabinet et du caucus, ainsi que du comportement d'acteurs non gouvernementaux comme les journalistes. Le préjudice subi par l'intimé est imputable à la publicité ayant entouré les allégations elles-mêmes et aux retombées politiques qui ont suivi. Les procédures en matière de droits de la personne n'avaient pas encore commencé lorsque l'intimé a commencé à être victime d'une stigmatisation. En outre, l'intimé fait toujours l'objet de poursuites civiles pour harcèlement sexuel et W a déposé une plainte contre le gouvernement pour les mêmes motifs. Il était probable que la stigmatisation résultant de la publicité incessante se poursuivrait peu importe le délai écoulé dans les procédures en matière de droits de la personne. Au mieux, l'intimé a été privé de la possibilité de se disculper rapidement. Enfin, le processus en matière de droits de la personne n'a pas sérieusement aggravé le préjudice subi par l'intimé. On voit mal comment un délai de procédure pourrait avoir sérieusement accru le préjudice déjà causé à la réputation de l'intimé.

Même si on reconnaît que les plaintes dont l'intimé faisait l'objet peuvent avoir contribué jusqu'à un certain point à sa stigmatisation et avoir ainsi causé certaines de ses souffrances, et même si on présume, sans pour autant le décider, qu'il existe un lien suffisant entre le délai imputable à l'État et le préjudice subi par l'intimé, dent's psychological integrity did not amount to a violation of his right to security of the person. First, the s. 7 rights of "liberty and security of the person" do not include a generalized right to dignity, or more specifically a right to be free from the stigma associated with a human rights complaint. While respect for the inherent dignity of persons is clearly an essential value in our free and democratic society which must guide the courts in interpreting the Charter, this does not mean that dignity is elevated to a free-standing constitutional right protected by s. 7. The notion of "dignity" is better understood as an underlying value. Like dignity, reputation is not a free-standing right. Neither is freedom from stigma. Second, the state has not interfered with the ability of the respondent and his family to make essential life choices. In order for security of the person to be triggered in this case, the impugned state action must have had a serious and profound effect on the respondent's psychological integrity. It is only in exceptional cases where the state interferes in profoundly intimate and personal choices of an individual that state-caused delay in human rights proceedings could trigger the s. 7 security of the person interest. Here, the alleged right to be free from stigma associated with a human rights complaint does not fall within this narrow sphere. The state has not interfered with the respondent's right to make decisions that affect his fundamental being. The prejudice to the respondent is essentially confined to his personal hardship.

There is no constitutional right outside the criminal context to be "tried" within a reasonable time. The majority of the Court of Appeal erred in transplanting s. 11(b) principles set out in the criminal law context to human rights proceedings under s. 7. Not only are there fundamental differences between criminal and human rights proceedings, but, more importantly, s. 11(b) of the Charter is restricted to a pending criminal case.

There are remedies available in the administrative law context to deal with state-caused delay in human rights proceedings. However, delay, without more, will not warrant a stay of proceedings as an abuse of process at common law. There must be proof of significant prejudice which results from an unacceptable delay. Here, the respondent's ability to have a fair hearing has l'atteinte de l'État à l'intégrité psychologique de l'intimé ne constituait pas une atteinte à son droit à la sécurité de sa personne. Premièrement, les droits «à la liberté et à la sécurité de [l]a personne» garantis par l'art. 7 ne comportent pas un droit général à la dignité ou, plus précisément, un droit à la protection contre la stigmatisation liée à une plainte fondée sur les droits de la personne. Bien que le respect de la dignité inhérente des gens soit nettement une valeur essentielle de notre société libre et démocratique, qui doit guider les tribunaux dans l'interprétation de la Charte, cela ne signifie pas pour autant que l'on fait de la dignité un droit constitutionnel distinct garanti par l'art. 7. Il vaut mieux considérer la notion de «dignité» comme une valeur sous-jacente. À l'instar de la dignité, la réputation n'est pas un droit distinct. La protection contre la stigmatisation ne l'est pas non plus. Deuxièmement, l'État n'a pas porté atteinte à la capacité de l'intimé et des membres de sa famille de faire des choix essentiels dans leur vie. Pour que la sécurité de la personne soit en cause en l'espèce, l'acte reproché à l'État doit avoir eu des répercussions graves et profondes sur l'intégrité psychologique de l'intimé. Ce n'est que dans les cas exceptionnels où l'État s'ingère dans des choix profondément intimes et personnels d'un individu que le délai imputable à l'État, dans des procédures en matière de droits de la personne, pourrait déclencher l'application du droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti par l'art. 7. En l'espèce, le droit allégué à la protection contre la stigmatisation liée à une plainte fondée sur les droits de la personne ne fait pas partie de cette catégorie restreinte. L'État n'a pas porté atteinte au droit de l'intimé de prendre des décisions touchant son être fondamental. Le préjudice subi par l'intimé se limite essentiellement à ses difficultés personnelles.

Le droit constitutionnel d'être «jugé» dans un délai raisonnable ne s'applique qu'en matière criminelle. La Cour d'appel à la majorité a eu tort de transposer dans des procédures en matière de droits de la personne fondées sur l'art. 7 des principes énoncés relativement à l'al. 11(b) dans le contexte du droit criminel. Non seulement y a-t-il des différences fondamentales entre des procédures criminelles et des procédures en matière de droits de la personne, mais encore l'al. 11(b) de la Charte ne s'applique qu'aux affaires criminelles pendantes.

Le droit administratif offre des réparations en ce qui concerne le délai imputable à l'État dans des procédures en matière de droits de la personne. Cependant, le délai ne justifie pas, à lui seul, un arrêt des procédures comme l'abus de procédure en common law. Il faut prouver qu'un délai inacceptable a causé un préjudice important. Dans la présente affaire, la capacité de l'intimé d'obte-not been compromised. Proof of prejudice has not been demonstrated to be of sufficient magnitude to impact on the fairness of the hearing. Unacceptable delay may also amount to an abuse of process in certain circumstances even where the fairness of the hearing has not been compromised. Where there is no prejudice to hearing fairness, the delay must be clearly unacceptable and have directly caused a significant prejudice to amount to an abuse of process. It must be a delay that would, in the circumstances of the case, bring the human rights system into disrepute. A court must be satisfied that the proceedings are contrary to the interests of justice. There may also be abuse of process where conduct is oppressive. A stay is not the only remedy available for abuse of process in administrative law proceedings and a respondent asking for a stay bears a heavy burden. In this case, the respondent did not demonstrate that the delay was unacceptable to the point of being so oppressive as to taint the proceedings. While the stress and stigma resulting from an inordinate delay may contribute to an abuse of process, the delay in processing the complaints was not inordinate.

The determination of whether a delay is inordinate is not based on the length of the delay alone, but on contextual factors, including the nature of the case and its complexity, the purpose and nature of the proceedings, and whether the respondent contributed to the delay or waived the delay. Here, although the Commission took longer than is desirable to process the complaints, the delay was not so inordinate as to amount to an abuse of process. The case may not have been an extremely complicated one, but the various steps necessary to protect the respondents in the context of the human rights complaints system take time. The trial judge found that only the 24-month period between the filing of the complaints and the end of the investigation process should be considered for the delay, stating that the Human Rights Tribunal could not be criticized for not setting the hearing dates earlier as the respondent did not press for earlier dates. During that 24-month period, there was no extended period without any activity in the processing of the complaints, except for an inexplicable five months of inaction. The respondent challenged the lateness of the complaints and brought forward allegations of bad faith and, as a result, the process was delayed by eight months. The Commission should not be held responsible for contributing to this part of the delay. When all the relevant factors are taken into account, in particular the ongoing communication between the parnir une audience équitable n'a pas été compromise. Il n'a pas été établi que le préjudice subi est assez important pour nuire à l'équité de l'audience. Un délai inacceptable peut également constituer un abus de procédure dans certaines circonstances, même lorsque l'équité de l'audience n'a pas été compromise. Pour constituer un abus de procédure dans les cas où il n'y a aucune atteinte à l'équité de l'audience, le délai doit être manifestement inacceptable et avoir directement causé un préjudice important. Il doit s'agir d'un délai qui, dans les circonstances de l'affaire, déconsidérerait le régime de protection des droits de la personne. La cour doit être convaincue que les procédures sont contraires à l'intérêt de la justice. Il peut également y avoir abus de procédure lorsque la conduite est oppressive. L'arrêt des procédures n'est pas la seule réparation possible dans le cas d'un abus de procédure en matière de droit administratif, et la personne faisant l'objet d'une plainte qui demande l'arrêt des procédures doit s'acquitter d'un lourd fardeau de preuve. En l'espèce, l'intimé n'a pas établi que le délai était inacceptable au point d'être oppressif et de vicier les procédures. Même si le stress et la stigmatisation résultant d'un délai excessif peuvent entraîner un abus de procédure, le délai écoulé dans le traitement des plaintes n'était pas excessif.

La question de savoir si un délai est excessif dépend non pas uniquement de la longueur de ce délai, mais de facteurs contextuels, dont la nature de l'affaire et sa complexité, de l'objet et de la nature des procédures ainsi que de la question de savoir si la personne visée par les procédures a contribué ou renoncé au délai. Dans la présente affaire, même si la Commission a pris plus de temps que ce qui est souhaitable pour traiter les plaintes, le délai écoulé n'était pas excessif au point de constituer un abus de procédure. Même s'il se peut que l'affaire n'ait pas été extrêmement compliquée, les diverses étapes nécessaires pour assurer la protection de la personne qui fait l'objet d'une plainte fondée sur les droits de la personne allongent d'autant le processus. Le juge de première instance a conclu que seule la période de 24 mois comprise entre le dépôt des plaintes et la fin de l'enquête pouvait être prise en considération pour calculer le délai, disant qu'on ne pouvait reprocher au Tribunal des droits de la personne de ne pas avoir fixé des dates d'audience plus rapprochées, étant donné que l'intimé ne lui avait pas demandé de le faire. Au cours de ces 24 mois, il n'y a pas eu de période prolongée d'inactivité dans le traitement des plaintes, si ce n'est une période inexplicable de cinq mois d'inactivité. L'intimé a présenté une contestation fondée sur le caractère tardif des plaintes et a allégué la mauvaise foi, de sorte que le processus a été retardé de huit mois. La Commis-ties, the delay in processing the complaints is not one that would offend the community's sense of decency and fairness. Nevertheless, in light of the lack of diligence displayed by the Commission, the Court's discretion under s. 47 of the Supreme Court Act should be exercised to award costs against the Commission in favour of the respondent and the complainants.

Per Iacobucci, Binnie, Arbour and LeBel JJ. (dissenting in part): This matter should be resolved on the basis of administrative law principles. It is therefore unnecessary to express a definite opinion on the application of s. 7 of the Charter.

Administrative delay that is determined to be unreasonable based on its length, its causes, and its effects is abusive and contrary to administrative law principles. Unreasonable delays must be identified within the specific circumstances of every case because not all delay is the same and not all administrative bodies are the same. In order to differentiate reasonable and unreasonable delay, courts must remain alive not only to the needs of administrative systems under strain, but also to their good faith efforts to provide procedural protections to alleged wrongdoers. In assessing the reasonableness of an administrative delay, three main factors should be balanced: (1) the time taken compared to the inherent time requirements of the matter before the particular administrative body; (2) the causes of delay beyond the inherent time requirements of the matter; and (3) the impact of the delay. A consideration of these factors imposes a contextual analysis.

Here, inefficiency in the Human Rights Commission's handling of this matter has led to abuse of process. First, although serious, the allegations of sexual discrimination against the respondent did not raise complex issues and were not of a nature that could justify a prolonged investigation. There was little to investigate. Even though the inherent time requirements were minimal, in all it took the Commission approximately two years to determine that the complaints should go to a hearing. The time from the initial filing of the complaints to the scheduled hearing was approximately 32 months. While it is true that the Commission's decision to send the matter to a hearing involved a number of steps, nothing in the inherent time requirements of the case came close to requiring the delay that occurred. Second, although the respondent sought to use the sion ne devrait pas être tenue responsable d'avoir contribué à cette partie du délai. Lorsque tous les facteurs pertinents sont pris en considération, notamment la communication constante entre les parties, le délai écoulé dans le traitement des plaintes n'est pas de ceux qui heurteraient le sens de la justice et de la décence de la société. Néanmoins, vu l'absence de diligence manifestée par la Commission, il y a lieu de lui ordonner de payer les dépens de l'intimé et des plaignantes en vertu du pouvoir discrétionnaire que l'art. 47 de la Loi sur la Cour suprême confère à notre Cour.

Les juges Iacobucci, Binnie, Arbour et LeBel (dissidents en partie): La présente affaire devrait être réglée en fonction des principes du droit administratif. Il est donc inutile d'exprimer une opinion précise sur l'application de l'art. 7 de la Charte.

Le délai administratif jugé déraisonnable en raison de sa durée, de ses causes et de ses effets est abusif et contraire aux principes du droit administratif. Il faut déterminer si un délai est déraisonnable en fonction des circonstances particulières de chaque cas, car les délais ne sont pas tous les mêmes et les organismes administratifs diffèrent les uns des autres. Pour distinguer un délai raisonnable d'un délai déraisonnable, les tribunaux doivent être conscients non seulement des besoins des régimes administratifs soumis à des contraintes, mais aussi des efforts qu'ils déploient de bonne foi en vue d'offrir des protections procédurales aux présumés contrevenants. Pour évaluer le caractère raisonnable d'un délai administratif, trois facteurs principaux doivent être appréciés: (1) le délai écoulé par rapport au délai inhérent à l'affaire dont est saisi l'organisme administratif en cause, (2) les causes de la prolongation du délai inhérent à l'affaire, et (3) l'incidence du délai. L'examen de ces facteurs commande une analyse contextuelle.

La façon inefficace dont la Commission des droits de la personne a traité la présente affaire a donné lieu à un abus de procédure. Premièrement, quoique graves, les allégations de discrimination sexuelle dont faisait l'objet l'intimé ne soulevaient pas des questions complexes et n'étaient pas de nature à justifier la tenue d'une enquête prolongée. Il y avait peu matière à enquête. Même si le délai inhérent était minime, il a fallu environ deux ans en tout à la Commission pour décider que les plaintes feraient l'objet d'une audience. Environ 32 mois se sont écoulés entre le dépôt initial des plaintes et la date fixée pour leur audition. Même s'il est vrai que la Commission a dû franchir un certain nombre d'étapes pour décider que l'affaire ferait l'objet d'une audience, le délai inhérent à l'affaire était loin de correspondre à celui qui s'est écoulé. Deuxièmement, même si l'intimé a tenté defences available to him, he did not become responsible for the sheer inefficiency of the Commission in dealing with these matters. There was serious delay on both complaints despite the respondent's efforts to find a way to end it. The Commission admits that it cannot explain what was going on for five months of the time that it was dealing with the allegations against the respondent. This five-month lapse is the high mark of the Commission's ineptitude. Third, although the administrative delay was not the only cause of the prejudice suffered by the respondent, it contributed significantly to its aggravation and the Commission did nothing to minimize the impact of the delay. The Commission's conduct in dealing with this matter was less than acceptable. Further, the inefficient and delay-filled process at the Commission harmed all parties involved in the process, including the complainants. In the end, the specific and unexplained delay entitles the respondent to a remedy.

The choice of the appropriate remedy requires a careful analysis of the circumstances of the case and imposes a balancing exercise between competing interests. In human rights proceedings, the interest of the respondent, that of the complainants, and the public interest of the community itself must be considered. The courts must also consider the stage of the proceedings which has been affected by the delay. A distinction must be drawn between the process leading to the hearing and the hearing itself. A different balance between conflicting interests may have to be found at different stages of the administrative process. A stay of proceedings should not generally appear as the sole or even the preferred form of redress. It should be limited to those situations that compromise the very fairness of the hearing and to those cases where the delay in the conduct of the process leading to the hearing would amount to a gross or shocking abuse of the process. In those two situations, the interest of the respondent and the protection of the integrity of the legal system become the paramount considerations. More limited and narrowly focused remedies will be appropriate when it appears that the hearing will remain fair, in spite of the delay, and when the delay has not risen to the level of a shocking abuse, notwithstanding its seriousness. The first objective of any intervention by a court should be to make things happen, where the administrative process is not working adequately. An order for an expedited hearing would be the most practical and effective means of judicial action.

d'invoquer les moyens de défense dont il disposait, il n'est pas devenu responsable de l'inefficacité pure et simple dont la Commission a fait preuve en traitant ces questions. Les deux plaintes ont fait l'objet d'un délai important malgré les efforts de l'intimé pour y mettre fin. La Commission reconnaît qu'elle ne peut pas expliquer ce qui s'est passé durant les cinq mois au cours desquels elle a traité les allégations formulées contre l'intimé. Cet intervalle de cinq mois est le paroxysme de l'ineptie dont la Commission a fait preuve. Troisièmement, même si le délai administratif n'a pas été la seule cause du préjudice subi par l'intimé, il a beaucoup contribué à son aggravation et la Commission n'a rien fait pour réduire au minimum l'incidence du délai. La conduite adoptée par la Commission en traitant cette affaire était moins qu'acceptable. En outre, l'inefficacité et les multiples délais qui ont caractérisé le processus devant la Commission ont lésé toutes les parties à ce processus, y compris les plaignantes. En définitive, le délai inexpliqué en cause justifie d'accorder une réparation à l'intimé.

Le choix de la réparation appropriée requiert une analyse minutieuse des circonstances de l'affaire et commande une évaluation d'intérêts opposés. Dans les procédures en matière de droits de la personne, il faut tenir compte de l'intérêt de l'intimé, de celui des plaignantes et de celui de la collectivité même. Les tribunaux judiciaires doivent également prendre en considération l'étape des procédures qui est touchée par le délai. Une distinction doit être établie entre les procédures menant à l'audience et l'audience elle-même. Une évaluation des intérêts opposés peut se révéler nécessaire à chacune des étapes des procédures administratives. L'arrêt des procédures ne devrait pas généralement être considéré comme la seule réparation possible ni même comme la forme de réparation préférée. Il devrait être limité aux cas où l'équité même de l'audience est compromise et où le délai dans les procédures menant à l'audience constituerait un abus de procédure grossier ou scandaleux. Dans les deux cas, l'intérêt de l'intimé et la protection de l'intégrité du système judiciaire deviennent les facteurs prépondérants. Des réparations plus limitées et mieux ciblées sont appropriées lorsqu'il appert que le délai ne portera pas atteinte à l'équité de l'audience et qu'il ne constitue pas un abus scandaleux en dépit de sa gravité. Toute intervention d'un tribunal judiciaire devrait, d'abord et avant tout, viser à faire avancer les choses lorsque les procédures administratives ne se déroulent pas adéquatement. L'intervention judiciaire la plus pratique et efficace serait d'ordonner la tenue d'une

An order for costs is a third kind of remedy. It will not address the delay directly, but some of its consequences.

In this case, a stay of proceedings appears both excessive and unfair. First, in spite of the seriousness of the problems faced by the respondent, the delay does not seem to compromise the fairness of the hearing. The delay rather concerns the process leading to the hearing. This delay arises from a variety of causes that do not evince an intent on the part of the Commission to harm the respondent wilfully, but rather demonstrate grave negligence and significant structural problems in the processing of the complaints. Second, a stay of proceedings in a situation that does not compromise the fairness of the hearing or amount to shocking or gross abuse requires the consideration of the interest of the complainants. The Court of Appeal completely omitted any consideration of this interest. Here, an order for an expedited hearing should have been considered as the remedy of choice. The stay should be lifted and the Commission should be ordered to pay costs on a party-to-party basis to the respondent in this Court and in the British Columbia courts. It is fair and appropriate to use the power conferred by s. 47 of the Supreme Court Act, as the respondent has established that the process initiated against him was deeply flawed and that its defects justified his search for a remedy, at least in administrative law.

Cases Cited

By Bastarache J.

Not followed: Nisbett v. Manitoba (Human Rights Commission) (1993), 101 D.L.R. (4th) 744; Canadian Airlines International Ltd. v. Canada (Human Rights Commission), [1996] 1 F.C. 638; Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission v. Kodellas (1989), 60 D.L.R. (4th) 143; considered: Misra v. College of Physicians & Surgeons of Saskatchewan (1988), 52 D.L.R. (4th) 477; Stefani v. College of Dental Surgeons (British Columbia) (1996), 44 Admin. L.R. (2d) 122; Brown v. Assn. of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of British Columbia, [1994] B.C.J. No. 2037 (QL); Ratzlaff v. British Columbia (Medical Services Commission) (1996), 17 B.C.L.R. (3d) 336; referred to: Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 624; Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038; Douglas/Kwantlen Faculty Assn. v. Douglas College, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 570; Mills v. The Queen, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863; R. v. Rahey, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 588; New Brunswick (Minister of Health and audience accélérée. L'adjudication de dépens est la troisième réparation possible. Elle touche non pas le délai directement, mais plutôt certaines de ses conséquences.

En l'espèce, l'arrêt des procédures paraît à la fois excessif et inéquitable. Premièrement, malgré la gravité des difficultés éprouvées par l'intimé, le délai ne semble pas compromettre l'équité de l'audience. Il concerne plutôt les procédures menant à l'audience. Ce délai est dû à une gamme de causes qui traduisent non pas l'intention de la Commission de léser délibérément l'intimé, mais plutôt une négligence grave et l'existence de problèmes structurels importants en matière de traitement des plaintes. Deuxièmement, pour ordonner l'arrêt des procédures dans le cas où l'équité de l'audience n'est pas compromise ou dans celui où il n'y a pas d'abus scandaleux ou grossier, il faut tenir compte de l'intérêt du plaignant. La Cour d'appel a complètement omis de tenir compte de cet intérêt. En l'espèce, l'ordonnance enjoignant de tenir une audience accélérée aurait dû être envisagée à titre de réparation appropriée. Il y a lieu d'annuler l'arrêt des procédures et d'ordonner à la Commission de payer à l'intimé des dépens comme entre parties devant notre Cour et les tribunaux de la Colombie-Britannique. Il est juste et opportun d'exercer le pouvoir conféré par l'art. 47 de la Loi sur la Cour suprême, étant donné que l'intimé a établi que les procédures engagées contre lui étaient entachées de vices importants qui le justifiaient de demander une réparation au moins fondée sur le droit administratif.

Jurisprudence

Citée par le juge Bastarache

Arrêts non suivis: Nisbett c. Manitoba (Human Rights Commission) (1993), 101 D.L.R. (4th) 744; Lignes aériennes Canadien International Ltée c. Canada (Commission des droits de la personne), [1996] 1 C.F. 638; Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission c. Kodellas (1989), 60 D.L.R. (4th) 143; arrêts examinés: Misra c. College of Physicians & Surgeons of Saskatchewan (1988), 52 D.L.R. (4th) 477; Stefani c. College of Dental Surgeons (British Columbia) (1996), 44 Admin. L.R. (2d) 122; Brown c. Assn. of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of British Columbia, [1994] B.C.J. No. 2037 (QL); Ratzlaff c. British Columbia (Medical Services Commission) (1996), 17 B.C.L.R. (3d) 336; arrêts mentionnés: Eldridge c. Colombie-Britannique (Procureur général), [1997] 3 R.C.S. 624; Slaight Communications Inc. c. Davidson, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 1038; Douglas/Kwantlen Faculty Assn. c. Douglas College, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 570; Mills c. La Reine, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 863; R. c. Rahey, [1987] 1 R.C.S.

Community Services) v. G. (J.), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46, rev'g (1997), 187 N.B.R. (2d) 81; R. v. Beare, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 387; Singh v. Minister of Employment and Immigration, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 177; Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486; Thomson Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada (Director of Investigation and Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 425; R. v. Heywood, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 761; B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 S.C.R. 315; R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30; Godbout v. Longueuil (City), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 844; Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519; Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man.), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1123; Operation Dismantle Inc. v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441; R. v. O'Connor, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411; R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103; Law v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 497; Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 1130; R. v. Mills, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 668; Canada (Human Rights Commission) v. Taylor, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 892; R. v. L. (W.K.), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 1091; Akthar v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1991] 3 F.C. 32; Ford Motor Co. of Canada v. Ontario (Human Rights Commission) (1995), 24 C.H.R.R. D/464; Freedman v. College of Physicians & Surgeons (New Brunswick) (1996), 41 Admin. L.R. (2d) 196; Martineau v. Matsqui Institution Disciplinary Board, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 602; R. v. Askov, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1199; R. v. Jewitt, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 128; R. v. Power, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 601; R. v. Young (1984), 40 C.R. (3d) 289; R. v. Potvin, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 880; R. v. Scott, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 979; R. v. Conway, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659; Allen v. Sir Alfred McAlpine & Sons, Ltd., [1968] 1 All E.R. 543; R. v. Morin, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 771.

By LeBel J. (dissenting in part)

Nisbett v. Manitoba (Human Rights Commission) (1993), 101 D.L.R. (4th) 744; Ford Motor Co. of Canada v. Ontario (Human Rights Commission) (1995), 24 C.H.R.R. D/464; Martineau v. Matsqui Institution Disciplinary Board, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 602; R. v. Rahey, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 588; R. v. Askov, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1199; Bagg's Case (1615), 11 Co. Rep. 93b, 77 E.R. 1271; Andover Case (1700), Holt. K.B. 441, 90 E.R. 1143; R. v. Barker (1762), 3 Burr. 1265, 97 E.R. 823; The King ex rel. Lee v. Workmen's Compensation Board, [1942] 2 D.L.R. 665; Harekin v. University of Regina, [1979] 2 S.C.R. 561; R. v. Bradley, [1941] S.C.R. 270; Rourke v. The Queen, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 1021; Muia v. Canada

588; Nouveau-Brunswick (Ministre de la Santé et des Services communautaires) c. G. (J.), [1999] 3 R.C.S. 46, inf. (1997), 187 R.N.-B. (2^e) 81; R. c. Beare, [1988] 2 R.C.S. 387; Singh c. Ministre de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 177; Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., [1985] 2 R.C.S. 486; Thomson Newspapers Ltd. c. Canada (Directeur des enquêtes et recherches, Commission sur les pratiques restrictives du commerce), [1990] 1 R.C.S. 425; R. c. Heywood, [1994] 3 R.C.S. 761; B. (R.) c. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 R.C.S. 315; R. c. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 R.C.S. 30; Godbout c. Longueuil (Ville), [1997] 3 R.C.S. 844; Rodriguez c. Colombie-Britannique (Procureur général), [1993] 3 R.C.S. 519; Renvoi relatif à l'art. 193 et à l'al. 195.1(1)(c) du Code criminel (Man.), [1990] 1 R.C.S. 1123; Operation Dismantle Inc. c. La Reine, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 441; R. c. O'Connor, [1995] 4 R.C.S. 411; R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103; Law c. Canada (Ministre de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration), [1999] 1 R.C.S. 497; Hill c. Église de scientologie de Toronto, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 1130; R. c. Mills, [1999] 3 R.C.S. 668; Canada (Commission des droits de la personne) c. Taylor, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 892; R. c. L. (W.K.), [1991] 1 R.C.S. 1091; Akthar c. Canada (Ministre de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration), [1991] 3 C.F. 32; Ford Motor Co. of Canada c. Ontario (Human Rights Commission) (1995), 24 C.H.R.R. D/464; Freedman c. College of Physicians & Surgeons (New Brunswick) (1996), 41 Admin. L.R. (2d) 196; Martineau c. Comité de discipline de l'Institution de Matsqui, [1980] 1 R.C.S. 602; R. c. Askov, [1990] 2 R.C.S. 1199; R. c. Jewitt, [1985] 2 R.C.S. 128; R. c. Power, [1994] 1 R.C.S. 601; R. c. Young (1984), 40 C.R. (3d) 289; R. c. Potvin, [1993] 2 R.C.S. 880; R. c. Scott, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 979; R. c. Conway, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 1659; Allen c. Sir Alfred McAlpine & Sons, Ltd., [1968] 1 All E.R. 543; R. c. Morin, [1992] 1 R.C.S. 771.

Citée par le juge LeBel (dissident en partie)

Nisbett c. Manitoba (Human Rights Commission) (1993), 101 D.L.R. (4th) 744; Ford Motor Co. of Canada c. Ontario (Human Rights Commission) (1995), 24 C.H.R.R. D/464; Martineau c. Comité de discipline de l'Institution de Matsqui, [1980] 1 R.C.S. 602; R. c. Rahey, [1987] 1 R.C.S. 588; R. c. Askov, [1990] 2 R.C.S. 1199; Bagg's Case (1615), 11 Co. Rep. 93b, 77 E.R. 1271; Andover Case (1700), Holt. K.B. 441, 90 E.R. 1143; R. c. Barker (1762), 3 Burr. 1265, 97 E.R. 823; The King ex rel. Lee c. Workmen's Compensation Board, [1942] 2 D.L.R. 665; Harekin c. Université de Regina, [1979] 2 R.C.S. 561; R. c. Bradley, [1941] R.C.S. 270; Rourke c. La Reine, [1978] 1 R.C.S. 1021; (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) (1996), 113 F.T.R. 234; Dass v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1996] 2 F.C. 410; Dee v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship & Immigration) (1998), 46 Imm. L.R. (2d) 278; Kiani v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship & Immigration) (1999), 50 Imm. L.R. (2d) 81; Bhatnager v. Minister of Employment and Immigration, [1985] 2 F.C. 315; R. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex parte Phansopkar, [1976] 1 Q.B. 606; Re Preston, [1985] A.C. 835; R. v. Chief Constable of the Merseyside Police, Ex parte Calveley, [1986] Q.B. 424; Misra v. College of Physicians & Surgeons of Saskatchewan (1988), 52 D.L.R. (4th) 477; Brown v. Assn. of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of British Columbia, [1994] B.C.J. No. 2037 (QL); Stefani v. College of Dental Surgeons (British Columbia) (1996), 44 Admin. L.R. (2d) 122; Ratzlaff v. British Columbia (Medical Services Commission) (1996), 17 B.C.L.R. (3d) 336; R. v. Conway, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659; Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v. Kodellas (1989), 60 D.L.R. (4th) 143; R. v. Morin, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 771; R. v. O'Connor, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411; Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Tobiass, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 391; Schachter v. Canada, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 7, 8, 11(b), 24, 32.
Human Rights Act, S.B.C. 1984, c. 22, s. 13(1)(d).
Human Rights Code, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 210, ss. 24, 27.
Magna Carta (1215).
Supreme Court Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. S-26, s. 47.

Authors Cited

Blackstone, William. Commentaries on the Laws of England, Book III, 4th ed. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1768.
 Brookings Task Force on Civil Justice Reform. Justice for All: Reducing Costs and Delay in Civil Litigation. Washington: Brookings Institution, 1989.
 Brown, Donald J. M., and John M. Evans. Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada. Toronto: Canvasback, 1998 (loose-leaf).
 Bryden, Philip. "Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission): A Case Comment" (1999), 33 U.B.C. L. Rev. 153.

Muia c. Canada (Ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration) (1996), 113 F.T.R. 234; Dass c. Canada (Ministre de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration), [1996] 2 C.F. 410; Dee c. Canada (Ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration) (1998), 46 Imm. L.R. (2d) 278; Kiani c. Canada (Ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration) (1999), 50 Imm. L.R. (2d) 81; Bhatnager c. Ministère de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration, [1985] 2 C.F. 315; R. c. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex parte Phansopkar, [1976] 1 Q.B. 606; Re Preston, [1985] A.C. 835; R. c. Chief Constable of the Merseyside Police, Ex parte Calveley, [1986] Q.B. 424; Misra c. College of Physicians & Surgeons of Saskatchewan (1988), 52 D.L.R. (4th) 477; Brown c. Assn. of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of British Columbia, [1994] B.C.J. No. 2037 (QL); Stefani c. College of Dental Surgeons (British Columbia) (1996), 44 Admin. L.R. (2d) 122; Ratzlaff c. British Columbia (Medical Services Commission) (1996), 17 B.C.L.R. (3d) 336; R. c. Conway, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 1659; Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) c. Kodellas (1989), 60 D.L.R. (4th) 143; R. c. Morin, [1992] 1 R.C.S. 771; R. c. O'Connor, [1995] 4 R.C.S. 411; Canada (Ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration) c. Tobiass, [1997] 3 R.C.S. 391; Schachter c. Canada, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 679.

Lois et règlements cités

Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, art. 7, 8, 11b), 24, 32.
Human Rights Act, S.B.C. 1984, ch. 22, art. 13(1)d).
Human Rights Code, R.S.B.C. 1996, ch. 210, art. 24, 27.
Loi sur la Cour suprême, L.R.C. (1985), ch. S-26, art. 47.
Magna Carta (1215).

Doctrine citée

Blackstone, William. Commentaries on the Law of England, Book III, 4th ed. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1768.
 Brookings Task Force on Civil Justice Reform. Justice for All: Reducing Costs and Delay in Civil Litigation. Washington: Brookings Institution, 1989.
 Brown, Donald J. M., and John M. Evans. Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada. Toronto: Canvasback, 1998 (loose-leaf).
 Bryden, Philip. «Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission): A Case Comment» (1999), 33 U.B.C. L. Rev. 153.

Evans, J. M., H. N. Janisch and David J. Mullan. Administrative Law: Cases, Text, and Materials, 4th ed. Toronto: Edmond Montgomery, 1995.

Hawkins, Robert E. "Reputational Review III: Delay, Disrepute and Human Rights Commissions" (2000), 25 Queen's L.J. 599.

Hogg, Peter W. Constitutional Law of Canada, vol. 2, loose-leaf ed. Scarborough, Ont.: Carswell, 1992 (update 1999, release 1).

Holdsworth, Sir William. A History of English Law, 7th ed., vol. I. Revised under the general editorship of A. L. Goodhart and H. G. Hanbury. London: Methuen & Co., 1956.

Jones, David Phillip, and Anne S. de Villars. Principles of Administrative Law, 3rd ed. Scarborough, Ont.: Carswell, 1999.

McMurtrie, Sheena N. "The Waiting Game — The Parliamentary Commissioner's Response to Delay in Administrative Procedures", [1997] Public Law 159.

Ontario. Human Rights Commission. Annual Report 1997-1998. Toronto: The Commission, 1998.

Simpson, J. "Human Rights Commission Mill Grinds Slowly", The Globe & Mail, October 1, 1998, p. A18.

Skiffington, Lawrence S. "Federal Administrative Delay: Judicial Remedies and Application in the Natural Resource Context" (1982), 28 Rocky Mtn. Min. L. Inst. 671.

Wade, Sir William, and Christopher Forsyth. Administrative Law, 7th ed. Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1994.

APPEAL from a judgment of the British Columbia Court of Appeal (1998), 49 B.C.L.R. (3d) 216, 160 D.L.R. (4th) 303, 107 B.C.A.C. 162, 174 W.A.C. 162, 7 Admin. L.R. (3d) 220, 31 C.H.R.R. D/175, 53 C.R.R. (2d) 189, [1998] 9 W.W.R. 457, [1998] B.C.J. No. 1092 (QL), allowing an appeal from a decision of the British Columbia Supreme Court (1998), 49 B.C.L.R. (3d) 201, 35 C.C.E.L. (2d) 41, 30 C.H.R.R. D/439, [1999] 1 W.W.R. 139, [1998] B.C.J. No. 320 (QL), dismissing the respondent's petition for judicial review and order that proceedings be terminated due to delay. Appeal allowed, Iacobucci, Binnie, Arbour and LeBel JJ. dissenting in part.

John J. L. Hunter, Q.C., Thomas F. Beasley, K. Michael Stephens and Stephanie L. McHugh, for the appellants the British Columbia Human Rights

Evans, J. M., H. N. Janisch and David J. Mullan. Administrative Law: Cases, Text, and Materials, 4th ed. Toronto: Edmond Montgomery, 1995.

Hawkins, Robert E. «Reputational Review III: Delay, Disrepute and Human Rights Commissions» (2000), 25 Queen's L.J. 599.

Hogg, Peter W. Constitutional Law of Canada, vol. 2, loose-leaf ed. Scarborough, Ont.: Carswell, 1992 (update 1999, release 1).

Holdsworth, Sir William. A History of English Law, 7th ed., vol. I. Revised under the general editorship of A. L. Goodhart and H. G. Hanbury. London: Methuen & Co., 1956.

Jones, David Phillip, and Anne S. de Villars. Principles of Administrative Law, 3rd ed. Scarborough, Ont.: Carswell, 1999.

McMurtrie, Sheena N. «The Waiting Game — The Parliamentary Commissioner's Response to Delay in Administrative Procedures», [1997] Public Law 159.

Ontario. Commission des droits de la personne. Rapport annuel 1997-1998. Toronto: La Commission, 1998.

Simpson, J. «Human Rights Commission Mill Grinds Slowly», The Globe & Mail, 1998, p. A18.

Skiffington, Lawrence S. «Federal Administrative Delay: Judicial Remedies and Application in the Natural Resource Context» (1982), 28 Rocky Mtn. Min. L. Inst. 671.

Wade, Sir William, and Christopher Forsyth. Administrative Law, 7th ed. Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1994.

POURVOI contre un arrêt de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique (1998), 49 B.C.L.R. (3d) 216, 160 D.L.R. (4th) 303, 107 B.C.A.C. 162, 174 W.A.C. 162, 7 Admin. L.R. (3d) 220, 31 C.H.R.R. D/175, 53 C.R.R. (2d) 189, [1998] 9 W.W.R. 457, [1998] B.C.J. No. 1092 (QL), qui a accueilli un appel interjeté contre une décision de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique (1998), 49 B.C.L.R. (3d) 201, 35 C.C.E.L. (2d) 41, 30 C.H.R.R. D/439, [1999] 1 W.W.R. 139, [1998] B.C.J. No. 320 (QL), qui avait rejeté la demande de contrôle judiciaire et d'ordonnance mettant fin aux procédures pour cause de délai, que l'intimé avait présentée. Pourvoi accueilli, les juges Iacobucci, Binnie, Arbour et LeBel sont dissidents en partie.

John J. L. Hunter, c.r., Thomas F. Beasley, K. Michael Stephens et Stephanie L. McHugh, pour les appelants la British Columbia Human Rights Commission and the Commissioner of Investigation and Mediation.

Written submissions only by Susan E. Ross, for the appellant the British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal.

Robert B. Farvolden, for the appellant Andrea Willis.

Joseph J. Arvay, Q.C., for the respondent.

Mark C. Stacey and Rosy M. Mondin, for the intervener Irene Schell.

Hart Schwartz, for the intervener the Attorney General for Ontario.

Harvey M. Groberman, Q.C., for the intervener the Attorney General of British Columbia.

Milton Woodard, Q.C., for the intervener the Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission.

Cathryn Pike and Jennifer Scott, for the intervener the Ontario Human Rights Commission.

Lara J. Morris and Maureen E. Shebib, for the intervener the Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission.

Aaron L. Berg and Denis Guénette, for the intervener the Manitoba Human Rights Commission.

Fiona Keith, for the intervener the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

Hélène Tessier, for the intervener the Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse.

Frances Kelly and James Pozer, for the intervener the British Columbia Human Rights Coalition.

Jennifer L. Conkie and Dianne Pothier, for the intervener the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund.

Commission et le Commissioner of Investigation and Mediation.

Argumentation écrite seulement par Susan E. Ross, pour l'appelant le British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal.

Robert B. Farvolden, pour l'appelante Andrea Willis.

Joseph J. Arvay, c.r., pour l'intimé.

Mark C. Stacey et Rosy M. Mondin, pour l'intervenante Irene Schell.

Hart Schwartz, pour l'intervenant le procureur général de l'Ontario.

Harvey M. Groberman, c.r., pour l'intervenant le procureur général de la Colombie-Britannique.

Milton Woodard, c.r., pour l'intervenante la Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission.

Cathryn Pike et Jennifer Scott, pour l'intervenante la Commission ontarienne des droits de la personne.

Lara J. Morris et Maureen E. Shebib, pour l'intervenante la Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission.

Aaron L. Berg et Denis Guénette, pour l'intervenante la Commission des droits de la personne du Manitoba.

Fiona Keith, pour l'intervenante la Commission canadienne des droits de la personne.

Hélène Tessier, pour l'intervenante la Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse.

Frances Kelly et James Pozer, pour l'intervenante la British Columbia Human Rights Coalition.

Jennifer L. Conkie et Dianne Pothier, pour l'intervenant le Fonds d'action et d'éducation juridiques pour les femmes.

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Major and Bastarache JJ. was delivered by

BASTARACHE J. —

I. Introduction

1 This case raises the issue of whether the respondent's rights to "liberty and security of the person" under s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms were violated by state-caused delay in the human rights proceedings against him. In the alternative, should this Court find that s. 7 of the Charter was not engaged, it must be determined whether the respondent was entitled to a remedy pursuant to principles of administrative law, notwithstanding that he had not been prejudiced in his ability to respond to the complaints against him.

2 I have concluded that the respondent's rights to liberty and security of the person were not implicated in the circumstances of this case. There is therefore no need to determine whether the alleged violation was in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. While I accept that, under administrative law principles, a denial of natural justice may occur for reasons other than procedural unfairness to the respondent, I find that there has been no denial of natural justice or abuse of process in the circumstances of this case.

II. Factual Background

3 In 1995, the respondent, Robin Blencoe, had been a member of the British Columbia legislature for 12 years. In March of that year the respondent's assistant, Fran Yanor, went public with allegations that the respondent had sexually harassed her. Following this allegation, the respondent stepped down as Minister, but remained in Cabinet pending the results of an inquiry. On April 4, 1995, Premier Harcourt removed the respondent from Cabinet and dismissed him from the New Democratic Party caucus. Subsequently, in July and August of 1995, two sexual harassment complaints were filed with the British Columbia Coun-

Version française du jugement du juge en chef McLachlin et des juges L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Major et Bastarache rendu par

LE JUGE BASTARACHE —

I. Introduction

Le présent pourvoi porte sur la question de savoir si le délai imputable à l'État dans les procédures en matière de droits de la personne engagées contre l'intimé a porté atteinte aux droits de ce dernier «à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne», que lui garantit l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. Subsidiairement, si jamais notre Cour ne conclut pas à l'application de l'art. 7 de la Charte en l'espèce, il faudra déterminer si l'intimé a droit à une réparation fondée sur les principes du droit administratif, même s'il n'a pas été porté atteinte à sa capacité de répondre aux plaintes portées contre lui.

J'arrive à la conclusion que les droits de l'intimé à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne ne sont pas en cause dans la présente affaire. Il est donc inutile de déterminer si l'atteinte alléguée est conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale. Bien que je convienne que, selon les principes du droit administratif, il peut y avoir déni de justice naturelle pour des raisons autres que l'iniquité procédurale, je juge qu'il n'y a eu ni déni de justice naturelle ni abus de procédure dans les circonstances de la présente affaire.

II. Les faits

En 1995, l'intimé, Robin Blencoe, était député à l'assemblée législative de la Colombie-Britannique depuis 12 ans. En mars de la même année, son adjointe, Fran Yanor, l'a accusé publiquement de harcèlement sexuel. L'intimé a alors abandonné son poste de ministre, mais a continué de faire partie du Cabinet jusqu'à ce que les résultats d'une enquête soient connus. Le 4 avril suivant, le premier ministre Harcourt a exclu l'intimé du Cabinet et du caucus du Nouveau Parti Démocratique. En juillet et en août 1995, l'appelante Andrea Willis et l'intervenante Irene Schell ont déposé devant le British Columbia Council of Human Rights (le cil of Human Rights (“Council” or “Commission”) against the respondent and the provincial Crown under the Human Rights Act, S.B.C. 1984, c. 22 (now the Human Rights Code, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 210, since January 1, 1997) (also referred to as the “Act” or the “Code”) by the appellant Andrea Willis and the intervener, Irene Schell (“Complaints” or “Complaint”).

The Complaints centered around various incidents of sexual harassment alleged to have occurred between March 1993 and March 1995. It is not necessary, for the purposes of this appeal, that I comment on the particulars of the Complaints in any detail. In brief, Ms. Willis worked as a senior clerk in the respondent’s ministerial office and alleged that the respondent discriminated against her because of her sex with respect to terms and conditions of her employment, causing her to resign. The alleged incidents occurred in August 1994 and March 1995. Ms. Schell represented a government-funded sports association with which the respondent had contact in his ministerial capacity. She alleged that the respondent had discriminated against her because of her sex with respect to a service or facility customarily available to the public. The alleged incidents occurred in March 1993 and on several occasions in July 1993 and July 1994.

While the events that followed in the human rights proceedings are lengthy, they nevertheless merit recitation in some detail in order to adequately address the alleged delay in the process. The following are what I consider to be the most relevant facts regarding each of the Complaints.

A. The Schell Complaint

The Schell Complaint dealt with conduct which allegedly occurred more than six months before the Complaint was filed. For this reason, a threshold issue of timeliness arose pursuant to s. 13(1)(d) of the Act. By letter dated July 20, 1995, the respondent’s counsel was informed that the Commission was considering whether to proceed with the investigation of the Schell Complaint and that timeliness submissions should be made. Letters were sent by the respondent on July 21 and July «Conseil» ou la «Commission») deux plaintes de harcèlement sexuel contre l’intimé et Sa Majesté du chef de la province en application de la Human Rights Act, S.B.C. 1984, ch. 22 (désormais le Human Rights Code, R.S.B.C. 1996, ch. 210, depuis le 1^{er} janvier 1997) (également désigné sous le nom de «Loi» ou de «Code») (les «plaintes» ou la «plainte»).

Les plaintes concernaient divers épisodes de harcèlement sexuel qui seraient survenus entre mars 1993 et mars 1995. Il n’est pas nécessaire, aux fins du présent pourvoi, que je m’attarde aux détails des plaintes. En résumé, M^{me} Willis occupait le poste de commis principal au bureau du ministre Blencoe et elle a allégué que ce dernier avait fait preuve de discrimination sexuelle à son égard relativement à ses conditions de travail, ce qui l’aurait amenée à démissionner. Les épisodes en cause se seraient produits en août 1994 et en mars 1995. Pour sa part, M^{me} Schell représentait une association sportive financée par l’État, avec laquelle l’intimé était en rapport en sa qualité de ministre. Elle a prétendu que l’intimé avait fait preuve de discrimination sexuelle à son égard relativement à des services ou à des installations habituellement accessibles au public. Les épisodes en question se seraient produits en mars 1993 et à maintes reprises en juillet 1993 et en juillet 1994.

Malgré la longueur des procédures en matière de droits de la personne qui ont suivi, il y a lieu néanmoins de les relater de façon assez détaillée pour bien examiner l’allégation de délai. Les faits qui suivent sont, à mon avis, les plus pertinents en ce qui concerne chacune des plaintes.

A. La plainte de M^{me} Schell

La plainte de M^{me} Schell porte sur une conduite qui aurait été adoptée plus de six mois avant le dépôt de ladite plainte, ce qui soulève la question préliminaire du respect du délai imparti à l’al. 13(1)d de la Loi. Dans une lettre datée du 20 juillet 1995, la Commission a informé l’avocat de l’intimé qu’elle se demandait si elle devait enquêter sur la plainte de M^{me} Schell, et que des observations devraient être formulées concernant la question du respect du délai imparti. Les 21 et 28

4

5

6

28, 1995, requesting particulars of the Complaint. Particulars were provided by the Commission by letter dated August 2, 1995.

juillet 1995, l'intimé a envoyé des lettres dans lesquelles il demandait des précisions sur la plainte. La Commission a accédé à sa demande par lettre datée du 2 août 1995.

7 On August 31, 1995, the respondent's counsel notified the Commission that the respondent would not provide a detailed submission on the timeliness issue until Ms. Schell discharged the onus of proving that her Complaint was filed in good faith. The Commission informed the respondent that it was not necessary for Ms. Schell to adduce further material on this matter. The respondent subsequently provided substantive submissions on the timeliness issue on September 22, 1995.

Le 31 août 1995, l'avocat de l'intimé a informé la Commission que son client ne présenterait des observations détaillées sur la question du respect du délai que lorsque M^{me} Schell se serait acquittée de son obligation de prouver que la plainte avait été portée de bonne foi. La Commission a avisé l'intimé que M^{me} Schell n'avait pas à produire d'autres documents à ce propos. Par la suite, le 22 septembre 1995, l'intimé a fourni des observations de fond sur la question du respect du délai imparti.

8 On November 14, 1995, the respondent was informed that the Commission had received Ms. Schell's submissions on October 11, 1995, and that the submissions of both parties were being considered. The respondent had not been forwarded a copy of Ms. Schell's submissions. Following two requests for such by Mr. Blencoe, the Commission provided him with a copy of this document on December 15, 1995, stating that the production of such document was a departure from normal procedures. On February 8, 1996, the respondent provided the Commission with a response to Ms. Schell's timeliness submissions.

Le 14 novembre 1995, l'intimé a appris que la Commission avait reçu les observations de M^{me} Schell le 11 octobre 1995 et que les observations des deux parties étaient examinées. L'intimé n'avait pas obtenu copie des observations de M^{me} Schell. Le 15 décembre 1995, après deux demandes formulées en ce sens par M. Blencoe, la Commission lui a fait parvenir une copie du document demandé en lui précisant qu'il s'agissait d'une entorse à la procédure habituelle. Le 8 février 1996, l'intimé a fait parvenir à la Commission une réponse aux observations de M^{me} Schell concernant le respect du délai imparti.

9 On February 21, 1996, the respondent was informed that the Council had decided to proceed with the investigation and that he had 30 days to provide a full response to the allegations. In letters dated March 1 and March 27, 1996, the respondent requested the initial correspondence between Ms. Schell and the Commission. The respondent maintained that he would not respond to the particulars of allegation until such correspondence was produced. On April 1, 1996, the respondent was informed that such documents would not be disclosed and that the investigation would continue on the basis of existing materials if no response was received by April 10, 1996. A general denial to the allegations was given by the respondent on April 10, 1996. On June 19, 1996, the respondent received a letter from the Commission in response to his request regarding how long he would be required to wait for a hearing date. He was informed that a hearing could not be scheduled until the Commission determined that a hearing was required.

Le 21 février 1996, l'intimé a appris que le Conseil avait décidé d'enquêter sur la plainte et qu'il disposait de 30 jours pour fournir une réponse complète aux allégations. Dans des lettres datées du 1^{er} et du 27 mars 1996, l'intimé a réclamé la correspondance initiale entre M^{me} Schell et la Commission. L'intimé a maintenu qu'il ne répondrait aux détails des allégations que lorsque cette correspondance aurait été produite. Le 1^{er} avril 1996, l'intimé a été informé que ces documents ne seraient pas communiqués et que l'enquête se poursuivrait en fonction des documents existants si aucune réponse n'était reçue au plus tard le 10 avril 1996. L'intimé a présenté une dénégation générale des allégations le 10 avril 1996. Le 19 juin de la même année, l'intimé a reçu une lettre dans laquelle la Commission répondait à sa demande concernant le temps qu'il lui faudrait attendre avant qu'une date d'audience soit fixée. Il

On September 6, 1996, the respondent was notified that an investigator had been assigned to the Schell Complaint. By letter dated November 8, 1996, the Commission wrote to the respondent, requesting a response to certain information obtained in the course of investigating the Schell Complaint. Such information was provided by the respondent on December 23, 1996. On March 4, 1997, Mr. Blencoe's counsel was provided with a copy of the investigation report and asked for a written response by April 8, 1997. Such response was given on March 27, 1997. On April 15, 1997, the respondent was provided with the submissions received from Ms. Schell in response to the investigation report. Mr. Blencoe was requested to reply by May 15, 1997. Such response was provided on May 14, 1997.

By letter dated July 3, 1997, the respondent was notified that the Schell Complaint would be referred to the British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal ("Tribunal") for a hearing, without specifying the hearing date. That ended the involvement of the Commission in the Complaint. On September 10, 1997, the respondent was informed that the hearing was set for March 4, 5 and 6, 1998 and a pre-hearing conference in November of 1997. The hearing was thus scheduled to take place approximately 32 months after the initial Complaint was filed.

B. The Willis Complaint

The respondent was informed of the Willis Complaint by letter dated September 11, 1995. The respondent challenged the timeliness of the Complaint and asked the Council to make a decision pursuant to s. 13(1)(d) of the Act. The respondent was asked to provide submissions on timeliness within 15 days of the letter dated September 21, 1995. Such submissions were provided by Mr. Blencoe on October 11, 1995 with respect to both Complaints. On December 21, 1995, the respondent was sent a copy of Ms. Willis's submissions on timeliness which were dated October a appris qu'une telle date ne pourrait être fixée que lorsque la Commission aurait conclu à la nécessité de tenir une audience.

Le 6 septembre 1996, l'intimé a été avisé qu'un enquêteur avait été chargé d'examiner la plainte de M^{me} Schell. Le 8 novembre 1996, la Commission a fait parvenir à l'intimé une lettre dans laquelle elle lui demandait de réagir à certains renseignements obtenus pendant l'enquête relative à la plainte de M^{me} Schell. L'intimé a accédé à cette demande le 23 décembre 1996. Le 4 mars 1997, on a remis à l'avocat de M. Blencoe un exemplaire du rapport d'enquête et on lui a demandé d'y répondre par écrit au plus tard le 8 avril 1997, ce qu'il a fait le 27 mars de la même année. Le 15 avril 1997, l'intimé a obtenu copie des observations que M^{me} Schell avait transmises en réponse au rapport d'enquête. On a demandé à M. Blencoe d'y répliquer au plus tard le 15 mai 1997, ce qu'il a fait le 14 mai de la même année.

Dans une lettre datée du 3 juillet 1997, l'intimé a été avisé que la plainte de M^{me} Schell serait renvoyée au British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal (le «Tribunal») pour qu'il tienne une audience, sans que la date de cette audience ne soit toutefois précisée. La Commission était dès lors dessaisie de la plainte. Le 10 septembre 1997, l'intimé a appris que l'audience se déroulerait les 4, 5 et 6 mars 1998 et qu'une conférence préparatoire aurait lieu en novembre 1997. L'audience devait donc débuter environ 32 mois après le dépôt de la plainte initiale.

B. La plainte de M^{me} Willis

Dans une lettre datée du 11 septembre 1995, l'intimé a été informé de la plainte de M^{me} Willis. L'intimé a fait valoir que la plainte n'avait pas été déposée dans le délai imparti et a demandé au Conseil de rendre une décision fondée sur l'al. 13(1)(d) de la Loi. Dans une lettre datée du 21 septembre 1995, on lui a demandé de présenter dans les 15 jours suivants des observations sur la question du respect du délai imparti. Monsieur Blencoe a présenté des observations sur les deux plaintes le 11 octobre 1995. Le 21 décembre suivant, l'intimé a obtenu copie des observations de M^{me} Willis sur 16, 1995. It was standard practice of the Council not to give respondents the complainant's response submissions.

10

11

12

le respect du délai imparti, lesquelles étaient datées du 16 octobre 1995. Le Conseil n'avait pas coutume de communiquer les observations d'un plaignant à la personne qui fait l'objet de la plainte.

13 On January 9, 1996, the respondent wrote to the Council, requesting that it refrain from making a decision regarding timeliness until he could reply to Ms. Willis's submissions. The respondent challenged both the timeliness of the Complaints and whether they were made in good faith. He declined to provide his response until such preliminary issues were addressed, contending that the Complaints should not be addressed at all. The Council concluded that the Complaints were timely, that there was no evidence of bad faith, and that the Complaints should be fully investigated. On January 11, 1996, the respondent was notified that the Commission was proceeding with its investigation of the Willis Complaint. The decision to proceed with this Complaint had been reached by the Council more than three weeks earlier, on December 18, 1995. The delay was said to have resulted from Council not returning the decision on timeliness file to the case management secretary and a temporary backlog in the clerical area.

Le 9 janvier 1996, l'intimé a écrit au Conseil pour lui demander de s'abstenir de rendre une décision concernant le respect du délai imparti jusqu'à ce qu'il puisse répondre aux observations de M^{me} Willis. Il soutenait que les plaintes n'avaient pas été déposées dans le délai imparti et qu'elles n'avaient pas été portées de bonne foi. Il refusait de produire sa réponse tant que ces questions préliminaires n'auraient pas été tranchées et il prétendait qu'il n'y avait absolument pas lieu d'examiner les plaintes. Le Conseil a conclu que les plaintes avaient été déposées à temps, qu'il n'y avait aucune preuve de mauvaise foi et que les plaintes devraient faire l'objet d'une enquête complète. Le 11 janvier 1996, l'intimé a été avisé que la Commission enquêtait sur la plainte de M^{me} Willis. La décision d'enquêter sur la plainte avait été prise par le Conseil plus de trois semaines auparavant, soit le 18 décembre 1995. On a expliqué le délai écoulé par l'omission du Conseil de retourner le dossier de la décision sur le respect du délai imparti au fonctionnaire responsable de la gestion des dossiers et par un retard temporaire dans l'exécution des fonctions administratives.

14 On January 29, 1996, the respondent informed the Council that he was prepared to waive the investigation stage of the process and asked that the Council set the matter for hearing. However, this waiver was not feasible since the respondent was not prepared to concede that there was a sufficient evidentiary basis to warrant a hearing.

Le 29 janvier 1996, l'intimé a informé le Conseil qu'il était disposé à renoncer à l'étape de l'enquête et il lui a demandé d'inscrire l'affaire à son rôle. Cependant, cette renonciation n'était pas possible puisque l'intimé n'était pas prêt à reconnaître qu'il y avait une preuve suffisante pour justifier la tenue d'une audience.

15 In April 1996, Mr. Blencoe's counsel inquired as to when the hearing was expected to occur. In June 1996, he was informed that this could not be determined until the investigation was completed. The respondent was also informed that no investigator had been assigned to the Willis Complaint at that time and that there was a backlog of investigation files. By letter dated September 6, 1996, Mr. Blencoe was informed that an investigator had been assigned to the Willis Complaint. On November 8, 1996, Mr. Blencoe was asked to respond to certain information obtained during the investigation. Such response was given on December 23, 1996. On March 3, 1997, the respondent was provided with a completed investigation report and asked for written responses which were provided by the respondent on March 27, 1997. In April 1997, the respondent was sent the submissions of Ms. Willis. He replied to them on May 14, 1997.

En avril 1996, l'avocat de M. Blencoe s'est informé de la date à laquelle l'audience était censée avoir lieu. En juin de la même année, il a appris que cette date ne pourrait être fixée que lorsque l'enquête serait terminée. Il a également appris qu'aucun enquêteur n'avait encore été chargé d'examiner la plainte de M^{me} Willis et que le traitement des dossiers d'enquête accusait un retard. Dans une lettre datée du 6 septembre 1996, on a informé l'intimé qu'un enquêteur avait été chargé d'examiner la plainte de M^{me} Willis.

On July 3, 1997, the respondent was informed that the Willis Complaint would be referred to the Tribunal for hearing. That ended the involvement of the Commission in the Complaint. On September 10, 1997, the respondent was notified that the hearing was set for March 18, 19 and 20, 1998 and a pre-hearing conference in November 1997. The hearing was thus scheduled to take place approximately 32 months after the initial Complaint was filed.

Subsequent to the allegations of sex discrimination, the respondent and his family have been hounded by the media. Mr. Blencoe has suffered from severe depression and both he and his wife have sought psychological counselling. The respondent did not stand for re-election when his province went to the polls in 1996. Mr. Blencoe and his wife decided to move their family to Ontario in August 1996, in order to escape the media attention and seek employment. In May 1997, the family returned to Victoria, allegedly because they could not escape the harassment of the media which followed them to Ontario and because the respondent's wife received an excellent job offer in British Columbia. The respondent continues to be clinically depressed and has been prescribed medication. He was prevented from coaching his youngest son's soccer team on the grounds that the soccer association did not want him working with children. The respondent considers himself "unemployable" in British Columbia, due to the outstanding human rights Complaints against him.

On November 27, 1997, the respondent commenced proceedings for judicial review, claiming that the Commission had lost jurisdiction due to unreasonable delay in processing the human rights

Le 8 novembre 1996, on a demandé à M. Blencoe de réagir à certains renseignements obtenus pendant l'enquête, ce qu'il a fait le 23 décembre suivant. Le 3 mars 1997, on a remis à l'intimé une copie du rapport d'enquête et on lui a demandé d'y répondre par écrit, ce qu'il a fait le 27 mars suivant. En avril 1997, l'intimé a obtenu copie des observations de M^{me} Willis, et il y a répondu le 14 mai suivant.

Le 3 juillet 1997, l'intimé a appris que la plainte de M^{me} Willis serait renvoyée au Tribunal pour qu'il tienne une audience. La Commission était dès lors dessaisie de la plainte. Le 10 septembre 1997, l'intimé a été avisé que l'audience se déroulerait les 18, 19 et 20 mars 1998 et qu'une conférence préparatoire aurait lieu en novembre 1997. L'audience devait donc débiter environ 32 mois après le dépôt de la plainte initiale.

À la suite des allégations de discrimination sexuelle, l'intimé et les membres de sa famille ont été traqués par les médias. Monsieur Blencoe a fait une grave dépression, et son épouse et lui ont tous les deux eu recours aux services d'un psychologue. L'intimé n'a pas sollicité un nouveau mandat lors du scrutin provincial de 1996. En août 1996, M. Blencoe et son épouse ont décidé d'aller s'établir en Ontario afin d'échapper à l'attention des médias et de trouver du travail. En mai 1997, la famille est revenue à Victoria, apparemment parce qu'elle ne pouvait pas échapper au harcèlement des médias qui les avaient suivis jusqu'en Ontario et que l'épouse de l'intimé s'était vu offrir un emploi très intéressant en Colombie-Britannique. L'intimé souffre toujours de dépression clinique et consomme des médicaments sur ordonnance. Il n'a pas pu entraîner l'équipe de soccer de son fils cadet parce que l'association responsable ne voulait pas qu'il côtoie des enfants. L'intimé se dit «inapte au travail» en Colombie-Britannique en raison des plaintes fondées sur les droits de la personne qui pèsent toujours contre lui.

Le 27 novembre 1997, l'intimé a présenté une demande de contrôle judiciaire en faisant valoir que la Commission avait perdu compétence en raison d'un délai déraisonnable dans le traitement des Complaints. The respondent alleged that the unreasonable delay caused serious prejudice to him and his family which amounted to an abuse of process and a denial of natural justice.

III. Judicial History

A. British Columbia Supreme Court (1998), 49 B.C.L.R. (3d) 201

19 The respondent's application for judicial review was dismissed by Lowry J. on February 11, 1998. The question before the court was whether, given the time that had elapsed since the Complaints were first made to the Commission, personal hardship attributable to the stigma attached to the allegations justified the supervisory intervention of the court. The respondent also alleged that, because two prospective witnesses had died and the memories of other witnesses had faded, he would be unable to obtain a fair hearing. The respondent did not make an express s. 7 argument before the lower court, but relied instead on principles of natural justice, pursuant to administrative law jurisprudence and common law protections against undue delay. The respondent did however cite s. 7 jurisprudence to support his claim that the prejudice he suffered was analogous to the prejudice that justifies a stay of proceedings in the s. 7 context.

20 Lowry J. recognized that the allegations of sexual harassment had significantly affected the respondent's life and that his political career appeared to be finished. However, he added that it was difficult to determine to what extent such prejudice could be fairly attributed to any delay in the proceedings.

21 Lowry J. rejected the contention that, absent any application of the Charter, personal hardship attributable to unacceptable delay in an administrative process could, standing alone, constitute prejudice that entitled a respondent to prerogative relief. He held that delay will only constitute a denial of natural justice if the result of the delay is to directly prejudice the ability of an affected party plaintes fondées sur les droits de la personne. Il a allégué que ce délai déraisonnable avait causé à sa famille et à lui-même un préjudice grave équivalant à un abus de procédure et à un déni de justice naturelle.

III. Historique des procédures judiciaires

A. Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique (1998), 49 B.C.L.R. (3d) 201

Le 11 février 1998, le juge Lowry a rejeté la demande de contrôle judiciaire de l'intimé. La cour était appelée à décider si, en raison du délai écoulé depuis le dépôt initial des plaintes à la Commission, les difficultés personnelles imputables à la stigmatisation liée aux allégations justifiaient un contrôle judiciaire. L'intimé prétendait également que, du fait que deux témoins éventuels étaient décédés et que la mémoire d'autres témoins avait décliné, il ne pourrait pas obtenir une audience équitable. Il n'a avancé aucun argument explicitement fondé sur l'art. 7 devant le tribunal inférieur, préférant invoquer les principes de justice naturelle, conformément à la jurisprudence en matière de droit administratif et aux protections que la common law offre contre les délais injustifiés. Il a cependant invoqué la jurisprudence relative à l'art. 7 à l'appui de son allégation que le préjudice qu'il subissait s'apparentait à celui qui justifie un arrêt des procédures dans le contexte de l'art. 7.

Le juge Lowry a reconnu que les allégations de harcèlement sexuel avaient sensiblement perturbé l'existence de l'intimé et semblaient avoir mis un terme à sa carrière politique. Il a toutefois ajouté qu'il était difficile de déterminer dans quelle mesure le préjudice subi pouvait être attribué, à juste titre, à un délai dans le déroulement des procédures.

Le juge Lowry a rejeté la prétention que, en l'absence de toute application de la Charte, les difficultés personnelles imputables à un délai inacceptable dans le déroulement d'un processus administratif pouvaient, à elles seules, conférer à l'intimé le droit à un bref de prerogative. Il a conclu qu'un délai ne constitue un déni de justice naturelle pour une partie que s'il porte atteinte to respond. He concluded that Mr. Blencoe's ability to have a fair hearing had not been prejudiced, since he was able to respond to the Complaints in an evidentiary sense.

Apart from an unexplained five-month period in the human rights process, Lowry J. found that there had been no extended period of inactivity in the processing of the Complaints from receipt to referral. Communication had been ongoing between the Commission, solicitors and complainants, and the respondent had not been ignored. Lowry J. thus concluded that there had been no "unacceptable delay" in the human rights process. He also noted that the respondent had not brought any of his personal hardship to the Commission's attention, nor had he requested a prioritization of the Complaints on that basis.

B. British Columbia Court of Appeal (1998), 49 B.C.L.R. (3d) 216

Before the Court of Appeal, Mr. Blencoe expressly argued that his s. 7 rights to liberty and security of the person were violated due to the length of the delay in resolving the Complaints against him. On May 11, 1998, the Court of Appeal (McEachern C.J.B.C. and Prowse J.A. for the majority, in separate concurring reasons) allowed the appeal and directed that the human rights proceedings against the respondent be stayed. Lambert J.A., in dissent, would have upheld the judgment of the British Columbia Supreme Court.

(a) Majority Decision of McEachern C.J.B.C.

McEachern C.J.B.C. concluded that the undue delay and the continued prejudice to privacy and human dignity could not be in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice (para. 104). McEachern C.J.B.C. found that the delay could not be attributed to Mr. Blencoe since he was unable to directement à sa capacité de se défendre. Il a conclu qu'il n'y avait eu aucune atteinte à la capacité de M. Blencoe d'obtenir une audience équitable étant donné qu'il était en mesure de répondre aux plaintes en produisant des éléments de preuve.

Outre le délai inexpliqué de cinq mois dans le déroulement du processus en matière de droits de la personne, le juge Lowry a estimé qu'il n'y avait eu aucune période d'inactivité prolongée dans le traitement des plaintes entre leur dépôt et leur renvoi pour audience. La communication avait été constante entre la Commission, les avocats et les plaignantes, et l'intimé n'avait pas été tenu à l'écart. Le juge Lowry a donc conclu qu'il n'y avait pas eu de «délai inacceptable» dans le déroulement du processus en cause. Il a également souligné que l'intimé n'avait ni fait part de ses difficultés personnelles à la Commission ni demandé que l'on donne la priorité aux plaintes pour ce motif.

B. Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique (1998), 49 B.C.L.R. (3d) 216

En Cour d'appel, M. Blencoe a expressément soutenu que les droits à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne que lui garantit l'art. 7 ont été violés en raison de la longueur du délai écoulé sans que les plaintes portées contre lui n'aient été réglées. Le 11 mai 1998, la Cour d'appel (le juge en chef McEachern et le juge Prowse s'exprimant, au nom de la majorité, dans des motifs concordants distincts) a accueilli l'appel et ordonné l'arrêt des procédures en matière de droits de la personne qui avaient été engagées contre l'intimé. Le juge Lambert, dissident, aurait confirmé le jugement de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique.

a) La décision majoritaire du juge en chef McEachern

Le juge en chef McEachern a conclu que le délai injustifié et l'atteinte constante à la vie privée et à la dignité de la personne ne pouvaient pas être conformes aux principes de justice fondamentale (par. 104). Il a jugé que le délai ne pouvait pas être imputé à M. Blencoe étant donné qu'il ne pouvait identify any steps taken by the respondent to which he was not entitled in defending himself. McEachern C.J.B.C. opined that the Complaints were not complex, but were rather of the type that are “quickly resolved by courts and tribunals all the time” (para. 37), such that “a week at the outside would have sufficed” to complete the investigation (para. 51). He added (at paras. 47 and 51):

22

23

24

... a delay of over 30 months from the date of the complaints to a hearing on the merits is far too long. If Mr. Blencoe had been charged in the criminal courts with this type of sexual assault, the charge would very likely be dismissed on grounds of delay . . .

As I have already commented, the investigation was necessarily one-dimensional as there were no eyewitnesses, and a week at the outside would have sufficed.

25 Turning to the issue of prejudice, McEachern C.J.B.C. found that but for these proceedings, “it might reasonably be expected that the overwhelming [media] attention would have died away and [Blencoe] and his family could have attempted to reconstruct their lives” (para. 53). He considered the contention that the prejudice suffered by the respondent was not caused by the delay, but rather by his dismissal from Cabinet. In this connection McEachern C.J.B.C. held that the Supreme Court of Canada has elevated the “exacerbation” of an existing deprivation to the same level as the creation of the deprivation itself. He held that the excessive delay both created a substantial stigma against the accused and exacerbated an existing state of affairs, thus triggering the s. 7 right to security of the person.

26 McEachern C.J.B.C. noted that the jurisprudence surrounding the application of s. 7 in a non-penal context was “fraught with considerable difficulty” (para. 60). He identified two competing streams of jurisprudence as to the scope of s. 7 in the Supreme Court. First, McEachern C.J.B.C. described what he referred to as the “judicial domain” school, which limits s. 7 protection to criminal proceedings. This approach was then contrasted with a broader approach to s. 7 which pro-pas dire que ce dernier avait pris des mesures qu’il n’avait pas le droit de prendre pour se défendre. Il s’est dit d’avis que les plaintes n’étaient pas complexes, mais qu’elles étaient plutôt du genre de celles que [TRADUCTION] «les tribunaux judiciaires et les tribunaux administratifs règlent toujours rapidement» (par. 37), de sorte qu’«il aurait suffi tout au plus d’une semaine» pour effectuer l’enquête (par. 51). Il a ajouté ce qui suit (aux par. 47 et 51):

[TRADUCTION] . . . un délai de plus de 30 mois entre le dépôt des plaintes et la tenue d’une audience au fond est beaucoup trop long. Si M. Blencoe avait été accusé au criminel de ce genre d’agression sexuelle, l’accusation serait fort probablement rejetée pour des raisons de délai . . .

Comme je l’ai déjà expliqué, l’enquête était nécessairement unidimensionnelle puisqu’il n’y avait aucun témoin oculaire, et il aurait suffi tout au plus d’une semaine.

Au sujet de la question du préjudice, le juge en chef McEachern a conclu que, n’eût été de ces procédures, [TRADUCTION] «on aurait pu raisonnablement s’attendre à ce que l’attention [médiatique] considérable s’estompe et à ce que [Blencoe] et les membres de sa famille puissent tenter de retrouver une vie normale» (par. 53). Il a examiné la prétention que le préjudice subi par l’intimé résultait non pas du délai, mais plutôt de son exclusion du Cabinet. Le juge en chef McEachern a conclu, à cet égard, que la Cour suprême du Canada a placé sur un pied d’égalité l’«aggravation» d’une atteinte existante et le fait de porter atteinte. Il a estimé que le délai excessif avait à la fois considérablement stigmatisé l’accusé et aggravé une situation déjà existante, de sorte que le droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti par l’art. 7 s’appliquait.

Le juge en chef McEachern a fait remarquer que la jurisprudence entourant l’application de l’art. 7 dans un contexte non pénal [TRADUCTION] «posait de grandes difficultés» (par. 60). Il a relevé, au sujet de la portée de l’art. 7, deux courants opposés dans la jurisprudence de la Cour suprême. Premièrement, le juge en chef McEachern a parlé de ce qu’il a appelé l’école du «domaine judiciaire» qui limite la protection de l’art. 7 aux procédures criminelles. Il a ensuite comparé ce point de vue avec protects an individual's right to "human dignity" and "privacy" outside the arena of criminal proceedings. McEachern C.J.B.C. adopted the more expansive approach (at para. 101):

... I feel constrained to follow what I regard as the emerging, preferred view in the Supreme Court of Canada that s. 7, under the rubric of liberty and security of the person, operates to protect both the privacy and dignity of citizens against the stigma of undue, prolonged humiliation and public degradation of the kind suffered by [Blencoe] here. Everyone can be made answerable, according to law, for his or her conduct or misconduct, but a process established by law to provide accountability and appropriate remedies cannot be completely open-ended in the sense that human dignity, even for wrongdoers if such is the case, can be compromised for as long as it has occurred in this case.

(b) Concurring Majority Judgment of Prowse J.A.

Prowse J.A. held that the allegations in this case were analogous to allegations of sexual assault and thus engaged s. 7 of the Charter. Having regard to the nature of the allegations and the extent of the prejudice suffered by Mr. Blencoe, she agreed with McEachern C.J.B.C. that the delay of over 30 months was unreasonable and breached the respondent's right to security of the person in a manner not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

(c) Dissenting Reasons of Lambert J.A.

In determining whether the delay was unacceptable, for the purposes of an assessment of natural justice, Lambert J.A. held that such decision was an issue of fact which was decided by the lower court. Consequently, he stated that Lowry J.'s decision should only be interfered with if there was a misconception of the evidence or if the decision was palpably wrong, neither of which had occurred in this case. On the legal question of which sorts of une interprétation plus large de l'art. 7 qui protège le droit de chacun à la «dignité» et à la «vie privée» ailleurs que dans le seul contexte de procédures criminelles. Le juge en chef McEachern s'est dit favorable à l'interprétation plus libérale (au par. 101):

[TRADUCTION] ... je me sens contraint à suivre ce qui me semble être la nouvelle interprétation préconisée par la Cour suprême du Canada, selon laquelle, au chapitre de la liberté et de la sécurité de la personne, l'art. 7 a pour effet de protéger à la fois la vie privée et la dignité des citoyens contre la stigmatisation découlant d'un opprobre prolongé et injustifié comme celui dont [M. Blencoe] a été victime. Suivant la loi, n'importe qui peut être tenu responsable de sa conduite ou de son inconduite, mais le processus établi par la loi pour statuer sur la responsabilité et accorder un redressement approprié ne peut avoir une durée totalement indéterminée au point où la dignité d'une personne, même fautive, peut être compromise aussi longtemps qu'elle l'a été en l'espèce.

(b) Le jugement majoritaire concordant du juge Prowse

Le juge Prowse a conclu que les allégations formulées en l'espèce s'apparentaient à des allégations d'agression sexuelle et faisaient donc intervenir l'art. 7 de la Charte. Compte tenu de la nature des allégations et de l'étendue du préjudice subi par M. Blencoe, elle a convenu avec le juge en chef McEachern que le délai de plus de 30 mois était déraisonnable et portait atteinte, d'une manière non conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale, au droit de l'intimé à la sécurité de sa personne.

(c) Les motifs dissidents du juge Lambert

La question de savoir si le délai était inacceptable au regard des principes de justice naturelle était, selon le juge Lambert, une question de fait que le tribunal inférieur avait tranchée. Il a donc affirmé qu'il n'y aurait lieu de modifier la décision du juge Lowry que s'il y avait eu mauvaise interprétation de la preuve ou décision manifestement erronée, ce qui n'était pas le cas en l'espèce. Quant à la question de droit qui est de savoir quels genres prejudice affect natural justice, Lambert J.A. agreed with Lowry J. that prejudice arising from delay must go to the intrinsic fairness of the hearing process and not merely to extrinsic factors such as stigma, stress or other forms of suffering.

de préjudice sont contraires aux principes de justice naturelle, le juge Lambert a convenu avec le juge Lowry que le préjudice découlant d'un délai doit se rapporter à l'équité intrinsèque de la procédure d'audition et non seulement à un facteur extrinsèque comme la stigmatisation, le stress ou d'autres formes de souffrance.

29 Turning to the Charter issue, Lambert J.A. found it unnecessary to decide whether s. 7 of the Charter applies to non-criminal proceedings or whether suffering induced by stigmatization, stress and disruption of family life can constitute a deprivation of liberty or security of the person in the human rights context. He found that the stigma suffered by Mr. Blencoe, the stress and anxiety related thereto, the media publicity, and Mr. Blencoe's lack of employment, could not be attributed to the human rights process, nor were they exacerbated by a breach of the principles of fundamental justice. Lambert J.A. emphasized that Mr. Blencoe's rights and expectations had to be balanced against those of the two complainants, in the context of the public interest in upholding an effective human rights process. Concluding that the principles of fundamental justice arising in the human rights process were not breached, Lambert J.A. would have found that the respondent was not entitled to relief under ss. 7 and 24 of the Charter.

En ce qui concerne la question relative à la Charte, le juge Lambert a décidé qu'il était inutile de déterminer si l'art. 7 de la Charte s'applique dans des procédures non criminelles ou si les souffrances dues à la stigmatisation, au stress et à la perturbation de la vie familiale peuvent constituer une atteinte à la liberté ou à la sécurité de la personne dans le contexte des droits de la personne. Il a conclu que la stigmatisation dont M. Blencoe a été victime, le stress et l'angoisse qui en ont résulté, la couverture médiatique et le fait que M. Blencoe n'avait plus d'emploi n'étaient pas attribuables au processus en matière de droits de la personne et n'avaient pas été aggravés par une violation des principes de justice fondamentale. Le juge Lambert a souligné que les droits et les attentes de M. Blencoe devaient être soupesés en fonction de ceux des deux plaignantes et de l'intérêt du public dans le maintien d'un processus efficace en matière de droits de la personne. Après avoir conclu qu'il n'y avait eu aucune violation des principes de justice fondamentale qui s'appliquent en matière de droits de la personne, le juge Lambert aurait conclu que l'intimé n'avait pas droit à une réparation fondée sur les art. 7 et 24 de la Charte.

IV. Relevant Constitutional Provisions

IV. Dispositions constitutionnelles pertinentes

30 Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

Charte canadienne des droits et libertés

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

7. Chacun a droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne; il ne peut être porté atteinte à ce droit qu'en conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale.

11. Any person charged with an offence has the right

11. Tout inculpé a le droit:

. . .

. . .

(b) to be tried within a reasonable time;

b) d'être jugé dans un délai raisonnable;

24. (1) Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

32. (1) This Charter applies

(a) to the Parliament and government of Canada in respect of all matters within the authority of Parliament including all matters relating to the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories; and

(b) to the legislature and government of each province in respect of all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province.

V. Issues

The following are the central issues to be determined for the disposition of this appeal:

- A. Does the Charter apply to the actions of the British Columbia Human Rights Commission?
- B. Have the respondent's s. 7 rights to liberty and security of the person been violated by state-caused delay in the human rights proceedings?
- C. If the respondent's s. 7 rights were not engaged, or if the state's actions were in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, was the respondent entitled to a remedy pursuant to administrative law principles where the delay did not interfere with the right to a fair hearing?
- D. If the respondent is entitled to a Charter or administrative law remedy, was the stay of proceedings an appropriate remedy in the circumstances of this case?

VI. Analysis

- A. Does the Charter Apply to the Actions of the British Columbia Human Rights Commission?

The scope of the Charter's application is delineated by s. 32(1) of the Charter which states:

24. (1) Toute personne, victime de violation ou de négation des droits ou libertés qui lui sont garantis par la présente charte, peut s'adresser à un tribunal compétent pour obtenir la réparation que le tribunal estime convenable et juste eu égard aux circonstances.

32. (1) La présente charte s'applique:

a) au Parlement et au gouvernement du Canada, pour tous les domaines relevant du Parlement, y compris ceux qui concernent le territoire du Yukon et les territoires du Nord-Ouest;

b) à la législature et au gouvernement de chaque province, pour tous les domaines relevant de cette législature.

V. Questions en litige

Notre Cour est appelée, aux fins du présent pourvoi, à trancher les questions centrales suivantes:

- A. La Charte s'applique-t-elle aux actes de la British Columbia Human Rights Commission?
- B. Le délai imputable à l'État dans les procédures en matière de droits de la personne a-t-il porté atteinte aux droits de l'intimé à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne garantis par l'art. 7?
- C. Si les droits garantis à l'intimé par l'art. 7 n'étaient pas en cause ou si les actes de l'État étaient conformes aux principes de justice fondamentale, l'intimé avait-il droit à une réparation fondée sur les principes du droit administratif dans la mesure où le délai écoulé n'a pas porté atteinte à son droit à une audience équitable?
- D. Si l'intimé a droit à une réparation fondée sur la Charte ou sur le droit administratif, l'arrêt des procédures était-il la réparation appropriée eu égard aux circonstances de la présente affaire?

VI. Analyse

- A. La Charte s'applique-t-elle aux actes de la British Columbia Human Rights Commission?

La portée de la Charte est délimitée par son par. 32(1), dont voici le libellé:

32. (1) This Charter applies

(a) to the Parliament and government of Canada in respect of all matters within the authority of Parliament including all matters relating to the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories; and

(b) to the legislature and government of each province in respect of all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province.

It is clear that both the federal Parliament and provincial legislatures are bound by the Charter. However, one threshold issue which has been raised in this case is whether the Commission and the Tribunal are agents of government pursuant to s. 32 of the Charter. The following three factors have been put forth to support the argument that these bodies are not bound by the Charter: (i) the organizations in question are required to be independent of government; (ii) the challenge in this case is not to any statutory provisions that might be said to be within the legislative sphere; and (iii) the organizations in question must act judicially since their functions are analogous to those exercised by courts of law.

32. (1) La présente charte s'applique:

a) au Parlement et au gouvernement du Canada, pour tous les domaines relevant du Parlement, y compris ceux qui concernent le territoire du Yukon et les territoires du Nord-Ouest;

b) à la législature et au gouvernement de chaque province, pour tous les domaines relevant de cette législature.

Il est clair que le Parlement du Canada et les législatures provinciales sont assujettis à la Charte. Cependant, une question préliminaire que soulève la présente affaire est de savoir si la Commission et le Tribunal sont des mandataires du gouvernement aux fins de l'art. 32 de la Charte. Les trois facteurs suivants ont été avancés à l'appui de l'argument voulant que ces organismes ne soient pas assujettis à la Charte: (i) les organismes en cause doivent être indépendants du gouvernement, (ii) la contestation en l'espèce ne vise pas une disposition dont on pourrait dire qu'elle ressortit au pouvoir législatif et (iii) les organismes en question doivent agir d'une manière judiciaire, étant donné que leurs fonctions sont analogues à celles d'une cour de justice.

33 For the reasons I address below, these claims are misguided with respect to their approach to the application of the Charter. Furthermore, for the purposes of this appeal, it is only necessary to address the Charter's applicability to the actions of the Commission since the prejudice suffered by the respondent is alleged to have resulted from unreasonable delay in the actions of the Commission.

Pour les raisons exposées ci-après, ces prétentions s'appuient sur une façon erronée d'aborder l'application de la Charte. De plus, aux fins du présent pourvoi, il est seulement nécessaire d'examiner l'applicabilité de la Charte aux actes de la Commission, étant donné que le préjudice subi par l'intimé serait imputable au fait que la Commission n'a pas agi dans un délai raisonnable.

34 The mere fact that a body is independent of government is not determinative of the Charter's application, nor is the fact that a statutory provision is not impugned. Being autonomous or independent from government is not a conclusive basis upon which to hold that the Charter does not apply.

Le seul fait qu'un organisme soit indépendant du gouvernement n'est pas décisif en ce qui concerne l'application de la Charte, pas plus que ne l'est le fait qu'aucune disposition législative n'est contestée. L'autonomie ou l'indépendance vis-à-vis du gouvernement ne permet pas de conclure à l'inapplication de la Charte.

35 Bodies exercising statutory authority are bound by the Charter even though they may be independent of government. This was confirmed by

L'organisme qui exerce un pouvoir conféré par une loi est assujetti à la Charte même s'il peut être indépendant du gouvernement. Le juge La Forest

La Forest J., speaking for a unanimous Court in Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 624, at para. 21:

There is no doubt, however, that the Charter also applies to action taken under statutory authority. The rationale for this rule flows inexorably from the logical structure of s. 32. As Professor Hogg explains in his Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd ed. 1992 (loose-leaf)), vol. 1, at pp. 34-8.3 and 34-9:

Action taken under statutory authority is valid only if it is within the scope of that authority. Since neither Parliament nor a Legislature can itself pass a law in breach of the Charter, neither body can authorize action which would be in breach of the Charter. Thus, the limitations on statutory authority which are imposed by the Charter will flow down the chain of statutory authority and apply to regulations, by-laws, orders, decisions and all other action (whether legislative, administrative or judicial) which depends for its validity on statutory authority.

There is no doubt that the Commission is created by statute and that all of its actions are taken pursuant to statutory authority.

One distinctive feature of actions taken under statutory authority is that they involve a power of compulsion not possessed by private individuals (P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (loose-leaf ed.), vol. 2, at p. 34-12). Clearly the Commission possesses more extensive powers than a natural person. The Commission's authority is not derived from the consent of the parties. The Human Rights Code grants various powers to the Commission to both investigate complaints and decide how to deal with such complaints. Section 24 of the Code specifically allows the Commissioner to compel the production of documents. The relevant portions of this section state:

24 (1) For the purpose of investigating a complaint, the commissioner of investigation and mediation or a human rights officer may l'a confirmé en rendant l'arrêt unanime de notre Cour Eldridge c. Colombie-Britannique (Procureur général), [1997] 3 R.C.S. 624, au par. 21:

Toutefois, il ne fait aucun doute que la Charte s'applique aussi aux actes accomplis en vertu de pouvoirs conférés par la loi. La justification de cette règle découle inexorablement de la structure logique de l'art. 32. Comme l'explique le professeur Hogg dans Constitutional Law of Canada (3^e éd. 1992 (feuilles mobiles)), vol. 1, aux pp. 34-8.3 et 34-9:

[TRANSDUCTION] Les mesures prises en vertu d'un pouvoir statutaire ne sont valides que si elles se situent à l'intérieur de la portée de ce pouvoir. Puisque ni le Parlement ni une législature ne peuvent eux-mêmes adopter une loi qui contrevient à la Charte, ni l'un ni l'autre ne peuvent autoriser des mesures qui contreviendraient à la Charte. Ainsi, les limites que la Charte impose à un pouvoir statutaire s'étendront à la famille des autres pouvoirs statutaires et s'appliqueront aux règlements, aux statuts, aux ordonnances, aux décisions et à toutes les autres mesures (législatives, administratives ou judiciaires) dont la validité dépend d'un pouvoir statutaire.

Il ne fait aucun doute que la Commission a été créée par une loi et qu'elle accomplit tous ses actes en vertu du pouvoir que lui confère la loi en cause.

L'un des traits distinctifs des actes accomplis en vertu d'un pouvoir conféré par la loi est qu'ils comportent un pouvoir de contrainte que n'ont pas les particuliers (P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (éd. feuilles mobiles), vol. 2, à la p. 34-12). Il est clair que les pouvoirs de la Commission sont plus étendus que ceux d'une personne physique. Sa compétence ne découle pas du consentement des parties. Le Human Rights Code habilite, de diverses manières, la Commission à enquêter sur des plaintes et à décider de la façon de les traiter. L'article 24 du Code permet expressément au commissaire d'exiger la production de documents. En voici les extraits pertinents:

[TRANSDUCTION]

24 (1) Lorsqu'il l'enquête relative à une plainte, le commissaire aux enquêtes et à la médiation ou un agent des droits de la personne peut

(a) require the production of books, documents, correspondence or other records that relate or may relate to the complaint, and

(b) make any inquiry relating to the complaint of any person, in writing or orally.

(2) If a person refuses to

(a) comply with a demand under subsection (1) (a) for the production of books, documents, correspondence or other records, or

(b) respond to an inquiry made under subsection (1) (b), the commissioner of investigation and mediation or a human rights officer may apply to the Supreme Court for an order requiring the person to comply with the demand or respond to the inquiry.

. . . .

(4) For the purpose of investigating a complaint, the commissioner of investigation and mediation or a human rights officer may, with the consent of the owner or occupier, enter and inspect any premises that in the opinion of that commissioner or the human rights officer may provide information relating to the complaint.

a) exiger la production de livres, documents, lettres ou autres dossiers qui se rapportent ou peuvent se rapporter à la plainte, et

b) poser des questions par écrit ou de vive voix relativement à la plainte.

(2) Si une personne refuse

a) d'obtempérer à une demande de production de livres, documents, lettres ou autres dossiers, fondée sur l'alinéa (1)a), ou

b) de répondre à une question posée en vertu de l'alinéa (1)b), le commissaire aux enquêtes et à la médiation ou un agent des droits de la personne peut demander à la Cour suprême d'ordonner à la personne en cause d'obtempérer à la demande ou de répondre à la question.

. . . .

(4) Lorsqu'il enquête sur une plainte, le commissaire aux enquêtes et à la médiation ou un agent des droits de la personne peut, avec le consentement du propriétaire ou de l'occupant, inspecter des locaux si, à son avis, cette inspection peut permettre d'obtenir des renseignements concernant la plainte.

37

The Commission in this case cannot therefore escape Charter scrutiny merely because it is not part of government or controlled by government. In Eldridge, a unanimous Court concluded that a hospital was bound by the Charter since it was implementing a specific government policy or program. The Commission in this case is both implementing a specific government program and exercising powers of statutory compulsion.

En l'espèce, la Commission ne peut pas échapper à un examen fondé sur la Charte du seul fait qu'elle ne fait pas partie du gouvernement ou qu'elle n'est pas sous son contrôle. Dans l'arrêt Eldridge, notre Cour a conclu à l'unanimité qu'un hôpital était assujéti à la Charte parce qu'il mettait en œuvre une politique ou un programme gouvernemental particulier. La commission dont il est question en l'espèce met en œuvre un programme gouvernemental particulier et exerce des pouvoirs de contrainte émanant de la loi.

38

With respect to the claim that the Commission exercises judicial functions and is thereby not subject to the Charter, the decision of this Court in Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038, is conclusive. Lamer J. (as he then was), in partial dissent but speaking for a unanimous Court on this point, held that the Charter applies to the orders of a statutorily appointed labour arbitrator. This determination was not open

L'arrêt de notre Cour Slaight Communications Inc. c. Davidson, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 1038, est concluant en ce qui concerne la prétention que la Commission exerce des fonctions judiciaires et n'est donc pas assujéti à la Charte. Le juge Lamer (plus tard Juge en chef), dissident en partie, mais s'exprimant au nom de toute la Cour sur ce point, a décidé que la Charte s'applique aux ordonnances d'un arbitre en matière de relations to challenge, as expressed by Lamer J., at pp. 1077-78:

The fact that the Charter applies to the order made by the adjudicator in the case at bar is not, in my opinion, open to question. The adjudicator is a statutory creature: he is appointed pursuant to a legislative provision and derives all his powers from the statute. [Emphasis added.]

The facts in Slaight and the case at bar share at least one salient feature: the labour arbitrator (in Slaight) and the Commission (in the case at bar) each exercise governmental powers conferred upon them by a legislative body. The ultimate source of authority in each of these cases is government. All of the Commission's powers are derived from the statute. The Commission is carrying out the legislative scheme of the Human Rights Code. It is putting into place a government program or a specific statutory scheme established by government to implement government policy (see Eldridge, supra, at paras. 37 and 44, and Douglas/Kwantlen Faculty Assn. v. Douglas College, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 570, at p. 584). The Commission must act within the limits of its enabling statute. There is clearly a "governmental quality" to the functions of a human rights commission which is created by government to promote equality in society generally.

Thus, notwithstanding that the Commission may have adjudicatory characteristics, it is a statutory creature and its actions fall under the authority of the Human Rights Code. The state has instituted an administrative structure, through a legislative scheme, to effectuate a governmental program to provide redress against discrimination. It is the administration of a governmental program that calls for Charter scrutiny. Once a complaint is brought before the Commission, the subsequent administrative proceedings must comply with the Charter. These entities are subject to Charter scrutiny in the performance of their functions just as government would be in like circumstances. To hold otherwise would allow the legislative branch to circumvent the Charter by establishing statutory du travail désigné en application d'une loi. Cette décision était incontestable, comme l'a dit le juge Lamer à la p. 1077:

Le fait que la Charte s'applique à l'ordonnance rendue par l'arbitre en l'espèce ne fait, à mon avis, aucun doute. L'arbitre est en effet une créature de la loi; il est nommé en vertu d'une disposition législative et tire tous ses pouvoirs de la loi. [Je souligne.]

Les faits de l'affaire Slaight et ceux de la présente affaire ont au moins une caractéristique commune prédominante: l'arbitre en matière de relations du travail (dans Slaight) et la Commission (en l'espèce) exercent tous les deux des pouvoirs gouvernementaux conférés par un corps législatif. Dans chaque cas, l'origine du pouvoir accordé est en fin de compte le gouvernement. La Commission tire tous ses pouvoirs de la loi. Elle applique le régime législatif du Human Rights Code. Elle met en œuvre un programme gouvernemental ou un régime législatif particulier établi par le gouvernement pour l'application de sa politique (voir Eldridge, précité, aux par. 37 et 44, et Douglas/Kwantlen Faculty Assn. c. Douglas College, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 570, à la p. 584). La Commission doit agir dans les limites de sa loi habilitante. Les fonctions d'une commission des droits de la personne créée par le gouvernement pour promouvoir l'égalité dans la société en général sont clairement de «nature gouvernementale».

Donc, même si elle peut avoir certaines caractéristiques d'un tribunal, la Commission est une créature de la loi et ses actes sont assujettis au Human Rights Code. L'État a créé par voie législative un organisme administratif chargé de mettre en œuvre un programme gouvernemental destiné à remédier à la discrimination. C'est l'application d'un programme gouvernemental qui commande l'examen fondé sur la Charte. Une fois la Commission saisie d'une plainte, les procédures administratives qui suivent doivent respecter la Charte. L'exercice des fonctions de telles entités peut faire l'objet d'un examen fondé sur la Charte tout comme pourrait le faire l'exercice des fonctions d'un gouvernement dans les mêmes circonstances. Conclure le contraire permettrait au pouvoir légisbodies that are immune to Charter scrutiny. The above analysis leads inexorably to the conclusion that the Charter applies to the actions of the Commission.

39

40

B. Have the Respondent's Section 7 Rights to Liberty and Security of the Person Been Violated by State-caused Delay in Human Rights Proceedings?

(a) Court of Appeal Decisions on This Issue

41 Four appellate courts have dealt with the issue of whether s. 7 of the Charter applies in circumstances similar to the case at bar, including the decision under appeal. The majority of the Court of Appeal in Blencoe followed the decision in Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission v. Kodellas (1989), 60 D.L.R. (4th) 143 (Sask. C.A.), to hold that s. 7 of the Charter was violated. However, the Manitoba Court of Appeal in Nisbett v. Manitoba (Human Rights Commission) (1993), 101 D.L.R. (4th) 744, and the Federal Court of Appeal in Canadian Airlines International Ltd. v. Canada (Human Rights Commission), [1996] 1 F.C. 638, refused to follow Kodellas, holding that s. 7 cannot be applied to the consequences of delays in human rights proceedings.

42 In Kodellas, between the date of the first complaint and the date fixed for the hearing, almost four years had elapsed and three years and two months had elapsed with respect to the second complaint. Bayda C.J.S., dissenting in part with respect to the appropriate remedy, held that the delay violated Mr. Kodellas's s. 7 security of the person. In reaching this conclusion, Bayda C.J.S. referred to the dissenting judgment of Lamer J. in Mills v. The Queen, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863 (hereinafter "Mills (1986)"), at p. 919, and reiterated in R. v. Rahey, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 588, at p. 605, where, in the context of s. 11(b) of the Charter, security of the person encompasses protection against latif de contourner la Charte en créant des organismes qui ne peuvent pas faire l'objet d'un tel examen. L'analyse qui précède mène inexorablement à la conclusion que la Charte s'applique aux actes de la Commission.

B. Le retard imputable à l'État dans les procédures en matière de droits de la personne a-t-il porté atteinte aux droits de l'intimé à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne garantis par l'art. 7?

a) La jurisprudence des cours d'appel sur ce point

Quatre cours d'appel ont statué sur la question de savoir si l'art. 7 de la Charte s'applique dans des circonstances semblables à celles de la présente affaire, y compris la cour d'appel dans l'arrêt qui fait l'objet du présent pourvoi. Dans l'affaire Blencoe, les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont suivi l'arrêt Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission c. Kodellas (1989), 60 D.L.R. (4th) 143 (C.A. Sask.), et ont conclu qu'il y avait violation de l'art. 7 de la Charte. Toutefois, la Cour d'appel du Manitoba dans Nisbett c. Manitoba (Human Rights Commission) (1993), 101 D.L.R. (4th) 744, et la Cour d'appel fédérale dans Lignes aériennes Canadien International Ltée c. Canada (Commission des droits de la personne), [1996] 1 C.F. 638, ont refusé de suivre l'arrêt Kodellas et ont conclu que l'art. 7 ne peut pas s'appliquer aux conséquences d'un délai dans des procédures en matière de droits de la personne.

Dans l'affaire Kodellas, près de quatre années s'étaient écoulées entre le dépôt de la première plainte et la date fixée pour la tenue de l'audience, alors que trois années et deux mois s'étaient écoulées dans le cas de la deuxième plainte. Le juge en chef Bayda, dissident en partie au sujet de la réparation appropriée, a conclu que le délai écoulé portait atteinte au droit de M. Kodellas à la sécurité de sa personne garanti par l'art. 7. En tirant cette conclusion, le juge en chef Bayda a mentionné les motifs dissidents du juge Lamer dans Mills c. La Reine, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 863 (ci-après l'«arrêt Mills de 1986»), à la p. 919, repris dans R. c. Rahey, [1987] 1 R.C.S. 588, à la p. 605, selon lesquels la sécurité de la personne, dans le contexte de l’al. 11b) de la Charte, englobe la protection contre [TRADUCTION] «un assujettissement trop long aux vexations et aux vicissitudes d’une accusation criminelle pendante» (Kodellas, à la p. 152). Il a été jugé, dans Kodellas, que le délai déraisonnable avait causé deux formes de préjudice à M. Kodellas: premièrement, il avait prolongé son traumatisme psychologique et, deuxièmement, il avait réduit les chances de M. Kodellas d’obtenir une audience équitable (Kodellas, à la p. 161).

“overlong subjection to the vexations and vicissitudes of a pending criminal accusation” (Kodellas, at p. 152). The unreasonable delay in Kodellas was found to result in two forms of prejudice to Mr. Kodellas. First, it extended his psychological trauma. Second, it reduced Mr. Kodellas’s chances of a fair hearing (Kodellas, at p. 161).

In Nisbett, the Manitoba Court of Appeal denied relief sought by a medical doctor to prohibit the hearing of his employee’s complaint of sexual harassment that had been outstanding for over three years. This decision was reached despite the stigma attached to the allegations which was described as “anxiety, the strain on family life, the disruption of his professional practice, the quest for evidence of similar conduct from former employees, the damage to his personal dignity and professional standing, the loss of self-esteem, and the continuing uncertainty as to the final outcome of the proceedings” (Nisbett, at p. 749) (quoting from the trial judgment (1992), 90 D.L.R. (4th) 672, at p. 679). The Manitoba Court of Appeal refused to follow Kodellas, questioning whether the impact of a criminal proceeding for sexual assault can be equated with a human rights proceeding on allegations of sex discrimination for the purposes of s. 7. The Court of Appeal concluded that s. 7 had no application to non-penal proceedings under human rights legislation and that s. 11 of the Charter was restricted to criminal cases.

Dans l’arrêt Nisbett, la Cour d’appel du Manitoba a refusé d’interdire, à la demande d’un médecin, l’audition de la plainte de harcèlement sexuel que l’employée de ce dernier avait déposée plus de trois ans auparavant. Elle a rendu cette décision malgré les stigmates liés aux allégations, qui avait été décrits comme étant [TRADUCTION] «l’angoisse, la perturbation de la vie familiale et de la vie professionnelle, la recherche d’une preuve de comportement similaire auprès d’anciennes employées, l’atteinte à la dignité personnelle et à la réputation professionnelle, la perte d’estime de soi et l’incertitude continuelle quant à l’issue finale des procédures» (Nisbett, à la p. 749 (citation provenant du jugement de première instance (1992), 90 D.L.R. (4th) 672, à la p. 679)). Doutant que l’incidence de procédures criminelles en matière d’agression sexuelle puisse être assimilée, aux fins de l’application de l’art. 7, à celle de procédures en matière de droits de la personne relatives à des allégations de discrimination sexuelle, la Cour d’appel du Manitoba a refusé de suivre l’arrêt Kodellas. Elle a statué que l’art. 7 ne s’appliquait pas à des procédures non pénales fondées sur une loi relative aux droits de la personne et que l’art. 11 de la Charte ne s’appliquait qu’en matière criminelle.

In Canadian Airlines, there was a 50-month delay between the filing of the complaint and the appointment of a tribunal to investigate. The Federal Court of Appeal also refused to follow Kodellas, and concluded that s. 7 did not apply to administrative proceedings of a non-criminal nature.

Dans Lignes aériennes Canadien, un délai de 50 mois s’était écoulé entre le dépôt de la plainte et la désignation des membres du tribunal chargé de faire enquête. La Cour d’appel fédérale y a également refusé de suivre l’arrêt Kodellas et a conclu que l’art. 7 ne s’appliquait pas à des procédures administratives de nature non criminelle.

43

44

(b) Applicability of Section 7 Outside the Criminal Context

45

Although there have been some decisions of this Court which may have supported the position that s. 7 of the Charter is restricted to the sphere of criminal law, there is no longer any doubt that s. 7 of the Charter is not confined to the penal context. This was most recently affirmed by this Court in New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46, where Lamer C.J. stated that the protection of security of the person extends beyond the criminal law (at para. 58). He later added (at para. 65):

... s. 7 is not limited solely to purely criminal or penal matters. There are other ways in which the government, in the course of the administration of justice, can deprive a person of their s. 7 rights to liberty and security of the person, i.e., civil committal to a mental institution: see B. (R.), supra, at para. 22.

46

Thus, to the extent that the above decisions of Nisbett and Canadian Airlines stand for the proposition that s. 7 can never apply outside the criminal realm, they are incorrect. Section 7 can extend beyond the sphere of criminal law, at least where there is “state action which directly engages the justice system and its administration” (G. (J.), at para. 66). If a case arises in the human rights context which, on its facts, meets the usual s. 7 threshold requirements, there is no specific bar against such a claim and s. 7 may be engaged. The question to be addressed, however, is not whether delays in human rights proceedings can engage s. 7 of the Charter but rather, whether the respondent’s s. 7 rights were actually engaged by delays in the circumstances of this case. Various parties in this case seem to have conflated the delay issue with the threshold s. 7 issue. However, whether the respondent’s s. 7 rights to life, liberty and security of the person are engaged is a separate issue from whether the delay itself was unreasonable. I will now examine whether the s. 7 threshold requirements have been met and whether the

b) Applicabilité de l’art. 7 dans un contexte autre que celui du droit criminel

Même si, dans certains arrêts, notre Cour a pu adhérer au point de vue que l’art. 7 de la Charte ne s’applique que dans le domaine du droit criminel, il ne fait plus aucun doute que cette disposition n’est pas limitée au contexte pénal. C’est ce que confirmait tout récemment notre Cour dans Nouveau-Brunswick (Ministre de la Santé et des Services communautaires) c. G. (J.), [1999] 3 R.C.S. 46, où le juge en chef Lamer a affirmé que la protection de la sécurité de la personne déborde le cadre du droit criminel (au par. 58). Plus loin, il a ajouté ce qui suit (au par. 65):

... l’art. 7 n’est pas limité aux affaires purement criminelles ou pénales. Dans le cours de l’administration de la justice, il existe d’autres façons par lesquelles l’État peut priver un individu du droit à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne garanti à l’art. 7, par exemple l’internement dans un établissement psychiatrique: voir B. (R.), précité, au par. 22.

Ainsi, les arrêts Nisbett et Lignes aériennes Canadien, précités, sont erronés dans la mesure où ils permettent d’affirmer que l’art. 7 ne s’applique qu’en matière criminelle. L’article 7 peut déborder le cadre du droit criminel, au moins dans le cas d’un «acte gouvernemental intéressant directement le système judiciaire et l’administration de la justice» (G. (J.), au par. 66). Rien ne s’oppose à ce que cet article s’applique à une affaire en matière des droits de la personne qui, sur le plan des faits, respecte les conditions préliminaires de son application. La question qui se pose toutefois est de savoir non pas si des délais dans des procédures en matière de droits de la personne peuvent déclencher l’application de l’art. 7 de la Charte, mais plutôt si, dans les circonstances de la présente affaire, des délais ont porté atteinte aux droits garantis à l’intimé par l’art. 7. Différentes parties à la présente affaire semblent avoir confondu la question du délai avec la question préliminaire de l’art. 7. Toutefois, la question de savoir si les droits de l’intimé à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne s’appliquent est distincte de celle de savoir si le délai lui-même était déraisonnable. Je vais maintenant examiner si les conditions prélimirespondent has demonstrated a breach of his s. 7 rights.

(c) Section 7 — General Principles

Section 7 of the Charter provides that “[e]veryone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.” Thus, before it is even possible to address the issue of whether the respondent’s s. 7 rights were infringed in a manner not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, one must first establish that the interest in respect of which the respondent asserted his claim falls within the ambit of s. 7. These two steps in the s. 7 analysis have been set out by La Forest J. in R. v. Beare, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 387, at p. 401, as follows:

To trigger its operation there must first be a finding that there has been a deprivation of the right to “life, liberty and security of the person” and, secondly, that the deprivation is contrary to the principles of fundamental justice.

Thus, if no interest in the respondent’s life, liberty or security of the person is implicated, the s. 7 analysis stops there. It is at the first stage in the s. 7 analysis that I have the greatest problem with the respondent’s s. 7 arguments.

McEachern C.J.B.C. collapsed the s. 7 interests of “liberty” and “security of the person” into a single right protecting a person’s dignity against the stigma of undue, prolonged humiliation and public degradation of the kind suffered by the respondent. In Singh v. Minister of Employment and Immigration, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 177, at pp. 204-5, Wilson J. emphasized that “life, liberty and security of the person” are three distinct interests, and that it is incumbent on the Court to give meaning to each of these elements. This statement was endorsed by Lamer J. for a majority of this Court in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486, at p. 500. In addressing the issue of whether the respondent’s s. 7 rights have been breached in this case, I also prefer to keep the interests protected by s. 7 analytically distinct to the extent possible. For the naires de l’application de l’art. 7 sont remplies et si l’intimé a démontré qu’il y a eu violation des droits que lui garantit cet article.

c) Article 7 — Principes généraux

L’article 7 de la Charte prévoit ceci: «[c]haque personne a droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne; il ne peut être porté atteinte à ce droit qu’en conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale.» Ainsi, avant même que l’on puisse se demander si les droits garantis à l’intimé par l’art. 7 ont fait l’objet d’une atteinte non conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale, il faut d’abord prouver que le droit visé par l’allégation de l’intimé relève de l’art. 7. Dans l’arrêt R. c. Beare, [1988] 2 R.C.S. 387, à la p. 401, le juge La Forest a énoncé ainsi ces deux étapes de l’analyse fondée sur l’art. 7:

Pour que l’article puisse entrer en jeu, il faut constater d’abord qu’il a été porté atteinte au droit «à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité [d’une] personne» et, en second lieu, que cette atteinte est contraire aux principes de justice fondamentale.

Par conséquent, si le droit de l’intimé à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de sa personne n’est pas en cause, l’analyse fondée sur l’art. 7 prend fin. C’est à la première étape de cette analyse que les arguments de l’intimé relatifs à l’art. 7 me posent le plus de difficultés.

Le juge en chef McEachern a fondu le droit «à la liberté» et le droit «à la sécurité de [l]a personne» en un seul droit à la protection de la dignité de la personne contre la stigmatisation découlant d’un opprobre prolongé et injustifié comme celui dont l’intimé a été victime. Dans Singh c. Ministre de l’Emploi et de l’Immigration, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 177, aux pp. 204 et 205, le juge Wilson a insisté sur le fait que «la vie, la liberté et la sécurité de la personne» constituent trois droits distincts et qu’il incombe à notre Cour de préciser le sens de chacun de ces droits. Le juge Lamer a souscrit à cet énoncé au nom de notre Cour à la majorité dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., [1985] 2 R.C.S. 486, à la p. 500. Pour déterminer si, en l’espèce, il a été porté atteinte aux droits de l’intimé garantis par l’art. 7, je préfère, dans la mesure du purposes of this appeal, the outcome is dependent upon the meaning to be given to the interests of “liberty” and “security of the person”.

47

48

(d) Liberty Interest

49

The liberty interest protected by s. 7 of the Charter is no longer restricted to mere freedom from physical restraint. Members of this Court have found that “liberty” is engaged where state compulsions or prohibitions affect important and fundamental life choices. This applies for example where persons are compelled to appear at a particular time and place for fingerprinting (Beare, supra); to produce documents or testify (Thomson Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada (Director of Investigation and Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 425); and not to loiter in particular areas (R. v. Heywood, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 761). In our free and democratic society, individuals are entitled to make decisions of fundamental importance free from state interference. In B. (R.) v. Children’s Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 S.C.R. 315, at para. 80, La Forest J., with whom L’Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier and McLachlin JJ. agreed, emphasized that the liberty interest protected by s. 7 must be interpreted broadly and in accordance with the principles and values underlying the Charter as a whole and that it protects an individual’s personal autonomy:

... liberty does not mean mere freedom from physical restraint. In a free and democratic society, the individual must be left room for personal autonomy to live his or her own life and to make decisions that are of fundamental personal importance.

50

In R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30, Wilson J., speaking for herself alone, was of the opinion that s. 251 of the Criminal Code violated not only a woman’s right to security of the person but her s. 7 liberty interest as well. She indicated that the liberty interest is rooted in fundamental notions of human dignity, personal autonomy, privacy and possible, cloisonner ces droits aux fins de l’analyse. L’issue du présent pourvoi dépend du sens donné aux droits «à la liberté» et «à la sécurité de [l]a personne».

d) Droit à la liberté

Le droit à la liberté garanti par l’art. 7 de la Charte ne s’entend plus uniquement de l’absence de toute contrainte physique. Des juges de notre Cour ont conclu que la «liberté» est en cause lorsque des contraintes ou des interdictions de l’État influent sur les choix importants et fondamentaux qu’une personne peut faire dans sa vie. Une telle situation existe, par exemple, lorsque des personnes doivent se présenter à un endroit et à un moment précis pour faire prendre leurs empreintes digitales (Beare, précité), produire des documents ou témoigner (Thomson Newspapers Ltd. c. Canada (Directeur des enquêtes et recherches, Commission sur les pratiques restrictives du commerce), [1990] 1 R.C.S. 425), et lorsque des personnes doivent s’abstenir de flâner dans certains lieux (R. c. Heywood, [1994] 3 R.C.S. 761). Dans notre société libre et démocratique, chacun a le droit de prendre des décisions d’importance fondamentale sans intervention de l’État. Dans B. (R.) c. Children’s Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 R.C.S. 315, au par. 80, le juge La Forest, avec l’assentiment des juges L’Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier et McLachlin, souligne que le droit à la liberté garanti par l’art. 7 protège l’autonomie personnelle et qu’il doit être interprété largement et en conformité avec les principes et les valeurs qui sous-tendent la Charte dans son ensemble:

... la liberté ne signifie pas simplement l’absence de toute contrainte physique. Dans une société libre et démocratique, l’individu doit avoir suffisamment d’autonomie personnelle pour vivre sa propre vie et prendre des décisions qui sont d’importance fondamentale pour sa personne.

Dans R. c. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 R.C.S. 30, le juge Wilson, s’exprimant uniquement en son propre nom, était d’avis que l’art. 251 du Code criminel violait non seulement le droit d’une femme à la sécurité de sa personne, mais également son droit à la liberté garanti par l’art. 7. Elle a indiqué que le droit à la liberté prend racine dans les concepts choice in decisions regarding an individual's fundamental being. She conveyed this as follows, at p. 166:

Thus, an aspect of the respect for human dignity on which the Charter is founded is the right to make fundamental personal decisions without interference from the state. This right is a critical component of the right to liberty. Liberty, as was noted in Singh, is a phrase capable of a broad range of meaning. In my view, this right, properly construed, grants the individual a degree of autonomy in making decisions of fundamental personal importance.

The above passage was endorsed by La Forest J. in B. (R.), supra, at para. 80. This Court in B. (R.) was asked to decide whether the s. 7 liberty interest protects the rights of parents to choose medical treatment for their children. The above passage from Wilson J. was applied by La Forest J. to individual interests of fundamental importance in our society such as the parental interest in caring for one's children.

In Godbout v. Longueuil (City), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 844, at para. 66, La Forest J., writing for L'Heureux-Dubé J. and McLachlin J. (as she then was), reiterated his position that the right to liberty in s. 7 protects the individual's right to make inherently private choices and that choosing where to establish one's home is one such inherently personal choice:

The foregoing discussion serves simply to reiterate my general view that the right to liberty enshrined in s. 7 of the Charter protects within its ambit the right to an irreducible sphere of personal autonomy wherein individuals may make inherently private choices free from state interference. I must emphasize here that, as the tenor of my comments in B. (R.) should indicate, I do not by any means regard this sphere of autonomy as being so wide as to encompass any and all decisions that individuals might make in conducting their affairs. Indeed, such a view would run contrary to the basic idea, expressed both at the outset of these reasons and in my reasons in B. (R.), that individuals cannot, in any organized society, be guaranteed an unbridled freedom to do whatever they please. Moreover, I do not even consider that the sphere of autonomy includes within its fondamentaux de la dignité humaine, de l'autonomie personnelle, de la vie privée et du choix des décisions concernant l'être fondamental de l'individu. Voici ce qu'elle a dit, à la p. 166:

Ainsi, un aspect du respect de la dignité humaine sur lequel la Charte est fondée est le droit de prendre des décisions personnelles fondamentales sans intervention de l'État. Ce droit constitue une composante cruciale du droit à la liberté. La liberté, comme nous l'avons dit dans l'arrêt Singh, est un terme susceptible d'une acception fort large. À mon avis, ce droit, bien interprété, confère à l'individu une marge d'autonomie dans la prise de décisions d'importance fondamentale pour sa personne.

Le juge La Forest a adopté cet extrait dans l'arrêt B. (R.), précité, au par. 80. Dans cette affaire, notre Cour était appelée à décider si le droit à la liberté garanti par l'art. 7 protège le droit des parents de choisir un traitement médical pour leurs enfants. Le juge La Forest a appliqué l'extrait précité des motifs du juge Wilson aux droits individuels qui revêtent une importance fondamentale dans notre société, comme le droit des parents de prendre soin de leurs enfants.

Dans l'arrêt Godbout c. Longueuil (Ville), [1997] 3 R.C.S. 844, au par. 66, le juge La Forest, s'exprimant au nom du juge L'Heureux-Dubé et du juge McLachlin (maintenant Juge en chef), a réitéré son point de vue selon lequel le droit à la liberté garanti par l'art. 7 protège le droit de chacun de faire des choix intrinsèquement privés, y compris le choix d'un lieu pour établir sa demeure:

L'analyse qui précède ne fait que répéter mon opinion générale selon laquelle la protection du droit à la liberté garanti par l'art. 7 de la Charte s'étend au droit à une sphère irréductible d'autonomie personnelle où les individus peuvent prendre des décisions intrinsèquement privées sans intervention de l'État. Comme les propos que j'ai tenus dans l'arrêt B. (R.) l'indiquent, je n'entends pas par là, je le précise, que cette sphère d'autonomie est vaste au point d'englober toute décision qu'un individu peut prendre dans la conduite de ses affaires. Une telle opinion, en effet, irait à l'encontre du principe fondamental que j'ai formulé au début des présents motifs et dans les motifs de l'arrêt B. (R.), selon lequel nul ne peut, dans une société organisée, prétendre à la garantie de la liberté absolue d'agir comme il lui plaît. J'estime même que cette sphère d'autonomie ne protège scope every matter that might, however vaguely, be described as “private”. Rather, as I see it, the autonomy protected by the s. 7 right to liberty encompasses only those matters that can properly be characterized as fundamentally or inherently personal such that, by their very nature, they implicate basic choices going to the core of what it means to enjoy individual dignity and independence. As I have already explained, I took the view in B. (R.) that parental decisions respecting the medical care provided to their children fall within this narrow class of inherently personal matters. In my view, choosing where to establish one’s home is, likewise, a quintessentially private decision going to the very heart of personal or individual autonomy. [Emphasis added.]

La Forest J. therefore spoke in Godbout of a narrow sphere of inherently personal decision-making deserving of the law’s protection. Choosing where to establish one’s home fell within that narrow class according to three members of this Court.

pas tout ce qui peut, même vaguement, être qualifié de «privé». Je suis plutôt d’avis que l’autonomie protégée par le droit à la liberté garanti par l’art. 7 ne comprend que les sujets qui peuvent à juste titre être qualifiés de fondamentalement ou d’essentiellement personnels et qui impliquent, par leur nature même, des choix fondamentaux participant de l’essence même de ce que signifie la jouissance de la dignité et de l’indépendance individuelles. Comme je l’ai déjà mentionné, j’ai exprimé, dans l’arrêt B.(R.), l’opinion voulant que les décisions des parents quant aux soins médicaux administrés à leurs enfants appartiennent à cette catégorie limitée de sujets fondamentalement personnels. À mon avis, le choix d’un lieu pour établir sa demeure est, de la même façon, une décision essentiellement privée qui tient de la nature même de l’autonomie personnelle. [Je souligne.]

Dans l’arrêt Godbout, le juge La Forest a donc parlé d’une catégorie limitée de décisions intrinsèquement personnelles qui méritent la protection de la loi. Selon trois juges de notre Cour, le choix d’un lieu pour établir sa demeure faisait partie de cette catégorie limitée.

52 Dissenting at the New Brunswick Court of Appeal in G. (J.), I also favoured a more generous approach to the liberty interest that would protect personal rights that are inherent to the individual and consistent with the essential values of our society (New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. J.G. (1997), 187 N.B.R. (2d) 81, at para. 49). In this vein, the parental interest in raising and caring for one’s children would be protected. I however agreed with La Forest J.’s caution that the liberty interest would encompass only those decisions that are of fundamental importance.

Dissident en Cour d’appel du Nouveau Brunswick dans l’affaire G. (J.), j’ai également préconisé une interprétation plus généreuse du droit à la liberté qui protégerait les droits personnels qui sont inhérents à l’individu et conformes aux valeurs essentielles de notre société (Nouveau-Brunswick (Ministre de la Santé et des Services communautaires) c. J.G. (1997), 187 R.N.-B. (2^e) 81, au par. 49). Dans le même ordre d’idées, le droit des parents d’éduquer leurs enfants et d’en prendre soin serait protégé. J’ai cependant souscrit à la mise en garde du juge La Forest selon laquelle le droit à la liberté n’engloberait que les décisions qui revêtent une importance fondamentale.

53 Professor Hogg, supra, at p. 44-9, supports a more cautious approach to the interpretation of s. 7 such that s. 7 does not become a residual right which envelopes all of the legal rights in the Charter. Professor Hogg also addresses the deliberate omission of “property” from “life, liberty and security of the person” in s. 7, and states, at p. 44-12:

Le professeur Hogg, op. cit., à la p. 44-9, préconise une interprétation plus prudente de l’art. 7 de manière à éviter que cet article confère un droit résiduel englobant toutes les garanties juridiques de la Charte. Le professeur Hogg aborde aussi la question de l’omission délibérée de garantir, à l’art. 7, le droit à la «propriété», en sus du droit «à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de [l]a personne», et affirme, à la p. 44-12:

It also requires . . . that those terms [liberty and security of the person] be interpreted as excluding economic liberty and economic security; otherwise, property, having been shut out of the front door, would enter by the back.

[TRADUCTION] Cela exige en outre [. . .] que ces termes [liberté et sécurité de [l]a personne] soient interprétés

Although an individual has the right to make fundamental personal choices free from state interference, such personal autonomy is not synonymous with unconstrained freedom. In the circumstances of this case, the state has not prevented the respondent from making any “fundamental personal choices”. The interests sought to be protected in this case do not in my opinion fall within the “liberty” interest protected by s. 7.

(e) Security of the Person

In the criminal context, this Court has held that state interference with bodily integrity and serious state-imposed psychological stress constitute a breach of an individual’s security of the person. In this context, security of the person has been held to protect both the physical and psychological integrity of the individual (Morgentaler, supra, at p. 56, per Dickson C.J., and at p. 173, per Wilson J.; Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519, at p. 587, per Sopinka J.; Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man.), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1123, at p. 1177, per Lamer J.). These decisions relate to situations where the state has taken steps to interfere, through criminal legislation, with personal autonomy and a person’s ability to control his or her own physical or psychological integrity such as prohibiting assisted suicide and regulating abortion.

The principle that the right to security of the person encompasses serious state-imposed psychological stress has recently been reiterated by this Court in G. (J.), supra. At issue in G. (J.) was whether relieving a parent of the custody of his or her children restricts a parent’s right to security of the person. Lamer C.J. held that the parental interest in raising one’s children is one of fundamental personal importance. State removal of a child from parental custody thus constitutes direct state interference with the psychological integrity of the parent, amounting to a “gross intrusion” into the private and intimate sphere of the parent-child comme excluant la liberté et la sécurité économiques; sinon, refoulée à la porte avant, la propriété entrerait par la porte arrière.

Même si un individu a le droit de faire des choix personnels fondamentaux sans intervention de l’État, cette autonomie personnelle n’est pas synonyme de liberté illimitée. Dans les circonstances de la présente affaire, l’État n’a pas empêché l’intimé de faire des «choix personnels fondamentaux». À mon avis, les droits que l’on cherche à protéger en l’espèce ne font pas partie du droit «à la liberté» garanti par l’art. 7.

e) Sécurité de la personne Notre Cour a statué, en matière criminelle, que l’atteinte de l’État à l’intégrité corporelle et la tension psychologique grave causée par l’État constituent une atteinte à la sécurité de la personne. Dans ce contexte, il a été jugé que la sécurité de la personne vise à la fois l’intégrité physique et l’intégrité psychologique (Morgentaler, précité, à la p. 56, le juge en chef Dickson, et à la p. 173, le juge Wilson; Rodriguez c. Colombie-Britannique (Procureur général), [1993] 3 R.C.S. 519, à la p. 587, le juge Sopinka; Renvoi relatif à l’art. 193 et à l’al. 195.1(1)c) du Code criminel (Man.), [1990] 1 R.C.S. 1123, à la p. 1177, le juge Lamer). Ces arrêts concernent des situations où l’État a légiféré au criminel dans le but de s’ingérer dans l’autonomie personnelle et la capacité d’une personne de maîtriser sa propre intégrité physique ou psychologique, en interdisant notamment l’aide au suicide et en réglementant l’avortement.

Récemment, dans l’arrêt G. (J.), précité, notre Cour a réitéré le principe voulant que le droit à la sécurité de la personne vise la tension psychologique grave causée par l’État. La question en litige dans cette affaire était de savoir si le retrait de la garde d’un enfant portait atteinte au droit du parent à la sécurité de sa personne. Le juge en chef Lamer a conclu que le droit des parents d’élever leurs enfants est un droit personnel d’une importance fondamentale. Le retrait de la garde d’un enfant par l’État constitue donc une atteinte directe à l’intégrité psychologique du parent équivalant à une «intrusion flagrante» dans le domaine privé et relationship (at para. 61). Lamer C.J. concluded that s. 7 guarantees every parent the right to a fair hearing where the state seeks to obtain custody of their children (at para. 55). However, the former Chief Justice also set boundaries in G. (J.) for cases where one's psychological integrity is infringed upon. He referred to the attempt to delineate such boundaries as "an inexact science" (para. 59).

54

55

56

intime du lien parent-enfant (au par. 61). Le juge en chef Lamer a conclu que l'art. 7 garantit aux parents le droit à une audience équitable lorsque l'État demande la garde de leurs enfants (au par. 55). Cependant, il a également établi, dans l'arrêt G. (J.), des limites applicables aux cas où il y a atteinte à l'intégrité psychologique d'une personne. Il a affirmé que la tentative d'établir de telles limites n'est pas une «science exacte» (par. 59).

57

Not all state interference with an individual's psychological integrity will engage s. 7. Where the psychological integrity of a person is at issue, security of the person is restricted to "serious state-imposed psychological stress" (Dickson C.J. in Morgentaler, supra, at p. 56). I think Lamer C.J. was correct in his assertion that Dickson C.J. was seeking to convey something qualitative about the type of state interference that would rise to the level of infringing s. 7 (G. (J.), at para. 59). The words "serious state-imposed psychological stress" delineate two requirements that must be met in order for security of the person to be triggered. First, the psychological harm must be state imposed, meaning that the harm must result from the actions of the state. Second, the psychological prejudice must be serious. Not all forms of psychological prejudice caused by government will lead to automatic s. 7 violations. These two requirements will be examined in turn.

Les atteintes de l'État à l'intégrité psychologique d'une personne ne font pas toutes intervenir l'art. 7. Lorsque l'intégrité physique d'une personne est en cause, la sécurité de la personne se limite à la «tension psychologique grave causée par l'État» (le juge en chef Dickson dans Morgentaler, précité, à la p. 56). Je crois que le juge en chef Lamer a eu raison de dire que le juge en chef Dickson tentait d'exprimer en termes qualitatifs le type d'ingérence de l'État susceptible de violer l'art. 7 (G. (J.), au par. 59). Selon l'expression «tension psychologique grave causée par l'État», deux conditions doivent être remplies que la sécurité de la personne soit en cause. Premièrement, le préjudice psychologique doit être causé par l'État, c'est-à-dire qu'il doit résulter d'un acte de l'État. Deuxièmement, le préjudice psychologique doit être grave. Les formes que prend le préjudice psychologique causé par le gouvernement n'entraînent pas toutes automatiquement des violations de l'art. 7. Je vais examiner successivement ces deux conditions.

(i) Was the Harm to Mr. Blencoe the Result of State-Caused the Human Rights Process?

(i) Le préjudice subi par M. Blencoe résulte-t-il d'un délai imputable à l'État dans le déroulement du processus en matière de droits de la personne?

58

In G. (J.), Lamer C.J. found direct state interference with the psychological integrity of the parent, describing the government action in that case as "direct state interference with the parent-child relationship" (para. 61). Later, at para. 66, Lamer C.J. referred to a child custody application as "an example of state action which directly engages the justice system and its administration" (emphasis added). He stressed that not every state action

Dans G. (J.), le juge en chef Lamer a conclu qu'il y avait eu atteinte directe de l'État à l'intégrité psychologique du parent, qualifiant la mesure prise dans cette affaire par le gouvernement d'«ingérence directe de l'État dans le lien parent-enfant» (par. 61). Plus loin, au par. 66, il a dit que les demandes de garde d'enfants sont «un exemple d'acte gouvernemental intéressant directement le système judiciaire et l'administration de la justice» which interferes with the parent-child relationship would have triggered s. 7.

Stress, anxiety and stigma may arise from any criminal trial, human rights allegation, or even a civil action, regardless of whether the trial or process occurs within a reasonable time. We are therefore not concerned in this case with all such prejudice but only that impairment which can be said to flow from the delay in the human rights process. It would be inappropriate to hold government accountable for harms that are brought about by third parties who are not in any sense acting as agents of the state.

While it is incontrovertible that the respondent has suffered serious prejudice in connection with the allegations of sexual harassment against him, there must be a sufficient causal connection between the state-caused delay and the prejudice suffered by the respondent for s. 7 to be triggered. In Operation Dismantle Inc. v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441, at p. 447, Dickson J. (as he then was) concluded that the causal link between the actions of government and the alleged Charter violation was too “uncertain, speculative and hypothetical to sustain a cause of action”. In separate concurring reasons, Wilson J. also conveyed the need to have some type of direct causation between the actions of the state and the resulting deprivation. She stated, at p. 490:

It is not necessary to accept the restrictive interpretation advanced by Pratte J., which would limit s. 7 to protection against arbitrary arrest or detention, in order to agree that the central concern of the section is direct impingement by government upon the life, liberty and personal security of individual citizens. At the very least, it seems to me, there must be a strong presumption that governmental action which concerns the relations of the state with other states, and which is therefore not directed at any member of the immediate political community, was never intended to be caught by s. 7 even although such action may have the incidental effect of increasing the risk of death or injury that individuals generally have to face. [Emphasis added.]

(je souligne). Il a souligné que les actes de l'État qui constituent une ingérence dans le lien parent-enfant ne déclenchent pas tous l'application de l'art. 7.

Un procès criminel, une allégation en matière de droits de la personne ou même une action au civil peut être une cause de stress, d'angoisse et de stigmatisation même lorsque le procès ou les procédures se déroulent dans un délai raisonnable. Ce qui nous intéresse en l'espèce n'est pas tout préjudice de cette nature, mais seulement l'atteinte qui, peut-on dire, résulte du délai écoulé dans le déroulement du processus en matière de droits de la personne. Il serait inopportun de tenir le gouvernement responsable du préjudice causé par un tiers qui n'est aucunement un mandataire de l'État.

Bien que les allégations de harcèlement sexuel dont l'intimé a fait l'objet lui aient indéniablement causé un préjudice grave, il doit y avoir un lien de causalité suffisant entre le délai imputable à l'État et le préjudice subi par l'intimé pour que l'art. 7 s'applique. Dans Operation Dismantle Inc. c. La Reine, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 441, à la p. 447, le juge Dickson (plus tard Juge en chef) a conclu que le lien de causalité entre les actes du gouvernement et la violation alléguée de la Charte était «trop incertain, trop conjectural et trop hypothétique pour étayer une cause d'action». Dans des motifs concordants distincts, le juge Wilson a également fait état de la nécessité d'un lien direct quelconque entre les actes de l'État et l'atteinte qui en a résulté. Voici ce qu'elle a dit, à la p. 490:

Il n'est pas nécessaire de souscrire à l'interprétation restrictive avancée par le juge Pratte, qui limiterait l'art. 7 à une protection contre les arrestations ou les détentions arbitraires, pour convenir que l'article a pour objet central l'ingérence directe du gouvernement dans la vie, la liberté et la sécurité personnelle des citoyens. À tout le moins, me semble-t-il, il doit y avoir une forte présomption qu'on n'a jamais voulu qu'une action gouvernementale relative aux relations de l'État avec d'autres États, et qui donc n'est dirigée contre aucun membre de la collectivité politique immédiate, tombe sous le coup de l'art. 7 même si cette action peut avoir l'effet incident d'accroître le risque de mort ou de préjudice auquel les gens doivent faire face en général. [Je souligne.]

59

60

61 The appellants submit that the nexus between the harm to the respondent and the alleged delay in processing the Complaints is remote. They assert that the largest measure of prejudice to Mr. Blencoe resulted not from any delay but from the publicity surrounding the events, especially his dismissal from Cabinet and later from the NDP caucus. They add that the respondent himself fought the allegations against him in the public domain. For the reasons I set out below, I also have doubts whether, on the facts, the psychological harm suffered by the respondent can be seen as the result of state-caused delay in the human rights process.

62 On March 1, 1995, the respondent was informed by Premier Harcourt that his former assistant, Fran Yanor, made sexual harassment allegations against him. This allegation was made public one week later. On March 9, 1995, Mr. Blencoe stepped down as Minister but remained in Cabinet, pending the results of an inquiry. He issued a press release, “vehemently denying the harassment allegations”. On March 10, 1995, the national and provincial press began running stories about the respondent’s resignation and allegations against him by Ms. Yanor and two other women. On April 4, 1995, Premier Harcourt removed the respondent from Cabinet and dismissed him from the NDP caucus.

63 While the respondent was only notified of the Schell and Willis Complaints in July and September of 1995, the record demonstrates that Mr. Blencoe had suffered the following prejudice or “stigmatization” prior to that time: Mr. Blencoe and his family were hounded by the media from the time that the Yanor harassment allegations were made public; the respondent and his wife feared press leaks and stopped speaking to persons outside their close circle of family and friends; Mr. Blencoe’s children were subjected to insults and name-calling at school; and Mr. Blencoe was under the care of a physician and was prescribed

Les appelants soutiennent que le lien entre le préjudice subi par l’intimé et le délai qui se serait écoulé dans le traitement des plaintes est ténu. Selon eux, la majeure partie du préjudice causé à M. Blencoe résultait non pas d’un délai mais de la publicité qui a entouré, plus particulièrement, son exclusion du Cabinet et, par la suite, du caucus du NPD. Ils ajoutent que l’intimé a lui-même réfuté publiquement les allégations dont il faisait l’objet. Pour les motifs indiqués ci-après, je doute également qu’il soit possible, d’après les faits, de considérer que le préjudice psychologique subi par l’intimé a résulté d’un délai imputable à l’État dans le déroulement du processus en matière de droits de la personne.

Le 1^{er} mars 1995, l’intimé a été informé par le premier ministre Harcourt que son ancienne adjointe, Fran Yanor, avait formulé des allégations de harcèlement sexuel contre lui. Ces allégations ont été rendues publiques une semaine plus tard. Le 9 mars 1995, M. Blencoe a démissionné de son poste de ministre, tout en continuant de faire partie du Cabinet, jusqu’à ce que les résultats de l’enquête soient connus. Il a diffusé un communiqué de presse dans lequel il [TRADUCTION] «niait catégoriquement les allégations de harcèlement». Le 10 mars 1995, la presse nationale et la presse provinciale ont commencé à faire état de la démission de l’intimé et des allégations formulées contre lui par M^{me} Yanor et deux autres femmes. Le 4 avril de la même année, le premier ministre Harcourt a exclu l’intimé du Cabinet et, ensuite, du caucus du NPD.

Quoique l’intimé Blencoe n’ait été avisé des plaintes de M^{mes} Schell et Willis qu’en juillet et en septembre 1995, il ressort du dossier qu’il avait déjà été victime d’un préjudice ou d’une «stigmatisation»: M. Blencoe et les membres de sa famille ont été traqués par les médias dès que les allégations de harcèlement de M^{me} Yanor eurent été rendues publiques; craignant les indiscretions de la presse, l’intimé et son épouse n’ont plus parlé qu’à leurs proches; les enfants de M. Blencoe ont fait l’objet d’insultes et de railleries à l’école; M. Blencoe a été suivi par un médecin qui lui a prescrit des antidépresseurs dès avril 1995.

antidepressants by April of 1995. The respondent himself admits that from mid-March 1995 until August 1995, he was “extremely unwell”. From April 11, 1995, to September 7, 1995, the respondent was on medical leave from the legislature. In the Fall of 1995, Mr. Blencoe considered whether to run in the upcoming election. Since he suspected that Premier Harcourt would refuse to sign his nomination papers, he decided not to seek the NDP nomination in his riding and resigned from the party on December 29, 1995. All of these events had occurred prior to any delays in the proceedings.

There is no question that the respondent’s life and that of his family have been terribly affected by the allegations of sexual harassment against him. His political career appears to be finished and, as professed by Lowry J., “[t]he impact on his family of what has seemed at times an unrelenting media coverage has been traumatic” (para. 12). The respondent attributes this prejudice to the delay in the human rights proceedings. McEachern C.J.B.C. agreed, stating (at para. 53) that:

There can be no doubt that [Blencoe] was severely wounded by the publicity surrounding his dismissal from the Cabinet. Such is the price of public life. But for these proceedings, however, it might reasonably be expected that the overwhelming attention would have died away and [Blencoe] and his family could have attempted to reconstruct their lives. [Emphasis added.]

With respect, I cannot agree with McEachern C.J.B.C.’s speculation that the respondent would have been able to reconstruct his life but for the proceedings (or I should say, delay in the proceedings). A higher level of certainty is required than “might reasonably be expected” in order to find that government has caused a deprivation of an individual’s Charter rights.

Based on the above facts, the Willis and Schell allegations were clearly not the first events in the sexual harassment claims against the respondent. Lambert J.A. asserted that “[t]he human rights pro-

L’intimé lui-même reconnaît que, à partir de la mi-mars jusqu’au mois d’août 1995, il allait [TRADUCTION] «très mal». Du 11 avril au 7 septembre 1995, il s’est absenté de l’assemblée législative pour cause de maladie. À l’automne de 1995, M. Blencoe s’est demandé s’il solliciterait un nouveau mandat lors du prochain scrutin. Comme il s’attendait à ce que le premier ministre Harcourt refuse de signer sa mise en candidature, il a décidé de ne pas se porter candidat du NPD dans sa circonscription et a démissionné du parti le 29 décembre 1995. Tous ces événements ont précédé quelque délai que ce soit dans les procédures.

Il ne fait aucun doute que les allégations de harcèlement sexuel ont terriblement nui à la vie personnelle de l’intimé et à celle des membres de sa famille. Sa carrière politique semble terminée et, comme l’a affirmé le juge Lowry, [TRADUCTION] «ce qui s’apparentait par moments à un acharnement médiatique a été traumatisant pour les membres de sa famille» (par. 12). L’intimé attribue ce préjudice au délai écoulé dans le déroulement des procédures en matière de droits de la personne. Le juge en chef McEachern lui a donné raison (au par. 53):

[TRADUCTION] On ne saurait douter que [Blencoe] a profondément souffert de la publicité qui a entouré son exclusion du Cabinet. Tels sont les aléas de la vie publique. Or, n’eût été des procédures, on aurait pu raisonnablement s’attendre à ce que l’attention considérable s’estompe et à ce que [Blencoe] et les membres de sa famille puissent tenter de retrouver une vie normale. [Je souligne.]

En toute déférence, je ne puis souscrire à la supposition du juge en chef McEachern que l’intimé aurait pu retrouver une vie normale n’eût été des procédures (ou, devrais-je dire, du délai écoulé dans les procédures). Pour conclure que le gouvernement a porté atteinte aux droits d’une personne garantis par la Charte, il faut plus de certitude que ce à quoi [TRADUCTION] «on aurait pu raisonnablement s’attendre».

D’après les faits susmentionnés, les allégations de M^{mes} Willis et Schell ne constituaient manifestement pas les premiers maillons de la chaîne des événements relatifs aux plaintes de harcèlement cess started with the complaints in April, 1995” (para. 5 (emphasis in original)). Based on the record, however, it is clear that the Willis and Schell Complaints were only filed with the Commission in July and August of that year. The respondent himself asserts that the complaints to the Premier’s office are what resulted in his removal from Cabinet and caucus. He makes this assertion to support his contention that the date from which the delay should be computed should pre-date the official Complaints to the Commission. This argument rather undermines the respondent’s assertion that the state caused his prejudice. The central event leading to the intense media scrutiny was the dismissal of the respondent from Cabinet and caucus in April 1995, following the allegations of Fran Yanor. At that time, there had been no complaints to the Commission. The Yanor allegations are thus more closely tied to the dismissal from Cabinet, and consequently the stigma. I therefore find that the most prejudicial impact on Mr. Blencoe was caused not by the actions of the Commission but rather by the events prior to the Complaints which caused the respondent to be ousted from Cabinet and caucus as well as the result of actions by non-governmental actors such as the press, employers and a soccer association. The harm to the respondent resulted from the publicity surrounding the allegations themselves coupled with the political fall-out which ensued rather than any delay in the human rights proceedings which had yet to commence at the time that the respondent began to experience stigma.

64

65

sexuel contre l’intimé. Le juge Lambert a dit que [TRADUCTION] «[l]e processus en matière de droits de la personne a été enclenché par le dépôt des plaintes en avril 1995» (par. 5 (en italique dans l’original)). Toutefois, selon le dossier, il est clair que la Commission n’a été saisie des plaintes de M^{mes} Willis et Schell qu’en juillet et en août de la même année. L’intimé lui-même affirme que ce sont les plaintes reçues au bureau du premier ministre qui ont entraîné son exclusion du Cabinet et du caucus. Cette affirmation vise à étayer sa prétention que la date à partir de laquelle le délai devrait être calculé est antérieure au dépôt officiel des plaintes à la Commission. Cet argument mine plutôt sa prétention que l’État est à l’origine du préjudice qu’il a subi. L’événement central à l’origine de la grande couverture médiatique a été l’exclusion de l’intimé du Cabinet et du caucus en avril 1995, à la suite des allégations de Fran Yanor. À l’époque, la Commission n’avait encore été saisie d’aucune plainte. Les allégations de M^{me} Yanor sont donc plus étroitement liées à l’exclusion du Cabinet et, par conséquent, à la stigmatisation. Je conclus donc que l’effet le plus préjudiciable sur M. Blencoe résulte non pas des actes de la Commission, mais plutôt d’événements antérieurs au dépôt des plaintes qui ont entraîné son expulsion du Cabinet et du caucus, ainsi que du comportement d’acteurs non gouvernementaux comme les journalistes, les employeurs et une association de soccer. Le préjudice subi par l’intimé est imputable à la publicité ayant entouré les allégations elles-mêmes et aux retombées politiques qui ont suivi, et non pas à un délai dans les procédures en matière de droit de la personne qui n’avait pas encore commencé à s’écouler lorsque l’intimé a commencé à être victime d’une stigmatisation.

Lambert J.A. rejected the connection between the delay and the prejudice. Although recognizing that the respondent and his family had suffered dreadfully, Lambert J.A. found that “[n]one of that stigma was brought about by the processes under the Human Rights Act or the Human Rights Code. Nor, in my opinion, was it much exacerbated by those processes” (para. 29). Lambert J.A. was also of the opinion that the stigma would not come to an end after the Tribunal had made its decision, “no matter the content of that decision” (para. 29).

Le juge Lambert a écarté tout lien entre le délai écoulé et le préjudice subi. Tout en reconnaissant que l’intimé et les membres de sa famille avaient souffert terriblement, il a conclu que [TRADUCTION] «[c]ette stigmatisation n’était aucunement imputable aux procédures fondées sur la Human Rights Act ou le Human Rights Code. À mon sens, ces procédures ne l’ont pas beaucoup aggravée non plus» (par. 29). Le juge Lambert était aussi d’avis

I am in agreement with Lowry J. and Lambert J.A. on this issue. My understanding is that there remains a civil suit pending against Mr. Blencoe for sexual harassment and that Ms. Willis’s Complaint against the Government on these very same issues has not been stayed. The prolongation of stigma from this ongoing publicity was therefore likely regardless of the delay in the human rights proceedings. At best, the respondent was deprived of a speedy opportunity to clear his name.

While I conclude that the delay in the human rights process was not the direct cause of the respondent’s prejudice, another question which arises is whether it exacerbated his prejudice. According to McEachern C.J.B.C., the excessive delay in the human rights proceedings both created a stigma against Mr. Blencoe and exacerbated an existing prejudice, which, according to the majority of the Court of Appeal, is tantamount to the creation of the prejudice itself. McEachern C.J.B.C. relied on the decision of this Court in Rodriguez, supra, to find that the Commission’s exacerbation of the deprivation of security of the person that Mr. Blencoe suffered at the hands of the media, triggered s. 7 (at para. 56). The respondent similarly argues that the delay exacerbated the stigmatization, claiming that additional media stories surfaced each time there was a new development in the processing of the Complaints. He relies on this Court’s decision in Morgentaler, supra, to support the position that it is sufficient if the delay is “a contributing cause” of the prejudice.

First, with respect to this “contributing cause” argument, I find it very difficult to equate the situations in Rodriguez and Morgentaler with that in the case at bar. In Rodriguez, the Crown had erroneously characterized Mrs. Rodriguez’s deprivation of security of the person as caused not by government but by her physical disabilities. In rejecting that argument, Sopinka J. held that the Criminal Code prohibition at s. 241(b) would con-que la stigmatisation ne prendrait pas fin dès que le Tribunal aurait rendu sa décision [TRADUCTION] «quelle qu’elle soit» (par. 29).

Je partage l’avis des juges Lowry et Lambert à cet égard. Si je comprends bien, M. Blencoe fait toujours l’objet de poursuites civiles pour harcèlement sexuel, et la plainte que M^{me} Willis a déposée contre le gouvernement pour les mêmes motifs n’a pas été suspendue. Il était donc probable que la stigmatisation résultant de cette publicité incessante se poursuivrait peu importe le délai écoulé dans les procédures en matière de droits de la personne. Au mieux, l’intimé a été privé de la possibilité de se disculper rapidement.

Même si je conclus que le délai écoulé dans le déroulement du processus en matière de droits de la personne n’a pas été la cause directe du préjudice subi par l’intimé, une autre question qui se pose est de savoir s’il a aggravé ce préjudice. Selon le juge en chef McEachern, le délai excessif dans les procédures en matière de droits de la personne a à la fois stigmatisé M. Blencoe et aggravé un préjudice existant, ce qui, selon la Cour d’appel à la majorité, équivaut au fait même de causer le préjudice. Le juge en chef McEachern s’est fondé sur l’arrêt Rodriguez, précité, de notre Cour pour conclure que l’aggravation, par la Commission, de l’atteinte que les médias portaient à la sécurité de la personne de M. Blencoe déclenchait l’application de l’art. 7 (au par. 56). De même, l’intimé fait valoir que le délai a aggravé la stigmatisation du fait que l’affaire refaisait surface dans les médias chaque fois qu’il y avait du nouveau dans le traitement des plaintes. Il s’appuie sur l’arrêt Morgentaler, précité, de notre Cour pour affirmer qu’il suffit que le délai écoulé soit un «facteur qui a contribué» au préjudice.

Premièrement, en ce qui concerne l’argument du «facteur qui a contribué», il me semble très difficile d’assimiler les situations dans les affaires Rodriguez et Morgentaler à celle qui existe en l’espèce. Dans l’affaire Rodriguez, le ministère public avait imputé à tort l’atteinte à la sécurité de la personne de M^{me} Rodriguez non pas au gouvernement, mais à ses déficiences physiques. En rejetant cet argument, le juge Sopinka a conclu que l’intertribute to Mrs. Rodriguez's distress if she was prevented from managing her death (at p. 584). A Criminal Code prohibition therefore directly deprived Mrs. Rodriguez of the ability to terminate her life. The Court in Rodriguez surely did not eliminate the need to establish a relationship between the harm complained of and the state action. In Rodriguez, all of the members of the Court agreed that government actions deprived Mrs. Rodriguez of the right to terminate her life at the time of her choosing. In the absence of government involvement, Mrs. Rodriguez would not have suffered a deprivation of her s. 7 rights. The same cannot be said of the facts in the case at bar.

67

68

69

diction prévue à l'al. 241b) du Code criminel contribuerait à la souffrance de M^{me} Rodriguez si on l'empêchait de gérer sa mort (à la p. 584). Une interdiction du Code criminel empêchait donc directement M^{me} Rodriguez de mettre fin à ses jours. Dans l'affaire Rodriguez, notre Cour n'a sûrement pas éliminé la nécessité d'établir l'existence d'un lien entre le préjudice reproché et l'acte de l'État. Tous les juges de notre Cour ont reconnu que des actes de l'État portaient atteinte au droit de M^{me} Rodriguez de mettre fin à ses jours au moment qu'elle jugerait opportun. N'eût été le rôle de l'État, il n'y aurait eu aucune atteinte aux droits garantis à M^{me} Rodriguez par l'art. 7. On ne peut en dire autant des circonstances de la présente affaire.

70

In the same vein, the Morgentaler case dealt with direct state interference with a woman's bodily integrity in that the delays in obtaining therapeutic abortions were caused by the mandatory procedures in s. 251 of the Criminal Code and resulted in a higher probability of complications and greater health risks to women. In that case, it could not have been argued that the cause of the deprivation is a woman's pregnancy rather than the Criminal Code prohibition. The decisions in Morgentaler and Rodriguez do not, in my opinion, obviate the need to establish a significant connection between the harm and the impugned state action to invoke the Charter.

Dans le même ordre d'idées, l'affaire Morgentaler portait sur l'atteinte directe de l'État à l'intégrité corporelle des femmes, étant donné que le délai requis pour obtenir un avortement thérapeutique résultait de la procédure prescrite par l'art. 251 du Code criminel et augmentait le risque de complications et le danger pour la santé des femmes. Dans cette affaire, on n'aurait pas pu faire valoir que l'atteinte était imputable à la grossesse plutôt qu'à l'interdiction du Code criminel. Les arrêts Morgentaler et Rodriguez ne permettent pas, à mon avis, d'échapper à l'obligation d'établir l'existence d'un lien important entre le préjudice et l'acte reproché à l'État pour pouvoir invoquer la Charte.

71

Moreover, even accepting this exacerbation argument, it is difficult to see how the respondent's prejudice was seriously exacerbated by the delays. In the absence of delays in the proceedings, the respondent would nevertheless have faced unproven allegations of sexual harassment and discrimination and suffered stigma as a result. It is thus clear that the respondent's reputation was harmed prior to the filing of the Complaints with the Commission. The delays in the proceedings could only have extended the time that rumours were circulating. As previously mentioned, the continuation of the concurrent complaint and civil action must also be considered. As professed by L'Heureux-Dubé J. in R. v. O'Connor, [1995] 4

En outre, même si l'argument de l'aggravation est retenu, il est difficile de voir comment le délai a aggravé sérieusement le préjudice subi par l'intimé. Même en l'absence de tout délai dans les procédures, l'intimé aurait fait face à des allégations non prouvées de harcèlement et de discrimination sexuels et aurait été stigmatisé en conséquence. Il est donc clair qu'il y a eu atteinte à la réputation de l'intimé avant le dépôt des plaintes devant la Commission. Le délai dans les procédures n'a pu contribuer qu'à prolonger la période pendant laquelle des rumeurs ont circulé. Comme je l'ai déjà mentionné, il faut également prendre en considération le fait que la plainte et les poursuites au civil concomitantes avaient toujours cours.

S.C.R. 411, at para. 119, with respect to privacy, “once invaded, it can seldom be regained”. Much the same is true of reputation; it is quickly ruined and difficult to re-establish. It is thus difficult to see how procedural delay could have seriously increased the damage to the respondent’s reputation that had already been done. The true prejudice to the respondent in this case may only be the lost opportunity to clear his name rapidly.

At trial, Lowry J. made the following finding concerning the cause of Mr. Blencoe’s suffering (at para. 13):

The stigma attached to the outstanding complaints has certainly contributed in large measure to the very real hardship Mr. Blencoe has experienced. His public profile as a Minister of the Crown rendered him particularly vulnerable to the media attention that has been focused on him and his family, and the hardship has, in the result, been protracted and severe.

Perhaps this statement supports the view that the outstanding Complaints did contribute to the stigma to some degree and that it was therefore a cause of the respondent’s suffering. Because I find in the next section that the state has not directly intruded into a private and intimate sphere of the respondent’s life, I assume without deciding that there is a sufficient nexus between the state-caused delay and the prejudice to Mr. Blencoe. I now turn to the question of whether this interference amounts to a violation of the respondent’s security of the person.

(ii) Quality of the Interference

McEachern C.J.B.C. concluded that liberty and security of the person under s. 7 protect both the privacy and dignity of individuals against the stigma of undue, prolonged humiliation and public degradation of the kind suffered by Mr. Blencoe (at para. 101). He therefore conflated s. 7 into a general right to dignity and protection against the stigma of undue, prolonged humiliation and public degradation suffered as a result of an administra-

Comme le juge L’Heureux-Dubé l’a affirmé, au sujet de la vie privée, dans R. c. O’Connor, [1995] 4 R.C.S. 411, au par. 119, «dès qu’on y a porté atteinte, on peut rarement la regagner dans son intégralité». Il en va généralement de même de la réputation; elle peut être ternie rapidement, mais elle est difficile à rétablir. On voit mal comment un délai de procédure pourrait avoir sérieusement accru le préjudice déjà causé à la réputation de l’intimé. Il se peut que le véritable préjudice qui a été causé à l’intimé en l’espèce ait seulement été la perte de la possibilité de se disculper rapidement.

En première instance, le juge Lowry a conclu ce qui suit au sujet de la cause des souffrances de M. Blencoe (au par. 13):

[TRADUCTION] La stigmatisation liée aux plaintes dont M. Blencoe faisait l’objet a sûrement contribué dans une large mesure aux difficultés très réelles qu’il a éprouvées. Du fait de sa visibilité en tant que ministre du gouvernement, il était davantage exposé à l’attention que les médias lui ont portée à lui-même et à sa famille, ce qui explique la longueur et la gravité des difficultés qui ont résulté.

Cet énoncé confirme peut-être que les plaintes dont M. Blencoe faisait l’objet ont jusqu’à un certain point contribué à la stigmatisation et qu’elles ont donc été l’une des causes de ses souffrances. Étant donné que je conclus ci-après que l’État ne s’est pas directement immiscé dans la vie privée et intime de l’intimé, je présume, sans pour autant le décider, qu’il existe un lien suffisant entre le délai imputable à l’État et le préjudice subi par M. Blencoe. Je vais maintenant passer à la question de savoir si cette immixtion constitue une atteinte à la sécurité de la personne de l’intimé.

(ii) Qualité de l’immixtion

Le juge en chef McEachern a conclu que le droit à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne garanti par l’art. 7 protège à la fois la vie privée et la dignité de l’individu contre la stigmatisation découlant d’un opprobre prolongé et injustifié comme celui dont M. Blencoe a été victime (au par. 101). Il a donc considéré que l’art. 7 confère un droit général à la dignité et à la protection contre l’opprobre prolongé et injustifié qui résulte de tive proceeding. The question which arises is whether the rights of “liberty and security of the person” protected by s. 7 of the Charter include a generalized right to dignity, or more specifically, a right to be free from stigma associated with a human rights complaint? In my opinion, they do not.

procédures administratives. La question qui se pose est de savoir si les droits «à la liberté et à [l]a sécurité de la personne» garantis par l’art. 7 de la Charte comportent un droit général à la dignité ou, plus précisément, un droit à la protection contre la stigmatisation liée à une plainte fondée sur les droits de la personne? Selon moi, ils ne comportent pas un tel droit.

75 The “right to dignity” accepted by McEachern C.J.B.C. essentially rests on several ideas. First, it is based on previous statements by this Court as to the importance and value of dignity. Second, it is based on the recognition in cases such as Morgentaler and O’Connor that state-induced psychological stress can infringe s. 7. Third, McEachern C.J.B.C. imports the notion of “stigma” as developed under s. 11(b) of the Charter in the criminal law context. Each of these bases for a generalized right to dignity under s. 7 will be addressed in turn.

1. Dignity

76 The Charter and the rights it guarantees are inextricably bound to concepts of human dignity. Indeed, notions of human dignity underlie almost every right guaranteed by the Charter (Morgentaler, supra, at pp. 164-66, per Wilson J.). As professed by Dickson C.J. in his discussion of s. 1 of the Charter in R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103, at p. 136:

The Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society which I believe embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society. The underlying values and principles of a free and democratic society are the genesis of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter and the ultimate standard against which a limit on a right or freedom must be shown, despite its effect, to be reasonable and demonstrably justified. [Emphasis added.]

Le «droit à la dignité» reconnu par le juge en chef McEachern repose essentiellement sur diverses idées. Premièrement, il s’appuie sur les propos que notre Cour a déjà tenus au sujet de l’importance et de la valeur de la dignité. Deuxièmement, il est fondé sur la reconnaissance, dans des affaires comme Morgentaler et O’Connor, que la tension psychologique causée par l’État peut violer l’art. 7. Troisièmement, le juge en chef McEachern transpose dans le contexte du droit criminel la notion de «stigmatisation» conçue sous le régime de l’al. 11(b) de la Charte. Ces trois fondements d’un droit général à la dignité sous le régime de l’art. 7 seront examinés successivement.

1. Dignité

La Charte et les droits qu’elle garantit sont inextricablement liés à la notion de dignité humaine. En fait, cette notion sous-tend presque tous les droits garantis par la Charte (Morgentaler, précité, aux pp. 164 à 166, le juge Wilson). Comme le juge en chef Dickson l’a dit en analysant l’article premier de la Charte dans l’arrêt R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103, à la p. 136:

Les tribunaux doivent être guidés par des valeurs et des principes essentiels à une société libre et démocratique, lesquels comprennent, selon moi, le respect de la dignité inhérente de l’être humain, la promotion de la justice et de l’égalité sociales, l’acceptation d’une grande diversité de croyances, le respect de chaque culture et de chaque groupe et la foi dans les institutions sociales et politiques qui favorisent la participation des particuliers et des groupes dans la société. Les valeurs et les principes sous-jacents d’une société libre et démocratique sont à l’origine des droits et libertés garantis par la Charte et constituent la norme fondamentale en fonction de laquelle on doit établir qu’une restriction d’un droit ou d’une liberté constitue, malgré son effet, une limite raisonnable dont la justification peut se démontrer. [Je souligne.]

In Rodriguez, supra, Sopinka J. states that it is unquestioned that respect for human dignity is an underlying principle upon which our society is based (at p. 592). In O'Connor, supra, at para. 63, L'Heureux-Dubé J. states that, "[t]his Court has repeatedly recognized that human dignity is at the heart of the Charter". More recently, this Court has stated in Law v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 497, at para. 51, that the purpose of s. 15(1) of the Charter, "is to prevent the violation of essential human dignity and freedom". Respect for the inherent dignity of persons is clearly an essential value in our free and democratic society which must guide the courts in interpreting the Charter. This does not mean, however, that dignity is elevated to a free-standing constitutional right protected by s. 7 of the Charter. Dignity has never been recognized by this Court as an independent right but has rather been viewed as finding expression in rights, such as equality, privacy or protection from state compulsion. In cases such as Morgentaler, Rodriguez and B. (R.), dignity was linked to personal autonomy over one's body or interference with fundamental personal choices. Indeed, dignity is often involved where the ability to make fundamental choices is at stake.

In my view, the notion of "dignity" in the decisions of this Court is better understood not as an autonomous Charter right, but rather, as an underlying value. In Beare, supra, at p. 401, La Forest J. cautions that s. 7 must not be interpreted too broadly, stating that:

Like other provisions of the Charter, s. 7 must be construed in light of the interests it was meant to protect. It should be given a generous interpretation, but it is important not to overshoot the actual purpose of the right in question. . . .

While this statement may have been obiter since the case was decided on the principles of fundamental justice, this caution with respect to the interpretation of "life, liberty and security of the person" is relevant nevertheless. La Forest J. chose

Dans l'arrêt Rodriguez, précité, le juge Sopinka affirme qu'on ne conteste pas que le respect de la dignité humaine est un principe fondamental de notre société (à la p. 592). Dans l'arrêt O'Connor, précité, au par. 63, le juge L'Heureux-Dubé précise que «[n]otre Cour a reconnu à plusieurs reprises que la dignité humaine est au cœur de la Charte». Plus récemment, dans l'arrêt Law c. Canada (Ministre de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration), [1999] 1 R.C.S. 497, au par. 51, notre Cour a statué que le par. 15(1) de la Charte a pour objet «d'empêcher toute atteinte à la dignité et à la liberté humaines essentielles». Le respect de la dignité inhérente des gens est nettement une valeur essentielle de notre société libre et démocratique, qui doit guider les tribunaux dans l'interprétation de la Charte. Cela ne signifie pas, cependant, que l'on fait de la dignité un droit constitutionnel distinct garanti par l'art. 7 de la Charte. La dignité n'a jamais été reconnue comme un droit indépendant par notre Cour, mais a plutôt été perçue comme s'exprimant dans des droits comme celui à l'égalité, à la vie privée ou à la protection contre la contrainte de l'État. Dans des affaires comme Morgentaler, Rodriguez et B. (R.), la dignité était liée à l'autonomie de la personne relativement à la maîtrise de son corps ou à l'ingérence dans des choix personnels fondamentaux. En fait, la dignité est souvent en cause lorsque la capacité de faire des choix fondamentaux est compromise.

À mon sens, il vaut mieux considérer la notion de «dignité» que l'on trouve dans la jurisprudence de notre Cour comme une valeur sous-jacente que comme un droit autonome garanti par la Charte. Dans l'arrêt Beare, précité, à la p. 401, le juge La Forest prévient que l'art. 7 ne doit pas être interprété de façon trop large:

Comme d'autres dispositions de la Charte, l'art. 7 doit être interprété en fonction des intérêts qu'il est censé protéger. Il doit recevoir une interprétation généreuse, mais il est important de ne pas outrepasser le but réel du droit en question . . .

Bien qu'elle ait pu être faite de manière incidente étant donné que l'affaire était tranchée en fonction des principes de justice fondamentale, cette mise en garde concernant l'interprétation du droit «à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de [l]a personne» est not to base his finding of a s. 7 deprivation on any principle of “dignity or self-respect”, as did Bayda C.J.S. of the Court of Appeal in that case. La Forest J. chose instead to find a deprivation of liberty and security of the person for the reasons of Cameron J.A. in the court below, based on the statutory requirement that a person surrender himself into the custody of the authorities and submit to bodily intrusions on pain of arrest and prosecution. La Forest J. conveys this, at p. 402:

77

78

The Court of Appeal, we saw, found that the impugned provisions constituted an infringement of the right guaranteed by the opening words of s. 7, the majority because fingerprinting offends the “dignity and self-respect” of at least those persons who because of their self-perception or the perception of the community would feel demeaned by being thus treated. In short, the majority thought that being subjected to fingerprinting was to be treated like a criminal. This approach appears to be broad and indefinite and to introduce an undesirable notion of differentiation among those subjected to the procedure. For my part, I prefer the more specific finding of Cameron J.A. that the impugned provisions infringe the rights guaranteed by s. 7 because they require a person to appear at a specific time and place and oblige that person to go through an identification process on pain of imprisonment for failure to comply. [Emphasis added.]

néanmoins pertinente. Dans cette affaire, le juge La Forest n’a pas choisi, comme l’avait fait le juge en chef Bayda de la Cour d’appel, de fonder sa conclusion à une violation de l’art. 7 sur un principe quelconque de «dignité ou de respect de soi». Il a plutôt conclu à l’existence d’une atteinte à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne pour les motifs exprimés par le juge Cameron de la Cour d’appel, compte tenu de l’exigence légale qu’une personne se rende aux autorités, se soumette à la détention et subisse des atteintes physiques sous peine d’emprisonnement et de poursuites. Le juge La Forest dit ceci, à la p. 402:

La Cour d’appel, nous l’avons vu, a jugé que les dispositions attaquées portaient atteinte au droit garanti par la première partie de l’art. 7, la majorité estimant que la prise des empreintes digitales est une atteinte «à la dignité et au respect de soi» dans le cas, à tout le moins, des personnes qui, à cause de leur propre perception ou de la perception de la collectivité se sentent humiliées par un tel traitement. En bref, la majorité pensait qu’être soumis à la prise d’empreintes digitales, c’était être traité comme un criminel. Cette vision des choses est large et indéfinie et introduit un élément regrettable de différenciation entre les diverses personnes qui sont soumises à la procédure. Pour ma part, je préfère la constatation plus précise du juge Cameron, que les dispositions attaquées enfreignent les droits garantis par l’art. 7 parce qu’elles obligent une personne à comparaître à une date et dans un lieu précis, et à subir une procédure d’identification sous peine d’emprisonnement en cas de refus d’obtempérer. [Je souligne.]

79

According to the respondent, the human dignity of a person is closely tied to a person’s reputation and privacy interests. Indeed, much of the harm which has been suffered by Mr. Blencoe in this case has been the damage which has been done to his reputation. Essentially, the respondent argues that his reputation has been ruined through the stigma he has suffered as a result of the publicity relating to the human rights proceedings against him. While this Court found in Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 1130, that reputation was a concept underlying Charter rights, it too is not an independent Charter right in and of itself (at para. 120):

Selon l’intimé, la dignité d’une personne est étroitement liée à sa réputation et à son droit à la vie privée. En réalité, l’atteinte à la réputation représente une bonne partie du préjudice subi par M. Blencoe en l’espèce. L’intimé fait essentiellement valoir que la stigmatisation résultant de la publicité qui a entouré les procédures en matière de droit de la personne engagées contre lui a contribué à ruiner sa réputation. Même si notre Cour a conclu, dans Hill c. Église de scientologie de Toronto, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 1130, que la réputation est un concept qui sous-tend les droits garantis par la Charte, elle n’est pas non plus elle-même un droit indépendant garanti par la Charte (au par. 120):

Although it is not specifically mentioned in the Charter, the good reputation of the individual represents and reflects the innate dignity of the individual, a concept which underlies all the Charter rights. It follows that the protection of the good reputation of an individual is of fundamental importance to our democratic society. [Emphasis added.]

Respect for a person's reputation, like respect for dignity of the person, is a value that underlies the Charter. These two values do not support the respondent's proposition that protection of reputation or freedom from the stigma associated with human rights complaints are independent constitutional s. 7 rights. Moreover, the above passages from Hill regarding the protection of reputation were made in the context of a defamation case. Defamation laws are intended to protect reputation. Dignity and reputation are not self-standing rights. Neither is freedom from stigma. I would therefore agree with the following passage from Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code, supra, at p. 1170, wherein Lamer J. cautioned:

If liberty or security of the person under s. 7 of the Charter were defined in terms of attributes such as dignity, self-worth and emotional well-being, it seems that liberty under s. 7 would be all inclusive. In such a state of affairs there would be serious reason to question the independent existence in the Charter of other rights and freedoms such as freedom of religion and conscience or freedom of expression.

2. State Interference with Psychological Integrity

In order for security of the person to be triggered in this case, the impugned state action must have had a serious and profound effect on the respondent's psychological integrity (G. (J.), supra, at para. 60). There must be state interference with an individual interest of fundamental importance (at para. 61). Lamer C.J. stated in G. (J.), at para. 59:

It is clear that the right to security of the person does not protect the individual from the ordinary stresses and

Bien qu'elle ne soit pas expressément mentionnée dans la Charte, la bonne réputation de l'individu représente et reflète sa dignité inhérente, concept qui sous-tend tous les droits garantis par la Charte. La protection de la bonne réputation d'un individu est donc d'importance fondamentale dans notre société démocratique. [Je souligne.]

Le respect de la réputation d'une personne, tout comme le respect de sa dignité, est une valeur qui sous-tend la Charte. Ces deux valeurs n'étaient pas l'argument de l'intimé que la protection de la réputation ou la protection contre la stigmatisation liée à une plainte fondée sur les droits de la personne constitue un droit constitutionnel indépendant garanti par l'art. 7. En outre, les extraits précités de l'arrêt Hill concernant la protection de la réputation ont pour contexte une poursuite en diffamation. Les règles en matière de diffamation visent à protéger la réputation. La dignité et la réputation ne sont pas des droits distincts. La protection contre la stigmatisation ne l'est pas non plus. Je souscrirais donc à l'extrait suivant du Renvoi relatif à l'art. 193 et à l'al. 195.1(1)c) du Code criminel, précité, à la p. 1170, où le juge Lamer a fait la mise en garde suivante:

Si la liberté ou la sécurité de la personne en vertu de l'art. 7 de la Charte étaient définies en fonction d'attributs comme la dignité, la valorisation et le bien-être sur le plan émotionnel, il semble que la liberté en vertu de l'art. 7 aurait une portée illimitée. Si tel était le cas, on pourrait sérieusement mettre en doute l'existence indépendante, dans la Charte, d'autres droits et libertés comme la liberté de conscience et de religion ou la liberté d'expression.

2. Atteinte de l'État à l'intégrité psychologique

Pour que la sécurité de la personne soit en cause en l'espèce, l'acte reproché à l'État doit avoir eu des répercussions graves et profondes sur l'intégrité psychologique de l'intimé (G. (J.), précité, au par. 60). L'État doit avoir porté atteinte à un droit individuel d'importance fondamentale (au par. 61). Dans l'arrêt G. (J.), précité, au par. 59, le juge en chef Lamer a dit ce qui suit:

Il est manifeste que le droit à la sécurité de la personne ne protège pas l'individu contre les tensions et les anxieties that a person of reasonable sensibility would suffer as a result of government action. If the right were interpreted with such broad sweep, countless government initiatives could be challenged on the ground that they infringe the right to security of the person, massively expanding the scope of judicial review, and, in the process, trivializing what it means for a right to be constitutionally protected.

He went on to state (at paras. 63-64):

Not every state action which interferes with the parent-child relationship will restrict a parent's right to security of the person. For example, a parent's security of the person is not restricted when, without more, his or her child is sentenced to jail or conscripted into the army. Nor is it restricted when the child is negligently shot and killed by a police officer: see Augustus v. Gosset, [1996] 3 S.C.R. 268.

While the parent may suffer significant stress and anxiety as a result of the interference with the relationship occasioned by these actions, the quality of the "injury" to the parent is distinguishable from that in the present case. In the aforementioned examples, the state is making no pronouncement as to the parent's fitness or parental status, nor is it usurping the parental role or prying into the intimacies of the relationship. In short, the state is not directly interfering with the psychological integrity of the parent qua parent. The different effect on the psychological integrity of the parent in the above examples leads me to the conclusion that no constitutional rights of the parent are engaged. [Emphasis added.]

82 The quality of the injury must therefore be assessed. In my opinion, all of the cases which have come within the broad interpretation of "security of the person" outside of the penal context differ markedly from the interests that are at issue in this case. Violations of security of the person in this context include only serious psychological incursions resulting from state interference with an individual interest of fundamental importance.

83 It is only in exceptional cases where the state interferes in profoundly intimate and personal choices of an individual that state-caused delay in human rights proceedings could trigger the s. 7 security of the person interest. While these funda-angoisses ordinaires qu'une personne ayant une sensibilité raisonnable éprouverait par suite d'un acte gouvernemental. Si le droit était interprété de manière aussi large, d'innombrables initiatives gouvernementales pourraient être contestées au motif qu'elles violent le droit à la sécurité de la personne, ce qui élargirait considérablement l'étendue du contrôle judiciaire, et partant, banaliserait la protection constitutionnelle des droits.

Il a ajouté ceci (aux par. 63 et 64):

Les actes par lesquels l'État s'ingère dans le lien parent-enfant ne restreignent pas tous le droit d'un parent à la sécurité de sa personne. Par exemple, ce droit n'est pas restreint du seul fait que l'enfant est condamné à la prison ou enrôlé dans l'armée par conscription. Pas plus qu'il ne l'est lorsque l'enfant est abattu par négligence par un agent de police: Augustus c. Gosset, [1996] 3 R.C.S. 268.

Bien que l'ingérence de l'État puisse constituer une source de tension et d'angoisse importantes pour le parent, la nature du «préjudice» causé au parent par ces actes peut être distinguée de celle qui est visée dans la présente affaire. Dans les exemples susmentionnés, l'État ne se prononce pas sur l'aptitude du père ou de la mère ni sur sa qualité de parent, il n'usurpe pas non plus sur le rôle parental ni ne cherche à s'ingérer dans l'intimité du lien parent-enfant. En résumé, l'État ne porte pas directement atteinte à l'intégrité psychologique du parent en tant que parent. La répercussion différente sur l'intégrité psychologique des parents dans les exemples susmentionnés m'amène à conclure que les droits constitutionnels des parents n'entrent pas en jeu. [Je souligne.]

Le préjudice doit donc être évalué sur le plan qualitatif. À mon avis, la présente affaire, en raison des droits qui sont en cause, diffère sensiblement de toutes les affaires non pénales que l'on a considérées comme n'étant pas visées par la notion de «sécurité de la personne», à l'issue d'une interprétation large de cette notion. L'atteinte à la sécurité de la personne dans le présent contexte n'englobe que l'atteinte grave à l'intégrité psychologique résultant de l'atteinte de l'État à un droit individuel d'importance fondamentale.

Ce n'est que dans des cas exceptionnels où l'État s'ingère dans des choix profondément intimes et personnels d'un individu que le délai imputable à l'État, dans des procédures en matière de droits de la personne, pourrait déclencher l'ap-mental personal choices would include the right to make decisions concerning one's body free from state interference or the prospect of losing guardianship of one's children, they would not easily include the type of stress, anxiety and stigma that result from administrative or civil proceedings.

In O'Connor, supra, this Court dealt with the disclosure of therapeutic records of a complainant in a sexual assault case. L'Heureux-Dubé J. described the psychological trauma that could be faced by sexual assault victims if forced to disclose their therapeutic records, at para. 112:

These people must contemplate the threat of disclosing to the very person accused of assaulting them in the first place, and quite possibly in open court, records containing intensely private aspects of their lives, possibly containing thoughts and statements which have never even been shared with the closest of friends or family.

Such a situation amounts to direct state interference with a complainant's psychological integrity. Moreover, O'Connor was reached primarily on the basis of privacy concerns and animated by principles protected by s. 8 of the Charter. In O'Connor, at para. 110, L'Heureux-Dubé J. listed the cases in which the Court "expressed sympathy" for the idea that s. 7 includes a right to privacy. But she concluded that people have only a "reasonable expectation of privacy" (emphasis deleted) because privacy "must be balanced against legitimate societal needs" (para. 117). However, unlike sexual assault victims who may be said to have a reasonable expectation of privacy in their therapeutic records, the Commission in this case has not invaded any of the respondent's privacy interests. If there was any invasion of the respondent's privacy, it cannot be said to have resulted from state action. Moreover, when one assumes a very prominent public office as the respondent has, it is arguable that a certain amount of public scrutiny is to be expected. The respondent injected himself into the public realm and the public scrutiny that it entailed. An individplication du droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti par l'art. 7. Même si ces choix personnels fondamentaux comprenaient le droit de prendre des décisions concernant son propre corps sans intervention de l'État ou sans risque de perdre la garde d'un enfant, ils pourraient difficilement inclure le genre de stress, d'anxiété et de stigmatisation qui résulte de procédures administratives ou civiles.

Dans l'arrêt O'Connor, précité, notre Cour était appelée à se prononcer sur la communication du dossier thérapeutique d'une plaignante dans une affaire d'agression sexuelle. Le juge L'Heureux-Dubé a décrit le traumatisme psychique auquel pouvaient faire face les victimes d'agression sexuelle tenues de communiquer leurs dossiers thérapeutiques (au par. 112):

Elles doivent envisager la menace de divulguer à la personne accusée de les avoir agressées en premier lieu, et très probablement en pleine cour, des dossiers contenant des aspects totalement privés de leur vie, contenant probablement des pensées et des déclarations qui n'ont jamais été partagées avec leurs amis les plus intimes ou leur famille.

Il s'agit là d'une atteinte directe de l'État à l'intégrité psychologique d'une plaignante. De plus, l'arrêt O'Connor était fondé principalement sur des préoccupations en matière de vie privée et s'inspirait de principes protégés par l'art. 8 de la Charte. Dans cet arrêt, au par. 110, le juge L'Heureux-Dubé a énuméré les affaires dans lesquelles notre Cour «a favorisé» l'idée que l'art. 7 garantit notamment un droit à la vie privée. Elle a cependant conclu que les gens n'ont qu'une «attente raisonnable en matière de protection de la vie privée» (soulignement omis), car la protection de la vie privée «doit être pondérée en tenant compte des besoins légitimes de la société» (par. 117). Toutefois, à la différence des victimes d'agression sexuelle dont on peut dire qu'elles ont, à l'égard de leurs dossiers thérapeutiques, une attente raisonnable en matière de protection de leur vie privée, la Commission en l'espèce n'a pas porté atteinte au droit à la vie privée de l'intimé. S'il y a eu atteinte au droit à la vie privée de l'intimé, on ne saurait dire qu'elle résulte d'un acte de l'État. En outre, on peut soutenir que la personne ual can have no more than a reasonable expectation of privacy.

qui occupe une charge publique aussi importante que celle de l'intimé peut s'attendre à être exposée, dans une certaine mesure, à l'attention du public. L'intimé s'est lancé lui-même dans le domaine des affaires publiques et s'est exposé lui-même à l'attention qui s'y rattache. Nul ne peut avoir davantage qu'une attente raisonnable en matière de protection de la vie privée.

85 Where the therapeutic relationship between a sexual assault complainant and his or her physician is threatened by the disclosure of private records, this Court has recently held that security of the person is implicated (R. v. Mills, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 668 (hereinafter "Mills (1999)"), at para. 85). However, this is because the therapeutic relationship between doctor and patient is crucial to the patient's psychological integrity. This relationship must be protected to safeguard the mental integrity of patients and to thereby aid victims in recovering from their trauma. To disclose confidential records would undermine this relationship and jeopardize the victim's psychological integrity.

Notre Cour a récemment statué que la sécurité de la personne est en cause lorsque la relation thérapeutique entre l'auteur d'une plainte d'agression sexuelle et son médecin est compromise par la communication de dossiers privés (R. c. Mills, [1999] 3 R.C.S. 668 (ci-après l'«arrêt Mills de 1999»), au par. 85). Il en est cependant ainsi parce que la relation thérapeutique entre le médecin et le patient est essentielle à l'intégrité psychologique de ce dernier. Cette relation doit être protégée afin de préserver l'intégrité mentale des patients et d'aider ainsi les victimes à se remettre de leur traumatisme. La communication de dossiers confidentiels minerait la relation et compromettrait l'intégrité psychologique de la victime.

86 Few interests are as compelling as, and basic to individual autonomy than, a woman's choice to terminate her pregnancy, an individual's decision to terminate his or her life, the right to raise one's children, and the ability of sexual assault victims to seek therapy without fear of their private records being disclosed. Such interests are indeed basic to individual dignity. But the alleged right to be free from stigma associated with a human rights complaint does not fall within this narrow sphere. The state has not interfered with the respondent's right to make decisions that affect his fundamental being. The prejudice to the respondent in this case, as recognized by Lowry J., at para. 10, is essentially confined to his personal hardship. He is not "employable" as a politician, he and his family have moved residences twice, his financial resources are depleted, and he has suffered physically and psychologically. However, the state has not interfered with the respondent and his family's ability to make essential life choices. To accept that the prejudice suffered by the respondent in this case amounts to state interference with his security

Peu d'intérêts sont aussi impérieux et essentiels à l'autonomie individuelle que le choix d'une femme d'interrompre sa grossesse, la décision d'une personne de mettre fin à ses jours, le droit d'élever ses enfants et la capacité des victimes d'agression sexuelle de recourir à une thérapie sans craindre que leurs dossiers privés soient communiqués. Ces intérêts sont vraiment essentiels à la dignité individuelle. Toutefois, le droit allégué à la protection contre la stigmatisation liée à une plainte fondée sur les droits de la personne ne fait pas partie de cette catégorie restreinte. L'État n'a pas porté atteinte au droit de l'intimé de prendre des décisions touchant son être fondamental. Comme l'a reconnu le juge Lowry au par. 10, le préjudice subi par l'intimé en l'espèce se limite essentiellement à ses difficultés personnelles. Il est «inapte au travail» de politicien, sa famille et lui ont changé de lieu de résidence deux fois, il a épuisé ses ressources financières et il a souffert tant physiquement que psychologiquement. Cependant, l'État n'a pas porté atteinte à la capacité de l'intimé et des membres de sa famille de faire des of the person would be to stretch the meaning of this right.

3. Importing the Notion of “Stigma” from the Criminal Law Context

In Mills (1986), supra, at pp. 919-20, Lamer J., in dissent, found that the combination of loss of privacy, stigma, and disruption of family life engaged an individual’s security of the person in the context of s. 11(b) of the Charter, stating that:

... security of the person is not restricted to physical integrity; rather, it encompasses protection against “overlong subjection to the vexations and vicissitudes of a pending criminal accusation”. . . . These include stigmatization of the accused, loss of privacy, stress and anxiety resulting from a multitude of factors, including possible disruption of family, social life and work, legal costs, uncertainty as to the outcome and sanction.

However, it must be emphasized that this statement was made in the context of s. 11(b) of the Charter which provides that a person charged with an offence has the right “to be tried within a reasonable time”. The qualifier to this right is that it applies to individuals who have been “charged with an offence”. The s. 11(b) right therefore has no application in civil or administrative proceedings. This Court has often cautioned against the direct application of criminal justice standards in the administrative law area. We should not blur concepts which under our Charter are clearly distinct. The s. 11(b) guarantee of a right to an accused person to be tried within a reasonable time cannot be imported into s. 7. There is no analogous provision to s. 11(b) which applies to administrative proceedings, nor is there a constitutional right outside the criminal context to be “tried” within a reasonable time.

Lamer C.J. later reiterated this statement from Mills (1986) in G. (J.), at para. 62. In so doing, however, this Court did not make freedom from stigma a free-standing right. Nor did it establish choix essentiels dans leur vie. Accepter que le préjudice subi par l’intimé en l’espèce équivaut à une atteinte de l’État au droit qu’il a à la sécurité de sa personne serait forcer le sens de ce droit.

3. Transposition de la notion de «stigmatisation» dans le contexte du droit criminel

Dans l’arrêt Mills de 1986, précité, aux pp. 919 et 920, le juge Lamer, dissident, a conclu que, prises ensemble, l’atteinte à la vie privée, la stigmatisation et les perturbations de la vie familiale mettaient en cause la sécurité de la personne dans le contexte de l’al. 11b) de la Charte:

... la notion de sécurité de la personne ne se limite pas à l’intégrité physique; elle englobe aussi celle de protection contre [TRADUCTION] «un assujettissement trop long aux vexations et aux vicissitudes d’une accusation criminelle pendante». [. . .] Celles-ci comprennent la stigmatisation de l’accusé, l’atteinte à la vie privée, la tension et l’anxiété résultant d’une multitude de facteurs, y compris éventuellement les perturbations de la vie familiale, sociale et professionnelle, les frais de justice et l’incertitude face à l’issue et face à la peine.

Il faut cependant souligner que ces propos ont été tenus dans le contexte de l’al. 11b) de la Charte, qui prévoit que tout inculpé a le droit «d’être jugé dans un délai raisonnable». Pour que ce droit s’applique, il faut que la personne en question soit «inculpée». Le droit garanti par l’al. 11b) ne s’applique donc pas dans le cas de procédures civiles ou administratives. Notre Cour a souvent fait des mises en garde contre l’application directe en droit administratif des normes de la justice criminelle. Nous devrions éviter de confondre des notions qui, suivant notre Charte, sont clairement distinctes. Le droit d’être jugé dans un délai raisonnable que l’al. 11b) garantit à tout inculpé ne peut être transposé dans l’art. 7. Aucune disposition analogue à l’al. 11b) ne s’applique aux procédures administratives, et le droit constitutionnel d’être «jugé» dans un délai raisonnable ne s’applique qu’en matière criminelle.

Par la suite, le juge en chef Lamer a réitéré, au par. 62 de l’arrêt G. (J.), cet énoncé tiré de l’arrêt Mills de 1986. Ce faisant, notre Cour n’a toutefois pas fait de la protection contre la stigmatisation un that respondents in sexual harassment proceedings suffer so greatly that s. 11(b) principles should apply to them. As will be demonstrated below, the nature of the harm caused by human rights delay is different.

87

88

89

droit distinct. Elle n'a pas non plus décidé que les personnes visées par des procédures en matière de harcèlement sexuel souffrent à tel point que les principes de l'al. 11b) devraient s'appliquer à elles. Comme nous le verrons plus loin, le préjudice causé par un délai dans des procédures en matière de droits de la personne diffère sur le plan de sa nature.

90

In Kodellas, supra, the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal clearly equated criminal sexual assault charges with human rights sex discrimination complaints. Bayda C.J.S. (dissenting on another issue) conveyed this as follows, at pp. 152-53:

Dans l'arrêt Kodellas, précité, la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan a clairement assimilé les accusations criminelles d'agression sexuelle à des plaintes de discrimination sexuelle fondées sur les droits de la personne. Le juge en chef Bayda (dissident sur un autre point) s'est exprimé ainsi, aux pp. 152 et 153:

For the purpose of determining the effect upon the "security of the person" I see no logical distinction of substance between the subjection to the vexations and vicissitudes of "a pending criminal accusation" based upon sexual harassment and sexual assault and the subjection to the vexations and vicissitudes of a pending accusation in penal (i.e., quasi-criminal) proceedings under s. 35(2) of the Code, of discrimination based upon sexual harassment and sexual assault. It is but a small step from there to find that for the same purpose no distinction of substance can be made between an accusation in a penal proceeding under the Code and an identical accusation in remedial proceedings under ss. 27 to 33 of the Code. Whether they occur in a criminal context, or in the context of a penal proceeding, such as that provided for in the Code, or in the context of remedial proceedings (which, as will be shown later, is the context relevant to this case) the "vexations and vicissitudes" will invariably "include stigmatization of the (alleged discriminator), loss of privacy, stress and anxiety resulting from a multitude of factors, including possible disruption of family, social life and work, legal costs, uncertainty as to the outcome and sanction". This is so because the hurt to the alleged discriminator emanates from the accusation, not from the type of proceedings in which the accusation is made. After all, it matters not a whit to all of the relevant actors — the public, the persons who are the source of the hurt, those who are indirectly affected by the hurt (such as the alleged discriminator's family) and the alleged discriminator, who is directly affected by the hurt and who is the subject and direct object of the hurt — whether the accusation is made in one procedural forum or another. What matters is the fact of the accusation. . . .

[TRADUCTION] Pour déterminer l'incidence sur la «sécurité de la personne», je ne vois aucune distinction logique, sur le plan du fond, entre l'assujettissement aux vexations et aux vicissitudes d'une «accusation criminelle pendante» fondée sur le harcèlement sexuel et l'agression sexuelle, et l'assujettissement aux vexations et aux vicissitudes d'une accusation pendante de discrimination fondée sur le harcèlement sexuel et l'agression sexuelle, qui a été portée en matière pénale (c'est-à-dire quasi criminelle) en vertu du par. 35(2) du Code. Par conséquent, il n'y a qu'un pas à faire pour conclure que, à des fins identiques, aucune distinction de fond ne peut être établie entre une accusation portée dans des procédures pénales fondées sur le Code et une accusation identique portée dans des procédures engagées en vertu des art. 27 à 33 du Code dans le but d'obtenir un redressement. Qu'elles soient occasionnées dans le contexte de procédures criminelles ou dans celui de procédures pénales, comme celles que prévoit le Code, ou encore dans celui de procédures visant l'obtention d'un redressement (qui, nous le verrons plus loin, est le contexte pertinent en l'espèce), les «vexations» et les «vicissitudes» comprennent inmanquablement «la stigmatisation de (l'auteur allégué de la discrimination), l'atteinte à la vie privée, la tension et l'anxiété résultant d'une multitude de facteurs, y compris éventuellement les perturbations de la vie familiale, sociale et professionnelle, les frais de justice et l'incertitude face à l'issue et à la peine». Il en est ainsi parce que le mal causé à l'auteur allégué de la discrimination découle de l'accusation, et non du genre de procédures dans lesquelles l'accusation est portée. Après tout, il est parfaitement égal à tous les acteurs pertinents — le public, les personnes qui sont à l'origine du mal causé, celles qui sont indirectement touchées par ce mal (comme les membres de la famille de l'auteur

In determining whether prejudice occurred in a given situation, it is important to note that it is in the very nature of this form of prejudice (i.e., feelings of mental hurt or “stigmatization”) that it arises automatically upon a formal accusation being made. Lamer J. in Rahey, while elucidating this form of prejudice (in the context of s. 11(b) of the Charter), recognized this when he said at p. [609]:

With respect to the security of the person, I do not believe that actual impairment need be proven by the accused to render the section operative. An objective standard is the only realistic means through which the security interest of the accused may be protected under the section. Otherwise, each individual accused would have the burden of demonstrating that he or she has subjectively suffered a form of anxiety, stress or stigmatization as a result of the criminal charge. We are dealing largely with the impairment of mental well-being, a matter which can only be established with considerable difficulty at considerable cost. [Underlining added; italics in original.]

The majority of the Court of Appeal in the case at bar followed the above reasoning in Kodellas. The effect of the Appeal Court decision in Blencoe was to import a requirement for a hearing within a reasonable time into the processing of human rights complaints. Although the majority of the Court of Appeal disclaimed a direct s. 11(b) right, numerous references were made in its reasons, equating sexual harassment proceedings to criminal proceedings for sexual assault where s. 11(b) would apply. Indeed, the majority speaks of “this type of sexual assault” (para. 47), “stigma against the accused” (para. 56), “prosecution of these complaints” (para. 58), a “straightforward case of sexual assault” (para. 102), “[allegations] which are tantamount to . . . sexual assault” (para. 108), and “unproven charges of sexual harassment” (para. 57). The basis for the majority of the Court of Appeal’s reasons in this case is the treatment of allégué de la discrimination) et l’auteur allégué de la discrimination, qui est directement touché par le mal et qui en est directement victime — que l’accusation soit portée dans le cadre de l’une ou l’autre instance. Ce qui importe, c’est le fait de l’accusation. . .

Pour déterminer si un préjudice a été causé dans une situation donnée, il importe de souligner qu’il est dans la nature même de cette forme de préjudice (c’est-à-dire le sentiment de souffrance morale ou de «stigmatisation») qu’elle prenne naissance dès qu’une accusation officielle est portée. Dans Rahey, le juge Lamer l’a reconnu en expliquant cette forme de préjudice (dans le contexte de l’application de l’al. 11b) de la Charte), à la p. [609]:

Au sujet de la sécurité de la personne, je ne crois pas que ce soit à l’inculpé qu’il incombe de prouver qu’il y a effectivement eu atteinte pour que l’article soit applicable. Une norme objective est le seul moyen réaliste de protéger, en vertu de cet article, l’intérêt du prévenu en matière de sécurité. Autrement, chaque prévenu aurait la charge de démontrer qu’il ou elle a subjectivement souffert d’angoisse, de tension ou de stigmates par suite d’une accusation criminelle. Nous avons largement affaire à un préjudice moral, ce qui ne peut être établi qu’au prix de difficultés et de frais considérables. [Je souligne; en italique dans l’original.]

Dans la présente affaire, la Cour d’appel à la majorité a suivi le raisonnement susmentionné de l’arrêt Kodellas. L’arrêt Blencoe de la Cour d’appel a eu pour effet de transposer dans le traitement d’une plainte en matière de droits de la personne l’exigence qu’une audience ait lieu dans un délai raisonnable. Bien qu’elle ait écarté l’application directe d’un droit garanti par l’al. 11b), la Cour d’appel à la majorité a assimilé, à maintes reprises dans ses motifs, les procédures relatives au harcèlement sexuel à des procédures criminelles en matière d’agression sexuelle où l’al. 11b) s’appliquerait. En fait, les juges majoritaires parlent de [TRADUCTION] «ce genre d’agression sexuelle» (par. 47), de «stigmatisation de l’accusé» (par. 56), de «poursuites relatives à ces plaintes» (par. 58), de «simple cas d’agression sexuelle» (par. 102), d’«[allégations] équivalant à [. . .] une accusation d’agression sexuelle» (par. 108) et d’«accusations non prouvées de harcèlement sexuel» (par. 57). En l’espèce, les motifs majoritaires de la Cour d’appel reposent sur l’assimilation des plaintes de harcèle-sexual harassment human rights complaints as akin to a pending criminal sexual assault charge.

ment sexuel fondées sur les droits de la personne à une accusation criminelle pendante d'agression sexuelle.

92

With respect, the Court of Appeal in Kodellas and the majority of the Court of Appeal in the case at bar have erred in transplanting s. 11(b) principles set out in the criminal law context to human rights proceedings under s. 7. Not only are there fundamental differences between criminal proceedings and human rights proceedings that the majority failed to recognize, but, more importantly, s. 11(b) of the Charter is restricted to a pending criminal case. The effect of the Court of Appeal's decision was to extract an element of s. 11(b) — the element of stigma, which may be sufficient in the context of criminal proceedings and s. 11(b), to create a deprivation of the security of the person — and apply it to a process that differs with respect to objectives, consequences and procedures. As this Court has recently confirmed in Mills (1999), supra, at paras. 61 and 64, Charter rights must be interpreted and defined in a contextual manner, because they often inform, and are informed by, other similarly deserving rights and values at play in particular circumstances. The Court of Appeal has failed to examine the rights protected by s. 7 in the context of this case.

En toute déférence, la Cour d'appel dans l'arrêt Kodellas et la Cour d'appel à la majorité en l'espèce ont eu tort de transposer dans des procédures en matière de droits de la personne fondées sur l'art. 7 des principes énoncés relativement à l'al. 11b) dans le contexte du droit criminel. Non seulement y a-t-il des différences fondamentales entre des procédures criminelles et des procédures en matière de droits de la personne, que les juges majoritaires n'ont pas reconnues, mais encore l'al. 11b) de la Charte ne s'applique qu'aux affaires criminelles pendantes. L'arrêt de la Cour d'appel a eu pour effet d'extirper un élément de l'al. 11b) — celui de la stigmatisation qui peut suffire, dans le contexte de procédures criminelles et de l'al. 11b), pour qu'il y ait atteinte à la sécurité de la personne — et de l'appliquer à un processus différent sur le plan des objectifs, des conséquences et de la procédure. Comme notre Cour l'a récemment confirmé dans l'arrêt Mills de 1999, précité, aux par. 61 et 64, les droits garantis par la Charte doivent être interprétés et définis en fonction du contexte, car ils sous-tendent ou s'inspirent souvent d'autres droits ou valeurs aussi louables qui sont en jeu dans des circonstances particulières. La Cour d'appel n'a pas examiné les droits garantis par l'art. 7 dans le contexte de la présente affaire.

93

In the criminal law context, the test to be applied under s. 11(b) is an objective one, and prejudice may be inferred from unreasonable delay. This stands in sharp contrast to the two-tiered approach to s. 7 of the Charter, where the mere passage of time in resolving a complaint does not automatically give rise to the kind of prejudice that is presumed to follow from the laying of a charge under s. 11(b) of the Charter. In this regard, Lamer J.'s comments in Mills (1986), supra, are premised on the fact that there has already been an "overlong subjection to the vexations and vicissitudes of a pending criminal accusation" (p. 919). This is a finding that would be made not at the threshold stage of the s. 7 analysis but is rather to be examined at the principles of fundamental justice

Dans le contexte du droit criminel, le critère applicable suivant l'al. 11b) est objectif et il est possible de déduire qu'un délai déraisonnable a causé un préjudice. Cela contraste fortement avec l'interprétation en deux étapes de l'art. 7 de la Charte, selon laquelle le seul fait qu'un délai s'écoule entre le dépôt de la plainte et son règlement ne cause pas automatiquement le genre de préjudice qui est présumé résulter du dépôt d'une accusation fondée sur l'al. 11b) de la Charte. À cet égard, dans les observations qu'il formule dans l'arrêt Mills de 1986, précité, le juge Lamer tient pour acquis qu'il y a déjà eu «assujettissement trop long aux vexations et au vicissitudes d'une accusation criminelle pendante» (p. 919). Il s'agit là d'une conclusion qui serait tirée non pas à l'étape stage. The Court of Appeal in Kodellas and in the case at bar erred in conflating the two stages of the s. 7 analysis. Philip Bryden similarly concluded that the two stages of the s. 7 analysis were merged by the majority of the Court of Appeal in this case (“Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission): A Case Comment” (1999), 33 U.B.C. L. Rev. 153, at p. 158):

In my view, Chief Justice McEachern’s formulation of when s. 7 applies tends to conflate the threshold question of whether liberty or personal security have been denied with the ultimate question of whether the process in place satisfies the requirements of fundamental justice. The main reason we use threshold tests for the applicability of constitutional protection is to focus our attention on the situations where we believe the special safeguards associated with constitutional protection are needed.

In discussing the nature and purpose of s. 11(b), Lamer J. emphasized in Mills (1986), supra, that the need for protecting the individual in such cases arises “from the nature of the criminal justice system and of our society” (p. 920). He described the criminal justice process as “adversarial and conflictual” and states that the very nature of the criminal process will heighten the stress and anxiety that results from a criminal charge. In contrast to the criminal realm, the filing of a human rights complaint implies no suspicion of wrongdoing on the part of the state. The investigation by the Commission is aimed solely at determining what took place and ultimately to settle the matter in a non-adversarial manner. The purpose of human rights proceedings is not to punish but to eradicate discrimination. Tribunal orders are compensatory rather than punitive. The investigation period in the human rights process is not one where the Commission “prosecutes” the respondent. The Commission has an investigative and conciliatory role until the time comes to make a recommendation whether to refer the complaint to the Tribunal for hearing. These human rights proceedings are designed to vindicate private rights and address grievances. As stated by Dickson C.J. in Canada préliminaire de l’analyse de l’art. 7, mais plutôt à l’étape de l’examen des principes de justice fondamentale. Dans l’arrêt Kodellas et en l’espèce, la Cour d’appel a commis une erreur en confondant les deux étapes de l’analyse de l’art. 7. Philip Bryden a lui aussi conclu que la Cour d’appel à la majorité en l’espèce avait confondu les deux étapes de l’analyse de l’art. 7 («Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission): A Case Comment» (1999), 33 U.B.C. L. Rev. 153, à la p. 158):

[TRADUCTION] À mon avis, en précisant les cas où l’art. 7 s’applique, le juge en chef McEachern tend à confondre la question préliminaire de savoir s’il y a eu atteinte au droit à la liberté ou à la sécurité de la personne avec la question de savoir, en fin de compte, si la procédure établie satisfait aux exigences de la justice fondamentale. Si nous utilisons des critères préliminaires d’applicabilité de la protection constitutionnelle, c’est principalement pour nous concentrer sur les situations où, croyons-nous, les garanties spéciales liées à la protection constitutionnelle sont requises.

En analysant la nature et l’objet de l’al. 11b) dans l’arrêt Mills de 1986, précité, le juge Lamer a souligné que la nécessité de protéger l’individu en pareils cas «tient à la nature même du système de la justice criminelle et de notre société» (p. 920). Il a dit que la justice criminelle procède selon une procédure «contradictoire et conflictuelle» et que la nature même du processus en matière criminelle intensifie le stress et l’angoisse résultant d’une accusation criminelle. Contrairement à ce qui se passe en matière criminelle, le dépôt d’une plainte fondée sur les droits de la personne n’implique aucun soupçon de méfait de la part de l’État. L’enquête menée par la Commission vise uniquement à déterminer ce qui s’est passé et, en fin de compte, à régler l’affaire selon une procédure non contradictoire. L’objectif des procédures en matière de droits de la personne est non pas de punir, mais de mettre fin à la discrimination. Les ordonnances du Tribunal sont de nature compensatoire et non punitive. Lors de l’enquête liée au processus en matière de droits de la personne, la Commission ne «poursuit» pas la personne qui fait l’objet d’une plainte. Elle joue un rôle d’enquêteur et de médiateur jusqu’au moment où il y a lieu de recommander ou non de renvoyer la plainte au Tribunal pour qu’il

(Human Rights Commission) v. Taylor, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 892, at p. 917:

It is essential, however, to recognize that, as an instrument especially designed to prevent the spread of prejudice and to foster tolerance and equality in the community, the Canadian Human Rights Act is very different from the Criminal Code. The aim of human rights legislation, and of s. 13(1), is not to bring the full force of the state's power against a blameworthy individual for the purpose of imposing punishment. Instead, provisions found in human rights statutes generally operate in a less confrontational manner, allowing for a conciliatory settlement if possible and, where discrimination exists, gearing remedial responses more towards compensating the victim.

95

In criminal proceedings, the accusation alone may engage a security interest because of the grave social and personal consequences to the accused — including potential loss of physical liberty, subjection to social stigma and ostracism from the community — which are the unavoidable consequences of an open and adversarial judicial system. However, this Court in Taylor, supra, at pp. 932-33, has commented directly on the diminished role of stigma in the human rights context:

... the present appeal concerns an infringement of s. 2(b) in the context of a human rights statute. The chill placed upon open expression in such a context will ordinarily be less severe than that occasioned where criminal legislation is involved, for attached to a criminal conviction is a significant degree of stigma and punishment, whereas the extent of opprobrium connected with the finding of discrimination is much diminished and the aim or remedial measures is more upon compensation and protection of the victim. As was stated in Canadian National Railway Co. v. Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1114, at p. 1134, under a human rights regime:

It is the (discriminatory) practice itself which is sought to be precluded. The purpose of the Act is not to punish wrongdoing but to prevent discrimination.

tienne une audience. Ces procédures en matière de droits de la personne sont conçues pour faire valoir des droits privés et redresser des torts. Comme l'a dit le juge en chef Dickson dans Canada (Commission des droits de la personne) c. Taylor, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 892, à la p. 917:

Il est essentiel toutefois de reconnaître qu'en tant qu'outil expressément conçu pour empêcher la propagation des préjugés et pour favoriser la tolérance et l'égalité au sein de la collectivité, la Loi canadienne sur les droits de la personne diffère nettement du Code criminel. La législation sur les droits de la personne, et en particulier le par. 13(1), n'a pas pour objet de faire exercer contre une personne fautive le plein pouvoir de l'État dans le but de lui infliger un châtiment. Au contraire, les dispositions des lois sur les droits de la personne tendent plutôt, en règle générale, à éviter ce genre d'affrontement en permettant autant que possible un règlement par voie de conciliation et, lorsqu'il y a discrimination, en prévoyant des redressements destinés davantage à indemniser la victime.

Dans des procédures criminelles, l'accusation peut à elle seule faire intervenir un droit à la sécurité en raison de ses graves conséquences sociales et personnelles sur l'accusé — dont le risque d'être privé de liberté, ainsi que la stigmatisation et l'exclusion sociales — qu'entraîne inévitablement un système judiciaire public et contradictoire. Toutefois, dans l'arrêt Taylor, précité, aux pp. 932 et 933, notre Cour a commenté directement le rôle moins important de la stigmatisation dans le contexte des droits de la personne:

... le présent pourvoi concerne une atteinte à l'al. 2b) résultant d'une loi sur les droits de la personne. La paralysie de la libre expression dans un tel contexte sera normalement moins grave que s'il s'agissait d'une loi pénale, car toute déclaration de culpabilité, au pénal, s'accompagne de stigmates et de peines importants, alors que l'opprobre attaché à une conclusion de discrimination est beaucoup moins grand et qu'en outre les mesures réparatrices visent plutôt la compensation et la protection de la victime. Comme le dit l'arrêt Compagnie des chemins de fer nationaux du Canada c. Canada (Commission canadienne des droits de la personne), [1987] 1 R.C.S. 1114, à la p. 1134, sous le régime d'une loi sur les droits de la personne:

C'est l'acte discriminatoire lui-même que l'on veut prévenir. La loi n'a pas pour objet de punir la faute, mais bien de prévenir la discrimination.

The last point is an important one and it deserves to be underscored. There is no indication that the purpose of the Canadian Human Rights Act is to assign or to punish moral blameworthiness.

I do not doubt that parties in human rights sex discrimination proceedings experience some level of stress and disruption of their lives as a consequence of allegations of complainants. Even accepting that the stress and anxiety experienced by the respondent in this case was linked to delays in the proceedings, I cannot conclude that the scope of his security of the person protected by s. 7 of the Charter covers such emotional effects nor that they can be equated with the kind of stigma contemplated in Mills (1986), supra, of an overlong and vexatious pending criminal trial or in G. (J.), supra, where the state sought to remove a child from his or her parents. If the purpose of the impugned proceedings is to provide a vehicle or act as an arbiter for redressing private rights, some amount of stress and stigma attached to the proceedings must be accepted. This will also be the case when dealing with the regulation of a business, profession, or other activity. A civil suit involving fraud, defamation or the tort of sexual battery will also be “stigmatizing”. The Commission’s investigations are not public, the respondent is asked to provide his version of events, and communication goes back and forth. While the respondent may be vilified by the press, there is no “stigmatizing” state pronouncement as to his “fitness” that would carry with it serious consequences such as those in G. (J.). There is thus no constitutional right or freedom against such stigma protected by the s. 7 rights to “liberty” or “security of the person”.

(f) Conclusion on Liberty and Security of the Person

To summarize, the stress, stigma and anxiety suffered by the respondent did not deprive him of his right to liberty or security of the person. The Ce dernier point est important et mérite d’être souligné. Rien n’indique que l’objet de la Loi canadienne sur les droits de la personne soit d’attribuer une responsabilité morale ou de la punir.

Je ne doute pas que les parties à des procédures relatives à des plaintes de discrimination sexuelle fondées sur les droits de la personne éprouvent un certain stress et voient leur existence perturbée en raison des allégations des plaignants. Même en acceptant que le stress et l’angoisse ressentis par l’intimé en l’espèce étaient liés au délai dans les procédures, je suis incapable de conclure que la sécurité de sa personne garantie par l’art. 7 de la Charte englobe une telle incidence sur le plan émotif ou que cette incidence est assimilable au genre de stigmatisation prévu dans l’arrêt Mills de 1986, précité, qui résulte d’un procès criminel trop long et vexatoire, ou dans l’arrêt G. (J.), précité, où l’État cherchait à retirer la garde d’un enfant à ses parents. Si les procédures contestées visent à fournir un moyen de faire valoir des droits privés, ou à faire fonction d’arbitre en la matière, le stress et la stigmatisation liés à ces procédures sont acceptables jusqu’à un certain point. Il en va également de même lorsqu’il s’agit de réglementer une activité commerciale, professionnelle ou autre. Les poursuites civiles pour fraude, diffamation ou voies de fait de nature sexuelle sont également «stigmatisantes». Les enquêtes menées par la Commission ne sont pas publiques, la personne qui fait l’objet de la plainte est appelée à donner sa version des faits et l’information circule dans les deux sens. Même si la personne qui fait l’objet de la plainte peut être vilipendée par la presse, l’État ne rend, relativement à son «aptitude», aucune décision «stigmatisante» qui aurait des conséquences graves comme dans l’affaire G. (J.). Le droit à la «liberté» ou à la «sécurité de [l]a personne» garanti par l’art. 7 ne comporte donc aucun droit constitutionnel à la protection contre d’une telle stigmatisation.

(f) Conclusion relative à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne

En résumé, le stress et l’angoisse que l’intimé a éprouvés et la stigmatisation dont il a été victime n’ont pas porté atteinte à son droit à la liberté ou à framers of the Charter chose to employ the words, “life, liberty and security of the person”, thus limiting s. 7 rights to these three interests. While notions of dignity and reputation underlie many Charter rights, they are not stand-alone rights that trigger s. 7 in and of themselves. Freedom from the type of anxiety, stress and stigma suffered by the respondent in this case should not be elevated to the stature of a constitutionally protected s. 7 right.

la sécurité de sa personne. Les rédacteurs de la Charte ont choisi d'utiliser les termes «vie, [...] liberté et [...] sécurité de [l]a personne», de sorte que l'art. 7 ne garantit que ces trois droits. Même si des notions de dignité et de réputation sous-tendent maints droits garantis par la Charte, ce ne sont pas des droits distincts qui déclenchent en soi l'application de l'art. 7. La protection contre le genre d'angoisse et de stress que l'intimé a éprouvés et contre le genre de stigmatisation dont il a été victime en l'espèce ne devrait pas être élevée au rang de droit constitutionnel garanti par l'art. 7.

98 My conclusion that the respondent is unable to cross the first threshold of the s. 7 Charter analysis in the circumstances of this case should not be construed as a holding that state-caused delays in human rights proceedings can never trigger an individual's s. 7 rights. It may well be that s. 7 rights can be engaged by a human rights process in a particular case. I leave open the possibility that in other circumstances, delays in the human rights process may violate s. 7 of the Charter.

Ma conclusion que l'intimé ne peut pas franchir la première étape préliminaire de l'analyse de l'art. 7 de la Charte dans les circonstances de la présente affaire ne doit pas être interprétée comme signifiant que les délais imputables à l'État dans des procédures en matière de droits de la personne ne peuvent jamais faire intervenir les droits que l'art. 7 garantit à une personne. Il peut bien arriver, dans certains cas, qu'un processus en matière de droits de la personne fasse intervenir les droits garantis par l'art. 7. Je n'écarte pas la possibilité que, dans d'autres circonstances, les délais dans le processus en matière de droits de la personne violent l'art. 7 de la Charte.

99 Because of my conclusion that there was no deprivation of the respondent's right to liberty or security of the person, I need not proceed to the second stage of the analysis to determine whether the alleged deprivation was in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. However, for the reasons that immediately follow in the administrative law section, I express the view that the delay, in the circumstances of this case, would not have violated the principles of fundamental justice.

Étant donné que j'ai conclu, dans un premier temps, qu'il n'y a eu aucune atteinte au droit de l'intimé à la liberté ou à la sécurité de sa personne, je n'ai pas à décider, dans un deuxième temps, si l'atteinte alléguée était conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale. Toutefois, pour les motifs exposés immédiatement après la partie relative au droit administratif, j'estime que, dans les circonstances de la présente affaire, le délai écoulé n'aurait pas violé les principes de justice fondamentale.

C. Was the Respondent Entitled to a Remedy Pursuant to Administrative Law Principles?

C. L'intimé avait-il droit à une réparation fondée sur les principes du droit administratif?

100 While I have concluded that the respondent is not entitled to a remedy under the Charter, I must still address the issue of whether the respondent is entitled to a remedy under principles of administrative law. This issue was pleaded before Lowry J. of the British Columbia Supreme Court. Counsel

Bien que j'aie conclu que l'intimé n'a droit à aucune réparation fondée sur la Charte, il me reste à déterminer s'il a droit à une réparation fondée sur les principes du droit administratif. La question a été débattue devant le juge Lowry de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique. À l'auwere advised by us during the hearing that, notwithstanding that pleadings were not made before this Court on administrative law per se, we were nevertheless prepared to deal with this issue. The question to be addressed in this section is whether the delay in this case could amount to a denial of natural justice even where the respondent's ability to have a fair hearing has not been compromised.

(a) Prejudice to the Fairness of the Hearing

In my view, there are appropriate remedies available in the administrative law context to deal with state-caused delay in human rights proceedings. However, delay, without more, will not warrant a stay of proceedings as an abuse of process at common law. Staying proceedings for the mere passage of time would be tantamount to imposing a judicially created limitation period (see: R. v. L. (W.K.), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 1091, at p. 1100; Akthar v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1991] 3 F.C. 32 (C.A.)). In the administrative law context, there must be proof of significant prejudice which results from an unacceptable delay.

There is no doubt that the principles of natural justice and the duty of fairness are part of every administrative proceeding. Where delay impairs a party's ability to answer the complaint against him or her, because, for example, memories have faded, essential witnesses have died or are unavailable, or evidence has been lost, then administrative delay may be invoked to impugn the validity of the administrative proceedings and provide a remedy (D. J. M. Brown and J. M. Evans, Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada (loose-leaf), at p. 9-67; W. Wade and C. Forsyth, Administrative Law (7th ed. 1994), at pp. 435-36). It is thus accepted that the principles of natural justice and the duty of fairness include the right to a fair hearing and that undue delay in the processing of an administrative proceeding that impairs the fairness of the hearing can be remedied (see, for example, J. M. Evans, H. N. Janisch and D. J. Mullan, Administrative Law: Cases, Text, and Materials (4th ed. 1995), at p. 256; Wade and Forsyth, supra, at pp. 435-36; Nisbett, supra, at p. 756; Canadian dience, nous avons informé les avocats que, bien que les plaidoiries devant notre Cour n'aient pas porté sur le droit administratif même, nous étions néanmoins disposés à examiner cette question. Il nous faut décider, dans la présente partie, si le délai écoulé en l'espèce peut constituer un déni de justice naturelle même si la capacité de l'intimé d'obtenir une audience équitable n'a pas été compromise.

a) Atteinte à l'équité de l'audience

Selon moi, le droit administratif offre des réparations appropriées en ce qui concerne le délai imputable à l'État dans des procédures en matière de droits de la personne. Cependant, le délai ne justifie pas, à lui seul, un arrêt des procédures comme l'abus de procédure en common law. Mettre fin aux procédures simplement en raison du délai écoulé reviendrait à imposer une prescription d'origine judiciaire (voir: R. c. L. (W.K.), [1991] 1 R.C.S. 1091, à la p. 1100; Akthar c. Canada (Ministre de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration), [1991] 3 C.F. 32 (C.A.)). En droit administratif, il faut prouver qu'un délai inacceptable a causé un préjudice important.

Il n'y a aucun doute que les principes de justice naturelle et l'obligation d'agir équitablement s'appliquent à toutes les procédures administratives. Lorsqu'un délai compromet la capacité d'une partie de répondre à la plainte portée contre elle, notamment parce que ses souvenirs se sont estompés, parce que des témoins essentiels sont décédés ou ne sont pas disponibles ou parce que des éléments de preuve ont été perdus, le délai dans les procédures administratives peut être invoqué pour contester la validité de ces procédures et pour justifier réparation (D. J. M. Brown et J. M. Evans, Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada (feuilles mobiles), à la p. 9-67; W. Wade et C. Forsyth, Administrative Law (7^e éd. 1994), aux pp. 435 et 436). Il est donc reconnu que les principes de justice naturelle et l'obligation d'agir équitablement comprennent le droit à une audience équitable et qu'il est possible de remédier au délai injustifié dans des procédures administratives qui compromettent l'équité de l'audience (voir, par exemple, J. M. Evans, H. N. Janisch et Airlines, supra; Ford Motor Co. of Canada v. Ontario (Human Rights Commission) (1995), 24 C.H.R.R. D/464 (Ont. Div. Ct.); Freedman v. College of Physicians & Surgeons (New Brunswick) (1996), 41 Admin. L.R. (2d) 196 (N.B.Q.B.)).

101

102

D. J. Mullan, Administrative Law: Cases, Text, and Materials (4^e éd. 1995), à la p. 256; Wade et Forsyth, op. cit., aux pp. 435 et 436; Nisbett, précité, à la p. 756; Lignes aériennes Canadien, précité; Ford Motor Co. of Canada c. Ontario (Human Rights Commission) (1995), 24 C.H.R.R. D/464 (C. div. Ont.); Freedman c. College of Physicians & Surgeons (New Brunswick) (1996), 41 Admin. L.R. (2d) 196 (B.R.N.-B.)).

103 The respondent argued before the British Columbia Supreme Court that the delay in the administrative process caused him prejudice that amounted to a denial of natural justice in that he could no longer receive a fair hearing. He alleged that two witnesses had died and that the memories of many witnesses might be impaired by the passage of time. Lowry J. referred to these claims as “vague assertions that fall far short of establishing an inability to prove facts necessary to respond to the complaints” (para. 10). Lowry J. concluded that the respondent’s opportunity to make full answer and defence had not been compromised and thereby refused to terminate the proceedings.

L’intimé a fait valoir, devant la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique, que le délai écoulé dans le déroulement du processus administratif lui avait causé un préjudice équivalant à un déni de justice naturelle du fait qu’il n’était plus en mesure d’obtenir une audience équitable. Il a allégué que deux témoins étaient décédés et que les souvenirs de bien des témoins avaient pu s’estomper avec le temps. Le juge Lowry a qualifié ces allégations de [TRADUCTION] «vagues assertions n’établissant pas l’incapacité de prouver des faits nécessaires pour répondre aux plaintes» (par. 10). Il a conclu que la possibilité de l’intimé de présenter une défense pleine et entière n’avait pas été compromise et il a donc refusé de mettre fin aux procédures.

104 The respondent also argued before Lowry J. that he was not provided with a copy of Ms. Schell’s timeliness submissions for a two-month period and that he had not received proper disclosure. Lowry J. did not consider the respondent prejudiced in this regard. With respect to the alleged failure to disclose information to the respondent, this is not, in my opinion, a case in which the unfairness is so obvious that there would be a denial of natural justice, or in which there was an abuse of process such that it would be inappropriate to put the respondent through hearings before the Tribunal. I would therefore adopt the finding of Lowry J. that the delay in this case is not such that it would necessarily result in a hearing that lacks the essential elements of fairness. The respondent’s right to a fair hearing has not been jeopardized. Proof of prejudice has not been demonstrated to be of sufficient magnitude to impact on the fairness of the hearing. This is a finding of fact made by the trial judge that has not, in my opinion, been successfully attacked on appeal. The question which must L’intimé a aussi fait valoir devant le juge Lowry qu’il avait dû attendre deux mois avant d’obtenir copie des observations de M^{me} Schell concernant le respect du délai imparti et que la divulgation qui lui avait été faite n’était pas suffisante. Le juge Lowry n’a pas considéré que l’intimé avait subi un préjudice à cet égard. En ce qui concerne l’omission alléguée de divulguer des renseignements à l’intimé, il ne s’agit pas, à mon sens, d’un cas où l’iniquité est si manifeste qu’il y aurait déni de justice naturelle ni d’un cas où il y a eu abus de procédure tel qu’il serait inapproprié de contraindre l’intimé à se présenter à une audience devant le Tribunal. Je suis donc d’avis de souscrire à la conclusion du juge Lowry que le délai en l’espèce n’est pas nécessairement de nature à entraîner la tenue d’une audience dépourvue des éléments requis pour être équitable. Le droit de l’intimé à une audience équitable n’a pas été compromis. Il n’a pas été établi que le préjudice subi est assez important pour nuire à l’équité de l’audience. Il s’agit là d’une conclusion de fait du juge de pre-be addressed is therefore whether the delay in this case could amount to a denial of natural justice or an abuse of process even where the respondent has not been prejudiced in an evidentiary sense.

(b) Other Forms of Prejudice

It is trite law that there is a general duty of fairness resting on all public decision-makers (Martineau v. Matsqui Institution Disciplinary Board, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 602, at p. 628). The human rights processes at issue in this case must have been conducted in a manner that is entirely consistent with the principles of natural justice and procedural fairness. Perhaps the best illustration of the traditional meaning of this duty of fairness in administrative law can be discerned from the following words of Dickson J. in Martineau, at p. 631:

In the final analysis, the simple question to be answered is this: Did the tribunal on the facts of the particular case act fairly toward the person claiming to be aggrieved? It seems to me that this is the underlying question which the courts have sought to answer in all the cases dealing with natural justice and with fairness.

Throughout the authorities in this area, terms such as “natural justice”, “procedural fairness”, “abuse of process”, and “abuse of discretion” are employed. In Martineau, at p. 629, Dickson J. (writing for three judges, while all nine concurred in the result), stated that “the drawing of a distinction between a duty to act fairly, and a duty to act in accordance with the rules of natural justice, yields an unwieldy conceptual framework”. With regard to these terms, I would adopt the following words of Sherstobitoff J.A. of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in Misra v. College of Physicians & Surgeons of Saskatchewan (1988), 52 D.L.R. (4th) 477, at p. 490:

There are two common denominators in each of the terms. The first is the impossibility of precise definition because of their breadth and the wide array of circummière instance qui n’a pas été contestée avec succès en appel. La question qui doit être examinée est donc de savoir si le délai écoulé en l’espèce pourrait constituer un déni de justice naturelle ou un abus de procédure même si l’intimé n’a subi aucun préjudice sur le plan de la preuve.

b) Autres formes de préjudice

Il est bien établi en droit que les instances décisionnelles publiques ont toutes l’obligation générale d’agir équitablement (Martineau c. Comité de discipline de l’Institution de Matsqui, [1980] 1 R.C.S. 602, à la p. 628). Les procédures en matière de droits de la personne, dont il est question en l’espèce, doivent s’être déroulées d’une manière tout à fait conforme aux principes de justice naturelle et d’équité procédurale. Les propos suivants du juge Dickson dans l’arrêt Martineau, à la p. 631, illustrent peut-être le mieux le sens traditionnel de l’obligation d’agir équitablement en droit administratif:

En conclusion, la simple question à laquelle il faut répondre est celle-ci: compte tenu des faits de ce cas particulier, le tribunal a-t-il agi équitablement à l’égard de la personne qui se prétend lésée? Il me semble que c’est la question sous-jacente à laquelle les cours ont tenté de répondre dans toutes les affaires concernant la justice naturelle et l’équité.

Dans la jurisprudence qui existe en la matière, on trouve des expressions comme «justice naturelle», «équité procédurale», «abus de procédure» et «abus de pouvoir discrétionnaire». Dans l’arrêt Martineau, à la p. 629, le juge Dickson (s’exprimant au nom de trois juges, alors que les neuf juges souscrivaient tous au résultat) a dit que «tracer une distinction entre une obligation d’agir équitablement et celle d’agir selon les règles de justice naturelle conduit à un cadre conceptuel de maniement difficile». En ce qui concerne ces expressions, je suis d’avis de souscrire aux propos suivants du juge Sherstobitoff de la Cour d’appel de la Saskatchewan, dans Misra c. College of Physicians & Surgeons of Saskatchewan (1988), 52 D.L.R. (4th) 477, à la p. 490:

[TRADUCTION] Il existe deux dénominateurs communs à chacune des expressions. Le premier est l’impossibilité de les définir avec exactitude en raison de leur portée et stances which may bring them into play. The other is the concept of “fairness” or “fair play”. They clearly overlap. Unreasonable delay is a possible basis upon which to raise any of them.

105

106

de la vaste gamme de circonstances susceptibles de les mettre en jeu. Le deuxième est le chevauchement manifeste des notions d’«équité» et de «franc-jeu». Un délai déraisonnable pourrait justifier d’invoquer l’une ou l’autre.

107

The respondent contends that the delay in the human rights proceedings constitutes a breach of procedural fairness amounting to a denial of natural justice and resulting in an abuse of process. The question is whether one can look to the psychological and sociological harm caused by the delay rather than merely to the procedural or legal effect, namely, whether the ability to make full answer and defence has been compromised, to determine whether there has been a denial of natural justice. This issue is a difficult one and there is no clear authority in this area.

L’intimé soutient que le délai dans les procédures en matière de droits de la personne constitue une atteinte à l’équité procédurale qui équivaut à un déni de justice naturelle et qui entraîne un abus de procédure. Il s’agit de savoir si, aux fins de déterminer s’il y a eu déni de justice naturelle, on peut tenir compte du préjudice psychologique et sociologique causé par le délai et non seulement de l’incidence procédurale ou juridique, c’est-à-dire de la question de savoir si la capacité de présenter une défense pleine et entière a été compromise. Cette question est difficile et il n’y a aucune jurisprudence claire en la matière.

108

In cases where the Charter was held not to apply, most courts and tribunals did not go further to decide whether the stress and stigma resulting from an unacceptable delay were so significant as to amount to an abuse of process. On the other hand, where courts did go further, they most often adopted a narrow approach to the principles of natural justice. For example, in Nisbett, supra, the Manitoba Court of Appeal concluded that delay may amount to an abuse of process that the law will remedy only where “on the record there has been demonstrated evidence of prejudice of sufficient magnitude to impact on the fairness of the hearing” (p. 757). In Canadian Airlines, supra, the Federal Court of Appeal followed Nisbett, concluding that the prejudice must be such “as to deprive a party of his right to a full and complete defence” (p. 641). In the case at bar, Lowry J. for the British Columbia Supreme Court, found that unless there was prejudice to hearing fairness, the type of personal hardship and psychological prejudice suffered by Mr. Blencoe could not give rise to a breach of natural justice (at para. 31):

Dans les affaires où ils ont jugé que la Charte ne s’appliquait pas, la plupart des tribunaux judiciaires et des tribunaux administratifs ne sont pas allés jusqu’à déterminer si le stress et la stigmatisation découlant d’un délai inacceptable étaient importants au point de constituer un abus de procédure. Par contre, les tribunaux judiciaires qui l’ont fait ont le plus souvent interprété de manière restrictive les principes de justice naturelle. Par exemple, dans l’arrêt Nisbett, précité, la Cour d’appel du Manitoba a conclu que le délai peut constituer un abus de procédure auquel la loi ne remédie que si, [TRADUCTION] «d’après le dossier, il a été établi que le préjudice subi est assez important pour nuire à l’équité de l’audience» (p. 757). Dans Lignes aériennes Canadien, précité, la Cour d’appel fédérale a suivi l’arrêt Nisbett et a conclu que le préjudice doit être tel «qu’il prive une partie de son droit à une défense pleine et entière» (p. 641). S’exprimant en l’espèce au nom de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique, le juge Lowry a conclu que, à moins qu’une atteinte ne soit portée à l’équité de l’audience, les difficultés personnelles que M. Blencoe a éprouvées et le préjudice psychologique qu’il a subi n’étaient pas de nature à donner naissance à un déni de justice naturelle (au par. 31):

...it cannot be said that the personal hardship Mr. Blencoe has suffered, albeit protracted by the time the administrative process has taken, gives rise to any Charter considerations. To my mind, it then becomes difficult to see how it can nonetheless be said to be a prejudice giving rise to a denial of natural justice. If it were, there would have been no need for the Kodellas court to resort to section 7 of the Charter. And, having rejected the applicability of section 7, the Nisbett court would have been bound to consider whether the personal hardship in that case constituted a prejudice that supported the prerogative relief sought.

However, courts and tribunals have also referred to other types of prejudice than trial fairness, holding that, where a commission or tribunal has abused its process to the detriment of an individual, a court has the discretion to grant a remedy. For example, in Stefani v. College of Dental Surgeons (British Columbia) (1996), 44 Admin. L.R. (2d) 122 (B.C.S.C.), a variety of effects on the petitioner were examined, including a cloud over his professional reputation resulting from a delay of two years and three months between the receipt of the complaint and the inspection, and an additional six- or seven-month delay which followed. However, the delay in that case had also resulted in an inability for the petitioner to have a fair hearing.

We have also been referred to the case of Brown v. Assn. of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of British Columbia, [1994] B.C.J. No. 2037 (QL), where the British Columbia Supreme Court referred to the petitioner's right to a fair trial having been jeopardized as well as the petitioner suffering harm to his reputation. In Brown, it took three years to serve the petitioner with notice of the inquiry after receiving the complaints. The delays were in no part caused by the petitioner.

In Misra, supra, a college disciplinary board elected to await the completion of criminal proceedings against Misra, while suspending him from the practice of medicine in the interim five-[TRADUCTION] ... on ne peut pas dire que les difficultés personnelles que M. Blencoe a éprouvées, même si elles se sont prolongées à cause de la longueur du processus administratif, font intervenir des considérations fondées sur la Charte. Il est alors difficile, à mon sens, de voir comment on peut néanmoins dire qu'elles constituent un préjudice qui donne naissance à un déni de justice naturelle. Si c'était le cas, la cour, dans l'affaire Kodellas, n'aurait pas eu besoin de recourir à l'art. 7 de la Charte. Et, après avoir écarté la possibilité d'appliquer l'art. 7, la cour, dans Nisbett, aurait été tenue d'examiner si les difficultés personnelles dans cette affaire constituaient un préjudice justifiant la délivrance du bref de prérogative demandé.

Cependant, les tribunaux judiciaires et les tribunaux administratifs ont aussi mentionné d'autres types de préjudice que l'atteinte à l'équité du procès et ont statué que, dans le cas où une commission ou un tribunal administratif abuse de sa procédure au détriment d'une personne, un tribunal judiciaire a le pouvoir discrétionnaire d'accorder un redressement. Par exemple, dans Stefani c. College of Dental Surgeons (British Columbia) (1996), 44 Admin. L.R. (2d) 122 (C.S.C.-B.), diverses répercussions sur le requérant ont été examinées, y compris l'atteinte à sa réputation professionnelle qui résultait du délai de deux ans et trois mois écoulé entre le dépôt de la plainte et le début de l'inspection, et du délai supplémentaire de six ou sept mois qui a suivi. Toutefois, le délai écoulé dans cette affaire avait également eu pour effet d'empêcher le requérant d'obtenir une audience équitable.

On nous a aussi mentionné la décision Brown c. Assn. of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of British Columbia, [1994] B.C.J. No. 2037 (QL), où la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique a décidé qu'il y avait eu atteinte à la réputation du requérant et à son droit à un procès équitable. Dans cette affaire, trois ans s'étaient écoulés entre le dépôt des plaintes et la signification d'un avis d'enquête au requérant. Le délai écoulé n'était aucunement imputable à ce dernier.

Dans Misra, précité, le comité de discipline d'un ordre avait décidé d'attendre la fin des procédures criminelles engagées contre M. Misra et, dans l'intervalle, de lui retirer son permis d'exercer la year period. After five years, the criminal proceedings were abandoned and the board council decided to hold a hearing. Sherstobitoff J.A. held for the court that (at p. 490):

109

110

111

The concept of natural justice or procedural fairness as outlined by Dickson J. in Martineau is broad enough to encompass principles which, in other contexts, have been termed abuse of discretion or abuse of process because of delay and related matters. A court, in exercising its supervisory function over an administrative tribunal is entitled to prohibit abuse of that tribunal's process in cases of unfairness or oppression caused or contributed to by delay resulting in a denial of natural justice.

médecine. Les procédures criminelles ont été abandonnées au bout de cinq ans et le comité a décidé de tenir une audience. Le juge Sherstobitoff a conclu ce qui suit, au nom de la cour (à la p. 490):

[TRADUCTION] La notion de justice naturelle ou d'équité procédurale dont le juge Dickson fait état dans l'arrêt Martineau est assez large pour faire obstacle à ce que l'on a qualifié, dans d'autres contextes, d'abus de pouvoir discrétionnaire ou d'abus de procédure causé par un délai et d'autres éléments connexes. En exerçant son rôle de surveillance d'un tribunal administratif, une cour de justice peut interdire que l'on abuse de la procédure de ce tribunal dans les cas où il y a iniquité ou oppression imputable en totalité ou en partie à un délai qui entraîne un déni de justice naturelle.

112 The Court of Appeal found that Misra's ability to defend himself would likely be impaired and that he had already been punished by virtue of the five-year suspension (at pp. 492-93). It is clear, however, that in Misra the court felt that it is only in exceptional cases that delay will amount to unfairness. Moreover, in Misra, an essential part of the prejudice suffered was the result of the lengthy suspension. Finally, the court also concluded that there was prejudice to Misra's right to a fair hearing due to the passage of a five-year period.

La Cour d'appel a conclu que la capacité de M. Misra de se défendre serait vraisemblablement compromise et que sa suspension de cinq ans avait déjà eu pour effet de le punir (aux pp. 492 et 493). Cependant, il est clair que, dans l'affaire Misra, la Cour d'appel a jugé qu'un délai ne constitue une iniquité que dans des cas exceptionnels. De plus, dans cette affaire, un élément essentiel du préjudice subi découlait de la durée prolongée de la suspension. Enfin, la cour a aussi conclu que le délai de cinq ans avait porté atteinte au droit de M. Misra à la tenue d'une audience équitable.

113 In Ratzlaff v. British Columbia (Medical Services Commission) (1996), 17 B.C.L.R. (3d) 336, Hollinrake J.A. for the British Columbia Court of Appeal agreed with the appellant that, "where the delay is so egregious that it amounts to an abuse of power or can be said to be oppressive, the fact that the hearing itself will be a fair one is of little or no consequence" (para. 19). At issue in Ratzlaff was a lengthy delay in processing disciplinary charges against a physician that had affected how the physician arranged his finances. In not restricting abuse of process to procedural unfairness, Hollinrake J.A. stated, at paras. 22-23:

Dans l'arrêt Ratzlaff c. British Columbia (Medical Services Commission) (1996), 17 B.C.L.R. (3d) 336, le juge Hollinrake de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a convenu avec l'appellant que [TRADUCTION] «lorsque le délai est énorme au point de constituer un abus de pouvoir ou de pouvoir être qualifié d'oppressif, le fait que l'audience elle-même sera équitable importe peu ou pas du tout» (par. 19). Dans cette affaire, un long délai dans le traitement des accusations d'infraction disciplinaire portées contre un médecin avait eu une incidence sur la planification financière de ce dernier. En s'abstenant de limiter l'abus de procédure à l'iniquité procédurale, le juge Hollinrake a affirmé ceci, aux par. 22 et 23:

Abuse of power is a broader notion, akin to oppression. It encompasses procedural unfairness, conduct equivalent to breach of contract or of representation, and, in my view, unjust delay. I should add that not all lengthy delays are unjust; regard must be had to the causes of delay, and to resulting reasonable changes of position.

[TRADUCTION] La notion d'abus de pouvoir est large et s'apparente à l'oppression. Elle englobe l'iniquité procédurale, la conduite équivalant à la rupture d'un contrat ou à une fausse déclaration et, à mon avis, le délai injustifié. J'ajouterais que tous les délais ne sont pas injusti-

Where a party in the position of the appellant relies on delay as amounting to an abuse of power it is incumbent on that party to demonstrate a resulting change of position. In my opinion, the very fact that the appellant continued with his practice as he did and throughout the whole period of time in issue is sufficient to establish such a change of position.

Ratzlaff differs from the case at bar in that the physician carried on his practice thinking that his problems were behind him. He had even retired thinking that his billing disputes were over. Moreover, the chambers judge found that the physician had literally requested that action be taken but that it was three years before the Commission even communicated with him (para. 11). In all, it had been seven years before the physician had received a hearing notice.

I would be prepared to recognize that unacceptable delay may amount to an abuse of process in certain circumstances even where the fairness of the hearing has not been compromised. Where inordinate delay has directly caused significant psychological harm to a person, or attached a stigma to a person's reputation, such that the human rights system would be brought into disrepute, such prejudice may be sufficient to constitute an abuse of process. The doctrine of abuse of process is not limited to acts giving rise to an unfair hearing; there may be cases of abuse of process for other than evidentiary reasons brought about by delay. It must however be emphasized that few lengthy delays will meet this threshold. I caution that in cases where there is no prejudice to hearing fairness, the delay must be clearly unacceptable and have directly caused a significant prejudice to amount to an abuse of process. It must be a delay that would, in the circumstances of the case, bring the human rights system into disrepute. The difficult question before us is in deciding what is an "unacceptable delay" that amounts to an abuse of process.

fiés; il faut tenir compte des causes du délai ainsi que des changements raisonnables de situation qui en ont résulté.

Lorsqu'une partie qui se trouve dans la situation de l'appellant soutient qu'un délai constitue un abus de pouvoir, il lui incombe de prouver qu'il en a résulté un changement de situation. Selon moi, le fait même que l'appellant a continué d'exercer sa profession pendant toute la période en cause suffit pour établir un tel changement de situation.

L'arrêt Ratzlaff diffère de la présente affaire du fait que le médecin avait continué d'exercer sa profession en pensant que ses problèmes étaient réglés. Il avait même pris sa retraite en croyant que ses litiges en matière de facturation étaient terminés. En outre, le juge en chambre a conclu que le médecin avait expressément demandé que des mesures soient prises, mais que trois années s'étaient écoulées avant même que la commission communique avec lui (au par. 11). En tout, sept années s'étaient écoulées avant que le médecin reçoive un avis d'audience.

Je serais disposé à reconnaître qu'un délai inacceptable peut constituer un abus de procédure dans certaines circonstances, même lorsque l'équité de l'audience n'a pas été compromise. Dans le cas où un délai excessif a causé directement un préjudice psychologique important à une personne ou entaché sa réputation au point de déconsidérer le régime de protection des droits de la personne, le préjudice subi peut être suffisant pour constituer un abus de procédure. L'abus de procédure ne s'entend pas que d'un acte qui donne lieu à une audience inéquitable et il peut englober d'autres cas que celui où le délai cause des difficultés sur le plan de la preuve. Il faut toutefois souligner que rares sont les longs délais qui satisfont à ce critère préliminaire. Ainsi, pour constituer un abus de procédure dans les cas où il n'y a aucune atteinte à l'équité de l'audience, le délai doit être manifestement inacceptable et avoir directement causé un préjudice important. Il doit s'agir d'un délai qui, dans les circonstances de l'affaire, déconsidérerait le régime de protection des droits de la personne. La question difficile dont nous sommes saisis est de savoir quel «délai inacceptable» constitue un abus de procédure.

114

115

(c) Abuse of Process — Principles

116

The respondent's case is that there has been an unacceptable delay in the administrative process which has caused him to be prejudiced by the stigma attached to the two Complaints to an extent that justifies the process being terminated now. Abuse of process is a common law principle invoked principally to stay proceedings where to allow them to continue would be oppressive. As stated by Brown and Evans, supra, at pp. 9-71 and 9-72:

The stringency of the requirements for showing that delay constitutes a breach of fairness would seem to be due, at least in part, to the drastic nature of the only appropriate remedy. Unlike other instances of procedural unfairness where it is open to a court to remit the matter for redetermination in a procedurally fair manner, the remedy for undue delay will usually be to prevent the tribunal from exercising its legislative authority, either by prohibiting it from proceeding with the hearing, or by quashing the resulting decision. [Emphasis added.]

117

In the context of a breach of s. 11(b) of the Charter, a stay has been found to constitute the only possible remedy (R. v. Askov, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1199). The respondent asked for the same remedy in his administrative law proceedings before Lowry J. There is, however, no support for the notion that a stay is the only remedy available in administrative law proceedings. A stay accords very little importance to the interest of implementing the Human Rights Code and giving effect to the complainants' rights to have their cases heard. Other remedies are available for abuse of process. Where a respondent asks for a stay, he or she will have to bear a heavy burden. The discussion that follows often links abuse of process and the remedy of a stay because the stay, as I have said, is the only applicable remedy in the context of a s. 11(b) application. Nevertheless, I wish to underline that my inquiry here is directed only at the determination of the existence of an abuse of process on the facts of this case.

c) Abus de procédure — Principes

L'intimé soutient que, vu qu'il a été tellement lésé par le délai inacceptable dans le processus administratif et par la stigmatisation qui en a découlé par suite des deux plaintes portées contre lui, l'arrêt des procédures est maintenant justifié. L'abus de procédure est une notion de common law qui est invoquée principalement pour mettre fin à des procédures lorsqu'il serait oppressif de permettre leur continuation. Comme l'ont affirmé Brown et Evans, op. cit., aux pp. 9-71 et 9-72:

[TRADUCTION] La rigueur de l'exigence de démontrer que le délai constitue un manquement à l'obligation d'agir équitablement semblerait attribuable, du moins en partie, à la nature radicale du seul redressement approprié. Contrairement à d'autres cas d'iniquité procédurale où la cour peut renvoyer l'affaire pour qu'elle soit tranchée à nouveau d'une manière équitable sur le plan de la procédure, le redressement prévu en cas de délai injustifié consiste généralement à empêcher le tribunal administratif d'exercer le pouvoir qu'il tient de la loi, soit en lui interdisant de tenir l'audience, soit en annulant la décision rendue à l'issue de celle-ci. [Je souligne.]

Dans le contexte d'une violation de l'al. 11b) de la Charte, l'arrêt des procédures a été considéré comme étant la seule réparation possible (R. c. Askov, [1990] 2 R.C.S. 1199). L'intimé a demandé la même réparation dans le cadre de ses procédures en matière de droit administratif devant le juge Lowry. Cependant, rien ne justifie l'idée que l'arrêt des procédures est la seule réparation possible dans des procédures en matière de droit administratif. Lorsqu'on ordonne un arrêt des procédures, on accorde très peu d'importance à l'intérêt qu'il y a à appliquer le Human Rights Code et à faire respecter le droit du plaignant d'être entendu. D'autres réparations peuvent être accordées dans le cas d'un abus de procédure. La personne faisant l'objet d'une plainte qui demande l'arrêt des procédures doit s'acquitter d'un lourd fardeau de preuve. L'analyse qui suit lie souvent abus de procédure et arrêt des procédures parce que ce dernier est, comme je l'ai dit, la seule réparation possible dans le contexte de l'application de l'al. 11b). Je tiens néanmoins à souligner que mon examen ici ne vise qu'à déterminer s'il y a eu abus de procédure d'après les faits de la présente affaire.

In R. v. Jewitt, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 128, this Court unanimously affirmed that the doctrine of abuse of process was available in criminal proceedings. In so doing, and as professed by L'Heureux-Dubé J. in R. v. Power, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 601, at p. 613, the Court borrowed the comments of Dubin J.A. in R. v. Young (1984), 40 C.R. (3d) 289 (Ont. C.A.), in describing the abuse of process doctrine, stating that a stay of proceedings should be granted where "compelling an accused to stand trial would violate those fundamental principles of justice which underlie the community's sense of fair play and decency" or where the proceedings are "oppressive or vexatious". The Court also adopted the Ontario Court of Appeal's warning in Young that this is a power which can be exercised only in the "clearest of cases" (p. 614). This was reiterated on many occasions by this Court (see, for example, R. v. Potvin, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 880; R. v. Scott, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 979; Power, supra).

In R. v. Conway, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659, at p. 1667, L'Heureux-Dubé J. explained the underlying purpose of the doctrine of abuse of process as follows:

Under the doctrine of abuse of process, the unfair or oppressive treatment of an appellant disentitles the Crown to carry on with the prosecution of the charge. The prosecution is set aside, not on the merits (see Jewitt, supra, at p. 148), but because it is tainted to such a degree that to allow it to proceed would tarnish the integrity of the court. The doctrine is one of the safeguards designed to ensure "that the repression of crime through the conviction of the guilty is done in a way which reflects our fundamental values as a society" (Rothman v. The Queen, [1981] 1 S.C.R. 640, at p. 689, per Lamer J.) It acknowledges that courts must have the respect and support of the community in order that the administration of criminal justice may properly fulfil its function. Consequently, where the affront to fair play and decency is disproportionate to the societal interest in the effective prosecution of criminal cases, then the administration of justice is best served by staying the proceedings. [Emphasis added.]

Dans l'arrêt R. c. Jewitt, [1985] 2 R.C.S. 128, notre Cour a confirmé à l'unanimité la possibilité d'appliquer la règle de l'abus de procédure en matière criminelle. Ce faisant, et comme l'a dit le juge L'Heureux-Dubé dans R. c. Power, [1994] 1 R.C.S. 601, aux pp. 613 et 614, notre Cour a repris les observations du juge Dubin dans R. c. Young (1984), 40 C.R. (3d) 289 (C.A. Ont.), pour décrire la règle de l'abus de procédure, en affirmant que l'arrêt des procédures devrait être ordonné lorsque «forcer le prévenu à subir son procès violerait les principes de justice fondamentaux qui sous-tendent le sens du franc-jeu et de la décence qu'a la société» ou lorsque la procédure est «oppressive ou vexatoire». La Cour a également fait sienne la mise en garde de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario dans Young, selon laquelle il s'agit d'un pouvoir qui ne peut être exercé que dans les «cas les plus manifestes» (p. 614). Notre Cour a réitéré cela à maintes reprises (voir, par exemple, R. c. Potvin, [1993] 2 R.C.S. 880; R. c. Scott, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 979; Power, précité).

Dans R. c. Conway, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 1659, à la p. 1667, le juge L'Heureux-Dubé a expliqué ainsi la fin qui sous-tend la règle ou doctrine de l'abus de procédure:

Suivant la doctrine de l'abus de procédure, le traitement injuste ou oppressif d'un accusé prive le ministère public du droit de continuer les poursuites relatives à l'accusation. Les poursuites sont suspendues, non à la suite d'une décision sur le fond (voir Jewitt, précité, à la p. 148), mais parce qu'elles sont à ce point viciées que leur permettre de suivre leur cours compromettrait l'intégrité du tribunal. Cette doctrine est l'une des garanties destinées à assurer «que la répression du crime par la condamnation du coupable se fait d'une façon qui reflète nos valeurs fondamentales en tant que société» (Rothman c. La Reine, [1981] 1 R.C.S. 640, à la p. 689, le juge Lamer). C'est là reconnaître que les tribunaux doivent avoir le respect et le soutien de la collectivité pour que l'administration de la justice criminelle puisse adéquatement remplir sa fonction. Par conséquent, lorsque l'atteinte au franc-jeu et à la décence est disproportionnée à l'intérêt de la société d'assurer que les infractions criminelles soient efficacement poursuivies, l'administration de la justice est mieux servie par l'arrêt des procédures. [Je souligne.]

118

119

120 In order to find an abuse of process, the court must be satisfied that, “the damage to the public interest in the fairness of the administrative process should the proceeding go ahead would exceed the harm to the public interest in the enforcement of the legislation if the proceedings were halted” (Brown and Evans, supra, at p. 9-68). According to L’Heureux-Dubé J. in Power, supra, at p. 616, “abuse of process” has been characterized in the jurisprudence as a process tainted to such a degree that it amounts to one of the clearest of cases. In my opinion, this would apply equally to abuse of process in administrative proceedings. For there to be abuse of process, the proceedings must, in the words of L’Heureux-Dubé J., be “unfair to the point that they are contrary to the interests of justice” (p. 616). “Cases of this nature will be extremely rare” (Power, supra, at p. 616). In the administrative context, there may be abuse of process where conduct is equally oppressive.

(d) Was the Delay Unacceptable?

121 To constitute a breach of the duty of fairness, the delay must have been unreasonable or inordinate (Brown and Evans, supra, at p. 9-68). There is no abuse of process by delay per se. The respondent must demonstrate that the delay was unacceptable to the point of being so oppressive as to taint the proceedings. While I am prepared to accept that the stress and stigma resulting from an inordinate delay may contribute to an abuse of process, I am not convinced that the delay in this case was “inordinate”.

122 The determination of whether a delay has become inordinate depends on the nature of the case and its complexity, the facts and issues, the purpose and nature of the proceedings, whether the respondent contributed to the delay or waived the delay, and other circumstances of the case. As previously mentioned, the determination of whether a delay is inordinate is not based on the length of the delay alone, but on contextual factors, including the nature of the various rights at stake in the proceedings, in the attempt to determine whether the Pour conclure qu’il y a eu abus de procédure, la cour doit être convaincue que [TRADUCTION] «le préjudice qui serait causé à l’intérêt du public dans l’équité du processus administratif, si les procédures suivaient leur cours, excéderait celui qui serait causé à l’intérêt du public dans l’application de la loi, s’il était mis fin à ces procédures» (Brown et Evans, op. cit., à la p. 9-68). Le juge L’Heureux-Dubé affirme dans Power, précité, à la p. 616, que, d’après la jurisprudence, il y a «abus de procédure» lorsque la situation est à ce point viciée qu’elle constitue l’un des cas les plus manifestes. À mon sens, cela s’appliquerait autant à l’abus de procédure en matière administrative. Pour reprendre les termes employés par le juge L’Heureux-Dubé, il y a abus de procédure lorsque les procédures sont «injustes au point qu’elles sont contraires à l’intérêt de la justice» (p. 616). «Les cas de cette nature seront toutefois extrêmement rares» (Power, précité, à la p. 616). Dans le contexte administratif, il peut y avoir abus de procédure lorsque la conduite est tout aussi oppressive.

d) Le délai écoulé était-il inacceptable?

Pour qu’il y ait manquement à l’obligation d’agir équitablement, le délai doit être déraisonnable ou excessif (Brown et Evans, op. cit., à la p. 9-68). Le délai ne constitue pas en soi un abus de procédure. La personne visée par des procédures doit établir que le délai était inacceptable au point d’être oppressif et de vicier les procédures en cause. Bien que je sois disposé à reconnaître que le stress et la stigmatisation résultant d’un délai excessif peuvent entraîner un abus de procédure, je ne suis pas convaincu que le délai écoulé en l’espèce était «excessif».

La question de savoir si un délai est devenu excessif dépend de la nature de l’affaire et de sa complexité, des faits et des questions en litige, de l’objet et de la nature des procédures, de la question de savoir si la personne visée par les procédures a contribué ou renoncé au délai, et d’autres circonstances de l’affaire. Comme nous l’avons vu, la question de savoir si un délai est excessif et s’il est susceptible de heurter le sens de l’équité de la collectivité dépend non pas uniquement de la longueur de ce délai, mais de facteurs contextuels, community's sense of fairness would be offended by the delay.

With respect to the actual length of the delay in this case and whether it had been "unacceptable", Lowry J. noted that, unlike the cases to which he had been referred, there was no extended period without any activity in the processing of the Complaints from receipt to referral, except for an inexplicable five-month period of inaction from April 10, 1996, when the respondent provided his substantive response to the Complaints, to September 6, 1996, when human rights officers were assigned to investigate the Complaints. The Commission's counsel provided no explanation or excuses for this five-month gap at the oral hearing. However, according to a letter to the complainant and the respondent dated March 6, 1996, the Council referred to a period of "adjustment" where investigative resources were being transferred from the Employment Standards Branch to the Council and that from then on the Council was to conduct its own investigations. This letter also stated that some investigations would be commenced prior to April 1, 1996, beginning with those complaints that had experienced the longest delays. The Council stated that it appreciated the parties' patience in waiting to be notified as to when the investigation would begin. Lowry J. found that, other than during this five-month period, communication had been ongoing between the Council, solicitors and complainants, and the respondent had not been ignored. There had been a continuous dialogue between the parties (at para. 39).

With respect to calculating the delay, Lowry J. found that the only time that could be considered for the delay was between the filing of the Complaint to the end of the investigation process, in July. He stated that the Tribunal could not be criticized for not setting the hearing dates earlier as the respondent did not press for earlier dates, did not question the fixed dates and cancelled the pre-hearing conference. While the respondent did at one point inquire as to whether one of the Complaints could be set for hearing without investigadont la nature des différents droits en jeu dans les procédures.

En ce qui concerne la longueur du délai en l'espèce et la question de savoir si elle est «inacceptable», le juge Lowry a fait remarquer que, contrairement aux affaires qui lui ont été mentionnées, il n'y avait pas eu de période prolongée d'inactivité dans le traitement des plaintes entre leur dépôt et leur renvoi au Tribunal, à l'exception d'une période inexplicable de cinq mois d'inactivité comprise entre le 10 avril 1996, date à laquelle l'intimé a répondu aux plaintes sur le fond, et le 6 septembre 1996, date à laquelle des agents des droits de la personne ont été chargés d'enquêter sur les plaintes. À l'audience, l'avocat de la Commission n'a fourni aucune explication ni aucune excuse au sujet de cet intervalle de cinq mois. Toutefois, dans une lettre datée du 6 mars 1996 et adressée à la plaignante et à l'intimé, le Conseil a parlé d'une période d'«ajustement» pendant laquelle des enquêteurs de la division des normes d'emploi avaient été mutés chez lui pour qu'il mène dorénavant ses propres enquêtes. La lettre précisait également que certaines enquêtes débuteraient avant le 1^{er} avril 1996 et que la priorité serait accordée aux plaintes dont l'examen avait le plus tardé. Le Conseil remerciait les parties de la patience dont elles feraient preuve en attendant d'être informées de l'ouverture de l'enquête. Le juge Lowry a conclu que, en dehors de cette période de cinq mois, la communication avait été constante entre la Commission, les avocats et les plaignantes, et que l'intimé n'avait pas été tenu à l'écart. Le dialogue s'était poursuivi de façon ininterrompue entre les parties (au par. 39).

Au sujet du calcul du délai, le juge Lowry a conclu que seule la période comprise entre le dépôt de la plainte et la fin de l'enquête, en juillet, pouvait être prise en considération. Il a dit qu'on ne pouvait reprocher au Tribunal de ne pas avoir fixé des dates d'audience plus rapprochées, étant donné que l'intimé ne lui avait pas demandé de le faire, qu'il n'avait pas contesté les dates fixées ni annulé la conférence préparatoire à l'audience. Même si, à un moment donné, l'intimé M. Blencoe s'était enquis de la possibilité de faire inscrire au rôle tion, this would have required a concession that there was sufficient evidence to warrant a hearing, a concession which Mr. Blencoe was not prepared to make. Following Lowry J.'s reasoning, the delay would be computed until July 1997, thus reducing the delay from 32 months to 24 months.

123

124

l'une des plaintes sans qu'une enquête n'ait lieu, il aurait fallu qu'il reconnaisse que la preuve était suffisante pour justifier la tenue d'une audience, ce qu'il n'était pas disposé à faire. Selon le raisonnement du juge Lowry, le délai serait calculé jusqu'en juillet 1997, de sorte qu'il passerait de 32 mois à 24 mois.

125 During those 24 months, the Commission also had to deal with a challenge by the respondent as to the lateness of the Complaints and his accusation that the Complaints were in bad faith. The respondent refused to respond to the allegations until this determination was made. As a result, the process was delayed for some eight months. The respondent was perfectly entitled to bring forward allegations of bad faith and to question the timeliness of the Complaints. However, the Commission should not be held responsible for contributing to this part of the delay. In this regard, Lowry J. stated (at para. 42):

It is not suggested that Mr. Blencoe was not entitled to challenge the complaints, as he did at the outset, but having done so, and having been unsuccessful, it is not in my view open to him now to claim that the events of the eight months elapsed contributed to an unacceptable delay.

Au cours de ces 24 mois, la Commission a également été saisie d'une contestation de l'intimé fondée sur le caractère tardif des plaintes, et de son argument que ces plaintes avaient été portées de mauvaise foi. Il refusait de répondre aux allégations jusqu'à ce que l'on ait statué sur ces points. Le processus a donc été retardé d'environ huit mois. L'intimé avait parfaitement le droit d'alléguer la mauvaise foi et le non-respect du délai imparti pour porter plainte. Cependant, la Commission ne devrait pas être tenue responsable d'avoir contribué à cette partie du délai. Voici ce que le juge Lowry a dit à ce sujet (au par. 42):

[TRADUCTION] On n'affirme pas que M. Blencoe n'avait pas le droit de contester les plaintes comme il l'a fait au départ, mais j'estime qu'il ne peut pas, après avoir exercé ce droit en vain, prétendre maintenant que les événements qui sont survenus pendant les huit mois qui se sont écoulés ont contribué à l'écoulement d'un délai inacceptable.

Thus, while the respondent was entitled to take the steps he did, the Court of Appeal wrongly considered the delay attributable to the aforementioned challenges in computing the delay caused by the Commission. Clearly much of this delay resulted from the respondent's actions, though there appear to be other delays caused by the Commission. As expressed by Lambert J.A., at para. 29, some of the delay was attributable to the Commission, some to the respondent, but very little of it was attributable to either of the two complainants — Ms. Schell or Ms. Willis.

Donc, même si l'intimé avait le droit de faire les démarches qu'il a faites, la Cour d'appel a eu tort de tenir compte du délai attribuable aux contestations susmentionnées pour calculer le délai imputable à la Commission. Il est clair que ce délai résulte en bonne partie des actes de l'intimé, quoique la Commission semble avoir eu par ailleurs sa part de responsabilité. Comme l'a dit le juge Lambert, au par. 29, le délai était attribuable en partie à la Commission et en partie à l'intimé, mais il l'était très peu à l'une ou l'autre des deux plaignantes, M^{me} Schell ou M^{me} Willis.

126 The arguments advanced by the parties before us rely heavily on criminal judgments where delay was considered in the context of s. 11(b) or s. 7 of the Charter. It must be kept in mind, as mentioned in paras. 93-95, that the human rights process of receiving complaints, investigating them, determining whether they are substantial enough to investigate and report and then to refer the matter to the Tribunal for hearing is a very different process from the criminal process. The British Columbia human rights process is designed to protect respondents by ensuring that cases are not adjudicated unless there is some basis for the claims to go forward and unless the issue cannot be disposed of prior to adjudication. Pursuant to s. 27 of the Human Rights Code, the Commission may dismiss a complaint if, inter alia, it is brought too late, the acts alleged do not contravene the Code, there is no reasonable basis for referring the complaint to a hearing, if it does not appear to be in the interest of the group bringing the complaint, the complaint was filed for improper motives or if the complaint was made in bad faith. The Commission therefore performs a gatekeeping or screening function, preventing those cases that are trivial or insubstantial from proceeding. There is also the goal of settlement through mediation which is lacking in the criminal context. The human rights process thus takes a great deal more time prior to referring a complaint to the Tribunal for hearing.

Les arguments que les parties ont avancés devant nous s'appuient en grande partie sur des jugements en matière criminelle où un délai était examiné à la lumière de l'al. 11b) ou de l'art. 7 de la Charte. Comme je l'ai mentionné aux par. 93 à 95, il faut se rappeler que le processus consistant à recevoir des plaintes fondées sur les droits de la

The principles of natural justice also require that both sides be given an opportunity to participate in reviewing documents at various stages in the process and to review the investigation report. The parties therefore have a chance to make submissions before a referral is made to the Tribunal. These steps in the process take time. Indeed, the Commission was under a statutory obligation to proceed as it did. The process itself was not challenged in this case. True, the Commission took longer than is desirable to process these Complaints. I am not condoning that. Nevertheless, McEachern C.J.B.C. has exaggerated in stating that “a week at the outside would have sufficed” to investigate these Complaints (para. 51). While the case may not have been an extremely complicated one, these stages are necessary for the protection personne, à enquêter à leur sujet, à déterminer si elles justifient la tenue d’une enquête, à rédiger un rapport et à renvoyer l’affaire au Tribunal pour qu’il l’entende est fort différent du processus en matière criminelle. Le processus en matière de droits de la personne qui a cours en Colombie-Britannique est conçu pour protéger les personnes qui font l’objet d’une plainte en assurant qu’une audience ne sera tenue que si la plainte a un minimum de fondement et que si la question ne peut pas être réglée préalablement. Selon l’art. 27 du Human Rights Code, la Commission peut notamment rejeter une plainte si elle est présentée tardivement, si les faits allégués ne contreviennent pas au Code, s’il n’y a aucun motif raisonnable de la renvoyer pour audience, si elle semble contraire aux intérêts du groupe qui porte plainte ou encore si elle a été portée de mauvaise foi ou pour des motifs répréhensibles. La Commission exerce donc une fonction de contrôle ou de tri et empêche ainsi les affaires frivoles ou sans fondement de suivre leur cours. Il y a également l’objectif de règlement par la médiation qui est absent du contexte du droit criminel. Le processus en matière de droits de la personne qui précède le renvoi de la plainte au Tribunal pour qu’il tienne une audience est donc beaucoup plus long.

Les principes de justice naturelle exigent en outre que les deux parties puissent examiner les documents aux différentes étapes du processus et prendre connaissance du rapport d’enquête. Les parties ont donc la possibilité de présenter des observations avant que l’affaire soit renvoyée au Tribunal. Ces étapes allongent d’autant le processus. En réalité, la Commission était tenue par la loi de procéder comme elle l’a fait. Le processus comme tel n’a pas été contesté en l’espèce. Il est vrai que la Commission a pris plus de temps que ce qui est souhaitable pour traiter les plaintes, ce qui n’est pas excusable selon moi. Toutefois, le juge en chef McEachern a exagéré lorsqu’il a dit [TRADUCTION] «qu’il aurait suffi tout au plus d’une semaine» pour enquêter sur ces plaintes (par. 51). Même s’il se peut que l’affaire n’ait pas été extrêmement compliquée, ces étapes sont nécessaires pour assurer la protection de la personne qui fait l’objet d’une plainte fondée sur les droits de la per-of the respondents in the context of the human rights complaints system.

128 The Commission seems to have handled the Complaints against Mr. Blencoe in the same manner as it handles all of its human rights complaints. The respondent argues that the Commission should have been sensitive to his particular needs and to have consequently expedited his Complaints on a priority basis. However, as professed by Lowry J., there is, “little if anything in the record to suggest that Mr. Blencoe raised with the Commission any of the hardship he has suffered or that he sought to be afforded any priority on that basis” (para. 45).

129 In Kodellas, supra, the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal held that the determination of whether the delay is unreasonable is, in part, a comparative one whereby one can compare the length of delay in the case at bar with the length of time normally taken for processing in the same jurisdiction and in other jurisdictions in Canada. While this factor has limited weight, I would note that in this regard, on average, it takes the Canadian Human Rights Commission 27 months to resolve a complaint (J. Simpson, “Human Rights Commission Mill Grinds Slowly”, The Globe & Mail (October 1, 1998), p. A18, as quoted in R. E. Hawkins, “Reputational Review III: Delay, Disrepute and Human Rights Commissions” (2000), 25 Queen’s L.J. 599, at p. 600). In Ontario, the average length of complaints, according to the Annual Report 1997-1998 of the Ontario Human Rights Commission (1998), at p. 24, is 19.9 months. The respondent’s counsel at the oral hearing quoted a report of the British Columbia Ministry where the average time to get to a hearing in British Columbia is three years.

130 The delay in the case at bar should be compared to that in analogous cases. In Nisbett, the sexual harassment complaint had been outstanding for approximately three years. In Canadian Airlines, there was a 50-month delay between the filing of the complaint and the appointment of an investigator. In Stefani, there was a delay of two years and sonne, lorsque vient le temps d’examiner cette plainte.

La Commission semble avoir traité les plaintes portées contre M. Blencoe de la même manière qu’elle le fait pour toutes les autres plaintes fondées sur les droits de la personne dont elle est saisie. L’intimé fait valoir qu’elle aurait dû tenir compte de ses besoins particuliers et, par conséquent, traiter en priorité les plaintes dont il faisait l’objet. Cependant, comme l’a affirmé le juge Lowry, [TRADUCTION] «il n’y a que peu ou pas d’éléments du dossier qui indiquent que M. Blencoe a informé la Commission des difficultés qu’il éprouvait ou qu’il a demandé qu’on lui accorde la priorité pour ce motif» (par. 45).

Dans Kodellas, précité, la Cour d’appel de la Saskatchewan a statué que l’exercice consistant à déterminer si un délai est déraisonnable est en partie comparatif, du fait qu’il permet de comparer la durée du délai dans l’affaire en cause au délai qui est normalement nécessaire pour procéder dans le même ressort ou ailleurs au Canada. Bien que ce facteur ait une importance limitée, je tiens à souligner, à cet égard, que la Commission canadienne des droits de la personne met en moyenne 27 mois à régler une plainte (J. Simpson, «Human Rights Commission Mill Grinds Slowly», The Globe & Mail (1^{er} octobre 1998), p. A18, cité dans R. E. Hawkins, «Reputational Review III: Delay, Disrepute and Human Rights Commissions» (2000), 25 Queen’s L.J. 599, à la p. 600). En Ontario, selon le Rapport annuel 1997-1998 de la Commission ontarienne des droits de la personne (1998), à la p. 26, la durée moyenne du traitement d’une plainte est de 19,9 mois. À l’audience, l’avocat de l’intimé a cité un rapport du ministère responsable en Colombie-Britannique selon lequel le délai d’obtention d’une audience dans la province est en moyenne de trois ans.

Le délai écoulé en l’espèce devrait être comparé à celui constaté dans des affaires analogues. Dans l’affaire Nisbett, environ trois années s’étaient écoulées depuis le dépôt de la plainte de harcèlement sexuel. Dans l’affaire Lignes aériennes Canadien, 50 mois s’étaient écoulés entre le dépôt de la plainte et la désignation d’un enquêteur. Dans three months between the complaint and the inspection and an additional six- or seven-month delay which followed. In Brown, a three-year period had elapsed prior to serving the petitioner with notice of the inquiry. In Misra, there was a five-year delay during which time Misra was suspended from the practice of medicine. Finally, in Ratzlaff, it had been seven years before the physician received a hearing notice.

A review of the facts in this case demonstrates that, unlike the aforementioned cases where there was complete inactivity for extremely lengthy periods, the communication between the parties in the case at bar was ongoing. While Lowry J. acknowledged the five-month delay of inactivity, on balance, he found no unacceptable delay and considered the time that elapsed to be nothing more “than the time required to process complaints of this kind given the limitations imposed by the resources available” (para. 47). Lowry J. concluded as follows (at para. 49):

In my view, it cannot be said that the Commission or the Tribunal have acted unfairly toward Mr. Blencoe. They have caused neither an unacceptable delay in the process nor a prejudice to him whereby fairness of the hearings scheduled to be conducted next month have been compromised. There has been no denial of natural justice and, accordingly, Mr. Blencoe’s petition for judicial review cannot succeed.

As expressed by Salmon L.J. in Allen v. Sir Alfred McAlpine & Sons, Ltd., [1968] 1 All E.R. 543 (C.A.), at p. 561, “it should not be too difficult to recognise inordinate delay when it occurs”. In my opinion, the five-month inexplicable delay or even the 24-month period from the filing of the Complaints to the referral to the Tribunal was not so inordinate or inexcusable as to amount to an abuse of process. Taking into account the ongoing communication between the parties, the delay in this case does not strike me as one that would offend the community’s sense of decency and fairness. While I would not presume to fix a specified period for a reasonable delay, I am satisfied that l’affaire Stefani, deux ans et trois mois s’étaient écoulés entre le dépôt de la plainte et le début de l’inspection, à quoi s’étaient ajoutés six ou sept mois supplémentaires. Dans l’affaire Brown, trois années s’étaient écoulées avant qu’un avis d’enquête soit signifié au requérant. Dans l’affaire Misra, un délai de cinq ans s’était écoulé, pendant lequel M. Misra s’était vu retirer son permis d’exercer la médecine. Enfin, dans l’affaire Ratzlaff, sept ans s’étaient écoulés avant que le médecin reçoive un avis d’audience.

L’examen des faits en l’espèce démontre que, contrairement aux affaires susmentionnées où il y a eu des périodes d’inactivité complète extrêmement longues, la communication entre les parties est demeurée constante. Bien qu’il ait reconnu que le dossier était demeuré inactif pendant cinq mois, le juge Lowry a jugé que ce délai n’était pas inacceptable en fin de compte et qu’il ne représentait rien de plus [TRADUCTION] «que le temps nécessaire pour traiter les plaintes de ce genre compte tenu des limites imposées par les ressources disponibles» (par. 47). Le juge Lowry a tiré la conclusion suivante (au par. 49):

[TRADUCTION] À mon avis, on ne peut dire que la Commission ou le Tribunal ont été inéquitables envers M. Blencoe. Ni l’un ni l’autre n’est à l’origine d’un délai inacceptable ou n’a causé à M. Blencoe un préjudice qui aurait eu pour effet de compromettre l’équité des audiences qui devaient avoir lieu le mois suivant. Il n’y a pas eu de déni de justice naturelle et, en conséquence, la demande de contrôle judiciaire présentée par M. Blencoe ne peut être accueillie.

Comme l’a dit le lord juge Salmon dans Allen c. Sir Alfred McAlpine & Sons, Ltd., [1968] 1 All E.R. 543 (C.A.), à la p. 561, [TRADUCTION] «il ne devrait pas être trop difficile de reconnaître un délai excessif lorsqu’il se produit». Selon moi, le délai inexplicable de cinq mois ou même le délai de 24 mois qui s’est écoulé entre le dépôt des plaintes et le renvoi au Tribunal n’était ni excessif ni inexcusable au point de constituer un abus de procédure. Vu la communication constante entre les parties, le délai en l’espèce ne me paraît pas être de ceux qui heurteraient le sens de la justice et de la décence de la société. Même si je ne saurais préciser la durée d’un délai raisonnable, je suis the delay in this case was not so inordinate as to amount to an abuse of process.

131

132

133 As noted in the discussion pertaining to the application of s. 7 of the Charter (paras. 59 to 72), I am also concerned with the causal connection in this case. There must be more than merely a lengthy delay for an abuse of process; the delay must have caused actual prejudice of such magnitude that the public's sense of decency and fairness is affected. While Mr. Blencoe and his family have suffered obvious prejudice since the various sexual harassment allegations against him were made public, as explained above, I am not convinced that such prejudice can be said to result directly from the delay in the human rights proceedings. As in the Charter analysis above, I have simply assumed without deciding, for the purpose of my analysis, that the delay caused by the Commission was a contributory cause of the respondent's prejudice.

VII. Conclusion

134 To summarize, it cannot be said that the respondent's s. 7 rights were violated nor that the conduct of the Commission amounted to an abuse of process. However, I emphasize that nothing in these reasons has any bearing on the merits of the case before the Tribunal.

135 Nevertheless, I am very concerned with the lack of efficiency of the Commission and its lack of commitment to deal more expeditiously with complaints. Lack of resources cannot explain every delay in giving information, appointing inquiry officers, filing reports, etc.; nor can it justify inordinate delay where it is found to exist. The fact that most human rights commissions experience serious delays will not justify breaches of the principles of natural justice in appropriate cases. In R. v. Morin, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 771, at p. 795, the Court stated that in the context of s. 11(b) of the Charter, the government "has a constitutional obligation to commit sufficient resources to prevent unreasona-convaincu que le délai en l'espèce n'était pas excessif au point de constituer un abus de procédure.

Comme je l'ai souligné en procédant à l'analyse concernant l'application de l'art. 7 de la Charte (par. 59 à 72), je suis également préoccupé par la question du lien causal en l'espèce. Pour qu'il y ait abus de procédure, le délai écoulé doit, outre sa longue durée, avoir causé un préjudice réel d'une telle ampleur qu'il heurte le sens de la justice et de la décence du public. Bien que M. Blencoe et les membres de sa famille aient manifestement subi un préjudice en raison de la publicité qui a entouré les diverses allégations de harcèlement sexuel, comme je l'ai expliqué précédemment, je ne suis pas convaincu qu'on peut dire que ce préjudice résulte directement du délai écoulé dans les procédures en matière de droits de la personne. Comme je l'ai fait dans l'analyse précédente relative à la Charte, j'ai simplement tenu pour acquis, sans pour autant le décider, aux fins de mon analyse, que le délai imputable à la Commission avait contribué à causer un préjudice à l'intimé.

VII. Conclusion

En résumé, on ne saurait dire qu'il y a eu atteinte aux droits garantis à l'intimé par l'art. 7 ou que la conduite de la Commission a constitué un abus de procédure. Cependant, je souligne que les présents motifs ne devraient avoir aucune incidence sur le bien-fondé de l'affaire devant le Tribunal.

Je suis néanmoins très préoccupé par l'inefficacité de la Commission et par l'absence d'engagement de sa part à traiter plus rapidement les plaintes dont elle est saisie. Le manque de ressources ne peut pas expliquer tous les délais en matière de communication des renseignements, de désignation d'enquêteurs, de dépôt de rapports, etc.; il ne peut pas justifier non plus un délai jugé excessif. Le fait que la plupart des commissions des droits de la personne connaissent de sérieux délais ne justifie pas la violation des principes de justice naturelle dans des cas appropriés. Dans l'arrêt R. c. Morin, [1992] 1 R.C.S. 771, à la p. 795, la Cour a dit, au sujet de l'application de l'al. 11b) de ble delay". The demands of natural justice are apposite.

I would allow the appeal. The Court of Appeal decision is set aside and the Tribunal should proceed with the hearing of the Complaints on their merits. Considering the lack of diligence displayed by the Commission, I would nevertheless exercise the Court's discretion under s. 47 of the Supreme Court Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. S-26, to award costs against the appellant Commission in favour of Robin Blencoe, Andrea Willis and Irene Schell.

The reasons of Iacobucci, Binnie, Arbour and LeBel JJ. were delivered by LEBEL J. (dissenting in part) — The reasons of Justice Bastarache fully review the judicial history and the factual background of this case, and I do not intend to summarize them again. I shall refer only to such elements of the evidence and of the history of this case, as may be required, for the purpose of my analysis.

I. The Issues

The parties have fought this case mainly on Charter issues. In the end, this approach turned into a constitutional problem, something that it was not. The important and determinative issue should have been the role of judicial review and administrative law principles in the control of undue delay in administrative tribunal proceedings. Given that human rights commissions are administrative law creations, the first place we should look for solutions to problems in their processes is in the realm of administrative law. If the relevant administrative law remedy had been applied, the trial judge should have found that there had been undue delay in the process of the British Columbia Human Rights Commission (formerly the British Columbia Council of Human Rights), that this delay was abusive, and that some la Charte, que le gouvernement «a l'obligation constitutionnelle d'attribuer des ressources suffisantes pour prévenir tout délai déraisonnable». Les exigences de la justice naturelle sont pertinentes.

Je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi. L'arrêt de la Cour d'appel est annulé et le Tribunal devrait procéder à l'audition des plaintes au fond. Toutefois, vu l'absence de diligence manifestée par la Commission appelante, je suis d'avis de lui ordonner de payer les dépens de Robin Blencoe, Andrea Willis et Irene Schell, en vertu du pouvoir discrétionnaire que l'art. 47 de la Loi sur la Cour suprême, L.R.C. (1985), ch. S-26, confère à notre Cour.

Version française des motifs des juges Iacobucci, Binnie, Arbour et LeBel rendus par

LE JUGE LEBEL (dissident en partie) — Dans ses motifs, le juge Bastarache fait un examen complet des procédures et des faits de la présente affaire, de sorte que je ne compte pas les résumer à nouveau. Je vais mentionner seulement les éléments de preuve et les faits qui seront nécessaires pour les fins de mon analyse.

I. Les questions en litige L'argumentation des parties a surtout porté sur des questions relatives à la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. En définitive, le problème qui se posait est, de ce fait, devenu à tort un problème constitutionnel. La question importante et déterminante aurait dû être celle du rôle que le contrôle judiciaire et les principes du droit administratif jouent en matière de prévention des délais injustifiés dans des procédures devant un tribunal administratif. Étant donné que les commissions des droits de la personne sont des créatures du droit administratif, c'est dans le domaine du droit administratif qu'il nous faut d'abord chercher des solutions aux problèmes que posent leurs procédures. Si la réparation appropriée en droit administratif avait été appliquée, le juge de première instance aurait dû conclure qu'il y a eu délai injustifié dans les procédures de la British Columbia Human Rights Commission (auparavant British Columbia Council of Human Rights) («Commission des form of remedy should have been granted to the respondent Blencoe.

136

137

138

droits de la personne de la Colombie-Britannique» ou «Commission»), que ce délai était excessif et qu'une forme quelconque de réparation devait être accordée à l'intimé Blencoe.

139 Nevertheless, I agree that a stay of proceedings was not warranted in the circumstances of the case and should be lifted, as suggested by Bastarache J. Such a remedy took no consideration of the interest of the complainants Irene Schell and Andrea Willis in the proceedings of the British Columbia Human Rights Commission ("Commission"). Nobody benefits from delay, but the interests of innocent parties must influence our choice of remedy. The Court of Appeal seems to have dealt with this case as if it were a pure conflict between the respondent and the state, without taking into account that the complainants Schell and Willis also had an important interest in an efficient disposition of their allegations against Blencoe and in the correct and timely application of the appropriate administrative law remedies.

II. The Administrative Law Doctrine of Abuse of Process and the Control of Undue Delay

140 Unnecessary delay in judicial and administrative proceedings has long been an enemy of a free and fair society. At some point, it is a foe that has plagued the life of almost all courts and administrative tribunals. It's a problem that must be brought under control if we are to maintain an effective system of justice, worthy of the confidence of Canadians. The tools for this task are not to be found only in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but also in the principles of a flexible and evolving administrative law system.

141 The legal doctrines that have developed both under the common law and under the Charter to respond to delay are certainly not simple. But the facts of this case point to one inescapable conclusion: the respondent, Robin Blencoe, faced unreasonable delay that violated administrative law principles of fairness in the management of the Je conviens néanmoins qu'un arrêt des procédures n'était pas justifié dans les circonstances de l'affaire et qu'il devrait être annulé, comme le propose le juge Bastarache. Cette réparation ne tenait aucun compte de l'intérêt que les plaignantes Irene Schell et Andrea Willis avaient dans les procédures de la Commission des droits de la personne de la Colombie-Britannique. Un délai n'est avantageux pour personne, mais les intérêts de parties innocentes doivent influencer notre choix d'une réparation. La Cour d'appel semble avoir considéré qu'il s'agissait en l'espèce d'un simple différend entre l'intimé et l'État, sans tenir compte du fait que les plaignantes Schell et Willis avaient elles aussi considérablement intérêt à ce qu'il soit statué efficacement sur leurs allégations contre Blencoe et à ce que les réparations appropriées en droit administratif soient accordées correctement et en temps opportun.

II. La règle de l'abus de procédure en droit administratif et la prévention des délais injustifiés

Ce n'est pas d'hier que les délais inutiles dans les procédures judiciaires et les procédures administratives sont qualifiés de contraires à une société libre et équitable. Il s'agit jusqu'à un certain point d'un fléau qui touche presque tous les tribunaux judiciaires et les tribunaux administratifs. C'est un problème qu'il faut régler pour assurer le maintien d'un système de justice efficace et digne de la confiance des Canadiens et des Canadiennes. La solution à ce problème réside non seulement dans l'application de la Charte, mais également dans celle des principes d'un régime de droit administratif souple et en évolution constante.

Les règles juridiques qui ont été établies en vertu de la common law et de la Charte afin de remédier au problème des délais ne sont sûrement pas simples. Cependant, les faits de la présente affaire amènent inévitablement à conclure que l'intimé, Robin Blencoe, a été victime d'un délai déraisonnable contraire aux principes, reconnus en process of an administrative tribunal or body. Those principles concern not only the fairness of the hearing and of the final decision, but the very conduct of the procedures leading to the disposition in the matter. In these reasons, I shall now examine those principles and the nature of the remedy that appears just and appropriate after giving due consideration to the interests of all parties concerned by this long and frustrating judicial debate.

III. The Application for Judicial Review

This case came before the courts when Blencoe brought a petition for judicial review. Lowry J., in the British Columbia Supreme Court, denied any remedy under administrative law principles because, in his opinion, Blencoe had not established any prejudice that related “directly to the ability to respond to the complaint in an evidentiary sense” ((1998), 49 B.C.L.R. (3d) 201, at para. 37). Judicial review would thus be essentially limited to assessing the impact of the delay on the hearing and the decision.

Some case law did support this approach. In Nisbett v. Manitoba (Human Rights Commission) (1993), 101 D.L.R. (4th) 744, the Manitoba Court of Appeal searched for delay that caused prejudice to an individual’s right to a fair and full hearing. In Ford Motor Co. of Canada v. Ontario (Human Rights Commission) (1995), 24 C.H.R.R. D/464, at p. 466, the Ontario Divisional Court explicitly followed the Nisbett analysis.

However, these decisions seem to have been exceptions in an otherwise steady progression toward a broader vision of administrative law abuse of process doctrine and the remedies that it provides for unreasonable delay. Administrative law abuse of process doctrine is fundamentally about protecting people from unfair treatment by administrative agencies. In Martineau v. Matsqui Institution Disciplinary Board, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 602, at p. 631, Dickson J. (as he then was) droit administratif, de l’équité en matière de gestion des procédures d’un tribunal ou d’un organisme administratif. Ces principes concernent non seulement l’équité de l’audience et de la décision finale, mais encore le déroulement même des procédures menant au règlement de l’affaire. Dans les présents motifs, je vais maintenant examiner ces principes et la nature de la réparation qui paraît juste et appropriée, compte tenu, comme il se doit, des intérêts de toutes les parties touchées par ce long et frustrant débat judiciaire.

III. La demande de contrôle judiciaire

Les procédures devant les tribunaux ont commencé avec le dépôt par Blencoe d’une demande de contrôle judiciaire. Le juge Lowry de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique a refusé toute réparation fondée sur les principes du droit administratif parce que, à son avis, Blencoe n’avait pas établi l’existence d’un préjudice lié [TRADUCTION] «directement à sa capacité de répondre à la plainte en produisant des éléments de preuve» ((1998), 49 B.C.L.R. (3d) 201, au par. 37). Ainsi, le contrôle judiciaire consisterait essentiellement à évaluer l’incidence du délai sur l’audience et la décision.

Une partie de la jurisprudence appuyait ce point de vue. Dans l’arrêt Nisbett c. Manitoba (Human Rights Commission) (1993), 101 D.L.R. (4th) 744, la Cour d’appel du Manitoba s’est demandé si un délai avait porté atteinte au droit d’une personne à une audience complète et équitable. Dans Ford Motor Co. of Canada c. Ontario (Human Rights Commission) (1995), 24 C.H.R.R. D/464, à la p. 466, la Cour divisionnaire de l’Ontario a explicitement suivi l’analyse effectuée dans l’arrêt Nisbett.

Toutefois, ces décisions semblent avoir constitué des accidents de parcours dans une évolution par ailleurs constante vers une conception plus large de la règle de l’abus de procédure en droit administratif et des réparations qu’elle offre en cas de délai déraisonnable. Cette règle de l’abus de procédure en droit administratif vise fondamentalement à protéger les gens contre tout traitement inéquitable de la part d’organismes administratifs. Dans l’arrêt Martineau c. Comité de discipline de l’Insti- described the administrative law principle of fairness in these classic terms:

142

143

144

In the final analysis, the simple question to be answered is this: Did the tribunal on the facts of the particular case act fairly toward the person claiming to be aggrieved? It seems to me that this is the underlying question which the courts have sought to answer in all the cases dealing with natural justice and fairness.

When we ask whether there has been an administrative law abuse of process, we ask the same fundamental question: has an administrative agency treated people inordinately badly?

IV. Historical Context

145 This question, however, does not exist outside of a legal historical context, through which we must trace the role of courts on these kinds of questions up to the present day. Two fundamental aspects of the common law's history are relevant to the rules in this area: (1) the common law system's abhorrence of delay; and (2) the common law's development as to the power of courts to monitor the processes of administrative bodies.

146 The notion that justice delayed is justice denied reaches back to the mists of time. In Magna Carta in 1215, King John promised: "To none will we sell, to none will we deny, or delay, right or justice" (emphasis added). As La Forest J. put it, the right to a speedy trial has been "a right known to the common law . . . for more than 750 years" (R. v. Rahey, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 588, at p. 636). In criminal law cases, this Court had no difficulty determining in R. v. Askov, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1199, at p. 1227, that "the right to be tried within a reasonable time is an aspect of fundamental justice protected by s. 7 of the Charter". Outside the criminal law context, legislators have devised limitation periods, and courts have developed equitable doctrines such as that of laches. For centuries, those working with our legal system have recognized tution de Matsqui, [1980] 1 R.C.S. 602, à la p. 631, le juge Dickson (plus tard Juge en chef) a décrit le principe de l'équité en droit administratif en ces termes classiques:

En conclusion, la simple question à laquelle il faut répondre est celle-ci: compte tenu des faits de ce cas particulier, le tribunal a-t-il agi équitablement à l'égard de la personne qui se prétend lésée? Il me semble que c'est la question sous-jacente à laquelle les cours ont tenté de répondre dans toutes les affaires concernant la justice naturelle et l'équité.

Lorsque nous nous demandons s'il y a eu abus de procédure selon le droit administratif, nous nous posons la même question fondamentale: un organisme administratif a-t-il traité des gens excessivement mal?

IV. Le contexte historique

La question ne se pose cependant pas en dehors d'un contexte juridique historique dans lequel nous devons examiner le rôle que les tribunaux judiciaires ont joué jusqu'à ce jour en la matière. Deux aspects fondamentaux de l'histoire de la common law sont pertinents quant aux règles applicables dans ce domaine: (1) l'aversion de la common law pour les délais, et (2) l'évolution de la common law en ce qui concerne le pouvoir des tribunaux judiciaires de surveiller les procédures d'organismes administratifs.

L'idée que la justice différée est un déni de justice ne date pas d'hier. Dans la Magna Carta de 1215, le roi Jean a pris l'engagement suivant: [TRADUCTION] «À aucun nous ne vendrons, à aucun nous ne refuserons ni différerons droit ou justice» (je souligne). Comme l'a dit le juge La Forest, le droit à un procès expéditif «est connu en common law depuis plus de 750 ans» (R. c. Rahey, [1987] 1 R.C.S. 588, à la p. 636). En matière de droit criminel, notre Cour n'a pas hésité à conclure, dans l'arrêt R. c. Askov, [1990] 2 R.C.S. 1199, à la p. 1227, que «le droit d'être jugé dans un délai raisonnable est un aspect de la justice fondamentale garantie en vertu de l'art. 7 de la Charte». En dehors du contexte du droit criminel, le législateur a établi des délais de prescription, et les cours de justice, des règles d'equity comme celle du manque de dili-that unnecessary delay strikes against its core values and have done everything within their powers to combat it, albeit not always with complete success.

Under the common law, courts have gradually developed the power to monitor the processes of administrative bodies and their legality. There is today no doubt that “[t]he superior courts have the inherent power to review the legality of administrative actions” (D. P. Jones and A. S. de Villars, Principles of Administrative Law (3rd ed. 1999), at p. 6). Unnecessary delay is not excluded from the scope of judicial review.

This supervisory power over administrative processes developed from the very beginnings of the prerogative writ most apropos in the case before us. Mandamus is a storied writ. At its origins, it empowered the Court of King’s Bench to order a court or an administrative body to do its duty: Sir W. Holdsworth, A History of English Law (7th ed. 1956), vol. I, at p. 229; W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England (4th ed. 1768), Book III, at p. 110. In the original cases that recognized it, the writ was used largely to prevent the procedurally illegitimate exclusion of citizens who were members of certain disliked groups from municipal offices: see Bagg’s Case (1615), 11 Co. Rep. 93b, 77 E.R. 1271; and Andover Case (1700), Holt. K.B. 441, 90 E.R. 1143, at p. 1143. But there was always the possibility of something much greater in the writ, and Lord Mansfield would go so far as to announce its prospective use “upon all occasions where the law has established no specific remedy, and where in justice and good government there ought to be one” (R. v. Barker (1762), 3 Burr. 1265, 97 E.R. 823, at pp. 824-25 (emphasis added). Cf. Bagg’s Case, supra, at pp. 1277-78, referring generally to “misgovernment”.) The writ always promised the possibility of ensuring that governmental officers would not shirk their duty to keep processes operating efficiently. Perhaps significantly, the very words of the original form of the writ referred to gence. Depuis des siècles, les gens qui œuvrent dans notre système juridique reconnaissent que les délais inutiles vont à l’encontre des valeurs fondamentales qui le sous-tendent et ils font tout ce qu’ils peuvent pour les éliminer, même s’ils ne parviennent pas toujours à le faire complètement.

Sous le régime de la common law, les cours de justice se sont progressivement donné le pouvoir de surveiller les procédures des organismes administratifs et leur légalité. Il ne fait désormais aucun doute que [TRADUCTION] «[l]es cours supérieures ont le pouvoir inhérent d’examiner la légalité de mesures administratives» (D. P. Jones et A. S. de Villars, Principles of Administrative Law (3^e éd. 1999), à la p. 6). Les délais inutiles n’échappent pas au contrôle judiciaire.

Ce pouvoir de surveillance des procédures administratives qui remonte aux origines du bref de prérogative est des plus à-propos en l’espèce. Le mandamus possède une longue histoire. À l’origine, il habilitait la Cour du Banc du Roi à ordonner à un tribunal judiciaire ou à un organisme administratif de faire son devoir: sir W. Holdsworth, A History of English Law (7^e éd. 1956), vol. I, à la p. 229; W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England (4^e éd. 1768), livre III, à la p. 110. Dans les premières affaires où il a été appliqué, le bref a servi en grande partie à empêcher que des membres de groupes abhorrés soient écartés illégitimement d’une charge municipale: voir Bagg’s Case (1615), 11 Co. Rep. 93b, 77 E.R. 1271, et Andover Case (1700), Holt. K.B. 441, 90 E.R. 1143, à la p. 1143. Cependant, il était toujours possible que le bref ait une portée plus grande, et lord Mansfield a même dit qu’il pourrait être utilisé [TRADUCTION] «chaque fois que la common law ne prévoit aucune réparation particulière et que la justice et le bon gouvernement exigent qu’il y ait réparation» (R. c. Barker (1762), 3 Burr. 1265, 97 E.R. 823, aux pp. 824 et 825 (je souligne). Comparer avec Bagg’s Case, précité, aux pp. 1277 et 1278, où il est généralement question de [TRADUCTION] «mauvais gouvernement»). Grâce au bref, il était toujours possible de veiller à ce qu’un fonctionnaire de l’État ne manque pas à son obligation de veiller au déroulement efficace des procédures. Ce qui peut être significatif, le libellé même du bref original parlait de «debitam et festinam justiciam» — justice régulière et expéditive (Holdsworth, op. cit., app. XV, à la p. 659).

147

148

“debitam et festinam justiciam” — due and speedy justice (Holdsworth, supra, app. XV, at p. 659).

V. Modern Developments

V. Évolution récente

149

Today, there is no doubt that mandamus may be used to control procedural delays. In the middle of the last century, a British Columbia Court of Appeal judgment recognized the principles behind mandamus, stating that “[t]he high prerogative writ of mandamus was brought into being to supply defects in administering justice” (The King ex rel. Lee v. Workmen’s Compensation Board, [1942] 2 D.L.R. 665, at p. 678). It went on to note that the granting of mandamus was “to be governed by considerations which tend to the speedy and inexpensive as well as efficacious administration of justice” (at p. 678, cited with approval in Harelkin v. University of Regina, [1979] 2 S.C.R. 561). Members of our Court have on occasion alluded to the use of mandamus specifically to control delay. (See notably: R. v. Bradley, [1941] S.C.R. 270, at p. 277, per Duff C.J.; Rourke v. The Queen, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 1021, at p. 1027, per Laskin C.J.; and Rahey, supra, at pp. 624-25, per Wilson J., and p. 631, per La Forest J.) And there exists a specific line of case law in the administrative context of immigration law that endorses just such a development, particularly where delay creates hardship: e.g., Muia v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) (1996), 113 F.T.R. 234; Dass v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1996] 2 F.C. 410 (C.A.), at para. 24; Dee v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship & Immigration) (1998), 46 Imm. L.R. (2d) 278 (F.C.T.D.); and Kiani v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship & Immigration) (1999), 50 Imm. L.R. (2d) 81 (F.C.T.D.), at para. 34. In such a context in Bhatnager v. Minister of Employment and Immigration, [1985] 2 F.C. 315 (T.D.), at p. 317, Strayer J. offers this widely quoted statement:

De nos jours, il ne fait aucun doute que le mandamus peut servir à limiter les délais procéduraux. Au milieu du siècle dernier, la Cour d’appel de la Colombie-Britannique a reconnu, dans un arrêt, les principes qui sous-tendent le mandamus en disant que [TRADUCTION] «[l]a raison d’être du bref de prérogative qu’est le mandamus est de remédier aux vices de l’administration de la justice» (The King ex rel. Lee c. Workmen’s Compensation Board, [1942] 2 D.L.R. 665, à la p. 678). La Cour d’appel a ajouté que la délivrance d’un mandamus devait être [TRADUCTION] «régie par des considérations qui contribuent à une administration de la justice expéditive, peu coûteuse et efficace» (à la p. 678, cité avec approbation dans Harelkin c. Université de Regina, [1979] 2 R.C.S. 561). Il est arrivé que des juges de notre Cour fassent allusion à l’utilisation du mandamus dans le but précis de limiter un délai. (Voir notamment les arrêts R. c. Bradley, [1941] R.C.S. 270, à la p. 277, le juge en chef Duff; Rourke c. La Reine, [1978] 1 R.C.S. 1021, à la p. 1027, le juge en chef Laskin; Rahey, précité, aux pp. 624 et 625, le juge Wilson, et à la p. 631, le juge La Forest.) En outre, il existe, dans le contexte administratif du droit de l’immigration, un courant jurisprudentiel particulier qui sanctionne une telle évolution, spécialement lorsque le délai cause des difficultés: par exemple, Muia c. Canada (Ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l’Immigration) (1996), 113 F.T.R. 234; Dass c. Canada (Ministre de l’Emploi et de l’Immigration), [1996] 2 C.F. 410 (C.A.), au par. 24; Dee c. Canada (Ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l’Immigration) (1998), 46 Imm. L.R. (2d) 278 (C.F. 1^{re} inst.); Kiani c. Canada (Ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l’Immigration) (1999), 50 Imm. L.R. (2d) 81 (C.F. 1^{re} inst.), au par. 34. C’est dans ce contexte que, dans Bhatnager c. Ministre de l’Emploi et de l’Immigration, [1985] 2 C.F. 315 (1^{re} inst.), à la p. 317, le juge Strayer a tenu les propos suivants qui sont souvent cités:

But mandamus can issue to require that some decision be made. Normally this would arise where there has been a specific refusal to make a decision, but it may also happen where there has been a long delay in the making of a decision without adequate explanation. [Emphasis added.]

The common law system has always abhorred delay. In our system's development of the courts' supervisory role over administrative processes through mandamus, we see a crystallizing potential to compel government officers to do their duty and, in so doing, to avoid delay in administrative processes. The historical context in which our case law is rooted is a soil of well-established principles. This ground's more modern seedlings must now be examined.

VI. Undue Delay and Procedural Fairness

English case law began in the last decades to bring these old streams of the common law together. In R. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex parte Phansopkar, [1976] Q.B. 606, the English Court of Appeal was prepared to act against unreasonable delay based on the Magna Carta itself, as reinforced by the European Convention on Human Rights. In Re Preston, [1985] A.C. 835, the House of Lords made clear that there could be judicial review of any delay amounting to an abuse of power or breach of natural justice. In R. v. Chief Constable of the Merseyside Police, Ex parte Calveley, [1986] 1 Q.B. 424, the English Court of Appeal applied this to a lengthy delay in notifying police officers of disciplinary charges against them. In the judgment of May L.J., at pp. 439-40, this was abusive and a breach of fairness because it disregarded the possibility of prejudice accruing to the officers on account of the delay. Unreasonable delay in administrative processes triggers the ancient rights of individuals who suffer prejudice as a result, and it gives the courts good reason to intervene against injustice. The modern English position, stated by W. Wade and C. Forsyth, Administrative Law (7th ed. 1994), at p. 649, is clear: "A statutory duty must be per-

Mais un bref de mandamus peut être délivré pour exiger qu'une décision soit rendue. Normalement, il en est ainsi lorsqu'il y a eu refus exprès de rendre une décision, mais ce peut être également le cas lorsqu'on tarde beaucoup à rendre une décision sans donner d'explication suffisante. [Je souligne.]

La common law a toujours eu les délais en aversion. Dans notre régime de common law, la reconnaissance du rôle de surveillance par voie de mandamus que les cours de justice exercent sur les procédures administratives est perçue comme traduisant la possibilité de contraindre les fonctionnaires de l'État à faire leur devoir et, ce faisant, à éviter les délais dans le déroulement des procédures administratives. Le contexte historique dans lequel s'insère notre jurisprudence est constitué de principes bien établis. Il faut maintenant examiner la jurisprudence plus récente qui en a émané.

VI. Délai injustifié et équité procédurale

Au cours des dernières décennies, les tribunaux britanniques ont commencé à réaliser la synthèse de ces vieux courants de common law. Dans R. c. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex parte Phansopkar, [1976] 1 Q.B. 606, la Cour d'appel d'Angleterre était disposée à réagir aux délais déraisonnables en se fondant sur la Magna Carta elle-même, telle qu'elle est renforcée par la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme. Dans Re Preston, [1985] A.C. 835, la Chambre des lords a précisé qu'il pouvait y avoir contrôle judiciaire de tout délai équivalant à un abus de pouvoir ou à un déni de justice naturelle. Dans R. c. Chief Constable of the Merseyside Police, Ex parte Calveley, [1986] Q.B. 424, la Cour d'appel d'Angleterre a appliqué cela au long délai écoulé avant que des policiers soient avisés des accusations d'infraction disciplinaire portées contre eux. Selon le lord juge May, aux pp. 439 et 440, il y avait eu abus et iniquité du fait qu'on n'avait pas tenu compte du préjudice que le délai pourrait causer aux policiers. Le délai déraisonnable dans des procédures administratives met en jeu les droits de longue date que possèdent les personnes qu'il lèse, et il donne aux tribunaux une bonne raison d'intervenir pour remédier à toute injustice qui peut avoir formed without unreasonable delay, and this may be enforced by mandamus” (emphasis added).

150

151

été causée. Le point de vue qui a cours actuellement en Angleterre selon W. Wade et C. Forsyth, Administrative Law (7^e éd. 1994), à la p. 649, est clair: [TRADUCTION] «Une obligation légale doit être exécutée sans délai déraisonnable, et pareille exécution peut être obtenue par voie de mandamus» (je souligne).

152

With the few exceptions I noted at the outset of these reasons, modern Canadian courts have begun building on those historical principles and the developments in the English case law discussed above to develop a framework within which they may assess unreasonable delay. First, courts have linked the idea of procedural fairness with a bar on abuse of process through unreasonable delay: e.g., Misra v. College of Physicians & Surgeons of Saskatchewan (1988), 52 D.L.R. (4th) 477 (Sask. C.A.) (leave to appeal to SCC granted, [1989] 1 S.C.R. viii, but appeal later discontinued, [1992] 1 S.C.R. vii). Second, even on a traditional analysis, courts have expressed their preparedness to consider different kinds of adverse effects of delay, such as damage to individuals’ reputations or other aspects of their lives, in conjunction with the traditionally recognized effects on the hearing: see, e.g., Brown v. Assn. of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of British Columbia, [1994] B.C.J. No. 2037 (QL) (S.C.); and Stefani v. College of Dental Surgeons (British Columbia) (1996), 44 Admin. L.R. (2d) 122 (B.C.S.C.).

Sauf les quelques exceptions que j’ai mentionnées au début des présents motifs, les tribunaux canadiens modernes ont commencé à s’appuyer sur ces principes historiques et sur l’évolution de la jurisprudence anglaise mentionnée plus haut pour établir un cadre leur permettant de déterminer si un délai est déraisonnable. Premièrement, ils ont lié la notion d’équité procédurale à l’interdiction de tout abus de procédure découlant d’un délai déraisonnable: par exemple, Misra c. College of Physicians & Surgeons of Saskatchewan (1988), 52 D.L.R. (4th) 477 (C.A. Sask.) (autorisation de pourvoi accordée par la CSC, [1989] 1 R.C.S. viii, mais désistement ultérieur, [1992] 1 R.C.S. vii). Deuxièmement, même dans le cadre d’une analyse traditionnelle, les tribunaux ont affirmé qu’ils étaient disposés à tenir compte de divers types d’effet préjudiciable du délai, comme l’atteinte à la réputation ou d’autres préjudices personnels, conjointement avec ses effets traditionnellement reconnus sur l’audience: voir, par exemple, Brown c. Assn. of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of British Columbia, [1994] B.C.J. No. 2037 (QL) (C.S.), et Stefani c. College of Dental Surgeons (British Columbia) (1996), 44 Admin. L.R. (2d) 122 (C.S.C.-B.).

153

Third, these two evolutions have become fused along with a realization that other adverse effects can create an abusive situation independently of evidentiary prejudice. In Ratzlaff v. British Columbia (Medical Services Commission) (1996), 17 B.C.L.R. (3d) 336 (C.A.), at para. 22, Hollinrake J.A. set out a theoretical framework within which the courts may consider unreasonable delay, along with some of the relevant factors in assessing it:

Troisièmement, outre ces deux évolutions, on s’est rendu compte que d’autres effets préjudiciables peuvent engendrer une situation abusive indépendamment du préjudice lié à la possibilité de présenter des éléments de preuve. Dans Ratzlaff c. British Columbia (Medical Services Commission) (1996), 17 B.C.L.R. (3d) 336 (C.A.), au par. 22, le juge Hollinrake a énoncé un cadre théorique à l’intérieur duquel les tribunaux pourraient déterminer si un délai est déraisonnable, ainsi que certains facteurs à prendre en considération à cette fin:

Abuse of power is a broader notion, akin to oppression. It encompasses procedural unfairness, conduct equivalent to breach of contract or of representation, and, in my view, unjust delay. I should add that not all lengthy delays are unjust; regard must be had to the causes of delay, and to resulting reasonable changes of position. [Emphasis added.]

This analytical method, in which unreasonable delay is assimilated to a type of abuse, helped Hollinrake J.A. to recognize that adverse effects other than on hearing fairness can be considered independently. He writes at para. 19, “where the delay is so egregious that it amounts to an abuse of power or can be said to be oppressive, the fact that the hearing itself will be a fair one is of little or no consequence”.

Abusive administrative delay is wrong and it does not matter if it wrecks only your life and not your hearing. The cases that have been part of this evolution have sometimes expressed the point differently, but the key consideration is this: administrative delay that is determined to be unreasonable based on its length, its causes, and its effects is abusive and contrary to the administrative law principles that exist and should be applied in a fair and efficient legal system.

Unreasonable delay is not limited to situations that bring the human rights system into disrepute either by prejudicing the fairness of a hearing or by otherwise rising above a threshold of shocking abuse. Otherwise, there would not be any remedy for an individual suffering from unreasonable delay unless this same individual were unlucky enough to have suffered sufficiently to meet an additional, external test of disrepute resulting to the human rights system. Such a limitation may arise from a fear that the main remedy available would be the blunt instrument of the stay of proceedings. However, as we will see below, a remedy other than a stay may be appropriate in other cases where ongoing delay is abusive. It is true that some of the cases that have most developed the doctrine of abusive delay involved lengthier periods of time that, in conjunction with other factors,

[TRADUCTION] La notion d’abus de pouvoir est large et s’apparente à l’oppression. Elle englobe l’iniquité procédurale, la conduite équivalant à la rupture d’un contrat ou à une fausse déclaration et, à mon avis, le délai injustifié. J’ajouterais que tous les délais ne sont pas injustifiés; il faut tenir compte des causes du délai ainsi que des changements raisonnables de situation qui en ont résulté. [Je souligne.]

Cette méthode analytique, dans laquelle le délai déraisonnable est assimilé à une sorte d’abus, a aidé le juge Hollinrake à reconnaître que des effets préjudiciables autres que celui sur l’équité de l’audience peuvent être pris en considération indépendamment. Il écrit, au par. 19, que [TRADUCTION] «lorsque le délai est énorme au point de constituer un abus de pouvoir ou de pouvoir être qualifié d’oppressif, le fait que l’audience elle-même sera équitable importe peu ou pas du tout».

Le délai administratif abusif est répréhensible, et ce, peu importe qu’il ne ruine que la vie d’une personne sans affecter l’audition à laquelle elle a droit. La jurisprudence associée à cette évolution expose parfois ce point de vue différemment, mais le facteur clé est le suivant: le délai administratif jugé déraisonnable en raison de sa durée, de ses causes et de ses effets est abusif et contraire aux principes du droit administratif qui existent et qui devraient s’appliquer dans un système juridique équitable et efficace.

Un délai n’est pas déraisonnable uniquement dans le cas où le régime de protection des droits de la personne est déconsidéré en raison d’une atteinte à l’équité de l’audience ou du fait que le délai a franchi le seuil d’un abus scandaleux. Si c’était le cas, la personne lésée par un délai injustifié ne disposerait d’aucun recours à moins d’avoir eu la malchance d’être suffisamment lésée pour satisfaire à un autre critère externe, celui de la déconsidération du régime de protection des droits de la personne. Pareille restriction peut découler de la crainte que la principale réparation disponible ne soit l’arrêt pur et simple des procédures. Cependant, comme nous le verrons plus loin, une réparation différente de l’arrêt des procédures peut convenir dans d’autres cas où le délai qui s’écoule est abusif. Il est vrai que, dans certaines des décisions qui ont le plus contribué à l’établissement de la warranted stays of proceedings. (see, e.g., the cases cited by Bastarache J. at paras. 117-18). They were cases that passed the highest threshold of abusiveness. Because of this, they did not discuss a lower threshold of unreasonable delay that might warrant some kind of judicial action and different, less radical, remedies than a stay in the administrative proceedings.

154

155

VII. Assessing Unreasonable Delay

156

The authorities and policy considerations that have been reviewed thus far confirm that modern administrative law is deeply averse to unreasonable delay. But nobody suggests the elimination of all delay per se — and with good reason. At the limit, a prohibition on delay per se would ban any and all delay. This would be an absurd result that would undermine rather than uphold a fair judicial system. Such an approach would, for example, deny parties on both sides the chance to prepare for the hearing (cf. R. v. Conway, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659, at p. 1694). Thus, unreasonable delays must be identified within the specific circumstances of every case.

157

In assessing a particular delay in the process of a specific administrative body, we must keep in mind two principles: (1) not all delay is the same; and (2) not all administrative bodies are the same. First, there are different kinds of delay. There are two kinds of delay in an administrative context: general delay and individual delay. Each of these, in turn, may encompass both necessary and unnecessary delay. General delay may include certain kinds of delay due to substantive and procedural complexities inherent in the kind of matter the tribunal deals with, but it may also include delays from systemic problems. Individual delay may relate to the special complexity of a particular decision, but it may also include delays from inattention to a particular file. (See generally: S. N. McMurtrie, “The Waiting Game — The Parliamentary Commissioner’s Response to Delay in règle du délai abusif, il était question de périodes plus longues qui, en plus d’autres facteurs, justifiaient l’arrêt des procédures (voir, par exemple, la jurisprudence citée par le juge Bastarache, aux par. 117 et 118). Il s’agissait de cas qui satisfaisaient au critère le plus rigoureux du caractère abusif. À cause de cela, on n’y analysait pas le critère moins rigoureux du délai déraisonnable qui pourrait justifier une forme quelconque d’intervention judiciaire et d’autres réparations moins radicales que l’arrêt des procédures administratives.

VII. Détermination du délai déraisonnable

La doctrine, la jurisprudence et les considérations de principe qui ont été examinées jusqu’ici confirment la profonde aversion du droit administratif moderne pour le délai déraisonnable. Cependant, personne ne propose l’élimination de tout délai en soi, et ce, pour une bonne raison. À la limite, l’interdiction du délai en soi aurait pour effet d’interdire tout délai. Ce serait un résultat absurde qui minerait un système judiciaire équitable au lieu de le préserver. Une telle approche priverait notamment les deux parties de la possibilité de se préparer pour l’audience (comparer avec R. c. Conway, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 1659, à la p. 1694). Il faut donc déterminer si un délai est déraisonnable en fonction des circonstances particulières de chaque cas.

Pour évaluer un délai dans les procédures d’un organisme administratif donné, il faut conserver deux principes à l’esprit: (1) les délais ne sont pas tous les mêmes, et (2) les organismes administratifs diffèrent les uns des autres. Premièrement, il existe différents types de délai. Dans le contexte administratif, il y en a deux: le délai général et le délai particulier. Chacun d’eux peut englober à son tour le délai nécessaire et le délai inutile. Le délai général peut comprendre certains types de délai dus à des difficultés de fond et de procédure inhérentes au genre d’affaire dont le tribunal est saisi, mais il peut aussi comprendre les délais dus à des problèmes systémiques. Le délai particulier peut être lié à la complexité particulière d’une décision donnée, mais il peut aussi comprendre le délai imputable au manque d’attention accordée à un dossier. (Voir, de manière générale, S. N.

Administrative Procedures”, [1997] Public Law 159; and L. S. Skiffington, “Federal Administrative Delay: Judicial Remedies and Application in the Natural Resource Context” (1982), 28 Rocky Mtn. Min. L. Inst. 671.)

McMurtrie, «The Waiting Game — The Parliamentary Commissioner’s Response to Delay in Administrative Procedures», [1997] Public Law 159, et L. S. Skiffington, «Federal Administrative Delay: Judicial Remedies and Application in the Natural Resource Context» (1982), 28 Rocky Mtn. Min. L. Inst. 671.)

Second, not all administrative bodies are the same. Indeed, this is an understatement. At first glance, labour boards, police commissions, and milk control boards may seem to have about as much in common as assembly lines, cops, and cows! Administrative bodies do, of course, have some common features, but the diversity of their powers, mandate and structure is such that to apply particular standards from one context to another might well be entirely inappropriate. Thus, inevitably, a court’s assessment of a particular delay in a particular case before a particular administrative body has to depend on a number of contextual analytic factors.

Deuxièmement, les organismes administratifs diffèrent les uns des autres. En fait, c’est le moins qu’on puisse dire. À première vue, un conseil des relations de travail, une commission de police et un office de contrôle laitier peuvent paraître avoir autant de points en commun qu’une ligne d’assemblage, un policier et une vache! Les organismes administratifs ont évidemment certaines caractéristiques en commun, mais en raison de la diversité de leurs attributions, de leur mandat et de leur organisation, il peut être totalement inapproprié d’appliquer les mêmes normes d’un contexte à l’autre. Par conséquent, l’évaluation judiciaire d’un délai dans une affaire particulière dont est saisi un organisme administratif donné doit inévitablement tenir compte d’un certain nombre de facteurs d’analyse contextuels.

158

In order to differentiate reasonable and unreasonable delay, a balancing exercise becomes necessary. Courts must, indeed, remain alive not only to the needs of administrative systems under strain, but also to their good faith efforts to provide procedural protections to alleged wrongdoers. One must approach matters with some common sense and ask whether a lengthy delay that profoundly harms an individual’s life is really justified in the circumstances of a given case.

Pour distinguer un délai raisonnable d’un délai déraisonnable, une évaluation s’impose. Les tribunaux doivent en effet être conscients non seulement des besoins des régimes administratifs soumis à des contraintes, mais aussi des efforts qu’ils déploient de bonne foi en vue d’offrir des protections procédurales aux présumés contrevenants. Il faut faire preuve de bon sens et se demander si le long délai qui ruine profondément l’existence d’une personne est véritablement justifié dans les circonstances d’une affaire donnée.

159

As indicated above, the central factors toward which the modern administrative law cases as a whole propel us are length, cause, and effects. Approaching these now with a more refined understanding of different kinds and contexts of delay, we see three main factors to be balanced in assessing the reasonableness of an administrative delay:

Comme nous l’avons vu, les principaux facteurs dont l’ensemble de la jurisprudence moderne en droit administratif nous invite à tenir compte sont la longueur, la cause et les effets. Grâce à une meilleure compréhension des différents types de délai et des différents contextes dans lesquels ils se situent, nous considérons que, pour évaluer le caractère raisonnable d’un délai administratif, trois facteurs principaux doivent être appréciés:

160

(1) the time taken compared to the inherent time requirements of the matter before the particular administrative body, which would encompass legal complexities (including the presence of any especially complex systemic issues) and factual complexities (including the need to gather large amounts of information or technical data), as well as reasonable periods of time for procedural safeguards that protect parties or the public;

(2) the causes of delay beyond the inherent time requirements of the matter, which would include consideration of such elements as whether the affected individual contributed to or waived parts of the delay and whether the administrative body used as efficiently as possible those resources it had available; and

(3) the impact of the delay, considered as encompassing both prejudice in an evidentiary sense and other harms to the lives of real people impacted by the ongoing delay. This may also include a consideration of the efforts by various parties to minimize negative impacts by providing information or interim solutions.

(See generally: Ratzlaff, supra, at p. 346; Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v. Kodellas (1989), 60 D.L.R. (4th) 143 (Sask. C.A.); R. v. Morin, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 771; McMurtrie, supra; and Skiffington, supra.) Obviously, considering all of these factors imposes a contextual analysis. Thus, our Court should avoid setting specific time limits in such matters. A judge should consider the specific content of the case he or she is hearing and make an assessment that takes into account the three main factors that have been identified above.

(1) le délai écoulé par rapport au délai inhérent à l'affaire dont est saisi l'organisme administratif en cause, ce qui comprendrait la complexité juridique (y compris l'existence de questions systémiques particulièrement complexes) et la complexité factuelle (y compris la nécessité de recueillir de grandes quantités de renseignements ou de données techniques), ainsi que les délais raisonnables pour que les parties ou le public bénéficient de garanties procédurales;

(2) les causes de la prolongation du délai inhérent à l'affaire, ce qui comprendrait notamment l'examen de la question de savoir si la personne touchée a contribué ou renoncé à certaines parties du délai, et celle de savoir si l'organisme administratif a utilisé aussi efficacement que possible les ressources dont il disposait;

(3) l'incidence du délai, considérée comme englobant le préjudice sur le plan de la preuve et les autres atteintes à l'existence des personnes touchées par le délai qui s'écoule. Cela peut également comprendre l'examen des efforts que les différentes parties ont déployés pour réduire au minimum les effets négatifs en fournissant des renseignements ou en apportant des solutions provisoires.

(Voir, de manière générale, Ratzlaff, précité, à la p. 346; Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) c. Kodellas (1989), 60 D.L.R. (4th) 143 (C.A. Sask.); R. c. Morin, [1992] 1 R.C.S. 771; McMurtrie, loc. cit.; Skiffington, loc. cit.) L'examen de ces facteurs commande, de toute évidence, une analyse contextuelle. Notre Cour devrait donc éviter d'imposer des délais précis en la matière. Un juge devrait examiner les faits particuliers de l'affaire dont il est saisi et faire une évaluation qui tienne compte des trois principaux facteurs décrits plus haut.

161

A number of parties have raised the objection that the consideration of some of those factors may extend "special treatment" to certain kinds of individuals, whether these be people who commit more stigmatizing wrongs or who are more susceptible to harms like damage to their reputations. Some interveners were afraid that the application of such factors might indeed require preferential

Plusieurs parties ont soulevé l'objection selon laquelle l'examen de certains de ces facteurs peut avoir pour effet d'accorder un «traitement particulier» à certaines personnes, qu'il s'agisse de gens qui commettent des fautes plus stigmatisantes ou de gens qui sont plus exposés à des préjudices comme l'atteinte à la réputation. Certains intervenants craignaient que l'application de tels facteurs treatment for powerful and influential people. These objections and fears are misplaced. It appears sound administrative practice for decision-making bodies to recognize the relevance of the identified factors while deciding how to process a particular case. For example, task forces analysing delay report that it is simply a good case management practice to send to different tracks cases of differing levels of complexity: see, e.g., Brookings Task Force on Civil Justice Reform, Justice for All: Reducing Costs and Delay in Civil Litigation (1989), at p. 3. Similarly, it only makes sense for administrative bodies seeking to minimize their negative impacts on real people to consider the ramifications of their failure to act expeditiously. In any event, every case should be processed with due dispatch.

VIII. Delays Before the British Columbia Human Rights Commission in This Case

Unreasonable delay in administrative proceedings is illegal under administrative law. It is a breach of the duty to conduct administrative proceedings fairly. Because of the highly contextual nature of any assessment of delay, I turn now to an analysis of the identified factors in the case at bar. I eventually conclude that inefficiency in the Commission's handling of this matter has led to abuse of process that must be addressed with the appropriate remedies in the circumstances of the case and in consideration of the interests of the complainants.

A. Length of Delay

The first factor to be considered is the time taken relative to the inherent time requirements of the matter. In the Court of Appeal, McEachern C.J.B.C. characterized the allegations in the case at bar as "relatively simple complaints" ((1998), 49 B.C.L.R. (3d) 216, at para. 37), stated that "[t]hese kinds of disputes are quickly resolved by courts and tribunals all the time, and there are no complex n'exige, en fait, que des personnes puissantes et influentes jouissent d'un traitement préférentiel. Ces objections et ces craintes ne sont pas fondées. Le fait qu'un organisme décideur reconnaisse la pertinence des facteurs décrits pour décider de la façon de traiter une affaire donnée semble être une saine pratique administrative. Par exemple, des groupes de travail qui analysent les délais signalent qu'une bonne pratique de gestion des dossiers consiste simplement à traiter différemment des affaires comportant des niveaux de complexité différents: voir, par exemple, Brookings Task Force on Civil Justice Reform, Justice for All: Reducing Costs and Delay in Civil Litigation (1989), à la p. 3. De même, il est seulement logique qu'un organisme administratif qui cherche à réduire au minimum son incidence négative sur des personnes tienne compte des conséquences de son omission d'agir rapidement. Quoi qu'il en soit, toute affaire devrait être traitée avec célérité.

VIII. Délai écoulé en l'espèce dans les procédures devant la Commission des droits de la personne de la Colombie-Britannique En droit administratif, le délai déraisonnable dans des procédures administratives est illégal. Il constitue un manquement à l'obligation d'assurer un déroulement équitable des procédures. Vu le caractère hautement contextuel de l'évaluation du délai, je vais maintenant analyser les facteurs décrits dans la présente affaire. Je conclus, en définitive, que la façon inefficace dont la Commission a traité la présente affaire a donné lieu à un abus de procédure auquel il faut remédier en accordant la réparation appropriée dans les circonstances de l'affaire et en tenant compte des intérêts des plaignants.

A. La longueur du délai

Le premier facteur à prendre en considération est le délai écoulé par rapport au délai inhérent à l'affaire. Le juge en chef McEachern de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a qualifié les allégations en l'espèce de [TRADUCTION] «plaintes relativement simples» ((1998), 49 B.C.L.R. (3d) 216, au par. 37). Il a affirmé que «[l]es tribunaux judiciaires et les tribunaux administratifs règlent legal or factual issues” (para. 37), and concluded that “a week at the outside would have sufficed” (para. 51) for the investigation. Although McEachern C.J.B.C. perhaps puts matters a bit optimistically in suggesting that the investigation could have been wrapped up within a week, there is a good measure of truth in what he says.

toujours rapidement ce genre de différend, et qu’aucune question juridique ou factuelle complexe ne se pose» (par. 37) et a conclu qu’«il aurait suffi tout au plus d’une semaine» (par. 51) pour effectuer l’enquête. Bien que le juge en chef McEachern soit quelque peu optimiste lorsqu’il laisse entendre que l’enquête aurait pu être complétée en moins d’une semaine, il y a une grande part de vérité dans ce qu’il dit.

164 At this point, a closer scrutiny of the facts is necessary in order to establish the inherent time requirements of the case. Different kinds of “allegations of sexual discrimination” may be more or less complex. A pay equity case might properly involve complex statistical analysis and innovative legal arguments and take time for those reasons. A case about other forms of well-concealed systemic discrimination might involve numerous witnesses and take time for that reason. But other cases that involve “allegations of sexual harassment” between individuals may have few complex legal or factual elements and thus appropriately should take much less time.

À ce stade, un examen plus minutieux des faits s’impose pour déterminer le délai inhérent à l’affaire. Une «allégation de discrimination sexuelle» peut être plus ou moins complexe selon le cas. Une affaire d’équité salariale pourrait requérir, à juste titre, une analyse statistique complexe et une argumentation juridique novatrice, et durer ainsi un certain temps. Une affaire portant sur d’autres formes de discrimination systémique bien dissimulée pourrait faire intervenir de nombreux témoins et se prolonger pour cette raison. Cependant, il se peut que d’autres affaires où il est question d’«allégations de harcèlement sexuel» entre des personnes comportent peu d’éléments juridiques ou factuels complexes et durent éventuellement moins longtemps.

165 Considering the complexity of the allegations should not be seen to reflect in any way on their merits. This being said, the case at bar falls within a relatively less complex category. The allegations with respect to Willis, an aide to Blencoe, were that Blencoe made sexual overtures to her and inappropriately kissed her when she came to work one evening in August 1994 and that he had subsequently put his arm on her arm in a sexual manner in March 1995. The allegations with respect to Schell were that Blencoe in March 1993 had inappropriately kissed and hugged Schell, who worked for a sports organization deriving funding from Blencoe’s ministry, and that he had subsequently on several occasions between July 1993 and July 1994 given her unwanted attention by inviting her for a drink. There were no other direct witnesses to any of the incidents, although there was some corroborating evidence from a small number of other witnesses. Blencoe denied some aspects of the allegations and admitted others.

La complexité des allégations ne devrait pas être perçue comme ayant une incidence quelconque sur leur bien-fondé. Cela dit, le présent dossier tombe dans la catégorie des affaires relativement moins complexes. Il était allégué, au sujet de Willis, une adjointe de Blencoe, que ce dernier lui avait fait des avances sexuelles et l’avait embrassée inopportunistement lorsqu’elle s’était rendue au bureau pour y travailler un soir du mois d’août 1994, et qu’en mars 1995 il avait appuyé son bras contre le sien dans un dessein apparemment sexuel. Il était allégué, au sujet de Schell, qu’en mars 1993 Blencoe l’avait embrassée et étreinte inopportunistement alors qu’elle travaillait pour une association sportive financée par le ministère de Blencoe, et qu’à maintes reprises, entre juillet 1993 et juillet 1994, il lui avait accordé une attention non souhaitée en l’invitant à prendre un verre. Personne d’autre n’a été directement témoin de ces incidents, bien qu’il y ait eu témoignage corroborant de la part d’un petit nombre d’autres personnes. Les allégations

Recognizing that this case is far less complex than many other sexual discrimination cases does not alleviate the seriousness of the allegations, but it is clear from the record that the allegations were not of a nature that could justify a prolonged investigation. Ultimately, the case was about a “he said/she said” scenario concerning which there should have been an adjudication. In this sense, there was little or nothing to investigate, and there was no reason for the pre-hearing investigation to take a long period of time.

Lowry J. expressed serious misgivings about the delays in this case. He wrote at para. 46:

It may well be that the structure of the Commission should be such that, given the nature of the complaints made by Ms. Schell and Ms. Willis, two years would not be required to determine that they warrant a hearing. [Emphasis added.]

While Lowry J. went on to attribute the delay to a lack of resources, he questioned the effectiveness of the Commission, and his finding that two years was an inappropriately long time confirms my conclusion on this branch of the analysis. The inherent time requirements in this case were minimal.

By contrast, the time taken was anything but minimal. After five to six months spent on determining that it could hear the complaints, and once Blencoe had a chance to respond, the Commission then mysteriously took the five months from April 1996 to September 1996 to appoint the same investigator who had been working on the file all along despite having told Blencoe that it expected to do so within two months (appellants’ record, at p. 229). The investigation took some four months. The trial judge found at para. 44 that this investigation was concluded in January 1997. Given this finding, then after this conclusion of the investigation, it apparently took the investigator another two months to write and forward a 12-page ont fait l’objet de dénégations de la part de Blencoe à certains égards et d’aveux à d’autres égards.

La reconnaissance que la présente affaire est beaucoup moins complexe que bien d’autres affaires de discrimination sexuelle n’atténue pas la gravité des allégations, mais il ressort clairement du dossier que ces allégations n’étaient pas de nature à justifier la tenue d’une enquête prolongée. En fin de compte, il était question de versions opposées des faits, qui auraient dû donner lieu à une décision. Il y avait donc peu ou pas matière à enquête, de sorte que rien ne justifiait que l’enquête préalable à l’audience se prolonge.

Le juge Lowry a exprimé de sérieuses réserves au sujet du délai écoulé en l’espèce. Il a écrit, au par. 46:

[TRADUCTION] Il se peut fort bien que la Commission doive être organisée de telle sorte que, compte tenu de la nature des plaintes de M^{mes} Schell et Willis, deux années ne soient pas nécessaires pour déterminer si elles justifient la tenue d’une audience. [Je souligne.]

Bien qu’il ait ensuite imputé le délai à un manque de ressources, le juge Lowry a mis en doute l’efficacité de la Commission, et sa conclusion qu’un délai de deux ans était trop long confirme la mienne en ce qui a trait à ce volet de l’analyse. Le délai inhérent à la présente affaire était minime.

Par contre, le délai écoulé était loin d’être minime. Après avoir mis cinq à six mois à décider qu’elle pourrait entendre les plaintes et après que Blencoe eut obtenu la possibilité de répondre, la Commission a mystérieusement mis cinq mois, soit d’avril à septembre 1996, à désigner le même enquêteur qui s’était occupé jusque-là du dossier, même si elle avait auparavant dit à Blencoe qu’elle s’attendait à le faire dans un délai de deux mois (dossier des appelants, à la p. 229). L’enquête a duré environ quatre mois. Le juge de première instance a conclu, au par. 44, que l’enquête avait pris fin en janvier 1997. Compte tenu de cette conclusion, après la fin de l’enquête, l’enquêteur aurait alors mis deux autres mois à rédiger un rapport de report in early March 1997, and this only after letters from Blencoe's lawyer asking about the delay (appellants' record, at pp. 322-35). After another four months, in July 1997, the Commission finally told Blencoe that the matter would proceed to a Tribunal hearing. It then took another two months to get a date set for the hearing, which was scheduled to be some six months later in March 1998. In all, the time for the Commission to make the determination that the complaints should go to a hearing was approximately two years. The time from the initial filing of the complaints to the scheduled hearing was approximately 32 months. While it is true that the Commission's decision to send the matter to a hearing involved a number of steps, every one of these steps involved a significant delay.

166

167

168

12 pages qui a été transmis au début du mois de mars 1997, et ce, uniquement après que l'avocat de Blencoe eut envoyé des lettres dans lesquelles il posait des questions au sujet du délai écoulé (dossier des appelants, aux pp. 322 à 335). Quatre autres mois plus tard, en juillet 1997, la Commission a finalement avisé Blencoe que le Tribunal procéderait à l'audition de l'affaire. Deux autres mois se sont ensuite écoulés avant qu'une date d'audience soit fixée au mois de mars 1998, soit quelque six mois plus tard. En tout, il a fallu environ deux ans à la Commission pour décider que les plaintes feraient l'objet d'une audience. Environ 32 mois se sont écoulés entre le dépôt initial des plaintes et la date fixée pour leur audition. Même s'il est vrai que la Commission a dû franchir un certain nombre d'étapes pour décider que l'affaire ferait l'objet d'une audience, chacune de ces étapes a comporté un délai considérable.

169

A particularly egregious example of the Commission's unacceptable lack of diligence may be found in the events during the period from October 16, 1995 to December 21, 1995. During that time, the Commission breached procedural fairness by failing to send to Blencoe Willis's October 16 response to his submissions on the timeliness of her complaint. In response to an inquiry, Blencoe received the Commission's letter dated December 21 on December 27. Although the December 21 letter denied that a decision had been made on this issue, a January 22, 1996 letter revealed that the Commission had actually already made the decision on December 18, before it even sent Blencoe the documents to which he had wished to reply and that the Commission had possessed for three months (see pp. 290-300 of the appellants' record). The Commission essentially failed even to keep those affected by its decisions up to date with what was going on.

Les événements qui se sont déroulés entre le 16 octobre et le 21 décembre 1995 sont un exemple particulièrement frappant du manque inacceptable de diligence de la Commission. Au cours de cette période, la Commission a manqué à son obligation d'équité procédurale en ne transmettant pas à Blencoe la réponse du 16 octobre que Willis avait donnée à ses observations concernant le respect du délai imparti pour déposer la plainte. À la suite d'une demande de renseignements, Blencoe a reçu, le 27 décembre, la lettre de la Commission datée du 21 décembre. Même si, dans la lettre du 21 décembre, on niait qu'une décision avait été prise à ce sujet, une lettre datée du 22 janvier 1996 a révélé que la Commission avait déjà pris une décision le 18 décembre 1995, avant même d'envoyer à Blencoe les documents auxquels il voulait répondre et qu'elle avait en sa possession depuis trois mois (voir les pp. 290 à 300 du dossier des appelants). La Commission a essentiellement omis de tenir au courant de la situation les personnes touchées par ses décisions.

170

Regardless of any arguments that parts of the time were necessary for procedural safeguards, the facts are that the Commission was slow at every step along the way. This eventually added up to a delay measured in years for a decision that was not

Indépendamment de tout argument que le délai était en partie nécessaire pour offrir des garanties procédurales, il reste que la Commission a été lente à toutes les étapes. Il lui a fallu, en définitive, plusieurs années pour prendre une décision non inherently complex. Although a few letters back and forth might have been appropriate, nothing in the inherent time requirements of the case came close to requiring the delay that occurred.

B. Cause of the Delay

The second factor that we must consider is the cause of delay beyond the inherent time requirements of the matter. It is true that Blencoe sought to use those defences available to him, including an argument about whether the complaints had been correctly filed within the limitation period provided by the statute. But in so doing, he did not become responsible for the sheer inefficiency of the Commission in dealing with these and other matters.

A measure of Blencoe's determination to seek an end to the delay is that even after matters had been delayed to this point largely on account of the Commission's failures to comply with basic procedural fairness, he offered to forego the investigative stage of the complaints to bring them to a hearing. In so doing, we may infer that he made clear to the Commission that he was seeking a way past the delay and red tape in which his life had become bound. In his request, he was rebuffed, as the Commission would have required him to make major concessions on the existence of a prima facie case against him, if he wanted to proceed to the hearing. (Although Blencoe made the offer only on the Willis complaint, this seems to be explained by the fact that he was simultaneously trying to find out whether a decision on the timeliness issue in the Schell complaint had been made without notification as had occurred with the Willis complaint (see the appellants' record at pp. 220 and 301).) On numerous other occasions as well, Blencoe asked about when there would be a decision on the complaints. Indeed, Blencoe's inquiries of this nature comprise a significant number of the letters in the record. There can be no doubt that there was serious delay on both complaints and that Blencoe tried to find a way to end it. After being thus rebuffed, his counsel was under no obligation to beg and cry for an expedited hear-complexe en soi. Même si un certain échange de correspondance avait pu être approprié, le délai inhérent à l'affaire était loin de correspondre à celui qui s'est écoulé.

B. La cause du délai

Le deuxième facteur que nous devons prendre en considération est la cause de la prolongation du délai inhérent à l'affaire. Il est vrai que Blencoe a tenté d'invoquer les moyens de défense dont il disposait, y compris l'argument de la question de savoir si les plaintes avaient été dûment déposées dans le délai prévu par la loi. Toutefois, ce faisant, il n'est pas devenu responsable de l'inefficacité pure et simple dont la Commission a fait preuve en traitant ces plaintes et d'autres questions.

Blencoe a montré à quel point il était déterminé à mettre fin au délai en offrant de renoncer à l'étape de l'enquête sur les plaintes et de passer directement à une audience, même si les choses avaient jusque-là traîné en longueur surtout à cause du manquement de la Commission à son obligation fondamentale d'équité procédurale. On peut déduire que, ce faisant, il a clairement signifié à la Commission qu'il souhaitait en finir avec les délais et les formalités administratives qui lui empoisonnaient la vie. Il a essuyé une rebuffade à ce sujet étant donné que, pour passer directement à l'audience, la Commission l'aurait obligé à faire des concessions importantes au sujet de l'existence d'une preuve prima facie contre lui. (Quoique Blencoe n'ait fait cette offre qu'à l'égard de la plainte de Willis, cela semble s'expliquer par le fait qu'il tentait, en même temps, de découvrir si une décision concernant le respect du délai imparti dans le cas de la plainte de Schell avait été rendue à son insu comme cela s'était produit relativement à la plainte de Willis (voir les pp. 220 et 301 du dossier des appelants).) Comme l'atteste un grand nombre de lettres versées au dossier, Blencoe a aussi maintes fois demandé à quel moment une décision serait rendue sur les plaintes. Il ne fait aucun doute que les deux plaintes ont fait l'objet d'un délai important auquel Blencoe a tenté de mettre fin. Après cette rebuffade, il n'était plus ing to demonstrate to the Human Rights Commission the seriousness of his requests.

171

172

nécessaire que l'avocat de Blencoe s'efforce de convaincre la Commission du sérieux des demandes de son client en faisant des pieds et des mains pour obtenir rapidement la tenue d'une audience.

173 A further measure of the Commission's behaviour with respect to delay is that even at the Supreme Court of Canada, the Commission admits that it cannot explain what was going on for five months of the time that it was dealing with the allegations against Blencoe. On a matter that ideally should not even have taken five months, a five-month period of unexplained delay remains surprising and troubling. Lowry J. characterized this period as a "five-month hiatus when there appears to have been no activity in relation to the complaints" (para. 47). After the gap, the Commission sent Blencoe a letter dated September 6, 1996 to advise him that it was appointing the same person as investigator as had up to that point been dealing with the pre-investigation report. In other words, in five months, nothing happened. This five-month lapse is just the high mark of the Commission's ineptitude.

C. Impact of Delay on the Respondent

174 The third factor that we must consider is the harm accruing as a result of the delay. Although Lowry J. found "that no clear case of prejudice in terms of an inability to defend has been made out" (para. 10), there is no doubt that Blencoe and his family suffered serious harm in other ways. Lowry J. went so far as to write at para. 50:

There is, however, substance to the contention that the hardship Mr. Blencoe, his wife, and his children have suffered, and continue to suffer, is markedly disproportionate to the value there can now be in an adjudicated resolution. [Emphasis added.]

175 There can be no doubt about the impact of the allegations on the respondent and his family. The respondent's career is finished. He and his family have been chased twice across the country in their

Une autre exemple de la conduite que la Commission adopte en matière de délais est que, même devant la Cour suprême du Canada, elle reconnaît qu'elle ne peut pas expliquer ce qui s'est passé durant les cinq mois au cours desquels elle a traité les allégations formulées contre Blencoe. Dans une affaire qui, idéalement, n'aurait même pas dû se prolonger pendant cinq mois, un délai inexpliqué de cinq mois est à la fois étonnant et troublant. Le juge Lowry a qualifié cette période de [TRADUCTION] «vide de cinq mois pendant lequel rien ne semble s'être passé relativement aux plaintes» (par. 47). Après cette période, la Commission a envoyé à Blencoe une lettre datée du 6 septembre 1996 l'informant qu'elle désignait à titre d'enquêteur la personne qui, jusque-là, s'était occupée du rapport préalable à l'enquête. En d'autres termes, rien ne s'est passé pendant cinq mois. Cet intervalle n'est que le paroxysme de l'ineptie dont la Commission a fait preuve.

C. L'incidence du délai sur l'intimé

Le troisième facteur que nous devons prendre en considération est le préjudice résultant du délai. Même si le juge Lowry a conclu [TRADUCTION] «qu'il n'y a aucune preuve manifeste de préjudice en ce qui concerne la capacité de se défendre» (par. 10), il n'y a pas doute que Blencoe et sa famille ont subi un grave préjudice à d'autres égards. Le juge Lowry va jusqu'à écrire, au par. 50:

[TRADUCTION] Il y a toutefois de quoi prétendre que les difficultés que M. Blencoe, son épouse et ses enfants ont éprouvées et qu'ils continuent d'éprouver sont nettement disproportionnées à l'avantage qu'il peut maintenant y avoir d'obtenir une décision sur l'affaire. [Je souligne.]

Il n'y a aucun doute que les allégations ont une incidence sur l'intimé et sa famille. La carrière de l'intimé est terminée. Sa famille et lui ont été traqués à deux reprises lorsqu'ils ont tenté de attempts to make a new life. He was under medical care for clinical depression for many months. In the wake of the outstanding complaints before the Commission, even such a normal aspect of life as coaching his youngest son's soccer team has been denied to Blencoe, since he has faced stigmatization in the form of presumed guilt as a sexual harasser. As Lowry J. wrote at para. 13:

The point need not be further stressed. The stigma attached to the outstanding complaints has certainly contributed in large measure to the very real hardship Mr. Blencoe has experienced. His public profile as a Minister of the Crown rendered him particularly vulnerable to the media attention that has been focused on him and his family, and the hardship has, in the result, been protracted and severe. [Emphasis added.]

Although I do not deny that Blencoe might have taken additional steps to make the Commission more fully aware of the impact on him of continued delay, he did try to move matters along. The Commission showed next to no regard for the possible impacts of its delays, often taking long periods of time even to respond to requests for information as to the progress of the file. It certainly did nothing to minimize the impact of the delay on the respondent.

It is true that administrative delay was not the only cause of the prejudice suffered by the respondent. Nevertheless, it contributed significantly to its aggravation. It must be added, though, that this delay also frustrated the complainants in their desire for a quick disposition of their complaints. Finally, the inefficient and delay-filled process at the Commission linked with the specific blunders made in the management of those particular complaints harmed all parties involved in this sorry process. Its flaws were such that it may rightly be termed to have been abusive in respect of the respondent. In this connection, I note that my colleague, Bastarache J., despite coming to the conclusion that the conduct of the Commission did not amount to an abuse of process, nevertheless found it necessary to award costs against the Commission in light of the "lack of diligence [it] displayed" refaire leur vie ailleurs au pays. Pendant plusieurs mois, il a eu recours à des soins médicaux pour traiter une dépression clinique. À la suite des plaintes déposées devant la Commission, Blencoe a même été empêché d'exercer une activité aussi normale qu'entraîner l'équipe de soccer de son fils cadet en raison de la stigmatisation liée au fait d'être présumé coupable de harcèlement sexuel. Comme l'a écrit le juge Lowry, au par. 13:

[TRADUCTION] Il n'y a pas lieu d'insister davantage sur ce point. La stigmatisation liée aux plaintes dont M. Blencoe faisait l'objet a sûrement contribué dans une large mesure aux difficultés très réelles qu'il a éprouvées. Du fait de sa visibilité en tant que ministre du gouvernement, il était davantage exposé à l'attention que les médias lui ont portée à lui-même et à sa famille, ce qui explique la longueur et la gravité des difficultés qui ont résulté. [Je souligne.]

Bien que je ne nie pas que Blencoe aurait pu prendre d'autres mesures pour que la Commission soit plus consciente de l'incidence que le délai avait sur lui, il reste qu'il a tenté de faire avancer les choses. La Commission s'est montrée presque indifférente aux effets possibles de ses délais, en mettant même souvent beaucoup de temps à répondre suite à des demandes de renseignements sur l'évolution du dossier. Elle n'a sûrement rien fait pour réduire au minimum l'incidence du délai sur l'intimé.

Il est vrai que le délai administratif n'a pas été la seule cause du préjudice subi par l'intimé. Néanmoins, il a beaucoup contribué à son aggravation. Il faut cependant ajouter que ce délai a également déjoué la volonté des plaignantes de voir leurs plaintes réglées rapidement. Enfin, l'inefficacité et les multiples délais qui ont caractérisé le processus devant la Commission et qui sont liés, en particulier, aux gaffes commises dans la gestion de ces plaintes ont lésé toutes les parties à ce processus déplorable. La procédure a été à ce point viciée qu'on peut à juste titre la qualifier d'abusives à l'égard de l'intimé. À cet égard, je constate que, même s'il conclut que la conduite qu'elle a adoptée n'a pas constitué un abus de procédure, mon collègue le juge Bastarache a néanmoins jugé nécessaire de condamner la Commission à payer des dépens en raison de «l'absence de diligence (para. 136). In my view, this further demonstrates the tension in this appeal and the fact that the conduct of the Commission in dealing with this matter was less than acceptable.

176

177

IX. Administrative Remedy

178

In the end, the specific and unexplained delay entitles Blencoe to some kind of remedy. The choice of the appropriate redress requires, though, a careful analysis of the circumstances of the case, in order to identify the causes and nature of the delay and its impact on the process, because the courts always have some discretion on orders of remedies founded on the old prerogative writs. The selection of an appropriate remedy may also impose a delicate balancing exercise between competing interests. In proceedings like those that gave rise to this appeal, we must factor in the interest of the respondent, that of the complainants themselves and finally, the public interest of the community itself which wants basic rights enforced efficiently but fairly. As we have seen above, the courts must also consider the stage of the proceedings which has been affected by the delay. A distinction must be drawn between the process leading to the hearing and the hearing itself. A different balance between conflicting interests may have to be found at different stages of the administrative process.

179

Several kinds of remedies are available either to prevent or remedy abusive delay within an administrative process. The main forms of redress that we need address here are a stay of proceedings, orders for an expedited hearing and costs.

180

Whoever asks for a stay of proceedings carries a heavy burden. In a human rights proceeding, such an order not only stops the proceedings and negates the public interest in the enforcement of human rights legislation, but it also affects, in a radical way, the interest of the complainants who lose the opportunity to have their complaints heard [qu'elle a] manifestée» (par. 136). À mon avis, cela est un autre indice de la tension qui existait en l'espèce et du caractère moins qu'acceptable de la conduite adoptée par la Commission en traitant cette affaire.

IX. Réparation issue du droit administratif

En définitive, le délai inexplicé en cause justifie d'accorder une forme de réparation à Blencoe. Toutefois, le choix de la réparation appropriée requiert une analyse minutieuse des circonstances de l'affaire afin de déterminer les causes et la nature du délai ainsi que son incidence sur les procédures, étant donné que les tribunaux judiciaires détiennent toujours un certain pouvoir discrétionnaire en matière de réparations fondées sur les anciens brevets de prérogative. Le choix d'une réparation appropriée peut aussi commander une évaluation délicate d'intérêts opposés. Dans des procédures comme celles à l'origine du présent pourvoi, il nous faut tenir compte de l'intérêt de l'intimé, de celui des plaignantes et, enfin, de celui de la collectivité, laquelle souhaite une application efficace, mais équitable, des droits fondamentaux. Comme nous l'avons vu, les tribunaux judiciaires doivent également prendre en considération l'étape des procédures qui est touchée par le délai. Une distinction doit être établie entre les procédures menant à l'audience et l'audience elle-même. Une évaluation des intérêts opposés peut se révéler nécessaire à chacune des étapes des procédures administratives.

Plusieurs types de réparation permettent de prévenir le délai abusif dans des procédures administratives, ou d'y remédier. Les principales formes de réparation qu'il nous faut examiner en l'espèce sont l'arrêt des procédures, l'ordonnance enjoignant de tenir une audience accélérée et l'adjudication de dépens.

Quiconque demande l'arrêt des procédures assume un lourd fardeau. Dans des procédures en matière de droits de la personne, en plus de mettre fin aux procédures et d'être contraire à l'intérêt du public dans l'application de la législation relatives aux droits de la personne, une telle ordonnance va, en outre, radicalement à l'encontre de l'intérêt du and dealt with. The stay of proceedings should not generally appear as the sole or even the preferred form of redress: see R. v. O'Connor, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, at para. 68. A more prudent approach would limit it to those situations that compromise the very fairness of the hearing and to those cases where the delay in the conduct of the process leading to it would amount to a gross or shocking abuse of the process. In those two situations, the interest of the respondent and the protection of the integrity of the legal system become the paramount considerations. The interest of the complainants would undoubtedly be grievously affected by a stay, but the prime concern in such cases becomes the safeguarding of the basic rights of the respondent engaged in a human rights proceeding and the preservation of the essential fairness of the process itself: see Ratzlaff, supra, at para. 19. Whatever its consequences, a stay may thus become the sole appropriate remedy in those circumstances.

I note that my approach on the matter of a stay here is consistent with the approach that our Court has adopted in the slightly different context in Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Tobiass, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 391. There, the Court, following O'Connor, supra, recognized a stay as appropriate in situations where the fairness of the hearing had been compromised as well as in situations falling within a residual category. For a residual case to give rise to a stay, the Court held in Tobiass, at paras. 90-91 that a stay could be granted where it was the only reasonable means of stopping an abuse that would be perpetuated and aggravated through the conduct of a trial. For a stay to be appropriate as a remedy for an abuse that has already occurred, the abuse must rise to a level such that the mere carrying forward of the case will offend society's sense of justice (Tobiass, at para. 91): i.e., in my analysis, where there is a gross or shocking abuse, or where the societal interest in proceeding does not outweigh the considerations I have enumerated.

plaignant qui perd la possibilité de voir sa plainte entendue et réglée. L'arrêt des procédures ne devrait pas généralement être considéré comme la seule réparation possible ni même comme la forme de réparation préférée: voir R. c. O'Connor, [1995] 4 R.C.S. 411, au par. 68. Il serait plus prudent de limiter l'arrêt des procédures aux cas où l'équité même de l'audience est compromise et où le délai dans les procédures menant à l'audience constituerait un abus de procédure grossier ou scandaleux. Dans les deux cas, l'intérêt de l'intimé et la protection de l'intégrité du système judiciaire deviennent les facteurs prépondérants. L'arrêt des procédures porterait sans doute gravement atteinte à l'intérêt des plaignantes, mais la principale préoccupation, en pareil cas, devient la protection des droits fondamentaux de l'intimé impliqué dans des procédures en matière de droits de la personne et la protection de l'équité essentielle des procédures mêmes: voir Ratzlaff, précité, au par. 19. Quelles qu'en soient les conséquences, l'arrêt des procédures peut donc devenir la seule réparation appropriée dans ces circonstances.

Je souligne que mon point de vue concernant la question d'un arrêt des procédures en l'espèce est conforme à celui que notre Cour a adopté dans le contexte légèrement différent de l'arrêt Canada (Ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration) c. Tobiass, [1997] 3 R.C.S. 391. Dans cet arrêt, la Cour a suivi l'arrêt O'Connor, précité, et a reconnu qu'un arrêt des procédures peut être ordonné dans les cas où l'équité de l'audience a été compromise et dans ceux qui relèvent d'une catégorie résiduelle. En ce qui concerne l'arrêt en vertu d'une catégorie résiduelle, la Cour a statué, aux par. 90 et 91 de l'arrêt Tobiass, qu'il pourrait être accordé si c'était le seul moyen raisonnable de mettre fin à un abus que le déroulement d'un procès contribuerait à perpétuer ou à aggraver. Pour qu'un arrêt puisse être ordonné afin de remédier à un abus déjà commis, l'abus doit être tel que la seule poursuite de l'affaire choquera le sens de la justice de la société (Tobiass, au par. 91): autrement dit, il convient de l'ordonner, selon moi, lorsqu'il y a abus grossier ou scandaleux ou encore lorsque l'intérêt de la société dans la poursuite de l'affaire ne l'emporte pas sur les considérations que j'ai énumérées.

182 The approach of the courts should change when it appears that the hearing will remain fair, in spite of the delay and when the delay has not risen to the level of a shocking abuse, notwithstanding its seriousness. More limited and narrowly focused remedies would then become appropriate. In the context of a judicial review procedure akin to mandamus, the first objective of any intervention by a court should be to make things happen, where the administrative process is not working adequately. An order for an expedited hearing within such time frame and with such conditions as the Court might set would be the most practical and effective means of judicial action. Used at the right moment, such a remedy may safeguard the interest of all parties to the process. A litigant who believes he or she is facing undue delay should probably take that route rather than letting the process decay in the hope of stopping the old process on some future date.

183 An order for costs is a third kind of remedy. It will not address the delay directly, but some of its consequences. If a party must resort to the courts to secure a timely hearing or to speed up the process in which he or she is engaged, some form of compensation for costs should at least be considered by the courts in their discretion. Whenever parties are compelled to seek judicial interventions to safeguard their rights, costs must be considered to compensate at least in part the time, money and efforts expended in obtaining redress. Even if costs cannot indemnify the party for all the losses and prejudice arising from administrative delay, they afford at least a measure of compensation.

184 In the present appeal, the remedy of a pure stay of proceeding appears both excessive and unfair. First, in spite of the seriousness of the problems faced by Blencoe, the delay does not seem to compromise the fairness of the hearing. As the trial judge found at para. 10, the respondent has not established that the delay has deprived him of evi-

L'approche des tribunaux judiciaires devrait changer lorsqu'il appert que le délai ne portera pas atteinte à l'équité de l'audience et qu'il ne constitue pas un abus scandaleux en dépit de sa gravité. Des réparations plus limitées et mieux ciblées seraient alors appropriées. Dans le contexte d'un contrôle judiciaire analogue au mandamus, toute intervention d'un tribunal judiciaire devrait, d'abord et avant tout, viser à faire avancer les choses lorsque les procédures administratives ne se déroulent pas adéquatement. L'intervention judiciaire la plus pratique et efficace serait d'ordonner la tenue d'une audience accélérée dans un délai et aux conditions prescrites par la cour. Si elle est accordée au bon moment, cette réparation peut protéger les intérêts de toutes les parties en cause. La partie qui se croit victime d'un délai injustifié devrait probablement procéder de cette façon plutôt que de laisser la situation se détériorer dans l'espoir de pouvoir mettre fin aux procédures ultérieurement.

L'adjudication de dépens est la troisième réparation possible. Elle touche non pas le délai directement, mais plutôt certaines de ses conséquences. Si une partie doit recourir aux tribunaux pour obtenir la tenue d'une audience en temps opportun ou pour accélérer les procédures dans lesquelles elle est impliquée, les tribunaux devraient au moins pouvoir envisager la possibilité d'accorder une forme quelconque d'indemnisation des dépens. Chaque fois qu'une partie doit faire appel à une cour de justice pour faire respecter ses droits, les dépens doivent être pris en compte pour compenser, du moins en partie, le temps, l'argent et les efforts consacrés à l'obtention d'une réparation. Même si les dépens ne permettent pas d'indemniser la partie de toutes les pertes et de tout le préjudice résultant d'un délai administratif, ils assurent au moins une certaine indemnisation.

En l'espèce, la réparation consistant à ordonner l'arrêt pur et simple des procédures paraît à la fois excessive et inéquitable. Premièrement, malgré la gravité des difficultés éprouvées par Blencoe, le délai ne semble pas compromettre l'équité de l'audience. Comme le juge de première instance l'a conclu, au par. 10, l'intimé n'a pas établi que le dence or information important to his defence. The delay rather concerns the process leading to the hearing. It arises from a variety of causes that do not evince an intent from the Commission to harm him wilfully, but rather demonstrate grave negligence and important structural problems in the processing of the complaints. Second, a stay of proceedings in a situation that does not compromise the fairness of the hearing and does not amount to shocking or gross abuse requires the consideration of the interest of the complainants in the choice of the proper remedy (Tobiass, supra, at para. 92). In the present matter, the judgment of the Court of Appeal completely omitted any consideration of this interest (see para. 39). The lifting of the stay is thus both justified and necessary.

However, rejecting the stay as a proper remedy in the present case does not mean that Blencoe should be deprived of any redress. On the contrary, an order for an expedited hearing should have been considered as the remedy of choice. There will be some irony in granting such a remedy more than five years after the proceedings began. Such an outcome offers the respondent little solace. Nevertheless, in spite of its rather symbolic value, at the present stage of the proceedings, it appears as a critically important remedy that should have been used at an earlier stage to prod the Commission along and to control the inefficiency of its process.

In spite of the partial success of this appeal, as I agree that the stay should be lifted, Blencoe is entitled to some compensation in the form of costs in our Court and in the courts below. Section 47 of the Supreme Court Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. S-26, grants our Court broad discretion when awarding costs. In the present case, it would be both fair and appropriate to use this power as the respondent has established that the process initiated against him was deeply flawed and that its defects justified his search for a remedy, at least in administrative law. He had to fight for his rights, and it would be unfair for him to bear the costs personally.

délai l'a privé d'un élément de preuve ou d'un renseignement important pour sa défense. Le délai concerne plutôt les procédures menant à l'audience. Il est dû à une gamme de causes qui traduisent non pas l'intention de la Commission de léser délibérément l'intimé, mais plutôt une négligence grave et l'existence de problèmes structurels importants en matière de traitement des plaintes. Deuxièmement, pour ordonner l'arrêt des procédures dans le cas où l'équité de l'audience n'est pas compromise et où il n'y a pas d'abus scandaleux ou grossier, il faut tenir compte l'intérêt du plaignant dans le choix de la réparation appropriée (Tobiass, précité, au par. 92). Dans la présente affaire, la Cour d'appel a complètement omis de tenir compte de cet intérêt (voir le par. 39). L'annulation de l'arrêt des procédures est donc à la fois justifiée et nécessaire.

Cependant, le rejet de l'arrêt des procédures à titre de réparation appropriée en l'espèce ne signifie pas pour autant que Blencoe devrait être privé de toute réparation. Au contraire, l'ordonnance enjoignant de tenir une audience accélérée aurait dû être envisagée à titre de réparation appropriée. Il est quelque peu ironique d'accorder une telle réparation plus de cinq ans après le début des procédures. Un tel résultat offre une mince consolation à l'intimé. Néanmoins, malgré sa valeur plutôt symbolique à l'étape actuelle des procédures, cette réparation apparaît comme une mesure d'une importance cruciale et aurait dû être accordée plus tôt pour inciter la Commission à agir et pour remédier à l'inefficacité de ses procédures.

En dépit de la réussite partielle du présent appel et étant donné que je conviens qu'il y a lieu d'annuler l'arrêt des procédures, Blencoe a droit à une indemnisation sous forme de dépens devant notre Cour et les tribunaux d'instance inférieure. L'article 47 de la Loi sur la Cour suprême, L.R.C. (1985), ch. S-26, investit notre Cour d'un large pouvoir discrétionnaire en matière d'adjudication de dépens. En l'espèce, il serait à la fois juste et opportun d'exercer ce pouvoir étant donné que l'intimé a établi que les procédures engagées contre lui étaient entachées de vices importants qui le justifiaient de demander une réparation au moins

185

186

Although ultimately unsuccessful in his application for a stay, Blencoe brought to the attention of the courts the grave deficiency of the administrative processes of the Commission. He should at least not be penalized for this mixture of success and failure (e.g., Schachter v. Canada, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679, at p. 726).

fondée sur le droit administratif. Il a dû lutter pour faire respecter ses droits et il serait injuste qu'il assume personnellement les frais de cette lutte. Même si sa demande d'arrêt des procédures a finalement été rejetée, Blencoe a attiré l'attention des tribunaux sur les graves lacunes des procédures administratives de la Commission. Il n'y a pas lieu, à tout le moins, de le pénaliser en raison de ce mélange de réussite et d'échec (par exemple, Schachter c. Canada, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 679, à la p. 726).

X. Section 7 of the Charter

X. L'article 7 de la Charte

187 The application of the general principles of administrative law would have justified the intervention of the trial court without any need to demonstrate a breach of an interest protected by s. 7 of the Charter. As I think that this matter should have been resolved on the basis of administrative law principles, I do not think I have to express a definite opinion on the application of s. 7 of the Charter in the present case.

L'application des principes généraux du droit administratif aurait justifié l'intervention du tribunal de première instance sans qu'il ne soit nécessaire de démontrer l'existence d'une atteinte à un droit garanti par l'art. 7 de la Charte. Comme j'estime que la présente affaire aurait dû être réglée en fonction des principes du droit administratif, il me paraît inutile d'exprimer une opinion précise sur l'application de l'art. 7 de la Charte en l'espèce.

188 We must remember though that s. 7 expresses some of the basic values of the Charter. It is certainly true that we must avoid collapsing the contents of the Charter and perhaps of Canadian law into a flexible and complex provision like s. 7. But its importance is such for the definition of substantive and procedural guarantees in Canadian law that it would be dangerous to freeze the development of this part of the law. The full impact of s. 7 will remain difficult to foresee and assess for a long while yet. Our Court should be alive to the need to safeguard a degree of flexibility in the interpretation and evolution of s. 7 of the Charter. At the same time, the Court should remind litigants that not every case can be reduced to a Charter case.

Nous devons toutefois nous rappeler que l'art. 7 énonce certaines valeurs fondamentales de la Charte. Il est sûrement vrai qu'il nous faut éviter de ramener la Charte, voire le droit canadien, à une disposition souple et complexe comme l'art. 7. Toutefois, son importance est telle pour la définition des garanties de fond et de procédure en droit canadien qu'il serait périlleux de bloquer l'évolution de cette partie du droit. Il restera difficile pendant encore assez longtemps de prévoir et d'évaluer toutes les répercussions de l'art. 7. Notre Cour devrait être consciente de la nécessité de maintenir une certaine souplesse dans l'interprétation de l'art. 7 de la Charte et dans l'évolution de son application. En même temps, notre Cour devrait rappeler aux parties que les affaires ne peuvent pas toutes être plaidées sur le fondement de la Charte.

189 Assuming that the Charter must solve every legal problem would be a recipe for freezing and sterilizing the natural and necessary evolution of the common law and of the civil law in this country. In the present appeal, the absence of a Charter remedy does not mean that administrative law

Supposer que tout problème juridique doit se régler en fonction de la Charte contribuerait à bloquer et à stériliser l'évolution naturelle et nécessaire de la common law et du droit civil dans notre pays. Comme nous l'avons vu, l'absence en l'espèce d'une réparation fondée sur la Charte ne remedies could not have been identified and applied, as we have seen above.

XI. Disposition

For these reasons, I would allow the appeal in part, lift the stay of proceedings and order an expedited hearing of the complainants Schell and Willis. I would also order the appellant British Columbia Human Rights Commission to pay costs on a party-to-party basis to the respondent Blencoe in this Court and in the British Columbia courts.

Appeal allowed with costs against the appellant Commission, IACOBUCCI, BINNIE, ARBOUR and LEBEL JJ. dissenting in part.

Solicitors for the appellants the British Columbia Human Rights Commission and the Commissioner of Investigation and Mediation: Davis & Company, Vancouver.

Solicitors for the appellant the British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal: Morley & Ross, Victoria.

Solicitor for the appellant Andrea Willis: Robert B. Farvolden, Victoria.

Solicitors for the respondent: Arvay Finlay, Victoria.

Solicitors for the intervener Irene Schell: Allard & Company, Vancouver.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General of British Columbia: The Ministry of the Attorney General, Victoria.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General for Ontario: The Ministry of the Attorney General, Toronto.

Solicitor for the intervener the Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission: Milton Woodard, Saskatoon.

signifie pas qu'aucune réparation n'aurait pu être trouvée et accordée en application du droit administratif.

XI. Dispositif

Pour ces motifs, je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi en partie, d'annuler l'arrêt des procédures et d'ordonner la tenue d'une audition accélérée des plaintes de Schell et Willis. Je suis également d'avis d'ordonner à l'appelante, la Commission des droits de la personne de la Colombie-Britannique, de payer à l'intimé Blencoe des dépens comme entre parties devant notre Cour et les tribunaux de la Colombie-Britannique.

Pourvoi accueilli avec dépens contre la Commission appelante, les juges IACOBUCCI, BINNIE, ARBOUR et LEBEL sont dissidents en partie.

Procureurs des appelants la British Columbia Human Rights Commission et le Commissioner of Investigation and Mediation: Davis & Company, Vancouver.

Procureurs de l'appelant le British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal: Morley & Ross, Victoria.

Procureur de l'appelante Andrea Willis: Robert B. Farvolden, Victoria.

Procureurs de l'intimé: Arvay Finlay, Victoria.

Procureurs de l'intervenante Irene Schell: Allard & Company, Vancouver.

Procureur de l'intervenant le procureur général de l'Ontario: Le ministère du Procureur général, Toronto.

Procureur de l'intervenant le procureur général de la Colombie-Britannique: Le ministère du Procureur général, Victoria.

Procureur de l'intervenante la Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission: Milton Woodard, Saskatoon.

Solicitors for the intervener the Ontario Human Rights Commission: Cathryn Pike and Jennifer Scott, Toronto.

Solicitor for the intervener the Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission: Lara J. Morris, Halifax.

Solicitor for the intervener the Manitoba Human Rights Commission: Manitoba Justice, Winnipeg.

Solicitor for the intervener the Canadian Human Rights Commission: Fiona Keith, Ottawa.

Solicitor for the intervener the Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse: Hélène Tessier, Montréal.

Solicitor for the intervener the British Columbia Human Rights Coalition: Community Legal Assistance Society, Vancouver.

Solicitors for the intervener the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund: Jennifer L. Conkie and Dianne Pothier, Vancouver.

Procureurs de l'intervenante la Commission ontarienne des droits de la personne: Cathryn Pike et Jennifer Scott, Toronto.

Procureur de l'intervenante la Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission: Lara J. Morris, Halifax.

Procureur de l'intervenante la Commission des droits de la personne du Manitoba: Justice Manitoba, Winnipeg.

Procureur de l'intervenante la Commission canadienne des droits de la personne: Fiona Keith, Ottawa.

Procureur de l'intervenante la Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse: Hélène Tessier, Montréal.

Procureur de l'intervenante la British Columbia Human Rights Coalition: Community Legal Assistance Society, Vancouver.

Procureurs de l'intervenant le Fonds d'action et d'éducation juridiques pour les femmes: Jennifer L. Conkie et Dianne Pothier, Vancouver.

Tab 6

R. v. Côté, 2011 SCC 46 (CanLII), [2011] 3 SCR 215

Source:	Supreme Court of Canada
Date:	2011-10-14
File number:	33645
Other citations:	342 DLR (4th) 77 — 421 NR 112 — AZ-50794015 — [2011] EXP 3108 — 276 CCC (3d) 42 — 87 CR (6th) 1 — 246 CRR (2d) 213 — 97 WCB (2d) 17 — [2011] CarswellQue 10407 — EYB 2011-196883 — JE 2011-1739 — [2011] SCJ No 46 (QL) — [2011] ACS no 46
Citation:	R. v. Côté, 2011 SCC 46 (CanLII), [2011] 3 SCR 215, < https://canlii.ca/t/fndv8 >, retrieved on 2026-03-22
Most recent unfavourable mention	R v Del Corro , 2019 ABCA 156 (CanLII) [...] The trial judge clearly took the view that the fact that the drugs could have been obtained in a constitutionally permissible manner (without a breach of ss 8 or 9) appreciably mitigated the seriousness and the impact of the breaches, despite the observation in R v Côté, 2011 SCC 46 at paras 67-68 , [2011] 3 SCR 215 , that [...]

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

CITATION: R. v. Côté, 2011 SCC 46, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 215

DATE: 20111014

DOCKET: 33645

BETWEEN:

Armande Côté
Appellant
and
Her Majesty The Queen

Respondent
- and -
Criminal Lawyers' Association (Ontario)
Intervener

OFFICIAL ENGLISH TRANSLATION: Reasons of Deschamps J.

CORAM: McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Charron, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT: Cromwell J. (McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Fish, Abella, Charron and Rothstein JJ. concurring)
(paras. 1 to 90)

DISSENTING REASONS: Deschamps J.
(paras. 91 to 119)

R. v. Côté, 2011 SCC 46, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 215

Armande Côté

Appellant

v.

Her Majesty The Queen

Respondent

and

Criminal Lawyers' Association (Ontario)

Intervener

Indexed as: R. v. Côté

2011 SCC 46

File No.: 33645.

2011: March 15; 2011: October 14.

Present: McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Charron, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR QUEBEC

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Enforcement — Exclusion of evidence — Accused charged with second degree murder — Search of accused's home conducted by police without valid warrants — Trial judge finding that police had not acted in good faith and demonstrated blatant disregard for accused's Charter rights throughout investigation — Trial judge concluding that admission of evidence in face of extraordinarily troubling police misconduct, even when decision would lead to acquittal of serious crime, would bring administration of justice into disrepute — Whether Court of Appeal erred in intervening on bases that police had not deliberately acted in abusive manner and that offence was serious — Whether Court of Appeal erred in intervening on basis that evidence could have been obtained legally by warrant without accused's participation — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 24(2).

Around 9 p.m. on July 22, 2006, C called 9-1-1 to report that her spouse, H, had been injured. The attending physician at the hospital established that H was suffering from head injuries and confirmed the presence of a metal object in H's skull, and communicated this information to the police. The police attended at C's home around midnight. The lights of the house were off and the house was calm. C answered the door in her pyjamas. The police explained that they were there to find out what happened and to make sure the premises were safe, but they did not tell C that they believed that H was suffering from a gunshot wound. The police, accompanied by C, inspected the interior and the exterior of the residence, as well as a gazebo. The police questioned C about the presence of firearms in the house. She confirmed the presence of two firearms but could only locate one, to which she led the police. The police later obtained warrants which were executed at C's residence. A .22 calibre rifle, of the same calibre as the bullet recovered from H's skull, was located by the police.

C was brought to the police station around 3 a.m. but not until 5:23 a.m. was she given a warning as an important witness in the attempted murder of H and advised of her right to counsel. After being warned, C spoke with a lawyer and invoked her right to silence. She then described the events to the police and was placed under arrest for attempted murder. She was cautioned again, advised of her right to counsel, and spoke with a lawyer again. After being placed under arrest, C was interrogated by the police throughout the day. C exhibited extreme anxiety about having the interrogation room closed, seemed to be exhausted and on several occasions told the interrogator that she had had enough, did not want to talk anymore or wanted to go lie down. C's interrogation ended at 8 p.m. on July 23, when she was advised of H's death and charged with second degree murder.

C applied to the trial judge to exclude the evidence against her. The trial judge concluded that the police embarked on a systematic violation of C's rights from the time they first entered onto her property until the end of her interrogation. The trial judge held that the police's entry on C's property, and the search of her house, property and gazebo constituted unreasonable searches and seizures contrary to s. 8 of the Charter. He held that the police detained C without telling her why in violation of s. 10\(a\) of the Charter, and that the police violated C's right to obtain the assistance of a lawyer and to be advised of that right, in violation of s. 10\(b\) of the Charter. He also held that the police violated C's right to silence as protected by s. 7 of the Charter and obtained a statement that was not voluntary. The trial judge also found that the investigators had misled a judicial officer to obtain warrants. The trial judge excluded all of the evidence pursuant to s. 24\(2\) of the Charter, finding that its admission would bring the administration of justice into disrepute, and C was acquitted of the charge. The Court of Appeal found that the trial judge was right to exclude C's statements to police. However, it concluded that the trial judge had erred by excluding the observations the police made of the exterior of C's home before the warrants were issued as well as the physical evidence obtained at C's home in execution of the warrants. It ordered a new trial.

Held (Deschamps J. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed and the acquittal restored.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Fish, Abella, Charron, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ.: The standard of review of a trial judge's s. 24(2) determination of what would bring the administration of justice into disrepute having regard to all of the circumstances is as follows: where a trial judge has considered the proper factors and has not made any unreasonable finding, his or her determination is owed considerable deference on appellate review.

This Court established a revised approach to the exclusion of evidence under s. 24(2) in R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 353. This Court held that three avenues of inquiry were relevant to an assessment of whether the admission of evidence obtained in breach of the Charter would bring the administration of justice into disrepute: (1) an evaluation of the seriousness of the state conduct; (2) the seriousness of the impact of the Charter violation on the Charter-protected interests of the accused; and (3) society's interest in an adjudication on the merits. After considering these factors, a court must then balance the assessments under each of these avenues of inquiry in making its s. 24(2) determination to determine whether admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

The Court of Appeal erred in intervening on the basis that the police had not deliberately acted in an abusive manner. By its re-characterization of the evidence which departed from express findings by the trial judge which were not tainted by any clear and determinative error, the Court of Appeal exceeded its role. The Court of Appeal also erred in reweighing the impact of the seriousness of the offence. This consideration was fully addressed by the trial judge who was aware of the seriousness of the offence and of the consequences of excluding the evidence.

Furthermore, the Court of Appeal erred by placing undue weight on the "discoverability" of the evidence in its s. 24(2) analysis. Its principal basis for appellate intervention was that the physical evidence could have been obtained legally by warrant, without C's participation. Discoverability is a relevant factor under the current s. 24(2) analysis, however, it is not determinative. A finding of discoverability does not necessarily lead to admission of evidence. In appropriate cases, discoverability may be relevant to the first two branches of the Grant analysis.

In the case at bar, with respect to the first branch of the analysis, it is clear that the trial judge considered the officers' misconduct to be very serious. The collection of the evidence pursuant to the warrants was an extension of the earlier, unlawful warrantless searches. The fact that the police could have demonstrated to a judicial officer that they had reasonable and probable grounds to believe that an offence had been committed and that there was evidence to be found, but did not do so, significantly aggravated the seriousness of their misconduct. The police misconduct in obtaining the warrants further aggravated the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct. With respect to the second branch of the analysis, the absence of prior judicial authorization constitutes a significant infringement of privacy. Having regard to all of the circumstances, the impact of the police misconduct on C's right to privacy was serious: the unauthorized search occurred in her home in the middle of the night while she was detained and the search was not brief. The breach implicated her liberty, her dignity as well as her privacy interests. Thus, the absence of prior authorization for the search was a serious affront to her reasonable expectation of privacy.

In this case, the trial judge drew the line where the police had continually shown systemic disregard for the law and the Constitution. The trial judge did not err in concluding that the courts must not tolerate this sort of behaviour by those sworn to uphold the law. He took the only course open to him in order to prevent the administration of justice from falling into further disrepute by condoning this disturbing and aberrant police behaviour.

Per Deschamps J. (dissenting): The application of the three-stage test proposed in R. v. Grant leads to the conclusion that the physical evidence should not have been excluded. At the first stage of the analysis — that of the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct — the police officers' conduct revealed a serious disregard for C's constitutional rights. Not only did the officers not concern themselves with obtaining either a warrant or C's informed consent before conducting their initial search, they also attempted to conceal the constitutional violations of C's rights.

At the second stage — that of the impact of the Charter breach on the Charter-protected interests of the accused — it is clear that the trial judge did not evaluate the actual impact of the breach. The main interest affected by the unlawful police search was C's expectation of privacy. In this regard, it is not enough to find that the search resulted in an invasion of privacy, as it is also necessary to determine the impact of the failure to obtain prior authorization on C's expectation. To do this, the situation here must be compared with the one that would have prevailed had the search been authorized in advance. It is more specifically the difference in seriousness between the two situations that reveals the extent to which the breach actually undermined the protected interests. In this case, a warrant could have been issued at the start of the investigation and the resulting invasion of C's privacy would, in practice, have been identical to the one that resulted from the warrantless search. Moreover, C did not have the highest expectation of privacy. She was the first and only person to whom the police officers could speak to find out what had happened in the moments before her spouse was taken away by ambulance. Therefore, the visit from the police could hardly be said to have been unexpected.

As for the third stage of the analysis — that of determining whether the search for truth would be better served by admitting the evidence or by excluding it — the evidence in question was reliable physical evidence, and its admission was likely to be of crucial importance to the truth-seeking function and to the conduct of the trial, since the exclusion of the statements made to the police by C meant that it was the only remaining evidence.

After completing all three stages of the analysis, it is necessary to balance the factors that weigh in favour of and against excluding the evidence. Here, the police misconduct, considered as a whole, is serious and the courts must dissociate themselves from it. However, it is possible to do so in respect of the constitutional violations in this case without excluding all the evidence. There are cases of impacts on expectations of privacy that are much more serious. Moreover, where reliable and important evidence exists, society's interest in the search for truth stands out. On the whole, it is the exclusion of the physical evidence that would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

Cases Cited

By Cromwell J.

Applied: R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 353; referred to: R. v. Godoy, 1999 CanLII 709 (SCC), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 311; R. v. Evans, 1996 CanLII 248 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 8; R. v. Tricker (1995), 1995 CanLII 1268 (ON CA), 21 O.R. (3d) 575; R. v. Araujo, 2000 SCC 65, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 992; R. v. Grant, 1993 CanLII 68 (SCC), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 223; R. v. Harrison, 2009 SCC 34, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 494, rev'g 2008 ONCA 85, 89 O.R. (3d) 161; R. v. Beaulieu, 2010 SCC 7, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 248; R. v. Collins, 1987 CanLII 84 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265; R. v. Stillman, 1997 CanLII 384 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 607; R. v. Colarusso, 1994 CanLII 134 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 20; R. v. Buhay, 2003 SCC 30, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 631; R. v. Nolet, 2010 SCC 24, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 851; R. v. Feeney, 1997 CanLII 342 (SCC), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 13; R. v. Greffe, 1990 CanLII 143 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 755.

By Deschamps J. (dissenting)

R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 353; R. v. Collins, 1987 CanLII 84 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265; R. v. Stillman, 1997 CanLII 384 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 607; Vancouver (City) v. Ward, 2010 SCC 27, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 28; R. v. Harrison, 2009 SCC 34, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 494.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 7, 8, 10, 24.

Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 488.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Quebec Court of Appeal (Dalphond, Duval Hesler and Gagnon JJ.A.), 2010 QCCA 303, 74 C.R. (6th) 130, SOQUIJ AZ-50609169, [2010] Q.J. No. 1162 (QL), 2010 CarswellQue 15137, setting aside the acquittal entered by Cournoyer J., 2008 QCCS 3749, SOQUIJ AZ-50509743, [2008] J.Q. n° 7951 (QL), 2008 CarswellQue 7931, and ordering a new trial. Appeal allowed, Deschamps J. dissenting.

Carole Gladu, Josée Veilleux and Karine Guay, for the appellant.

Magalie Cimon and Pierre Goulet, for the respondent.

Frank Addario and Kelly Doctor, for the intervener.

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Fish, Abella, Charron, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ. was delivered by

CROMWELL J. —

I. Introduction

[1] Evidence obtained in a manner that violates rights guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms must be excluded if, having regard to all of the circumstances, its admission would bring the administration of justice into disrepute: s. 24(2). This case raises in stark terms how this requirement applies when the court is faced with serious and systematic disregard for Charter rights by the police during the investigation of a serious crime.

[2] On the appellant's trial for second degree murder, the trial judge, after a five-day hearing, concluded that the police investigators over several hours had violated virtually every Charter right accorded to a suspect in a criminal investigation. These violations, he held, were not the result of isolated errors of judgment on the part of the police investigators, but rather were part of a larger pattern of disregard of the appellant's Charter rights. The seriousness of this misconduct was aggravated by the facts that the investigators had misled a judicial officer in order to obtain search warrants and that, as witnesses at trial, they had refused to admit obvious facts, offered improbable hypotheses and tried to justify their actions on untenable grounds. The trial judge found that to admit the evidence in the face of this extraordinarily troubling police misconduct, even when his decision would lead to an acquittal of a serious crime, would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. He therefore ordered its exclusion. In response to this ruling, the Crown stated that it had no other evidence and the appellant was acquitted of the charge.

[3] The Crown appealed to the Court of Appeal which held that some of the evidence which the trial judge had excluded should have been admitted. The court therefore set aside the trial judge's decision in part and ordered a new trial. On Ms. Côté's further appeal to this Court, the issue is whether the Court of Appeal erred in law in doing so.

[4] In my respectful view, the appeal must succeed and the decision of the trial judge to exclude the evidence restored. The trial judge drew the line where the police had continually shown systematic disregard for the law and the Constitution. The trial judge did not err in concluding that the courts must not tolerate this sort of behaviour by those sworn to uphold the law. He took the only course open to him in order to prevent the administration of justice from falling into further disrepute by condoning this disturbing and aberrant police behaviour.

II. Facts, Proceedings and Issues

A. Evidence and Decision at Trial, 2008 QCCS 3749 \(CanLII\)

(1) Overview

[5] The appellant applied to the trial judge to exclude evidence which she claimed had been obtained in a manner that infringed her rights under the Charter. The appellant also sought exclusion of her statements to the police on the basis that they had not been made voluntarily. The trial judge essentially agreed with the appellant, finding that the police violated the appellant's rights and misconducted themselves in several respects.

[6] The trial judge concluded that the police embarked on a systematic violation of Ms. Côté's rights when they entered onto her property at approximately 12:15 a.m. on July 23, 2006, and these violations extended until 8:00 p.m. that evening when her interrogation ended. First, the police officers' entry on the appellant's property, their authorization to enter her home, the search of her house, the peripheral search of the property and the search of her gazebo constituted unreasonable searches and seizures contrary to s. 8 of the Charter. Second, within a few moments of their arrival, the police detained the appellant without telling her why, in violation of s. 10(a) of the Charter. Third, at that point, and later on in their dealings with the appellant, the police violated her right to obtain the assistance of a lawyer and to be advised of that right, both in violation of s. 10(b) of the Charter. Fourth, the police violated the appellant's right to silence as protected by s. 7 of the Charter and fifth, through their improper questioning, obtained a statement that was not voluntary. In addition, the trial judge found that the investigators had misled a judicial officer to obtain search warrants and had been evasive and unbelievable witnesses at trial. After balancing society's interest in discovering the truth against its interest in maintaining the integrity of the administration of justice, the trial judge excluded all of the evidence, finding that its admission would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

(2) Evidence and Reasons

[7] On July 22, 2006, a little before 9:00 p.m., Ms. Côté called 9-1-1 to report that her spouse, André Hogue, had been injured. Mr. Hogue was transported to the Hôtel-Dieu hospital in Sorel and attended to by Dr. Nicolas Elazhary. Dr. Elazhary established that Mr. Hogue had a wound in the back of his head and concluded that he was suffering from head and possibly throat injuries. An X-ray revealed an intracerebral hematoma and a metal image compatible with a projectile. Dr. Elazhary communicated this information to Sergeant François Monetta of the Sûreté du Québec (Tracy Detachment) at 11:08 p.m. Shortly thereafter, Sergeant Monetta sent Constable Alain Hogue to the hospital to speak with Dr. Elazhary. At 11:28 p.m. Dr. Elazhary confirmed the presence of a metal object in the victim's skull and Constable Hogue relayed this information to Sergeant Monetta. At 11:38 p.m. Sergeant Monetta contacted Constable Jean-François Fortier in the Nicolet Detachment of the Sûreté du Québec and communicated the information he had about the victim and the incident, including the observations made by Dr. Elazhary. Thus, from at least 11:38 p.m., before officers arrived at Ms. Côté's residence, the police knew that they were in all likelihood dealing with a bullet wound to the back of the head. They were also aware that the victim had been transported to the hospital from the appellant's address earlier that evening.

[8] The appellant contacted Dr. Elazhary around 11:30 p.m. She told him that she had left Mr. Hogue beside the gazebo and that when she returned he was lying on the ground. Dr. Elazhary informed the appellant that Mr. Hogue was suffering from head trauma but did not mention the discovery of the bullet wound.

(a) Investigation of 9-1-1 Call

[9] Around 12:15 a.m. patrolling officers Tremblay and Mathieu attended at the appellant's home. All of the lights were off and the house appeared to be calm. Believing the main entrance to be at the rear of the house, the officers went around the back, entered the solarium and rang the doorbell. The appellant answered the door in her pyjamas. The officers explained that they were there to find out what had happened earlier that evening and to make sure the premises were safe. However, the trial judge was of the view that their explanations did not reflect their true intentions. The trial judge held that

[TRANSLATION] [a]s unpleasant as this might be for a judge, the court did not believe Constables Tremblay, Mathieu and Fortier. They unfortunately failed to display the candour and honesty that are to be expected of police officers responsible for law enforcement. [para. 126]

The officers asked to enter the house and, without responding, the appellant stepped aside. She accompanied the officers as they inspected the interior and exterior of the residence. They did not tell the appellant that they believed that her spouse was suffering from a gunshot wound.

[10] The trial judge found that the violation of the appellant's rights began shortly after the police arrived at her home, when they entered onto her property. The police relied on their power to investigate the 9-1-1 call, and, in particular, to locate the caller, determine his or her reasons for making the call, and provide the required assistance, but the trial judge found that the legitimate ambit of that power to investigate had expired earlier that evening and could not justify their investigation as it unfolded at the appellant's residence: see R. v. Godoy, 1999 CanLII 709 \(SCC\), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 311, at para. 22. In the trial judge's view, the police went to the appellant's house with the intention of conducting a criminal investigation, so they could not claim that, at 12:15 a.m., they were responding to a 9-1-1 call placed at 8:51 p.m. He found it telling that, while seeking the appellant's consent to look around her home, the police had deliberately chosen not to inform her about the gunshot wound to her spouse's head. The trial judge concluded that the police thought the appellant was a suspect in an attempted murder and were not responding to a call for assistance. The trial judge also found it incredible that the police tried to justify their intervention on the basis of ensuring Ms. Côté's safety. If the police had been genuinely concerned for the appellant's safety, he determined that they would not have had her accompany them as they searched the house.

[11] The trial judge explained that even if the parameters set out in Godoy were respected during the initial police intervention, this power does not authorize police to search the premises or otherwise intrude on a resident's privacy or property. He concluded that the power recognized in Godoy did not authorize the searches of the appellant's house and property and these searches were thus unlawful.

(b) Invitation to Knock and Approach

[12] The Crown also sought to justify the police intervention on the basis of the implied invitation to knock and approach the door for a lawful purpose as set out in R. v. Evans, 1996 CanLII 248 \(SCC\), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 8. This refers to the idea that "the occupier of a dwelling gives implied licence to any member of the public, including a police officer, on legitimate business to come on to the property" (Evans, at para. 13, per Sopinka J., citing R. v. Tricker (1995), 1995 CanLII 1268 \(ON CA\), 21 O.R. (3d) 575 (C.A.), at p. 579). The trial judge held that in shutting off the lights in her residence, the appellant had retracted the public and police's implicit invitation to knock and approach. Even if shutting off the lights did not retract this implied invitation, the trial judge found that the police had exceeded the permission accorded by the implied invitation to knock and approach for a lawful purpose. This permission was exceeded because the police had expressly contemplated the possibility of recovering evidence against the appellant when they went to her home, illustrated by the fact that the police deliberately withheld from the appellant the fact that Mr. Hogue had been wounded by a bullet. Given this intention, the police exceeded the implied permission to approach and knock. Therefore, the search was not legally justified on this basis.

(c) Appellant's Consent to Enter Her Residence

[13] The trial judge also found that the police's failure to provide the appellant with the information they possessed about the nature of her spouse's injuries vitiated her consent to enter her home. It also did not conform to the requirements set out in the jurisprudence for obtaining consent for a warrantless search. The warrantless searches could therefore not be justified on the basis of the appellant's consent.

(d) Urgency

[14] Finally, the trial judge found that the evidence did not establish urgency. There was no concern for the police or the public's safety, nor was there a concern that some of the evidence would be destroyed. Accordingly, the police officers' entry onto the appellant's property and the warrantless search of her home could not be justified on the basis of urgency.

(e) First Search of House and Property

[15] After Constables Tremblay and Mathieu entered the appellant's home, she accompanied them as they inspected the interior of the residence. Constable Tremblay then checked the exterior of the house and found that the door to the gazebo was broken and that there appeared to be blood inside the gazebo. Constable Mathieu, accompanied by the appellant, joined Constable Tremblay outside to make sure everything was in order. Constable Mathieu noticed holes in the gazebo's mosquito screen and in the solarium window. The trial judge found that both of these searches were illegal.

[16] At 12:27 a.m. Constable Tremblay went back to the police cruiser and relayed his observations to Constable Fortier. Constable Mathieu went back inside the house with the appellant. At 12:55 a.m. Constable Tremblay joined the appellant and Constable Mathieu inside the residence and questioned the appellant about the presence of firearms in the house. Ms. Côté gave some information about the night's events during this encounter. She confirmed the presence of two firearms but could only locate one. She led the officers to her bedroom closet where she showed them a firearm case that she said contained a firearm. Constable Tremblay did not handle the case but assumed that it contained a firearm.

(f) Detention

[17] The trial judge held that the appellant's detention commenced shortly after Constables Tremblay and Mathieu arrived at her residence. He found that she was detained at 12:27 a.m. when the officers observed holes in the solarium's window and in the gazebo's mosquito screen, failed to tell Ms. Côté about the projectile in Mr. Hogue's head and Constable Mathieu began making surveillance notes with respect to the appellant's behaviour and movements.

[18] The trial judge found that the police officers had quickly established that Ms. Côté was the only suspect in the attempted murder of Mr. Hogue, which is why they hid from her the fact that they knew about the gunshot wound. The trial judge held that keeping this information from her was a strategic choice to prevent Ms. Côté from being on her guard. The trial judge found that the questions posed and verifications undertaken clearly demonstrated that the goal of the investigation was not to acquire information, but rather to clarify the appellant's participation in the crime. He had the impression that the police officers did not want to admit certain facts because they were afraid that their admissions would lead the court to conclude that Ms. Côté was detained within the meaning of s. 10 of the Charter and that she should have been appropriately cautioned. Specifically, he found Constable Mathieu's claim — that if Ms. Côté had wanted to leave, he would have had no choice but to let her go — to be unbelievable. Accordingly, the trial judge found that Ms. Côté's right under s. 10(a) of the Charter to be informed promptly of the reasons for her detention was violated until she was warned as an [TRANSLATION] "important witness" at 5:23 a.m. (para. 229). He also found that her rights under s. 10(b) to retain and instruct counsel upon detention and to be advised of that right were violated.

[19] At 2:20 a.m. Constable Tremblay spoke to Detective Christian Houle who told him that it would be preferable to bring Ms. Côté to the police station so that she could make a statement given that she was an important person with respect to the incident. At 2:34 a.m. Constables Tremblay and Mathieu took the appellant to the Nicolet police station, giving her the explanation provided by Detective Houle. She remained in the company of Constable Mathieu from her arrival at the police station at 2:54 a.m. until around 4:00 a.m. On a number of occasions, the appellant asked why she was there, why these steps were being taken and why she was not left at home. She was told that she was an important witness, she was more familiar with her spouse than the police were and it was important for the police to figure out what had happened to Mr. Hogue. At 4:10 a.m. the appellant was asked to write down her version of the evening's events. At 5:23 a.m. Detective Sylvain Bellemare gave the appellant her first warning as an important witness in the attempted murder of André Hogue.

[20] To briefly recap, the appellant's detention began at 12:27 a.m. but the police failed to caution her until 5:23 a.m. and at that point, they only cautioned her as an important witness rather than as a suspect. This violated her s. 10(a) and (b) rights. The trial judge was very troubled by the fact that throughout their interactions with the appellant, the police constantly minimized her actual legal situation to her and kept her ignorant of the information essential to the exercise of her constitutional rights. He found that they had deliberately failed to caution her correctly and he found this behaviour to be illustrative of a constant and systematic attitude evident throughout their interactions with Ms. Côté.

[21] After the appellant was questioned, Constable Mathieu stayed inside the house with her while Constable Tremblay established a security perimeter around the property at 1:15 a.m. At 2:05 a.m. Constables Fortier and Kelly Bellerive arrived on the scene and walked around the property with Constable Tremblay. The trial judge found this to be a warrantless search that violated the appellant's s. 8 rights.

(h) Enlargement of Security Perimeter

[22] At 3:10 a.m. Detective Sergeant Luc Briand asked Constable Fortier to enlarge the security perimeter established earlier by Constable Tremblay. Between 3:30 and 3:45 a.m. Constable Fortier expanded the perimeter and took advantage of this opportunity to further search the property. During this search, Constable Fortier observed at least one hole in the gazebo's mosquito screen with the fibres pointing inwards towards the gazebo; a small hole in the interior window of the solarium; a large hole in the exterior window of the solarium; powder residue on the interior of the solarium window; two small holes in the solarium's mosquito screen; and shards of glass on the ground underneath the solarium window. The trial judge found that this constituted an unauthorized perimeter search.

(i) Issuance of Telewarrants

[23] At 5:15 a.m. Detective Sergeant Briand drafted requests for telewarrants (a telewarrant for the recording of the 9-1-1 call, a general telewarrant and a search and seizure telewarrant) indicating that he had reasonable and probable grounds to believe that a criminal act, specifically attempted murder with a firearm, had occurred on the night of July 22 at the appellant's home. He indicated that he had reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the shot had been fired from inside the residence.

[24] The trial judge noted that Detective Sergeant Briand had failed to fully and frankly disclose all material facts in the Information to Obtain a Search Warrant ("ITO"). For instance, para. 5 of the ITO was misleading because it suggested that some of the observations regarding the solarium and gazebo had been made inadvertently, thereby concealing the fact that Constable Fortier had already made a number of those observations during an earlier unconstitutional search with Constable Tremblay. The trial judge was also troubled by the fact that Detective Sergeant Briand failed to mention the illegal search conducted by Constables Tremblay and Mathieu earlier that evening and the fact that they had refrained from disclosing the bullet wound to Ms. Côté.

[25] The general telewarrant and the search and seizure telewarrant were executed on July 23, 2006 at 10:35 a.m. at the appellant's house by Detective Sergeant Briand and Constable Alain Gaucher. While searching the house they located a .10 calibre gun in a case in the bedroom closet and a .22 calibre rifle, not in a case in a basement closet. The trial judge noted that the gun found in the basement closet was the same calibre as the bullet recovered from the victim's skull.

[26] The trial judge held that the general telewarrant and the search and seizure telewarrant were invalid. He found that the police must have identified a problem in Constables Tremblay, Mathieu and Fortier's interventions and sought the warrants to remedy the unconstitutional conduct. He concluded that the warrants were invalid because if the unconstitutionally obtained information was excised from the ITO, the remaining information (paras. 1-3 and 8) did not constitute "some evidence that might reasonably be believed on the basis of which the authorization could have issued" (para. 266, citing R. v. Araujo, 2000 SCC 65, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 992, at para. 51). He also held that the warrants were invalid on the basis of non-disclosure of relevant information as well as the inclusion of deliberately misleading information, such as the wording in para. 5 of the ITO that suggested that Constable Fortier had inadvertently made certain observations while extending the security perimeter when in fact he had made most of those observations earlier while unconstitutionally searching the property with Constable Tremblay. Relying on R. v. Grant, 1993 CanLII 68 (SCC), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 223, at pp. 254-55 ("Grant 1993"), the trial judge concluded that the entire search process was tainted by the warrantless perimeter searches which violated s. 8.

(j) First Police Warning

[27] As mentioned above, the appellant was cautioned and advised of her right to counsel at 5:23 a.m. by Detective Bellemare. This was the first time she was so advised even though she had been detained since 12:27 a.m. At that, she was only cautioned as an “important witness” in the attempted murder of André Hogue. Detective Bellemare used a standard police warning form but struck out the words [TRANSLATION] “arrested or detained” and replaced them with “witness” (evidence of Detective Bellemare, A.R., vol. V, at p. 192). It is notable that the police cautioned the appellant as an important witness at 5:23 a.m. when they had sworn an ITO at 5:15 a.m. stating that they had reasonable and probable grounds to believe that attempted murder had been committed. Given the information that the police possessed at 5:23 a.m., the trial judge found it inexplicable that they only warned Ms. Côté as an important witness. After being warned, she spoke with a lawyer and invoked her right to silence. She then described the day’s events to Detective Bellemare and at 5:56 a.m. was placed under arrest for attempted murder. She was cautioned again, advised of her right to counsel and spoke with a lawyer for a second time.

(k) Interrogation

[28] After the appellant was placed under arrest for attempted murder at 5:56 a.m., she was transferred to a different police station. After sleeping an hour and eating, she was interrogated first by Detective Bellemare and later by Detective Pierre Samson. At the outset of her interrogation, the appellant exhibited extreme anxiety about having the interrogation room door closed and appeared claustrophobic. She also seemed to be exhausted and on several occasions told the interrogator that she had had enough, she did not want to talk anymore or she wanted to go lie down. She reaffirmed her right to silence over 20 times after consulting various lawyers. At 8:00 p.m. she was advised of Mr. Hogue’s death and placed under arrest for murder. This ended her interrogation.

[29] The trial judge concluded that the appellant’s right to silence had been systematically violated. He noted that she had been wakened in the middle of the night in the absence of any sort of urgency, the police had deliberately put off warning her appropriately and she was exhausted, claustrophobic and had exercised her right to silence on numerous occasions.

[30] He also faulted the police for having denigrated the work of defence counsel, telling the appellant that she had more life experience than her lawyer and that she was the only person who could help herself. The investigator also counselled her on exercising her right to silence. He told her that if she had planned the murder, like a member of an organized gang would have, he would advise her to remain silent because she would be in serious trouble in that kind of situation. However, given that her situation was very different, the investigator suggested that she need not remain silent. The investigator also suggested that if she had committed an armed robbery he would advise her to remain silent, but again, her circumstances were quite different. In light of this specific behaviour, the whole of the police investigation and the general context of a systematic violation of Ms. Côté's constitutional rights, the trial judge was not convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the videotaped statement was made freely and voluntarily.

(l) Police Testimony at Trial

[31] The trial judge made strong, unfavourable findings about the credibility of the police officers' testimony at trial. He did not believe Constables Tremblay, Mathieu and Fortier, characterizing their evidence as lacking in frankness and sincerity. He found that these officers tried to present their intervention at the appellant's house as routine, a simple follow-up to the 9-1-1 call and a verification of the premises, which downplayed their knowledge that Mr. Hogue had likely suffered a bullet wound to the back of the head and that they were conducting a criminal investigation. He also noted that police witnesses refused to admit obvious facts and offered improbable hypotheses to the court. The trial judge had the impression that the officers did this because they did not want him to conclude that Ms. Côté was detained and should have been properly cautioned. As mentioned above, the trial judge found Constable Mathieu's assertion that Ms. Côté was not detained and could have left the police station at any point to be implausible. He found the officers' evidence that the appellant had not been told about the possible gunshot wound because it had not yet been confirmed to be equally unbelievable. Generally, he found that the officers' attitude during their testimony, primarily Constable Tremblay but also Constables Mathieu and Fortier, established that they did not want to admit that one investigative avenue implicated Ms. Côté in the attempted murder of Mr. Hogue.

[32] The trial judge also found that police witnesses tried to downplay the importance of certain evidence. Specifically, they tried to minimize the importance of the information transmitted to them from Dr. Elazhary, illustrated by the fact that Constable Mathieu maintained that the appellant was not detained and was free to leave at any time. The police officers also downplayed the issue of whether the holes in the window of the solarium were bullet holes and claimed that it was important to investigate whether a shot could have come from the river behind the gazebo when this hypothesis was inconsistent with the evidence they had already found. He concluded that the frankness and sincerity that is expected of police officers charged with applying the law was unfortunately lacking in this case.

(m) Serious and Systematic Violation of Charter Rights

[33] The trial judge was troubled by the police conduct throughout the investigation; he found that it demonstrated a blatant disregard for the appellant's Charter rights. He found that the breaches of the appellant's rights with respect to search and seizure were extremely serious, [TRANSLATION] "flagrant and systematic" (para. 337). They were not, in his view, the product of isolated errors in judgment on the part of the police, but rather were part of a larger pattern of disregard of the rights guaranteed by the Charter. He found that the police had not acted in good faith.

(n) Exclusion of the Evidence

[34] Balancing the interests of the state in discovering the truth and the integrity of the administration of justice, the trial judge found that no other result than exclusion of the evidence would prevent further discrediting of the administration of justice. He therefore concluded that the admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute and excluded the oral and written statements given by the appellant, the evidence obtained as a result of the warranted searches at the appellant's home and the observations made by police officers with respect to the exterior of the house before the warrants were issued. In making his decision, he emphasized that the crime in question was serious, that there was a strong societal interest in adjudicating the charge on its merits and recognized that his decision was particularly difficult because it led to the appellant's acquittal.

B. Court of Appeal, 2010 QCCA 303 (CanLII)

[35] The Court of Appeal found that the trial judge was right to exclude the appellant's statements to police as the police seriously undermined the advice given by Ms. Côté's lawyers in obtaining those statements and this behaviour could not be sanctioned by a court. The Crown conceded, by and large, that the police had committed a number of violations, and that they were serious. It also conceded that the videotaped statements ought to be excluded. However, the court concluded that the trial judge had erred by excluding the observations police made of the exterior of the appellant's home before the warrants were issued as well as the physical evidence obtained at the appellant's home in execution of the two telewarrants.

[36] The Court of Appeal explained that the only issue before it was the admissibility of reliable derivative evidence. In R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 353, this Court referred to derivative evidence as "physical evidence discovered as a result of an unlawfully obtained statement" (para. 116). The Court of Appeal seemed to characterize all of the physical evidence obtained at the scene as derivative evidence in this sense. The Court of Appeal noted that the trial judge had not had the benefit of this Court's decisions in Grant and R. v. Harrison, 2009 SCC 34, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 494, and that these decisions had changed the law in this area. In Grant, the Court stated that in determining whether to exclude evidence under s. 24(2) of the Charter, a court must assess and weigh the following three factors: (1) the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct; (2) the impact of the breach on the Charter-protected interests of the accused; and (3) society's interest in the adjudication of the case on the merits (para. 71). The Court of Appeal explained that while derivative evidence was often excluded where an accused's constitutional rights were seriously violated, Grant now required the judge "to consider whether admission of derivative evidence obtained through a Charter breach would bring the administration of justice into disrepute" (para. 33, citing Grant, at para. 118). The Court of Appeal examined the three factors relevant to the s. 24(2) determination, as set out in Grant.

[37] With respect to the first factor (the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct), the Court of Appeal acknowledged the trial judge's finding that the Charter violations were serious and that the police had systematically violated Ms. Côté's Charter rights. However, it concluded that the police officers had not deliberately acted in an abusive manner.

[38] Regarding the second factor (the effect of the violation on the accused's rights), it found that the accused had been seriously affected by a series of police errors. However, the Court of Appeal highlighted the fact that the evidence could have been discovered lawfully without the appellant's participation because the police could have obtained a search warrant. It held that a warrant would have been issued on the basis of the 9-1-1 call and the finding of a bullet in the deceased's head which had entered from the rear, thus eliminating any possibility of suicide. Relying on Grant, at para. 122, the Court of Appeal noted that discoverability "retains a useful role . . . in assessing the actual impact of the breach on the protected interests of the accused" because the possibility of independent discovery of derivative evidence would mitigate the impact of a Charter violation on an accused person (para. 43). The discoverability of the evidence was therefore relevant to the analysis of the second factor. The Court of Appeal held that the admission of the physical evidence would not affect the fairness of the trial or bring the administration of justice into disrepute because the evidence and observations could have otherwise been discovered had the police obtained a warrant when they had grounds to do so.

[39] With respect to the third factor (society's interest in the resolution of the charge on its merits), the court explained that the physical evidence which the trial judge had excluded (e.g. the hole in the gazebo's mosquito screen, the holes in the solarium window, the traces of blood and the firearm registered in the victim's name) was essential to the Crown's case as it included all of the evidence from the scene. The Court of Appeal also underlined that the evidence was reliable. The court found that society's interest in having an adjudication on the merits was extremely important given the seriousness of the alleged crime.

[40] The Court of Appeal took the view that the exclusion of the physical evidence, rather than its inclusion, would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. In the Court of Appeal's opinion, all of the physical evidence from the scene would have been discovered without the appellant's assistance, the crime was very serious and the police officers had not deliberately acted in an abusive manner. The court explained that while the police officers' respect for the appellant's constitutional rights had been somewhat fragmented and that the trial judge had not found them to be credible witnesses, they did not intend to act prejudicially (pas eu d'attitude attentatoire) (para. 47). Accordingly, the court held that the physical evidence and observations made at the appellant's home should not have been excluded and it allowed the appeal and ordered a new trial.

C. Issues

[41] The appellant challenges the Court of Appeal's decision to admit the physical evidence and the evidence concerning the police observations at her home. The Crown concedes, as it must, that the police committed serious breaches of the appellant's constitutional and legal rights. The Crown also does not contest the trial judge's decision to exclude the appellant's statements made to police. However, the Crown supports the Court of Appeal's decision to admit the police observations and the physical evidence obtained at the appellant's home.

[42] The Court of Appeal intervened principally on the basis that the evidence observed or collected at the scene could have been discovered lawfully without the appellant's participation. The Court of Appeal also justified its intervention by suggesting that the police had not deliberately acted in an abusive manner and by emphasizing the seriousness of the offence. It relied on these considerations in re-balancing the relevant lines of inquiry under s. 24(2) and in concluding that the repute of the administration of justice required the admission of some of the evidence. The appeal thus raises two main issues:

1. Did the Court of Appeal err in intervening on the bases that the police had not deliberately acted in an abusive manner and that the offence was serious?
2. Did the Court of Appeal err in intervening on the basis that the evidence was "discoverable"?

III. Analysis

[43] Before discussing the main issues in this case, I will briefly set out the standard of review and the factors relevant to a s. 24(2) determination, as described in Grant and its companion cases.

A. Standard of Review

[44] The standard of review of a trial judge's s. 24(2) determination of what would bring the administration of justice into disrepute having regard to all of the circumstances is not controversial. It was set out by this Court in Grant and recently affirmed in R. v. Beaulieu, 2010 SCC 7, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 248. Where a trial judge has considered the proper factors and has not made any unreasonable finding, his or her determination is owed considerable deference on appellate review (Grant, at para. 86, and Beaulieu, at para. 5).

B. The Grant Analysis

[45] This Court established a revised approach to the exclusion of evidence under s. 24(2) in Grant. It explained that s. 24(2) was generally concerned with “whether the overall reputation of the justice system, viewed in the long term, will be adversely affected by admission of the evidence” (para. 68). As noted earlier, this Court held that three avenues of inquiry were relevant to an assessment of whether the admission of evidence obtained in breach of the Charter would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. A court's role when addressing an application to exclude evidence under s. 24(2) is to balance the assessments under each of these lines of inquiry and determine, based on all of the circumstances, whether the admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[46] In setting out this new framework, this Court made it clear that while these lines of inquiry did not precisely track the categories of considerations set out in the earlier jurisprudence, they did capture the factors relevant to the s. 24(2) determination that had been set out in the earlier cases. In Beaulieu, Charron J., writing for the Court, emphasized this point, noting that Grant did not change the relevant factors in the s. 24(2) analysis.

[47] The first line of inquiry involves an evaluation of the seriousness of the state conduct. The more serious the state conduct constituting the Charter breach, the greater the need for courts to distance themselves from that conduct by excluding evidence linked to the conduct. The second line of inquiry deals with the seriousness of the impact of the Charter violation on the Charter-protected interests of the accused. The impact may range from that resulting from a minor technical breach to that following a profoundly intrusive violation. The more serious the impact on the accused's constitutional rights, the more the admission of the evidence is likely to bring the administration of justice into disrepute. The third line of inquiry is concerned with society's interest in an adjudication on the merits. It asks whether the truth-seeking function of the criminal process would be better served by the admission or exclusion of the evidence. The reliability of the evidence and its importance to the prosecution's case are key factors. Admitting unreliable evidence will not serve the accused's fair trial interests nor the public's desire to uncover the truth. On the other hand, excluding reliable evidence may undermine the truth-seeking function of the justice system and render the trial unfair from the public's perspective. The importance of the evidence to the Crown's case is corollary to the inquiry into reliability. Admitting evidence of questionable reliability is more likely to bring the administration of justice into disrepute where it forms the whole of the prosecution's case, but excluding highly reliable evidence may more negatively affect the truth-seeking function of the criminal law process where the effect is to "gut" the prosecution's case.

[48] After considering these factors, a court must then balance the assessments under each of these avenues of inquiry in making its s. 24(2) determination. There is no "overarching rule" that governs how a court must strike this balance (Grant, at para. 86). Rather, "[t]he evidence on each line of inquiry must be weighed in the balance, to determine whether, having regard to all the circumstances, admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute" (Harrison, at para. 36). No one consideration should be permitted to consistently trump other considerations. For instance, as this Court explained in Harrison, the seriousness of the offence and the reliability of the evidence should not be permitted to “overwhelm” the s. 24(2) analysis because this “would deprive those charged with serious crimes of the protection of the individual freedoms afforded to all Canadians under the Charter and, in effect, declare that in the administration of the criminal law ‘the ends justify the means’” (para. 40, citing 2008 ONCA 85, 89 O.R. (3d) 161, at para. 150, per Cronk J.A., dissenting). In all cases, courts must assess the long-term repute of the administration of justice.

C. First Issue

[49] I turn to the first of the two issues raised on appeal: Did the Court of Appeal err in intervening on the bases that the police had not deliberately acted in an abusive manner and that the offence was serious?

[50] As explained above, the Court of Appeal found that the trial judge had erred in excluding the physical evidence located at the scene. It based its conclusion, in part, on the fact that the police did not intend to act prejudicially nor had they deliberately acted in an abusive manner. It also based this conclusion on the fact that the offence in question was serious. In my respectful view, appellate intervention was not warranted on either of these grounds.

(1) Re-characterization of Police Conduct

[51] The Court of Appeal found that the police did not intend to act prejudicially nor had they deliberately acted in an abusive manner. This constituted a re-characterization of the evidence that was not open to the Court of Appeal. The trial judge made numerous findings to the contrary, specifically that the Charter violations were extremely serious, the police had not acted in good faith, the police had demonstrated a continuous and systematic disregard for the appellant’s Charter-protected rights and had persisted in their misconduct by misleading a judicial officer in obtaining search warrants, by failing to be frank and sincere in their testimony and by trying to justify their actions on untenable grounds. The Court of Appeal, respectfully, exceeded its role by its re-characterization of the evidence which departed from express findings by the trial judge which are not tainted by any clear and determinative error. The Court of Appeal should not have substituted its own view of the police conduct for that of the trial judge.

[52] The respondent spent a considerable portion of its written argument trying to persuade this Court that the trial judge's findings about the nature of the police conduct were unreasonable. The respondent submits that the trial judge went too far in his criticism of the police. More specifically, the respondent submits that it was unreasonable for the trial judge to conclude that the Charter violations committed by the police were flagrant without considering the dynamic and evolving nature of the situation. It also submits that the trial judge erred in failing to conclude that the police were faced with a situation of urgency that required immediate action from the patrolling officers. I would not accede to these attempts to reverse the trial judge's findings of fact. A trial judge's findings of fact on a voir dire concerning the admissibility of evidence must be respected unless they are tainted by clear and determinative error. The trial judge made clear findings that from virtually the moment that the police arrived at the appellant's residence, they believed that she was a suspect; he concluded that the police knew that the person they were meeting was susceptible to being involved in the death of Mr. Hogue. I also note that the trial judge made a clear finding that the officers were not exercising their investigative powers arising from the 9-1-1 call when they came to Ms. Côté's house. Rather, he found that their purpose was to conduct a criminal investigation by speaking with an obvious suspect. The trial judge made these clear findings of fact based on his first-hand assessment of the officers' credibility by observing their testimony in court. There is no basis disclosed for interfering with the trial judge's numerous conclusions with respect to the police conduct and I thus decline to interfere with his findings.

(2) Seriousness of the Offence

[53] The Court of Appeal also emphasized that the offence in question was serious in grounding its conclusion that the trial judge was wrong to exclude the physical evidence obtained from the appellant's residence. This relates to the third branch of the Grant analysis that deals with society's interest in an adjudication on the merits. Under this branch, relevant, reliable evidence that is crucial to the prosecution's case will often point towards admission, though these considerations will have to be balanced against other relevant factors. The seriousness of the offence, however, has the potential to "cut both ways" and will not always weigh in favour of admission (Grant, at para. 84). While society has a greater interest in seeing a serious offence prosecuted, it has an equivalent interest in ensuring that the judicial system is above reproach, particularly when the stakes are high for the accused person.

[54] The Court of Appeal thus erred in reweighing the impact of the seriousness of the offence. This consideration was fully addressed by the trial judge who was painfully aware of the seriousness of the offence and of the consequences of excluding the evidence. At para. 339 of his reasons, the trial judge acknowledged the seriousness of the offence, and at para. 340, he noted that the more serious the offence, the greater the likelihood that the administration of justice would be brought into disrepute by its exclusion, especially where the evidence was essential to a conviction. It is clear that the trial judge took this factor into account in his s. 24(2) determination and the Court of Appeal was therefore unjustified in simply assigning it greater importance.

[55] The respondent submits that the trial judge erred in failing to consider the reliability of the evidence and that this affected his weighing under the third factor of the s. 24(2) analysis. While I acknowledge that the trial judge did not expressly state that the evidence was reliable, he was of course fully aware of the nature of the evidence that was the subject of his order of exclusion. The evidence was reliable in the sense that it was objective and material and this would certainly have been obvious to the trial judge, who described all of the evidence at length in his reasons. The respondent's argument also overlooks the fact that the trial judge's decision predates this Court's judgment in Grant and thus may have been couched in different terms. I do not accept the respondent's submission that the trial judge failed to consider the reliability of the evidence and that this affected his s. 24(2) determination.

[56] To conclude, the Court of Appeal erred in interfering with the trial judge's s. 24(2) determination on the basis that the police did not deliberately act abusively; they did, as the trial judge found. It should also not have interfered with the trial judge's s. 24(2) determination by assigning greater importance to the seriousness of the offence when the trial judge was fully aware of and properly weighed this factor. The Court of Appeal should not have simply substituted its weighing of these factors for that of the trial judge given that he clearly considered them according to correct legal principles.

D. Second Issue

[57] I now turn to the second of the two issues raised on appeal: Did the Court of Appeal err in intervening on the basis that the evidence was “discoverable”?

(1) The Court of Appeal’s Reliance on Discoverability

[58] As noted, the Court of Appeal was also convinced that the physical evidence (all of which it described as [TRANSLATION] “derivative evidence”) should not have been excluded because it could have been obtained legally by warrant, without the appellant’s participation (para. 33). Indeed, as I read the court’s reasons, this was the principal basis for its appellate intervention. The Court of Appeal’s emphasis on the discoverability of the evidence affected its weighing of the s. 24(2) factors, in particular the second one concerning the impact of the violation on the accused’s rights. The court was of the view that the impact of the violations was attenuated because the evidence could have been lawfully obtained and, accordingly, its admission would not affect trial fairness nor bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[59] The trial judge was alive to this issue. He commented at para. 347 of his reasons that it was possible, even probable, that the police could have pursued their investigation effectively and in a constitutional manner had they respected simple and elementary principles governing their actions.

[60] Analysis of the Court of Appeal’s treatment of discoverability requires that the following questions be answered:

- (a) Did the development of the law in Grant and its companion cases justify appellate intervention?
- (b) What is the principle of discoverability and how does it affect the s. 24(2) analysis under Grant and its companion cases?
- (c) Did the Court of Appeal err in its treatment of discoverability in the s. 24(2) analysis in this case?

[61] I will address these questions in turn.

- (a) Did the Development of the Law in Grant and Its Companion Cases Justify Appellate Intervention?

[62] The Court of Appeal was of the view that Grant and its companion cases, decided after the trial judge's ruling, had changed the law with respect to the admission of reliable derivative evidence. By "derivative evidence", the Court of Appeal meant physical evidence discovered as a result of an unlawfully obtained statement. In its broader sense, evidence is "derivative" when it is discovered as a result of other unconstitutionally obtained evidence. Under the trial fairness rationale in R. v. Collins, 1987 CanLII 84 \(SCC\), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265, derivative evidence obtained as a result of unconstitutional conscription, that is, compelled self-incrimination at the behest of the state of the accused against him or herself, was generally excluded — because of its presumed impact on trial fairness — unless it would have been independently discovered. The Court of Appeal noted that now, as a result of Grant and its companion cases, the admissibility of such evidence is to be assessed on the same basis as all other evidence by asking whether its admission would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. The Court of Appeal seemed to suggest that because derivative evidence of a conscriptive nature was more likely to have been excluded under the pre-Grant framework, it was necessary to redo the s. 24(2) analysis using the revised Grant approach.

[63] The fundamental difficulty with the court's reasoning, in my respectful view, is this: the trial judge did not refer to the fact that this was conscriptive evidence, nor did he suggest that the case for exclusion was stronger because of that. It is therefore difficult for me to see how the trial judge showed any concern that the evidence ought to be excluded because it was conscriptive. Thus, the trial judge did not place any weight on the conscriptive character of the evidence and it did not appear to affect his analysis in any way. In any event, the Court of Appeal erred by characterizing all of the evidence as being derivative of an unlawfully obtained statement when in fact very little of it was. Only the two guns potentially constitute "derivative" evidence in the narrow sense described by the Court of Appeal, as the appellant had informed Constables Tremblay and Mathieu of their presence in the house. Although she only showed police the gun located in the bedroom, she nevertheless told them that a second gun existed. More importantly, I am of the view that the Court of Appeal erred in its analysis of the doctrine of discoverability as it applies in this case.

(b) What Is the Principle of Discoverability and How Does It Affect the Section 24(2) Analysis Under Grant and Its Companion Cases?

[64] The principle of discoverability was developed under the Collins/Stillman framework of analysis and has traditionally been applied to derivative evidence obtained as a result of the breach of an accused's right against self-incrimination: see Collins, and R. v. Stillman, 1997 CanLII 384 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 607. According to the Collins trial fairness rationale, admitting evidence derived from unconstitutional self-incrimination not only further undermined the accused's right not to be conscripted against him or herself, but it also could be seen as undermining the fairness of the accused's trial at which, of course, he or she is presumed innocent and is not a compellable witness. The fact that the evidence could have been discovered without the accused's participation — in other words that it was discoverable — was considered relevant and often determinative to the s. 24(2) analysis because that fact attenuated the impact of the unconstitutional actions on the accused's right against self-incrimination and his or her fair trial rights. The state would have been able to collect the evidence without the accused's participation, and the fact that the evidence would have been discovered without infringing the accused's right against self-incrimination weakens the causal link between the Charter breach and obtaining the evidence.

[65] In Grant, this Court established a more flexible, multi-factored approach to the exclusion of evidence under s. 24(2). The earlier Collins/Stillman framework had been criticized for being too categorical; exclusion seemed to be virtually automatic if the evidence was found to be conscriptive and not otherwise discoverable. However, Grant affirmed that discoverability remains relevant to the s. 24(2) analysis, explaining as follows:

Discoverability retains a useful role, however, in assessing the actual impact of the breach on the protected interests of the accused. It allows the court to assess the strength of the causal connection between the Charter-infringing self-incrimination and the resultant evidence. The more likely it is that the evidence would have been obtained even without the statement, the lesser the impact of the breach on the accused's underlying interest against self-incrimination. The converse, of course, is also true. On the other hand, in cases where it cannot be determined with any confidence whether evidence would have been discovered in absence of the statement, discoverability will have no impact on the s. 24(2) inquiry. [para. 122]

[66] The concept of discoverability has been used in relation to derivative evidence to indicate that the police could have obtained the same evidence without unconstitutionally conscripting the accused or that the evidence would have inevitably been discovered without reference to that conscription: Stillman, at para. 107; R. v. Colarusso, 1994 CanLII 134 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 20, at p. 77. However, I will use the term “discoverability” to refer to situations where unconstitutionally obtained evidence of any nature could have been obtained by lawful means had the police chosen to adopt them. Viewed in this fashion, discoverability has, in appropriate circumstances, a useful role to play in the s. 24(2) analysis where the interest at stake is one other than self-incrimination.

[67] In the pre-Grant case law, the fact that unconstitutionally obtained evidence, even though not conscriptive, could have been obtained by constitutional means was considered in the s. 24(2) analysis. Discoverability had two main effects on the analysis: first, the fact that the evidence could have been obtained properly in some circumstances tended to make the Charter breach more serious, particularly, for example, in cases in which the police simply ignored the requirement of prior authorization for a search. On the other hand, in some circumstances, the fact that the police actually had reasonable and probable grounds to search, although they did not obtain a warrant, tended to lessen the seriousness of the breach.

[68] R. v. Buhay, 2003 SCC 30, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 631, is a good example of how discoverability can, in simple language, cut both ways. There, the police searched a locker. One officer said that the idea of getting a warrant did not even cross his mind, while another said he did not consider obtaining a warrant because he thought he lacked sufficient grounds. The Court endorsed the conclusion of the trial judge that the officer who failed even to consider getting a warrant had demonstrated a “casual attitude” towards the appellant’s Charter rights and that the other officer’s decision to proceed with the search because he thought he did not have sufficient grounds to obtain a warrant suggested a blatant disregard for the appellant’s rights which was fatal to a claim of good faith: paras. 60-61. On the other hand, this Court acknowledged that the officer probably did in fact have sufficient grounds to obtain a warrant and that the existence in fact of reasonable and probable grounds to conduct the search has on many occasions been considered as lessening the seriousness of the violation. In the end, the Court accepted that the trial judge had reasonably concluded that the breach was serious and that his assessment should not have been interfered with on appeal: see generally paras. 52-56.

[69] Discoverability remains a relevant factor under the current s. 24(2) analysis. R. v. Nolet, 2010 SCC 24, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 851, is an example. Binnie J., writing for the Court, found that the fact that non-bodily physical evidence obtained in breach of an accused’s s. 8 right would otherwise have been discovered was one of the points favouring the admissibility rather than the exclusion of the evidence.

[70] While discoverability may still play a useful role in the s. 24(2) analysis, it is not determinative. A finding of discoverability should not be seen as necessarily leading to admission of evidence. Nor should courts engage in speculation. As stated in Grant, where it cannot be determined with any confidence whether evidence would have been discovered in the absence of the Charter breach, discoverability will have no impact on the s. 24(2) inquiry. I will describe how, in appropriate cases, discoverability may be relevant to the first two branches of the Grant analysis.

[71] I turn to the first branch of the Grant test which is concerned with the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct. If the police officers could have conducted the search legally but failed to turn their minds to obtaining a warrant or proceeded under the view that they could not have demonstrated to a judicial officer that they had reasonable and probable grounds, the seriousness of the state conduct is heightened. As in Buhay, a casual attitude towards, or a deliberate flouting of, Charter rights will generally aggravate the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct. On the other hand, the facts that the police exhibited good faith and/or had a legitimate reason for not seeking prior judicial authorization of the search will likely lessen the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct.

[72] We come now to the effect of discoverability on the second branch of the Grant test — the impact on the Charter-protected interests of the accused. Section 8 of the Charter protects an individual's reasonable expectation of privacy. That reasonable expectation of privacy must take account of the fact that searches may occur when a judicial officer is satisfied that there are reasonable and probable grounds and authorizes the search before it is carried out. If the search could not have occurred legally, it is considerably more intrusive of the individual's reasonable expectation of privacy. On the other hand, the fact that the police could have demonstrated to a judicial officer that they had reasonable and probable grounds to believe that an offence had been committed and that there was evidence to be found at the place of the search will tend to lessen the impact of the illegal search on the accused's privacy and dignity interests protected by the Charter.

[73] This is not to say, however, that in such circumstances there is no infringement of an accused's privacy interests. A reasonable expectation of privacy protected under s. 8 of the Charter includes not only that proper grounds exist but also the requirement of prior judicial authorization. Thus the absence of a warrant when one was legally required constitutes an infringement of an accused's privacy. The intrusiveness of such an unauthorized search will be assessed according to the level of privacy that could have reasonably been expected in the given set of circumstances.

The greater the expectation of privacy, the more intrusive the unauthorized search will have been. The seriousness of the impact on the accused's Charter-protected interests will not always mirror the seriousness of the breach, i.e. the Charter-infringing state conduct. For instance, where the police acted in good faith in obtaining a warrant that was found on review not to disclose reasonable and probable grounds to believe that a crime had been committed and that there was evidence to be found at the place of the search, the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct is reduced but the impact of the search on the accused's Charter-protected interests is greater because the search could not have occurred legally.

[74] The lawful discoverability of evidence may thus be a relevant consideration when a court must determine whether to exclude evidence pursuant to s. 24(2) of the Charter. When relevant, courts should assess the effect of the discoverability of the evidence under the first and second Grant lines of inquiry in light of all of the circumstances.

(c) Did the Court of Appeal Err in Its Treatment of Discoverability in the Section 24(2) Analysis in This Case?

[75] The Court of Appeal found that all of the physical evidence gathered on the premises, such as the observations of the perforations in the mosquito screen and solarium window, the gunpowder residue on the solarium window and the gun registered in the name of the victim, would have been discovered without the appellant's help. Duval Hesler J.A. held that the 9-1-1 call and the gunshot projectiles lodged in the back of the victim's head would have been sufficient to obtain a valid search warrant even before the first of the warrantless peripheral searches. Relying on Grant, she stated that if the derivative evidence could have been discovered independently, the effect of the violation on the accused would be lessened and this would affect the second element of the s. 24(2) inquiry. She then relied, in part, on the discoverability of the evidence to ground her conclusion that the exclusion of the evidence in this case would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[76] The finding of discoverability in this case rests on the Court of Appeal's conclusion that the police could have obtained a warrant to search the premises very early in the investigation based on finding Mr. Hogue at the residence with what was likely a bullet in the back of his head and the 9-1-1 call from the residence. While I agree with this conclusion, I part company with the Court of Appeal about the significance of this factor for the s. 24(2) analysis in this case.

[77] Before turning to the issue of discoverability in this case, I should briefly comment on what role, if any, the validity or invalidity of the telewarrants obtained by the police played in the trial judge's s. 24(2) analysis. In my view, whether or not those warrants were valid had little or no impact on the analysis here.

[78] The trial judge found that the warrants which the police ultimately obtained were unlawful. In his view, when the unconstitutionally obtained material was excised from the ITO, what remained was insufficient. The Court of Appeal did not address this conclusion directly, noting simply that the grounds to obtain a warrant existed much earlier, which would have permitted the police to obtain all of the observations and physical evidence legally. In this Court, the Crown argued that the trial judge's ruling about the validity of the warrants was in error. However, even if the warrants were valid, this could have little if any effect on the trial judge's decision to exclude the physical evidence. The trial judge relied on the fact that the totality of the search process was tainted by the unconstitutional searches that preceded the issuance of the warrants.

[79] This finding is consistent with well-established case law. Grant 1993 provides a good example of how illegal warrantless searches can taint a subsequent search that is otherwise lawful. In that case, the information obtained through the warrantless perimeter search was used to support the police's application for search warrants. This Court held that once the illegally obtained information was excised from the affidavits presented to the issuing justice, the information that remained was sufficient to issue the warrants. While this Court held that the warrants were valid, it found that the illegal searches "were nevertheless an integral component in a series of investigative tactics which led to the unearthing of the evidence in question". It was thus "unrealistic to view the perimeter searches as severable from the total investigatory process which culminated in discovery of the impugned evidence" (p. 255). Similarly, in the case at bar, given the trial judge's findings of fact that the police misconduct was continual and systematic from the outset of the investigation, the question of exclusion must not be approached in a compartmentalized fashion.

[80] I now turn to the impact of discoverability on the exclusion of evidence in this case.

[81] With respect to the first branch of the analysis, it is clear that the trial judge considered the officers' misconduct to be very serious. Like in Grant 1993, the collection of the evidence in this case was simply an extension of the earlier warrantless searches conducted by Constables Tremblay, Mathieu and Fortier; there was clearly a connection between the earlier breaches and the evidence obtained pursuant to the warrants. Moreover, by the time the warrants were obtained in this case, there had been multiple, serious and deliberate breaches of the appellant's rights. As mentioned earlier, the trial judge found it shocking that the police had not sought a search warrant earlier that evening or obtained the appellant's free and informed consent to enter her home. He was also troubled by the fact that the police had constantly minimized, to the appellant, her true legal situation and found this disregard for her Charter rights to be part of a systematic attitude evident throughout their dealings with Ms. Côté. He also found that obtaining the evidence pursuant to the warranted searches was part of a larger pattern of disregard for Ms. Côté's Charter-protected rights. Given that this evidence was tainted by the earlier Charter breaches that involved serious police misconduct, it is obvious that nothing turned on the trial judge's conclusion with respect to the validity of the warrants.

[82] The fact that the police could have demonstrated to a judicial officer that they had reasonable and probable grounds to believe that an offence had been committed and that there was evidence to be found at the place of the search but did not do so, in the circumstances of this case, significantly aggravated the seriousness of their misconduct. The trial judge found that no police officer seemed preoccupied with the absence of a search warrant (a warrant was not even prepared until over five hours after the initial police intervention) or the inherent limits recognized by courts for proceeding without a warrant. The trial judge was particularly troubled by the fact that the search occurred during the night, at a very late hour, and in a dwelling house, typically a place where individuals have the greatest expectation of privacy.

[83] The police misconduct in obtaining the warrants further aggravated the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct. The trial judge concluded that the warrants were actually sought as an ill-conceived scheme to attempt to remedy the unconstitutionality of the prior searches and that the police had misled the issuing judicial officer by failing to make full and frank disclosure of their earlier, unconstitutional conduct.

[84] The fact that the police could have demonstrated to a judicial officer that they had reasonable and probable grounds to believe that an offence had been committed and that there was evidence to be found at the place of the search is also relevant to the impact of the breach on the Charter-protected interests of the accused. If a search warrant could have been validly issued at the time the search was conducted (putting aside issues about whether the search was conducted reasonably), the intrusiveness of the illegal search arises from the fact that it was not authorized in advance by a judicial officer. This, on its own, tends to reduce the impact of this breach on the appellant's Charter-protected reasonable expectation of privacy. However, the absence of prior judicial authorization still constitutes a significant infringement of privacy. Indeed, it must not be forgotten that the purpose of the Charter's protection against unreasonable searches is to prevent them before they occur, not to sort them out from reasonable intrusions on an ex post facto analysis: R. v. Feeney, 1997 CanLII 342 (SCC), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 13, at para. 45. Thus, prior authorization is directly related to, and forms part of, an individual's reasonable expectation of privacy.

[85] Having regard to all of the circumstances, the impact of the police misconduct on the appellant's right to privacy was serious: the unauthorized search occurred in her home, a place where citizens have a very high expectation of privacy, and the search was not brief (Grant, at para. 113). The officers arrived at the appellant's home at 12:13 a.m. and the appellant only departed for the police station at 2:34 a.m. The appellant, dressed in her pyjamas, accompanied the police as they illegally searched the interior and exterior of her house in the middle of the night for not an insignificant amount of time during which she was detained without interruption. The breach was thus not “transient or trivial in its impact” and implicated her liberty, her dignity as well as her privacy interests (Harrison, at para. 28; Grant, at para. 113). The appellant certainly had a reasonable expectation of not being subjected to such an intrusive search, without lawful authorization in the middle of the night, and several hours after her spouse had been transported to the hospital. Thus, the absence of prior authorization for a search of this nature was a serious affront to her reasonable expectation of privacy.

[86] In my respectful view, the Court of Appeal was wrong to conclude that the trial judge erred in his appreciation of the seriousness of the impact on the Charter-protected interests of the accused. Even though the searches could have been conducted lawfully, this fact would not have changed the conclusion that the second branch of the Grant analysis militated in favour of exclusion, in light of the numerous other factors highlighting the serious impact on the appellant’s privacy and dignity interests.

[87] In the result, the Court of Appeal erred in attaching great weight to the fact that the evidence was discoverable because it could have been obtained lawfully. In my view, the trial judge’s assessment was not tainted by any error of law that is relevant to his ultimate conclusion or by any unreasonable finding of fact. There was therefore no basis to interfere on appeal with the trial judge’s weighing of the various factors.

[88] The trial judge analysed the admissibility of Ms. Côté’s statements and the material evidence separately. With respect to both, he found that the violations of the appellant’s rights were systematic and deliberate and that the police were less than candid even under oath in court in order to minimize the extent of their misconduct. While the misleading character of in-court police testimony does not form part of the Charter breach itself, it is a relevant factor under the first branch of the s. 24(2) analysis as a court must dissociate itself from such behaviour: Harrison, at para. 26. The trial judge was fully aware that proper investigative methods could have produced the same evidence, that the evidence was reliable and that the alleged offence was extremely serious. He also weighed the important societal interest in having the appellant’s guilt or innocence determined on the merits. He emphasized that the violations of the appellant's rights were the result of "a larger pattern of disregard for the appellant's Charter rights" (para. 346, citing R. v. Greffe, 1990 CanLII 143 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 755, at p. 796) and this sort of disregard by the police for a suspect's rights was carried through to their misleading evidence to obtain the warrants and by their conduct as witnesses before the court.

IV. Conclusion

[89] To sum up, the trial judge's decision to exclude the observations made by police at the appellant's home and the physical evidence collected pursuant to the warrants was owed deference. With respect, the Court of Appeal misconceived of its appellate role when it substituted its view of the police conduct for the trial judge's and when it placed undue emphasis on the seriousness of the offence. The Court of Appeal's holding that the police had not deliberately acted in an abusive manner was contrary to the trial judge's numerous findings of deliberate and systematic police misconduct. Its emphasis on the seriousness of the offence was also misplaced given that the trial judge had acknowledged that the offence was serious and that the seriousness of the offence had been held not to be a determinative factor. The Court of Appeal also erred in placing undue weight on the "discoverability" of the evidence in its s. 24(2) analysis. While I agree with the Court of Appeal that the police could have demonstrated to a judicial officer that they had reasonable and probable grounds to believe that an offence had been committed and that there was evidence to be found at the place of the search, this fact would not have affected the s. 24(2) analysis in all of the circumstances of this case. Both the police misconduct and its impact on the accused's Charter-protected interests were very serious, even taking discoverability into account. The trial judge was obviously and justly concerned about the continuous, deliberate and flagrant breaches of the appellant's Charter rights and this consideration played an important role in his balancing of the factors under s. 24(2). He also properly took into account the strong societal interest in having a serious criminal charge determined on its merits. His conclusion was not tainted by any error of law relevant to the ultimate conclusion and, accordingly, it should not have been set aside on appeal.

V. Disposition

[90] I would allow the appeal and restore the acquittal entered at trial.

English version of the reasons delivered by

[91] DESCHAMPS J. (dissenting) — I have read Cromwell J.’s reasons. He would restore the Superior Court’s judgment (2008 QCCS 3749 \(CanLII\)), which in his view contains no error that would justify the Court of Appeal’s decision to intervene. On the basis of the test from R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 353, I agree with the Court of Appeal (2010 QCCA 303 \(CanLII\)) that the evidence obtained without the appellant’s participation — which I will call “the physical evidence” — should not have been excluded. I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

[92] There is only one point on which my colleague Cromwell J. expressly agrees with the Court of Appeal: the police could have obtained a search warrant very early in their investigation. However, he attaches no significance to this fact because, in his view, the trial judge’s conclusions on the exclusion of the evidence were not based on the invalidity of the warrants. With respect, I believe that there are two separate issues here: first, the consequences of the trial judge’s failure to consider the possibility that a warrant could have been issued at the very beginning of the investigation; and, second, the consequences of the invalidity of the warrants issued later in the investigation. At no point in his analysis did the trial judge consider whether the physical evidence could have been discovered if a warrant had been obtained very early in the investigation. In my opinion, it is this finding by the Court of Appeal that is relevant.

[93] The trial judge rendered judgment before the decision in Grant, in which this Court revised the test from R. v. Collins, 1987 CanLII 84 \(SCC\), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265, and R. v. Stillman, 1997 CanLII 384 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 607. Although this fact would not, considered in isolation, justify reviewing a decision to exclude evidence, it is nonetheless appropriate to ask whether the judge considered all the factors on which such a decision must be based. In the case at bar, it is clear that he failed to do so.

I. Relevant Facts With Respect to the Issuance of a Warrant Very Early in the Investigation

[94] At 11:38 p.m. on July 22, 2006, Constable Jean-François Fortier received a telephone call from Sergeant François Monetta, who told him that a man with injuries to the back of his head had been taken to hospital by ambulance and that an X-ray had revealed that there was a bullet in the man's head. Sergeant Monetta gave Constable Fortier the injured man's name and the address of the residence from which he had been taken by ambulance after his spouse had found him injured there.

[95] On receiving that information, Constable Fortier, as the head of the team of four police officers on duty that night for the area in which the residence in question was located, asked Constables Tremblay and Mathieu to go to the scene to investigate.

[96] The officers arrived there at 12:13 a.m. They began by observing the house. It was not lit and there were no signs of activity. They parked at a certain distance from the house and walked up to it. They rang the doorbell and a woman opened the door. It was Ms. Côté. The officers explained that they were from the Sûreté du Québec and that they were there to find out what had happened that evening and to make sure that the premises were safe.

[97] After inspecting the interior of the residence and determining that no one other than Ms. Côté was there, Constable Tremblay went outside. He entered the gazebo, where he saw blood, or what looked like blood. Constable Mathieu and Ms. Côté joined him there. Constable Mathieu then went back inside the residence, where he noticed a hole in the glass of one of the solarium's windows. Constable Tremblay then went to the patrol car and relayed these observations to Constable Fortier. It was 12:27 a.m.

[98] I do not question the trial judge's decision to reject the prosecution's argument that the officers' purpose in searching the house was to make sure the occupants were safe. My review of the facts is based strictly on the trial judge's findings of fact and is intended to highlight the information the officers had before they arrived at Ms. Côté's residence and when they discovered the key pieces of physical evidence.

[99] It seems to me that the Court of Appeal's conclusion that a warrant could have been issued very early in the investigation is inescapable. The police were informed that a person had sustained a serious injury to the back of the head and that the injury had probably been caused by a firearm. It could not have resulted from illness, nor could it have been self-inflicted given the bullet's point of entry into the skull. In addition, the police knew the address of the residence from which the injured person had been taken by ambulance. In light of these facts, they had to discharge their duty to investigate and gather evidence related to the incident. It was therefore possible for the police to have reasonable and probable grounds to believe that evidence of an offence could be found at the place from which the victim had been taken by ambulance. Furthermore, the nature of the injury and the fact that the victim had been found on the ground could have given them reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the warrant had to be executed by night, since residue, prints and fresh tracks could have been eliminated or altered if the start of the investigation had been delayed (s. 488 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46). The Court of Appeal analysed the situation as follows (at para. 44):

[TRANSLATION] In a case such as this one, all the [physical] evidence gathered on the premises — including the holes in the gazebo window screen, the hole in the solarium window, the gunshot residue on the inside of the solarium window, the firearm registered in the victim's name and found in his home — would have been discovered without any contribution from the accused. To obtain a valid warrant to search the premises where the incident occurred, it would have been sufficient to refer to the 9-1-1 call and the bullet fragments that penetrated the victim's head from the back, eliminating the possibility of suicide and militating in favour of a serious indictable offence. It is difficult to imagine that a justice of the peace would have refused to issue a warrant in light of such assertions, if only for the purpose of obtaining an appropriate expert assessment of the scene and to perform checks that were obviously relevant, regardless of any suspicion against the accused. Consequently, in this case, the flaws detected by the trial judge in the affidavit used to obtain the general search . . . warrant are not decisive factors.

[100] To determine how to deal with the physical evidence, the Court of Appeal could not simply rely on the trial judge's overall assessment. It had no choice but to conduct the review the trial judge had failed to conduct. In my opinion, the Court of Appeal was right to conclude that the physical evidence should not have been excluded, although the way I apply Grant differs somewhat from the way the Court of Appeal applied it.

II. Application of the Grant Test

[101] In Grant, the Court established a three-stage test for determining whether evidence is admissible under s. 24(2) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. At the first stage, a court must consider the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct and “assess whether the admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute by sending a message to the public that the courts, as institutions responsible for the administration of justice, effectively condone state deviation from the rule of law by failing to dissociate themselves from the fruits of that unlawful conduct” (para. 72).

[102] At the second stage, the inquiry “focusses on the seriousness of the impact of the Charter breach on the Charter-protected interests of the accused. It calls for an evaluation of the extent to which the breach actually undermined the interests protected by the right infringed” (para. 76). It is important to determine the extent of the violation’s impact on the interests protected by the infringed right.

[103] At the third stage, having regard to the fact that “[s]ociety generally expects that a criminal allegation will be adjudicated on its merits”, the court must “[ask] whether the truth-seeking function of the criminal trial process would be better served by admission of the evidence, or by its exclusion” (para. 79). The reliability of the evidence and its importance to the prosecution’s case are factors to be considered, and all relevant circumstances must be taken into account.

[104] In determining whether the maintenance of confidence in the administration of justice would be better served by admitting the physical evidence or by excluding it, the court must balance the implications that are identified at the different stages.

[105] At the first stage of the analysis, I accept the trial judge’s conclusion that the police officers’ conduct revealed a serious disregard for Ms. Côté’s constitutional rights. The judge noted that the officers did not concern themselves with obtaining either a warrant or Ms. Côté’s informed consent before conducting their initial search. The judge seems to have believed that Ms. Côté's rights would not have been violated had experienced officers been assigned to the investigation. In some cases, the fact that an agent of the state is inexperienced may be a sign that rights have not been intentionally violated, which means that the infringement resulting from the officers' conduct would be less serious. In the instant case, however, the officers' inexperience cannot serve as an excuse, since, according to the judge, they should have known the applicable rules. Also relevant is the judge's observation that the officers' conduct was aggravated by their attempt to conceal the constitutional violations of Ms. Côté's rights by raising arguments he held to be unfounded. The police conduct in this case was such that the courts must dissociate themselves from it.

[106] At the second stage, it is clear that the trial judge did not evaluate the actual impact of the breach. The main interest affected by the unlawful police search was Ms. Côté's expectation of privacy. What must be determined is the impact on it of the failure to obtain prior authorization. To do this, the situation here must be compared with the one that would have prevailed had the search been authorized in advance. It is therefore not enough to find that the search resulted in an invasion of privacy. While that is of course relevant, it is more specifically the difference in seriousness between the intrusion that actually occurred and the one that would have occurred had a warrant been issued that reveals the "extent to which the breach actually undermined the interests protected" (Grant, at para. 76). This is the corollary of the previous findings that a warrant could have been obtained at the very beginning of the investigation and that this would have led the police to discover the physical evidence.

[107] However limited the warrant may have been, it would at the very least have authorized an examination of the gazebo and the area surrounding it. The warrant would therefore have authorized a search of both the outside and part of the inside of the house. As a result, if it is accepted that the warrant could have been issued at the start of the investigation, it must also be accepted that the resulting invasion of Ms. Côté's privacy would, in practice, have been identical to the one that resulted from the warrantless search.

[108] I therefore agree with Cromwell J. that the impact of the infringement of the right to privacy is limited to the fact that the search was not authorized by a judicial officer (para. 84). However, it seems to me that his assessment of that impact contradicts the conceptual approach that follows from this premise. To determine the seriousness of the impact of the breach, my colleague considers facts that would have existed even if the search had been authorized. That does not reveal the extent to which the expectation of privacy was actually undermined by the failure to obtain prior authorization for the search.

[109] All persons are entitled to expect the state to respect their rights, and a court cannot do anything that suggests that their rights have no value. Even where a breach has no practical consequences, the court must play a declaratory role in vindicating constitutional rights. It is this role that must be borne in mind where a duly authorized search would have had the same practical consequences (see, in the analogous context of s. 24(1) of the Charter, Vancouver (City) v. Ward, 2010 SCC 27, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 28). In the instant case, the protected right is the legitimate expectation of any person not to be subjected to a warrantless search. The standpoint from which a court assesses the impact of a breach of protected rights is therefore very different where the intrusion would have been identical had the search been authorized by a warrant. The interest that remains to be protected is what the Court in Ward referred to as “[v]indication, in the sense of affirming constitutional values” (para. 28).

[110] Protection of a person’s expectation of privacy is a fundamental requirement in the Canadian constitutional system. For this reason — and to reflect the actual scope of this expectation — it is particularly appropriate to take a nuanced approach when assessing it. The higher the expectation of privacy, the more clearly the constitutional right that protects it must be affirmed. Conversely, the lower the expectation of privacy, the lower the need for affirmation.

[111] In the case at bar, Ms. Côté was the person who called 9-1-1 and provided her address. She was the person who contacted the doctor and told him that she had found her spouse in the gazebo. She was the first and only person to whom the police officers could speak to find out what had happened in the moments before her spouse was taken away by ambulance.

Therefore, the visit from the police could hardly be said to have been unexpected. In short, not only would the intrusion have been the same with or without a warrant, but Ms. Côté did not have the highest expectation of privacy. As a result, the relevant factors at the second stage of the analysis do not weigh in favour of excluding the physical evidence.

[112] At the stage of the analysis that involves determining whether the search for truth would be better served by admitting the evidence or by excluding it, I must point out that the evidence in question was reliable physical evidence. It was found shortly after the injured person was taken away by ambulance, and it was gathered near the alleged scene of the crime. Although my colleague acknowledges that the trial judge did not speak to the reliability of the physical evidence, he assumes that the judge attached the necessary weight to this factor (para. 55). With respect, I have difficulty seeing how such a conclusion can be drawn.

[113] It is possible that the trial judge's failure to discuss the reliability of the evidence is due to the fact that he was applying the law as it stood before Grant. According to the test from Collins and Stillman, the discoverability of physical evidence was linked to the protection against self-incrimination and the assessment of trial fairness (Grant, at para. 121). Exclusion was almost automatic (Grant, at para. 64). In that context, the reliability of the evidence was of little consequence. However, one of the changes effected in Grant was in fact to move away from automatic exclusion toward an analysis in which all the circumstances would be considered. On this point, I agree with my colleague Cromwell J. that the discoverability of physical evidence may be relevant to the decision whether to exclude evidence (para. 74). The relevance of discoverability is no longer limited to the protection against self-incrimination, and it is essential to consider the reliability of the evidence.

[114] Because the trial judge did not discuss the reliability of the physical evidence, I cannot find that he considered all the relevant factors in determining whether physical evidence should be excluded. In my view, this was a serious flaw.

[115] As regards the importance of the physical evidence to the conduct of the trial, it is sufficient to note that this evidence was circumstantial. Because the statements made to the police by Ms. Côté had been excluded, it was the only remaining evidence. Its admission was therefore likely to be of crucial importance to the truth-seeking function and to the conduct of the trial.

[116] At the stage of assessing society's interest in the conduct of the trial, having regard to all the relevant facts, I see nothing that would weigh in favour of excluding the physical evidence. Although the evidence as a whole was limited by the exclusion of the statements made to the police by Ms. Côté, some reliable evidence remained that the prosecution could still have considered sufficient to conduct the trial.

[117] After completing all three stages of the analysis, the court must balance the factors that weigh in favour of and against excluding the evidence. This is a qualitative exercise and not a quantitative one (R. v. Harrison, 2009 SCC 34, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 494, at para. 36).

[118] In the instant case, the police misconduct, considered as a whole, is serious and the courts must dissociate themselves from it. However, it is possible to do so in respect of the constitutional violations in this case without excluding all the evidence. There are cases of impacts on expectations of privacy that are much more serious. Moreover, where reliable and important evidence exists, society's interest in the search for truth stands out. On the whole, I can only conclude that, in this case, it is the exclusion of the physical evidence that would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[119] For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal allowed, DESCHAMPS J. dissenting.

Solicitor for the appellant: Centre communautaire juridique de la Rive-Sud, Longueuil.

Solicitor for the respondent: Directeur des poursuites criminelles et pénales du Québec, Longueuil.

Solicitors for the intervener: Sack Goldblatt Mitchell, Toronto.

TAB 7

R. v. Conway, 2010 SCC 22 (CanLII), [2010] 1 SCR 765

Source: Supreme Court of Canada
Date: 2010-06-11
File number: 32662
Other citations: 103 OR (3d) 320 — 320 DLR (4th) 25 — 402 NR 255 —
263 OAC 61 — [2010] EXP 1926 — 255 CCC (3d) 506 —
75 CR (6th) 201 — 1 Admin LR (5th) 163 —
211 CRR (2d) 326 — 88 WCB (2d) 441 —
EYB 2010-175167 — JE 2010-1051 — [2010] SCJ No 22 (QL)
Citation: R. v. Conway, 2010 SCC 22 (CanLII), [2010] 1 SCR 765, <<https://canlii.ca/t/2b2ds>>, retrieved on 2026-03-22

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

CITATION: R. v. Conway, 2010 SCC 22, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 765

DATE: 20100611

DOCKET: 32662

BETWEEN:

Paul Conway

Appellant

and

Her Majesty The Queen and Person in charge of the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health

Respondents

- and -

Attorney General of Canada, Ontario Review Board,

Mental Health Legal Committee and Mental Health Legal

Advocacy Coalition, British Columbia Review Board,

Criminal Lawyers' Association and David Asper Centre for

Constitutional Rights, and Community Legal Assistance Society

Interveners

CORAM: McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Charron, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT: Abella J. (McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Charron, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ. concurring)
(paras. 1 to 104)

R. v. Conway, 2010 SCC 22, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 765

Paul Conway

Appellant

v.

Her Majesty The Queen and Person in charge of the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health

Respondents

and

Attorney General of Canada, Ontario Review Board,
Mental Health Legal Committee and Mental Health Legal
Advocacy Coalition, British Columbia Review Board,
Criminal Lawyers' Association and David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights, and Community Legal Assistance Society

Interveners

Indexed as: R. v. Conway

2010 SCC 22

File No.: 32662.

2009: October 22; 2010: June 11.

Present: McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Charron, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Remedies — Accused not criminally responsible by reason of mental disorder detained in mental health facility — Accused alleging violations of his constitutional rights and seeking absolute discharge as remedy under s. 24(1) of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Accused also seeking as remedy order directing mental health facility to provide him with particular treatment — Whether Review Board has jurisdiction to grant remedies under s. 24(1) of Charter — If so, whether accused entitled to remedies sought — Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, ss. 672.54, 672.55.

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Remedies — Court of competent jurisdiction — Remedial jurisdiction of administrative tribunals under s. 24(1) of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — New approach.

Criminal law — Mental disorder — Review Board — Remedial jurisdiction under Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Accused not criminally responsible by reason of mental disorder detained in mental health facility — Accused alleging violations of his constitutional rights and seeking absolute discharge as remedy under s. 24(1) of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms at his disposition hearing before Review Board — Board concluding accused was a threat to public safety and not entitled to absolute discharge under Criminal Code — Whether Review Board has jurisdiction to grant absolute discharge as remedy under s. 24(1) of Charter — If so, whether accused entitled to remedy sought — Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 672.54.

Administrative law — Boards and tribunals — Jurisdiction — Remedial jurisdiction of administrative tribunals under s. 24(1) of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — New approach.

In 1984, C was found not guilty by reason of insanity on a charge of sexual assault with a weapon. Since the verdict, he has been detained in mental health facilities and diagnosed with several mental disorders. Prior to his annual review hearing before the Ontario Review Board in 2006, C alleged that the mental health centre where he was being detained had breached his rights under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. He sought an absolute discharge as a remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter. The Board unanimously concluded that C was a threat to public safety, who would, if released, quickly return to police and hospital custody. This made him an unsuitable candidate for an absolute discharge under s. 672.54(a) of the Criminal Code, which provides that an absolute discharge is unavailable to any patient who is a “significant threat to the safety of the public”. The Board therefore ordered that C remain in the mental health centre. The Board further concluded that it had no jurisdiction to consider C’s Charter claims. A majority in the Court of Appeal upheld the Board’s conclusion that it was not a court of competent jurisdiction for the purpose of granting an absolute discharge under s. 24(1) of the Charter. However, the Court of Appeal unanimously concluded that it was unreasonable for the Board not to address the treatment impasse plaguing C’s detention. This issue was remitted back to the Board.

Before this Court, the issue is whether the Ontario Review Board has jurisdiction to grant remedies under s. 24(1) of the Charter. C has requested, in addition to an absolute discharge, remedies dealing with his conditions of detention: an order directing the mental health centre to provide him with access to psychotherapy and an order prohibiting the centre from housing him near a construction site.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

When the Charter was proclaimed, its relationship with administrative tribunals was a blank slate. However, various dimensions of the relationship quickly found their way to this Court. The first wave of relevant cases started in 1986 with Mills v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 17 (SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863. The Mills cases established that a court or administrative tribunal was a “court of competent jurisdiction” under s. 24(1) of the Charter if it had jurisdiction over the person, the subject matter, and the remedy sought. The second wave started in 1989 with Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038. The Slaight cases established that any exercise of statutory discretion is subject to the Charter and its values. The third and final wave started in 1990 with Douglas/Kwantlen Faculty Assn. v. Douglas College, 1990 CanLII 63 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 570, followed in 1991 by Cuddy Chicks Ltd. v. Ontario (Labour Relations Board), 1991 CanLII 57 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 5, and Tétreault-Gadoury v. Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission), 1991 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 22. The cases flowing from this trilogy, which deal with s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, established that specialized tribunals with both the expertise and the authority to decide questions of law are in the best position to hear and decide the constitutionality of their statutory provisions.

This evolution of the case law over the last 25 years has cemented the direct relationship between the Charter, its remedial provisions and administrative tribunals. It confirms that we do not have one Charter for the courts and another for administrative tribunals and that, with rare exceptions, administrative tribunals with the authority to apply the law, have the jurisdiction to apply the Charter to the issues that arise in the proper exercise of their statutory functions. The evolution also confirms that expert tribunals should play a primary role in determining Charter issues that fall within their specialized jurisdiction and that in exercising their statutory functions, administrative tribunals must act consistently with the Charter and its values.

Moreover, the jurisprudential evolution affirms the practical advantages and the constitutional basis for allowing Canadians to assert their Charter rights in the most accessible forum available, without the need for bifurcated proceedings between superior courts and administrative tribunals. Any scheme favouring bifurcation is, in fact, inconsistent with the well-established principle that an administrative tribunal is to decide all matters, including constitutional questions, whose essential factual character falls within the tribunal's specialized statutory jurisdiction.

A merger of the three distinct constitutional streams flowing from this Court's administrative law jurisprudence calls for a new approach that consolidates this Court's gradual expansion of the scope of the Charter and its relationship with administrative tribunals. When a Charter remedy is sought from an administrative tribunal, the initial inquiry should be whether the tribunal can grant Charter remedies generally. The answer to this question flows from whether the administrative tribunal has the jurisdiction, explicit or implied, to decide questions of law. If it does, and unless the legislature has clearly demonstrated its intent to withdraw the Charter from the tribunal's authority, the tribunal will have the jurisdiction to grant Charter remedies in relation to Charter issues arising in the course of carrying out its statutory mandate. The tribunal is, in other words, a court of competent jurisdiction under s. 24(1) of the Charter. This approach has the benefit of attributing Charter jurisdiction to a tribunal as an institution, rather than requiring litigants to test, remedy by remedy, whether the tribunal is a court of competent jurisdiction.

Once the initial inquiry has been resolved in favour of Charter jurisdiction, the remaining question is whether the tribunal can grant the particular remedy sought given its statutory scheme. Answering this question is necessarily an exercise in discerning legislative intent, namely, whether the remedy sought is the kind of remedy that the legislature intended would fit within the statutory framework of the particular tribunal. Relevant considerations include the tribunal's statutory mandate and function.

In this case, C seeks certain Charter remedies from the Board. The first inquiry, therefore, is whether the Board is a court of competent jurisdiction under s. 24(1). The answer to this question depends on whether the Board is authorized to decide questions of law. The Board is a quasi-judicial body with significant authority over a vulnerable population. It operates under Part XX.1 of the Criminal Code as a specialized statutory tribunal with ongoing supervisory jurisdiction over the treatment, assessment, detention and discharge of NCR patients: accused who have been found not criminally responsible by reason of mental disorder. Part XX.1 of the Criminal Code provides that any party to a review board hearing may appeal the board's disposition on a question of law, fact or mixed fact and law. The Code also authorizes appellate courts to overturn a review board's disposition if it was based on a wrong decision on a question of law. This statutory language is indicative of the Board's authority to decide questions of law. Given this conclusion, and since Parliament has not excluded the Charter from the Board's mandate, it follows that the Board is a court of competent jurisdiction for the purpose of granting remedies under s. 24\(1\) of the Charter.

The next question is whether the remedies sought are the kinds of remedies which would fit within the Board's statutory scheme. This requires consideration of the scope and nature of the Board's statutory mandate and functions. The review board regime is intended to reconcile the "twin goals" of protecting the public from dangerous offenders and treating NCR patients fairly and appropriately. Based on the Board's duty to protect public safety, its statutory authority to grant absolute discharges only to non-dangerous NCR patients, and its mandate to assess and treat NCR patients with a view to reintegration rather than recidivism, it is clear that Parliament intended that dangerous NCR patients have no access to absolute discharges. C cannot, therefore, obtain an absolute discharge from the Board. The same is true of C's request for a treatment order. Allowing the Board to prescribe or impose treatment is expressly prohibited by s. 672.55 of the Criminal Code. Finally, neither the validity of C's complaint about the location of his room nor, obviously, the propriety of his request for an order prohibiting the mental health centre from housing him near a construction site, have been considered by the Board. It may well be that the substance of C's complaint can be fully addressed within the Board's statutory mandate and the exercise of its discretion in accordance with Charter values. If so, resort to s. 24\(1\) of the Charter may not add to the Board's capacity to either address the substance of C's complaint or provide appropriate redress.

Cases Cited

Considered: Mills v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 17 \(SCC\), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863; Carter v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 18 \(SCC\), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 981; Weber v. Ontario Hydro, 1995 CanLII 108 \(SCC\), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 929; Mooring v. Canada (National Parole Board), 1996 CanLII 254 \(SCC\), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 75; R. v. 974649 Ontario Inc., 2001 SCC 81, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 575; Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 \(SCC\), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038; Douglas/Kwantlen Faculty Assn. v. Douglas College, 1990 CanLII 63 \(SCC\), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 570; Cuddy Chicks Ltd. v. Ontario (Labour Relations Board), 1991 CanLII 57 \(SCC\), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 5; Tétreault-Gadoury v. Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission), 1991 CanLII 12 \(SCC\), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 22; Nova Scotia (Workers' Compensation Board) v. Martin, 2003 SCC 54, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 504; Paul v. British Columbia (Forest Appeals Commission), 2003 SCC 55, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 585; Quebec (Attorney General) v. Quebec (Human Rights Tribunal), 2004 SCC 40, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 223; Okwuobi v. Lester B. Pearson School Board, 2005 SCC 16, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 257; Cooper v. Canada (Human Rights Commission), 1996 CanLII 152 \(SCC\), [1996] 3 S.C.R. 854; Regina Police Assn. Inc. v. Regina (City) Board of Police Commissioners, 2000 SCC 14, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 360; Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse) v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 39, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 185; Vaughan v. Canada, 2005 SCC 11, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 146; Winko v. British Columbia (Forensic Psychiatric Institute), 1999 CanLII 694 \(SCC\), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 625; Mazzei v. British Columbia (Director of Adult Forensic Psychiatric Services), 2006 SCC 7, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 326; referred to: Argentina v. Mellino, 1987 CanLII 49 \(SCC\), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 536; United States v. Allard, 1987 CanLII 50 \(SCC\), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 564; R. v. Rahey, 1987 CanLII 52 \(SCC\), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 588; R. v. Gamble, 1988 CanLII 15 \(SCC\), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 595; R. v. Smith, 1989 CanLII 12 \(SCC\), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 1120; R. v. Hynes, 2001 SCC 82, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 623; R. v. Menard, 2008 BCCA 521, 240 C.C.C. (3d) 1; British Columbia (Director of Child, Family & Community Service) v. L. (T.), 2009 BCPC 293, 73 R.F.L. (6th) 455, aff'd 2010 BCSC 105 \(CanLII\); Dagenais v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp., 1994 CanLII 39 \(SCC\), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 835; Eaton v. Brant County Board of Education, 1997 CanLII 366 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 241; Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII

327 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 624; Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 (SCC), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817; Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307; Multani v. Commission scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys, 2006 SCC 6, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 256; Société des Acadiens et Acadiennes du Nouveau-Brunswick Inc. v. Canada, 2008 SCC 15, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 383; R. v. Mentuck, 2001 SCC 76, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 442; Toronto Star Newspapers Ltd. v. Ontario, 2005 SCC 41, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 188; Roncarelli v. Duplessis, 1959 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1959] S.C.R. 121; Four B Manufacturing Ltd. v. United Garment Workers of America, 1979 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1031; Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190; R. v. Swain, 1991 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 933; Penetanguishene Mental Health Centre v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 20, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 498; R. v. Owen, 2003 SCC 33, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 779; Pinet v. St. Thomas Psychiatric Hospital, 2004 SCC 21, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 528; Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3; Canada (Prime Minister) v. Khadr, 2010 SCC 3, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 44; R. v. Nasogaluak, 2010 SCC 6, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 206.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 2(b), (d), 7, 8, 9, 12, 15(1), 24.

Constitution Act, 1982, s. 52(1).

Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, Part XX.1, ss. 672.4(1), 672.38(1), 672.39, 672.54, 672.55, 672.72(1), 672.78(1), 672.81(1), 672.83(1).

Authors Cited

Canada. House of Commons. Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General, No. 7, 3rd Sess., 34th Parl., October 9, 1991.

Latimer, Jeff, and Austin Lawrence. Research Report: The Review Board Systems in Canada: Overview of Results from the Mentally Disordered Accused Data Collection Study. Ottawa: Department of Justice Canada, Research and Statistics, January 2006.

Lokan, Andrew K., and Christopher M. Dassios. Constitutional Litigation in Canada. Toronto: Thomson/Carswell, 2006.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal (Simmons, Armstrong and Lang JJ.A.), 2008 ONCA 326, 90 O.R. (3d) 335, 293 D.L.R. (4th) 729, 235 O.A.C. 341, 231 C.C.C. (3d) 429, 169 C.R.R. (2d) 314, [2008] O.J. No. 1588 (QL), 2008 CarswellOnt 2352, allowing in part an appeal from a decision of the Ontario Review Board. Appeal dismissed.

Marlys A. Edwardh, Delmar Doucette, Jessica Orkin and Michael Davies, for the appellant.

Hart M. Schwartz and Amanda Rubaszek, for the respondent Her Majesty the Queen.

Janice E. Blackburn and Ioana Bala, for the respondent the Person in charge of the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health.

Simon Fothergill, for the intervener the Attorney General of Canada.

Stephen J. Moreau and Elichai Shaffir, for the intervener the Ontario Review Board.

Paul Burstein and Anita Szigeti, for the interveners the Mental Health Legal Committee and the Mental Health Legal Advocacy Coalition.

Joseph J. Arvay, Q.C., Mark G. Underhill and Alison Latimer, for the intervener the British Columbia Review Board.

Cheryl Milne, for the interveners the Criminal Lawyers' Association and the David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights.

David W. Mossop, Q.C., and Diane Nielsen, for the intervener the Community Legal Assistance Society.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

[1] ABELLA J. — The specific issue in this appeal is the remedial jurisdiction of the Ontario Review Board under s. 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The wider issue is the relationship between the Charter, its remedial provisions and administrative tribunals generally.

[2] There are two provisions in the Charter dealing with remedies: s. 24(1) and s. 24(2). Section 24(1) states that anyone whose Charter rights or freedoms have been infringed or denied may apply to a “court of competent jurisdiction” to obtain a remedy that is “appropriate and just in the circumstances”. Section 24(2) states that in those proceedings, a court can exclude evidence obtained in violation of the Charter if its admission would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. A constitutional remedy is also available under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, which states that the Constitution is the supreme law of Canada, and that any law inconsistent with its provisions is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.

[3] When the Charter was proclaimed in 1982, its relationship with administrative tribunals was a tabula rasa. It was not long, however, before various dimensions of the relationship found their way to this Court.

[4] The first relevant wave of cases started in 1986 with Mills v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 17 (SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863. The philosophical legacy of Mills was in its conclusion that for the purposes of s. 24(1) of the Charter, a “court of competent jurisdiction” was a “court” with jurisdiction over the person, the subject matter, and the remedy sought. For the next 25 years, this three-part test served as the grid for determining whether a court or administrative tribunal was a “court of competent jurisdiction” under s. 24(1) of the Charter (Carter v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 981; Argentina v. Mellino, 1987 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 536; United States v. Allard, 1987 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 564; R. v. Rahey, 1987 CanLII 52 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 588; R. v. Gamble, 1988 CanLII 15 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 595; R. v. Smith, 1989 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 1120; Weber v. Ontario Hydro, 1995 CanLII 108 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 929; Mooring v. Canada (National Parole Board), 1996 CanLII 254 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 75; R. v. 974649 Ontario Inc., 2001 SCC 81, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 575 (“Dunedin”); R. v. Hynes, 2001 SCC 82, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 623; R. v. Menard, 2008 BCCA 521, 240 C.C.C. (3d) 1; British Columbia (Director of Child, Family & Community Service) v. L. (T.), 2009 BCPC 293, 73 R.F.L. (6th) 455, aff’d 2010 BCSC 105 (CanLII)).

[5] The second wave started in 1989 with Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038. Although Slaight did not — and does not — offer any direct guidance on what constitutes a “court of competent jurisdiction”, its legacy was in its conclusion that any exercise of statutory discretion is subject to the Charter and its values (Dagenais v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp., 1994 CanLII 39 (SCC), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 835, at p. 875; Eaton v. Brant County Board of Education, 1997 CanLII 366 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 241; Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 327 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 624; Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 (SCC), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817, at paras. 53-56; Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307, at paras. 38-40; Multani v. Commission scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys, 2006 SCC 6, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 256, at para. 22; Société des Acadiens et Acadiennes du Nouveau-Brunswick Inc. v. Canada, 2008 SCC 15, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 383, at paras. 20-24).

[6] The third and final wave started in 1990 with Douglas/Kwantlen Faculty Assn. v. Douglas College, 1990 CanLII 63 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 570, followed in 1991 by Cuddy Chicks

Ltd. v. Ontario (Labour Relations Board), 1991 CanLII 57 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 5, and Tétreault-Gadoury v. Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission), 1991 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 22. The legacy of these cases — the Cuddy Chicks trilogy — is in their conclusion that specialized tribunals with both the expertise and authority to decide questions of law are in the best position to hear and decide constitutional questions related to their statutory mandates (Nova Scotia (Workers' Compensation Board) v. Martin, 2003 SCC 54, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 504; Paul v. British Columbia (Forest Appeals Commission), 2003 SCC 55, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 585; Quebec (Attorney General) v. Quebec (Human Rights Tribunal), 2004 SCC 40, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 223; Okwuobi v. Lester B. Pearson School Board, 2005 SCC 16, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 257).

[7] The impact of these three jurisprudential waves has been to confine constitutional issues for administrative tribunals to three discrete universes. It seems to me that after 25 years of parallel evolution, it is time to consider whether the universes can appropriately be merged.

-

Background

[8] Paul Conway is 56 years old. As a child, he was physically and sexually abused by close relatives. During his twenties, Mr. Conway was twice convicted of assault.

[9] In September 1983, at the age of 29, Mr. Conway threatened his aunt at knife point and forced her to have sexual intercourse with him repeatedly over the course of a few hours. On February 27, 1984, Mr. Conway was found not guilty by reason of insanity on a charge of sexual assault with a weapon.

[10] Since the verdict, Mr. Conway has been detained in mental health facilities across Ontario, primarily the Penetanguishene Mental Health Centre's maximum security unit. He has been diagnosed with an unspecified psychotic disorder, a mixed personality disorder with paranoid, borderline and narcissistic features, potential post traumatic stress disorder and potential paraphilia.

[11] In 2005, following Mr. Conway's mandatory annual review hearing before the Ontario Review Board, the Board transferred Mr. Conway from Penetanguishene to Toronto's Centre for Addiction and Mental Health ("CAMH"), a medium security facility. The Board observed that although Mr. Conway was "unconvinced that he suffers from a mental illness" and was "uncured", his treatment required that he have hope of eventually being integrated into the community.

[12] Prior to his annual review hearing in 2006, Mr. Conway sent a Notice of Constitutional Question to the Board, CAMH, and the Attorneys General of Ontario and Canada, alleging breaches of ss. 2(b), 2(d), 7, 8, 9, 12 and 15(1) of the Charter. He listed the following grounds as the basis of the claim that his constitutional rights had been violated and that he was therefore entitled to an absolute discharge under s. 24(1):

Mr. Conway states that there is little regard for the living conditions under which he is detained and that these factors have a negative impact on his mental and physical health. These conditions include:

- a. Construction noise, fumes and dust associated with the renovation of the unit directly below him which affect his peace, tranquillity and convalescence;
- b. Failure to respect his rights, individuality, and expressions of same;
- c. Interruptions by staff of his telephone calls and unnecessary and improper implementation of call restrictions including when he is speaking with legal counsel;
- d. Unfair treatment by staff which manifests in differential treatment towards him compared with other NCR accused individuals detained on the unit; and
- e. Failure to provide for his needs and advocacy for his expressed needs;

...

Mr. Conway is currently incarcerated and is subject to infringements on his liberty, safety, dignity and security of his person without due process of the law, including:

- a) environmental pollution;
- b) noise pollution;
- c) arbitrary actions by staff;
- d) threats of attack and attacks by inpatients;
- e) hostility by staff against him;
- f) threats of the use of chemical and mechanical restraints;
- g) failure to provide emotional counselling for the abuse suffered by Mr. Conway as a child (including emotional, physical, sexual and domestic abuse) which is the real source of Mr. Conway's mental health problems and emotional distress;
- h) failure to provide an environment which allows him to feel safe on a daily basis;
- i) failure to provide an environment where the Rule of Law prevails;
- j) failure to provide an environment where Mr. Conway is afforded procedural fairness in respect of any restriction of his liberties;
- k) failure to provide an environment which is free of racism;
- l) failure to provide [an] environment which is cross-culturally sensitive; and
- m) such other and further infringements and violations as counsel may advise and the Board may permit;

These violations on Mr. Conway's rights have affected Mr. Conway such that he no longer can benefit therapeutically from the environment.

[13] After an eight-day hearing, the five-member panel of the Ontario Review Board unanimously concluded that Mr. Conway was "an egocentric, impulsive bully with a poor to absent ability to control his own behaviour", had continued paranoid and delusional ideation, and had a persistent habit of threatening and intimidating others, high actuarial scores for violent recidivism and an untreated clinical condition.

[14] He was consequently found to be a threat to public safety, who would, if released, quickly return to police and hospital custody. This made him an unsuitable candidate for an absolute discharge under the statute, which states that an absolute discharge is unavailable to any patient who is a "significant threat to the safety of the public" (Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 672.54). Accordingly, Mr. Conway was ordered to remain at CAMH. The Board suggested, but did not formally order, that CAMH establish a “renewed treating team” for Mr. Conway, enrol him in anger management and sexual assault prevention programs, and investigate whether he had sustained brain damage in a car accident more than 30 years ago.

[15] As for Mr. Conway’s application for a remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter, the Board concluded that it had no Charter jurisdiction in light of its statutory structure and function, its own past rulings, and those of other Canadian review boards denying s. 24(1) jurisdiction. It therefore had no jurisdiction to consider Mr. Conway’s Charter claims.

[16] Mr. Conway appealed to the Ontario Court of Appeal, which unanimously found that an absolute discharge was not an available remedy for Mr. Conway under s. 24(1) (2008 ONCA 326, 90 O.R. (3d) 335). Armstrong J.A. for the majority concluded that the Board lacked jurisdiction to grant an absolute discharge as a Charter remedy because granting such a remedy to a patient who, like Mr. Conway, was a significant threat to the public, would frustrate Parliamentary intent. The Board was therefore not a court of competent jurisdiction pursuant to the test set out in Mills since it lacked jurisdiction over the particular remedy sought. Lang J.A. agreed that an absolute discharge was unavailable to Mr. Conway, but she was of the view that the Board was competent to make other orders that would be appropriate remedies for a breach of a patient’s Charter rights.

[17] Notably, the Court of Appeal also unanimously concluded that it was unreasonable for the Board not to make a formal order setting out conditions addressing the treatment impasse plaguing Mr. Conway’s detention. This issue was remitted back to the Board.

[18] This Court, in order to decide whether Mr. Conway is entitled to the Charter remedies he is seeking, must first determine whether the Ontario Review Board is a court of competent jurisdiction which can grant Charter remedies under s. 24(1). In accordance with the new approach developed in these reasons, I am of the view that it is. On the other hand, I am not persuaded that Mr. Conway is entitled to the particular Charter remedies he seeks and would therefore dismiss the appeal.

Analysis

[19] Section 24(1) states:

Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

[20] We do not have one Charter for the courts and another for administrative tribunals (Cooper v. Canada (Human Rights Commission), 1996 CanLII 152 (SCC), [1996] 3 S.C.R. 854, per McLachlin J. (in dissent), at para. 70; Dunedin; Douglas College; Martin). This truism is reflected in this Court's recognition that the principles governing remedial jurisdiction under the Charter apply to both courts and administrative tribunals. It is also reflected in the jurisprudence flowing from Mills and the Cuddy Chicks trilogy according to which, with rare exceptions, administrative tribunals with the authority to apply the law have the jurisdiction to apply the Charter to the issues that arise in the proper exercise of their statutory functions.

[21] The jurisprudential evolution has resulted in this Court's acceptance not only of the proposition that expert tribunals should play a primary role in the determination of Charter issues falling within their specialized jurisdiction, but also that in exercising their statutory discretion, they must comply with the Charter.

[22] All of these developments serve to cement the direct relationship between the Charter, its remedial provisions and administrative tribunals. In light of this evolution, it seems to me to be no longer helpful to limit the inquiry to whether a court or tribunal is a court of competent jurisdiction only for the purposes of a particular remedy. The question instead should be institutional: Does this particular tribunal have the jurisdiction to grant Charter remedies generally? The result of this question will flow from whether the tribunal has the power to decide questions of law. If it does, and if Charter jurisdiction has not been excluded by statute, the tribunal will have the jurisdiction to grant Charter remedies in relation to Charter issues arising in the course of carrying out its statutory mandate (Cuddy Chicks trilogy; Martin). A tribunal which has the jurisdiction to grant Charter remedies is a court of competent jurisdiction. The tribunal must then decide, given this jurisdiction, whether it can grant the particular remedy sought based on its statutory mandate. The answer to this question will depend on legislative intent, as discerned from the tribunal's statutory mandate (the Mills cases).

[23] This approach has the benefit of attributing Charter jurisdiction to the tribunal as an institution, rather than requiring litigants to test, remedy by remedy, whether it is a court of competent jurisdiction. It is also an approach which emerges from a review of the three distinct constitutional streams flowing from this Court's jurisprudence. As the following review shows, this Court has gradually expanded the approach to the scope of the Charter and its relationship with administrative tribunals. These reasons are an attempt to consolidate the results of that expansion.

-

[24] In Mills, it was decided that relief is available under s. 24(1) of the Charter if the “court” from which relief is sought has jurisdiction over the parties, the subject matter and the remedy sought. Since 1986, the Mills test has been consistently applied to determine whether courts and tribunals acting under specific statutory schemes are courts of competent jurisdiction to grant particular remedies under s. 24(1).

[25] The early cases considered the remedial jurisdiction of statutory and superior courts. In Mills and Carter, this Court held that a provincial court judge sitting as a preliminary inquiry court was not a court of competent jurisdiction for the purpose of ordering a stay of proceedings for an alleged s. 11(b) violation. The following year, this Court concluded that extradition judges had the same institutional features as preliminary inquiry judges, and could therefore not order a stay in the event of a Charter breach (Mellino; Allard). Further, in Mellino, the Court observed that since extradition proceedings were reviewable by superior courts by way of habeas corpus, those superior courts were the courts of competent jurisdiction to grant a stay under s. 24(1), not the extradition judge.

[26] In 1988, in Gamble, the Court held that a superior court in the province where an individual is in custody is a court of competent jurisdiction to hear an application for habeas corpus, stating:

Where the courts of Ontario have jurisdiction over the subject matter and the person, it seems to me that they may, under the broad provisions of s. 24(1) of the Charter, grant such relief as it is within their jurisdiction to grant and as they consider appropriate and just in the circumstances. [p. 631]

[27] In 1995, in Weber, the Court expanded the scope of the Mills inquiry to cover administrative tribunals. The issue was whether a labour arbitrator appointed under the Labour Relations Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. L.2, was a court of competent jurisdiction for the purpose of granting damages and a declaration under s. 24(1) in relation to disputes which in their essential character arose out of the collective agreement between the parties. Weber had sought relief for what he alleged were breaches of ss. 7 and 8 of the Charter committed by his employer, Ontario Hydro, who had gathered surveillance evidence about him during his extended sick leave. The Court had to determine whether Weber was required to raise his Charter claims before a labour arbitrator or before the superior court.

[28] For the majority, McLachlin J. rejected an approach that would bifurcate the proceedings between the arbitrator and the courts. In her view, the “essential character” of Weber’s claim was unfair treatment by the employer. The collective agreement expressly stated that the grievance procedure applied to “[a]ny allegation that an employee has been subjected to unfair treatment”. Weber’s Charter claims were therefore found to be within the arbitrator’s exclusive jurisdiction:

[W]hile the informal processes of such tribunals might not be entirely suited to dealing with constitutional issues, clear advantages to the practice exist. Citizens are permitted to assert their Charter rights in a prompt, inexpensive, informal way. The parties are not required to duplicate submissions on the case in two different fora, for determination of two different legal issues. A specialized tribunal can quickly sift the facts and compile a record for the reviewing court. And the specialized competence of the tribunal may provide assistance to the reviewing court.

...

... it is not the name of the tribunal that determines the matter, but its powers. ...
The practical import of fitting Charter remedies into the existing system of tribunals, as McIntyre J. notes [in Mills], is that litigants have “direct” access to Charter remedies in the tribunal charged with deciding their case. [paras. 60 and 65]

[29] Foreshadowing the debate that is before us in this case, Iacobucci J. in dissent, expressed the view that the arbitrator was neither a “court” nor of “competent jurisdiction” for the purpose of granting Charter remedies under s. 24(1). In his view, Weber was entitled to seek labour remedies from the arbitrator, but not those under the Charter.

[30] The Weber “exclusive jurisdiction model” enunciated by McLachlin J., which directed that an administrative tribunal should decide all matters whose essential character falls within the tribunal’s specialized statutory jurisdiction, is now a well-established principle of administrative law (Regina Police Assn. Inc. v. Regina (City) Board of Police Commissioners, 2000 SCC 14, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 360; Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse) v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 39, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 185; Quebec (Human Rights Tribunal); Vaughan v. Canada, 2005 SCC 11, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 146; Okwuobi; Andrew K. Lokan and Christopher M. Dassios, Constitutional Litigation in Canada (2006), at p. 4-15).

[31] The next year, this Court decided Mooring. The issue was whether the National Parole Board was a court of competent jurisdiction for the purpose of excluding evidence under s. 24(2) of the Charter. Sopinka J., writing for the majority, considered only the third step of the Mills test since he found it to be determinative. In his view, it followed from the Parole Board’s structure and function, as well as the language of its enabling statute, that the Board could not exclude evidence under s. 24(2) of the Charter. Pursuant to the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, S.C. 1992, c. 20, the Board was not bound by the traditional rules of evidence and was obliged to consider all available, relevant information when rendering its decisions. The ability to exclude evidence would have been, in Sopinka J.’s view, inconsistent with the intent and specific provisions of the Parole Board’s statutory scheme. Since the Mills test was ultimately a means of discerning Parliamentary intent, this inconsistency precluded the Board from being a court of competent jurisdiction for the purpose of granting the particular remedy sought. Sopinka J. concluded instead that the Parole Board's "duty of fairness" obligations offered sufficient protection to those appearing before the Board.

[32] Major J. (McLachlin J. concurring), in a vigorous dissent, criticized the majority's implicit resurrection of the idea, rejected in Weber, that only courts could be "courts of competent jurisdiction" for the purpose of s. 24(1). Major J. was of the view that the policy considerations animating the Court's reasoning under s. 52 in the Cuddy Chicks trilogy applied equally in cases arising under s. 24(1). He felt that "[o]f primary importance is the ability of the citizen to rely upon and assert Charter rights in a direct manner in the normal procedural context in which the issue arises" (para. 61). As he explained:

There is no reason in principle why any of the practical advantages enunciated by La Forest J. in the trilogy should apply with any less force to a tribunal granting a remedy under s. 24 than to a tribunal declining to enforce a constitutionally invalid statutory provision. If anything, tailoring a specific Charter remedy for a specific applicant before a tribunal is more suited to a tribunal's special role in determining rights on a case by case basis in the tribunal's area of expertise. It has less serious ramifications than determining that a statutory provision will not be applied on Charter grounds. [para. 64]

[33] Turning to the Mills test, Major J. concluded that the only real question before the Court was whether the Parole Board was a court of competent jurisdiction for the purpose of awarding the specific remedy sought by the applicant, namely the exclusion of evidence. While the Parole Board was not bound by formal rules of evidence, it was nonetheless obliged to exclude information that was irrelevant, unreliable or inaccurate. Accordingly, the Board had the jurisdiction to exclude evidence and it therefore met the third Mills criterion. Major J. expressly disagreed with Sopinka J.'s conclusion that the doctrine of procedural fairness provided sufficient protection of constitutional rights in the context of the Board's proceedings.

[34] More recently, the Court has had two further opportunities to consider the Mills test. In Dunedin, the issue was whether a provincial court judge with jurisdiction under Ontario's Provincial Offences Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.33, was a court of competent jurisdiction for the purpose of ordering costs against the Crown for failure to comply with the Charter. McLachlin C.J., writing for a unanimous Court, again confirmed that applying the Mills test is, first and foremost, a matter of discerning legislative intent. The question in each case is whether the legislature intended to give the court or tribunal the power to apply the Charter:

[W]here a legislature confers on a court or tribunal a function that involves the determination of matters where Charter rights may be affected, and furnishes it with processes and powers capable of fairly and justly resolving those incidental Charter issues, then it must be inferred, in the absence of a contrary intention, that the legislature intended to empower the tribunal to apply the Charter. [para. 75]

[35] This approach “promotes direct and early access to Charter remedies in forums competent to issue such relief” (para. 75). Applying it to the issue before her, McLachlin C.J. concluded that both the structure and function of the provincial offences court supported the view that it could and should apply the Charter. Looking first to function, McLachlin C.J. concluded that the provincial offences court’s role as a quasi-criminal court of first instance weighed strongly in favour of expansive remedial jurisdiction under s. 24 of the Charter. Such jurisdiction would promote the resolution of Charter issues in the forum best situated to resolve them:

Provincial offences courts, like other criminal trial courts, are the preferred forum for issuing Charter remedies in the cases originating before them, where they will have the “fullest account of the facts available” This role commends a full complement of criminal law remedies at the disposal of provincial offences courts. This broad remedial jurisdiction is necessary to prevent frequent resort to superior courts to fill gaps in statutory jurisdiction, and to ensure that the remedy that ultimately flows is in fact both appropriate and just. [para. 79]

[36] McLachlin C.J. also sought, as she had in Weber, to avoid the unnecessary bifurcation of avenues of relief:

[F]racturing the availability of Charter remedies between provincial offences courts and superior courts could, in some circumstances, effectively deny the accused access to a remedy and a court of competent jurisdiction. It may be unrealistic to expect criminal accused, who often rely on legal aid to mount a defence against the state, to bring a separate action in the provincial superior court to recover the costs arising from the breach of their Charter rights. This option, while available in theory, may far too often prove illusory in practice. [para. 82]

[37] McLachlin C.J. then considered the structure of the provincial offences court. She concluded that since criminal and quasi-criminal proceedings are structurally indistinguishable, the criminal courts' jurisdiction to grant costs in the event of a Charter breach extends to the quasi-criminal courts. The Provincial Offences Act disclosed no contrary intention. McLachlin C.J. ultimately concluded that since the legislature gave the provincial offences court functions destined to attract Charter issues and Charter remedies, the legislature must have intended that it be able to deal with related Charter issues.

[38] In the companion case of Hynes, the issue was whether a preliminary inquiry court was a court of competent jurisdiction for the purpose of excluding evidence under s. 24(2) of the Charter. Again, only the third step of the Mills test was considered, and again the tension on display in Weber and Mooring was exhibited. McLachlin C.J., for the majority, reiterated the principles set out in Dunedin and explained that in all cases the question is whether Parliament or the legislature intended to empower the court or tribunal to make rulings on Charter violations that arise incidentally to their proceedings, and to grant the remedy sought as a remedy for such violations. [para. 26]

She went on to conclude that a preliminary inquiry court was not a court of competent jurisdiction for the purpose of excluding evidence under s. 24(2). A preliminary inquiry's primary function was, in her view, to determine whether the Crown has sufficient evidence to warrant committing the accused to trial. Empowering a preliminary inquiry judge to exclude evidence under the Charter would jeopardize the inquiry's expeditious nature. The criminal trial courts were better suited to the task of determining whether to exclude evidence.

[39] Major J., writing in dissent for four judges, agreed that only the third step of the Mills test was at issue but disagreed with the majority as to the result. He noted that preliminary inquiry judges were authorized to exclude evidence under the common law confessions rule. It was not, therefore, supportable by "logic or efficiency to permit a preliminary inquiry justice to determine the admissibility of statements for common law purposes, but not for Charter purposes, when it is recognized that preliminary inquiry justices are armed with all the facts. Parliament could not have intended such waste" (para. 96). Accordingly, in his view, a preliminary inquiry judge was competent to exclude evidence under s. 24(2).

[40] This review of Mills' progeny gives rise to three observations. First, this Court has accepted that the Mills test applies to courts as well as to administrative tribunals. Second, although Mills set out a three-pronged definition of "court of competent jurisdiction", the first two steps have almost never been relied on. Twenty-five years later, "jurisdiction over the parties" and “jurisdiction over the subject matter” remain undefined for the purposes of the test. The inquiry has almost always turned on whether the court or tribunal had jurisdiction to award the particular remedy sought under s. 24(1). In other words, the inquiry is less into whether the adjudicative body is institutionally a court of competent jurisdiction, and more into whether it is a court of competent jurisdiction for the purposes of granting a particular remedy. Third, while there appears to be agreement that s. 24(1) jurisdiction is a function of legislative intent, the authoritative comments of the majorities in Weber and Dunedin, eschewing bifurcated proceedings and heralding early and accessible adjudication of Charter applications, may have been slightly unmoored by the majority in Mooring.

The Slaight Cases

[41] The cases flowing from Slaight, while of no direct assistance on what constitutes a court of competent jurisdiction, are of interest as they too show how the Court increasingly came to expand the application of the Charter in the administrative sphere. In 1989, Slaight established that any exercise of statutory discretion must comply with the Charter and its values. The issue was whether an adjudicator appointed under the Canada Labour Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. L-1, had the authority to order an employer to write a content-restricted reference letter for an employee and to limit the employer’s response to any inquiries about the employee to the comments in the letter. The employer argued that such an order violated s. 2(b) of the Charter. This Court agreed that the employer’s s. 2(b) rights were violated, but a majority concluded that the arbitrator’s order was justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

[42] Lamer J. explained that it was “not . . . open to question” that the adjudicator’s orders were subject to the Charter:

The adjudicator is a statutory creature: he is appointed pursuant to a legislative provision and derives all his powers from the statute. As the Constitution is the supreme law of Canada and any law that is inconsistent with its provisions is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect, it is impossible to interpret legislation conferring discretion as conferring a power to infringe the Charter, unless, of course, that power is expressly conferred or necessarily implied. . . . Legislation conferring an imprecise discretion must therefore be interpreted as not allowing the Charter rights to be infringed. Accordingly, an adjudicator exercising delegated powers does not have the power to make an order that would result in an infringement of the Charter, and he exceeds his jurisdiction if he does so. [Emphasis in original; pp. 1077-78.]

[43] Slaight was applied in 1994 in Dagenais, where Lamer C.J. (for the majority on this issue) said that a judge's discretion to order a publication ban was subject to the Slaight principle. He concluded that the judge's discretion could not be open-ended or exercised arbitrarily, and had to be "exercised within the boundaries set by the principles of the Charter" (p. 875). Exceeding those boundaries would result in a reversible error of law (see also R. v. Mentuck, 2001 SCC 76, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 442, and Toronto Star Newspapers Ltd. v. Ontario, 2005 SCC 41, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 188).

[44] In the 1997 case of Eaton, the Ontario Special Education Tribunal, acting pursuant to the Education Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. E.2, had ordered that Emily Eaton, a child with cerebral palsy, be placed in a special classroom for students with disabilities. The Eatons alleged discrimination, arguing that their daughter's education should take place in the mainstream schools. Lamer C.J. wrote brief reasons to clarify what he had said in Slaight:

[S]tatutory silences should be read down to not authorize breaches of the Charter, unless this cannot be done because such an authorization arises by necessary implication. I developed this principle in the context of administrative tribunals which operate pursuant to broad grants of statutory powers, and which can potentially violate Charter rights. Whatever section of the Act or of Regulation 305, R.R.O. 1990, grants the authority to the Tribunal to place students like Emily Eaton . . . Slaight Communications would require that any open-ended language in that provision (if there were any) be interpreted so as to not authorize breaches of the Charter. [para. 3]

[45] In the 1997 case of Eldridge, the Court was asked to assess the constitutionality of certain aspects of British Columbia's health care delivery scheme. The issue was whether the Charter applied to the Medical Services Commission's decision not to provide sign language interpreters for the deaf as part of a publicly funded scheme for the provision of medical care. La Forest J., writing for a unanimous Court, said that the basic principle derived from Slaight was that since legislatures may not enact laws that infringe the Charter, they cannot authorize or empower another person or entity to do so (para. 35). The provincial government had delegated to the Medical Services Commission the power to decide whether a service was a "benefit" under the Medical and Health Care Services Act, S.B.C. 1992, c. 76, and to define what constitutes a "medically required" service for the purpose of the provincial health insurance program. When exercising this discretion, the Commission was acting in a governmental capacity and was therefore subject to the Charter.

[46] In 1999, the Court decided Baker, a judicial review of the exercise of statutory discretion by an immigration officer pursuant to the Immigration Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-2. L'Heureux-Dubé J., relying on Slaight and Roncarelli v. Duplessis, 1959 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1959] S.C.R. 121, among others, concluded that statutory discretion must be exercised in accordance with the boundaries imposed by the statute, the principles of the rule of law and of administrative law, the fundamental values of Canadian society, and the principles of the Charter (paras. 53 and 56).

[47] The following year, in Blencoe, the Court was asked to determine whether the provincial Human Rights Commission was subject to the Charter. Bastarache J., writing for the majority, explained that Slaight guaranteed that statutory bodies like the Commission are bound by the Charter even if they are independent of the government and/or exercising adjudicatory functions:

The facts in Slaight and the case at bar share at least one salient feature: the labour arbitrator (in Slaight) and the Commission (in the case at bar) each exercise governmental powers conferred upon them by a legislative body. The ultimate source of authority in each of these cases is government. All of the Commission's powers are derived from the statute. The Commission is carrying out the legislative scheme of the Human Rights Code. It is putting into place a government program or a specific statutory scheme established by government to implement government policy The Commission must act within the limits of its enabling statute. There is clearly a "governmental quality" to the functions of a human rights commission which is created by government to promote equality in society generally.

Thus, notwithstanding that the Commission may have adjudicatory characteristics, it is a statutory creature and its actions fall under the authority of the Human Rights Code. The state has instituted an administrative structure, through a legislative scheme, to effectuate a governmental program to provide redress against discrimination. It is the administration of a governmental program that calls for Charter scrutiny. Once a complaint is brought before the Commission, the subsequent administrative proceedings must comply with the Charter. These entities are subject to Charter scrutiny in the performance of their functions just as government would be in like circumstances. To hold otherwise would allow the legislative branch to circumvent the Charter by establishing statutory bodies that are immune to Charter scrutiny. The above analysis leads inexorably to the conclusion that the Charter applies to the actions of the Commission. [paras. 39-40]

The majority ultimately concluded that Blencoe's Charter rights had not been infringed.

[48] Finally, in 2006, in Multani, the Court considered whether a decision of a school board's council of commissioners prohibiting one of its students from wearing a kirpan at school infringed the student's freedom of religion. Charron J., writing for the majority and relying on Slaight, explained:

The council is a creature of statute and derives all its powers from statute. Since the legislature cannot pass a statute that infringes the Canadian Charter, it cannot, through enabling legislation, do the same thing by delegating a power to act to an administrative decision maker. [para. 22]

The Cuddy Chicks Trilogy

[49] While the courts and tribunals were preoccupied with the proper application of the principles in Mills and Slaight, another line of authority regarding the constitutional jurisdiction of statutory tribunals was emerging. These cases dealt with whether administrative tribunals could decide the constitutionality of the provisions of their own statutory schemes and decline to apply them because they are “of no force or effect” under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. The first case was Douglas College, in which two Douglas College employees challenged the mandatory retirement provision in their collective agreement, claiming that it was contrary to s. 15(1) of the Charter. The primary issue was whether a labour arbitrator, governed by the Industrial Relations Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 212, and appointed under the parties' collective agreement, had the jurisdiction to determine the collective agreement's constitutionality.

[50] La Forest J., writing for the Court on this issue, concluded that the jurisdiction lay with the arbitrator. Under the Industrial Relations Act, the arbitrator had express authority to “provide a final and conclusive settlement of a dispute”. To fulfill this mandate, arbitrators acting under the Act could interpret and apply any statute that regulated employment. This included the Charter. La Forest J. noted that arbitrators were bound by the same Constitution as the courts. Accordingly, if a collective agreement was illegal or unconstitutional, an arbitrator must decline to apply it just as a court would.

[51] La Forest J. rejected the College's argument that the informal arbitration process was unsuited to litigating a Charter issue, concluding that any disadvantages of allowing administrative tribunals to decide constitutional questions were outweighed by the "clear advantages" of granting them this jurisdiction. In his view, such jurisdiction promotes respect for the Constitution because "[t]he citizen, when appearing before decision-making bodies set up to determine his or her rights and duties, should be entitled to assert the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution" (p. 604). Constitutional issues should be raised at an early stage in the context in which they arise, without the claimant having to first resort to an application in superior court, which is more expensive and time-consuming than the administrative process. In addition, a "specialized competence can be of invaluable assistance in constitutional interpretation" (p. 605). Specialized arbitrators and agencies can sift through the facts and quickly compile a record for the benefit of a reviewing court. In this way, the parties (and the reviewing courts) benefit from the arbitrators' expertise. This practice also allows for all related aspects of a matter to be dealt with by the most appropriate decision maker. As La Forest J. pointed out, "it would be anomalous if tribunals responsible for interpreting the law on the issue were unable to deal with the issue in its entirety, subject to judicial review" (p. 599).

[52] In 1991, Cuddy Chicks established that the Ontario Labour Relations Board could determine the constitutionality of a provision which excluded agricultural workers from the protections of Ontario's Labour Relations Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 228. The issue arose out of an application by the union for the certification of Cuddy Chicks' hatchery employees. The union challenged the constitutional validity of this exclusion, arguing that it violated ss. 2(d) and 15 of the Charter, and sought to have it declared to be of no force and effect pursuant to s. 52(1).

[53] In rejecting the employer's argument that the superior court, not the Labour Board, should deal with the constitutional question, and drawing on his reasons in Douglas College, La Forest J.'s "overarching consideration" was that where administrative bodies like the Labour Board have specialized expertise, that expertise makes them the appropriate forum for assessing Charter compliance:

It is apparent, then, that an expert tribunal of the calibre of the Board can bring its specialized expertise to bear in a very functional and productive way in the determination of Charter issues which make demands on such expertise. In the present case, the experience of the Board is highly relevant to the Charter challenge to its enabling statute, particularly at the s. 1 stage where policy concerns prevail. At the end of the day, the legal process will be better served where the Board makes an initial determination of the jurisdictional issue arising from a constitutional challenge. In such circumstances, the Board not only has the authority but a duty to ascertain the constitutional validity of s. 2(b) of the Labour Relations Act. [Emphasis added; p. 18.]

[54] After citing a number of cases in which labour boards were found to have the jurisdiction to consider constitutional questions relating to their own jurisdiction, such as Four B Manufacturing Ltd. v. United Garment Workers of America, 1979 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1031, La Forest J. observed:

What these cases speak to is not only the fundamental nature of the Constitution, but also the legal competence of labour boards and the value of their expertise at the initial stages of complex constitutional deliberations. These practical considerations have compelled the courts to recognize a power, albeit a carefully limited one, in labour tribunals to deal with constitutional issues involving their own jurisdiction. Such considerations are as compelling in the case of Charter challenges to a tribunal's enabling statute. Therefore, to extend this "limited but important role" of labour boards to the realm of the Charter is simply a natural progression of a well established principle. [Emphasis added; p. 19.]

[55] La Forest J. ultimately concluded that it was within the Board's jurisdiction to consider the constitutionality of its enabling statute since it had the express authority to consider questions of law under the statute.

[56] In Tétreault-Gadoury, Ms. Tétreault-Gadoury lost her job shortly after her 65th birthday and applied for unemployment insurance benefits. The Employment and Immigration Commission denied her application because, under s. 31 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 48, a person over 65 was only entitled to a lump sum retirement benefit. Ms. Tétreault-Gadoury appealed the Commission's decision to a Board of Referees, arguing that s. 31 of the Act offended s. 15(1) of the Charter. The Board declined to rule on the constitutional question. Rather than appeal to an umpire as directed by the Act, Ms. Tétreault-Gadoury appealed to the Federal Court of Appeal, which concluded that s. 31 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 was contrary to s. 15 of the Charter.

[57] On appeal, La Forest J., again writing for the Court on the jurisdictional issue, reiterated the principle that an administrative tribunal with the authority to interpret or apply the law is entitled to determine whether a particular statutory provision is unconstitutional. The Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 expressly conferred the jurisdiction to consider questions of law on the umpires, not the Board of Referees. This meant that under the legislative scheme, umpires, not the Referees, were authorized to resolve constitutional issues.

[58] In 1996, the constitutional jurisdiction of another statutory body — the Canadian Human Rights Commission — came under scrutiny in Cooper. Two airline pilots filed a human rights complaint with the Commission alleging that the mandatory retirement provision in their collective agreement was discriminatory. Section 15\(c\) of the Canadian Human Rights Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. H-6, permitted the imposition of mandatory retirement if the age set was the “normal age of retirement for employees . . . in [similar] positions”. The complainants challenged the constitutionality of s. 15(c). The issue before the Court was whether the Commission and, in turn, a tribunal appointed by the Commission to hear a complaint, had the power to assess the constitutionality of a provision of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

[59] Cooper, decided in the same year as Mooring, highlighted the conceptual debate in this Court as to the constitutional jurisdiction of administrative tribunals. La Forest J., writing for the majority, again confirmed that if a tribunal has the power to consider questions of law, then it “must be able to address constitutional issues” (para. 46). The Commission, however, lacked statutory authority to decide questions of law. While it was entitled to interpret and apply its enabling statute, this limited legal jurisdiction was insufficient to establish that the Commission could consider general questions of law.

[60] La Forest J. reached the same conclusion with respect to a human rights tribunal. While a tribunal could consider general legal and constitutional questions, “logic” demanded that it lacked the ability to assess the constitutionality of the Canadian Human Rights Act (para. 66). The tribunals lacked expertise; any gain in efficiency would be lost through the inevitable judicial review of a tribunal’s constitutional determinations; the tribunals’ loose evidentiary rules were unsuited to constitutional litigation; and constitutional matters would bog down the human rights system, which was intended to provide for efficient and timely adjudication of complaints.

[61] Lamer C.J. concurred with La Forest J., but wrote separate reasons urging the Court to abandon the principles set out in the Cuddy Chicks trilogy. In his view, the principles enunciated in those cases were contrary to the separation of powers and Parliamentary democracy, two fundamental principles of the Canadian Constitution.

[62] In dissent, McLachlin J. (L'Heureux-Dubé J. concurring) concluded that both the Canadian Human Rights Commission and a human rights tribunal were empowered to assess the constitutionality of the Canadian Human Rights Act. This result, according to McLachlin J., “best achieves the economical and effective resolution of human rights disputes and best serves the values entrenched in the Canadian Human Rights Act and the Charter” (para. 73). Like La Forest J., McLachlin J. reinforced the view expressed in the trilogy that “administrative tribunals empowered to decide questions of law may consider Charter questions” (para. 81), and once again confirmed that in light of the doctrine of constitutional supremacy,

[c]itizens have the same right to expect that [the Charter] will be followed and applied by the administrative arm of government as by legislators, bureaucrats and the police. If the state sets up an institution to exercise power over people, then the people may properly expect that that institution will apply the Charter. [para. 78]

In her view, both the Commission and the tribunals could consider whether the Charter renders invalid the “‘normal age of retirement’ defence”, since both bodies were empowered to decide questions of law.

[63] In Martin, in 2003, the Court sought to resolve the debate over the Charter jurisdiction of tribunals. The issue was whether s. 10B of the Workers' Compensation Act, S.N.S.

1994-95, c. 10, and the Functional Restoration (Multi-Faceted Pain Services) Program Regulations, N.S. Reg. 57/96, which precluded individuals suffering from chronic pain from receiving workers' compensation benefits, were contrary to s. 15(1) of the Charter. As a threshold issue, it was necessary to decide whether the Nova Scotia Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal had the jurisdiction to consider whether the benefits provisions of its enabling statute were constitutional.

[64] Gonthier J., writing for a unanimous Court, expressly rejected the 1996 ratio in Cooper, particularly insofar as it distinguished between limited and general questions of law and insofar as it suggested that an adjudicative function was a prerequisite for a tribunal's constitutional jurisdiction. He also expressly rejected Lamer C.J.'s contention that the Cuddy Chicks trilogy was inconsistent with the separation of powers and Parliamentary democracy.

[65] Instead, Gonthier J. affirmed and synthesized the main principles emerging from the trilogy. The first was the principle of constitutional supremacy, which provides that any law that is inconsistent with the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force and effect. No government actor can apply an unconstitutional law, he observed, and, subject to an express contrary intention, a government agency given statutory authority to consider questions of law is presumed to have the jurisdiction to assess related constitutional questions.

[66] As a further corollary, Gonthier J. echoed the views expressed over the years by McLachlin J., Major J., La Forest J., and McIntyre J. confirming that "Canadians should be entitled to assert the rights and freedoms that the Constitution guarantees them in the most accessible forum available, without the need for parallel proceedings before the courts". Explaining that this "accessibility concern" was "particularly pressing given that many administrative tribunals have exclusive initial jurisdiction over disputes relating to their enabling legislation”, Gonthier J. concluded that “forcing litigants to refer Charter issues to the courts would result in costly and time-consuming bifurcation of proceedings” (para. 29).

[67] In his view, a tribunal’s factual findings and the record it compiles when considering a constitutional question are of invaluable assistance in constitutional determinations. The tribunal provides the reviewing court with the most well-informed, expert view of the issues at stake:

It must be emphasized that the process of Charter decision making is not confined to abstract ruminations on constitutional theory. In the case of Charter matters which arise in a particular regulatory context, the ability of the decision maker to analyze competing policy concerns is critical. . . . The informed view of the Board, as manifested in a sensitivity to relevant facts and an ability to compile a cogent record, is also of invaluable assistance. [para. 30, citing Cuddy Chicks, at pp. 16-17]

[68] Based on these principles, Gonthier J. concluded that the following determines whether it is within an administrative tribunal’s jurisdiction to subject a legislative provision to Charter scrutiny:

- Under the tribunal’s enabling statute, does the administrative tribunal have jurisdiction, explicit or implied, to decide questions of law arising under a legislative provision? If so, the tribunal is presumed to have the jurisdiction to determine the constitutional validity of that provision under the Charter.
- Does the tribunal’s enabling statute clearly demonstrate that the legislature intended to exclude the Charter from the tribunal’s jurisdiction? If so, the presumption in favour of Charter jurisdiction is rebutted.

[69] Applying this approach, Gonthier J. noted that the Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal was explicitly authorized to "determine all questions of fact and law". Further, the Tribunal's decisions could be appealed "on any question of law". This confirmed that the Tribunal was entitled to decide legal questions which triggered the presumption that the Tribunal was authorized to decide Charter questions.

[70] The adjudicative nature of the Tribunal was also relevant. It was independent of the Workers' Compensation Board, could establish its own procedural rules, consider all relevant evidence, record any oral evidence for future reference, exercise powers under the Public Inquiries Act, R.S.N.S. 1989, c. 372, and extend time limits for decisions when necessary. In addition, its members had been called to the bar and the Attorney General could intervene in proceedings involving constitutional questions. In his view, therefore, even if the Tribunal had lacked express authority to decide questions of law, an implied grant of authority would have been found. The legislature clearly intended to create a comprehensive scheme for resolving workers' compensation disputes. Nothing in the Workers' Compensation Act rebutted the presumption.

[71] Moreover, allowing the Tribunal to apply the Charter furthered the policy objectives of allowing courts to "benefit from a full record established by a specialized tribunal fully apprised of the policy and practical issues relevant to the Charter claim". It also permitted workers to "have their Charter rights recognized within the relatively fast and inexpensive adjudicative scheme created by the Act" rather than having to pursue separate proceedings in the courts in addition to a compensation claim before the administrative tribunal (para. 56).

[72] Gonthier J. concluded that the Workers' Compensation Board too, like the Appeals Tribunal, had the jurisdiction to review the constitutional validity of its enabling statute, since both statutory bodies had the same authority to decide questions of law.

[73] Martin was released with Paul v. British Columbia (Forest Appeals Commission). Paul was charged with a breach of s. 96 of the Forest Practices Code of British Columbia Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 159, which was a general prohibition against cutting Crown timber. Paul conceded that he cut the prohibited timber, but asserted that as an aboriginal person, he had a right to do so under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The issue on appeal was whether the provincial Forest Appeals Commission had the authority to entertain Paul's constitutional argument.

[74] Bastarache J., writing for the Court, applied the methodology in Martin to determine whether the Commission was authorized to consider and apply s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The issue therefore was whether the enabling statute either expressly or by implication granted the Commission the jurisdiction to interpret or decide questions of law.

[75] The Forest Practices Code stated that any party to a proceeding before the Commission could make submissions as to fact, law and jurisdiction and could appeal a Commission's decision on a question of law or jurisdiction. These provisions made it impossible to conclude that the Commission's mandate was limited to purely factual matters, and the Court accordingly concluded that the Forest Appeals Commission was empowered to decide questions of law, including whether s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 applied.

[76] In the case of Okwuobi, the issue was the jurisdiction of the Administrative Tribunal of Québec to hear rights claims for minority language education under the Charter of the French language, R.S.Q., c. C-11, and the Canadian Charter. Based on Martin and Paul, the Court concluded:

As will become clear, the fact that the ATQ is vested with the ability to decide questions of law is crucial, and is determinative of its jurisdiction to apply the Canadian Charter in this appeal. The quasi-judicial structure of the ATQ, discussed briefly above, may be indicative of a legislative intention that constitutional questions be considered and decided by the ATQ, but the structure of the ATQ is not determinative. This is evidenced by the recent decisions of this Court in Nova Scotia (Workers' Compensation Board) v. Martin, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 504, 2003 SCC 54, and Paul v. British Columbia (Forest Appeals Commission), [2003] 2 S.C.R. 585, 2003 SCC 55. [para. 28]

In Okwuobi, the Administrative Tribunal of Québec was found to have the jurisdiction to decide questions of law. The presumption in favour of constitutional jurisdiction was therefore triggered and was not rebutted.

[77] These cases confirm that administrative tribunals with the authority to decide questions of law and whose Charter jurisdiction has not been clearly withdrawn have the corresponding authority — and duty — to consider and apply the Constitution, including the Charter, when answering those legal questions. As McLachlin J. observed in Cooper:

[E]very tribunal charged with the duty of deciding issues of law has the concomitant power to do so. The fact that the question of law concerns the effect of the Charter does not change the matter. The Charter is not some holy grail which only judicial initiatives of the superior courts may touch. The Charter belongs to the people. All law and law-makers that touch the people must conform to it. Tribunals and commissions charged with deciding legal issues are no exception. Many more citizens have their rights determined by these tribunals than by the courts. If the Charter is to be meaningful to ordinary people, then it must find its expression in the decisions of these tribunals. [para. 70]

[78] The jurisprudential evolution leads to the following two observations: first, that administrative tribunals with the power to decide questions of law, and from whom constitutional jurisdiction has not been clearly withdrawn, have the authority to resolve constitutional questions that are linked to matters properly before them. And secondly, they must act consistently with the Charter and its values when exercising their statutory functions. It strikes me as somewhat unhelpful, therefore, to subject every such tribunal from which a Charter remedy is sought to an inquiry asking whether it is “competent” to grant a particular remedy within the meaning of s. 24(1).

[79] Over two decades of jurisprudence has confirmed the practical advantages and constitutional basis for allowing Canadians to assert their Charter rights in the most accessible forum available, without the need for bifurcated proceedings between superior courts and administrative tribunals (Douglas College, at pp. 603-4; Weber, at para. 60; Cooper, at para. 70; Martin, at para. 29). The denial of early access to remedies is a denial of an appropriate and just remedy, as Lamer J. pointed out in Mills, at p. 891. And a scheme that favours bifurcating claims is inconsistent with the well-established principle that an administrative tribunal is to decide all matters, including constitutional questions, whose essential factual character falls within the tribunal’s specialized statutory jurisdiction (Weber; Regina Police Assn.; Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse); Quebec (Human Rights Tribunal); Vaughan; Okwuobi. See also Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190, at para. 49.).

[80] If, as in the Cuddy Chicks trilogy, expert and specialized tribunals with the authority to decide questions of law are in the best position to decide constitutional questions when a remedy is sought under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982, there is no reason why such tribunals are not also in the best position to assess constitutional questions when a remedy is sought under s. 24(1) of the Charter. As McLachlin J. said in Weber, “[i]f an arbitrator can find a law violative of the Charter, it would seem he or she can determine whether conduct in the administration of the collective agreement violates the Charter and likewise grant remedies” (para. 61). I agree with the submission of both the Ontario Review Board and the British Columbia Review Board that in both types of cases, the analysis is the same.

[81] Building on the jurisprudence, therefore, when a remedy is sought from an administrative tribunal under s. 24(1), the proper initial inquiry is whether the tribunal can grant Charter remedies generally. To make this determination, the first question is whether the administrative tribunal has jurisdiction, explicit or implied, to decide questions of law. If it does, and unless it is clearly demonstrated that the legislature intended to exclude the Charter from the tribunal’s jurisdiction, the tribunal is a court of competent jurisdiction and can consider and apply the Charter — and Charter remedies — when resolving the matters properly before it.

[82] Once the threshold question has been resolved in favour of Charter jurisdiction, the remaining question is whether the tribunal can grant the particular remedy sought, given the relevant statutory scheme. Answering this question is necessarily an exercise in discerning legislative intent. On this approach, what will always be at issue is whether the remedy sought is the kind of remedy that the legislature intended would fit within the statutory framework of the particular tribunal. Relevant considerations in discerning legislative intent will include those that have guided the courts in past cases, such as the tribunal’s statutory mandate, structure and function (Dunedin).

Application to This Case

[83] The question before the Court is whether the Ontario Review Board is authorized to provide certain remedies to Mr. Conway under s. 24(1) of the Charter. Before the Board, Mr. Conway sought an absolute discharge. At the hearing before this Court, and for the first time, he requested additional remedies dealing with his conditions of detention: an order directing CAMH to provide him with access to psychotherapy, and an order prohibiting CAMH from housing him near a construction site.

[84] The first inquiry is whether the Board is a court of competent jurisdiction. In my view, it is. The Board is a quasi-judicial body with significant authority over a vulnerable population. It is unquestionably authorized to decide questions of law. It was established by, and operates under, Part XX.1 of the Criminal Code as a specialized statutory tribunal with ongoing supervisory jurisdiction over the treatment, assessment, detention and discharge of those accused who have been found not criminally responsible by reason of mental disorder (“NCR patient”). Section 672.72(1) provides that any party may appeal a board’s disposition on any ground of appeal that raises a question of law, fact or mixed fact and law. Further, s. 672.78(1) authorizes an appellate court to allow an appeal against a review board’s disposition where the court is of the opinion that the board’s disposition was based on a wrong decision on a question of law. I agree with the conclusion of Lang J.A. and the submission of the British Columbia Review Board that, as in Martin and Paul, this language is indicative of the Board’s power to decide legal questions. And there is nothing in Part XX.1 of the Criminal Code — the Board’s statutory scheme — which permits us to conclude that Parliament intended to withdraw Charter jurisdiction from the scope of the Board’s mandate. It follows that the Board is entitled to decide constitutional questions, including Charter questions, that arise in the course of its proceedings.

[85] The question for the Court to decide therefore is whether the particular remedies sought by Mr. Conway are the kinds of remedies that Parliament appeared to have anticipated would fit within the statutory scheme governing the Ontario Review Board. This requires us to consider the scope and nature of the Board’s statutory mandate and functions.

[86] Part XX.1 of the Criminal Code was enacted after this Court struck down the traditional regime for dealing with mentally ill offenders as contrary to s. 7 of the Charter in R. v. Swain, 1991 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 933. The traditional system subjected offenders with mental illness to automatic and indefinite detention at the pleasure of the Lieutenant Governor in Council (Criminal Code, s. 614(2) (formerly s. 542(2)) (repealed S.C. 1991, c. 43, s. 3); Winko v. British Columbia (Forensic Psychiatric Institute), 1999 CanLII 694 (SCC), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 625). Part XX.1 was designed to address the concerns raised in Swain and was intended to highlight that offenders with a mental illness must be “treated with the utmost dignity and afforded the utmost liberty compatible with [their] situation” (Winko, at para. 42; Penetanguishene Mental Health Centre v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 20, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 498, at para. 22).

[87] Part XX.1 introduced a new verdict — “not criminally responsible on account of mental disorder” — into the traditional guilt/innocence dichotomy. This verdict is neither an acquittal nor a conviction; rather, it diverts offenders to a special stream that provides individualized assessment and treatment for those found to be a significant danger to the public (Winko, at para. 21; R. v. Owen, 2003 SCC 33, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 779, at para. 90; Penetanguishene, at para. 21). Those NCR patients who are not a significant danger to the public must be unconditionally released.

[88] The Ontario Board manages and supervises the assessment and treatment of each NCR patient in Ontario by holding annual hearings and making dispositions for each patient (ss. 672.38(1), 672.54, 672.81(1) and 672.83(1); Mazzei v. British Columbia (Director of Adult Forensic Psychiatric Services), 2006 SCC 7, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 326, at para. 29). It is well established that the review board regime is intended to reconcile the “twin goals” of protecting the public from dangerous offenders, and treating NCR patients fairly and appropriately (Winko, at para. 20; House of Commons, Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General, No. 7, 3rd Sess., 34th Parl., October 9, 1991, at p. 6). While public safety is the paramount concern, an NCR patient’s liberty interest has been held to be the Board’s “major preoccupation” within the fence posts staked by public safety (Pinet v. St. Thomas Psychiatric Hospital, 2004 SCC 21, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 528, at para. 19). The Board fulfills its “primary purpose” therefore by protecting the public while minimizing incursions on patients’ liberty and treating patients fairly (Mazzei, at para. 32; Winko, at paras. 64-71; Penetanguishene, at para. 51).

[89] Section 672.54 of the Criminal Code sets out the remedial jurisdiction of review boards, stating:

Where a court or Review Board makes a disposition under subsection 672.45(2) or section 672.47 or 672.83, it shall, taking into consideration the need to protect the public from dangerous persons, the mental condition of the accused, the reintegration of the accused into society and the other needs of the accused, make one of the following dispositions that is the least onerous and least restrictive to the accused:

- (a) where a verdict of not criminally responsible on account of mental disorder has been rendered in respect of the accused and, in the opinion of the court or Review Board, the accused is not a significant threat to the safety of the public, by order, direct that the accused be discharged absolutely;
- (b) by order, direct that the accused be discharged subject to such conditions as the court or Review Board considers appropriate; or
- (c) by order, direct that the accused be detained in custody in a hospital, subject to such conditions as the court or Review Board considers appropriate.

Accordingly, at a disposition hearing regarding an NCR patient, the Ontario Review Board is authorized to make one of three dispositions: an absolute discharge, a conditional discharge or a detention order. When making its disposition, the Board must consider the four statutory criteria:

the need to protect the public from dangerous persons, the patient's mental condition, the reintegration of the patient into society and the patient's other needs.

[90] The Board has a “necessarily broad” discretion to consider a large range of evidence in order to fulfill this mandate (Winko, at para. 61). The Board's assessment of the evidence must “take place in an environment respectful of the NCR accused's constitutional rights, free from the negative stereotypes that have too often in the past prejudiced the mentally ill who come into contact with the justice system” (Winko, at para. 61). Upon considering the evidence, if the Board is not of the opinion that the patient is a significant threat to public safety, it must direct that the patient be discharged absolutely (s. 672.54(a); Winko, at para. 62). On the other hand, if the Board finds that the patient is, as in Mr. Conway's case, a significant threat to public safety, an absolute discharge is not statutorily available as a disposition (s. 672.54; Winko, at para. 62).

[91] A patient is not a significant threat to public safety unless he or she is a “real risk of physical or psychological harm to members of the public that is serious in the sense of going beyond the merely trivial or annoying” (Winko, at para. 62). The conduct giving rise to the harm must be criminal in nature (Winko, at paras. 57 and 62).

[92] Once a patient is absolutely discharged, he or she is no longer subject to the criminal justice system or to the Board's jurisdiction (Mazzei, at para. 34). However, pending an absolute discharge, NCR patients are subject to a detention or conditional discharge order. The Board is entitled to include appropriate conditions in its orders (s. 672.54(b) and (c)). The appropriateness of conditions is tied, at least in part, to the framework for making the least onerous and least restrictive disposition consistent with public safety, the patient's mental condition and other needs, and the patient's reintegration into the community (s. 672.54(b) and (c); Penetanguishene, at paras. 51 and 56).

[93] The Board is not entitled to include any conditions that prescribe or impose treatment on an NCR patient (s. 672.55; Mazzei) and any conditions must withstand Charter scrutiny (Slaight). In addition, disposition orders, including any conditions, are subject to appeal. The Court of Appeal is entitled to allow an appeal against a disposition if it is unreasonable, cannot be supported by the evidence, is based on a wrong decision on a question of law, or gives rise to a miscarriage of justice (s. 672.78(1); Owen).

[94] Subject to these limits, the content of the conditions included in a disposition is at the Board's discretion. In this way, the Board has the statutory tools to supervise the treatment and detention of dangerous NCR patients in a responsive, Charter-compliant fashion and has a broad power to attach flexible, individualized, creative conditions to the discharge and detention orders it devises for dangerous NCR patients.

[95] The Board's task calls for "significant expertise" (Owen, at paras. 29-30) and the Board's membership, which sits in five-member panels comprised of the chairperson (a judge or a person qualified for or retired from appointment to the bench), a second legal member, a psychiatrist, a second psychiatrist or psychologist and one public member (ss. 672.39 and 672.4(1)), guarantees that the requisite experts perform the Board's challenging task (Owen, at para. 29; s. 672.39). Further, as almost one-quarter of NCR patients and accused found unfit to stand trial spend at least 10 years in the review board system, with some, like Mr. Conway, spending significantly longer (Jeff Latimer and Austin Lawrence, Research Report — The Review Board Systems in Canada: Overview of Results from the Mentally Disordered Accused Data Collection Study (Department of Justice Canada, January 2006, at p. v), review boards become intimately familiar with the patients under their supervision. In light of this expertise, the appellate courts are "not [to] be too quick to overturn" a review board's "expert opinion" on how best to manage a patient's risk to the public (Owen, at para. 69; Winko, at para. 61).

[96] Mr. Conway submits that, pursuant to s. 24(1) of the Charter, and notwithstanding the Board's finding that he is a significant threat to public safety, he is entitled to an absolute discharge or, in the absence of a discharge, an order directing CAMH to provide him with alternative treatment and/or an order directing CAMH to ensure that he can access psychotherapy. Mr. Conway admits that these remedies are outside the Board's statutory jurisdiction, but asserts that s. 24(1) of the Charter frees the Board from statutory limits on its jurisdiction.

[97] I disagree. Part XX.1 of the Code provides the Board with "wide latitude" in the exercise of its powers (Winko, at para. 27; Mazzei, at para. 43). However, Parliament did not imbue the Board with free remedial rein, and in fact withdrew certain remedies from the Board's statutory arsenal. As noted above, Part XX.1 of the Code precludes the Board from granting either an absolute discharge to an NCR patient found to be dangerous or an order directing that a hospital authority provide an NCR patient with particular treatment (ss. 672.54(a) and 672.55; Winko; Mazzei). Parliament was entitled to withdraw these powers from the Board and, barring a constitutional challenge to the legislation, no judicial fiat can overrule Parliament's clear expression of intent.

[98] Granting the Board the jurisdiction to unconditionally release a dangerous patient without the requisite treatment to resolve the dangerousness would frustrate the Board's mandate to supervise the special needs of those who are found to require the treatment/assessment regime (Winko, at paras. 39-42). It would also undermine the balance required by s. 672.54: it not only threatens public safety, it jeopardizes the interests of the NCR patient by failing to adequately prepare him or her for reintegration and, as a result, creating a substantial risk of re-offending and re-entry into the Part XX.1 regime (Winko, at paras. 39-41). As McLachlin J. wrote in Winko, at paras. 39-41:

Treatment . . . is necessary to stabilize the mental condition of a dangerous NCR accused and reduce the threat to public safety created by that condition. . . .

Part XX.1 protects society. If society is to be protected on a long-term basis, it must address the cause of the offending behaviour — the mental illness. . . .

Part XX.1 also protects the NCR offender. The assessment-treatment model introduced by Part XX.1 of the Criminal Code is fairer to the NCR offender than the traditional common law model. The NCR offender is not criminally responsible, but ill. Providing opportunities to receive treatment, not imposing punishment, is the just and appropriate response.

[99] The Board’s duty to protect public safety, its statutory authority to grant absolute discharges only to non-dangerous NCR patients, and its mandate to assess and treat NCR patients with a view to reintegration rather than recidivism, all point to Parliament’s intent not to permit NCR patients who are dangerous to have access to absolute discharges as a remedy. These factors are determinative in this case and lead to the conclusion that it would not be appropriate and just in Mr. Conway’s current circumstances for the Board to grant him an absolute discharge.

[100] The same is true of Mr. Conway’s request for a treatment order. Allowing the Board to prescribe or impose treatment is not only expressly prohibited by the Criminal Code (s. 672.55), it is also inconsistent with the constitutional division of powers (Mazzei). The authority to make treatment decisions lies exclusively within the mandate of provincial health authorities in charge of the hospital where an NCR patient is detained, pursuant to various provincial laws governing the provision of medical services. “It would be an inappropriate interference with provincial legislative authority (and with hospitals’ treatment plans and practices) for Review Boards to require hospital authorities to administer particular courses of medical treatment for the benefit of an NCR accused” (Mazzei, at para. 31).

[101] A finding that the Board is entitled to grant Mr. Conway an absolute discharge despite its conclusion that he is a significant threat to public safety, or to direct CAMH to provide him with a particular treatment, would be a clear contradiction of Parliament's intent. Given the statutory scheme and the constitutional considerations, the Board cannot grant these remedies to Mr. Conway.

[102] Finally, Mr. Conway complains about where his room is located and seeks an order under s. 24(1) prohibiting CAMH from housing him near a construction site. Neither the validity of this complaint, nor, obviously, the propriety of any redress, has yet been determined by the Board.

[103] Remedies granted to redress Charter wrongs are intended to meaningfully vindicate a claimant's rights and freedoms (Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 55; Canada (Prime Minister) v. Khadr, 2010 SCC 3, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 44, at para. 30). Yet, it is not the case that effective, vindicatory remedies for harm flowing from unconstitutional conduct are available only through separate and distinct Charter applications (R. v. Nasogaluak, 2010 SCC 6, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 206, at para. 2). Charter rights can be effectively vindicated through the exercise of statutory powers and processes (Nasogaluak; Dagenais; Okwuobi). In this case, it may well be that the substance of Mr. Conway's complaint about where his room is located can be fully addressed within the framework of the Board's statutory mandate and the exercise of its discretion in accordance with Charter values. If that is what the Board ultimately concludes to be the case, resort to s. 24(1) of the Charter may not add either to the Board's capacity to address the substance of the complaint or to provide appropriate redress.

[104] I would dismiss the appeal. In accordance with the request of the parties, there will be no order for costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant: Marlys Edwardh Barristers Professional Corporation, Toronto.

Solicitor for the respondent Her Majesty the Queen: Attorney General of Ontario, Toronto.

Solicitors for the respondent the Person in charge of the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health: Bersenas Jacobsen Chouest Thomson Blackburn, Toronto.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General of Canada: Attorney General of Canada, Ottawa.

Solicitors for the intervener the Ontario Review Board: Cavalluzzo Hayes Shilton McIntyre & Cornish, Toronto.

Solicitors for the interveners the Mental Health Legal Committee and the Mental Health Legal Advocacy Coalition: Hiltz Szigeti, Toronto.

Solicitors for the intervener the British Columbia Review Board: Arvay Finlay, Vancouver.

Solicitor for the interveners the Criminal Lawyers' Association and the David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights: University of Toronto, Toronto.

Solicitor for the intervener the Community Legal Assistance Society: Community Legal Assistance Society, Vancouver.

TAB 8

R. v. Deschamplain, 2004 SCC 76 (CanLII), [2004] 3 SCR 601

Source:	Supreme Court of Canada
Date:	2004-11-19
File number:	29722
Other citations:	252 DLR (4th) 289 — 347 NR 287 — 211 OAC 323 — 193 CCC (3d) 448 — 196 CCC (3d) 1 — 65 WCB (2d) 132 — [2004] CarswellOnt 4766 — JE 2007-233 — [2004] OJ No 73 (QL) — [2004] SCJ No 73 (QL) — [2004] ACS no 73
Citation:	R. v. Deschamplain, 2004 SCC 76 (CanLII), [2004] 3 SCR 601, < https://canlii.ca/t/1j5fv >, retrieved on 2026-03-22

R. v. Deschamplain, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 601, 2004 SCC 76

Her Majesty The Queen

Appellant

v.

Douglas Deschamplain

Respondent

Indexed as: R. v. Deschamplain

Neutral citation: 2004 SCC 76.

File No.: 29722.

2004: June 16; 2004: November 19.

Present: McLachlin C.J. and Major, Bastarache, Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps and Fish JJ.

on appeal from the court of appeal for ontario

Criminal law — Preliminary inquiry — Jurisdiction — Certiorari — Preliminary inquiry judge discharging accused — Whether preliminary inquiry judge failed to consider “the whole of the evidence” as prescribed by Criminal Code — If so, whether such failure constitutes jurisdictional error — Scope of review on certiorari of decision of preliminary inquiry judge to discharge accused — Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 548\(1\)\(b\).

The accused, a police officer, went to his son’s school while on duty in response to allegations that his son had shown a knife to other students and made threats. He met a teacher, who gave him the knife so he could conduct a police investigation. Another officer was subsequently assigned to investigate and discovered that the accused had not made notes in his police notebook nor completed a police report about the incident nor secured the knife as an exhibit. The accused did not comply with a request to turn the knife over to the police. He was charged with possession of “a prohibited weapon, to wit a brass knuckle knife” and with obstruction of justice. At the preliminary inquiry, the teacher testified that the handle of the knife was silver in colour with brass-knuckle type four rings. He said that he had not touched the knife and indicated that by using the descriptor “brass-knuckle type” he was not suggesting that the handle was made of metal. Brass knuckles are described under the relevant regulations as consisting of a band of metal with one or more finger holes designed to fit over the fingers of the hand. The preliminary inquiry judge held that the Crown had failed to adduce any evidence that the handle of the knife was made of metal. She discharged the accused on the prohibited weapon charge because an essential element of the offence had not been made out and she held that a discharge on the count of obstruction of justice resulted as a matter of course. The Crown successfully applied for certiorari and the reviewing judge set aside the discharge order. The Court of Appeal restored the order. It was prepared to assume that the preliminary inquiry judge had erred in failing to consider the whole of the evidence but held that such an error amounts to an error in assessing the sufficiency of the evidence, an error that was within the jurisdiction of the preliminary inquiry judge and was thus not reviewable on certiorari.

Held (Binnie, LeBel and Fish JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed. The discharge order should be set aside and the matter remitted to the preliminary inquiry judge.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Major, Bastarache and Deschamps JJ.: A preliminary inquiry judge commits a jurisdictional error if he or she fails to consider “the whole of the evidence”, as prescribed by s. 548(1)(b) of the Criminal Code, before discharging an accused. The judge must obey mandatory statutory jurisdictional prescriptions, or risks intervention by a reviewing court on certiorari. Here, the preliminary inquiry judge failed to fulfill her obligations under s. 548(1)(b). On the count of possession of a prohibited weapon, her finding that there was no evidence that the handle of the knife was made of metal is unsupported by the record. Silence in the reasons alone may not necessarily be sufficient to justify intervention, however, on the main issue of the case, she mentioned only the teacher’s testimony and his description of the knife and did not refer to the considerable body of circumstantial evidence. Her finding that the count of obstruction of justice “fail[ed] as a matter of course” also amounted to a non-assessment of the circumstantial evidence since, in the performance of his duties, the accused was expected to secure any evidence and to document and report the complaint so that another investigator could be assigned. By failing to consider the whole of the evidence before discharging the accused, the preliminary inquiry judge committed a jurisdictional error on both counts. Although a preliminary inquiry judge is not required to give extensive reasons, there must be some indication that the mandatory requirement of s. 548(1)(b) has been complied with, and the failure to give such an indication results in a loss of jurisdiction. A decision as to the sufficiency of evidence is beyond review by certiorari only when it was made by a preliminary inquiry judge who was acting within his or her jurisdiction, pursuant to the mandatory provisions of s. 548.

Per Binnie J. (dissenting): The preliminary inquiry judge did not commit a jurisdictional error. There is no reason to believe in this case that she failed to consider “the whole of the evidence”. Although the judge did not mention the circumstantial evidence in her reasons, what is required is that her reasons indicate she understood the nature of the case so that the parties recognize that the case they argued was the one decided. The teacher’s evidence was the focus of the arguments of both the Crown and the defence, and the main issue was whether the knife was made of metal. Inferences from the subsequent conduct of the accused were secondary. A preliminary hearing judge ought not to be reversed simply because the reasons do not advert to all of the secondary or collateral circumstances that the Crown now say had a bearing on the main issue. The Crown did not demonstrate that the preliminary inquiry judge likely overlooked the circumstantial evidence.

Per LeBel J. (dissenting): The preliminary inquiry judge did not commit a jurisdictional error. In the circumstances of this case, the Crown did not establish that she failed to consider the whole of the evidence.

Per Fish J. (dissenting): The preliminary inquiry justice’s omission to mention explicitly in her reasons certain elements of circumstantial evidence or to include a generalized assertion that she had considered all of the evidence does not indicate that she in fact failed to consider all of the evidence before discharging the accused. First, it cannot be assumed from the justice’s silence that she did not consider the circumstantial evidence. It is more plausible to infer that she simply found that the evidence she did not mention had no significant probative value, since it could not support a rational conclusion that the handle of the knife was made of metal — the critical issue in the case. Even if she was mistaken, her error would relate to the sufficiency of the evidence and would not constitute a jurisdictional error giving rise to certiorari. Second, there is some indication in her reasons that she did assess the circumstantial evidence. While the preliminary inquiry justice focussed her attention on the teacher’s evidence, she also adverted to the Crown’s submissions regarding reasonable inferences that could be drawn from the record.

Third, since the Crown, in its submissions relating to the composition of the weapon, referred the justice exclusively to the teacher's testimony — its strongest and most significant evidence — it is not surprising that the justice did the same in her reasons. Fourth, the inquiry was neither disjointed nor hurried and the disposition was not reached precipitously or without reflection. In their submissions, both counsel drew the justice's attention to the circumstantial evidence, including the accused's "subsequent conduct". A reviewing court should not assume that the evidence vanished overnight from the justice's realm of contemplation. This is especially so where the justice amply demonstrated that she understood and considered all of the relevant issues. She was also perfectly aware of the limited nature of her task and of the test she was to apply in discharging it. There is no basis to assume that the preliminary inquiry justice did not apply the principles she had so carefully set out.

Cases Cited

By Major J.

Referred to: R. v. Sazant, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 635, 2004 SCC 77; Forsythe v. The Queen, 1980 CanLII 15 \(SCC\), [1980] 2 S.C.R. 268; Dubois v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 60 \(SCC\), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 366; R. v. Morin, 1992 CanLII 40 \(SCC\), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 286; R. v. Arcuri, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 828, 2001 SCC 54; R. v. Russell, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 804, 2001 SCC 53; United States of America v. Shephard, 1976 CanLII 8 \(SCC\), [1977] 2 S.C.R. 1067; Skogman v. The Queen, 1984 CanLII 22 \(SCC\), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 93; Macdonald v. The Queen, 1976 CanLII 140 \(SCC\), [1977] 2 S.C.R. 665; R. v. Sheppard, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 869, 2002 SCC 26.

By Binnie J. (dissenting)

R. v. Sazant, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 635, 2004 SCC 77; R. v. Sheppard, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 869, 2002 SCC 26; R. v. Braich, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 903, 2002 SCC 27.

By LeBel J. (dissenting)

R. v. Sazant, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 635, 2004 SCC 77.

By Fish J. (dissenting)

Skogman v. The Queen, 1984 CanLII 22 \(SCC\), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 93; Forsythe v. The Queen, 1980 CanLII 15 \(SCC\), [1980] 2 S.C.R. 268; R. v. Russell, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 804, 2001 SCC 53; Dubois v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 60 \(SCC\), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 366; Doyle v. The Queen, 1976 CanLII 11 \(SCC\), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 597; R. v. Morin, 1992 CanLII 40 \(SCC\), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 286; R. v. Sheppard, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 869, 2002 SCC 26; R. v. B. (C.R.), 1990 CanLII 142 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 717.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, ss. 84(1), 91\(2\), 139\(2\), 548\(1\) [rep. & sub. c. 27 (1st Supp.), s. 101(1)], 675, 676, 691, 693.

Police Services Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.15, s. 42.

Regulations Prescribing Certain Firearms and other Weapons, Components and Parts of Weapons, Accessories, Cartridge Magazines, Ammunition and Projectiles as Prohibited or Restricted, SOR/98-462, s. 4, Part 3, s. 15.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal (2003), 2003 CanLII 52134 \(ON CA\), 173 C.C.C. (3d) 130, 168 O.A.C. 389, [2003] O.J. No. 570 (QL), reversing a decision of the Superior Court of Justice setting aside a preliminary inquiry judge's order discharging an accused. Appeal allowed, Binnie, LeBel and Fish JJ. dissenting.

Jennifer Woollcombe, for the appellant.

Michael W. Lacy, for the respondent.

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Major, Bastarache and Deschamps JJ. was delivered by MAJOR J. —

I. Introduction

1 This appeal, like its companion case, R. v. Sazant, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 635, 2004 SCC 77, concerns the scope of review on certiorari of the decision of a preliminary inquiry judge to discharge an accused. The issue raised in this appeal is whether the failure of a preliminary inquiry judge to consider “the whole of the evidence” as prescribed by s. 548(1)(b) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, before discharging an accused, constitutes a jurisdictional error. The Ontario Court of Appeal held that such an error falls within the jurisdiction of the preliminary inquiry judge and is therefore immune from review. With respect, I do not agree. A preliminary inquiry judge who fails to meet the statutory obligations imposed by Parliament acts in excess of his or her jurisdiction and risks the intervention of a reviewing court. For the reasons that follow, I would allow the appeal.

II. Facts

2 On May 24, 2000, the respondent, a member of the Ontario Provincial Police, attended an elementary school with another police officer, Constable Renauld. Both officers were in uniform and on duty. The respondent’s wife had arrived earlier to search for a knife that she believed was in their son’s possession. Her actions were prompted by the alarming notes she found at home written by him. She called the respondent from the school. There were allegations that their son had shown a knife to other students and made threats. The knife was found in a box in another student's desk and given to Guy Campeau, a teacher, who decided that the police should be contacted.

3 The respondent met with his wife, their son and Mr. Campeau, in the principal's office. Constable Renauld remained in the outer office with the secretary. The respondent told Mr. Campeau that the knife had been recently bought at a flea market for whittling wood and that he had warned his son not to take it to school. Mr. Campeau suggested that the respondent's son be sent home and that the principal, David Parks, who was away that day, would decide the length of the suspension.

4 Given the seriousness of the situation, Mr. Campeau asked the respondent about the procedure for laying criminal charges. The respondent told him that it was the responsibility of the police. He also asked the respondent whether he was there as a father or police officer, and the respondent replied that he was there as a concerned father and as a police officer. Mr. Campeau decided that as a police officer, the respondent should have the knife in order to conduct the investigation, and gave it to him. The respondent, accompanied by Constable Renauld, then drove his wife and son home.

5 On May 25, 2000, Mr. Parks, the principal, dissatisfied with how the matter had been handled the previous day, contacted the police and requested that another officer investigate the incident. Detective Sergeant Lalonde was assigned to the case and when he spoke to the respondent that night, he asked him what sort of knife was involved. The respondent replied that it was a small jackknife. Mr. Campeau had looked at the knife in the box after removing the lid but never touched it. He testified at the preliminary inquiry that the handle and the grip area of the knife were silver in colour with "brass-knuckle type four rings that you would put your fingers through to hold on to the handle”. Mr. Campeau did not say in direct examination that the handle was made of metal and in cross-examination clarified that by using the descriptor “brass-knuckle type”, he was not suggesting that the handle was made of brass.

6 Detective Sergeant Lalonde discovered that the respondent had not made any notes in his police notebook, completed a police report about the incident or secured the knife as an exhibit. The respondent never complied with a subsequent request to turn the knife over to the police.

7 On June 22, 2000, the respondent was charged with two Criminal Code offences: possession of a prohibited weapon contrary to s. 91(2) and obstruction of justice contrary to s. 139(2).

III. Judicial History

A. Ontario Court of Justice

8 A preliminary inquiry was commenced before Serré J. of the Ontario Court of Justice on April 17, 2001. Three witnesses testified for the Crown: Guy Campeau, Detective Sergeant Lalonde, and Constable Renault. The matter was adjourned to May 30, 2001, when counsel made their submissions on committal. Serré J. rendered her decision the following day, and discharged the respondent on both counts. As a prohibited weapon, “brass knuckles” are described in the Regulations Prescribing Certain Firearms and other Weapons, Components and Parts of Weapons, Accessories, Cartridge Magazines, Ammunition and Projectiles as Prohibited or Restricted, SOR/98-462, Part 3, s. 15, as “consisting of a band of metal with one or more finger holes designed to fit over the fingers of the hand”. In the view of Serré J., on the strength of Mr. Campeau’s testimony alone, the Crown had failed to adduce any evidence that the handle of the knife was made of metal, and therefore an essential element of the prohibited weapon charge was not met. She concluded that a discharge under the second count, obstruction of justice, resulted as a matter of course. Serré J. made no reference to the circumstantial evidence including the evidence presented by the other witnesses.

B. Superior Court of Justice

9 The Crown brought an application in the Ontario Superior Court seeking an order in lieu of certiorari quashing the discharge order. The reviewing judge, Gauthier J., concluded that Serré J. had exceeded her jurisdiction by failing to commit on the first count despite direct evidence and by failing to consider the sufficiency of the circumstantial evidence with respect to both counts. She set aside the discharge order and remitted the matter back to Serré J. to commit the respondent on the first count and to consider the whole of the evidence with respect to the second.

C. Ontario Court of Appeal (2003), 2003 CanLII 52134 \(ON CA\), 173 C.C.C. (3d) 130

10 The Ontario Court of Appeal reversed the reviewing judge’s decision and restored the discharge order. Laskin J.A. (Morden and Feldman JJ.A. concurring) noted that the Crown had rightly conceded that there was no direct evidence adduced at the preliminary inquiry that any part of the knife handle attaching to the four finger rings was made of metal. In fact, the evidence proffered on this element was entirely circumstantial. Laskin J.A. was prepared to assume that on the whole of the evidence, a reasonable and properly instructed jury could conclude that the knife was a prohibited weapon. However, he held that a failure to consider all of the evidence constitutes an error in assessing the sufficiency of the evidence, and since such an error falls within the jurisdiction of the preliminary inquiry judge, it is not reviewable.

IV. Relevant Statutory Provisions

11 Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46

548. (1) When all the evidence has been taken by the justice, he shall

(a) if in his opinion there is sufficient evidence to put the accused on trial for the offence charged or any other indictable offence in respect of the same transaction, order the accused to stand trial; or

(b) discharge the accused, if in his opinion on the whole of the evidence no sufficient case is made out to put the accused on trial for the offence charged or any other indictable offence in respect of the same transaction.

Regulations Prescribing Certain Firearms and other Weapons, Components and Parts of Weapons, Accessories, Cartridge Magazines, Ammunition and Projectiles as Prohibited or Restricted,
SOR/98-462

4. The weapons listed in Part 3 of the schedule are prohibited weapons for the purposes of paragraph (b) of the definition “prohibited weapon” in subsection 84(1) of the Criminal Code.

...

PART 3

...

15. The device known as “Brass Knuckles” and any similar device consisting of a band of metal with one or more finger holes designed to fit over the fingers of the hand.

V. Analysis

A. Jurisdiction

12 There is no dispute that the jurisdiction of a preliminary inquiry judge is statutory and not inherent. In Forsythe v. The Queen, 1980 CanLII 15 (SCC), [1980] 2 S.C.R. 268, Laskin C.J. acknowledged that there are few situations in which a preliminary inquiry judge can lose jurisdiction, but noted, at pp. 271-72, that “jurisdiction will be lost by a magistrate who fails to observe a mandatory provision of the Criminal Code”. He went on to say that the judge presiding at a preliminary inquiry “has the obligation to obey the jurisdictional prescriptions of s. 475 [now s. 548] of the Criminal Code”.

13 In Dubois v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 60 (SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 366, Estey J. affirmed, at p. 377:

Jurisdictional error is committed where “mandatory provisions” of the Criminal Code are not followed, and in the context of s. 475 [now s. 548], this means at least that there must be some basis in the evidence proffered for the justice’s decision to commit.

14 In the decision under review, Laskin J.A. held that it is not a jurisdictional requirement of s. 548(1)(b) that the preliminary inquiry judge consider “the whole of the evidence”. He stated, at para. 37, that he reached this conclusion because to accept that a failure to consider “the whole of the evidence” is a jurisdictional error risks turning virtually every error of law into a jurisdictional error. This would be contrary to numerous authorities, including Dubois, which have held that many errors of law are not jurisdictional. Indeed, the mere failure to consider relevant evidence has been held by the Supreme Court of Canada not even to amount to an error of law: see R. v. Morin (1992)

15 With respect, Laskin J.A. appears to have taken the reasoning of this Court in Morin out of context. R. v. Morin, 1992 CanLII 40 (SCC), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 286, was not a preliminary inquiry, but a trial. At p. 297, Sopinka J., for the Court, held that there was no basis for concluding that the trial judge had failed to consider the totality of the evidence in reaching the verdict. While it is open to the trial judge to assess the quality, credibility and reliability of evidence, a preliminary inquiry judge is prohibited from making such findings: see R. v. Arcuri, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 828, 2001 SCC 54, at para. 30. As the preliminary inquiry judge correctly stated in this appeal: “Assessing the quality and reliability of the evidence, or weighing the evidence for competing inferences in determining whether there is sufficient evidence for committal is not permitted at this stage of the proceedings.”

16 In Forsythe, supra, at p. 272, Laskin C.J. emphasized that the “[m]ere disallowance of a question or questions on cross-examination or other rulings on proffered evidence [in a preliminary inquiry] would not, in [his] view, amount to a jurisdictional error.”

17 The respondent questions why the failure of a preliminary hearing judge to consider evidence tendered by the Crown amounts to jurisdictional error, but the erroneous exclusion of evidence at the preliminary hearing does not. The answer is not elusive. The preliminary inquiry judge has jurisdiction to conduct the inquiry according to the rules of evidence. Any error with respect to the application of those rules that does not rise to the level of a denial of natural justice (which also goes to jurisdiction: see Dubois, supra, at p. 377; Forsythe, supra, at p. 272) constitutes an error of law, not a jurisdictional error. Errors of law are not reviewable by way of certiorari.

18 Section 548(1)(b) requires the preliminary inquiry judge to consider “the whole of the evidence” that “has been taken” during the preliminary inquiry. The primary purpose of a preliminary inquiry is to “ascertain whether there is sufficient evidence to warrant committing the accused to trial”: R. v. Russell, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 804, 2001 SCC 53, at para. 20. It follows that Parliament never intended to allow decisions on the discharge of an accused to be made without full regard to all of the evidence. In my view, it is a jurisdictional error for a preliminary inquiry judge to fail to consider the “whole of the evidence” as required under s. 548(1)(b), and the Ontario Court of Appeal erred in concluding otherwise.

19 As Forsythe and Dubois make plain, the failure of a preliminary inquiry judge to comply with a mandatory statutory provision goes to jurisdiction and allows a reviewing court to intervene.

B. The Reasons of the Preliminary Inquiry Judge

20 As it is a jurisdictional error for a preliminary inquiry judge to discharge an accused under s. 548(1)(b) without considering “the whole of the evidence”, for the purposes of this appeal, the question that remains is whether or not Serré J. fulfilled this obligation.

21 While an exhaustive examination of all the evidence is not expected, her finding that the Crown failed to adduce any evidence that the handle of the knife was made of metal is unsupported by the record which reveals a considerable body of circumstantial evidence going to both counts. The absence of any reference to this circumstantial evidence in the reasons leads me to conclude that she failed to consider the whole of the evidence as required by s. 548(1)(b). As a result, she committed a jurisdictional error and her decision is subject to review on certiorari.

Serré J. began her reasons, which were delivered orally, by correctly stating the proper legal tests and outlining the role of the preliminary inquiry judge. She noted that the test for sufficiency is whether there is any admissible evidence, whether direct or circumstantial, upon which a reasonable jury properly instructed could convict the accused. [See United States of America v. Shephard, 1976 CanLII 8 (SCC), [1977] 2 S.C.R. 1067, at p. 1080; Arcuri, supra, at para. 21.]

The jurisprudence of this Court leaves no doubt that a preliminary inquiry judge commits a jurisdictional error by committing an accused for trial under s. 548(1)(a) when an essential element of the offence is not made out: see Skogman v. The Queen, 1984 CanLII 22 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 93, at p. 104; Dubois, supra, at p. 376; Russell, supra, at para. 21. Conversely, it is not a jurisdictional error for the preliminary inquiry judge, after considering the whole of the evidence and where there is an absence of direct evidence on each essential element of the offence, to erroneously conclude that the totality of the evidence (direct and circumstantial) is insufficient to meet the test for committal and to consequently discharge the accused under s. 548(1)(b): see Arcuri, supra, at paras. 21-23; Russell, supra, at para. 26. In that situation, it would be improper for a reviewing court to intervene merely because the preliminary inquiry judge's conclusion on sufficiency differs from that which the reviewing court would have reached: see Russell, supra, at para. 19. It is a jurisdictional error, however, for a preliminary inquiry judge to act arbitrarily: Dubois, supra, at p. 377.

Silence in the reasons alone may not necessarily be sufficient to justify the intervention of a reviewing court. As this Court has previously held, there must be some rational basis in the record to justify such intervention: see Macdonald v. The Queen, 1976 CanLII 140 (SCC), [1977] 2 S.C.R. 665, at p. 673 (involving reasons from a court martial); and R. v. Sheppard, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 869, 2002 SCC 26, at paras. 29-30 (involving reasons from a trial verdict).

25 After canvassing the case law, stating the legal rules to be followed and reciting the charges against the respondent, Serré J. said:

A critical examination of Mr. Campeau's evidence is warranted to determine whether it registers on the scales as any evidence at all to meet the [Shephard] test.

She then referred to excerpts from the direct and cross-examination of Mr. Campeau that confirmed his description of the knife ("silver with brass-knuckle type four rings that you would put your fingers through to hold on to the handle"), the fact that he never touched the knife or saw the blade, and that by referring to the handle as a "brass-knuckle type", he was not suggesting that it was made of brass.

26 Serré J. went on to explain what she found to be her task before stating her conclusion:

Can a Justice draw a reasonable inference from Mr. Campeau's knowledge of brass knuckles that the device was made of metal? Mr. Campeau simply identified the shape of the device; the grip of the knife bore four rings; it was silver in colour and could be used in a manner consistent with brass knuckles.

To apply, as suggested by the Crown, every-day meaning to the language on the exchange reproduced above, [i.e., excerpts from Mr. Campeau's direct and cross-examination] does not lead to the inference that the device was made of metal. The question on a preliminary inquiry always relates to the ability of the evidence to support a verdict of guilt in the eyes of the dispassionate jury, properly instructed on the law. The absence of evidence on an essential element will result in a discharge.

There is a distinction to be made between a situation where there is no evidence on an essential element of the charge and one where the evidence proffered suffers from frailties.

This is a clear situation where there was no evidence that the device was made of metal nor was there any evidence upon which a reasonably instructed jury could infer that the device was a prohibited weapon as defined in the regulations. [First emphasis in the certified transcription; second and third emphasis added.]

Clearly, Serré J. referred only to the testimony of Mr. Campeau and only to his description of the knife.

27 Laskin J.A. summarized, at paras. 23-24, some of the circumstantial evidence that appears to have not been considered by the preliminary inquiry judge: (1) the respondent did not make any notes of the incident in his police notebook; (2) the respondent did not make a police report about taking the knife; (3) the respondent did not turn over the knife though asked to do so by the investigating officer; (4) the respondent described the knife as a “jack-knife”; (5) the respondent’s wife arrived at the school upset and became even more upset “as the situation progressed”; (6) Mr. Campeau thought that the knife was “no ordinary knife” and that its presence in the school was as serious as if a gun had been found; (7) Mr. Campeau insisted that the police be called and later acknowledged that it was “not in every situation that the police would necessarily become involved”; (8) Mr. Campeau gave the knife to the respondent because he was a police officer, not because he was a concerned parent; (9) the respondent’s description of the knife was inconsistent with that given by Mr. Campeau.

28 As a result of her findings on the first count, Serré J. held that “[t]he second count of obstruct justice fails as a matter of course.” In the Court of Appeal, Laskin J.A., at para. 27, found merit in the argument that [i]f the knife was not a prohibited weapon the appellant was not required to refer to the incident in his notebook, make out a police report, or even return the knife. Therefore, the preliminary inquiry judge had no need to consider this circumstantial evidence once she had concluded the evidence was insufficient to show that the knife could be a prohibited weapon.

29 The second count alleges that the respondent on or about the 24th day of May 2000 at the Town of Monetville in the said region did wilfully attempt to defeat the course of justice in a judicial proceeding by, while acting in his capacity as a peace officer, failing to report a criminal offence and removing evidence of that offence, contrary to Section 139\(2\) of the Criminal Code of Canada.

30 Mr. Campeau insisted that the police attend the school because of the presence of the knife and the allegations of threats made by the respondent's son. The respondent was bound by Ontario Provincial Police duty requirements to complete General Occurrence Reports or other law enforcement forms and to maintain "a daily journal which thoroughly and chronologically details experienced, investigated or reported events and occurrences during each duty period". In addition, s. 42 of the Ontario Police Services Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.15, also imposes an obligation on police officers to perform those assigned duties. It is noteworthy that Constable Renauld documented her attendance at the school even though she was under the impression that the respondent was attending to a personal family matter and not a complaint requiring a police investigation. Considering that the suspect of the complaint was his son, the respondent, understandably, would not have been expected to conduct the ensuing investigation, but he was expected, in the performance of his duties, to secure any evidence, document and report the complaint so that another investigator could be assigned.

31 I agree with the reviewing judge, Gauthier J., that the preliminary inquiry judge's finding that the second count "failed as a matter of course" amounted "to a non-assessment of the circumstantial evidence which was before the court”.

32 The respondent contends that since the testimony of the three Crown witnesses was heard over the course of one day and the preliminary inquiry judge had the benefit of submissions from counsel, not to mention a transcript of the evidence, the fact that she chose to focus on a specific portion of the evidence in her reasons does not suggest that she did so to the exclusion of the other evidence. This argument, though, cuts both ways. The evidence was heard on April 17, 2001, written submissions were made later, and oral submissions were presented on May 30. The decision was rendered on May 31. Given the time frame and the preponderance of circumstantial evidence, it is equally reasonable to expect that if Serré J. had considered the strength of the inferences that could be drawn from the circumstantial evidence, she would have made some reference to her assessment in the reasons.

33 Section 548(1)(b) is a mandatory provision. In addition to Mr. Campeau’s description of the knife there was, as already noted, a mountain of additional circumstantial evidence. It is evident from the record that the preliminary inquiry judge was aware of this material and had, at times, some of it in her possession. However, there is nothing in the record or in the reasons of the preliminary inquiry judge that indicates that she considered the whole of the evidence. There is no requirement for fulsome reasons why evidence at a preliminary inquiry has been rejected, but there must be some indication that the mandatory requirement of the Criminal Code has been complied with. The failure to do so results in a loss of jurisdiction.

34 It is now plain from Canadian jurisprudence that a trial judge is not required to give extensive reasons for a decision, but is bound to indicate what he or she understands the nature of the case to be so that the parties are aware that the case they argued was the one decided: see Sheppard, supra. Similarly, a preliminary inquiry judge is not required to render extensive reasons but must demonstrate that he or she met the statutory and mandatory duty to consider the whole of the evidence. It hardly needs saying that had the proceedings been a trial and not a preliminary inquiry, an acquittal of the respondent for the reasons given by Serré J. not to commit would likely be sustained. However, the mandatory duty imposed on the judge at a preliminary inquiry to consider the whole of the evidence requires some clear indication that this obligation was met. In my view, the reasons at issue here do not satisfy this requirement.

35 I find that the preliminary inquiry judge committed a jurisdictional error on both counts by failing to consider the whole of the evidence before discharging the respondent.

36 Fish J. concludes at para. 82 that if the preliminary inquiry judge erred at all, “her error concerned the sufficiency of the evidence and was not subject to review on certiorari”. He postulates at para. 62:

And it is well established that an error as to the sufficiency of the evidence cannot properly be characterized as “jurisdictional”, except where it results in a committal to trial in the absence of some evidence capable of supporting a conviction. . . .

He then quotes McLachlin C.J. at paras. 28-29 of Russell, supra. In that passage, McLachlin C.J. clarified that the principles that govern jurisdictional errors are the same, regardless of whether such an error is raised by the Crown or by the accused. However, the reasons went on to state that practically speaking, the Crown and the accused would face disparate effects of errors as to the essential elements of a crime. She wrote (at para. 29):

While it is true that the effect of this principle is that errors as to the essential elements of the crime will, as a general rule, be reviewable when challenged by the accused but not when challenged by the Crown, this disparity reflects the balance of harms

[Emphasis in original.]

37 As discussed at para. 23 above, when it is the accused who raises a jurisdictional error, he or she will succeed if it can be shown that there was no evidence as to some essential element of the crime. In referring to disparate effects faced by the Crown and the accused, I read McLachlin C.J. to be referring to the fact that, on the other hand, the Crown cannot demonstrate a jurisdictional error merely by showing that there was some evidence on each essential element of the crime. This is because it would be improper for the reviewing court to intervene merely because it would have reached a different conclusion from the preliminary inquiry judge as to the sufficiency of the evidence. However, a decision as to the sufficiency of evidence is beyond review by certiorari only when it was made by a preliminary inquiry judge who was acting within his or her jurisdiction, pursuant to the mandatory provisions of s. 548.

38 Fish J. would dismiss the appeal on the basis that the preliminary inquiry judge made a determination as to the sufficiency of the evidence that was within her jurisdiction. However, under s. 548(1)(b), a preliminary inquiry judge must consider “the whole of the evidence” in order to determine whether “no sufficient case is made out to put the accused on trial”. In this case, the preliminary inquiry judge did not consider “the whole of the evidence” as mandated by s. 548(1)(b), and such an error is jurisdictional.

VI. Disposition

39 I would therefore allow the appeal, set aside the discharge order and remit the matter to the preliminary inquiry judge to consider the whole of the evidence.

The following are the reasons delivered by 40 BINNIE J. (dissenting) — I agree with Major J., as a matter of law, that the failure of a preliminary inquiry judge to consider “the whole of the evidence” as prescribed by s. 548\(1\)\(b\) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, before discharging an accused, would, if established, constitute a jurisdictional error. Of course, it is the duty of any court or tribunal to consider “the whole of the evidence”. Nevertheless Parliament has chosen to turn this general duty into a specific statutory condition precedent to the exercise of the power of discharge. As such, it is mandatory, and failure to comply would result in loss of jurisdiction.

41 My disagreement with Major J. is on the facts. As a practical matter, appellate courts should not be too quick to conclude that a preliminary inquiry judge has not considered “the whole of the evidence”. In the companion case of R. v. Sazant, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 635, 2004 SCC 77, the fatal flaws in the preliminary inquiry judge’s decision appear from what is said in his reasons. This case is different. The Crown relies entirely on what is not said. It is true that the preliminary inquiry judge made no specific mention of the circumstantial evidence. Nevertheless, as Major J. acknowledges at para. 34, what is required is that the reasons “indicate what he or she understands the nature of the case to be so that the parties are aware that the case they argued was the one decided”. Here both the Crown and the defence demonstrated in their respective submissions to the hearing judge that they regarded Mr. Campeau’s evidence as the focus of the contending arguments. Inferences from the subsequent conduct of the accused were secondary. In R. v. Sheppard, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 869, 2002 SCC 26, we confirmed the duty on trial judges to give reasons adequate for the function they perform, including appellate review, but we also held in R. v. Braich, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 903, 2002 SCC 27 \(released at the same time\), at para. 25, that in the case of a conviction:

Enough was said in the trial judge’s reasons to show that he came to grips with the issues thus defined by the defence. His decision ought not to be reversed simply because he did not advert to all of the secondary or collateral circumstances that the respondents say had a bearing on the main issue.

42 The “main issue” here was whether the alleged prohibited weapon was made of metal, as charged in the information. The Crown cannot, in fairness, demand a higher and more meticulous standard of reasons in dealing with this issue where the accused has been discharged (or acquitted) than where the accused has been committed (or convicted). It has not been demonstrated by the Crown that the preliminary inquiry judge likely overlooked the circumstantial evidence now relied upon. We have no reason to believe she did not consider “the whole of the evidence”. I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

The following are the reasons delivered by

43 LEBEL J. (dissenting) — Although I concur with Major J. in the companion case R. v. Sazant, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 635, 2004 SCC 77, I agree with Fish J. in the present appeal that the preliminary inquiry judge did not commit any jurisdictional error. In my opinion, in the circumstances of this case, the appellant did not establish that Serré J. had actually failed to consider the “whole of the evidence”. Such a failure would have been a jurisdictional error, whether it resulted in an improper discharge or an unwarranted committal. For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal.

The following are the reasons delivered by

FISH J. (dissenting) —

I. Overview

44 Douglas Deschamplain, the respondent, was discharged at the conclusion of his preliminary inquiry on both counts of an information laid against him under the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46. The first count was for possession of “a prohibited weapon, to wit a brass knuckle knife”; the second, for obstructing justice by “failing to report a criminal offence and removing evidence of that offence”.

45 It is common ground that Mr. Deschamplain could not properly be committed to trial on the first count in the absence of some evidence upon which a jury could reasonably conclude that the handle of the “brass knuckle knife” (or band to which the “knuckle holes” were attached) was made of metal. As Laskin J.A. explained in the court below:

Not every knife is a prohibited weapon. Section 84(1) of the Code defines a “prohibited weapon” as “(b) any weapon, other than a firearm, that is prescribed to be a prohibited weapon”. Those weapons prescribed to be prohibited are listed in Regulation SOR/98-462. In this case the relevant provision of the Regulation is part 3, section 15, which prescribes as prohibited “[t]he device known as ‘Brass Knuckles’ and any similar device consisting of a band of metal with one or more finger holes designed to fit over the fingers of the hand”. [Emphasis in original.]

((2003), 2003 CanLII 52134 \(ON CA\), 173 C.C.C. (3d) 130, at para. 16)

46 It is common ground as well that Mr. Deschamplain could not be committed on the second count unless he was also committed on the first: if the evidence was insufficient to establish possession of a prohibited weapon, Mr. Deschamplain could hardly be sent to trial for failing to report that offence or for removing evidence of its commission.

47 In this case, the respondent, Mr. Deschamplain, had admitted possession of the knife. His committal to trial on both counts therefore depended on whether the evidence, in the opinion of the justice, was sufficient to support a reasonable inference that the handle of the knife was “made of metal”, in the sense mentioned above. After studying the transcript, considering the submissions of counsel, and reserving the matter overnight for deliberation and decision, Serré J. answered that question in the negative and discharged Mr. Deschamplain.

48 Section 548(1) of the Criminal Code provides:

548. (1) When all the evidence has been taken by the justice, he shall

(a) if in his opinion there is sufficient evidence to put the accused on trial for the offence charged or any other indictable offence in respect of the same transaction, order the accused to stand trial; or

(b) discharge the accused, if in his opinion on the whole of the evidence no sufficient case is made out to put the accused on trial for the offence charged or any other indictable offence in respect of the same transaction.

49 The governing principles are well established. The decision of the justice to commit or to discharge is not appealable. It is, however, reviewable on certiorari, but only for excess of jurisdiction. An error as to the sufficiency of the evidence is not reviewable on certiorari except where it results in a committal to trial in the absence of any evidence capable of supporting a conviction. Nor is the failure of a justice to explicitly advert to relevant and admissible evidence, whether wrongly excluded or properly admitted. In some instances, errors of this sort may be appealed as errors of law: see, for example, ss. 675, 676, 691 and 693 of the Criminal Code. At the preliminary inquiry, however, they are neither appealable nor reviewable on certiorari.

50 Looking beyond the form to the substance of the matter, the Crown's attack on Serré J.'s decision amounts, in my respectful view, to an appeal that does not lie, dressed up as a prerogative remedy that cannot fly. The Superior Court of Justice nonetheless found that Serré J. had exceeded her jurisdiction and therefore granted certiorari. In the opinion of the reviewing judge, there was direct evidence that the knife in question here was a prohibited weapon. The Crown acknowledged in the Court of Appeal that the reviewing judge, on this point, was wrong.

51 The decision of the Superior Court was in turn set aside by the Court of Appeal for Ontario. Speaking for a unanimous court, Laskin J.A. held that Serré J. did not exceed her jurisdiction in discharging the respondent. Major J. would allow the Crown's present appeal against that judgment.

52 I agree with Major J. (at para. 22) that Serré J. "correctly stat[ed] the proper legal tests and outlin[ed] the role of the preliminary inquiry judge". With respect, however, I do not share his conclusion (at para. 35) that Serré J. exceeded her jurisdiction "by failing to consider the whole of the evidence before discharging the respondent".

53 This conclusion rests, ultimately, on the omission of Serré J. to mention explicitly in her reasons certain elements of circumstantial evidence. On this issue, able and experienced Crown counsel stated on the hearing of the appeal that she could not even make this argument if Serré J. "[had] said anywhere in her reasons: I've considered all of the other evidence—.

54 The failure of Serré J. to include this sort of generalized assertion in her reasons, delivered orally, does not persuade me that she failed to consider all of the evidence before deciding to discharge the respondent; on the contrary, the Crown's reliance on this purportedly fatal "omission" simply exposes the frail foundation of the Crown's appeal.

55 I shall later explain in some detail why I am not persuaded that Serré J. failed to consider all of the evidence. It appears to me, rather, that she did not explicitly set out the circumstantial evidence mentioned by Major J. because she did not consider it probative on the only decisive issue before her: whether the knife that the respondent had in his possession at the relevant time was a “prohibited weapon” within the meaning of the Criminal Code (s. 84(1)). That depended on the composition of its handle. Serré J. evidently agreed with defence counsel that the circumstantial evidence set out in my colleague’s reasons could not support a rational conclusion that the handle of the knife was made of metal, as required by the relevant regulation (SOR/98-462, Part 3, s. 15).

56 But even if Serré J. was mistaken in this regard, her error related to the sufficiency of the evidence. And, as I have already mentioned, it is well established that an error as to the sufficiency of the evidence is not reviewable on certiorari.

57 For these reasons and the reasons that follow, I would dismiss the appeal.

II. Review for “Jurisdictional Error”

58 An erroneous committal or discharge, I again emphasize, is not appealable and is only reviewable on certiorari for want or excess of jurisdiction. Estey J., speaking for the majority in Skogman v. The Queen, 1984 CanLII 22 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 93, thus explained (at p. 100):

It is clear . . . that certiorari remains available to the courts for the review of the functioning of the preliminary hearing tribunal only where it is alleged that the tribunal has acted in excess of its assigned statutory jurisdiction or has acted in breach of the principles of natural justice which, by the authorities, is taken to be an excess of jurisdiction It need only be added by way of emphasis that such certiorari review does not authorize a superior court to reach inside the functioning of the statutory tribunal for the purpose of challenging a decision reached by that tribunal within its assigned jurisdiction on the ground that the tribunal committed an error of law in reaching that decision, or reached a conclusion different from that which the reviewing tribunal might have reached.

See also Forsythe v. The Queen, 1980 CanLII 15 (SCC), [1980] 2 S.C.R. 268; R. v. Russell, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 804, 2001 SCC 53; Dubois v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 60 (SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 366.

59 Major J. finds that the justice in this case committed a “jurisdictional error” in failing to take into account some of the evidence adduced before her. In my colleague’s view, this omission violated a “mandatory provision of the Criminal Code”, within the meaning of Doyle v. The Queen, 1976 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 597; Dubois, supra; and Forsythe, supra, in that s. 548(1)(b) of the Code requires a preliminary inquiry justice to “discharge the accused, if in his opinion on the whole of the evidence no sufficient case is made out to put the accused on trial for the offence charged . . .” (emphasis added).

60 In this regard, Laskin J.A. stated (at para. 36):

I acknowledge that in . . . Dubois [at p. 377], Estey J. wrote that “[j]urisdictional error is committed where ‘mandatory provisions’ of the Criminal Code are not followed” and that the requirement in s. 548(1)(b) to consider “the whole of the evidence” before discharging the accused could be characterized as “mandatory”. It seems to me, however, that for several reasons, failing to comply with this kind of provision cannot amount to jurisdictional error. [Emphasis added.]

61

Laskin J.A. then proceeded to explain why the omission of a justice to take into account some of the relevant evidence, even when viewed as a failure to comply with s. 548(1)(b), will not for that reason amount to a jurisdictional error subject to review on certiorari.

62

As we shall soon see, I am not persuaded at all that the justice in this case failed to consider the circumstantial evidence mentioned by Major J. In my view, the error imputed by the Crown to Serré J. in this regard amounts, at its highest, to an error as to the sufficiency of the evidence taken as a whole. And it is well established that an error as to the sufficiency of the evidence cannot properly be characterized as “jurisdictional”, except where it results in a committal to trial in the absence of some evidence capable of supporting a conviction. As McLachlin C.J., speaking for a unanimous Court, explained in Russell, supra, at paras. 28-29:

The Crown’s argument here is that under the “parity” principle of Dubois, if a preliminary judge’s error as to the elements of a crime is unreviewable when challenged by the Crown (as the Crown contends is the law under Tremblay), that kind of error must also be unreviewable when challenged by the accused. The Crown argues that “the availability of certiorari does not turn on the identity of the party seeking that relief, but rather on the nature of the alleged error”. I find nothing objectionable in that assertion, but I cannot see how it warrants the conclusion that the alleged error in this case is unreviewable on certiorari. The fault lies in the Crown’s characterization of the error as “an alleged misinterpretation of the elements of the offence”. When characterized this way, it is indeed difficult to see how it can be that the accused can challenge such an error though the Crown cannot. The logic becomes clear, however, once the rule is framed, as it should be, in terms of the jurisdiction of the preliminary inquiry judge: whether the error is challenged by the Crown or by the accused, an error is reviewable on certiorari only if it is jurisdictional. If it is not jurisdictional, no recourse to certiorari may be had. It is not the fact that it is the accused seeking certiorari here that makes the error reviewable. It is the fact that the error is jurisdictional.

The discrepancy that troubles the Crown is not, in my view, disturbing. As I note above, the governing principle is the same whether an error is challenged by the Crown or by the accused. While it is true that the effect of this principle is that errors as to the essential elements of the crime will, as a general rule, be reviewable when challenged by the accused but not when challenged by the Crown, this disparity reflects the balance of harms: a wrongful discharge does not raise the possibility of a violation of s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; by contrast, I think it clear that committing an individual to stand trial on a charge for which there is no evidence on one of the essential elements would violate the principles of fundamental justice. I note, moreover, that in circumstances such as were at issue in Tremblay, the Crown is free, subject to the requirements of s. 577 of the Criminal Code, to lay a new information or prefer an indictment. There is no analogous remedy available to the accused. [Emphasis in original.]

63 I take care not to be understood to have decided here that a failure to consider relevant evidence will never amount to reviewable error. With respect, however, I do not subscribe to a jurisdictional distinction in this regard between preliminary inquiries and summary trials, for example — which are almost everywhere in Canada generally conducted by the very same judges — or between common law courts and courts created by statute. A superior court is, of course, vested with discretionary prerogatives not shared by statutory courts and tribunals. In my view, however, it enjoys no exclusive or inherent powers regarding an omission to consider relevant evidence.

64 As Laskin J.A. noted, this Court, in R. v. Morin, 1992 CanLII 40 (SCC), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 286, has held that the failure of a trial judge to consider relevant evidence will not necessarily amount to an error of law. Delivering the judgment of the Court in Morin, Sopinka J. put the matter this way: “[f]ailure to appreciate [all of] the evidence cannot amount to an error of law unless the failure is based on a misapprehension of some legal principle” (p. 295). This rule, it appears, would apply even where “the trial judge [has] failed to appreciate important evidence”: see R. v. Sheppard, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 869, 2002 SCC 26, at para. 47 (emphasis added).

65 The error imputed in this case to Serré J. was not “based on a misapprehension of some legal principle”. Assuming, in this context only, that Serré J. did indeed fail to appreciate some of the relevant evidence, as alleged by the appellant, I find it unnecessary to decide whether this constituted an error in law within the meaning of Morin, supra. I think it sufficient to say that she did not thereby commit a jurisdictional error giving rise to certiorari.

III. Serré J.’s Consideration of Evidence

66 The appellant, I repeat once more, has failed to persuade me that Serr— J. discharged the respondent without considering the whole of the evidence.

67 It is undisputed that Serré J., before concluding that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a committal for trial, instructed herself correctly as to the role of a justice at a preliminary inquiry. Moreover, she instructed herself impeccably as to the test for sufficiency as it related specifically to the offences charged in both counts.

68 The Crown contends that Serré J. examined some but not all of the evidence capable of supporting a committal and thereby exceeded her jurisdiction in discharging the respondent. Specifically, the appellant relies on Serr— J.’s question, “Can a Justice draw a reasonable inference from Mr. Campeau’s knowledge of brass knuckles that the device was made of metal?” (emphasis in original), to support the conclusion that Serré J. considered only the evidence of Guy Campeau, while ignoring other circumstantial evidence that could support a finding that the object was a prohibited weapon. Major J. has reviewed that other circumstantial evidence, much of which relates to the respondent’s “subsequent conduct”, in considerable detail and there is thus no need for me to do so again here.

70 First, we are not entitled to assume from the justice's silence regarding a particular piece of evidence that she has not considered that evidence as she is required by s. 548(1)(b) to do. I think it more plausible to infer that Serré J. simply found that the evidence not explicitly mentioned by her had no significant probative value and, therefore, no impact on the sufficiency of the evidence taken as a whole.

71 A reviewing court must take care not to fill with presumptively adverse assumptions the gaps it sees in the reasons given by a justice at the conclusion of a preliminary inquiry. Here, there is no basis for supposing, because Serré J. mentioned the strongest evidence relied on by the prosecution, that she overlooked or “failed to consider” other evidence that may be thought by some to have a bearing on that issue. On my reading of the record, it is more likely by far that these other items of evidence, individually or collectively considered, could not in her opinion reasonably support an inculpatory finding on the one critical issue in the case as it had unfolded before her: whether the “brass knuckle knife” Mr. Deschamplain admittedly had in his possession was a prohibited weapon within the meaning of the Criminal Code.

72 Second, there is some indication in Serr— J.'s reasons, delivered orally, that she did in fact assess the circumstantial evidence adduced by the Crown, and found it to be insufficient to warrant a committal. The question relied upon by the appellant must be taken in the context of Serr— J.'s reasons read as a whole. Serré J. dealt with the Crown's evidence on the composition of the “brass knuckle knife” as follows:

Counsel for the prosecution invites the Court to safely act on the evidence of Guy Campeau and commit the accused to trial.

Crown Counsel submits that the Court can draw from the record and from the application of the common usage of the language given to the phrase ‘brass knuckle’, a reasonable inference to commit.

Counsel for the defence argues that the Crown is engaging in conjecture, and that it is insufficient for a committal that the inferences which Crown counsel asks the Court to draw leads to speculative rather than logical and precise inferences of guilt objectively grounded in evidence. . . .

Can a Justice draw a reasonable inference from Mr. Campeau’s knowledge of brass knuckles that the device was made of metal? Mr. Campeau simply identified the shape of the device; the grip of the knife bore four rings; it was silver in colour and could be used in a manner consistent with brass knuckles. [First, second and third emphasis added; fourth emphasis in certified transcript.]

73 In this regard, I find it helpful to reproduce here a relevant extract from the reasons of Laskin J.A. in the Court of Appeal (at paras. 7-8):

The box with the knife in it was turned over to one of the teachers at the school, Guy Campeau. Mr. Campeau took the box back to his office, opened the lid, and looked at the knife. At the preliminary hearing he testified that the knife was “silver with brass knuckle type four rings that you would put your finger through to hold onto the handle”. On cross-examination he acknowledged that he never took the knife out of the box or even touched it. He also acknowledged that although he described the knife as a “brass knuckle type knife” he was not suggesting that it was made of brass. . . .

Mr. Campeau was not asked, either on direct examination or on cross-examination, whether either the four rings or the handle to which they were attached was made of metal.

74 While Serré J. did focus her attention on the evidence of Mr. Campeau, she also adverted to the Crown’s submissions regarding reasonable inferences that could be drawn from the record. Serr— J.’s assessment of the sufficiency of this body of evidence was within her jurisdiction: she was entitled — indeed, required — to determine what inferences it could reasonably support, and she was entitled to conclude, as she did, that those inferences were speculative in nature.

75 Third, it is not at all surprising that the justice, in giving her reasons, focussed on the evidence of Mr. Campeau. Crown counsel, in his submissions relating to the composition of the weapon, referred Serr— J. exclusively to the teacher’s testimony:

Mr. Campeau in his evidence, and perhaps the better way of doing this is taking it to the defendant’s written submissions. This would be found at page 7. He describes it was silver, brass knuckle type, 4 rings that you could put your finger through to hold on to the handle and then at the bottom of page 7 he says “I’ve never seen brass knuckles before but from what I know of them you slide your 4 fingers into a grip and you hold on to it this way.” Then I got him to describe the fact that he held it up with his fist closed and in my respectful submission that is sufficient evidence for these purposes.

Counsel went on to discuss the importance of the other circumstantial evidence, particularly the respondent’s “subsequent conduct”, in relation to the respondent’s state of mind and with respect to the obstruction of justice charge. As I have mentioned, however, it is conceded that a committal for obstruction could not stand in the absence of a committal on the count for possession of a prohibited weapon.

76 Crown counsel was most familiar with the theory of his case, the relative importance of the various pieces of evidence, and the viability of the inferences to be drawn from them. The claim of the defence to a discharge rested on an assertion that there was no evidence upon which a trier of fact could reasonably find that the knife in question was a prohibited weapon.

Understandably, Crown counsel, in responding to that submission, relied on the testimony of Mr. Campeau concerning the appearance of the knife, rather than on the more speculative and tenuous evidence of “subsequent conduct”. It is hardly surprising that Serr— J. likewise thought it unnecessary to do so. Instead, she dealt in detail with what the Crown itself evidently (and correctly) considered to be its strongest and most significant evidence in relation to the nature of the weapon. In my view, Serré J. committed no jurisdictional error in doing so.

77 Finally, as I mentioned earlier, the preliminary inquiry in this case was not conducted in a disjointed or hurried manner, and the disposition was not reached precipitously or without reflection. Serr— J. heard all the Crown’s evidence together and on the same day. She then adjourned for six weeks before hearing submissions with the benefit of a full transcript of the evidence.

78 In their submissions, both counsel drew Serr— J.’s attention to the circumstantial evidence adduced by the Crown, including the respondent’s “subsequent conduct”. Understandably, they offered differing assessments of the import of that evidence. Moreover, they related it essentially to the respondent’s state of mind rather than to the composition of the “prohibited weapon”. Serr— J. then adjourned until the next morning, with the transcript of the evidence in hand, in order to “review the submissions of counsel, together with the case law that has been provided”.

79 As a general rule, the reasons set out in a judge’s decision provide the safest measure of what was in the judge’s mind when that decision was rendered. Earlier comments, particularly if they are remote in time or expressed in evidently tentative terms, are of little value in determining the soundness of the judgment. This, however, does not entitle a reviewing court to assume that evidence canvassed by opposing counsel in their extensive and detailed submissions vanished overnight from the judge’s realm of contemplation. And I would not do so here.

80 As McLachlin J. has stated in another context, “[t]he fact that a trial judge misstates himself at one point should not vitiate his ruling if the preponderance of what was said shows that the proper test was applied and if the decision can be justified on the evidence”: R. v. B. (C.R.), 1990 CanLII 142 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 717, at p. 737. This Court should show no less deference in reviewing the decision of a justice to discharge at the conclusion of a preliminary inquiry.

81 This is especially so where, as here, the preponderance of what transpired before the justice, and what she expressly stated, amply demonstrate that she understood and considered all of the relevant issues. More particularly, it is clear from the record that Serré J. was perfectly aware of the limited nature of her task, of the test she was to apply in discharging it, of the essential elements of the offences charged and of the evidence relied on by the prosecution to establish those elements.

82 If Serr— J. erred at all, it was, of course, not in “misstating” herself, but rather in failing to refer explicitly to some of the circumstantial evidence which may be thought by others to have warranted a committal to trial. Here, I repeat, Serré J. heard all the relevant evidence, received and examined a transcript of that evidence, considered it in the light of counsels’ submissions, adjourned to consider the evidence and to review the governing principles, and set out flawlessly the law governing her role in determining whether to commit for trial. I think it both right and fair to assume that she proceeded to apply the principles she had so carefully set out. I see no basis for assuming the opposite. If she nonetheless erred in the result, her error concerned the sufficiency of the evidence and was not subject to review on certiorari.

IV. Conclusion

For all of the foregoing reasons and with respect for the contrary conclusion of Major J., I would therefore, as stated at the outset, dismiss the appeal.

Appeal allowed, BINNIE, LEBEL and FISH JJ. dissenting.

Solicitor for the appellant: Attorney General of Ontario, Toronto.

Solicitors for the respondent: Kelly Jennings & Lacy, Toronto.

TAB 9

Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62 (CanLII), [2003] 3 SCR 3

Source:	Supreme Court of Canada
Date:	2003-11-06
File number:	28807
Other citations:	232 DLR (4th) 577 — 312 NR 1 — 218 NSR (2d) 311 — 687 APR 311 — 112 CRR (2d) 202 — 45 CPC (5th) 1 — [2003] CarswellNS 375 — JE 2003-2076 — [2003] SCJ No 63 (QL) — [2003] ACS no 63
Citation:	Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62 (CanLII), [2003] 3 SCR 3, < https://canlii.ca/t/4nx4 >, retrieved on 2026-03-22
Most recent unfavourable mention	R. v. Warren , 2024 ONSC 2785 (CanLII) [...] Mr. Warren’s case is distinguishable from Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education) , 2003 SCC 62 (CanLII) , [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3, as s. 12 of the Charter does not contain the same “affirmative promise” as the provision of minority language education in s. 23. [...]

Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3, 2003 SCC 62

Glenda Doucet-Boudreau, Alice Boudreau, Jocelyn Bourbeau, Bernadette Cormier-Marchand, Yolande Levert and Cyrille Leblanc, in their name and in the name of all Nova Scotia parents who are entitled to the right, under Section 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, to have their children educated in the language of the minority, namely the French language, in publicly funded French-language school facilities, and Fédération des parents acadiens de la Nouvelle-Écosse Inc.

Appellants

Attorney General of Nova Scotia

Respondent

and

Attorney General of Canada, Attorney General of Ontario, Attorney General of New Brunswick, Attorney General of Newfoundland and Labrador, Commissioner of Official Languages for Canada, Fédération nationale des conseillères et conseillers scolaires francophones, Fédération des associations de juristes d'expression française de Common Law Inc. (FAJEFCL) and Conseil scolaire acadien provincial (CSAP)

Interveners

Indexed as: Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education)

Neutral citation: 2003 SCC 62.

File No.: 28807.

2002: October 4; 2003: November 6.

Present: McLachlin C.J. and Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache, Binnie, Arbour, LeBel and Deschamps JJ.

on appeal from the court of appeal for nova scotia

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Enforcement — Remedy available for realization of minority language education rights — Trial judge ordering province to make best efforts to provide homogeneous French-language facilities and programs by particular dates — Order further requiring parties to appear before same judge periodically to report on status of those efforts — Whether trial judge had authority to retain jurisdiction to hear reports from Province on the status of those efforts as part of his remedy under s. 24(1) of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — Whether reporting order was “appropriate and just in the circumstances” — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 23, 24(1).

Appeals — Mootness — Appropriate and just remedy — Minority language education rights — Appeal raising important question about jurisdiction of superior courts to order what may be an effective remedy in some classes of cases — Moot appeal should be heard to provide guidance in similar cases.

The appellants are Francophone parents living in five school districts in Nova Scotia. They applied for an order directing the Province and the Conseil scolaire acadien provincial to provide, out of public funds, homogeneous French-language facilities and programs at the secondary school level. The trial judge noted that the government did not deny the existence or content of the parents’ rights under s. 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms but rather failed to prioritize those rights and delayed fulfilling its obligations, despite clear reports showing that assimilation was “reaching critical levels”. He found a s. 23 violation and ordered the Province and the Conseil to use their “best efforts” to provide school facilities and programs by particular dates. He retained jurisdiction to hear reports on the status of the efforts. The Province appealed the part of the order in which the trial judge retained his jurisdiction to hear reports. The majority of the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and struck down the impugned portion of the order. On the basis of the common law principle of functus officio, the majority held that the trial judge, having decided the issue between the parties, had no further jurisdiction to remain seized of the case. They also held that, while courts have broad ranging powers under s. 24(1) of the Charter to fashion remedies, the Charter does not extend a court’s jurisdiction to permit it to enforce its remedies.

Held (Major, Binnie, LeBel and Deschamps JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed and the trial judge’s order restored.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Gonthier, Iacobucci, Bastarache and Arbour JJ.: This appeal involves the nature of remedies available under s. 24(1) of the Charter for the realization of the minority language education rights protected by s. 23. A purposive approach to remedies in a Charter context requires that both the purpose of the right being protected and the purpose of the remedies provision be promoted. To do so, courts must issue effective, responsive remedies that guarantee full and meaningful protection of Charter rights and freedoms.

Section 23 of the Charter is designed to correct past injustices not only by halting the progressive erosion of minority official language cultures across Canada, but also by actively promoting their flourishing. While the rights are granted to individuals, they apply only if the “numbers warrant”. For every school year that governments do not meet their obligations under s. 23, there is an increased likelihood of assimilation which carries the risk that numbers might cease to “warrant”. If delay is tolerated, governments could potentially avoid the duties imposed upon them by s. 23. The affirmative promise contained in s. 23 and the critical need for timely compliance will sometimes require courts to order affirmative remedies to guarantee that language rights are meaningfully, and therefore necessarily promptly, protected.

Under s. 24(1) of the Charter, a superior court may craft any remedy that it considers appropriate and just in the circumstances. In doing so, it must exercise a discretion based on its careful perception of the nature of the right and of the infringement, the facts of the case, and the application of the relevant legal principles. The court must also be sensitive to its role as judicial arbiter and not fashion remedies which usurp the role of the other branches of governance. The boundaries of the courts’ proper role will vary according to the right at issue and the context of each case.

The nature and extent of remedies available under s. 24(1) remain limited by the words of the section itself and must be read in harmony with the rest of our Constitution. While it would be unwise at this point to attempt to define the expression “appropriate and just”, there are some broad considerations that judges should bear in mind in evaluating the appropriateness and justice of a potential remedy. An appropriate and just remedy in the circumstances of a Charter claim is one that meaningfully vindicates the rights and freedoms of the claimants and employs means that are legitimate within the framework of our constitutional democracy. It is a judicial one which vindicates the right while invoking the function and powers of a court. An appropriate and just remedy is also fair to the party against whom the order is made. Since s. 24 is part of a constitutional scheme for the vindication of fundamental rights and freedoms enshrined in the Charter, the judicial approach to remedies must remain flexible and responsive to the needs of a given case. The meaningful protection of Charter rights, and in particular the enforcement of s. 23 rights, may thus in some cases require the introduction of novel remedies. Lastly, the remedial power in s. 24(1) cannot be strictly limited by statutes or rules of the common law. However, insofar as the statutory provisions or common law rules express principles that are relevant to determining what is “appropriate and just in the circumstances”, they may be helpful to a court choosing a remedy under s. 24(1).

Here, the remedy ordered by the trial judge was appropriate and just in the circumstances. He exercised his discretion to select an effective remedy that meaningfully vindicated the s. 23 rights of the appellants in the context of serious rates of assimilation and a history of delay in the provision of French-language education. The order is a creative blending of remedies and processes already known to the courts in order to give life to the rights in s. 23. Given the critical rate of assimilation found by the trial judge, it was appropriate for him to grant a remedy that would in his view lead to prompt compliance. The remedy took into account, and did not depart unduly or unnecessarily from, the role of the courts in our constitutional democracy. The remedy vindicated the rights of the parents while leaving the detailed choices of means largely to the executive. The reporting order was judicial in the sense that it called on the functions and powers known to courts. The range of remedial orders available to courts in civil proceedings demonstrates that constitutional remedies involving some degree of ongoing supervision do not represent a radical break with the past practices of courts. Further, although the common law doctrine of functus officio cannot strictly pre-empt the remedial discretion in s. 24(1), an examination of the functus question indicates that the trial judge issued an order that is appropriately judicial. The retention of jurisdiction did not include any power to alter the disposition of the case and did nothing to undermine the provision of a stable basis for launching an appeal. Finally, in the context, the reporting order was not unfair to the government. While, in retrospect, it would certainly have been advisable for the trial judge to provide more guidance to the parties as to what they could expect from the reporting sessions, his order was not incomprehensible or impossible to follow. It was not vaguely worded so as to render it invalid.

Per Major, Binnie, LeBel and Deschamps JJ. (dissenting): While superior courts' powers to craft Charter remedies may not be constrained by statutory or common law limits, they are nonetheless bound by rules of fundamental justice and by constitutional boundaries. Such remedies should be designed keeping in mind the canons of good legal drafting, the fundamental importance of procedural fairness, and a proper awareness of the nature of the role of courts in our democratic political regime. In the context of constitutional remedies, courts fulfill their proper function by issuing orders precise enough for the parties to know what is expected of them, and by permitting the parties to execute those orders. Such orders are final. A court purporting to retain jurisdiction to oversee the implementation of a remedy, after a final order has been issued, will likely be acting inappropriately on two levels: (1) by attempting to extend the court's jurisdiction beyond its proper role, it will breach the separation of powers principle; (2) by acting after exhausting its jurisdiction, it will breach the functus officio doctrine.

Here, the drafting of the reporting order was anything but clear. The order gave the parties no clear notice of their obligations, the nature of the reports or even the purpose of the reporting hearings. The uncertainty engendered by the order amounted to a breach of procedural fairness. For this reason alone, the order can be found to be inappropriate under s. 24(1) and therefore void. In addition, the reporting order assumed that the judge could retain jurisdiction at will, after he had finally disposed of the matter of which he had been seized. As a general rule, courts should avoid interfering in the management of public administration. Once they have rendered judgment, they should resist the temptation to directly oversee or supervise the administration of their orders and operate under a presumption that judgments of courts will be executed with reasonable diligence and good faith. In this case, the trial judge assumed jurisdiction over a sphere traditionally outside the province of the judiciary, and also acted beyond the jurisdiction with which he was legitimately charged as a trial judge, thereby breaching the constitutional principle of separation of powers and the functus officio doctrine. His remedy undermined the proper role of the judiciary within our constitutional order and unnecessarily upset the balance between the three branches of government. Since no part of the Constitution can conflict with another, the trial judge's order for reporting hearings cannot be interpreted as appropriate and just under s. 24(1).

The proper development of the law of constitutional remedies requires that courts reconcile their duty to act within proper jurisdictional limits with the need to give full effect to the rights of a claimant. The intrusiveness of the trial judge's order was in no way necessary to secure the appellants' s. 23 Charter interests. In the present case, refusing superior courts the power to order reporting hearings clearly would not deny claimants' access to a recognized Charter remedy and, more importantly, to that which they are guaranteed by s. 23 — namely, the timely provision of minority language instruction facilities. If, as suggested by the appellants, the reporting hearings were an incentive for the government to comply with the best efforts order, it is difficult to see how they could have been more effective than the construction deadline coupled with the possibility of a contempt order. Moreover, at the level of constitutional principles, because this incentive is legal in nature, it would not have led to the improper politicization of the relationship between the judiciary and the executive. While a trial judge's decisions with respect to remedies are owed deference, this must be tempered when, as here, fundamental legal principles are threatened. Proper consideration of the principles of procedural fairness and the separation of powers is required to establish the requisite legitimacy and certainty essential to an appropriate and just remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter.

Cases Cited

By Iacobucci and Arbour JJ.

Referred to: Mills v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 17 (SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863; Borowski v. Canada (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 123 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 342; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union 2085 v. Winnipeg Builders' Exchange, 1967 CanLII 116 (SCC), [1967] S.C.R. 628; New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), 1999 CanLII 653 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46; Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145; R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295; Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, 1985 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486; Reference re Prov. Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), 1991 CanLII 61 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 158; Vriend v. Alberta, 1998 CanLII 816 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 493; R. v. Gamble, 1988 CanLII 15 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 595; R. v. Sarson, 1996 CanLII 200 (SCC), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 223; R. v. 974649 Ontario Inc., [2001] 3 S.C.R. 575, 2001 SCC 81; Mahe v. Alberta, 1990 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 342; Reference re Public Schools Act (Man.), s. 79(3), (4) and (7), 1993 CanLII 119 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 839; Arsenault-Cameron v. Prince Edward Island, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 3, 2000 SCC 1; R. v. Beaulac, 1999 CanLII 684 (SCC), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 768; Marchand v. Simcoe County Board of Education (1986), 1986 CanLII 2671 (ON SC), 29 D.L.R. (4th) 596; Marchand v. Simcoe County Board of Education (No. 2) (1987), 1987 CanLII 4129 (ON SC), 44 D.L.R. (4th) 171; Lavoie v. Nova Scotia (Attorney-General) (1988), 1988 CanLII 5684 (NS SC), 47 D.L.R. (4th) 586; Conseil des Écoles Séparées Catholiques Romaines de Dufferin et Peel v. Ontario (Ministre de l'Éducation et de la Formation) (1996), 1996 CanLII 12465 (ON SCDC), 136 D.L.R. (4th) 704, aff'd (1996), 1996 CanLII 11789 (ON SC), 30 O.R. (3d) 681; Conseil Scolaire Fransaskois de Zenon Park v. Saskatchewan, 1998 CanLII 13468 (SK QB), [1999] 3 W.W.R. 743, aff'd 1998 CanLII 12371 (SK CA), [1999] 12 W.W.R. 742; Assoc. Française des Conseils Scolaires de l'Ontario v. Ontario (1988), 1988 CanLII 4759 (ON CA), 66 O.R. (2d) 599; Assn. des parents francophones de la Colombie-Britannique v. British Columbia (1998), 1998

CanLII 3969 \(BC SC\), 167 D.L.R. (4th) 534; Re Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, 1981 CanLII 24 \(SCC\), [1981] 1 S.C.R. 714; Douglas/Kwantlen Faculty Assn. v. Douglas College, 1990 CanLII 63 \(SCC\), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 570; Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 \(SCC\), [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217; Fraser v. Public Service Staff Relations Board, 1985 CanLII 14 \(SCC\), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 455; New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v. Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), 1993 CanLII 153 \(SCC\), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 319; RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 \(SCC\), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199; Reference re Bill 30, An Act to amend the Education Act (Ont.), 1987 CanLII 65 \(SCC\), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1148; Schachter v. Canada, 1992 CanLII 74 \(SCC\), [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679; Nelles v. Ontario, 1989 CanLII 77 \(SCC\), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 170; MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, 1995 CanLII 57 \(SCC\), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725; Reference re Young Offenders Act (P.E.I.), 1991 CanLII 11713 \(SCC\), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 252; Mooring v. Canada (National Parole Board), 1996 CanLII 254 \(SCC\), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 75; Weber v. Ontario Hydro, 1995 CanLII 108 \(SCC\), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 929; R. v. Rahey, 1987 CanLII 52 \(SCC\), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 588; R. v. Smith, 1989 CanLII 12 \(SCC\), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 1120; Mareva Compania Naviera S.A. v. International Bulkcarriers S.A., [1975] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 509; Anton Piller KG v. Manufacturing Processes Ltd., [1976] 1 Ch. 55; Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1985 CanLII 33 \(SCC\), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721; Re Manitoba Language Rights Order, 1985 CanLII 9 \(SCC\), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 347; Re Manitoba Language Rights Order, 1990 CanLII 35 \(SCC\), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1417; Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1992 CanLII 115 \(SCC\), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 212; British Columbia (Association des parents francophones) v. British Columbia (1996), 1996 CanLII 1455 \(BC SC\), 139 D.L.R. (4th) 356; Société des Acadiens du Nouveau-Brunswick Inc. v. Minority Language School Board No. 50 (1983), 1983 CanLII 3785 \(NB KB\), 48 N.B.R. (2d) 361; Attorney-General v. Birmingham, Tame, and Rea District Drainage Board, [1910] 1 Ch. 48, aff'd [1912] A.C. 788; Kennard v. Cory Brothers and Co., [1922] 1 Ch. 265, aff'd [1922] 2 Ch. 1; Chandler v. Alberta Association of Architects, 1989 CanLII 41 \(SCC\), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 848; Reekie v. Messervey, 1990 CanLII 158 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 219.

By LeBel and Deschamps JJ. (dissenting)

Sonoco Ltd. v. Local 433 (1970), 1970 CanLII 763 \(BC CA\), 13 D.L.R. (3d) 617; Sporting Club du Sanctuaire Inc. v. 2320-4365 Québec Inc., 1989 CanLII 1210 \(QC CA\), [1989] R.D.J. 596; Supermarchés Jean Labrecque Inc. v. Flamand, 1987 CanLII 19 \(SCC\), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 219; MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, 1995 CanLII 57 \(SCC\), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725; Ocean Port Hotel Ltd. v. British Columbia (General Manager, Liquor Control and Licensing Branch), [2001] 2 S.C.R. 781, 2001 SCC 52; Bell Canada v. Canadian Telephone Employees Association, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 884, 2003 SCC 36; New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v. Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), 1993 CanLII 153 \(SCC\), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 319; Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 \(SCC\), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3; Fraser v. Public Service Staff Relations Board, 1985 CanLII 14 \(SCC\), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 455; Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 405, 2002 SCC 13; In re St. Nazaire Co. (1879), 12 Ch. D. 88; In re Swire (1885), 30 Ch. D. 239; Paper Machinery Ltd. v. J. O. Ross Engineering Corp., 1934 CanLII 1 \(SCC\), [1934] S.C.R. 186; Chandler v. Alberta Association of Architects, 1989 CanLII 41 \(SCC\), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 848; Grillas v. Minister of Manpower and Immigration, 1971 CanLII 3 \(SCC\), [1972] S.C.R. 577; R. v. H. (E.F.) (1997), 1997 CanLII 418 \(ON CA\), 115 C.C.C. (3d) 89; Mills v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 17 \(SCC\), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863; Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 327 \(SCC\), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 624; Vriend v. Alberta, 1998 CanLII 816 \(SCC\), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 493; Dixon v. British Columbia (Attorney-General) (1989), 1989 CanLII 248 \(BC SC\), 59 D.L.R. (4th) 247; Attorney General of Quebec v. Blaikie, 1981 CanLII 14 \(SCC\), [1981] 1 S.C.R. 312; Wells v. Newfoundland, 1999 CanLII 657 \(SCC\), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 199; R. v. 974649 Ontario Inc., [2001] 3 S.C.R. 575, 2001 SCC 81; Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1985 CanLII 33 \(SCC\), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Alberta Rules of Court, Alta. Reg. 390/68, r. 390(1).

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 23, 24(1).

Civil Procedure Rules (Nova Scotia), rr. 15.07, 15.08(d), (e).

Constitution Act, 1867, ss. 92, 96.

Constitution Act, 1982.

Education Act, S.N.S. 1995-96, c. 1, ss. 11-16, 88(1).

Judicature Act, R.S.N.S. 1989, c. 240, ss. 33, 34(d), 38.

Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, r. 59.06(2)(c), (d).

Authors Cited

Bennett, Frank. Bennett on Receiverships, 2nd ed. Scarborough, Ont.: Carswell, 1999.

Bogart, W. A. “‘Appropriate and Just’: Section 24 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Question of Judicial Legitimacy” (1986), 10 Dalhousie L.J. 81.

Brun, Henri, et Guy Tremblay. Droit constitutionnel, 4^e éd. Cowansville, Qué.: Yvon Blais, 2002.

de Smith, Stanley A., Harry Woolf and Jeffrey L. Jowell. Judicial Review of Administrative Action, 5th ed. and First Cum. Supp. London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1995, 1998.

Dussault, René, and Louis Borgeat. Administrative Law: A Treatise, 2nd ed., vol. 4. Toronto: Carswell, 1990.

Gillespie, Nora. “Charter Remedies: The Structural Injunction” (1989-90), 11 Advocates’ Q. 190.

Hogg, Peter W. Constitutional Law of Canada, loose-leaf ed., vol. 1. Scarborough, Ont.: Carswell (updated 2002, release 1).

Jacob, Jack I. H. The Fabric of English Civil Justice. London: Stevens & Sons, 1987.

Manfredi, Christopher Philip. Judicial Power and the Charter: Canada and the Paradox of Liberal Constitutionalism. Toronto: M&S, 1993.

McLachlin, Beverley M. “The Charter: A New Role for the Judiciary?” (1991), 29 Alta. L. Rev. 540.

Morton, F. L., and Rainer Knopff. The Charter Revolution and the Court Party. Peterborough, Ont.: Broadview Press, 2000.

Mullan, David J. Administrative Law. Toronto: Irwin Law, 2001.

Oosterhoff, A. H. Oosterhoff on Wills and Succession, 5th ed. Scarborough, Ont.: Carswell, 2001.

Pépin, Gilles, et Yves Ouellette. Principes de contentieux administratif, 2^e éd. Cowansville, Qué.: Yvon Blais, 1982.

Petter, Andrew. “The Politics of the Charter” (1986), 8 Supreme Court L.R. 473.

Reid, Hubert. Dictionnaire de droit québécois et canadien avec table des abréviations et lexique anglais-français, 2^e éd. Montréal: Wilson & Lafleur, 2001, “functus officio”.

Roach, Kent. Constitutional Remedies in Canada. Aurora, Ont.: Canada Law Book, 1994 (loose-leaf updated October 2002, release 9).

Roach, Kent. The Supreme Court on Trial: Judicial Activism or Democratic Dialogue. Toronto: Irwin Law, 2001.

Sharpe, Robert J. Injunctions and Specific Performance, 2nd ed. Aurora, Ont.: Canada Law Book, 1992 (loose-leaf updated November 2002, release 10).

Walker, David M. Oxford Companion to Law. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1980, “functus officio”.

Waters, D. W. M. Law of Trusts in Canada, 2nd ed. Toronto: Carswell, 1984.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal (2001), 203 D.L.R. (4th) 128, 194 N.S.R. (2d) 323, 85 C.R.R. (2d) 189, [2001] N.S.J. No. 240 (QL), 2001 NSCA 104, setting aside a decision of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court (2000), 2000 CanLII 50591 \(NS SC\), 185 N.S.R. (2d) 246, 575 A.P.R. 246, [2000] N.S.J. No. 191 (QL). Appeal allowed, Major, Binnie, LeBel and Deschamps JJ. dissenting.

Joel E. Fichaud, Q.C., and Melanie S. Comstock, for the appellants.

Alexander M. Cameron, for the respondent.

Bernard Laprade and Christopher Rupar, for the intervener the Attorney General of Canada.

Janet E. Minor and Vanessa Yolles, for the intervener the Attorney General of Ontario.

Gabriel Bourgeois, Q.C., for the intervener the Attorney General of New Brunswick.

Written submissions only by Deborah Paquette, for the intervener the Attorney General of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Laura C. Snowball and Subrata Bhattacharjee, for the intervener the Commissioner of Official Languages for Canada.

Michel Doucet and Christian E. Michaud, for the intervener Fédération nationale des conseillères et conseillers scolaires francophones.

Roger J. F. Lepage and Peter T. Bergbusch, for the intervener Fédération des associations de juristes d’expression française de Common Law Inc.

Noella Martin and Janet M. Stevenson, for the intervener Conseil scolaire acadien provincial.

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Gonthier, Iacobucci, Bastarache and Arbour JJ. was delivered by

1 IACOBUCCI AND ARBOUR JJ. — This appeal involves the nature of remedies available under s. 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms for the realization of the minority language education rights protected by s. 23 of the Charter. The specific issue is whether a trial judge may, after ordering that a provincial government use its best efforts to build French-language school facilities by given dates, retain jurisdiction to hear reports on the progress of those efforts. The issue of broader and ongoing judicial involvement in the administration of public institutions is not before the Court in this case.

I. Background and Judicial History.

2 The appellants are Francophone parents living in five school districts in Nova Scotia (Kingston/Greenwood, Chéticamp, Île Madame-Archat (Petit-de-Grat), Argyle, and Clare) and Fédération des parents acadiens de la Nouvelle-Écosse Inc., a non-profit organization that monitors the advancement of educational rights of the Acadian and Francophone minority in Nova Scotia.

The Attorney General of Nova Scotia is the respondent, acting on behalf of the Department of Education of Nova Scotia.

3 Apart from the specific facts of the case, it is most important to note the historical context on which this dispute is centred. As we will discuss below, French-language education in Nova Scotia has not had an enviable record of success. While the situation improved over the rather dismal record of the previous centuries, the twentieth century left much to be achieved. Section 23 of the Charter has been the hope of the French-speaking minority of Nova Scotia to redress the linguistic failings and inequality of history.

4 It is conceded in this appeal that s. 23 of the Charter entitles the appellant parents to publicly funded French-language educational facilities for their children. For some time, Francophone parents in these five school districts of Nova Scotia had been urging their provincial government to provide homogeneous French-language schools at the secondary level in addition to the existing primary level facilities. The government of Nova Scotia, for its part, agreed: it did not dispute that the number of students warranted the facilities demanded. The government amended the Education Act, S.N.S. 1995-96, c. 1, ss. 11-16, in 1996 to create the Conseil scolaire acadien provincial (the “Conseil”), a province-wide French-language school board, with a view to realizing the Charter’s minority language education rights. However, while s. 11(1) empowered the Conseil to deliver and administer all French-language programs, only the Minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council, could construct, furnish and equip schools (see s. 88(1)). Although the government eventually announced the construction of the new French-language school facilities, construction of the promised schools never began. So in 1998, 16 years after the right was entrenched in the Constitution, the appellant parents applied to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia for an order directing the Province and the Conseil to provide, out of public funds, homogeneous French-language facilities and programs at the secondary school level.

5 The application was heard before LeBlanc J. in October 1999. LeBlanc J. declared that the applicants were entitled parents under s. 23 of the Charter and that the number of students warranted the provision of French homogeneous secondary school facilities in Chéticamp, Île Madame-Archat (Petit-de-Grat), Argyle, and Clare: (2000), 2000 CanLII 50591 (NS SC), 185 N.S.R. (2d) 246. He noted, however, that the real issue was not the existence and content of the applicants' s. 23 rights, but the date on which the programs and facilities would finally be made available.

6 LeBlanc J. found that the respondents had not given sufficient attention to the serious rate of assimilation among Acadians and Francophones in Nova Scotia. The Province treated s. 23 rights as if they were but one more demand for educational programs and facilities, and failed to accord them due priority as constitutional rights. Meanwhile, assimilation continued. LeBlanc J. stated that “[i]t is beyond any doubt that it is time that homogeneous programs and facilities be provided to s. 23 students” (para. 206).

7 LeBlanc J. considered the state of school programs and facilities, including the progress that had already been made toward complying with s. 23 of the Charter, in each of the five school districts at issue. He directed the Province, which, through the Department of Education, is responsible for providing school facilities, and the Conseil, which is responsible for program provision, to build schools and provide programs by more and less specific deadlines. LeBlanc J. required that the respondents use their “best efforts” to comply with his order. Finally, he retained jurisdiction to hear reports from the respondents on their compliance. The precise wording of the order was as follows:

1. In Kingston/Greenwood, the entitled parents under Section 23 have a right to a homogeneous French program from grades Primary to 12 and the entitled parents have a right to a homogeneous French facility for grades Primary to 12 by September 2000.

2. In Cheticamp, the entitled parents under Section 23 have a right to a homogeneous French secondary program in a homogeneous French facility by September 2000.
3. In Île Madame-Archat (Petit-de-Grat), the Respondent CSAP shall use its best efforts to provide a homogeneous French program for grades 9 through 12 by September 2000 and the Respondent Department of Education shall use its best efforts (a) to provide a homogeneous French facility (on an interim basis) for grades 9 through 12 by September 2000 and (b) to provide a permanent homogeneous French facility by January 2001.
4. In Argyle, the Respondent CSAP shall use its best efforts to provide a homogeneous French program for grades Primary through 12 by September 2000 and the Respondent Department of Education shall provide a homogeneous French facility for grades Primary through 12 by September 2001.
5. In Clare, the Respondent CSAP shall provide a homogeneous French program for grades Primary through 12 by September 2000 and the Respondent Department of Education shall take immediate steps to provide homogeneous French facilities for grades Primary through 12 by September 2001.
6. The Respondents shall use their best efforts to comply with this Order.
7. The Court shall retain jurisdiction to hear reports from the Respondents respecting the Respondents' compliance with this Order. The Respondents shall report to this Court on March 23, 2001 at 9:30 a.m., or on such other date as the Court may determine.

8 The reference to "the Court" in the final paragraph was interpreted by LeBlanc J., and the parties, as a reference to himself sitting as a judge of the provincial supreme court, rather than to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia generally, which, as a court of first instance, would be competent to hear applications relating to any failure by the respondents to comply with LeBlanc J.'s order and would require no express retention of jurisdiction. LeBlanc J. presided over several of these "reporting hearings" between July 27, 2000, and March 23, 2001. Prior to each reporting session the trial judge directed the Province to file an affidavit from the appropriate official at the Department of Education, setting out the Department's progress in complying with the trial judge's decision. The trial judge permitted the respondent and Conseil to adduce evidence, including rebuttal evidence on various matters relating to compliance with the best efforts order. The Attorney General of Nova Scotia, on behalf of the Department of Education, appealed the part of the order in which LeBlanc J. retained his jurisdiction to hear reports.

9 The majority at the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal allowed the appeal before the final scheduled reporting hearing took place ((2001), 194 N.S.R. (2d) 323, 2001 NSCA 104). Flinn J.A., writing for the majority, emphasized that the declaration of the parents' rights and the order to provide programs and facilities were not in issue in the appeal (para. 6). Only the trial judge's retention of jurisdiction to hear reports was challenged. Flinn J.A. held that the trial judge, having decided the issue between the parties, had no further jurisdiction to remain seized of the case. This opinion was based on the common law principle of functus officio and Flinn J.A.'s view that the Judicature Act, R.S.N.S. 1989, c. 240, not only fails explicitly to authorize the retention of jurisdiction by a trial court after it has decided the issues before it and provided a remedy, but also precludes a trial judge from retaining jurisdiction to determine whether there is compliance with the order. He cited this Court's decision in Mills v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 17 \(SCC\), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863, at pp. 952-53, for the principle that it is for Parliament, and not judges, to fix the jurisdiction of courts and that the Charter was intended to fit in, rather than to alter, the existing scheme of Canadian legal procedure. After reviewing the language rights jurisprudence, Flinn J.A. concluded that there was no authority or precedent supporting the trial judge's decision to order and conduct the reporting sessions. He concluded that, while it is true that courts have broad ranging powers under s. 24(1) to fashion remedies, and are encouraged to be creative in so doing, the Charter does not extend a court's jurisdiction to permit it to enforce its remedies. Finally, Flinn J.A. expressed a reluctance to open the door to American jurisprudence on the enforcement of mandatory injunctions and a fear that post-trial intervention by trial judges in the enforcement of remedies would undermine the tradition of co-operation between the judiciary and the other branches of government.

10 Freeman J.A. dissented. In his view, LeBlanc J.’s order was not final and the judge was not functus officio until the continuing supervision was completed; the trial judge was able to keep his decision from being final simply by declaring that he was doing so. Freeman J.A. referred to the order as a “creative blending of declaratory and injunctive relief with a means of mediation” and found it to be “of the very essence of the kind of remedy courts are encouraged to seek pursuant to s. 24(1) to give life to Charter rights” (para. 70). He noted that requiring fresh applications by the parties each time the Province or the Conseil appeared not to be using its best efforts could have dragged matters out interminably, and would have left the matter to a judge with less familiarity with the issues and legal principles involved. Freeman J.A. concluded that the order, meant to “head off the potential for an enforcement nightmare”, “got the job done, virtually on time, with a minimum of inconvenience or unnecessary cost” (para. 84).

II. Issues

11 A preliminary issue raised by the respondent is whether the Court should decline to hear this appeal because it is moot.

12 The main issue in the appeal is simply this: having found a violation of s. 23 of the Charter and having ordered that the Province make its best efforts to provide homogeneous French-language facilities and programs by particular dates, did the Nova Scotia Supreme Court have the authority to retain jurisdiction to hear reports from the Province on the status of those efforts as part of its remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter?

13 Strictly speaking, only the retention of jurisdiction to hear reports, and not the “best efforts” order itself, is at issue in the present appeal. Nonetheless, the best efforts order and the retention of jurisdiction were conceived by the trial judge as two complementary parts of a whole. A full appreciation of the balance and moderation of the trial judge’s approach to crafting this remedy requires that the reports respecting the respondents' compliance with the order be viewed and evaluated in the context of the remedy as a whole.

III. Charter Provisions

14 LeBlanc J.'s order was designed to remedy a breach of s. 23 of the Charter which provides:

23. (1) Citizens of Canada

(a) whose first language learned and still understood is that of the English or French linguistic minority population of the province in which they reside, or

(b) who have received their primary school instruction in Canada in English or French and reside in a province where the language in which they received that instruction is the language of the English or French linguistic minority population of the province, have the right to have their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in that language in that province.

(2) Citizens of Canada of whom any child has received or is receiving primary or secondary school instruction in English or French in Canada, have the right to have all their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in the same language.

(3) The right of citizens of Canada under subsections (1) and (2) to have their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in the language of the English or French linguistic minority population of a province

(a) applies wherever in the province the number of children of citizens who have such a right is sufficient to warrant the provision to them out of public funds of minority language instruction; and

(b) includes, where the number of those children so warrants, the right to have them receive that instruction in minority language educational facilities provided out of public funds.

15 LeBlanc J. ordered the remedy challenged in this case pursuant to s. 24(1) of the Charter which provides:

24. (1) Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

IV. Analysis

A. Mootness

16 Before considering the main issue in this case, it is necessary to consider the respondent's argument that this appeal should not be heard because it is moot.

17 The doctrine of mootness reflects the principle that courts will only hear cases that will have the effect of resolving a live controversy which will or may actually affect the rights of the parties to the litigation except when the courts decide, in the exercise of their discretion, that it is nevertheless in the interest of justice that the appeal be heard (see Borowski v. Canada (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 123 \(SCC\), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 342, at p. 353). In our view, the instant appeal is moot. The parties attended several reporting hearings, presented evidence and allowed the deponents of affidavits to be cross-examined. The desired effect has been achieved: the schools at issue have been built. Restoring the validity of the trial judge's order would have no practical effect for the litigants in this case and no further reporting sessions are necessary.

18 Although this appeal is moot, the considerations in Borowski, supra, suggest that it should be heard. Writing for the Court, Sopinka J. outlined the following criteria for courts to consider in exercising discretion to hear a moot case (at pp. 358-63):

(1) the presence of an adversarial context;

(2) the concern for judicial economy; and

(3) the need for the Court to be sensitive to its role as the adjudicative branch in our political framework.

19 In this case, the appropriate adversarial context persists. The litigants have continued to argue their respective sides vigorously.

20 As to the concern for conserving scarce judicial resources, this Court has many times noted that such an expenditure is warranted in cases that raise important issues but are evasive of review (Borowski, supra, at p. 360; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union 2085 v. Winnipeg Builders' Exchange, 1967 CanLII 116 \(SCC\), [1967] S.C.R. 628; New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), 1999 CanLII 653 \(SCC\), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46). The present appeal raises an important question about the jurisdiction of superior courts to order what may be an effective remedy in some classes of cases. To the extent that the reporting order is effective, it will tend to evade review since parties may rapidly comply with orders before an appeal is heard.

21 Moreover, in deciding whether to hear a moot case, courts must weigh the expenditure of scarce judicial resources against “the social cost of continued uncertainty in the law” (Borowski, supra, at p. 361). The social cost of uncertainty as to the available Charter remedies is high. The Charter is designed to protect those who are most vulnerable to the dangers of majority rule; this aspect of the Charter’s purpose is evident in the provisions protecting official minority language education rights. If the Court leaves this matter undecided and courts are left under a misapprehension as to the tools available to ensure that government behaviour conforms with the Charter, the obvious danger is less than full protection of Charter rights. Thus, the expenditure of judicial resources is warranted in the present case despite the fact that the appeal may be moot.

The decision of this Court will provide guidance on the important question of the nature and extent of remedies under s. 24 of the Charter in similar cases.

22 Finally, the Court is neither departing from its traditional role as an adjudicator nor intruding upon the legislative or executive sphere by deciding to hear this case (Borowski, supra, at p. 362). The question of what remedies are available under the Charter falls squarely within the expertise of the Court and is not susceptible to legislative or executive pronouncement. Furthermore, unlike in Borowski, supra, at p. 365, the appellants are not seeking an answer to an abstract question on the interpretation of the Charter; they are not “turn[ing] this appeal into a private reference”. The Attorney General of Nova Scotia appealed successfully against an order made against it by a superior court. Although the immediate grievances of the appellants have now been addressed, deciding in this case will assist the parties to this action, and others in similar circumstances, in their ongoing relationships.

B. The Retention of Jurisdiction

(1) The Importance of Context: Sections 23 and 24 of the Charter

23 It is well accepted that the Charter should be given a generous and expansive interpretation and not a narrow, technical, or legalistic one (Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 \(SCC\), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145; R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 \(SCC\), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295; Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, 1985 CanLII 81 \(SCC\), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486; Reference re Prov. Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), 1991 CanLII 61 \(SCC\), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 158; Vriend v. Alberta, 1998 CanLII 816 \(SCC\), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 493). The need for a generous interpretation flows from the principle that the Charter ought to be interpreted purposively. While courts must be careful not to overshoot the actual purposes of the Charter’s guarantees, they must avoid a narrow, technical approach to Charter interpretation which could subvert the goal of ensuring that right holders enjoy the full benefit and protection of the Charter. In our view, the approach taken by our colleagues LeBel and Deschamps JJ. which appears to contemplate that special remedies might be available in some circumstances, but not in this case, severely undervalues the importance and the urgency of the language rights in the context facing LeBlanc J.

24 The requirement of a generous and expansive interpretive approach holds equally true for Charter remedies as for Charter rights (R. v. Gamble, 1988 CanLII 15 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 595; R. v. Sarson, 1996 CanLII 200 (SCC), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 223; R. v. 974649 Ontario Inc., [2001] 3 S.C.R. 575, 2001 SCC 81 (“Dunedin”). In Dunedin, McLachlin C.J., writing for the Court, explained why this is so. She stated, at para. 18:

[Section] 24(1), like all Charter provisions, commands a broad and purposive interpretation. This section forms a vital part of the Charter, and must be construed generously, in a manner that best ensures the attainment of its objects Moreover, it is remedial, and hence benefits from the general rule of statutory interpretation that accords remedial statutes a “large and liberal” interpretation Finally, and most importantly, the language of this provision appears to confer the widest possible discretion on a court to craft remedies for violations of Charter rights. In Mills, McIntyre J. observed at p. 965 that “[i]t is difficult to imagine language which could give the court a wider and less fettered discretion”. This broad remedial mandate for s. 24(1) should not be frustrated by a “(n)arrow and technical” reading of the provision [Reference omitted.]

25 Purposive interpretation means that remedies provisions must be interpreted in a way that provides “a full, effective and meaningful remedy for Charter violations” since “a right, no matter how expansive in theory, is only as meaningful as the remedy provided for its breach” (Dunedin, supra, at paras. 19-20). A purposive approach to remedies in a Charter context gives modern vitality to the ancient maxim ubi jus, ibi remedium: where there is a right, there must be a remedy. More specifically, a purposive approach to remedies requires at least two things. First, the purpose of the right being protected must be promoted: courts must craft responsive remedies. Second, the purpose of the remedies provision must be promoted: courts must craft effective remedies.

26 The purpose of s. 23 of the Charter is “to preserve and promote the two official languages of Canada, and their respective cultures, by ensuring that each language flourishes, as far as possible, in provinces where it is not spoken by the majority of the population” (Mahe v. Alberta, 1990 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 342, at p. 362). Minority language education rights are the means by which the goals of linguistic and cultural preservation are achieved (see Reference re Public Schools Act (Man.), s. 79(3), (4) and (7), 1993 CanLII 119 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 839, at p. 849-50 (“Schools Reference”)). This Court has, on a number of occasions, observed the close link between language and culture. In Mahe, at p. 362, Dickson C.J. stated:

. . . any broad guarantee of language rights, especially in the context of education, cannot be separated from a concern for the culture associated with the language. Language is more than a mere means of communication, it is part and parcel of the identity and culture of the people speaking it. It is the means by which individuals understand themselves and the world around them.

27 A further aspect of s. 23 of the Charter is its remedial nature (see, for example, Mahe, supra, at p. 363; Schools Reference, supra, at p. 850; Arsenault-Cameron v. Prince Edward Island, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 3, 2000 SCC 1, at para. 26). The section is designed to correct past injustices not only by halting the progressive erosion of minority official language cultures across Canada, but also by actively promoting their flourishing (Mahe, supra, at p. 363; Schools Reference, supra, at p. 850). Section 23 must therefore be construed “in recognition of previous injustices that have gone unredressed and which have required the entrenchment of protection of minority language rights” (Schools Reference, at p. 850; see also Arsenault-Cameron, supra, at para. 27). This Court has made it clear that the fact that language rights arose from political compromise does not alter their nature and importance; consequently, s. 23 must be given the same large and liberal interpretation as all Charter rights (R. v. Beaulac, 1999 CanLII 684 (SCC), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 768, at para. 25; Arsenault-Cameron, supra, at para. 27).

28 The minority language education rights protected under s. 23 of the Charter are unique. They are distinctively Canadian, representing “a linchpin in this nation’s commitment to the values of bilingualism and biculturalism” (Mahe, supra, at p. 350). Section 23 places positive obligations on governments to mobilize resources and enact legislation for the development of major institutional structures (Mahe, at p. 389). While the rights are granted to individuals (Schools Reference, at p. 865), they apply only if the “numbers warrant”, and the specific programs or facilities that the government is required to provide varies depending on the number of students who can potentially be expected to participate (Mahe, supra, at p. 366; Schools Reference, supra, at p. 850; Arsenault-Cameron, supra, at para. 38). This requirement gives the exercise of minority language education rights a unique collective aspect even though the rights are granted to individuals.

29 Another distinctive feature of the right in s. 23 is that the “numbers warrant” requirement leaves minority language education rights particularly vulnerable to government delay or inaction. For every school year that governments do not meet their obligations under s. 23, there is an increased likelihood of assimilation which carries the risk that numbers might cease to “warrant”. Thus, particular entitlements afforded under s. 23 can be suspended, for so long as the numbers cease to warrant, by the very cultural erosion against which s. 23 was designed to guard. In practical, though not legal, terms, such suspensions may well be permanent. If delay is tolerated, governments could potentially avoid the duties imposed upon them by s. 23 through their own failure to implement the rights vigilantly. The affirmative promise contained in s. 23 of the Charter and the critical need for timely compliance will sometimes require courts to order affirmative remedies to guarantee that language rights are meaningfully, and therefore necessarily promptly, protected (see, for example, Marchand v. Simcoe County Board of Education (1986), 1986 CanLII 2671 \(ON SC\), 29 D.L.R. (4th) 596 (Ont. H.C.); Marchand v. Simcoe County Board of Education (No. 2) (1987), 1987 CanLII 4129 \(ON SC\), 44 D.L.R. (4th) 171 (Ont. H.C.); Lavoie v. Nova Scotia (Attorney-General) (1988), 1988 CanLII 5684 \(NS SC\), 47 D.L.R. (4th) 586 (N.S.S.C.T.D.); Conseil des Écoles Séparées Catholiques Romaines de Dufferin et Peel v. Ontario (Ministre de l'Éducation et de la Formation) (1996), 1996 CanLII 12465 \(ON SCDC\), 136 D.L.R. (4th) 704 (Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.)), aff'd (1996), 1996 CanLII 11789 \(ON SC\), 30 O.R. (3d) 681 (C.A.); Conseil Scolaire Fransaskois de Zenon Park v. Saskatchewan, 1998 CanLII 13468 \(SK QB\), [1999] 3 W.W.R. 743 (Sask. Q.B.), aff'd 1998 CanLII 12371 \(SK CA\), [1999] 12 W.W.R. 742 (Sask. C.A.); Assoc. Française des Conseils Scolaires de l'Ontario v. Ontario (1988), 1988 CanLII 4759 \(ON CA\), 66 O.R. (2d) 599 (C.A.); Assn. des parents francophones de la Colombie-Britannique v. British Columbia (1998), 1998 CanLII 3969 \(BC SC\), 167 D.L.R. (4th) 534 (B.C.S.C.)).

30 To put the matter of judicial remedies in greater context, it is useful to reflect briefly on the role of courts in the enforcement of our laws.

31 Canada has evolved into a country that is noted and admired for its adherence to the rule of law as a major feature of its democracy. But the rule of law can be shallow without proper mechanisms for its enforcement. In this respect, courts play an essential role since they are the central institutions to deal with legal disputes through the rendering of judgments and decisions. But courts have no physical or economic means to enforce their judgments. Ultimately, courts depend on both the executive and the citizenry to recognize and abide by their judgments.

Fortunately, Canada has had a remarkable history of compliance with court decisions by private parties and by all institutions of government. That history of compliance has become a fundamentally cherished value of our constitutional democracy; we must never take it for granted but always be careful to respect and protect its importance, otherwise the seeds of tyranny can take root.

This tradition of compliance takes on a particular significance in the constitutional law context, where courts must ensure that government behaviour conforms with constitutional norms but in doing so must also be sensitive to the separation of function among the legislative, judicial and executive branches. While our Constitution does not expressly provide for the separation of powers (see Re Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, 1981 CanLII 24 \(SCC\), [1981] 1 S.C.R. 714, at p. 728; Douglas/Kwantlen Faculty Assn. v. Douglas College, 1990 CanLII 63 \(SCC\), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 570, at p. 601; Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 \(SCC\), [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at para. 15), the functional separation among the executive, legislative and judicial branches of governance has frequently been noted. (See, for example, Fraser v. Public Service Staff Relations Board, 1985 CanLII 14 \(SCC\), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 455, at pp. 469-70.) In New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v. Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), 1993 CanLII 153 \(SCC\), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 319, McLachlin J. (as she then was) stated, at p. 389:

Our democratic government consists of several branches: the Crown, as represented by the Governor General and the provincial counterparts of that office; the legislative body; the executive; and the courts. It is fundamental to the working of government as a whole that all these parts play their proper role. It is equally fundamental that no one of them overstep its bounds, that each show proper deference for the legitimate sphere of activity of the other.

34 In other words, in the context of constitutional remedies, courts must be sensitive to their role as judicial arbiters and not fashion remedies which usurp the role of the other branches of governance by taking on tasks to which other persons or bodies are better suited. Concern for the limits of the judicial role is interwoven throughout the law. The development of the doctrines of justiciability, and to a great extent mootness, standing, and ripeness resulted from concerns about the courts overstepping the bounds of the judicial function and their role vis-à-vis other branches of government.

35 In addition, it is unsurprising, given how the Charter changed the nature of our constitutional structure by requiring that all laws and government action conform to the Charter, that concerns about the limits of the judicial role have animated much of the Charter jurisprudence and commentary surrounding it (see, for example, K. Roach, The Supreme Court on Trial: Judicial Activism or Democratic Dialogue (2001); C. P. Manfredi, Judicial Power and the Charter: Canada and the Paradox of Liberal Constitutionalism (1993); F. L. Morton and R. Knopff, The Charter Revolution and the Court Party (2000); A. Petter, “The Politics of the Charter” (1986), 8 Supreme Court L.R. 473). Thus, in Vriend, supra, this Court stated, at para. 136:

In carrying out their duties, courts are not to second-guess legislatures and the executives; they are not to make value judgments on what they regard as the proper policy choice; this is for the other branches. Rather, the courts are to uphold the Constitution and have been expressly invited to perform that role by the Constitution itself. But respect by the courts for the legislature and executive role is as important as ensuring that the other branches respect each others’ role and the role of the courts.

36 Deference ends, however, where the constitutional rights that the courts are charged with protecting begin. As McLachlin J. stated in RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, at para. 136:

Parliament has its role: to choose the appropriate response to social problems within the limiting framework of the Constitution. But the courts also have a role: to determine, objectively and impartially, whether Parliament's choice falls within the limiting framework of the Constitution. The courts are no more permitted to abdicate their responsibility than is Parliament.

Determining the boundaries of the courts' proper role, however, cannot be reduced to a simple test or formula; it will vary according to the right at issue and the context of each case.

37 Returning to this appeal, we believe that LeBlanc J. was duly guided by historical and contextual factors in crafting a remedy that would meaningfully protect, indeed implement, the applicants' rights to minority official language education for their children while maintaining appropriate respect for the proper roles of the executive and legislative branches.

38 As indicated earlier, the history of French-language education in Nova Scotia has been disappointing, resulting in high rates of assimilation that have continued well into the period when this litigation began. While the situation is not what it was in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries when French-language education in Acadia was for the most part either expressly prohibited or unavailable, the promise of s. 23 had yet to be fulfilled in the five school districts at issue in this appeal when the appellants brought their application demanding homogeneous French-language facilities before the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in 1998. Through the mid-1990s, s. 23 parents had pressured the government to provide homogeneous French-language facilities in presentations to Legislative Committees and in written and oral submissions to Ministers of Education. They had submitted petitions, letters, and expert analyses on assimilation to the Province. In 1996, amendments to the Education Act provided for a French-language school board, the Conseil scolaire acadien provincial, geared toward the fulfilment of the Province's s. 23 obligations. The school board then decided to provide the facilities at issue in this appeal. From 1997 to 1999, the provincial government announced the construction of homogeneous French-language schools in Petit-de-Grat, Clare, and Argyle. The schools were never built, and the construction projects were officially put on hold in September 1999.

39 The reason for the delay, broadly speaking, was the government's failure to give due priority to s. 23 rights in educational policy setting. Indeed, LeBlanc J. observed that the real issue between the parties by the time of trial was the date on which the programs ought to be implemented, rather than any question as to whether they were required in the first place. The government cited a lack of consensus in the community, a consequent fear that enrollment would drop, and lack of funds as reasons for its decision to place the previously announced school construction projects on hold pending cost-benefit reviews. LeBlanc J. rightly concluded that none of these reasons justified the government's failure to fulfill its obligations under s. 23. He found that the government had been treating the provision of s. 23 schools no differently from programs or facilities generally, without attention to purposes of s. 23 of the Charter and the role that homogeneous schools play in French linguistic and cultural preservation and flourishing (para. 205). Meanwhile, assimilation continued (para. 210) and enrollment in the Conseil's schools was dropping. Programs were in jeopardy (paras. 229-30).

40 It is in this urgent context of ongoing cultural erosion that LeBlanc J. crafted his remedy. He was sensitive to the need for timely execution, the limits of the judicial role, and the desirability of allowing the government flexibility in the manner of fulfilling its constitutional obligations when he ordered the government to make best efforts to provide facilities by particular dates and retained jurisdiction to hear progress reports. However, the urgency of the context does not by itself create jurisdiction in a superior court to issue a remedy of unlimited scope under s. 24(1) of the Charter. We now turn to the question of whether LeBlanc J.'s order was within the jurisdiction of a superior court.

(2) The Jurisdiction of a Superior Court to Issue a Remedy Under Section 24(1) of the Charter

41 Section 24(1) entrenches in the Constitution a remedial jurisdiction for infringements or denials of Charter rights and freedoms. The respondent makes various arguments suggesting that LeBlanc J. exceeded his jurisdiction by violating constitutional norms, statutory provisions, and common law rules. We will first deal with the extent of the remedial jurisdiction in s. 24(1) and the constitutional limits to that jurisdiction proposed by the respondent. Later we will discuss how statutes and common law rules might be relevant to the choice of remedy under s. 24(1).

42 Clearly, if there is some constitutional limit to the remedial power either in s. 24(1) or in some other part of the Constitution, the judge ordering a remedy must respect this boundary. As a basic rule, no part of the Constitution can abrogate or diminish another part of the Constitution (New Brunswick Broadcasting, supra, at p. 373, McLachlin J. citing Reference re Bill 30, An Act to amend the Education Act (Ont.), 1987 CanLII 65 \(SCC\), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1148). For example, a court could not compel a provincial government to do something pursuant to s. 24(1) which would exceed the jurisdiction of the province under s. 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

43 A remedy under s. 24(1) is available where there is some government action, beyond the enactment of an unconstitutional statute or provision, that infringes a person's Charter rights (see Schachter v. Canada, 1992 CanLII 74 \(SCC\), [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679, at pp. 719-20). In the present appeal, the difficulty does not lie with the legislation: no provision or omission in the Education Act prevented the government from providing minority language education as required by the Constitution Act, 1982. On the contrary, the Education Act, as amended in 1996, establishes a French-language school board to provide homogeneous French-language education to children of s. 23 entitled parents. Neither is the problem rooted in any particular government action; rather, the problem was inaction on the part of the provincial government, particularly its failure to mobilize resources to provide school facilities in a timely fashion, as required by s. 23 of the Charter. Section 24(1) is available to remedy this failure.

44 To repeat its text, s. 24(1) of the Charter provides:

Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

45 The purposive reading of s. 24(1) and also the ordinary meaning of the drafter's language make it clear that s. 24(1) guarantees that there must always be a court of competent jurisdiction to hear anyone whose rights or freedoms have been infringed or denied (see Nelles v. Ontario, 1989 CanLII 77 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 170, at p. 196, and Mills, supra, at p. 881). The default court of competent jurisdiction is a superior court established under s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. It is also plainly contemplated in s. 24(1) that a court of competent jurisdiction will have the authority to grant a remedy that it considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

46 The respondent Attorney General of Nova Scotia suggested that Re Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, supra, and other cases which describe the functions of courts in the context of s. 96 should be read as setting limits on superior courts' remedial power. With respect, that submission must fail. It is true that in Re Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, at pp. 734-35, Dickson J. (as he then was) discussed the nature of the "judicial function" of s. 96 courts. But this discussion occurred in the context of a s. 96 challenge to the validity of a statute conferring jurisdiction on an administrative tribunal. Section 96 protects a "core" of superior courts' jurisdiction from being transferred exclusively to provincial inferior courts or administrative tribunals (MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, 1995 CanLII 57 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725, at para. 15, per Lamer C.J.). These cases safeguarding a core do not trace the limits of superior courts' jurisdiction. There is nothing in s. 96 to limit the inherent jurisdiction of the superior courts or the jurisdiction that can be conferred on them by statute (Reference re Young Offenders Act (P.E.I.), 1991 CanLII 11713 (SCC), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 252, at p. 274) and, a fortiori, nothing to limit the jurisdiction of a superior court under s. 24(1) of the Charter.

47 In a similar vein, the respondent Attorney General suggests that this Court's decisions in Mills and Dunedin, both supra, which set out a framework for determining when a court or tribunal is competent to grant remedies under s. 24(1) of the Charter, deny the availability of the remedy ordered in this case. In our opinion, this submission rests on a mistaken view of the source of superior courts' power to grant Charter remedies.

48 In Mills, the Court considered whether a preliminary hearing magistrate given jurisdiction by particular provisions of the Criminal Code was a court of competent jurisdiction for the purposes of entering a stay of proceedings under s. 24(1) of the Charter. The unanimous conclusion of the Court was that a magistrate sitting at preliminary hearing was not competent to provide that remedy. McIntyre J., speaking for the majority on this point, emphasized the limited function of a court sitting in preliminary inquiry, which is to commit the accused to trial where there is sufficient evidence, or discharge the accused where there is not. The role does not include entering acquittals or convictions, imposing penalties, or giving remedies. As such, remedies under s. 24(1) could not be granted by that tribunal. Subsequent cases applying Mills, including Dunedin, supra, Mooring v. Canada (National Parole Board), 1996 CanLII 254 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 75, and Weber v. Ontario Hydro, 1995 CanLII 108 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 929, considered whether administrative tribunals or judges acting under statutory authority had the power to issue particular Charter remedies under s. 24(1). In each case, the analysis was directed at discerning what kinds of powers the legislator intended the tribunal to exercise in light of the purposes of the Charter as well as the tribunal's function and the practical limits imposed by its structure. This analysis has no application to s. 96 courts which are, of course, not creatures of statute but courts of general inherent jurisdiction.

49 Thus, when McIntyre J. wrote in Mills, supra, at p. 953, that “the Charter was not intended to turn the Canadian legal system upside down”, he meant that s. 24(1) did not confer new jurisdiction on statutory and inferior tribunals beyond that which was intended by the legislator as reflected in the tribunal's function and the practical limits imposed by its structure. The test set out in Mills does not apply to superior courts since, as McIntyre J. pointed out, a superior court will always be a court of competent jurisdiction under s. 24(1) of the Charter (Mills, supra, at p. 956). Superior courts retain “constant, complete and concurrent jurisdiction” to issue remedies under s. 24(1) (see R. v. Rahey, 1987 CanLII 52 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 588, at pp. 603-4, citing Mills, supra, at p. 892, and R. v. Smith, 1989 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 1120, at pp. 1129-30).

50 The foregoing analysis does not preclude review on appeal of a superior court's choice of remedy under s. 24(1). Rather, it simply forecloses the argument that a given remedy under s. 24 is unavailable in a superior court because of the constitutional limitations on its jurisdiction as proposed by the respondent. The nature and extent of remedies available under s. 24(1) remain limited by the words of the section itself and must be read in harmony with the rest of our Constitution. As McIntyre J. wrote in Mills, supra, at p. 965:

What remedies are available when an application under s. 24(1) of the Charter succeeds? Section 24(1) again is silent on the question. It merely provides that the appellant may obtain such remedy as the court considers “appropriate and just in the circumstances”. It is difficult to imagine language which could give the court a wider and less fettered discretion. It is impossible to reduce this wide discretion to some sort of binding formula for general application in all cases, and it is not for appellate courts to pre-empt or cut down this wide discretion.

McLachlin C.J. recently endorsed this passage in Dunedin, supra, at para. 18. Consequently, a party seeking to challenge a Charter remedy ordered by a s. 96 court must show that the order is not “appropriate and just in the circumstances”.

51 The power of the superior courts under s. 24(1) to make appropriate and just orders to remedy infringements or denials of Charter rights is part of the supreme law of Canada. It follows that this remedial power cannot be strictly limited by statutes or rules of the common law. We note, however, that statutes and common law rules may be helpful to a court choosing a remedy under s. 24(1) insofar as the statutory provisions or common law rules express principles that are relevant to determining what is “appropriate and just in the circumstances”.

(3) The Meaning of “Appropriate and Just in the Circumstances”

52 What, then, is meant in s. 24(1) by the words “appropriate and just in the circumstances”? Clearly, the task of giving these words meaning in particular cases will fall to the courts ordering the remedies since s. 24(1) specifies that the remedy should be such as the court considers appropriate and just. Deciding on an appropriate and just remedy in particular circumstances calls on the judge to exercise a discretion based on his or her careful perception of the nature of the right and of the infringement, the facts of the case, and the application of the relevant legal principles. Once again, we emphasize McIntyre J.’s words in Mills, supra, at p. 965:

It is difficult to imagine language which could give the court a wider and less fettered discretion. It is impossible to reduce this wide discretion to some sort of binding formula for general application in all cases, and it is not for appellate courts to pre-empt or cut down this wide discretion.

53 With respect, the approach to s. 24 reflected in the reasons of LeBel and Deschamps JJ. would tend to pre-empt and reduce this wide discretion. Their approach would also, in this case, pre-empt and devalue the constitutional promise respecting language rights in s. 23. In our view, judicial restraint and metaphors such as “dialogue” must not be elevated to the level of strict constitutional rules to which the words of s. 24 can be subordinated. The same may be said of common law procedural principles such as functus officio which may to some extent be incorporated in statutes. Rather, as LeBel and Deschamps JJ. appear to recognize at paras. 135 and following, there are situations in which our Constitution requires special remedies to secure the very order it envisages.

54 While it would be unwise at this point to attempt to define, in detail, the words “appropriate and just” or to draw a rigid distinction between the two terms, there are some broad considerations that judges should bear in mind when evaluating the appropriateness and justice of a potential remedy. These general principles may be informed by jurisprudence relating to remedies outside the Charter context, such as cases discussing the doctrine of functus and overly vague remedies, although, as we have said, that jurisprudence does not apply strictly to orders made under s. 24(1).

55 First, an appropriate and just remedy in the circumstances of a Charter claim is one that meaningfully vindicates the rights and freedoms of the claimants. Naturally, this will take account of the nature of the right that has been violated and the situation of the claimant. A meaningful remedy must be relevant to the experience of the claimant and must address the circumstances in which the right was infringed or denied. An ineffective remedy, or one which was “smothered in procedural delays and difficulties”, is not a meaningful vindication of the right and therefore not appropriate and just (see Dunedin, supra, at para. 20, McLachlin C.J. citing Mills, supra, at p. 882, per Lamer J. (as he then was)).

56 Second, an appropriate and just remedy must employ means that are legitimate within the framework of our constitutional democracy. As discussed above, a court ordering a Charter remedy must strive to respect the relationships with and separation of functions among the legislature, the executive and the judiciary. This is not to say that there is a bright line separating these functions in all cases. A remedy may be appropriate and just notwithstanding that it might touch on functions that are principally assigned to the executive. The essential point is that the courts must not, in making orders under s. 24(1), depart unduly or unnecessarily from their role of adjudicating disputes and granting remedies that address the matter of those disputes.

57 Third, an appropriate and just remedy is a judicial one which vindicates the right while invoking the function and powers of a court. It will not be appropriate for a court to leap into the kinds of decisions and functions for which its design and expertise are manifestly unsuited. The capacities and competence of courts can be inferred, in part, from the tasks with which they are normally charged and for which they have developed procedures and precedent.

58 Fourth, an appropriate and just remedy is one that, after ensuring that the right of the claimant is fully vindicated, is also fair to the party against whom the order is made. The remedy should not impose substantial hardships that are unrelated to securing the right.

59 Finally, it must be remembered that s. 24 is part of a constitutional scheme for the vindication of fundamental rights and freedoms enshrined in the Charter. As such, s. 24, because of its broad language and the myriad of roles it may play in cases, should be allowed to evolve to meet the challenges and circumstances of those cases. That evolution may require novel and creative features when compared to traditional and historical remedial practice because tradition and history cannot be barriers to what reasoned and compelling notions of appropriate and just remedies demand. In short, the judicial approach to remedies must remain flexible and responsive to the needs of a given case.

(4) Application to this Case: the Remedy Ordered by the Trial Judge Was Appropriate and Just in the Circumstances

(a) The Reporting Order Effectively Vindicated the Rights of the Parents

60 LeBlanc J. exercised his discretion to select an effective remedy that meaningfully vindicated the s. 23 rights of the appellants in the context of serious rates of assimilation and a history of delay in the provision of French-language education in Kingston (Greenwood, Chéticamp, Île Madame-Archat (Petit-de-Grat), Argyle, and Clare). The facts as found by LeBlanc J. disclosed that continued delay could imperil the already vulnerable s. 23 rights, their exercise depending as it does on the numbers of potential students. As Freeman J.A. noted in dissent in the Court of Appeal, the reporting hearings were aimed at identifying difficulties with the timely implementation of the trial judge's order as they arose, instead of requiring fresh applications by the appellants every time it appeared that a party was not using its best efforts to comply with the judge's order.

61 In the absence of reporting hearings, the appellant parents would have been forced to respond to any new delay by amassing a factual record by traditional means disclosing whether the parties were nonetheless using their best efforts. A new proceeding would be required and this might be heard by another judge less familiar with the case than LeBlanc J. All of this would have taken significant time and resources from parents who had already waited too long and dedicated much energy to the cause of realizing their s. 23 rights. The order of reporting hearings was, as Freeman J.A. wrote "a pragmatic approach to getting the job done expeditiously" (para. 74).

LeBlanc J.'s order is a creative blending of remedies and processes already known to the courts in order to give life to the right in s. 23.

62 In assessing the extent to which LeBlanc J.'s remedy was appropriate and just in the circumstances, it is useful to examine the options before the trial judge. In doing so we are not intending to usurp the role and discretion of the trial judge but only to gain a fuller understanding of the situation he faced. LeBlanc J. could have limited the remedy to a declaration of the rights of the parties, as the Court considered prudent in Mahe, supra, at pp. 392-93. In Mahe, however, the primary issues before the Court concerned the scope and content of s. 23 of the Charter, including the degree of management of control of schools to be accorded to s. 23 parents, and the determination of when the numbers are sufficient to warrant given programs and facilities. After clarifying the content and scope of the s. 23 rights at issue, the Court chose the remedy of ordering a declaration of those rights. It did so to allow the government the greatest flexibility to fashion a response suited to the circumstances (p. 393). The assumption underlying this choice of remedy is that governments will comply with the declaration promptly and fully.

63 After Mahe, litigation to vindicate minority language education rights has entered a new phase. The general content of s. 23 in many cases is now largely settled (Mahe, Schools Reference, Arsenault-Cameron, all supra). In the present case, for example, it was clear to and accepted by the parties from the start that the government was required to provide the homogeneous French-language facilities at issue. The entitled parents sought the assistance of the court in enforcing the full and prompt vindication of their rights after a lengthy history of government inaction.

64 Our colleagues LeBel and Deschamps JJ. state at para. 140 of their reasons that the trial judge was not faced with a government which had understood its obligations but refused to comply with them. Our colleagues suggest that there was some issue as to what s. 23 demanded in the situation. With respect, this portrayal is directly at odds with the findings of fact made by the trial judge. At para. 198 of his reasons, the trial judge wrote:

It is apparent that the real issue between the parties is the date on which these programs and facilities are to be implemented. The Department, in its submissions, does not challenge the applicants' right and entitlement to these programs and facilities but point [sic] to a number of factors which ought to satisfy the applicants. The Conseil opposes the applicants' claim for an earlier implementation of the transition plan but supports the applicants in its [sic] demand for declaration that the Department ought to be directed to provide homogeneous facilities.

65 LeBlanc J. further noted that the Department of Education did not provide either statistical or financial evidence with respect to the “numbers warrant” test and that, in any case, the number of children of s. 23 parents were greater than the number in the case of Mahe, supra, decided by this Court (paras. 200-201). Instead, the government argued at trial that it should be allowed to delay its obligations because of a lack of consensus in the Acadian and Francophone communities (para. 202) and because the political compromise in s. 23 required a “go-slowly approach” (para. 214). According to the trial judge, the government did not deny the existence or content of the s. 23 rights of the parents but rather failed to prioritize those rights and delayed fulfilling its obligations. The government “did not give sufficient priority to the serious rate of assimilation occurring among Acadians and Francophones in Nova Scotia and the fact that rights established in s. 23 are individual rights” (para. 204) despite clear reports showing that assimilation was “reaching critical levels” (para. 215). These are the findings of fact which can only be made by a judge who has heard all the evidence at trial. These findings are not on appeal and it is not open for appellate judges to reverse these findings without proper justification. LeBlanc J. properly took account of the factual circumstances within which he exercised his discretion to select a remedy which was appropriate and just.

LeBlanc J. obviously considered that, given the Province's failure to give due priority to the s. 23 rights of its minority Francophone populations in the five districts despite being well aware of them, there was a significant risk that such a declaration would be an ineffective remedy. Parents such as the appellants should not be forced continually to seek declarations that are essentially restatements of the declaration in Mahe. Where governments have failed to comply with their well-understood constitutional obligations to take positive action in support of the right in s. 23, the assumption underlying a preference for declarations may be undermined. In Mahe, supra, at p. 393, Dickson C.J. recognized this possibility:

As the Attorney General for Ontario submits, the government should have the widest possible discretion in selecting the institutional means by which its s. 23 obligations are to be met; the courts should be loath to interfere and impose what will be necessarily procrustean standards, unless that discretion is not exercised at all, or is exercised in such a way as to deny a constitutional right. Once the Court has declared what is required in Edmonton, then the government can and must do whatever is necessary to ensure that these appellants, and other parents in their situation, receive what they are due under s. 23. [Emphasis added.]

This Court's judgment in Mahe speaks to all provincial and territorial governments. LeBlanc J. was entitled to conclude that he was not limited to declaring the appellant parents' rights and could take into consideration that the case before him was different from those in which declarations had been considered appropriate and just.

Our colleagues LeBel and Deschamps JJ. suggest that the reporting order in this case was not called for since any violation of a simple declaratory remedy could be dealt with in contempt proceedings against the Crown. We do not doubt that contempt proceedings may be available in appropriate cases. The threat of contempt proceedings is not, in our view, inherently more respectful of the executive than simple reporting hearings in which a linguistic minority could discover in a timely way what progress was being made towards the fulfilment of their s. 23 rights. More importantly, given the critical rate of assimilation found by the trial judge, it was appropriate for him to grant a remedy that would in his view lead to prompt compliance. Viewed in this light, LeBlanc J. selected a remedy that reduced the risk that the minority language education rights would be smothered in additional procedural delay.

(b) The Reporting Order Respected the Framework of our Constitutional Democracy

68 The remedy granted by LeBlanc J. took into account, and did not depart unduly or unnecessarily from, the role of the courts in our constitutional democracy. LeBlanc J. considered the government’s progress toward providing the required schools and services (see, e.g., paras. 233-34). Some flexibility was built into the “best efforts” order to allow for unforeseen difficulties. It was appropriate for LeBlanc J. to preserve and reinforce the Department of Education’s role in providing school facilities as mandated by s. 88 of the Education Act, as this could be done without compromising the entitled parents’ rights to the prompt provision of school facilities.

69 To some extent, the legitimate role of the court vis-à-vis various institutions of government will depend on the circumstances. In these circumstances, it was appropriate for LeBlanc J. to craft the remedy so that it vindicated the rights of the parents while leaving the detailed choices of means largely to the executive.

70 Our colleagues LeBel and Deschamps JJ. appear to consider that the issuance of an injunction against the government under s. 24(1) is constitutionally suspect and represents a departure from a consensus about Charter remedies (see para. 134 of the dissent). With respect, it is clear that a court may issue an injunction under s. 24(1) of the Charter. The power of courts to issue injunctions against the executive is central to s. 24(1) of the Charter which envisions more than declarations of rights. Courts do take actions to ensure that rights are enforced, and not merely declared. Contempt proceedings in the face of defiance of court orders, as well as coercive measures such as garnishments, writs of seizure and sale and the like are all known to courts. In this case, it was open to the trial judge in all the circumstances to choose the injunctive remedy on the terms and conditions that he prescribed.

(c) The Reporting Order Called on the Function and Powers of a Court

71 Although it may not be common in the context of Charter remedies, the reporting order issued by LeBlanc J. was judicial in the sense that it called on the functions and powers known to courts. In several different contexts, courts order remedies that involve their continuing involvement in the relations between the parties (see R. J. Sharpe, Injunctions and Specific Performance (2nd ed. (loose-leaf)), at paras. 1.260-1.490). Superior courts, which under the Judicature Acts possess the powers of common law courts and courts of equity, have “assumed active and even managerial roles in the exercise of their traditional equitable powers” (K. Roach, Constitutional Remedies in Canada (loose-leaf), at para. 13.60). A panoply of equitable remedies are now available to courts in support of the litigation process and the final adjudication of disputes. For example, prejudgment remedies developed in such cases as Mareva Compania Naviera S.A. v. International Bulkcarriers S.A., [1975] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 509 (C.A.), and Anton Piller KG v. Manufacturing Processes Ltd., [1976] 1 Ch. 55 (C.A.), involve the court in the preservation of evidence and the management of parties’ assets prior to trial. In bankruptcy and receivership matters, courts may be called on to supervise fairly complex and ongoing commercial transactions relating to debtors’ assets. Court-appointed receivers may report to and seek guidance from the courts and in some cases must seek the permission of the courts before disposing of property (see Bennett on Receiverships (2nd ed. 1999), at pp. 21-37, 443-45). Similarly, the courts’ jurisdiction in respect of trusts and estates may sometimes entail detailed and continuing supervision and support of their administration (see D. W. M. Waters, Law of Trusts in Canada (2nd ed. 1984), at pp. 904-9; Oosterhoff on Wills and Succession (5th ed. 2001), at pp. 27-28). Courts may also retain an ongoing jurisdiction in family law cases to order alterations in maintenance payments or parenting arrangements as circumstances change. Finally, this Court has in the past remained seized of a matter so as to facilitate the implementation of constitutional language rights: see Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1985 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721; Re Manitoba Language Rights Order, 1985 CanLII 9 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 347; Re Manitoba Language Rights Order, 1990 CanLII 35 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1417; Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1992 CanLII 115 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 212. Lower courts have also retained jurisdiction in s. 23 cases: British Columbia (Association des parents francophones) v. British Columbia (1996), 1996 CanLII 1455 (BC SC), 139 D.L.R. (4th) 356 (B.C.S.C.), at p. 380; Lavoie, supra, at pp. 593-95; Société des Acadiens du Nouveau-Brunswick Inc. v. Minority Language School Board No. 50 (1983), 1983 CanLII 3785 (NB KB), 48 N.B.R. (2d) 361 (Q.B.), at para. 109.

72 The difficulties of ongoing supervision of parties by the courts have sometimes been advanced as a reason that orders for specific performance and mandatory injunctions should not be awarded. Nonetheless, courts of equity have long accepted and overcome this difficulty of supervision where the situations demanded such remedies (see Sharpe, supra, at paras. 1.260-1.380; Attorney-General v. Birmingham, Tame, and Rea District Drainage Board, [1910] 1 Ch. 48 (C.A.), aff'd [1912] A.C. 788 (H.L.); Kennard v. Cory Brothers and Co., [1922] 1 Ch. 265, aff'd [1922] 2 Ch. 1 (C.A.)).

73 As academic commentators have pointed out, the range of remedial orders available to courts in civil proceedings demonstrates that constitutional remedies involving some degree of ongoing supervision do not represent a radical break with the past practices of courts (see W. A. Bogart, “‘Appropriate and Just’: Section 24 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Question of Judicial Legitimacy” (1986), 10 Dalhousie L.J. 81, at pp. 92-94; N. Gillespie, “Charter Remedies: The Structural Injunction” (1989-90), 11 Advocates’ Q. 190, at pp. 217-18; Roach, Constitutional Remedies in Canada, supra, at paras. 13.50-13.80; Sharpe, supra, at paras. 1.260-1.490). The change announced by s. 24 of the Charter is that the flexibility inherent in an equitable remedial jurisdiction may be applied to orders addressed to government to vindicate constitutionally entrenched rights.

74 The order in this case was in no way inconsistent with the judicial function. There was never any suggestion in this case that the court would, for example, improperly take over the detailed management and co-ordination of the construction projects. Hearing evidence and supervising cross-examinations on progress reports about the construction of schools are not beyond the normal capacities of courts.

75 The respondent argues that the reporting order issued by LeBlanc J. violated the common law doctrine of functus officio. As we have said, statutes or common law rules cannot strictly pre-empt the remedial discretion in s. 24(1). Nonetheless, the doctrine of functus officio properly speaks to the functions and powers of courts. Therefore, an examination of the functus question is useful in deciding whether LeBlanc J. issued an order that is appropriately judicial.

76 Flinn J.A. for the majority in the Court of Appeal decided that the trial judge, having issued the best efforts order, had no further jurisdiction with respect to the parties and was therefore precluded from retaining jurisdiction to hear reports on its implementation (para. 21). This view is based on a mis-characterization of the reporting portion of the order as somehow separate from and additional to the best efforts injunctions. On the contrary, in our view, the reporting sessions formed an integral part of the remedy fashioned by LeBlanc J. Moreover, the functus doctrine has no application where the trial judge does not purport to alter a final judgment. There was no indication that the retention of jurisdiction included any power to alter the disposition of the case.

77 A closer examination of the doctrine is helpful. The Oxford Companion to Law (1980), at p. 508, provides the following definition:

Functus officio (having performed his function). Used of an agent who has performed his task and exhausted his authority and of an arbitrator or judge to whom further resort is incompetent, his function being exhausted.

78 But how can we know when a judge's function is exhausted? Sopinka J., writing for the majority in Chandler v. Alberta Association of Architects, 1989 CanLII 41 \(SCC\), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 848, at p. 860, described the purpose and origin of the doctrine in the following words:

The general rule that a final decision of a court cannot be reopened derives from the decision of the English Court of Appeal in In re St. Nazaire Co. (1879), 12 Ch. D. 88. The basis for it was that the power to rehear was transferred by the Judicature Acts to the appellate division.

79 It is clear that the principle of functus officio exists to allow finality of judgments from courts which are subject to appeal (see also Reekie v. Messervey, 1990 CanLII 158 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 219, at pp. 222-23). This makes sense: if a court could continually hear applications to vary its decisions, it would assume the function of an appellate court and deny litigants a stable base from which to launch an appeal. Applying that aspect of the functus doctrine to s. 23(1), we face the question of whether the ordering of progress reports denied the respondents a stable basis from which to appeal.

80 In our view, LeBlanc J.'s retention of jurisdiction to hear reports did nothing to undermine the provision of a stable basis for launching an appeal. He did not purport to retain a power to change the decision as to the scope of the s. 23 rights in question, to alter the finding as to their violation, or to modify the original injunctions. The decision, including the best efforts order and the order to appear at reporting sessions, was final and appealable.

81 In any case, the rules of practice in Nova Scotia and other provinces allow courts to vary or add to their orders so as to carry them into operation or even to provide other or further relief than originally granted (Nova Scotia Civil Procedure Rules, Rule 15.08(d) and (e); Ontario Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, Rule 59.06(2)(c) and (d); Alberta Rules of Court, Alta. Reg. 390/68, Rule 390(1)). This shows that the practice of providing further direction on remedies in support of a decision is known to our courts, and does not undermine the availability of appeal. Moreover, the possibility of such proceedings may facilitate the process of putting orders into operation without requiring resort to contempt proceedings.

82 The respondent relies on the Nova Scotia's Judicature Act to support its argument that the ordered reporting hearings were improper. However, even if that Act could have the effect of limiting the jurisdiction granted by s. 24\(1\) of the Charter, nothing in the Judicature Act appears to remove from a trial judge the power to hear reports on the implementation of his or her order. Section 33 of the Judicature Act provides that proceedings in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia shall be “heard, determined and disposed of” by a single judge, but this does not limit the powers of the court to order reporting hearings. Section 34\(d\) of the Judicature Act allows a presiding judge to reserve judgment for a maximum of six months, but in our view, judgment was not reserved in this case since LeBlanc J. delivered his judgment within the six-month period. Section 38 of the Judicature Act provides that “an appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from any decision, verdict, judgment or order” of a judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. LeBlanc J. did nothing that would preclude the appeal of his decision or choice of remedy.

83 In the context, the reporting order was one which, after vindicating the entitled parents' rights, was not unfair to the respondent government. The respondent argues that it was subject to an overly vague remedy. In our opinion, the reporting order was not vaguely worded so as to render it invalid. While, in retrospect, it would certainly have been advisable for LeBlanc J. to provide more guidance to the parties as to what they could expect from the reporting sessions, his order was not incomprehensible or impossible to follow. In our view, the "reporting" element of LeBlanc J. remedy was not unclear in a way that would render it invalid.

84 Doubtless, as LeBel and Deschamps JJ. point out, the initial retention of jurisdiction by LeBlanc J. could have been more specific in its terms so as to give parties a precise understanding of the procedure at reporting sessions. Nonetheless, the respondent knew it was required to present itself to the court to report on the status of its efforts to provide the facilities as ordered by LeBlanc J. LeBlanc J.'s written order is satisfactory and clearly communicates that the obligation on government was simply to report. The fact that this was the subject of questions later in the process suggests that future orders of this type could be more explicit and detailed with respect to the jurisdiction retained and the procedure at reporting hearings.

85 It should be remembered that LeBlanc J. was crafting a fairly original remedy in order to provide flexibility to the executive while vindicating the s. 23 right. It may be expected that in future cases judges will be in a better position to ensure that the contents of their orders are clearer. In addition, the reporting order chosen by LeBlanc J. is not the only tool of its kind. It may be more helpful in some cases for the trial judge to seek submissions on whether to specify a timetable with a right of the government to seek variation where just and appropriate to do so.

86 Once again, we emphasize that s. 24(1) gives a court the discretion to fashion the remedy that it considers just and appropriate in the circumstances. The trial judge is not required to identify the single best remedy, even if that were possible. In our view, the trial judge's remedy was clearly appropriate and just in the circumstances.

(5) Conclusion

87 Section 24(1) of the Charter requires that courts issue effective, responsive remedies that guarantee full and meaningful protection of Charter rights and freedoms. The meaningful protection of Charter rights, and in particular the enforcement of s. 23 rights, may in some cases require the introduction of novel remedies. A superior court may craft any remedy that it considers appropriate and just in the circumstances. In doing so, courts should be mindful of their roles as constitutional arbiters and the limits of their institutional capacities. Reviewing courts, for their part, must show considerable deference to trial judges' choice of remedy, and should refrain from using hindsight to perfect a remedy. A reviewing court should only interfere where the trial judge has committed an error of law or principle.

88 The remedy crafted by LeBlanc J. meaningfully vindicated the rights of the appellant parents by encouraging the Province's prompt construction of school facilities, without drawing the court outside its proper role. The Court of Appeal erred in wrongfully interfering with and striking down the portion of LeBlanc J.'s order in which he retained jurisdiction to hear progress reports on the status of the Province's efforts in providing school facilities by the required dates.

V. Disposition

In the result, we would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and restore the order of the trial judge.

We would award full costs to the appellants on a solicitor-client basis throughout, including the costs for the reporting hearings. The appellants are parents who have, despite their numerous efforts, been consistently denied their Charter rights. The Province failed to meet its corresponding obligations to the appellant parents despite its clear awareness of the appellants' rights. Accordingly, in looking at all the circumstances, our view is that solicitor-client costs should be awarded.

The reasons of Major, Binnie, LeBel and Deschamps JJ. were delivered by

LEBEL AND DESCHAMPS JJ. (dissenting) —

I. Introduction

The devil is in the details. Awareness of the critical importance of effectively enforcing constitutional rights should not lead to forgetfulness about the need to draft pleadings, orders and judgments in a sound manner, consonant with the basic rules of legal writing, and with an understanding of the proper role of courts and of the organizing principles of the legal and political order of our country. Court orders should be written in such a way that parties are put on notice of what is expected of them. Courts should not unduly encroach on areas which should remain the responsibility of public administration and should avoid turning themselves into managers of the public service. Judicial interventions should end when and where the case of which a judge is seized is brought to a close.

In our respectful view, without putting in any doubt the desire of the trial judge to fashion an effective remedy to address the consequences of a long history of neglect of the rights of the Francophone minority in Nova Scotia, the drafting of his so-called reporting order was seriously flawed. It gave the parties no clear notice of their obligations, the nature of the reports or even the purpose of the reporting hearings. In addition, the reporting order assumed that the judge could retain jurisdiction at will, after he had finally disposed of the matter of which he had been seized, thereby breaching the constitutional principle of separation of powers. The order did so by reason of the way it was framed and the manner in which it was implemented. In our opinion, the reporting order was void, as the Court of Appeal of Nova Scotia found, and the appeal should be dismissed.

II. The Nature of the Issues

This appeal raises the sole question of the validity of the reporting order made by LeBlanc J. ((2000), 2000 CanLII 50591 \(NS SC\), 185 N.S.R. (2d) 246). In this context, we do not intend to engage in a full review of the factual background and of the judicial history of this case. For the purposes of our reasons, we are content to rely on their extensive review in the reasons of our colleagues. We will only add such details about the reporting order and its implementation as might be of assistance to our analysis of the legal questions at stake in this appeal.

At the outset, we wish to emphasize that we fully agree with our colleagues in their analysis of the nature and fundamental importance of language rights in the Canadian Constitution, as well as on the need for efficacy and imagination in the development of constitutional remedies. Indeed, we dissent because we believe that constitutional remedies should be designed keeping in mind the canons of good legal drafting, the fundamental importance of procedural fairness, and a proper awareness of the nature of the role of courts in our democratic political regime, a key principle of which remains the separation of powers. This principle protects the independence of courts. It also flexibly delineates the domain of court action, particularly in the relationship of courts not only with legislatures but also with the executive branch of government or public administration.

95 As to the other issues such as mootness, immunities and mandatory injunctions, we are in broad agreement with our colleagues and do not intend to comment any further on them. We turn now to an analysis of the issues which lie at the root of our disagreement with the majority as to the final disposition of this appeal.

96 In this analysis, we will first review the nature of the reporting order and we will determine whether it can be considered consistent with the principle of procedural fairness. We will then discuss the principles of separation of powers and functus officio; we will demonstrate that the question of whether the trial judge had jurisdiction to issue the order is germane to the determination of whether the trial judge breached the separation of powers. In both discussions, the appropriateness of the remedy will be called into question. In the former, we will assess the appropriateness of the order for reporting hearings from the perspective of the parties subject to it, while in the latter, we will analyse the appropriateness of the order, by taking into consideration the proper role of courts within our constitutional order.

III. The Drafting of the Order and the Principle of Procedural Fairness

97 The drafting of applications asking for injunctive relief, or of orders granting such remedies, can be a serious challenge for counsel and judges. The exercise of the court power to grant injunctions may lead, from time to time, to situations of non-compliance where it may be necessary to call upon the drastic exercise of courts' powers to impose civil or criminal penalties, including imprisonment (R. J. Sharpe, Injunctions and Specific Performance (2nd ed. (loose-leaf)), at p. 6-7). Therefore, proper notice to the parties of the obligations imposed upon them and clarity in defining the standard of compliance expected of them must be essential requirements of a court's intervention. Vague or ambiguous language should be strictly avoided (Sonoco Ltd. v. Local 433 (1970), 1970 CanLII 763 \(BC CA\), 13 D.L.R. (3d) 617 (B.C.C.A.), at p. 621; Sporting Club du Sanctuaire Inc. v. 2320-4365 Québec Inc., 1989 CanLII 1210 \(QC CA\), [1989] R.D.J. 596 (Que. C.A.)).

98 Unfortunately, the drafting of the present reporting order was anything but clear. Its brevity and apparent simplicity belie its actual complexity and the state of confusion and uncertainty in which it left not only all of the parties, but the trial judge himself at times. This order was final, not interim, and it was tied to the “best efforts order”, which was not couched in terms liable to shed much light on the nature of the obligations of the respondents. Given that this part of the order was not challenged on appeal, we will not discuss it at length, but instead, will focus exclusively on the reporting order which is the object of this appeal.

99 At first, when judgment was rendered, the reporting order read, at para. 245:

The applicants have requested that I should maintain jurisdiction. I agree to do so. I am scheduling a further appearance for Thursday, July 27, 2000 at 1:30 p.m., and at that time the respondents will report on the status of their efforts. I am requesting the respondents to utilize their best efforts to comply with this decision.

This drafting was slightly modified in the final order, dated December 14, 2000:

The Court shall retain jurisdiction to hear reports from the respondents respecting the respondents' compliance with this Order. The respondents shall report to this Court on March 23, 2001 at 9:30 a.m., or on such other date as the Court may determine.

100 As Flinn J.A. observed in his reasons in the Court of Appeal ((2001), 194 N.S.R. (2d) 323, 2001 NSCA 104), nobody knew the exact nature of these reports. Their form and content were undefined. There was no indication as to whether they should be delivered orally or in writing or both nor as to how detailed they should be and what kind of supporting documents, if any, would be needed. The order also provided for hearings, but again, it left the parties in the dark as to the procedure, purpose or nature of these sessions of the court. The parties learned only shortly before these hearings that affidavits needed to be filed and deponents made available for cross-examination. Further, there seemed to be little direction, if any at all, as to what sort of evidence was required to be included for the purpose of the hearings. The nature of these hearings, as the process developed, appeared to become a cross between a mini-trial, an informal meeting with the judge and some kind of mediation session, for the purpose of monitoring the execution of the school-building program for Francophone students.

101 The trial judge himself seemed unsure about the nature of the hearings he had ordered and of the process he had initiated. At first, he appeared to lean towards the view that those hearings were regular sessions of the court, that he had not issued a final order and that additional relief could be requested. For example, in the July 27, 2000 hearing, the trial judge stated that in the hearings, he “would have the opportunity to determine if the Respondents were indeed making every or best efforts to comply” (appellants’ record, at p. 762). This was a reiteration of a claim made earlier in that hearing (appellants’ record, at p. 720). Similarly, in the August 9, 2000 hearing, the trial judge stated: “the amount of room I have with respect to a decision or direction or comment is very limited” (appellants’ record, at pp. 997-98); this statement implies that the trial judge had the power, albeit limited, to make orders. However, after the setting down of his formal order, at the last hearing in March 2001, he commented that he could not grant further relief, that he had fully disposed of the matter in his order and accompanying reasons, which were released the previous summer. He added that the sessions had a solely informational purpose.

102 In the meantime, schools were built or renovated and made available to Francophone students. It is difficult to determine whether those sessions accomplished anything in this respect. What these sessions certainly did was sow confusion, doubt and uncertainty about the obligations of the respondents and about the nature of a process that went on over several months. The trial judge appeared to view this process as open ended and indeterminate, with more sessions being scheduled as he wished. Nobody really knew when it all would come to an end.

103 The uncertainty engendered by the reporting order was not merely inconvenient for the parties. In our view it amounted to a breach of the parties' interest in procedural fairness. One essential feature of a fair procedural rule is that its contents are clearly defined, and known in advance by the parties subject to it (Supermarchés Jean Labrecque Inc. v. Flamand, 1987 CanLII 19 \(SCC\), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 219, at pp. 233-36; see also: D. J. Mullan, Administrative Law (2001), at p. 233; R. Dussault and L. Borgeat, Administrative Law: A Treatise (2nd ed. 1990), vol. 4, at pp. 279-82; S. A. de Smith, H. Woolf and J. L. Jowell, Judicial Review of Administrative Action (5th ed. 1995 & Cum. Supp. 1998), at pp. 432-36).

104 Moreover, as we noted above, the trial judge in his initial characterization of the order seemed to believe, and certainly gave the impression, that he had the power to make further orders based on what was presented to him at the reporting sessions. In other words, he purported to have available the coercive power of the state to compel the parties to act, and suggested that he could do so based on conclusions that he would draw from the evidence placed before him. In the result, the parties found themselves before a trial judge who purported to exercise judicial functions and powers, and who provided almost nothing by way of procedural guidelines. The parties were denied notice which, as L'Heureux-Dubé J. has noted, is a rule "so fundamental in our legal system that I do not think there is any necessity to discuss it at length" (Supermarchés Jean Labrecque, supra, at p. 233). For this reason alone, the trial judge's order can be found to be inappropriate under s. 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and therefore void. Nonetheless, we turn now to a discussion of the principles of separation of powers and functus officio. Consideration of these principles will aid in assessing the appropriateness of the remedy, in light of the judiciary's proper role within our constitutional order.

IV. The Appropriate Role of the Judiciary

105 While superior courts' powers to craft Charter remedies may not be constrained by statutory or common law limits, they are nonetheless bound by rules of fundamental justice, as we have shown above, and by constitutional boundaries, as we shall see below. In the context of constitutional remedies, courts fulfill their proper function by issuing orders precise enough for the parties to know what is expected of them, and by permitting the parties to execute those orders. Such orders are final. A court purporting to retain jurisdiction to oversee the implementation of a remedy, after a final order has been issued, will likely be acting inappropriately on two levels. First, by attempting to extend the court's jurisdiction beyond its proper role, it will breach the separation of powers principle. Second, by acting after exhausting its jurisdiction, it will breach the functus officio doctrine. We will look at each of these breaches in turn.

1. The Separation of Powers

106 Courts are called upon to play a fundamental role in the Canadian constitutional regime. When needed, they must be assertive in enforcing constitutional rights. At times, they have to grant such relief as will be required to safeguard basic constitutional rights and the rule of law, despite the sensitivity of certain issues or circumstances and the reverberations of their decisions in their societal environment. Despite — or, perhaps, because of — the critical importance of their functions, courts should be wary of going beyond the proper scope of the role assigned to them in the public law of Canada. In essence, this role is to declare what the law is, contribute to its development and to give claimants such relief in the form of declarations, interpretation and orders as will be needed to remedy infringements of constitutional and legal rights by public authorities. Beyond these functions, an attitude of restraint remains all the more justified, given that, as the majority reasons acknowledge, Canada has maintained a tradition of compliance by governments and public servants with judicial interpretations of the law and court orders.

107 Given the nature of the Canadian parliamentary system, the existence of a true doctrine of separation of powers in Canada was sometimes put in doubt (see P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 7-24; MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, 1995 CanLII 57 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725, at para. 52). It is true that Canadians have never adopted a watertight system of separation of judicial, legislative and executive functions. In the discharge of their functions, courts have had to strike down laws, regulations or administrative decisions. They have imposed liability on the Crown or public bodies and have awarded damages against them. Forms of administrative justice or adjudication have grown out of the development of executive functions (Ocean Port Hotel Ltd. v. British Columbia (General Manager, Liquor Control and Licensing Branch), [2001] 2 S.C.R. 781, 2001 SCC 52; Bell Canada v. Canadian Telephone Employees Association, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 884, 2003 SCC 36). Such developments may be said to have blurred theoretical distinctions between government functions. Nevertheless, in a broad sense, a separation of powers is now entrenched as a cornerstone of our constitutional regime.

108 More particularly, the distinction clearly stands out in respect of the relationship of courts on one side and of the legislatures and executive or public administration on the other (H. Brun and G. Tremblay, Droit constitutionnel (4th ed. 2002), at pp. 756-57). Our Court has acknowledged the fundamental nature of the separation of powers, although some of its pronouncements emphasize its functional nature (New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v. Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), 1993 CanLII 153 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 319). Indeed, our Court has recently characterized this principle as a defining feature of the Canadian Constitution (Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3 (“Provincial Court Judges Reference”); see also Fraser v. Public Service Staff Relations Board, 1985 CanLII 14 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 455, at pp. 469-70).

109 Our Court has strongly emphasized and vigorously applied the principle of separation of powers in order to uphold the independence of the judiciary (see for example: Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra; see also Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 405, 2002 SCC 13). In that context, the principle was viewed as a shield designed to protect the judiciary in order to allow it to discharge its duties under the Constitution with complete independence and impartiality. Nothing less was required to maintain the normative ordering of the Canadian legal system.

110 However, the principle of separation of powers has an obverse side as well, which equally reflects the appropriate position of the judiciary within the Canadian legal system. Aside from their duties to supervise administrative tribunals created by the executive and to act as vigilant guardians of constitutional rights and the rule of law, courts should, as a general rule, avoid interfering in the management of public administration.

111 More specifically, once they have rendered judgment, courts should resist the temptation to directly oversee or supervise the administration of their orders. They should generally operate under a presumption that judgments of courts will be executed with reasonable diligence and good faith. Once they have declared what the law is, issued their orders and granted such relief as they think is warranted by circumstances and relevant legal rules, courts should take care not to unnecessarily invade the province of public administration. To do otherwise could upset the balance that has been struck between our three branches of government.

112 This is what occurred in the present case. When the trial judge attempted to oversee the implementation of his order, he not only assumed jurisdiction over a sphere traditionally outside the province of the judiciary, but also acted beyond the jurisdiction with which he was legitimately charged as a trial judge. In other words, he was functus officio and breached an important principle which reflects the nature and function of the judiciary in the Canadian constitutional order, as we shall see now.

2. Functus Officio

113 Canadian doctrinal and judicial writing on functus officio is sparse, even though the rule itself derives from an old case of the English Court of Appeal (In re St. Nazaire Co. (1879), 12 Ch. D. 88). Essentially, the rule is that the court has no jurisdiction to reopen or amend a final decision, except in two cases: (1) where there has been a slip in drawing up the judgment, or (2) where there has been error in expressing the manifest intention of the court (see In re Swire (1885), 30 Ch. D. 239 (C.A.); Paper Machinery Ltd. v. J. O. Ross Engineering Corp., 1934 CanLII 1 \(SCC\), [1934] S.C.R. 186). More recently, this Court affirmed that this rule need not always be rigidly applied to tribunals in the administrative law context when the policy reasons for it are not present (Chandler v. Alberta Association of Architects, 1989 CanLII 41 \(SCC\), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 848).

114 The existence and scope of a right of appeal has often been made the focus of analytical attention in applying the functus doctrine. Such was the case when the power of the Court of Chancery to rehear cases was extinguished by the Judicature Acts in 1873 by fusing common law and equity jurisdictions into one court and providing for a single appeal to a newly created Court of Appeal (In re St. Nazaire, supra). Originally, this was also the focus of the functus analysis for administrative tribunals that had rights of appeal tightly constrained by statute (see Grillas v. Minister of Manpower and Immigration, 1971 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1972] S.C.R. 577). However, the underlying rationale for the doctrine is clearly more fundamental: that for the due and proper administration of justice, there must be finality to a proceeding to ensure procedural fairness and the integrity of the judicial system. The point is plainly made by Sopinka J. in Chandler, supra, at pp. 861-62:

As a general rule, once . . . a tribunal has reached a final decision in respect to the matter that is before it in accordance with its enabling statute, that decision cannot be revisited because the tribunal has changed its mind, made an error within jurisdiction or because there has been a change of circumstances. . . .

To this extent, the principle of functus officio applies. It is based, however, on the policy ground which favours finality of proceedings rather than the rule which was developed with respect to formal judgments of a court whose decision was subject to a full appeal.

115 If a court is permitted to continually revisit or reconsider final orders simply because it has changed its mind or wishes to continue exercising jurisdiction over a matter, there would never be finality to a proceeding, or, as G. Pépin and Y. Ouellette have perceptively termed it, the providing of [TRANSLATION] “legal security” for the parties (Principes de contentieux administratif (2nd ed. 1982), at p. 221). This concern for finality is evident in the definition of functus officio:

[TRANSLATION] Qualifies a court or tribunal, a public body or an official that is no longer seized of a matter because it or he or she has discharged the office. E.g. A judge who has pronounced a final judgment is functus officio.

(H. Reid, Dictionnaire de droit québécois et canadien (2001), at p. 253)

The principle ensures that subject to an appeal, parties are secure in their reliance on the finality of superior court decisions.

116 This common law rule is further reflected in modern rules of civil procedure (see, e.g., Nova Scotia Civil Procedure Rules, Rule 15.07) and the interpretation of criminal appeal provisions (see R. v. H. (E.F.) (1997), 1997 CanLII 418 (ON CA), 115 C.C.C. (3d) 89 (Ont. C.A.), considering s. 675 of the Criminal Code). Whether in its common law or statutory form, the doctrine of functus officio provides that only in strictly limited circumstances can a court revisit an order or judgment (see Nova Scotia Civil Procedure Rules, Rule 15.08). If it were otherwise, there would be, to paraphrase Charron J.A. in H. (E.F.), supra, at p. 101, the recurring danger of the trial process becoming or appearing to become a “never closing revolving door” through which litigants could come and go as they pleased.

117 In addition to this concern with finality, the question of whether a court is clothed with the requisite authority to act raises concerns related to the separation of powers, a principle that transcends procedural and common law rules. In our view, if a court intervenes, as here, in matters of administration properly entrusted to the executive, it exceeds its proper sphere and thereby breaches the separation of powers. By crossing the boundary between judicial acts and administrative oversight, it acts illegitimately and without jurisdiction. Such a crossing of the boundary cannot be characterized as relief that is “appropriate and just in the circumstances” within the meaning of s. 24(1) of the Charter.

V. Application of the Relevant Principles to the Present Case

118 When the above principles are applied to the present facts, it is evident that McIntyre J.’s admonition in Mills v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 17 (SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863, that s. 24(1)

“was not intended to turn the Canadian legal system upside down” is apropos (p. 953). In our view, the trial judge’s remedy undermined the proper role of the judiciary within our constitutional order, and unnecessarily upset the balance between the three branches of government. As a result, the trial judge in the present circumstances acted inappropriately, and contrary to s. 24(1).

119 As we noted above, the trial judge equivocated on the question of whether his purported retention of jurisdiction empowered him to make further orders. Regardless of which position is taken, the separation of powers was still breached. On the one hand, if he did purport to be able to make further orders, based on the evidence presented at the reporting hearings, he was functus officio. We find it difficult to imagine how any subsequent order would not have resulted in a change to the original final order. This necessarily falls outside the narrow exceptions provided by functus officio, and breaches that rule.

120 Such a breach would also have resulted in a violation of the separation of powers principle. By purporting to be able to make subsequent orders, the trial judge would have assumed a supervisory role which included administrative functions that properly lie in the sphere of the executive. These functions are beyond the capacities of courts. The judiciary is ill equipped to make polycentric choices or to evaluate the wide-ranging consequences that flow from policy implementation. This Court has recognized that courts possess neither the expertise nor the resources to undertake public administration. In Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 327 \(SCC\), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 624, at para. 96, it was held that in light of the “myriad options” available to the government to rectify the unconstitutionality of the impugned system, it was “not this Court’s role to dictate how this is to be accomplished”.

121 In addition, if he purported to adopt a managerial role, the trial judge undermined the norm of co-operation and mutual respect that not only describes the relationship between the various actors in the constitutional order, but defines its particularly Canadian nature, and invests each branch with legitimacy. In Vriend v. Alberta, 1998 CanLII 816 \(SCC\), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 493, Iacobucci J. noted that “respect by the courts for the legislature and executive role is as important as ensuring that the other branches respect each others’ role and the role of the courts” (para. 136). He discussed the wording of provisions of the Charter that expressed this norm of mutual respect (para. 137), and remarked that this norm has “the effect of enhancing the democratic process” (para. 139).

122 Similarly, McLachlin J. (as she then was) in the 1990 Weir Memorial Lecture reviewed the elements of our legal culture — including our political climate, our tradition of judicial restraint, and the system of references — that have contributed to a spirit of co-operation, rather than confrontation among the branches of government (B. M. McLachlin, “The Charter: A New Role for the Judiciary?” (1991), 29 Alta. L. Rev. 540, at pp. 554-56). Moreover, referring to her reasons in Dixon v. British Columbia (Attorney-General) (1989), 1989 CanLII 248 \(BC SC\), 59 D.L.R. (4th) 247 (B.C.S.C.), she spoke to the importance of considerations of institutional legitimacy for a court crafting a remedy (at p. 557):

It was not for me, I felt, to dictate to the Legislature what sort of law they should enact; that was the responsibility of the elected representatives. But, again following a time-honoured judicial tradition, I offered advice on what limits on the principle of one person-one vote, might be acceptable.

123 McLachlin J. expressed this concern for the principle of democratic legitimacy in respect of the relationship between the judiciary and the legislature, but the principle extends to that between the judiciary and the executive. This Court has recognized that in the Canadian parliamentary system, the executive is inextricably tied to the legislative branch. The Court in Attorney General of Quebec v. Blaikie, 1981 CanLII 14 \(SCC\), [1981] 1 S.C.R. 312, at p. 320, observed that “[t]here is thus a considerable degree of integration between the Legislature and the Government”. In Wells v. Newfoundland, 1999 CanLII 657 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 199, at para. 53, the Court held: “On a practical level, it is recognized that the same individuals control both the executive and legislative branches of government.”

124 Therefore, just as the legislature should, after a judicial finding of a Charter breach retain independence in writing its legislative response, the executive should after a judicial finding of a breach, retain autonomy in administering government policy that conforms with the Charter. In our constitutional order, the legislature and the executive are intimately interrelated and are the principal loci of democratic will. Judicial respect for that will should extend to both branches.

125 Thus, if the trial judge’s initial suggestion that he could continue to make orders, and thereby effectively engage in administrative supervision and decision making accurately characterizes the nature of the reporting sessions, the order for reporting sessions breached the constitutional principle of separation of powers. Since no part of the Constitution can be interpreted to conflict with another, that order cannot be considered appropriate and just in the circumstances, under s. 24(1). The trial judge’s order for reporting sessions should also be considered inappropriate because it put into question the Canadian tradition of mutual respect between the judiciary and the institutions that are the repository of democratic will.

126 If, however, the trial judge’s statement in the last session that he could not make further orders correctly characterized his remedial order, then he breached the separation of powers in another way. When considered in light of this constitutional principle and applied to the present facts, McLachlin C.J.’s proposition that “s. 24 should not be read so broadly that it endows courts and tribunals with powers that they were never intended to exercise” (R. v. 974649 Ontario Inc., [2001] 3 S.C.R. 575, 2001 SCC 81 (“Dunedin”), at para. 22) leads to the conclusion that the trial judge’s remedy was not appropriate and just in the circumstances.

127 The appellants argued that the trial judge retained jurisdiction only to hear reports, and that these hearings had purely “suasive” value. They also argued that the hearings were designed to hold “the Province’s feet to the fire” (SCC hearing transcripts). They further suggested that the threat of having to report to the trial judge functioned as an incentive for the government to comply with the best efforts order. In the words of the appellants:

Is it a coincidence that, after a nine month delay (October 1999 to July 2000) the Province called for tenders eight days before the reporting hearing and “fast tracked” the school? The Province knew that it would have to report on July 27. The Province ensured that a call for tenders and a construction schedule were in place for July 27.

128 If this characterization of the trial judge’s activity is accurate, then the order for reporting sessions did not result in the exercise of adjudicative, or any other, functions that traditionally define the ambit of a court’s proper sphere. Moreover, it resulted in activity that can be characterized as political. According to the appellants’ characterization, a primary purpose of the hearings was to put public pressure on the government to act. This kind of pressure is paradigmatically associated with political actors. Indeed, the practice of publicly questioning a government on its performance, without having any legal power to compel it to alter its behaviour, is precisely that undertaken by an opposition party in the legislature during question period.

129 In the above, we reasoned that the trial judge, by breaching the separation of powers, would have put in question the norm of co-operation that defines the relationship between the branches of government in Canada. We will presently demonstrate how the trial judge, by improperly altering the relationship between the judiciary and the executive, would have breached the separation of powers.

130 In Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, Lamer C.J. described the separation of powers as providing that “the relationships between the different branches of government should have a particular character” (para. 139 (emphasis in original)). In particular, according to him, the separation of powers doctrine requires that these relationships be depoliticized (para. 140 (emphasis in original)).

131 In that case, Lamer C.J. remarked that the legislature and the executive cannot exert, and cannot appear to exert political pressure on the judiciary (para. 140). The reciprocal proposition applies to the immediate case. With the reporting hearings, the trial judge may have sought to exert political or public pressure on the executive, and at least appeared to do so. In our view, such action would tend to politicize the relationship between the executive and the judiciary.

132 If the reporting hearings were intended to hold “the Province’s feet to the fire”, the character of the relationship between the judiciary and the executive was improperly altered and, as per the Provincial Court Judges Reference, the constitutional principle of separation of powers was breached. Once again, since no part of the Constitution can conflict with another, the trial judge’s order for reporting hearings cannot be interpreted as appropriate and just under s. 24(1).

133 We would reiterate, at this point, the importance of clarity and certainty in the provisions of a court order. If the trial judge had precisely defined the terms of the remedy, in advance, then the ensuing confusion surrounding his role may not have occurred. Moreover, by complying with this essential element of fair procedure, he may have been able to avoid the constitutional breach of the separation of powers that followed.

VI. Neither a Breach of Procedural Fairness nor of the Separation of Powers Was Appropriate

134 We noted above that this Court in Eldridge recognized the appropriateness of judicial restraint in issuing a remedy under s. 24(1), given the variety of choices open to the executive in administering policy. Implicit in the declaratory remedy ordered in that case was the presumption that the government will act in good faith in rectifying Charter wrongs and the recognition that legislatures and executives, not the courts, are in the best position to decide exactly how this should be done. Turning to the present case then, the trial judge's decision to provide injunctive relief already represented a departure from the cooperative norm that defines and shapes the relationships among the branches of the Canadian constitutional order. We do not deny that in the appropriate factual circumstances, injunctive relief may become necessary. However, the trial judge's order for reporting sessions then purported to go even further, and breached both a fundamental principle of procedural fairness and the constitutional principle of separation of powers.

135 One might argue that such a breach is appropriate where it is the only way that a claimant's rights can be vindicated. Alternatively, one might suggest that if a government has ignored previous, less intrusive judicial measures, and thereby put into question their efficacy, a court might be justified in abandoning the presumption of governmental good will that we referred to above. In our view, the present case gave rise to neither of these arguments.

136 Turning to the first argument, if the hearings were aimed at ensuring the vindication of the claimants' rights by providing them with the opportunity to enforce or alter the remedy, there were alternatives available. If the claimants felt that the government was not complying with any part of the order, then they could have brought an application for contempt. The majority seems to suggest that contempt proceedings would have been less effective in this case in ensuring timely performance of the order, without being any more respectful of the separation of powers. However, we would note that expedited applications are possible in Nova Scotia and other jurisdictions to deal with cases quickly and efficiently. In addition, the reporting order at issue in this case precluded applying to any other judge for relief and was, in this way, even more limiting than a contempt proceeding. Most importantly, contempt proceedings are more consistent with our adversarial system, which is based on the common law norm of giving the parties primary control over the proceedings (see J. I. H. Jacob, The Fabric of English Civil Justice (1987), at p. 13). In contrast, the present order for reporting sessions placed the trial judge in an inappropriate, ongoing supervisory and investigative role despite the availability of the equally effective, well-established, and minimally intrusive alternative of contempt relief.

137 Consequently, it is clear that the order for reporting hearings was not the only means of vindicating the claimants' rights, and that recourse to a readily available alternative would have been consistent with a defining feature of our legal system. Recourse to this alternative would not have resulted in an interpretation of the court's remedial powers that was so broad as to purport to endow the court with powers that it was "never intended to exercise" (Dunedin, supra, at para. 22). It is important to stress that in the present case, it is not clear that actual recourse to a contempt application would have been necessary. The point is simply that if judicial enforcement of the deadlines in question were necessary, recourse to this alternative would not have overextended the court's powers.

138 On a last note, we find it difficult to imagine circumstances where a breach of one party's fundamental right to notice would aid in the vindication of another's Charter rights. In any event, the present facts do not present such a case. The intrusiveness of the trial judge's order was in no way necessary to secure the claimants' s. 23 interests. Given the absence of any causal connection between the breach of the parties' right to notice and the effectiveness of the purported remedy, we would conclude that the breach cannot be considered appropriate for the purposes of s. 24(1).

139 The second argument is simply not applicable in this case. The facts here do not require us to decide whether previous government non-compliance can ever justify remedial orders that breach principles of procedural fairness and the separation of powers. The Government of Nova Scotia did not refuse to comply with either a prior remedial order or a declaration with respect to its particular obligations in the fact-situation at hand. No such order was made and it is impossible to determine whether the government would have responded in the present case to either a declaration of rights, or the injunction to meet the deadline as these measures were combined with the order purporting to retain jurisdiction to oversee the reporting sessions. Therefore, it cannot be asserted that the trial judge's order has succeeded where less intrusive remedial measures failed.

140 Moreover, what was required by the Government of Nova Scotia to comply with its obligations pursuant to s. 23 was not self-evident at trial. The trial judge was not faced with a government which was cognizant of how it should fulfill its obligations, but refused to do so. Indeed, at issue before the trial judge was precisely the question of what compliance with s. 23 involved. The present order, therefore, did not overcome governmental recalcitrance in the face of a clear understanding of what s. 23 required in the circumstances of the case. Remedies must be chosen in light of the nature and structure of the Canadian constitutional order, an important feature of which is the presumption of co-operation between the branches of government. Therefore, unless it is established that this constitutional balance has been upset by the executive's clear defiance of a directly applicable judicial order, increased judicial intervention in public administration will rarely be appropriate.

141 In choosing and reviewing s. 24(1) remedies, it is important to remember that the inquiry into the appropriateness of a remedy should be undertaken from an ex ante perspective. The simple fact that a desired result occurs after a remedial order is issued is not relevant to determining the question of the order's appropriateness. In our view, an adequate ex ante assessment must consider the risks that attend a given remedy. In the present case, as Freeman J.A. noted in dissent, if the trial judge "misread the degree of co-operation he could expect from the players, there was a risk of failure" (para. 84). That the present remedy's susceptibility to failure was tied to the capacities of a particular judge should in itself give pause. In our view, whether a remedy is appropriate should be assessed with reference to the remedy itself and not the particular capacities of a given judge to manage that remedy. More importantly, where a thorough ex ante assessment of a remedy reveals that it will certainly be inconsistent with basic legal principles and constitutional doctrines, such a remedy should not be considered appropriate. Available remedies that do not result in such breaches should, a contrario, be considered to be more appropriate.

142 The question of the relevant time frame for the inquiry into a remedy's appropriateness is tied to the more general question of remedial effectiveness. It is important to remember the context in which this Court considered the issue of effectiveness in Dunedin, supra. The issue was whether a justice of the peace acting as a trial justice under the Ontario Provincial Offences Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.33, was a court of competent jurisdiction to direct an order for costs against the Crown for a Charter breach. The Court held that if provincial offences courts were deprived of this remedy, an accused may be denied access to a recognized means of remedying a Charter breach (para. 82).

In the present case, refusing superior courts the power to order reporting hearings clearly would not deny claimants' access to a recognized Charter remedy, as such an order is entirely idiosyncratic. More importantly, refusing superior courts this power would not deprive claimants of access to that which they are guaranteed by s. 23, namely, the timely provision of minority language instruction facilities. Indeed, if the appellants' characterization of the reporting hearings' purpose is correct, it is difficult to see how they could have been more effective than the construction deadline coupled with the possibility of a contempt order. In our view, the availability of this legal sanction for non-compliance with the order to meet the construction deadline would have provided at least as much incentive for the government to remedy the s. 23 breach as would have reporting hearings, in which the presiding judge was without the power to make further orders. Moreover, at the level of constitutional principle, because this incentive is legal in nature, it would not have led to the improper politicization of the relationship between the judiciary and the executive.

Also, it should be noted that the trial judge's order was not consistent with this Court's retention of jurisdiction in the Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1985 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721. Far from purporting to supervise compliance with a remedy, the Court in that case retained jurisdiction to ask for the government's assistance in fashioning it. The Court did not thereby exceed its constitutional role by purporting to oversee administrative action. The Court was ultimately respectful of the executive's capacity to make the policy choices necessary to comply with constitutional requirements.

VII. Conclusion

In the result, the trial judge breached both a principle of procedural fairness and the constitutional principle of separation of powers, and it is not clear that alternative, less-intrusive remedial measures, would not have achieved the ends sought. While a trial judge's decisions with respect to remedies are owed deference, we believe that this must be tempered when fundamental legal principles are threatened. In light of these principles, and in the presence of untested alternative remedies, we would find that the present trial judge's retention of jurisdiction was not appropriate and just under s. 24(1). The Court of Appeal was correct in declaring that the order to retain jurisdiction for the purposes of reporting sessions was of no force and effect.

146 In closing, we recur to the underlying purpose of s. 24(1), by referring to a passage in Mills, supra, at pp. 952-53, in which McIntyre J. wrote:

To begin with, it must be recognized that the jurisdiction of the various courts of Canada is fixed by the Legislatures of the various provinces and by the Parliament of Canada. It is not for the judge to assign jurisdiction in respect of any matters to one court or another. This is wholly beyond the judicial reach. . . .

. . . The absence of jurisdictional provisions and directions in the Charter confirms the view that the Charter was not intended to turn the Canadian legal system upside down. What is required rather is that it be fitted into the existing scheme of Canadian legal procedure.

147 The proper development of the law of constitutional remedies requires that courts reconcile their duty to act within proper jurisdictional limits with the need to give full effect to the rights of a claimant. To read into s. 24(1) a judicial carte blanche would not only “turn the Canadian legal system upside down”, but would also be an injustice to the parties who come before the court to have their disputes resolved in accordance with basic legal principles. In our view, proper consideration of the principles of procedural fairness and the separation of powers is required to establish the requisite legitimacy and certainty essential to an appropriate and just remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter.

*Appeal allowed with costs, MAJOR, BINNIE, LEBEL and DESCHAMPS JJ.
dissenting.*

Solicitors for the appellants: Patterson Palmer, Halifax.

Solicitor for the respondent: Attorney General of Nova Scotia, Halifax.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General of Canada: Attorney General of Canada, Ottawa.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General of Ontario: Attorney General of Ontario, Toronto.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General of New Brunswick: Attorney General of New Brunswick, Fredericton.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General of Newfoundland and Labrador: Attorney General of Newfoundland and Labrador, St. John's.

*Solicitor for the intervener the Commissioner of Official Languages for Canada:
Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages, Ottawa.*

Solicitors for the intervener Fédération nationale des conseillères et conseillers scolaires francophones: Patterson Palmer, Moncton.

Solicitors for the intervener Fédération des associations de juristes d'expression française de Common Law Inc.: Balfour Moss, Regina.

Solicitors for the intervener Conseil scolaire acadien provincial: Merrick Holm, Halifax.

TAB 10

R. v. Dudley, 2009 SCC 58 (CanLII), [2009] 3 SCR 570

Source:	Supreme Court of Canada
Date:	2009-12-17
File number:	32603
Other citations:	313 DLR (4th) 257 — 396 NR 299 — [2010] 3 WWR 191 — 470 WAC 198 — 17 Alta LR (5th) 1 — [2010] EXP 53 — 469 AR 198 — 249 CCC (3d) 421 — 71 CR (6th) 1 — 86 WCB (2d) 156 — EYB 2009-167385 — JE 2010-26 — [2009] SCJ No 58 (QL) — [2009] ACS no 58
Citation:	R. v. Dudley, 2009 SCC 58 (CanLII), [2009] 3 SCR 570, < https://canlii.ca/t/272k3 >, retrieved on 2026-03-22
Most recent unfavourable mention	R. v. Lapointe , 2021 QCCA 360 (CanLII) [...] [38] Contrary to her conclusion, the trial judge was not bound by Dudley according to stare decisis since, in that case, the Supreme Court of Canada had specifically excluded the application of the Identification of Criminals Act from the analysis. [...]

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

CITATION: R. v. Dudley, 2009 SCC 58, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 570

DATE: 20091217
DOCKET: 32603

BETWEEN:

Kristy Leanne Dudley
Appellant
and
Her Majesty The Queen
Respondent
- and -

Director of Public Prosecutions of Canada

Intervener

CORAM: McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Charron, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT: Fish J. (McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Abella and Cromwell JJ. concurring)
(paras. 1 to 56)

CONCURRING REASONS: Charron J. (Deschamps and Rothstein JJ. concurring)
(paras. 57 to 90)

R. v. Dudley, 2009 SCC 58, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 570

Kristy Leanne Dudley

Appellant

v.

Her Majesty The Queen

Respondent

and

Director of Public Prosecutions of Canada

Intervener

Indexed as: R. v. Dudley

Neutral citation: 2009 SCC 58.

File No.: 32603.

2009: March 18; 2009: December 17.

Present: McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Charron, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ALBERTA

Criminal law — Procedure — Hybrid offences — Summary convictions — Limitation period — Information sworn more than six months after offences were alleged to have been committed — Plea not yet entered — Trial judge declaring information to be a nullity — Whether Crown can continue prosecution as indictable offence — Whether limitation period in s. 786(2) of Criminal Code applies to hybrid offences.

D was charged with one count of fraud not exceeding $5,000 under s. 380(1)(b) of the Criminal Code, and one count of uttering a forged document under s. 368(1)(b), both hybrid offences which allow the Crown to proceed either by indictment or by summary conviction. The Crown elected to proceed summarily. When the matter came before the trial court for an expected guilty plea, defence counsel moved to dismiss the charges as a nullity because the summary conviction proceeding was statute-barred under s. 786(2) of the Code as the information had been sworn more than six months after the alleged unlawful conduct. The Crown immediately sought leave to “re-elect” and proceed by indictment or, alternatively, to withdraw the charge. The trial judge denied these motions and concluded that the charge was a nullity. The Court of Appeal allowed the Crown’s appeal, holding that the original information remained valid and that the Crown could “re-elect” to proceed by indictment.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Fish, Abella and Cromwell JJ.: Where the Crown elects to proceed by way of summary conviction, the hybrid offence is treated in all respects as a summary conviction offence and the proceedings must be instituted within six months unless the parties otherwise agree. Where the trial has proceeded before a summary conviction court without an express election by the Crown, it will be presumed that the Crown has elected to proceed summarily. Where it is discovered before adjudication on the merits that the proceedings were instituted more than six months after the offence is alleged to have been committed, a mistrial should be declared unless the parties agree to waive the limitation period. After the verdict has been rendered, the appropriate remedy is an appeal on any permissible ground to the summary conviction appeal court. Where an appeal by the accused is allowed on the sole ground that the proceedings were statute-barred and conducted without consent, a conviction at trial should be set aside. When a mistrial is declared or a conviction is set aside, the Crown may proceed afresh by indictment except where the court is satisfied that this would amount to an abuse of process. An appeal by the Crown against an acquittal on the ground that the proceedings were statute-barred will not lie, since it is the Crown’s responsibility to ensure that the proceedings are properly instituted. [2-6]

When the defendant declines to consent to the continuation of the summary conviction proceedings, and the offence is punishable only on summary conviction, the court should simply dismiss the information. Hybrid offences, however, in virtue of s. 34 of the Interpretation Act, are deemed indictable unless and until the Crown has elected to proceed summarily. Where the Crown elects to proceed summarily, proceedings are governed by the provisions of the Code set out in Part XXVII, including s. 786\(2\). The accused’s failure to consent to the prosecution of a hybrid offence by way of summary conviction beyond the limitation period is fatal to the validity of the Crown’s election to proceed summarily and to the ensuing proceedings. The initial election and all subsequent proceedings are a nullity and have therefore no effect on the Crown’s ability to proceed by indictment. [37-39] [42-43]

Per Deschamps, Charron and Rothstein JJ.: The limitation period in s. 786\(2\) of the Criminal Code does not apply to dual procedure offences. The matter should therefore be remitted to the trial court to proceed by summary conviction in accordance with the Crown’s election. [62] [90]

Section 786(2) only operates as a general bar to the institution of proceedings more than six months after the alleged offence in respect of summary conviction offences. While the definition of “proceedings” in s. 785 of Part XXVII of the Code entitled “Summary Convictions” is wide enough to include dual procedure offences, that Part only applies “[e]xcept where otherwise provided by law”. Since dual procedure offences are deemed indictable offences by operation of s. 34 of the Interpretation Act, the proceedings are commenced pursuant to s. 504 or 505 of the Code, not s. 788\(1\). As a result, the proceedings for dual procedure offences are never “instituted” under Part XXVII within the meaning of s. 788\(1\) and the limitation period in s. 786\(2\) does not apply to these offences. Proceedings in respect of dual procedure offences may therefore be instituted beyond the six-month period. Any subsequent Crown election to proceed summarily does not retroactively invalidate the institution of the proceeding. Even though the Crown's election to proceed summarily results in the dual procedure offence's acquiring the same characteristics as a pure summary offence in important aspects, its choice of procedural route does not change the original characterization of the offence as an indictable offence. Further, since s. 786(2) speaks to the institution of the proceeding, not the Crown election, nothing in the provision bars the Crown from electing to proceed either by indictment or by summary conviction in respect of such offences. Parliament considers dual procedure offences as more serious than pure summary conviction offences and, had it wished to impose a limitation period on dual procedure offences, it could have expressly adverted to the offences in s. 786(2) or declined to deem them to be indictable offences in the Interpretation Act. [61] [68] [71-72] [77-78]

Interpreting s. 786(2) to exclude dual procedure offences is consistent with the purpose of the limitation provision and does not interfere with the fair and efficient administration of the criminal justice system. Such an interpretation also respects prosecutorial discretion and protects the accused from unfair treatment since the Crown is not forced to proceed by way of indictment when it would otherwise pursue a summary conviction absent an accused's consent to summary proceedings. In addition, this interpretation causes no conflict with other legislation and nothing in the jurisprudence militates against it as no court has ruled on the specific issue of the application of s. 786(2) to dual procedure offences. [75] [79] [80] [82-83] [87]

Cases Cited

By Fish J.

Referred to: R. v. Richards, 1933 CanLII 483 (BC CA), [1934] 2 W.W.R. 390; Smythe v. The Queen, 1971 CanLII 831 (SCC), [1971] S.C.R. 680; R. v. Mitchell (1997), 1997 CanLII 6321 (ON CA), 121 C.C.C. (3d) 139; R. v. Paul-Marr, 2005 NSCA 73, 199 C.C.C. (3d) 424; R. v. C. (D.J.) (1985), 1985 CanLII 3611 (PE SCAD), 21 C.C.C. (3d) 246; Canada (Attorney General) v. Trueman, P.C.J. (1996), 1996 CanLII 3132 (BC CA), 83 B.C.A.C. 227; Trinidad and Tobago v. Davis, 2008 ABCA 275, 233 C.C.C. (3d) 435; R. v. Huff (1979), 1979 ABCA 234 (CanLII), 50 C.C.C. (2d) 324; R. v. Gougeon (1980), 1980 CanLII 2842 (ON CA), 55 C.C.C. (2d) 218; R. v. Tontarelli, 2009 NBCA 52, 348 N.B.R. (2d) 41; R. v. D. (S.) (1997), 1997 CanLII 14627 (NL CA), 119 C.C.C. (3d) 65; R. v. O'Leary (1991), 1991 CanLII 6852 (NL CA), 64 C.C.C. (3d) 573; R. v. Shiplack (1993), 1993 CanLII 9139 (SK CA), 109 Sask. R. 311; Ahmed v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship & Immigration), 2009 FC 672, 81 Imm. L.R. (3d) 116; R. v. Connors (1998), 1998 CanLII 12468 (BC CA), 121 C.C.C. (3d) 358; Re Abarca and The Queen (1980), 1980 CanLII 2958 (ON CA), 57 C.C.C. (2d) 410; R. v. Karpinski, 1957 CanLII 9 (SCC), [1957] S.C.R. 343; R. v. Kelly (1998), 1998 CanLII 7145 (ON CA), 128 C.C.C. (3d) 206; Giroux v. The King (1917), 1917 CanLII 81 (SCC), 56 S.C.R. 63; Korponay v. Attorney General of Canada, 1982 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 41; R. v. Jans (1990), 1990 ABCA 271 (CanLII), 59 C.C.C. (3d) 398; R. v. Burke (1992), 1992 CanLII 7121 (NL CA), 78 C.C.C. (3d) 163; R. v. Kalkhorany (1994), 1994 CanLII 687 (ON CA), 89 C.C.C. (3d) 184; R. v. Boutilier (1995), 1995 NSCA 227 (CanLII), 104 C.C.C. (3d) 327; R. v. Belair (1988), 1988 CanLII 7110 (ON CA), 41 C.C.C. (3d) 329; R. v. Phelps (1993), 1993 CanLII 14657 (ON CA), 79 C.C.C. (3d) 550; R. v. Edwards (1898), 1898 CanLII 105 (ON CA), 2 C.C.C. 96; R. v. Machacek, 1961 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1961] S.C.R. 163; Petersen v. The Queen, 1982 CanLII 200 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 493.

By Charron J.

Considered: R. v. Karpinski, 1957 CanLII 9 (SCC), [1957] S.C.R. 343; referred to: R. v. Beare, 1988 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 387; Krieger v. Law Society of Alberta, 2002 SCC 65, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 372; Smythe v. The Queen, 1971 CanLII 831 (SCC), [1971] S.C.R. 680; R. v. Court of Sessions of the Peace, ex parte Lafleur, 1966 CanLII 560 (QC CA), [1967] 3 C.C.C. 244; R. v. Connors (1998), 1998 CanLII 12468 (BC CA), 121 C.C.C. (3d) 358; R. v. Boutilier (1995), 1995 NSCA 227 (CanLII), 104 C.C.C. (3d) 327.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Animal Pedigree Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 8 (4th Supp.), s. 67.

Citizenship Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-29, s. 22.

Crimes Act 1900 (N.S.W.), ss. 475A, 475B.

Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1927, c. 36, s. 501.

Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, ss. 368(1)(b), 380(1)(b), 504, 505, 536, 606(4), Part XXVII, 785 “proceedings”, 786(2) [ad. 1997, c. 18, s. 110], 788.

Criminal Code, 1892, S.C. 1892, c. 29, s. 841.

Criminal Records Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-47, s. 4.

Identification of Criminals Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-1.

Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, s. 34.

Juries Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 4.

Magistrates’ Courts Act 1980 (U.K.), 1980, c. 43, s. 19.

Authors Cited

Barton, P. G. “Why Limitation Periods in the Criminal Code?” (1998), 40 Crim. L.Q. 188.

Canada. Department of Justice. Public Prosecution Service. The Federal Prosecution Service Deskbook, Part V, c. 19, “Elections and Re-Elections”, 2000 (update October 2005) (online: <http://www.ppsc-sppc.gc.ca/eng/fps-sfp/fpd/ch19.html>).

Canada. House of Commons. Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights. Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, 1st Sess., 36th Parl., October 20, 1998 (online: <http://www2.parl.gc.ca/HousePublications/Publication.aspx?DocId=1038963&Mode=1&Parl=36&Ses=1&Language=E>).

Manning, Mewett & Sankoff: Criminal Law, 4th ed. by Morris Manning and Peter Sankoff. Markham, Ont.: LexisNexis, 2009.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Alberta Court of Appeal (Ritter and Slatter JJ.A. and Bielby J. (ad hoc)), 2008 ABCA 73, 425 A.R. 280, 418 W.A.C. 280, 89 Alta. L.R. (4th) 71, 231

C.C.C. (3d) 80, [2008] 7 W.W.R. 645, [2008] A.J. No. 209 (QL), 2008 CarswellAlta 261, setting aside a decision of Wenden Prov. Ct. J., 2006 CarswellAlta 2115. Appeal dismissed.

Akram Attia and Daryl J. Royer, for the appellant.

James A. Bowron, for the respondent.

François Lacasse and Gilles Villeneuve, for the intervener.

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Fish, Abella and Cromwell JJ. was delivered by

FISH J. —

I

[1] “Hybrid” offences are crimes that can be prosecuted by indictment or on summary conviction. The choice in Canada is the Crown’s, though this has not always been the case and is not the case in other jurisdictions.

[2] Where the Crown elects to proceed by way of summary conviction, or “summarily”, the hybrid (or “dual procedure”) offence is treated in all respects as a summary conviction offence. Of particular importance here, the proceedings must be instituted within six months unless the parties otherwise agree.

[3] Where the trial has proceeded before a summary conviction court without an express election by the Crown, it will be presumed that the Crown has elected to proceed summarily. Where it is discovered before adjudication on the merits that the proceedings were instituted more than six months after the offence is alleged to have been committed, a mistrial should be declared unless the parties agree to waive the limitation period (or “prescription”).

[4] After the verdict has been rendered, the appropriate remedy is an appeal on any permissible ground to the summary conviction appeal court.

[5] Where an appeal by the accused^[1] is allowed on the sole ground that the proceedings were statute-barred and conducted without consent, a conviction at trial should be set aside. In either instance, the Crown may proceed afresh by indictment except where the court is satisfied that this would amount to an abuse of process. That is because neither a mistrial nor a conviction set aside on appeal gives rise to a plea of autrefois.

[6] An appeal by the Crown against an acquittal on the ground that the proceedings were statute-barred will not lie, since it was the Crown’s responsibility to ensure that the proceedings were properly instituted. Having elected to proceed by way of summary conviction before the right court, the Crown should not be heard to complain after an adverse adjudication on the merits that it neglected to obtain the consent of the accused before the accused was acquitted!

[7] In my view, these are the governing principles where a hybrid offence is prosecuted by way of summary conviction beyond the six-month limitation period.

[8] The rest is background, detail and commentary.

II

[9] The appellant, Kristy Leanne Dudley, was charged with one count of fraud not exceeding $5,000 under s. 380(1)(b) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, and one count of uttering a forged document under s. 368(1)(b) of the Code. The fraud was alleged to have occurred between June 23, 2002 and May 31, 2004; the uttering, on November 12, 2002. Both are hybrid offences and the Crown elected to proceed summarily.

[10] When the matter came before Wenden Prov. Ct. J. for an expected guilty plea, counsel for Ms. Dudley noticed that the information had been sworn on January 30, 2006 — more than six months after the alleged unlawful conduct was said to have occurred — and was therefore statute-barred as a summary conviction proceeding.

[11] Counsel for Ms. Dudley moved to dismiss the charges as a “nullity”. The prosecutor immediately sought leave to “re-elect” and proceed by indictment or, in the alternative, to withdraw the charges. Wenden Prov. Ct. J. denied the Crown’s motions and disposed of the matter by concluding that “the charge is a nullity because . . . it is sworn out of time” (2006 CarswellAlta 2115, at para. 3).

[12] The Alberta Court of Appeal allowed the Crown’s appeal and held that the original information charging Ms. Dudley with fraud and uttering remained valid (2008 ABCA 73, 231 C.C.C. (3d) 80). It also held that the Crown’s statute-barred election to proceed summarily did not afford Ms. Dudley a defence to the charges. Rather, the court concluded that the Crown could “re-elect” to proceed by indictment on the original information since the Crown’s initial election and the subsequent proceedings in the summary conviction court were nullities.

III

[13] This case requires us to consider the peculiar nature of hybrid offences, which exist nowhere — and everywhere — on the landscape of Canadian criminal procedure.

[14] They exist nowhere in the sense that the Criminal Code classifies offences as either indictable or punishable upon summary conviction, and nowhere recognizes a third, discrete category of hybrid offences. Yet hybrid offences are everywhere to be found in the Criminal Code — and in dozens, if not hundreds, of other federal statutes.

[15] Hybrid offences, though initially rare, are not of recent conception: Some can be found in the very first Criminal Code, enacted by Parliament in 1892. And in recent decades Parliament has transformed many crimes formerly triable either by indictment or summarily into offences that may now be prosecuted either way.

[16] Moreover, hybrid offences are by no means a uniquely Canadian phenomenon. Elsewhere, however, the decision whether to proceed summarily or on indictment is not generally a matter of prosecutorial discretion. In England and Wales, for example, it is the presiding magistrate who decides: Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 (U.K.), 1980, c. 43, s. 19. And in certain Australian states, including New South Wales, the accused may apply to be tried summarily, subject to the consent of the Crown: Crimes Act 1900 (N.S.W.), ss. 475A and 475B.

[17] Even in Canada, it was at one time explicitly provided that certain offences were punishable on indictment or on summary conviction at the option of the accused: see, for example, s. 501 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1927, c. 36; R. v. Richards, 1933 CanLII 483 (BC CA), [1934] 2 W.W.R. 390 (B.C.C.A.). But all such provisions have long since been repealed and, as mentioned earlier, the choice is now the Crown's: Smythe v. The Queen, 1971 CanLII 831 (SCC), [1971] S.C.R. 680, at pp. 685-87, per Fauteux C.J.

[18] Pursuant to s. 34(1)(a) of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, an offence is presumed indictable “if the enactment provides that the offender may be prosecuted for the offence by indictment”. Hybrid offences are therefore treated as indictable — unless the Crown elects, or is deemed to have elected, to try them summarily:

In these cases, it is the prosecution that first decides how to proceed. If it chooses to proceed by indictment, the offence is treated in all respects as an indictable offence and the accused has the normal rights of election; if it chooses otherwise, the case proceeds in all respects as a summary conviction offence.

(Manning, Mewett & Sankoff: Criminal Law (4th ed. 2009), at p. 44)

[19] To avoid uncertainty and the misunderstanding of which much unnecessary litigation is born, I think it best for the Crown to declare explicitly whether it is proceeding on a hybrid offence summarily or by indictment before the accused is asked to plead. And where the Crown elects to proceed summarily beyond the six-month limitation period, the prosecutor and the defendant should both be required to declare expressly — again, before plea — that they agree to proceed summarily.

[20] In the absence of an express election, it will in any event be presumed that the Crown has elected to proceed summarily where a hybrid offence “is proceeded with through trial to a verdict in a court having jurisdiction to hear a summary conviction proceeding”: R. v. Mitchell (1997), 1997 CanLII 6321 (ON CA), 121 C.C.C. (3d) 139 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 4. Similarly, the Crown will be deemed to have elected to proceed by indictment where the accused has been put to the election as to mode of trial required, for example by s. 536 of the Criminal Code, so long as the proceedings take place in a court having jurisdiction over the alleged offence.

IV

[21] As mentioned earlier, hybrid offences are deemed to be indictable unless and until the Crown elects to proceed summarily. Thus, speaking for the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal in R. v. Paul-Marr, 2005 NSCA 73, 199 C.C.C. (3d) 424, at para. 20, Cromwell J.A. (as he then was) explained that “where an offence may be prosecuted by either indictment or on summary conviction at the election of the Crown, the offence is deemed to be indictable until the Crown elects to proceed by way of summary conviction”. Likewise, in R. v. C. (D.J.) (1985), 1985 CanLII 3611 \(PE SCAD\), 21 C.C.C. (3d) 246, at p. 252, MacDonald J., speaking for the Prince Edward Island Supreme Court, Appeal Division, stated that “in the case of a hybrid offence once the Crown elects to proceed by way of summary conviction the offence is no longer deemed to be an indictable offence”. And in Canada (Attorney General) v. Trueman, P.C.J. (1996), 1996 CanLII 3132 \(BC CA\), 83 B.C.A.C. 227, at para. 13, once more for a unanimous court, McEachern C.J.B.C. held that hybrid offences “are deemed by s. 34 of the Interpretation Act . . . to be indictable [and] remain indictable unless the Crown elects to proceed by summary conviction”. (Emphasis added throughout.)

[22] Other appellate courts across the country have reached the same conclusion: Trinidad and Tobago v. Davis, 2008 ABCA 275, 233 C.C.C. (3d) 435, at para. 14; R. v. Huff (1979), 1979 ABCA 234 \(CanLII\), 50 C.C.C. (2d) 324 (Alta. C.A.), at p. 328; Mitchell, at para. 4; R. v. Gougeon (1980), 1980 CanLII 2842 \(ON CA\), 55 C.C.C. (2d) 218 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 234; R. v. Tontarelli, 2009 NBCA 52, 348 N.B.R. (2d) 41, at para. 55; R. v. D. (S.) (1997), 1997 CanLII 14627 \(NL CA\), 119 C.C.C. (3d) 65 (Nfld. C.A.), at para. 34; R. v. O’Leary (1991), 1991 CanLII

6852 (NL CA), 64 C.C.C. (3d) 573 (Nfld. C.A.), at p. 575; R. v. Shiplack (1993), 1993 CanLII 9139 (SK CA), 109 Sask. R. 311 (C.A.), at para. 9. See also Ahmed v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship & Immigration), 2009 FC 672, 81 Imm. L.R. (3d) 116, at para. 40.

[23] Justice Charron cites R. v. Connors (1998), 1998 CanLII 12468 (BC CA), 121 C.C.C. (3d) 358 (B.C.C.A.), for the proposition that “dual procedure offences retain their character as indictable offences in the context of the Identification of Criminals Act” (para. 73). As my colleague points out, the Identification of Criminals Act is not before us on this appeal. For present purposes, it will therefore suffice to emphasize that Connors stands alone in this regard. Other courts have reached the opposite conclusion. See, for example, Re Abarca and The Queen (1980), 1980 CanLII 2958 (ON CA), 57 C.C.C. (2d) 410 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 413.

V

[24] Against this background, I turn now to ss. 786(2) and 788(1) of the Criminal Code, which both appear in Part XXVII of the Code, entitled “Summary Convictions”:

786. . . .

(2) No proceedings shall be instituted more than six months after the time when the subject-matter of the proceedings arose, unless the prosecutor and the defendant so agree.

788. (1) Proceedings under this Part shall be commenced by laying an information in Form 2.

[25] The time limit for instituting summary conviction proceedings that is now codified in s. 786(2) has existed in one form or another since at least 1892: Criminal Code, 1892, S.C. 1892, c. 29, s. 841. Only in 1997, however, was it made subject to waiver — that is, to extension by consent of the parties (S.C. 1997, c. 18, s. 110). Until then, summary conviction offences could not be prosecuted at all unless proceedings were timely brought: R. v. Karpinski, 1957 CanLII 9 \(SCC\), [1957] S.C.R. 343, at p. 350, per Fauteux J.

[26] It was in light of this that this Court in Karpinski unanimously held that the Crown could not try a hybrid offence as a summary conviction offence after the six-month limitation period had expired. But the Court divided as to the validity of the proceedings that had taken place in the summary conviction court prior to the discovery of the limitation problem.

[27] Fauteux J. (Abbott J. concurring) held that the proceedings were null ab initio because “there [was] no right for the Crown to elect to proceed by way of summary conviction and no jurisdiction for the magistrate to accept and act upon the election by receiving a plea” (p. 351). This line of reasoning has come to be known as the “no jurisdiction” view, and has been embraced by the Ontario Court of Appeal in a number of cases similar to the one at bar. See, for example, R. v. Kelly (1998), 1998 CanLII 7145 \(ON CA\), 128 C.C.C. (3d) 206.

[28] Again in Karpinski, Cartwright J. (dissenting) concluded that the summary conviction court retained at least a limited jurisdiction over the proceedings. In his view, the Crown’s “withdrawal of the charge before the learned magistrate was tantamount to an acquittal” and thus gave rise to the special plea of autrefois acquit if the Crown attempted to prosecute the same offence by indictment: Karpinski, p. 350. Justice Cartwright’s reasoning has come to be known as the “defence view” of Karpinski, and it has been embraced by the Newfoundland Court of Appeal, in obiter, in D. (S.).

[29] This division between the “no jurisdiction” and the “defence” views of acquired prescription retains its historical interest but not its former procedural significance. On either view, a summary conviction court has jurisdiction, with the consent of the parties, over statute-barred summary conviction proceedings. Absent consent, it does not.

[30] Except in one respect, I see no reason to distinguish in this regard between hybrid offences and offences punishable only on summary conviction. For hybrid offences, the Crown may proceed by indictment where its offer to proceed summarily is spurned by the accused. If the offence is a “pure” summary conviction offence — as opposed to a hybrid offence — the accused may nonetheless agree to proceed beyond the limitation period to avoid prosecution by indictment for a related offence that covers the same conduct. In either instance, if the prosecutor and defendant agree, a summary conviction court may exercise in respect of a statute-barred prosecution the jurisdiction it would otherwise have had.

[31] The sole relevant difference, it seems to me, is this. Absent consent, expiry of the limitation period bars entirely proceedings in respect of an offence that may be prosecuted only by way of summary conviction. A hybrid offence that can no longer be prosecuted summarily without the defendant’s consent may nonetheless, absent abuse of process, be prosecuted by indictment, whether or not the Crown initially elected to proceed summarily — except of course, where the accused was acquitted by a summary conviction court pursuant to the Crown’s initial election.

[32] In its reasons below, the Alberta Court of Appeal held that the Crown may “seek the consent of the accused to continue with a summary procedure” under s. 786(2) when it discovers “it has mistakenly elected to proceed summarily on an information sworn more than six months after the date of an alleged hybrid offence” (para. 42). On this view, which I share, the proceedings in the summary conviction court cannot be treated as a nullity ab initio.

[33] Whatever the situation may have been prior to the amendment of s. 786(2) in 1997, the summary conviction court now retains jurisdiction — subject to the consent of the parties — when it is discovered that the proceedings before it were statute-barred when the information was sworn. On a purposive interpretation of the amendment, the curative consent that is its object may be given at any time before verdict without requiring the parties to start the trial afresh. As I mentioned earlier, however, uncertainty and misunderstanding can easily be avoided by inviting and recording on the record — before the defendant is asked to plead — an agreement by the parties to proceed summarily.

[34] It is true, as a matter of principle, that jurisdiction cannot be conferred by consent. But this principle is subject to statutory attenuation, and Parliament has since 1997 expressly provided in s. 786(2) that the prosecutor and the defendant, by mutual consent, can renounce the six-month limitation period for summary convictions. From the defendant's point of view, this amounts to what may properly be characterized as a waiver of the benefit of prescription.

[35] And it is not without interest that the Court, nearly a century ago, recognized in Giroux v. The King (1917), 1917 CanLII 81 \(SCC\), 56 S.C.R. 63, that “[c]onsent cannot confer jurisdiction but a privilege defeating jurisdiction may always be waived if the trial court has jurisdiction over the subject matter” (p. 67). In the context that concerns us here, the benefit of an expired limitation period may be regarded, at least since 1997, as a privilege that can be waived by the accused.

[36] The consent of the parties, I repeat, can be given at any time during the proceedings before the verdict. The prosecutor will always be deemed to have consented by virtue of his or her election to try the hybrid offence summarily. The defendant must consent to the proceedings in a manner consistent with the reasons of the Court in Korponay v. Attorney General of Canada, 1982 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 41. That is to say, the consent of the defendant to continue with the proceedings must be “informed, clear and unequivocal”: Korponay, at p. 58.

VI

[37] The only question remaining on this appeal is what should become of the proceedings when the defendant declines to consent to their continuation.

[38] Where the offence is punishable only on summary conviction, the court should simply dismiss the information.

[39] In virtue of s. 34 of the Interpretation Act, hybrid offences are deemed indictable unless and until the Crown has elected to proceed summarily. Where the Crown elects to proceed summarily beyond the limitation period without the defendant’s consent, the Crown’s invalid election does not retrospectively invalidate an information.

[40] There is a large and divided body of case law considering the Crown’s right to “re-elect” on the original information to proceed by indictment after first electing to proceed summarily. See, for example, Re Abarca and The Queen; R. v. Jans (1990), 1990 ABCA 271 (CanLII), 59 C.C.C. (3d) 398 (Alta. C.A.); R. v. Burke (1992), 1992 CanLII 7121 (NL CA), 78 C.C.C. (3d) 163 (Nfld. C.A.); R. v. Kalkhorany (1994), 1994 CanLII 687 (ON CA), 89 C.C.C. (3d) 184 (Ont. C.A.); R. v. Boutilier (1995), 1995 NSCA 227 (CanLII), 104 C.C.C. (3d) 327 (N.S.C.A.).

[41] In my respectful view, these cases do not ask the right question.

[42] As mentioned earlier, the failure of the accused to consent to the prosecution of a hybrid offence by way of summary conviction beyond the limitation period is fatal to the validity of the Crown's election and to the proceedings that ensue.

[43] It is for precisely this reason that the Crown is free to proceed by indictment on the original information, if valid on its face, where the accused refuses to consent. Although the information remains valid, the initial election and all subsequent proceedings are a nullity. They can therefore have no effect on the Crown's ability to proceed by indictment.

[44] I agree with the Court of Appeal that it is not unfair to the accused to permit the Crown to proceed by indictment unless "the evidence discloses an abuse of process arising from improper Crown motive, or resulting prejudice to the accused sufficient to violate the community's sense of fair play and decency" (para. 1). On the record as we have it, nothing of the sort may be said to have occurred here.

[45] As Martin J.A. observed in R. v. Belair (1988), 1988 CanLII 7110 \(ON CA\), 41 C.C.C. (3d) 329 (Ont. C.A.):

The [hybrid] offence charged was at all times triable by indictment, and indeed the information charged an indictable offence until the Crown elected to treat the offence as one punishable on summary conviction: see Re Abarca and The Queen (1980), 1980 CanLII 2958 \(ON CA\), 57 C.C.C. (2d) 410 at pp. 413-4 (Ont. C.A.). The respondent in this case was in no way prejudiced by the error of Crown counsel. If Crown counsel had noticed, prior to electing to proceed by way of summary conviction, that summary conviction proceedings were precluded by s. 721(2), he would, no doubt, have proceeded by indictment, as he ultimately did. The respondent in this case suffered no prejudice as a result of Crown counsel failing to notice prior to election that summary conviction proceedings were barred by s. 721(2). [p. 339]

[46] In R. v. Phelps (1993), 1993 CanLII 14657 \(ON CA\), 79 C.C.C. (3d) 550, the Ontario Court of Appeal aptly noted that “in view of the lengthy proceedings that have taken place through no fault of the appellant, [the Crown should] consider whether the interests of justice would be served by proceeding further with this charge, the seriousness of which it obviously deemed to be of a summary conviction nature” (p. 552). That decision, I agree, is best left to prosecutorial and not judicial discretion.

VII

[47] Finally, four observations regarding the reasons of Justice Charron.

[48] The first concerns the conceptual underpinning of my colleague’s entire analytical framework. Justice Charron finds that the Crown’s election to prosecute a hybrid offence by way of summary conviction, “while defining the process by which the charge will be dealt once laid, does not change the underlying character of the offence as indictable” (para. 74).

[49] With respect, I am unable to understand in what sense the “underlying character” of a hybrid offence remains indictable once the Crown has elected to proceed summarily. The trial is before a different court and follows a different procedure. The offender is subject, upon conviction, to a different punishment. An appeal against the decision at trial goes to a different court of appeal. Under various federal and provincial statutes, conviction for a hybrid offence prosecuted summarily carries with it, not only in respect of sentence but in other respects as well, different consequences than a conviction on indictment: See, for example, the Criminal Records Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-47, s. 4; the Citizenship Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-29, s. 22; and the Ontario Juries Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. J.3, s. 4. Finally, Parliament has expressly provided, in s. 34(1)(c) of the Interpretation Act, that “no person [prosecuted summarily for a hybrid offence] shall be considered to have been convicted of an indictable offence”.

[50] In what sense, then, does a hybrid offence retain its “underlying character” as an indictable offence once the Crown has elected to proceed by way of summary conviction? I am unable to identify any. On the contrary, the hybrid offence takes on the “underlying character” of a summary conviction offence and is in every respect governed by the provisions of Part XXVII of the Criminal Code. In my view, there is no principled reason for making of s. 786(2) an exception to this rule.

[51] Second, Justice Charron finds that “s. 786(2) speaks to the institution of the proceeding, not the Crown election” (para. 61). That, of course, is so. But hybrid offences prosecuted summarily are instituted by the laying of an information and not by the Crown’s election. In virtue of s. 788, they commence with the laying of that information; and in virtue of s. 786(2) they cannot be commenced more than six months after the offence is alleged to have occurred. Accordingly, it is because s. 786(2) “speaks to the institution of proceedings, not the Crown election” that the Crown may elect to proceed summarily at any time, provided that the information was sworn no more than six months after the date of the alleged offence — and otherwise only with the consent of the accused.

[52] Third, Justice Charron states (at para. 60) that “[t]here is a conflicting body of jurisprudence, all stemming from this Court’s decision in . . . Karpinski . . . on the effect of a ‘mistaken’ Crown election to proceed summarily in respect of a dual procedure offence on an information laid more than six months after the offence was allegedly committed.” My colleague’s statement should not be misunderstood: Not a single Canadian decision drawn to our attention has held that the limitation period for summary conviction offences is inapplicable to hybrid offences prosecuted summarily. On this issue, there is no jurisprudential conflict whatever.

[53] Thus, in Karpinski, all members of the Court agreed that the limitation period applied. This understanding of the law has prevailed in Canada for well over 100 years: R. v. Edwards (1898), 1898 CanLII 105 \(ON CA\), 2 C.C.C. 96 (Ont. H.C.J.). And it has since Karpinski been twice re-affirmed by this Court, first in R. v. Machacek, 1961 CanLII 55 \(SCC\), [1961] S.C.R. 163, and again in Petersen v. The Queen, 1982 CanLII 200 \(SCC\), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 493. Any “conflict” in the jurisprudence relates to entirely different questions that confirm the applicability of the limitation period to hybrid offences prosecuted summarily, differing only as to whether a statute-barred prosecution goes to jurisdiction or is a matter of defence. I have dealt with this branch of the matter above, at paras. 21 and following.

[54] Finally, Justice Charron states, at para. 74, that “in those jurisdictions where cases are screened before charges are laid, a dual procedure offence is still instituted as an indictable offence under s. 504 or 505”. On the contrary, and with the greatest of respect, I believe the opposite is true. In screening proposed prosecutions, Crown counsel are expected to determine whether charges are justified and, in the case of hybrid offences, whether they should be prosecuted summarily or by indictment. Where Crown counsel determines that the case should be prosecuted summarily, it would at the very least be incongruous to then proceed as if by indictment — and nothing in the materials before us suggests that this is done. It is more plausible to assume that where the Crown authorizes summary proceedings, they are instituted under s. 788 of the Code — in accordance with the Crown’s decision to prosecute summarily.

[55] In short, my colleague’s position — which was not raised by the parties or by the intervener — is incompatible with the text of the relevant provisions of the Code, inconsistent with more than a century of judicial decisions (including Karpinski), and contrary to how the law has always and universally been understood by lawyers and commentators alike. It is contrary as well to the position taken by the Director of Public Prosecutions of Canada in this Court when invited to do so,^[2] in instructions to federal prosecutors across the country,^[3] and by the Federal Department of Justice in Parliament when s. 786(2) was amended.^[4]

VIII

[56] In the result, I would dismiss the appeal, set aside the decision of the trial judge and let justice take its course in accordance with the governing principles set out in these reasons.

The reasons of Deschamps, Charron and Rothstein JJ. were delivered by

CHARRON J. —

1. Overview

[57] The appellant, Kristy Leanne Dudley, was charged with one count of fraud not exceeding $5,000 under s. 380(1)(b), and one count of uttering a forged document under s. 368(1)(b) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, both dual procedure offences which allow the Crown to proceed either by indictment or by summary conviction. The Crown elected to proceed summarily. When the matter came before the trial court for an expected guilty plea, counsel for Ms. Dudley noticed that the information had been sworn more than six months after the offences were alleged to have been committed. Counsel therefore argued that the information was a nullity on the basis that it was statute-barred under s. 786\(2\) of the Criminal Code. The Crown sought leave to re-elect to proceed by indictment, or in the alternative to withdraw the information. Counsel for Ms. Dudley objected, arguing that a judicial stay would probably be appropriate as his client had “no resolution other than a guilty plea” and the extent of her jeopardy increased if this matter proceeded by indictment. The trial judge denied both Crown requests, on the ground that the information was “out of time” and “a nullity” (2006 CarswellAlta 2115, at para. 3).

[58] The Crown appealed to the Alberta Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal set aside the trial court’s decision, holding that an information is not invalidated by the Crown’s mistaken election to proceed summarily, nor is the Crown precluded from re-electing to proceed by indictment once the error is discovered, “unless the evidence discloses an abuse of process arising from improper Crown motive, or resulting prejudice to the accused sufficient to violate the community’s sense of fair play and decency” (2008 ABCA 73, 231 C.C.C. (3d) 80, at para. 1). The matter was therefore remitted to the trial court, for the Crown to apply to re-elect to proceed by indictment on the information, or alternatively to withdraw the information and proceed by indictment on a new information.

[59] Ms. Dudley appeals to this Court, arguing that the trial judge’s decision was, in effect, an implicit determination that a stay of the charges was appropriate and, as such, an exercise of judicial discretion which ought not to have been interfered with by the Court of Appeal. She therefore asks that the trial court’s decision be reinstated, disallowing the Crown to re-elect or to proceed with the matter by indictment.

[60] There is a conflicting body of jurisprudence, all stemming from this Court's decision in R. v. Karpinski, 1957 CanLII 9 (SCC), [1957] S.C.R. 343, on the effect of a "mistaken" Crown election to proceed summarily in respect of a dual procedure offence on an information laid more than six months after the offence was allegedly committed. In all cases, much as in the case at bar, it was simply assumed that s. 786(2) of the Criminal Code operated to bar a proceeding by summary conviction in respect of a dual procedure offence, without asking whether the six-month prescription applies at all to such offences. In this appeal, this precise issue was canvassed at the hearing before this Court, following which the parties and the Director of Public Prosecutions, as intervener, filed supplementary submissions. Ms. Dudley argues that dual procedure offences are subject to the general limitation period under s. 786(2). The intervener supports her position. The Crown, on the other hand, takes the position that the general limitation period under s. 786(2) cannot govern the institution of proceedings in respect of dual procedure offences, as these offences are deemed indictable at law.

[61] Having considered those submissions, I have come to the conclusion that s. 786(2) only operates as a general bar to the institution of proceedings more than six months after the alleged offence in respect of summary conviction offences. Dual procedure offences are deemed indictable offences by operation of s. 34 of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, and, as such, not subject to any general limitation period under the Criminal Code. Proceedings in respect of dual procedure offences may therefore be instituted beyond the six-month period. Further, s. 786(2) speaks to the institution of the proceeding, not the Crown election. Therefore, nothing in the provision bars the Crown from electing to proceed either by indictment or by summary conviction in respect of such offences.

[62] Consequently, I would confirm the Court of Appeal's judgment setting aside the trial court's decision, but would remit the matter to the trial court to proceed by summary conviction in accordance with the Crown's election.

2. Analysis

[63] The first question in this case is whether the limitation period in s. 786(2) applies to dual procedure offences. In light of my conclusion that it does not, this is the only question that need be answered. Resolving this issue is a matter of statutory interpretation, which requires ascertaining Parliament's intent. Before interpreting the provision in question, I will briefly discuss the nature and purpose of dual procedure offences.

2.1 Dual Procedure Offences

[64] The Criminal Code creates two categories of offences: summary conviction offences and indictable offences. Since indictable offences are more serious, a prosecution by indictment triggers additional procedural safeguards and a conviction attracts more severe penalties. Some offences may be prosecuted either summarily or by indictment, at the Crown's discretion. These offences are commonly known as "hybrid offences", but this term is misleading if it suggests that there exists a third category of offences. As discussed below, these offences are deemed at law to be indictable offences; they do not occupy a third category. I will therefore refer to these hybrid offences as "dual procedure offences".

[65] Parliament's enactment of dual procedure offences recognizes that certain crimes can be more or less serious depending on the circumstances and provides the Crown with discretion to choose the most appropriate procedure and range of potential penalties. For example, the offence of fraud under $5,000 — one of the charges in this case — can embrace criminal activity ranging from a young first offender switching price tickets on an item in a department store, to a repeat offender wrongfully appropriating the savings account of a vulnerable person under his or her care. The Crown prosecutor chooses the procedure that best fits the particular offence and offender. As this Court has recognized, discretion, including prosecutorial discretion, is an “essential feature of the criminal justice system” which will not be lightly interfered with: R. v. Beare, 1988 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 387, at p. 410; Krieger v. Law Society of Alberta, 2002 SCC 65, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 372.

[66] With few exceptions, the decision to proceed summarily or by way of indictment in Canada has always been the Crown prosecutor’s. This Court made this explicit in Smythe v. The Queen, 1971 CanLII 831 (SCC), [1971] S.C.R. 680, at p. 686, when it adopted the following statement from the Quebec Court of Appeal: “If an authority such as the Attorney-General can have the right to decide whether or not a person shall be prosecuted, surely he may, if authorized by statute, have the right to decide what form the prosecution shall take”: R. v. Court of Sessions of the Peace, ex parte Lafleur, 1966 CanLII 560 (QC CA), [1967] 3 C.C.C. 244, at p. 248. Justice Fish, at para. 17, points to s. 501 of the 1927 version of the Criminal Code which, exceptionally, left the choice to the accused. The operative part of s. 501 read as follows: “Every one is guilty of an offence punishable, at the option of the accused, on indictment or on summary conviction before two justices and liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or to three months’ imprisonment with or without hard labour . . .”. Since the potential range of penalties on conviction of this offence was the same whichever procedural route was chosen, in effect, s. 501 gave the accused the choice of trial forum, a choice that is commonly left with the accused. In any event, the wording of s. 501 appears to be an anomaly as it is not replicated in any other provision in that version of the Criminal Code.

2.2 The Words of the Statute

[67] I now turn to the question of statutory interpretation. The starting point in interpreting statutes is the wording of the provision. The provision in question is found at the commencement of Part XXVII of the Criminal Code, entitled “Summary Convictions”. A number of definitions are set out in s. 785, then s. 786 provides the following:

786. (1) Except where otherwise provided by law, this Part applies to proceedings as defined in this Part.

(2) No proceedings shall be instituted more than six months after the time when the subject-matter of the proceedings arose, unless the prosecutor and the defendant so agree.

The relevant part of the definition of “proceedings” under s. 785 reads as follows:

“proceedings” means

(a) proceedings in respect of offences that are declared by an Act of Parliament or an enactment made thereunder to be punishable on summary conviction

[68] Ms. Dudley claims that since dual procedure offences are “punishable on summary conviction”, s. 786(2) applies to them. As she points out, nothing in para. (a) of the definition of “proceedings” in s. 785 suggests that an offence must be punishable exclusively on summary conviction to fall within the definition. True enough, but this argument only brings us so far. While the definition of “proceedings” is wide enough to include dual procedure offences, Part XXVII only applies “[e]xcept where otherwise provided by law”. For example, it is obvious that many of the provisions contained in Part XXVII do not apply to dual procedure offences when the Crown elects to proceed by indictment. Other provisions of the Criminal Code govern instead. Therefore, the definition of “proceedings” does not answer the question whether the limitation provision under s. 786(2) applies to dual procedure offences. The fact that the provision deals with the institution of the proceedings, in my view, provides more fruitful ground to ascertain its meaning.

[69] Section 786(2) states that proceedings shall not be “instituted” outside of the six-month limitation period. Proceedings relating to summary conviction offences are instituted pursuant to s. 788(1) of the Code; proceedings relating to indictable offences are instituted pursuant to s. 504 or 505 of the Code. In either case, instituting the procedure requires laying an information in Form 2. Thus, the Criminal Code provides two routes to the same result. There is no third route in respect of dual procedure offences — this reflects the fact that, as stated earlier, there is no third category of “hybrid” offences.

[70] The question therefore becomes whether dual procedure offences are instituted pursuant to s. 788(1) or pursuant to s. 504 or 505. Section 34(1) of the Interpretation Act makes it clear that it is the latter, as s. 34(1)(a) deems a dual procedure offence to be an indictable offence. The provision reads as follows:

34. (1) Where an enactment creates an offence,

(a) the offence is deemed to be an indictable offence if the enactment provides that the offender may be prosecuted for the offence by indictment;

(b) the offence is deemed to be one for which the offender is punishable on summary conviction if there is nothing in the context to indicate that the offence is an indictable offence; and

(c) if the offence is one for which the offender may be prosecuted by indictment or for which the offender is punishable on summary conviction, no person shall be considered to have been convicted of an indictable offence by reason only of having been convicted of the offence on summary conviction.

[71] The import of s. 34(1) of the Interpretation Act is that dual procedure offences are deemed to be indictable offences, so the proceedings are commenced pursuant to s. 504 or 505, not s. 788(1). As a result, the proceedings are never “instituted” under Part XXVII within the meaning of s. 788(1), and the limitation period does not apply to these offences. Any subsequent Crown election to proceed summarily does not retroactively invalidate the institution of the proceeding.

[72] Further, as the wording of s. 34(1) of the Interpretation Act indicates, the characterization of a dual procedure offence as an indictable offence endures. Paragraph (a) provides no suggestion that the dual procedure offence ever ceases being deemed indictable. In addition, the safeguarding provision under para. (c) would not be necessary if a summary election or plea negated the deeming provision in para. (a). Therefore, subsequent events — notably the Crown’s election to proceed by way of summary conviction or the accused’s decision to plead guilty to a summary conviction offence pursuant to s. 606(4) — do not affect the original characterization. They do affect the procedure that is followed, the penalty that may be imposed, and the effect of a conviction — as Fish J. notes in his reasons, where the Crown elects to proceed summarily, the dual procedure offence acquires the same characteristics as a pure summary offence in all those important respects and indeed, as he points out, the offence has been described by many courts as having ceased to be indictable at that point. (See paras. 21-22.) While this view may accurately reflect the practical effects of the Crown election from a procedural standpoint, there is no support in the wording of s. 34 to say that the offence, from a substantive standpoint, is no longer indictable. If it were otherwise and the offence ceased to be characterized as an indictable offence upon the Crown electing to proceed summarily, there would be no basis in law for the Crown to “re-elect” and continue the proceedings by indictment. In my respectful view, the Crown’s choice of procedural route does not change the original characterization of the offence as an indictable offence.

[73] The extent to which the original characterization of the offence carries the day in any particular context has been the subject of debate in other contexts. For example, the British Columbia Court of Appeal in R. v. Connors (1998), 1998 CanLII 12468 (BC CA), 121 C.C.C. (3d) 358, came to the conclusion that dual procedure offences retained their character as indictable offences in the context of the Identification of Criminals Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-1, which allows for the fingerprinting of any person who is in lawful custody, charged or convicted of an indictable offence:

At least for the purposes of the Identification of Criminals Act the term “indictable offence” includes offences which may be prosecuted summarily, but they retain their character as indictable offences no matter how the Crown elects. The Crown election has an impact procedurally on how and in what court the charge proceeds and, as well, on the maximum penalty that may be imposed, but does not change the character of the offence. It remains an indictable offence.

(Per Cumming J.A. writing for a unanimous bench on this point, at para. 69.)

[74] The interpretation of the Identification of Criminals Act is not before us. Therefore suffice it for our purposes to conclude that the underlying characterization of the dual procedure offence as indictable certainly governs the institution of the process. The Crown’s election to proceed summarily, while defining the process by which the charge will be dealt once laid, does not change the underlying character of the offence as indictable. Therefore, it is of no moment when the Crown makes the decision. As noted by the intervener, in some jurisdictions the Crown’s election is sometimes expressly set out on the form or in the wording of the count before the information is laid. In my view, this causes no difficulties. Regardless of the timing of the Crown election, the offence is still deemed to be an indictable offence pursuant to the Interpretation Act. Another way of looking at it is the following. An election is not made in the abstract. It must relate to a proceeding. As matter of logic, the institution of the proceeding therefore must precede the election. Accordingly, in those jurisdictions where cases are screened before charges are laid, a dual procedure offence is still instituted as an indictable offence under s. 504 or 505, following which the election becomes immediately effective to govern the ensuing process accordingly.

2.3 The Purpose of the Limitation Period

[75] An examination of the purpose of the limitation provision supports the conclusion that Parliament did not intend to time-limit prosecutions of dual procedure offences.

[76] As one academic has noted, it is primarily the interests of the defendant that animate limitation periods in criminal law: P. G. Barton, “Why Limitation Periods in the Criminal Code?” (1998), 40 Crim. L.Q. 188. A central purpose is to allow those who commit minor offences to rest easy after a period: “. . . if the matter is of a level of seriousness of a summary conviction offence, it is not so significant that, after a time, a person should have to fear prosecution. He or she should be able to get on with life without the threat of a criminal proceeding hanging over his or her head. The seriousness of indictable matters overweighs this factor” (p. 190).

[77] In respect of dual procedure offences, as discussed above, Parliament has recognized that certain crimes may be more or less serious depending on the circumstances and has provided the Crown with broad discretion to choose the most appropriate procedure. It follows that Parliament considers dual procedure offences as more serious than pure summary conviction offences.

[78] It is of course open to Parliament to create limitation periods for all offences, some offences, or no offences. While Parliament has imposed a limitation period on summary conviction offences, the least serious crimes, it has not made the same choice regarding indictable offences. It has determined that the public interest in prosecuting these more serious offences outweighs the defendant’s interest in resting easy. It has also chosen that dual procedure offences are deemed to be indictable offences. In my view, imposing a limitation period on dual procedure offences would frustrate Parliament’s purpose. Had Parliament wished to impose a limitation period on dual procedure offences, it could have expressly adverted to these offences in s. 786(2) or declined to deem them to be indictable offences in the Interpretation Act.

2.4 The Consequences of the Interpretation

[79] In my view, interpreting s. 786(2) to include dual procedure offences would have undesirable consequences: it would interfere with the fair and efficient administration of the criminal justice system.

[80] As many cases exemplify, including the case at bar, the consequence of imposing a limitation period on dual procedure offences is to force the Crown to proceed by way of indictment when it would otherwise pursue a summary conviction (unless the accused consented to summary proceedings). This interpretation would restrain the Crown's exercise of discretion, the importance of which was alluded to above. It might also be unfair to the accused. As Ms. Dudley argued, proceedings by way of indictment may cause more prejudice to the accused: they place the accused in greater jeopardy, can involve increased cost and delay, and may carry greater stigma. See R. v. Boutilier (1995), 1995 NSCA 227 (CanLII), 104 C.C.C. (3d) 327 (N.S.C.A), at pp. 335-36.

[81] An interpretation excluding dual procedure offences from s. 786(2) avoids these adverse consequences. For dual procedure offences, Crown prosecutors would continue to exercise their full discretion, even after the expiry of six months. For pure summary offences instituted beyond the six months, defendants would still have the option, granted in s. 786(2), to agree to proceed by way of summary conviction. I do not accept the argument that this option would be absurd if the limitation applied only to pure summary conviction offences on the basis that an accused's only possible motivation for waiving the limitation period would be to avoid proceedings by indictment in respect of a dual procedure offence. This premise is incorrect: defendants might well exercise that option where their conduct can be captured by several different offences, some indictable and others not. Agreeing to summary conviction proceedings, in return for the Crown's decision not to proceed with the indictable offence(s), would decrease their jeopardy.

[82] In my view, the interpretation that respects prosecutorial discretion and protects the accused from unfair treatment should be favoured in this case.

[83] Interpreting s. 786(2) to exclude dual procedure offences also does not cause conflicts with other legislation. No inconsistency results.

[84] I would dismiss three concerns raised by the intervener about incoherence with other statutes. First, this intervener has identified a number of federal statutes which contain only dual procedure offences and for which a specific limitation period applicable when the proceedings are instituted by way of summary conviction is prescribed. The intervener argues that these limitation periods must remain. I agree. At issue in this case is the limitation period in s. 786(2) of the Code only; Parliament of course may institute any other statutory limitation periods it wishes.

[85] Second, this intervener has identified a number of other federal statutes providing for summary conviction offences which are not subject to a specific limitation period. It worries that an interpretation of s. 786(2) excluding dual procedure offences would lead to the result that the dual procedure offences set out in these statutes would elude prescription, while the dual procedure offences in the statutes described in the preceding paragraph would not. I do not think there is any cause for concern. Again, Parliament is free to impose, or not to impose, limitation periods. No conflict arises.

[86] Third, this intervener points specifically to the Animal Pedigree Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 8 (4th Supp.). This Act contains only one offence which is a dual procedure offence, but s. 67 of the act states, “[t]he provisions of the Criminal Code prescribing a time limit for making a complaint or laying an information in respect of offences punishable on summary conviction do not apply to proceedings in respect of an offence under this Act.” According to the intervener, this indicates that Parliament considered that s. 786(2) applies to dual procedure offences. I disagree. I take comfort in the fact that the parties and the intervener could locate only one such example and, in my view, this provision was added for greater certainty. No incoherence results: this provision in fact aligns with the proposed interpretation of s. 786(2).

[87] Finally, nothing in the jurisprudence militates against the proposed interpretation as no court has ruled on this issue.

[88] This Court did not hold in Karpinski that the Crown could not try a dual procedure offence as a summary conviction offence after the expiry of the limitation period; this question was not before the Court. In Karpinski, an information was sworn, the Crown elected to proceed summarily, and the defendant entered a plea of not guilty. Defence counsel then moved to dismiss on the ground that the information had been laid out of time. The magistrate permitted Crown counsel to withdraw the information and lay a new information to proceed by way of indictment. This Court confronted only the narrow question of whether the withdrawal of the first information amounted to an acquittal thereby allowing the accused to plead autrefois acquit. It did not address the aborted trial, or the propriety of withdrawing the information.

[89] While other courts have also assumed that s. 786(2) applies to dual procedure offences, none has ruled on this issue. Therefore, no case law stands against the conclusion that s. 786(2) does not apply to dual procedure offences.

3. Disposition

[90] I have reached the conclusion that, properly interpreted, s. 786(2) does not bar the institution of proceedings more than six months after the alleged offence in respect of dual procedure offences. I would dismiss the appeal, confirm the Court of Appeal's order setting aside the trial court's decision, and amend that order so as to remit the matter to the trial court to proceed by summary conviction in accordance with the Crown's election.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant: Attia Reeves Tensfeldt Snow, Edmonton.

Solicitor for the respondent: Department of Justice, Edmonton.

Solicitor for the intervener: Director of Public Prosecutions of Canada, Ottawa.

[1] I am aware, of course, that the Criminal Code uses the term “accused” for indictable offences and “defendant” for offences punishable on summary conviction. For the sake of simplicity without unnecessary terminological nuance, I shall, dealing here with hybrid offences, use “accused” for both and “defendant” only for summary conviction proceedings. I shall also use “verdict” to signify a decision on the merits (“guilty” or “not guilty”) both for indictable and for summary conviction matters, “acquittal” to signify a not guilty verdict in either instance, and “summarily” to signify proceedings by way of summary conviction.

[2] Supplementary Factum, Intervener Director of Public Prosecutions.

[3] The Federal Prosecution Service Deskbook, Section 19.2.1 (updated 2002).

^[4] Senior Counsel, Department of Justice Criminal Law Policy Section, before the Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights, at 0930 (October 20, 1998).

TAB 11

Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9 (CanLII), [2008] 1 SCR 190

Source:	Supreme Court of Canada
Date:	2008-03-07
File number:	31459
Other citations:	329 NBR (2d) 1 — 291 DLR (4th) 577 — 372 NR 1 — 164 ACWS (3d) 727 — 844 APR 1 — AZ-50478101 — 170 LAC (4th) 1 — 64 CCEL (3d) 1 — 69 Admin LR (4th) 1 — 69 Imm LR (3d) 1 — 95 LCR 65 — DTE 2008T-223 — [2008] CarswellNB 124 — EYB 2008-130674 — JE 2008-547 — [2008] SCJ No 9 (QL) — [2008] ACS no 9
Citation:	Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9 (CanLII), [2008] 1 SCR 190, < https://canlii.ca/t/1vxsm >, retrieved on 2026-03-22
Most recent unfavourable mention	Dr Ignacio Tan III v Alberta Veterinary Medical Association , 2025 ABCA 119 (CanLII) [...] Despite Dunsmuir , "patent unreasonableness" will live on in British Columbia, but the content of the expression, and the precise degree of deference it commands in the diverse circumstances of a large provincial administration, will necessarily continue to be calibrated according to general principles of administrative [...]

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

CITATION: Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190, 2008 SCC 9

DATE: 20080307
DOCKET: 31459

BETWEEN:

David Dunsmuir

Appellant

v.

Her Majesty the Queen in Right of the Province of New Brunswick as represented by Board of Management

Respondent

CORAM: McLachlin C.J. and Bastarache, Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Charron and Rothstein JJ.

JOINT REASONS FOR JUDGMENT: Bastarache and LeBel JJ. (McLachlin C.J. and Fish and Abella JJ. concurring)

(paras. 1 to 118)

Binnie J.

CONCURRING REASONS:

(paras. 119 to 157)

Deschamps J. (Charron and Rothstein JJ. concurring)

CONCURRING REASONS:

(paras. 158 to 173)

Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190, 2008 SCC 9

David Dunsmuir

Appellant

v.

Her Majesty the Queen in Right of the Province of New Brunswick as represented by Board of Management

Respondent

Indexed as: Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick

Neutral citation: 2008 SCC 9.

File No.: 31459.

2007: May 15; 2008: March 7.

Present: McLachlin C.J. and Bastarache, Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Charron and Rothstein JJ.

on appeal from the court of appeal for new brunswick

Administrative law — Judicial review — Standard of review — Proper approach to judicial review of administrative decision makers — Whether judicial review should include only two standards: correctness and reasonableness.

Administrative law — Judicial review — Standard of review — Employee holding office “at pleasure” in provincial civil service dismissed without alleged cause with four months’ pay in lieu of notice — Adjudicator interpreting enabling statute as conferring jurisdiction to determine whether discharge was in fact for cause — Adjudicator holding employer breached duty of procedural fairness and ordering reinstatement — Whether standard of reasonableness applicable to adjudicator’s decision on statutory interpretation issue — Public Service Labour Relations Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. P-25, ss. 97\(2.1\), 100.1\(5\) — Civil Service Act, S.N.B. 1984, c. C-5.1, s. 20.

Administrative law — Natural justice — Procedural fairness — Dismissal of public office holders — Employee holding office “at pleasure” in provincial civil service dismissed without alleged cause with four months’ pay in lieu of notice — Employee not informed of reasons for termination or provided with opportunity to respond — Whether employee entitled to procedural fairness — Proper approach to dismissal of public employees.

D was employed by the Department of Justice for the Province of New Brunswick. He held a position under the Civil Service Act and was an office holder “at pleasure”. His probationary period was extended twice and the employer reprimanded him on three separate occasions during the course of his employment. On the third occasion, a formal letter of reprimand was sent to D warning him that his failure to improve his performance would result in further disciplinary action up to and including dismissal. While preparing for a meeting to discuss D's performance review the employer concluded that D was not right for the job. A formal letter of termination was delivered to D's lawyer the next day. Cause for the termination was explicitly not alleged and D was given four months' pay in lieu of notice.

D commenced the grievance process under s. 100.1 of the Public Service Labour Relations Act ("PSLRA"), alleging that the reasons for the employer's dissatisfaction were not made known, that he did not receive a reasonable opportunity to respond to the concerns, that the employer's actions in terminating him were without notice, due process or procedural fairness, and that the length of the notice period was inadequate. The grievance was denied and then referred to adjudication. A preliminary issue of statutory interpretation arose as to whether, where dismissal was with notice or pay in lieu thereof, the adjudicator was authorized to determine the reasons underlying the province's decision to terminate. The adjudicator held that the referential incorporation of s. 97(2.1) of the PSLRA into s. 100.1(5) of that Act meant that he could determine whether D had been discharged or otherwise disciplined for cause. Ultimately, the adjudicator made no finding as to whether the discharge was or was not for cause. In his decision on the merits, he found that the termination letter effected termination with pay in lieu of notice and that the termination was not disciplinary. As D's employment was hybrid in character, the adjudicator held that D was entitled to and did not receive procedural fairness in the employer's decision to terminate his employment. He declared that the termination was void ab initio and ordered D reinstated as of the date of dismissal, adding that in the event that his reinstatement order was quashed on judicial review, he would find the appropriate notice period to be eight months.

On judicial review, the Court of Queen's Bench applied the correctness standard and quashed the adjudicator's preliminary decision, concluding that the adjudicator did not have jurisdiction to inquire into the reasons for the termination, and that his authority was limited to determining whether the notice period was reasonable. On the merits, the court found that D had received procedural fairness by virtue of the grievance hearing before the adjudicator. Concluding that the adjudicator's decision did not stand up to review on a reasonableness simpliciter standard, the court quashed the reinstatement order but upheld the adjudicator's provisional award of eight months' notice. The Court of Appeal held that the proper standard with respect to the interpretation of the adjudicator's authority under the PSLRA was reasonableness simpliciter, not correctness, and that the adjudicator's decision was unreasonable. It found that where the employer elects to dismiss with notice or pay in lieu of notice, s. 97(2.1) of the PSLRA does not apply and the employee may only grieve the length of the notice period. It agreed with the reviewing judge that D's right to procedural fairness had not been breached.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Bastarache, LeBel, Fish and Abella JJ.: Despite its clear, stable constitutional foundations, the system of judicial review in Canada has proven to be difficult to implement. It is necessary to reconsider both the number and definitions of the various standards of review, and the analytical process employed to determine which standard applies in a given situation. Notwithstanding the theoretical differences between the standards of patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter, any actual difference between them in terms of their operation appears to be illusory. There ought to be only two standards of review: correctness and reasonableness. [32] [34] [41]

When applying the correctness standard in respect of jurisdictional and some other questions of law, a reviewing court will not show deference to the decision maker's reasoning process; it will rather undertake its own analysis of the question and decide whether it agrees with the determination of the decision maker; if not, the court will substitute its own view and provide the correct answer. A court conducting a review for reasonableness inquires into the qualities that make a decision reasonable. Reasonableness is concerned mostly with the existence of justification, transparency and intelligibility within the decision-making process and with whether the decision falls within a range of possible, acceptable outcomes which are defensible in respect of the facts and the law. It is a deferential standard which requires respect for the legislative choices to leave some matters in the hands of administrative decision makers, for the processes and determinations that draw on particular expertise and experiences, and for the different roles of the courts and administrative bodies within the Canadian constitutional system. [47-50]

An exhaustive analysis is not required in every case to determine the proper standard of review. Courts must first ascertain whether the jurisprudence has already determined in a satisfactory manner the degree of deference to be accorded to a decision maker with regard to a particular category of question. If the inquiry proves unfruitful, courts must analyze the factors making it possible to identify the proper standard of review. The existence of a privative clause is a strong indication of review pursuant to the reasonableness standard, since it is evidence of Parliament or a legislature's intent that an administrative decision maker be given greater deference and that interference by reviewing courts be minimized. It is not, however, determinative. Where the question is one of fact, discretion or policy, or where the legal issue is intertwined with and cannot be readily separated from the factual issue, deference will usually apply automatically. Deference will usually result where a decision maker is interpreting its own statute or statutes closely connected to its function, with which it will have particular familiarity. While deference may also be warranted where an administrative decision maker has developed particular expertise in the application of a general common law or civil law rule in relation to a specific statutory context, a question of law that is of central importance to the legal system as a whole and outside the specialized area of expertise of the administrative decision maker will always attract a correctness standard. So will a true question of vires, a question regarding the jurisdictional lines between two or more competing specialized tribunals, and a constitutional question regarding the division of powers between Parliament and the provinces in the Constitution Act, 1867. [52-62]

The standard of reasonableness applied on the issue of statutory interpretation. While the question of whether the combined effect of ss. 97(2.1) and 100.1 of the PSLRA permits the adjudicator to inquire into the employer's reason for dismissing an employee with notice or pay in lieu of notice is a question of law, it is not one that is of central importance to the legal system and outside the specialized expertise of the adjudicator, who was in fact interpreting his enabling statute. Furthermore, s. 101(1) of the PSLRA includes a full privative clause, and the nature of the regime favours the standard of reasonableness. Here, the adjudicator's interpretation of the law was unreasonable and his decision does not fall within the range of acceptable outcomes that are defensible in respect of the facts and the law. The employment relationship between the parties in this case was governed by private law. The combined effect of ss. 97(2.1) and 100.1 of the PSLRA cannot, on any reasonable interpretation, remove the employer's right, under the ordinary rules of contract, to discharge an employee with reasonable notice or pay in lieu thereof without asserting cause. By giving the PSLRA an interpretation that allowed him to inquire into the reasons for discharge, the adjudicator adopted a reasoning process that was fundamentally inconsistent with the employment contract and, thus, fatally flawed. [66-75]

On the merits, D was not entitled to procedural fairness. Where a public employee is employed under a contract of employment, regardless of his or her status as a public office holder, the applicable law governing his or her dismissal is the law of contract, not general principles arising out of public law. Where a dismissal decision is properly within the public authority's powers and is taken pursuant to a contract of employment, there is no compelling public law purpose for imposing a duty of fairness. The principles expressed in Knight v. Indian Head School Division No. 19 in relation to the general duty of fairness owed by public authorities when making decisions that affect the rights, privileges or interests of individuals are valid and important. However, to the extent that Knight ignored the important effect of a contract of employment, it should not be followed. In the case at bar, D was a contractual employee in addition to being a public office holder. Section 20 of the Civil Service Act provided that as a civil servant he could only be dismissed in accordance with the ordinary rules of contract. To consider a public law duty of fairness issue where such a duty exists falls squarely within the adjudicator's task to resolve a grievance. Where, as here, the relationship is contractual, it was unnecessary to consider any public law duty of procedural fairness. By imposing procedural fairness requirements on the respondent over and above its contractual obligations and ordering the full "reinstatement" of D, the adjudicator erred and his decision was therefore correctly struck down. [76-78] [81] [84] [106] [114] [117]

Per Binnie J.: The majority reasons for setting aside the adjudicator ruling were generally agreed with, however the call of the majority to re-evaluate the pragmatic and functional test and to re-assess “the structure and characteristics of the system of judicial review as a whole” and to develop a principled framework that is “more coherent and workable” invites a broader reappraisal. Judicial review is an idea that has lately become unduly burdened with law office metaphysics. Litigants find the court’s attention focussed not on their complaints, or the government’s response, but on lengthy and arcane discussions of something they are told is the pragmatic and functional test. The Court should at least (i) establish some presumptive rules and (ii) get the parties away from arguing about the tests and back to arguing about the substantive merits of their case. [119-122] [133] [145]

The distinction between “patent unreasonableness” and reasonableness simpliciter is now to be abandoned. The repeated attempts to explain the difference between the two, was in hindsight, unproductive and distracting. However, a broad reappraisal of the system of judicial review should explicitly address not only administrative tribunals but issues related to other types of administrative bodies and statutory decision makers including mid-level bureaucrats and, for that matter, Ministers. If logic and language cannot capture the distinction in one context, it must equally be deficient elsewhere in the field of judicial review. [121-123] [134-135] [140]

It should be presumed that the standard of review of an administrative outcome on grounds of substance is reasonableness. In accordance with the ordinary rules of litigation, it should also be presumed that the decision under review is reasonable until the applicant shows otherwise. An applicant urging the non-deferential “correctness” standard should be required to demonstrate that the decision rests on an error in the determination of a legal issue not confided (or which constitutionally could not be confided) to the administrative decision maker to decide, whether in relation to jurisdiction or the general law. The logic of the constitutional limitation is obvious. If the limitation did not exist, the government could transfer the work of the courts to administrative bodies that are not independent of the executive and by statute immunize the decisions of these bodies from effective judicial review. Questions of law outside the administrative decision maker's home statute and closely related rules or statutes which require his or her expertise should also be reviewable on a "correctness" standard whether or not it meets the majority's additional requirement that it be "of central importance to the legal system as a whole". The standard of correctness should also apply to the requirements of "procedural fairness", which will vary with the type of decision maker and the type of decision under review. Nobody should have his or her rights, interests or privileges adversely dealt with by an unjust process. [127-129] [146-147]

On the other hand when the application for judicial review challenges the substantive outcome of an administrative action, the judge is invited to cross the line into second-guessing matters that lie within the function of the administrator. This is controversial because it is not immediately obvious why a judge's view of the reasonableness of an administrative policy or the exercise of an administrative discretion should be preferred to that of the administrator to whom Parliament or a legislature has allocated the decision, unless there is a full statutory right of appeal to the courts, or it is otherwise indicated in the conferring legislation that a "correctness" standard is intended. [130]

Abandonment of the distinction between reasonableness simpliciter and patent unreasonableness has important implications. The two different standards addressed not merely "the magnitude or the immediacy of the defect" in the administrative decision but recognized that different administrative decisions command different degrees of deference, depending on who is deciding what. [135]

"Contextualizing" a single standard of "reasonableness" review will shift the courtroom debate from choosing between two standards of reasonableness that each represented a different level of deference to a debate within a single standard of reasonableness to determine the appropriate level of deference. [139]

Thus a single “reasonableness” standard will now necessarily incorporate both the degree of deference owed to the decision maker formerly reflected in the distinction between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter, and an assessment of the range of options reasonably open to the decision maker in the circumstances. The judge’s role is to identify the outer boundaries of reasonable outcomes within which the administrative decision maker is free to choose. [141] [149]

A single “reasonableness” standard is a big tent that will have to accommodate a lot of variables that inform and limit a court’s review of the outcome of administrative decision making. “Contextualizing” the reasonableness standard will require a reviewing court to consider the precise nature and function of the decision maker including its expertise, the terms and objectives of the governing statute (or common law) conferring the power of decision including the existence of a privative clause and the nature of the issue being decided. Careful consideration of these matters will reveal the extent of the discretion conferred. In some cases the court will have to recognize that the decision maker was required to strike a proper balance (or achieve proportionality) between the adverse impact of a decision on the rights and interests of the applicant or others directly affected weighed against the public purpose which is sought to be advanced. In each case careful consideration will have to be given to the reasons given for the decision. This list of “contextual” considerations is non-exhaustive. A reviewing court ought to recognize throughout the exercise that fundamentally the “reasonableness” of the administrative outcome is an issue given to another forum to decide. [144] [151-155]

Per Deschamps, Charron and Rothstein JJ.: Any review starts with the identification of the questions at issue as questions of law, questions of fact or questions of mixed fact and law. In the adjudicative context, decisions on questions of fact, whether undergoing appellate review or administrative law review, always attract deference. When there is a privative clause, deference is owed to the administrative body that interprets the legal rules it was created to interpret and apply. If the body oversteps its delegated powers, if it is asked to interpret laws in respect of which it does not have expertise or if Parliament or a legislature has provided for a statutory right of review, deference is not owed to the decision maker. Finally, when considering a question of mixed fact and law, a reviewing court should show an adjudicator the same deference as an appeal court would show a lower court. [158-164]

Here, the employer's common law right to dismiss without cause was the starting point of the analysis. Since the adjudicator does not have specific expertise in interpreting the common law, the reviewing court can proceed to its own interpretation of the applicable rules and determine whether the adjudicator could enquire into the cause of the dismissal. The applicable standard of review is correctness. The distinction between the common law rules of employment and the statutory rules applicable to a unionized employee is essential if s. 97\(2.1\) of the PSLRA is to be applied mutatis mutandis to the case of a non-unionized employee as required by s. 100.1\(5\) of the PSLRA. The adjudicator's failure to inform himself of this crucial difference led him to look for a cause for the dismissal, which was not relevant. Even if deference had been owed to the adjudicator, his interpretation could not have stood. Employment security is so fundamental to an employment relationship that it could not have been granted by the legislature by providing only that the PSLRA was to apply mutatis mutandis to non-unionized employees. [168-171]

Cases Cited

By Bastarache and LeBel JJ.

Referred to: Chalmers (Dr. Everett) Hospital v. Mills (1989), 1989 CanLII 7923 \(NB CA\), 102 N.B.R. (2d) 1; Knight v. Indian Head School Division No. 19, 1990 CanLII 138 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 653; Alberta Union of Provincial Employees v. Lethbridge Community College, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 727, 2004 SCC 28; Crevier v. Attorney General of Quebec, 1981 CanLII 30 \(SCC\), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 220; Dr. Q v. College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 226, 2003 SCC 19; Executors of the Woodward Estate v. Minister of Finance, 1972 CanLII 139 \(SCC\), [1973] S.C.R. 120; U.E.S., Local 298 v. Bibeault, 1988 CanLII 30 \(SCC\), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 1048; Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 \(SCC\), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817; Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3, 2002 SCC 1; Mount Sinai Hospital Center v. Quebec (Minister of Health and Social Services), [2001] 2 S.C.R. 281, 2001 SCC 41; C.U.P.E. v. Ontario (Minister of Labour), [2003] 1 S.C.R. 539, 2003 SCC 29; Chamberlain v. Surrey School District No. 36, [2002] 4 S.C.R. 710, 2002 SCC 86; Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 963 v. New Brunswick Liquor Corp., 1979 CanLII 23 \(SCC\), [1979] 2 S.C.R. 227; Canada (Director of Investigation and Research) v. Southam Inc., 1997 CanLII 385 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 748; Pushpanathan v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1998 CanLII 778 \(SCC\), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 982; Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 77, 2003 SCC 63; Law Society of New Brunswick v. Ryan, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 247, 2003 SCC 20; Council of Canadians with Disabilities v. Via Rail Canada Inc., [2007] 1 S.C.R. 650, 2007 SCC 15; Voice Construction Ltd. v. Construction & General Workers' Union, Local 92, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 609, 2004 SCC 23; Canada (Attorney General) v. Mossop, 1993 CanLII 164 \(SCC\), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 554; Canadian Broadcasting Corp. v. Canada (Labour Relations Board), 1995 CanLII 148 \(SCC\), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 157; Toronto (City) Board of Education v. O.S.S.T.F., District 15, 1997 CanLII 378 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 487; McLeod v. Egan, 1974 CanLII 12 \(SCC\), [1975] 1 S.C.R. 517; Cartaway Resources Corp. (Re), [2004] 1 S.C.R. 672, 2004 SCC 26; Westcoast Energy Inc. v. Canada (National Energy Board), 1998 CanLII 813 \(SCC\), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 322; Nova Scotia (Workers' Compensation Board) v. Martin, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 504, 2003 SCC 54; United Taxi Drivers' Fellowship of Southern Alberta v. Calgary (City), [2004] 1 S.C.R. 485, 2004 SCC 19; Regina Police Assn. Inc. v. Regina (City) Board of Police Commissioners, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 360, 2000 SCC 14; Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse) v. Quebec (Attorney General), [2004] 2 S.C.R. 185, 2004 SCC 39; Canada Safeway Ltd. v. RWDSU, Local 454, 1998 CanLII 780 \(SCC\), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 1079; Moreau-Bérubé v. New Brunswick (Judicial Council), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 249, 2002 SCC 11; Ridge v. Baldwin, [1963] 2 All E.R. 66; Nicholson v. Haldimand-Norfolk Regional Board of Commissioners of Police, 1978 CanLII 24 \(SCC\), [1979] 1 S.C.R. 311; Martineau v. Matsqui Institution Disciplinary Board, 1979 CanLII 184 \(SCC\), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 602; Kane v. Board of Governors of the University of British Columbia, 1980 CanLII 10 \(SCC\), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1105; Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, 1980 CanLII 21 \(SCC\), [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735; Cardinal v. Director of Kent Institution, 1985 CanLII 23 \(SCC\), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 643; Reglin v. Creston (Town) (2004), 34 C.C.E.L. (3d) 123, 2004 BCSC 790; Gismondi v. Toronto (City) (2003), 2003 CanLII 52143 \(ON CA\), 64 O.R. (3d) 688; Seshia v. Health Sciences Centre (2001), 160 Man. R. (2d) 41, 2001 MBCA 151; Rosen v. Saskatoon District Health Board (2001), 202 D.L.R. (4th) 35, 2001 SKCA 83; Hanis v. Teevan (1998), 1998 CanLII 7126 \(ON CA\), 111 O.A.C. 91; Gerrard v. Sackville (Town) (1992), 1992 CanLII 2435 \(NB CA\), 124 N.B.R. (2d) 70; Malloch v. Aberdeen Corp., [1971] 2 All E.R. 1278; Hughes v. Moncton (City) (1990), 1990 CanLII 6545 \(NB QB\), 111 N.B.R. (2d) 184, aff'd (1991), 1991 CanLII 4226 \(NB CA\), 118 N.B.R. (2d) 306; Rosen v. Saskatoon District Health Board, [2000] 4 W.W.R. 606, 2000 SKQB 40; Wells v. Newfoundland, 1999 CanLII 657 \(SCC\), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 199; School District No. 5 (Southeast Kootenay) and B.C.T.F. (Yellowaga) (Re) (2000), 2000 CanLII 50084 \(BC LA\), 94 L.A.C. (4th) 56; Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd., 1997 CanLII 332 \(SCC\), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 701.

By Binnie J.

Referred to: Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 963 v. New Brunswick Liquor Corp., 1979 CanLII 23 \(SCC\), [1979] 2 S.C.R. 227; Cooper v. Wandsworth Board of Works (1863), 14 C.B. (N.S.) 180, 143 E.R. 414; Ocean Port Hotel Ltd. v. British Columbia (General Manager, Liquor Control and Licensing Branch), [2001] 2 S.C.R. 781, 2001 SCC 52; U.E.S., Local 298 v. Bibeault, 1988 CanLII 30 \(SCC\), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 1048; Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corp., [1947] 2 All E.R. 680; Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 \(SCC\), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817; Mount Sinai Hospital Center v. Quebec (Minister of Health and Social Services), [2001] 2 S.C.R. 281, 2001 SCC 41; Idziak v. Canada (Minister of Justice), 1992 CanLII 51 \(SCC\), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 631; Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3, 2002 SCC 1; Operation Dismantle

Inc. v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 74 \(SCC\), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441; Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, 1980 CanLII 21 \(SCC\), [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735; Westcoast Energy Inc. v. Canada (National Energy Board), 1998 CanLII 813 \(SCC\), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 322; Law Society of New Brunswick v. Ryan, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 247, 2003 SCC 20; Moreau-Bérubé v. New Brunswick (Judicial Council), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 249, 2002 SCC 11; C.U.P.E. v. Ontario (Minister of Labour), [2003] 1 S.C.R. 539, 2003 SCC 29; Roncarelli v. Duplessis, 1959 CanLII 50 \(SCC\), [1959] S.C.R. 121.

By Deschamps J.

Referred to: H.L. v. Canada (Attorney General), [2005] 1 S.C.R. 401, 2005 SCC 25; Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 77, 2003 SCC 63.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Civil Service Act, S.N.B. 1984, c. C-5.1, s. 20.

Constitution Act, 1867, ss. 96 to 101.

Employment Standards Act, S.N.B. 1982, c. E-7.2.

Extradition Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-23.

Human Rights Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. H-11.

Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, s. 23(1).

Interpretation Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. I-13, s. 20.

Public Service Labour Relations Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. P-25, ss. 92(1), 97, 97\(2.1\) [ad. 1990, c. 30, s. 35], 100.1 [idem, s. 40], 101(1) [idem, s. 41], (2) [idem].

Authors Cited

Black's Law Dictionary, 8th ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West, 2004, “pleasure appointment”.

- Brown, Donald J. M., and John M. Evans. Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada. Toronto: Canvasback, 1998 (loose-leaf updated July 2007).
- Cromwell, Thomas A. "Appellate Review: Policy and Pragmatism". In 2006 Pitblado Lectures, Appellate Courts: Policy, Law and Practice. Winnipeg: Fort Garry, 2006, V-1.
- de Smith, Stanley A. Judicial Review of Administrative Action, 5th ed. By Lord Woolf and Jeffrey Jowell. London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1995.
- Dyzenhaus, David. "The Politics of Deference: Judicial Review and Democracy", in Michael Taggart, ed., The Province of Administrative Law. Oxford: Hart Publishing, 1997, 279.
- England, Geoff. Employment Law in Canada, 4th ed. Markham, Ont.: LexisNexis Butterworths, 2005 (loose-leaf updated March 2007, release 10).
- Hogg, Peter W., and Patrick J. Monahan. Liability of the Crown, 3rd ed. Scarborough, Ont.: Carswell, 2000.
- Mullan, David J. Administrative Law. Toronto: Irwin Law, 2001.
- Mullan, David J. "Recent Developments in Standard of Review", in Taking the Tribunal to Court: A Practical Guide for Administrative Law Practitioners. Canadian Bar Association (Ontario), October 20, 2000.
- Mullan, David J. "Establishing the Standard of Review: The Struggle for Complexity?" (2004), 17 C.J.A.L.P. 59.
- Sossin, Lorne, and Colleen M. Flood, "The Contextual Turn: Iacobucci's Legacy and the Standard of Review in Administrative Law" (2007), 57 U.T.L.J. 581.
- Wade, Sir William. Administrative Law, 8th ed. by Sir William Wade and Christopher Forsyth. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

APPEAL from a judgment of the New Brunswick Court of Appeal (Turnbull, Daigle and Robertson JJ.A.) (2006), 2006 NBCA 27 \(CanLII\), 297 N.B.R. (2d) 151, 265 D.L.R. (4th) 609, 44 Admin. L.R. (4th) 92, 48 C.C.E.L. (3d) 196, 2006 CLLC ¶220-030, [2006] N.B.J. No. 118 (QL), 2006 CarswellNB 155, 2006 NBCA 27, affirming a judgment of Rideout J. (2005), 293 N.B.R. (2d) 5, 43 C.C.E.L. (3d) 205, [2005] N.B.J. No. 327 (QL), 2005 CarswellNB 444, 2005 NBQB 270, quashing a preliminary ruling and quashing in part an award made by an adjudicator. Appeal dismissed.

J. Gordon Petrie, Q.C., and Clarence L. Bennett, for the appellant.

C. Clyde Spinney, Q.C., and Keith P. Mullin, for the respondent.

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Bastarache, LeBel, Fish and Abella JJ. was delivered by

BASTARACHE AND LEBEL JJ. —

I. Introduction

[1] This appeal calls on the Court to consider, once again, the troubling question of the approach to be taken in judicial review of decisions of administrative tribunals. The recent history of judicial review in Canada has been marked by ebbs and flows of deference, confounding tests and new words for old problems, but no solutions that provide real guidance for litigants, counsel, administrative decision makers or judicial review judges. The time has arrived for a reassessment of the question.

A. Facts

[2] The appellant, David Dunsmuir, was employed by the Department of Justice for the Province of New Brunswick. His employment began on February 25, 2002, as a Legal Officer in the Fredericton Court Services Branch. The appellant was placed on an initial six-month probationary term. On March 14, 2002, by Order-in-Council, he was appointed to the offices of Clerk of the Court of Queen's Bench, Trial Division, Administrator of the Court of Queen's Bench, Family Division, and Clerk of the Probate Court of New Brunswick, all for the Judicial District of Fredericton.

[3] The employment relationship was not perfect. The appellant's probationary period was extended twice, to the maximum 12 months. At the end of each probationary period, the appellant was given a performance review. The first such review, which occurred in August 2002, identified four specific areas for improvement. The second review, three months later, cited the same four areas for development, but noted improvements in two. At the end of the third probationary period, the Regional Director of Court Services noted that the appellant had met all expectations and his employment was continued on a permanent basis.

[4] The employer reprimanded the appellant on three separate occasions during the course of his employment. The first incident occurred in July 2002. The appellant had sent an email to the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench objecting to a request that had been made by the judge of the Fredericton Judicial District for the preparation of a practice directive. The Regional Director issued a reprimand letter to the appellant, explaining that the means he had used to raise his concerns were inappropriate and exhibited serious error in judgment. In the event that a similar concern arose in the future, he was directed to discuss the matter first with the Registrar or the Regional Director. The letter warned that failure to comply would lead to additional disciplinary measures and, if necessary, to dismissal.

[5] A second disciplinary measure occurred when, in April 2004, it came to the attention of the Assistant Deputy Minister that the appellant was being advertised as a lecturer at legal seminars offered in the private sector. The appellant had inquired previously into the possibility of doing legal work outside his employment. In February 2004, the Assistant Deputy Minister had informed him that lawyers in the public service should not practise law in the private sector. A month later, the appellant wrote a letter to the Law Society of New Brunswick stating that his participation as a non-remunerated lecturer had been vetted by his employer, who had voiced no objection. On June 3, 2004, the Assistant Deputy Minister issued to the appellant written notice of a one-day suspension with pay regarding the incident. The letter also referred to issues regarding the appellant's work performance, including complaints from unnamed staff, lawyers and members of the public regarding his difficulties with timeliness and organization. This second letter concluded with the statement that "[f]uture occurrences of this nature and failure to develop more efficient organized work habits will result in disciplinary action up to and including dismissal."

[6] Third, on July 21, 2004, the Regional Director wrote a formal letter of reprimand to the appellant regarding three alleged incidents relating to his job performance. This letter, too, concluded with a warning that the appellant's failure to improve his organization and timeliness would result in further disciplinary action up to and including dismissal. The appellant responded to the letter by informing the Regional Director that he would be seeking legal advice and, until that time, would not meet with her to discuss the matter further.

[7] A review of the appellant's work performance had been due in April 2004 but did not take place. The appellant met with the Regional Director on a couple of occasions to discuss backlogs and organizational problems. Complaints were relayed to her by staff but they were not documented and it is unknown how many complaints there had been. The Regional Director notified the appellant on August 11, 2004, that his performance review was overdue and would occur by August 20. A meeting had been arranged for August 19 between the appellant, the Regional Director, the Assistant Deputy Minister and counsel for the appellant and the employer. While preparing for that meeting, the Regional Director and the Assistant Deputy Minister concluded that the appellant was not right for the job. The scheduled meeting was cancelled and a termination notice was faxed to the appellant. A formal letter of termination from the Deputy Minister was delivered to the appellant's lawyer the next day. The letter terminated the appellant's employment with the Province of New Brunswick, effective December 31, 2004. It read, in relevant part:

I regret to advise you that I have come to the conclusion that your particular skill set does not meet the needs of your employer in your current position, and that it is advisable to terminate your employment on reasonable notice, pursuant to section 20 of the Civil Service Act. You are accordingly hereby advised that your employment with the Province of New Brunswick will terminate on December 31, 2004. Cause for termination is not alleged.

To aid in your search for other employment, you are not required to report to work during the notice period and your salary will be continued until the date indicated or for such shorter period as you require either to find a job with equivalent remuneration, or you commence self-employment.

. . .

In the circumstances, we would request that you avoid returning to the workplace until your departure has been announced to staff, and until you have returned your keys and government identification to your supervisor, Ms. Laundry as well as any other property of the employer still in your possession

[8] On February 3, 2005, the appellant was removed from his statutory offices by order of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

[9] The appellant commenced the grievance process under s. 100.1 of the Public Service Labour Relations Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. P-25 (“PSLRA”; see Appendix), by letter to the Deputy Minister on September 1, 2004. That provision grants non-unionized employees of the provincial public service the right to file a grievance with respect to a “discharge, suspension or a financial penalty” (s. 100.1(2)). The appellant asserted several grounds of complaint in his grievance letter, in particular, that the reasons for the employer’s dissatisfaction were not made known; that he did not receive a reasonable opportunity to respond to the employer’s concerns; that the employer’s actions in terminating him were without notice, due process or procedural fairness; and that the length of the notice period was inadequate. The grievance was denied. The appellant then gave notice that he would refer the grievance to adjudication under the PSLRA. The adjudicator was selected by agreement of the parties and appointed by the Labour and Employment Board.

[10] The adjudication hearing was convened and counsel for the appellant produced as evidence a volume of 169 documents. Counsel for the respondent objected to the inclusion of almost half of the documents. The objection was made on the ground that the documents were irrelevant since the appellant's dismissal was not disciplinary but rather was a termination on reasonable notice. The preliminary issue therefore arose of whether, where dismissal was with notice or pay in lieu thereof, the adjudicator was authorized to assess the reasons underlying the province's decision to terminate. Following his preliminary ruling on that issue, the adjudicator heard and decided the merits of the grievance.

B. Decisions of the Adjudicator

(1) Preliminary Ruling (January 10, 2005)

[11] The adjudicator began his preliminary ruling by considering s. 97(2.1) of the PSLRA. He reasoned that because the appellant was not included in a bargaining unit and there was no collective agreement or arbitral award, the section ought to be interpreted to mean that where an adjudicator determines that an employee has been discharged for cause, the adjudicator may substitute another penalty for the discharge as seems just and reasonable in the circumstances. The adjudicator considered and relied on the decision of the New Brunswick Court of Appeal in Chalmers (Dr. Everett) Hospital v. Mills (1989), 1989 CanLII 7923 (NB CA), 102 N.B.R. (2d) 1.

[12] Turning to s. 100.1 of the PSLRA, he noted the referential incorporation of s. 97 in s. 100.1(5). He stated that such incorporation "necessarily means that an adjudicator has jurisdiction to make the determination described in s. 97(2.1), i.e. that an employee has been discharged or otherwise disciplined for cause" (p. 5). The adjudicator noted that an employee to whom s. 20 of the Civil Service Act, S.N.B. 1984, c. C-5.1 (see Appendix), applies may be discharged for cause, with reasonable notice or with pay in lieu of reasonable notice. He concluded by holding that an employer cannot avoid an inquiry into its real reasons for dismissing an employee by stating that cause is not alleged. Rather, a grieving employee is entitled to an adjudication as to whether a discharge purportedly with notice or pay in lieu thereof was in fact for cause. He therefore held that he had jurisdiction to make such a determination.

(2) Ruling on the Merits (February 16, 2005).

[13] In his decision on the merits, released shortly thereafter, the adjudicator found that the termination letter of August 19 effected termination with pay in lieu of notice. The employer did not allege cause. Inquiring into the reasons for dismissal the adjudicator was satisfied that, on his view of the evidence, the termination was not disciplinary. Rather, the decision to terminate was based on the employer's concerns about the appellant's work performance and his suitability for the positions he held.

[14] The adjudicator then considered the appellant's claim that he was dismissed without procedural fairness in that the employer did not inform him of the reasons for its dissatisfaction and did not give him an opportunity to respond. The adjudicator placed some responsibility on the employer for cancelling the performance review scheduled for August 19. He also opined that the employer was not so much dissatisfied with the appellant's quality of work as with his lack of organization.

[15] The adjudicator's decision relied on Knight v. Indian Head School Division No. 19, 1990 CanLII 138 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 653, for the relevant legal principles regarding the right of "at pleasure" office holders to procedural fairness. As the appellant's employment was "hybrid in character" (para. 53) — he was both a Legal Officer under the Civil Service Act and, as Clerk, an office holder "at pleasure" — the adjudicator held that the appellant was entitled to procedural fairness in the employer's decision to terminate his employment. He declared that the termination was void ab initio and ordered the appellant reinstated as of August 19, 2004, the date of dismissal.

[16] The adjudicator added that in the event that his reinstatement order was quashed on judicial review, he would find the appropriate notice period to be eight months.

C. Judicial History

(1) Court of Queen's Bench of New Brunswick (2005), 293 N.B.R. (2d) 5, 2005 NBQB 270

[17] The Province of New Brunswick applied for judicial review of the adjudicator's decision on numerous grounds. In particular, it argued that the adjudicator had exceeded his jurisdiction in his preliminary ruling by holding that he was authorized to determine whether the termination was in fact for cause. The Province further argued that the adjudicator had acted incorrectly or unreasonably in deciding the procedural fairness issue. The application was heard by Rideout J.

[18] The reviewing judge applied a pragmatic and functional analysis, considering the presence of a full privative clause in the PSLRA, the relative expertise of adjudicators appointed under the PSLRA, the purposes of ss. 97(2.1) and 100.1 of the PSLRA as well as s. 20 of the Civil Service Act, and the nature of the question as one of statutory interpretation. He concluded that the correctness standard of review applied and that the court need not show curial deference to the decision of an adjudicator regarding the interpretation of those statutory provisions.

[19] Regarding the preliminary ruling, the reviewing judge noted that the appellant was employed “at pleasure” and fell under s. 20 of the Civil Service Act. In his view, the adjudicator had overlooked the effects of s. 20 and had mistakenly given ss. 97(2.1) and 100.1 of the PSLRA a substantive, rather than procedural, interpretation. Those sections are procedural in nature. They provide an employee with a right to grieve his or her dismissal and set out the steps that must be followed to pursue a grievance. The adjudicator is bound to apply the contractual provisions as they exist and has no authority to change those provisions. Thus, in cases in which s. 20 of the Civil Service Act applies, the adjudicator must apply the ordinary rules of contract. The reviewing judge held that the adjudicator had erred in removing the words “and the collective agreement or arbitral award does not contain a specific penalty for the infraction that resulted in the employee being discharged or otherwise disciplined” from s. 97(2.1). Those words limit s. 97(2.1) to employees who are not employed “at pleasure”. In the view of the reviewing judge, the adjudicator did not have jurisdiction to inquire into the reasons for the termination. His authority was limited to determining whether the notice period was reasonable. Having found that the adjudicator had exceeded his jurisdiction, the reviewing judge quashed his preliminary ruling.

[20] With respect to the adjudicator’s award on the merits, the reviewing judge commented that some aspects of the decision are factual in nature and should be reviewed on a patent unreasonableness standard, while other aspects involve questions of mixed fact and law which are subject to a reasonableness simpliciter standard. The reviewing judge agreed with the Province that the adjudicator’s reasons do not stand up to a “somewhat probing examination” (para. 76). The reviewing judge held that the adjudicator’s award of reinstatement could not stand as he was not empowered by the PSLRA to make Lieutenant-Governor in Council appointments. In addition, by concluding that the decision was void ab initio owing to a lack of procedural fairness, the adjudicator failed to consider the doctrine of adequate alternative remedy. The appellant received procedural fairness by virtue of the grievance hearing before the adjudicator. The adjudicator had provisionally increased the notice period to eight months — that provided an adequate alternative remedy. Concluding that the adjudicator’s decision did not stand up to review on a reasonableness simpliciter standard, the reviewing judge quashed the reinstatement order but upheld the adjudicator's provisional award of eight months' notice.

(2) Court of Appeal of New Brunswick (2006), 297 N.B.R. (2d) 151, 2006 NBCA 27

[21] The appellant appealed the decision of the reviewing judge. The Court of Appeal, Robertson J.A. writing, held that the proper standard with respect to the interpretation of the adjudicator's authority under the PSLRA was reasonableness simpliciter and that the reviewing judge had erred in adopting the correctness standard. The court reached that conclusion by proceeding through a pragmatic and functional analysis, placing particular emphasis on the presence of a full privative clause in the PSLRA and the relative expertise of an adjudicator in the labour relations and employment context. The court also relied on the decision of this Court in Alberta Union of Provincial Employees v. Lethbridge Community College, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 727, 2004 SCC 28. However, the court noted that the adjudicator's interpretation of the Mills decision warranted no deference and that "correctness is the proper review standard when it comes to the interpretation and application of caselaw" (para. 17).

[22] Applying the reasonableness simpliciter standard, the court held that the adjudicator's decision was unreasonable. Robertson J.A. began by considering s. 20 of the Civil Service Act and noted that under the ordinary rules of contract, an employer holds the right to dismiss an employee with cause or with reasonable notice or with pay in lieu of notice. Section 20 of the Civil Service Act limits the Crown's common law right to dismiss its employees without cause or notice. Robertson J.A. reasoned that s. 97(2.1) of the PSLRA applies in principle to non-unionized employees, but that it is only where an employee has been discharged or disciplined for cause that an adjudicator may substitute such other penalty as seems just and reasonable in the circumstances. Where the employer elects to dismiss with notice or pay in lieu of notice, however,

s. 97(2.1) does not apply. In such circumstances, the employee may only grieve the length of the notice period. The only exception is where the employee alleges that the decision to terminate was based on a prohibited ground of discrimination.

[23] On the issue of procedural fairness, the court found that the appellant exercised his right to grieve, and thus a finding that the duty of fairness had been breached was without legal foundation. The court dismissed the appeal.

II. Issues

[24] At issue, firstly is the approach to be taken in the judicial review of a decision of a particular adjudicative tribunal which was seized of a grievance filed by the appellant after his employment was terminated. This appeal gives us the opportunity to re-examine the foundations of judicial review and the standards of review applicable in various situations.

[25] The second issue involves examining whether the appellant who held an office “at pleasure” in the civil service of New Brunswick, had the right to procedural fairness in the employer’s decision to terminate him. On this occasion, we will reassess the rule that has found formal expression in Knight.

[26] The two types of judicial review, on the merits and on the process, are therefore engaged in this case. Our review of the system will therefore be comprehensive, which is preferable since a holistic approach is needed when considering fundamental principles.

III. Issue 1: Review of the Adjudicator’s Statutory Interpretation Determination

A. Judicial Review

[27] As a matter of constitutional law, judicial review is intimately connected with the preservation of the rule of law. It is essentially that constitutional foundation which explains the purpose of judicial review and guides its function and operation. Judicial review seeks to address an underlying tension between the rule of law and the foundational democratic principle, which finds an expression in the initiatives of Parliament and legislatures to create various administrative bodies and endow them with broad powers. Courts, while exercising their constitutional functions of judicial review, must be sensitive not only to the need to uphold the rule of law, but also to the necessity of avoiding undue interference with the discharge of administrative functions in respect of the matters delegated to administrative bodies by Parliament and legislatures.

[28] By virtue of the rule of law principle, all exercises of public authority must find their source in law. All decision-making powers have legal limits, derived from the enabling statute itself, the common or civil law or the Constitution. Judicial review is the means by which the courts supervise those who exercise statutory powers, to ensure that they do not overstep their legal authority. The function of judicial review is therefore to ensure the legality, the reasonableness and the fairness of the administrative process and its outcomes.

[29] Administrative powers are exercised by decision makers according to statutory regimes that are themselves confined. A decision maker may not exercise authority not specifically assigned to him or her. By acting in the absence of legal authority, the decision maker transgresses the principle of the rule of law. Thus, when a reviewing court considers the scope of a decision-making power or the jurisdiction conferred by a statute, the standard of review analysis strives to determine what authority was intended to be given to the body in relation to the subject matter. This is done within the context of the courts' constitutional duty to ensure that public authorities do not overreach their lawful powers: Crevier v. Attorney General of Quebec, 1981 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 220, at p. 234; also Dr. Q v. College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 226, 2003 SCC 19, at para. 21.

[30] In addition to the role judicial review plays in upholding the rule of law, it also performs an important constitutional function in maintaining legislative supremacy. As noted by Justice Thomas Cromwell, “the rule of law is affirmed by assuring that the courts have the final say on the jurisdictional limits of a tribunal’s authority; second, legislative supremacy is affirmed by adopting the principle that the concept of jurisdiction should be narrowly circumscribed and defined according to the intent of the legislature in a contextual and purposeful way; third, legislative supremacy is affirmed and the court-centric conception of the rule of law is reined in by acknowledging that the courts do not have a monopoly on deciding all questions of law” (“Appellate Review: Policy and Pragmatism”, in 2006 Isaac Pitblado Lectures, Appellate Courts: Policy, Law and Practice, V-1, at p. V-12). In essence, the rule of law is maintained because the courts have the last word on jurisdiction, and legislative supremacy is assured because determining the applicable standard of review is accomplished by establishing legislative intent.

[31] The legislative branch of government cannot remove the judiciary’s power to review actions and decisions of administrative bodies for compliance with the constitutional capacities of the government. Even a privative clause, which provides a strong indication of legislative intent, cannot be determinative in this respect (Executors of the Woodward Estate v. Minister of Finance, 1972 CanLII 139 (SCC), [1973] S.C.R. 120, at p. 127). The inherent power of superior courts to review administrative action and ensure that it does not exceed its jurisdiction stems from the judicature provisions in ss. 96 to 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867: Crevier. As noted by Beetz J. in U.E.S., Local 298 v. Bibeault, 1988 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 1048, at p. 1090, “[t]he role of the superior courts in maintaining the rule of law is so important that it is given constitutional protection”. In short, judicial review is constitutionally guaranteed in Canada, particularly with regard to the definition and enforcement of jurisdictional limits. As Laskin C.J. explained in Crevier:

Where . . . questions of law have been specifically covered in a privative enactment, this Court, as in Farrah, has not hesitated to recognize this limitation on judicial review as serving the interests of an express legislative policy to protect decisions of adjudicative agencies from external correction. Thus, it has, in my opinion, balanced the competing interests of a provincial Legislature in its enactment of substantively valid legislation and of the courts as ultimate interpreters of the British North America Act and s. 96 thereof. The same considerations do not, however, apply to issues of jurisdiction which are not far removed from issues of constitutionality. It cannot be left to a provincial statutory tribunal, in the face of s. 96, to determine the limits of its own jurisdiction without appeal or review. [pp. 237-38]

See also D. J. Mullan, Administrative Law (2001), at p. 50.

[32] Despite the clear, stable constitutional foundations of the system of judicial review, the operation of judicial review in Canada has been in a constant state of evolution over the years, as courts have attempted to devise approaches to judicial review that are both theoretically sound and effective in practice. Despite efforts to refine and clarify it, the present system has proven to be difficult to implement. The time has arrived to re-examine the Canadian approach to judicial review of administrative decisions and develop a principled framework that is more coherent and workable.

[33] Although the instant appeal deals with the particular problem of judicial review of the decisions of an adjudicative tribunal, these reasons will address first and foremost the structure and characteristics of the system of judicial review as a whole. In the wake of Baker v. Canada

(Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 \(SCC\), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817, Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3, 2002 SCC 1, Mount Sinai Hospital Center v. Quebec (Minister of Health and Social Services), [2001] 2 S.C.R. 281, 2001 SCC 41, and C.U.P.E. v. Ontario (Minister of Labour), [2003] 1 S.C.R. 539, 2003 SCC 29, it has become apparent that the present system must be simplified. The comments of LeBel J. in Chamberlain v. Surrey School District No. 36, [2002] 4 S.C.R. 710, 2002 SCC 86, at paras. 190 and 195, questioning the applicability of the “pragmatic and functional approach” to the decisions and actions of all kinds of administrative actors, illustrated the need for change.

B. Reconsidering the Standards of Judicial Review

[34] The current approach to judicial review involves three standards of review, which range from correctness, where no deference is shown, to patent unreasonableness, which is most deferential to the decision maker, the standard of reasonableness simpliciter lying, theoretically, in the middle. In our view, it is necessary to reconsider both the number and definitions of the various standards of review, and the analytical process employed to determine which standard applies in a given situation. We conclude that there ought to be two standards of review — correctness and reasonableness.

[35] The existing system of judicial review has its roots in several landmark decisions beginning in the late 1970s in which this Court developed the theory of substantive review to be applied to determinations of law, and determinations of fact and of mixed law and fact made by administrative tribunals. In Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 963 v. New Brunswick Liquor Corp., 1979 CanLII 23 \(SCC\), [1979] 2 S.C.R. 227 (“CUPE”), Dickson J. introduced the idea that, depending on the legal and administrative contexts, a specialized administrative tribunal with particular expertise, which has been given the protection of a privative clause, if acting within its jurisdiction, could provide an interpretation of its enabling legislation that would be allowed to stand unless “so patently unreasonable that its construction cannot be rationally supported by the relevant legislation and demands intervention by the court upon review” (p. 237). Prior to CUPE, judicial review followed the “preliminary question doctrine”, which inquired into whether a tribunal had erred in determining the scope of its jurisdiction. By simply branding an issue as “jurisdictional”, courts could replace a decision of the tribunal with one they preferred, often at the expense of a legislative intention that the matter lie in the hands of the administrative tribunal. CUPE marked a significant turning point in the approach of courts to judicial review, most notably in Dickson J.’s warning that courts “should not be alert to brand as jurisdictional, and therefore subject to broader curial review, that which may be doubtfully so” (p. 233). Dickson J.’s policy of judicial respect for administrative decision making marked the beginning of the modern era of Canadian administrative law.

[36] CUPE did not do away with correctness review altogether and in Bibeault, the Court affirmed that there are still questions on which a tribunal must be correct. As Beetz J. explained, “the jurisdiction conferred on administrative tribunals and other bodies created by statute is limited, and . . . such a tribunal cannot by a misinterpretation of an enactment assume a power not given to it by the legislator” (p. 1086). Bibeault introduced the concept of a “pragmatic and functional analysis” to determine the jurisdiction of a tribunal, abandoning the “preliminary question” theory. In arriving at the appropriate standard of review, courts were to consider a number of factors including the wording of the provision conferring jurisdiction on the tribunal, the purpose of the enabling statute, the reason for the existence of the tribunal, the expertise of its members, and the nature of the problem (p. 1088). The new approach would put “renewed emphasis on the superintending and reforming function of the superior courts” (p. 1090). The “pragmatic and functional analysis”, as it came to be known, was later expanded to determine the appropriate degree of deference in respect of various forms of administrative decision making.

[37] In Canada (Director of Investigation and Research) v. Southam Inc., 1997 CanLII 385 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 748, a third standard of review was introduced into Canadian administrative law. The legislative context of that case, which provided a statutory right of appeal from the decision of a specialized tribunal, suggested that none of the existing standards was entirely satisfactory. As a result, the reasonableness simpliciter standard was introduced. It asks whether the tribunal's decision was reasonable. If so, the decision should stand; if not, it must fall. In Southam, Iacobucci J. described an unreasonable decision as one that "is not supported by any reasons that can stand up to a somewhat probing examination" (para. 56) and explained that the difference between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter is the "immediacy" or "obviousness" of the defect in the tribunal's decision (para. 57). The defect will appear on the face of a patently unreasonable decision, but where the decision is merely unreasonable, it will take a searching review to find the defect.

[38] The three standards of review have since remained in Canadian administrative law, the approach to determining the appropriate standard of review having been refined in Pushpanathan v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1998 CanLII 778 \(SCC\), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 982.

[39] The operation of three standards of review has not been without practical and theoretical difficulties, neither has it been free of criticism. One major problem lies in distinguishing between the patent unreasonableness standard and the reasonableness simpliciter standard. The difficulty in distinguishing between those standards contributes to the problem of choosing the right standard of review. An even greater problem lies in the application of the patent unreasonableness standard, which at times seems to require parties to accept an unreasonable decision.

[40] The definitions of the patent unreasonableness standard that arise from the case law tend to focus on the magnitude of the defect and on the immediacy of the defect (see Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 77, 2003 SCC 63, at para. 78, per LeBel J.). Those two hallmarks of review under the patent unreasonableness standard have been used consistently in the jurisprudence to distinguish it from review under the standard of reasonableness simpliciter. As it had become clear that, after Southam, lower courts were struggling with the conceptual distinction between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter, Iacobucci J., writing for the Court in Law Society of New Brunswick v. Ryan, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 247, 2003 SCC 20, attempted to bring some clarity to the issue. He explained the different operations of the two deferential standards as follows, at paras. 52-53:

[A] patently unreasonable defect, once identified, can be explained simply and easily, leaving no real possibility of doubting that the decision is defective. A patently unreasonable decision has been described as “clearly irrational” or “evidently not in accordance with reason” A decision that is patently unreasonable is so flawed that no amount of curial deference can justify letting it stand.

A decision may be unreasonable without being patently unreasonable when the defect in the decision is less obvious and might only be discovered after “significant searching or testing” (Southam, supra, at para. 57). Explaining the defect may require a detailed exposition to show that there are no lines of reasoning supporting the decision which could reasonably lead that tribunal to reach the decision it did.

[41] As discussed by LeBel J. at length in Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., notwithstanding the increased clarity that Ryan brought to the issue and the theoretical differences between the standards of patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter, a review of the cases reveals that any actual difference between them in terms of their operation appears to be illusory (see also the comments of Abella J. in Council of Canadians with Disabilities v. Via Rail Canada Inc., [2007] 1 S.C.R. 650, 2007 SCC 15, at paras. 101-3). Indeed, even this Court divided when attempting to determine whether a particular decision was “patently unreasonable”, although this should have been self-evident under the existing test (see C.U.P.E. v. Ontario (Minister of Labour)). This result is explained by the fact that both standards are based on the idea that there might be multiple valid interpretations of a statutory provision or answers to a legal dispute and that courts ought not to interfere where the tribunal's decision is rationally supported. Looking to either the magnitude or the immediacy of the defect in the tribunal's decision provides no meaningful way in practice of distinguishing between a patently unreasonable and an unreasonable decision. As Mullan has explained:

[T]o maintain a position that it is only the "clearly irrational" that will cross the threshold of patent unreasonableness while irrationality simpliciter will not is to make a nonsense of the law. Attaching the adjective "clearly" to irrational is surely a tautology. Like "uniqueness", irrationality either exists or it does not. There cannot be shades of irrationality.

See D. J. Mullan, "Recent Developments in Standard of Review", in Canadian Bar Association (Ontario), Taking the Tribunal to Court: A Practical Guide for Administrative Law Practitioners (2000), at p. 25.

[42] Moreover, even if one could conceive of a situation in which a clearly or highly irrational decision were distinguishable from a merely irrational decision, it would be unpalatable to require parties to accept an irrational decision simply because, on a deferential standard, the irrationality of the decision is not clear enough. It is also inconsistent with the rule of law to retain an irrational decision. As LeBel J. explained in his concurring reasons in Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., at para. 108:

In the end, the essential question remains the same under both standards: was the decision of the adjudicator taken in accordance with reason? Where the answer is no, for instance because the legislation in question cannot rationally support the adjudicator's interpretation, the error will invalidate the decision, regardless of whether the standard applied is reasonableness simpliciter or patent unreasonableness

See also Voice Construction Ltd. v. Construction & General Workers' Union, Local 92, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 609, 2004 SCC 23, at paras. 40-41, per LeBel J.

C. Two Standards of Review

[43] The Court has moved from a highly formalistic, artificial “jurisdiction” test that could easily be manipulated, to a highly contextual “functional” test that provides great flexibility but little real on-the-ground guidance, and offers too many standards of review. What is needed is a test that offers guidance, is not formalistic or artificial, and permits review where justice requires it, but not otherwise. A simpler test is needed.

(1) Defining the Concepts of Reasonableness and Correctness

[44] As explained above, the patent unreasonableness standard was developed many years prior to the introduction of the reasonableness simpliciter standard in Southam. The intermediate standard was developed to respond to what the Court viewed as problems in the operation of judicial review in Canada, particularly the perceived all-or-nothing approach to deference, and in order to create a more finely calibrated system of judicial review (see also L. Sossin and C. M. Flood, “The Contextual Turn: Iacobucci’s Legacy and the Standard of Review in Administrative Law” (2007), 57 U.T.L.J. 581). However, the analytical problems that arise in trying to apply the different standards undercut any conceptual usefulness created by the inherently greater flexibility of having multiple standards of review. Though we are of the view that the three-standard model is too difficult to apply to justify its retention, now, several years after Southam, we believe that it would be a step backwards to simply remove the reasonableness simpliciter standard and revert to pre-Southam law. As we see it, the problems that Southam attempted to remedy with the introduction of the intermediate standard are best addressed not by three standards of review, but by two standards, defined appropriately.

[45] We therefore conclude that the two variants of reasonableness review should be collapsed into a single form of “reasonableness” review. The result is a system of judicial review comprising two standards — correctness and reasonableness. But the revised system cannot be expected to be simpler and more workable unless the concepts it employs are clearly defined.

[46] What does this revised reasonableness standard mean? Reasonableness is one of the most widely used and yet most complex legal concepts. In any area of the law we turn our attention to, we find ourselves dealing with the reasonable, reasonableness or rationality. But what is a reasonable decision? How are reviewing courts to identify an unreasonable decision in the context of administrative law and, especially, of judicial review?

[47] Reasonableness is a deferential standard animated by the principle that underlies the development of the two previous standards of reasonableness: certain questions that come before administrative tribunals do not lend themselves to one specific, particular result. Instead, they may give rise to a number of possible, reasonable conclusions. Tribunals have a margin of appreciation within the range of acceptable and rational solutions. A court conducting a review for reasonableness inquires into the qualities that make a decision reasonable, referring both to the process of articulating the reasons and to outcomes. In judicial review, reasonableness is concerned mostly with the existence of justification, transparency and intelligibility within the decision-making process. But it is also concerned with whether the decision falls within a range of possible, acceptable outcomes which are defensible in respect of the facts and law.

[48] The move towards a single reasonableness standard does not pave the way for a more intrusive review by courts and does not represent a return to pre-Southam formalism. In this respect, the concept of deference, so central to judicial review in administrative law, has perhaps been insufficiently explored in the case law. What does deference mean in this context? Deference is both an attitude of the court and a requirement of the law of judicial review. It does not mean that courts are subservient to the determinations of decision makers, or that courts must show blind reverence to their interpretations, or that they may be content to pay lip service to the concept of reasonableness review while in fact imposing their own view. Rather, deference imports respect for the decision-making process of adjudicative bodies with regard to both the facts and the law. The notion of deference “is rooted in part in a respect for governmental decisions to create administrative bodies with delegated powers” (Canada (Attorney General) v. Mossop, 1993 CanLII 164 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 554, at p. 596, per L’Heureux-Dubé J., dissenting). We agree with David Dyzenhaus where he states that the concept of “deference as respect” requires of the courts “not submission but a respectful attention to the reasons offered or which could be offered in support of a decision”: “The Politics of Deference: Judicial Review and Democracy”, in M. Taggart, ed., The Province of Administrative Law (1997), 279, at p. 286 (quoted with approval in Baker, at para. 65, per L’Heureux-Dubé J.; Ryan, at para. 49).

[49] Deference in the context of the reasonableness standard therefore implies that courts will give due consideration to the determinations of decision makers. As Mullan explains, a policy of deference “recognizes the reality that, in many instances, those working day to day in the implementation of frequently complex administrative schemes have or will develop a considerable degree of expertise or field sensitivity to the imperatives and nuances of the legislative regime”: D. J. Mullan, “Establishing the Standard of Review: The Struggle for Complexity?” (2004), 17 C.J.A.L.P. 59, at p. 93. In short, deference requires respect for the legislative choices to leave some matters in the hands of administrative decision makers, for the processes and determinations that draw on particular expertise and experiences, and for the different roles of the courts and administrative bodies within the Canadian constitutional system.

[50] As important as it is that courts have a proper understanding of reasonableness review as a deferential standard, it is also without question that the standard of correctness must be maintained in respect of jurisdictional and some other questions of law. This promotes just decisions and avoids inconsistent and unauthorized application of law. When applying the correctness standard, a reviewing court will not show deference to the decision maker's reasoning process; it will rather undertake its own analysis of the question. The analysis will bring the court to decide whether it agrees with the determination of the decision maker; if not, the court will substitute its own view and provide the correct answer. From the outset, the court must ask whether the tribunal's decision was correct.

(2) Determining the Appropriate Standard of Review

[51] Having dealt with the nature of the standards of review, we now turn our attention to the method for selecting the appropriate standard in individual cases. As we will now demonstrate, questions of fact, discretion and policy as well as questions where the legal issues cannot be easily separated from the factual issues generally attract a standard of reasonableness while many legal issues attract a standard of correctness. Some legal issues, however, attract the more deferential standard of reasonableness.

[52] The existence of a privative or preclusive clause gives rise to a strong indication of review pursuant to the reasonableness standard. This conclusion is appropriate because a privative clause is evidence of Parliament or a legislature's intent that an administrative decision maker be given greater deference and that interference by reviewing courts be minimized. This does not mean, however, that the presence of a privative clause is determinative. The rule of law requires that the constitutional role of superior courts be preserved and, as indicated above, neither Parliament nor any legislature can completely remove the courts' power to review the actions and decisions of administrative bodies. This power is constitutionally protected. Judicial review is necessary to ensure that the privative clause is read in its appropriate statutory context and that administrative bodies do not exceed their jurisdiction.

[53] Where the question is one of fact, discretion or policy, deference will usually apply automatically (Mossop, at pp. 599-600; Dr. Q, at para. 29; Suresh, at paras. 29-30). We believe that the same standard must apply to the review of questions where the legal and factual issues are intertwined with and cannot be readily separated.

[54] Guidance with regard to the questions that will be reviewed on a reasonableness standard can be found in the existing case law. Deference will usually result where a tribunal is interpreting its own statute or statutes closely connected to its function, with which it will have particular familiarity: Canadian Broadcasting Corp. v. Canada (Labour Relations Board), 1995 CanLII 148 (SCC), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 157, at para. 48; Toronto (City) Board of Education v. O.S.S.T.F., District 15, 1997 CanLII 378 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 487, at para. 39. Deference may also be warranted where an administrative tribunal has developed particular expertise in the application of a general common law or civil law rule in relation to a specific statutory context: Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., at para. 72. Adjudication in labour law remains a good example of the relevance of this approach. The case law has moved away considerably from the strict position evidenced in McLeod v. Egan, 1974 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1975] 1 S.C.R. 517, where it was held that an administrative decision maker will always risk having its interpretation of an external statute set aside upon judicial review.

[55] A consideration of the following factors will lead to the conclusion that the decision maker should be given deference and a reasonableness test applied:

- A privative clause: this is a statutory direction from Parliament or a legislature indicating the need for deference.
- A discrete and special administrative regime in which the decision maker has special expertise (labour relations for instance).

— The nature of the question of law. A question of law that is of “central importance to the legal system . . . and outside the . . . specialized area of expertise” of the administrative decision maker will always attract a correctness standard (Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., at para. 62). On the other hand, a question of law that does not rise to this level may be compatible with a reasonableness standard where the two above factors so indicate.

[56] If these factors, considered together, point to a standard of reasonableness, the decision maker’s decision must be approached with deference in the sense of respect discussed earlier in these reasons. There is nothing unprincipled in the fact that some questions of law will be decided on the basis of reasonableness. It simply means giving the adjudicator’s decision appropriate deference in deciding whether a decision should be upheld, bearing in mind the factors indicated.

[57] An exhaustive review is not required in every case to determine the proper standard of review. Here again, existing jurisprudence may be helpful in identifying some of the questions that generally fall to be determined according to the correctness standard (Cartaway Resources Corp. (Re), [2004] 1 S.C.R. 672, 2004 SCC 26). This simply means that the analysis required is already deemed to have been performed and need not be repeated.

[58] For example, correctness review has been found to apply to constitutional questions regarding the division of powers between Parliament and the provinces in the Constitution Act, 1867: Westcoast Energy Inc. v. Canada (National Energy Board), 1998 CanLII 813 \(SCC\), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 322. Such questions, as well as other constitutional issues, are necessarily subject to correctness review because of the unique role of s. 96 courts as interpreters of the Constitution:

Nova Scotia (Workers' Compensation Board) v. Martin, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 504, 2003 SCC 54; Mullan, Administrative Law, at p. 60.

[59] Administrative bodies must also be correct in their determinations of true questions of jurisdiction or vires. We mention true questions of vires to distance ourselves from the extended definitions adopted before CUPE. It is important here to take a robust view of jurisdiction. We neither wish nor intend to return to the jurisdiction/preliminary question doctrine that plagued the jurisprudence in this area for many years. “Jurisdiction” is intended in the narrow sense of whether or not the tribunal had the authority to make the inquiry. In other words, true jurisdiction questions arise where the tribunal must explicitly determine whether its statutory grant of power gives it the authority to decide a particular matter. The tribunal must interpret the grant of authority correctly or its action will be found to be ultra vires or to constitute a wrongful decline of jurisdiction: D. J. M. Brown and J. M. Evans, Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada (loose-leaf), at pp. 14-3 to 14-6. An example may be found in United Taxi Drivers' Fellowship of Southern Alberta v. Calgary (City), [2004] 1 S.C.R. 485, 2004 SCC 19. In that case, the issue was whether the City of Calgary was authorized under the relevant municipal acts to enact bylaws limiting the number of taxi plate licences (para. 5, per Bastarache J.). That case involved the decision-making powers of a municipality and exemplifies a true question of jurisdiction or vires. These questions will be narrow. We reiterate the caution of Dickson J. in CUPE that reviewing judges must not brand as jurisdictional issues that are doubtfully so.

[60] As mentioned earlier, courts must also continue to substitute their own view of the correct answer where the question at issue is one of general law “that is both of central importance to the legal system as a whole and outside the adjudicator’s specialized area of expertise” (Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., at para. 62, per LeBel J.). Because of their impact on the administration of justice as a whole, such questions require uniform and consistent answers. Such was the case in Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., which dealt with complex common law rules and conflicting jurisprudence on the doctrines of res judicata and abuse of process — issues that are at the heart of the administration of justice (see para. 15, per Arbour J.).

[61] Questions regarding the jurisdictional lines between two or more competing specialized tribunals have also been subject to review on a correctness basis: Regina Police Assn. Inc. v. Regina (City) Board of Police Commissioners, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 360, 2000 SCC 14; Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse) v. Quebec (Attorney General), [2004] 2 S.C.R. 185, 2004 SCC 39.

[62] In summary, the process of judicial review involves two steps. First, courts ascertain whether the jurisprudence has already determined in a satisfactory manner the degree of deference to be accorded with regard to a particular category of question. Second, where the first inquiry proves unfruitful, courts must proceed to an analysis of the factors making it possible to identify the proper standard of review.

[63] The existing approach to determining the appropriate standard of review has commonly been referred to as “pragmatic and functional”. That name is unimportant. Reviewing courts must not get fixated on the label at the expense of a proper understanding of what the inquiry actually entails. Because the phrase “pragmatic and functional approach” may have misguided courts in the past, we prefer to refer simply to the “standard of review analysis” in the future.

[64] The analysis must be contextual. As mentioned above, it is dependent on the application of a number of relevant factors, including: (1) the presence or absence of a privative clause; (2) the purpose of the tribunal as determined by interpretation of enabling legislation; (3) the nature of the question at issue, and; (4) the expertise of the tribunal. In many cases, it will not be necessary to consider all of the factors, as some of them may be determinative in the application of the reasonableness standard in a specific case.

D. Application

[65] Returning to the instant appeal and bearing in mind the foregoing discussion, we must determine the standard of review applicable to the adjudicator's interpretation of the PSLRA, in particular ss. 97(2.1) and 100.1, and s. 20 of the Civil Service Act. That standard of review must then be applied to the adjudicator's decision. In order to determine the applicable standard, we will now examine the factors relevant to the standard of review analysis.

(1) Proper Standard of Review on the Statutory Interpretation Issue

[66] The specific question on this front is whether the combined effect of s. 97(2.1) and s. 100.1 of the PSLRA permits the adjudicator to inquire into the employer's reason for dismissing an employee with notice or pay in lieu of notice. This is a question of law. The question to be answered is therefore whether in light of the privative clause, the regime under which the adjudicator acted, and the nature of the question of law involved, a standard of correctness should apply.

[67] The adjudicator was appointed and empowered under the PSLRA; s. 101(1) of that statute contains a full privative clause, stating in no uncertain terms that "every order, award, direction, decision, declaration or ruling of . . . an adjudicator is final and shall not be questioned or reviewed in any court". Section 101(2) adds that "[n]o order shall be made or process entered, and no proceedings shall be taken in any court, whether by way of injunction, judicial review, or otherwise, to question, review, prohibit or restrain . . . an adjudicator in any of its or his proceedings.” The inclusion of a full privative clause in the PSLRA gives rise to a strong indication that the reasonableness standard of review will apply.

[68] The nature of the regime also favours the standard of reasonableness. This Court has often recognized the relative expertise of labour arbitrators in the interpretation of collective agreements, and counselled that the review of their decisions should be approached with deference: CUPE, at pp. 235-36; Canada Safeway Ltd. v. RWDSU, Local 454, 1998 CanLII 780 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 1079, at para. 58; Voice Construction, at para. 22. The adjudicator in this case was, in fact, interpreting his enabling statute. Although the adjudicator was appointed on an ad hoc basis, he was selected by the mutual agreement of the parties and, at an institutional level, adjudicators acting under the PSLRA can be presumed to hold relative expertise in the interpretation of the legislation that gives them their mandate, as well as related legislation that they might often encounter in the course of their functions. See Alberta Union of Provincial Employees v. Lethbridge Community College. This factor also suggests a reasonableness standard of review.

[69] The legislative purpose confirms this view of the regime. The PSLRA establishes a time- and cost-effective method of resolving employment disputes. It provides an alternative to judicial determination. Section 100.1 of the PSLRA defines the adjudicator’s powers in deciding a dispute, but it also provides remedial protection for employees who are not unionized. The remedial nature of s. 100.1 and its provision for timely and binding settlements of disputes also imply that a reasonableness review is appropriate.

[70] Finally, the nature of the legal question at issue is not one that is of central importance to the legal system and outside the specialized expertise of the adjudicator. This also suggests that the standard of reasonableness should apply.

[71] Considering the privative clause, the nature of the regime, and the nature of the question of law here at issue, we conclude that the appropriate standard is reasonableness. We must now apply that standard to the issue considered by the adjudicator in his preliminary ruling.

(2) Was the Adjudicator's Interpretation Unreasonable?

[72] While we are required to give deference to the determination of the adjudicator, considering the decision in the preliminary ruling as a whole, we are unable to accept that it reaches the standard of reasonableness. The reasoning process of the adjudicator was deeply flawed. It relied on and led to a construction of the statute that fell outside the range of admissible statutory interpretations.

[73] The adjudicator considered the New Brunswick Court of Appeal decision in Chalmers (Dr. Everett) Hospital v. Mills as well as amendments made to the PSLRA in 1990 (S.N.B. 1990, c. 30). Under the former version of the Act, an employee could grieve “with respect to . . . disciplinary action resulting in discharge, suspension or a financial penalty” (s. 92(1)). The amended legislation grants the right to grieve “with respect to discharge, suspension or a financial penalty” (PSLRA, s. 100.1(2)). The adjudicator reasoned that the referential incorporation of s. 97(2.1) in s. 100.1(5) “necessarily means that an adjudicator has jurisdiction to make the determination described in subsection 97(2.1), i.e. that an employee has been discharged or otherwise disciplined for cause” (p. 5). He further stated that an employer “cannot avoid an inquiry into its real reasons for a discharge, or exclude resort to subsection 97(2.1), by simply stating that cause is not alleged” (ibid. (emphasis added)). The adjudicator concluded that he could determine whether a discharge purportedly with notice or pay in lieu of notice was in reality for cause.

[74] The interpretation of the law is always contextual. The law does not operate in a vacuum. The adjudicator was required to take into account the legal context in which he was to apply the law. The employment relationship between the parties in this case was governed by private law. The contractual terms of employment could not reasonably be ignored. That is made clear by s. 20 of the Civil Service Act. Under the ordinary rules of contract, the employer is entitled to discharge an employee for cause, with notice or with pay in lieu of notice. Where the employer chooses to exercise its right to discharge with reasonable notice or pay in lieu thereof, the employer is not required to assert cause for discharge. The grievance process cannot have the effect of changing the terms of the contract of employment. The respondent chose to exercise its right to terminate without alleging cause in this case. By giving the PSLRA an interpretation that allowed him to inquire into the reasons for discharge where the employer had the right not to provide — or even have — such reasons, the adjudicator adopted a reasoning process that was fundamentally inconsistent with the employment contract and, thus, fatally flawed. For this reason, the decision does not fall within the range of acceptable outcomes that are defensible in respect of the facts and the law.

[75] The decision of the adjudicator treated the appellant, a non-unionized employee, as a unionized employee. His interpretation of the PSLRA, which permits an adjudicator to inquire into the reasons for discharge where notice is given and, under s. 97(2.1), substitute a penalty that he or she determines just and reasonable in the circumstances, creates a requirement that the employer show cause before dismissal. There can be no justification for this; no reasonable interpretation can lead to that result. Section 100.1(5) incorporates s. 97(2.1) by reference into the determination of grievances brought by non-unionized employees. The employees subject to the PSLRA are usually unionized and the terms of their employment are determined by collective agreement; s. 97(2.1) explicitly refers to the collective agreement context. Section 100.1(5) referentially incorporates s. 97(2.1) mutatis mutandis into the non-collective agreement context so that non-unionized employees who are discharged for cause and without notice have the right to grieve the discharge and have the adjudicator substitute another penalty as seems just and reasonable in the circumstances. Therefore, the combined effect of s. 97(2.1) and s. 100.1 cannot, on any reasonable interpretation, remove the employer's right under contract law to discharge an employee with reasonable notice or pay in lieu of notice.

[76] The interpretation of the adjudicator was simply unreasonable in the context of the legislative wording and the larger labour context in which it is embedded. It must be set aside. Nevertheless, it must be acknowledged that his interpretation of the PSLRA was ultimately inconsequential to the overall determination of the grievance, since the adjudicator made no finding as to whether the discharge was or was not, in fact, for cause. The decision on the merits, which resulted in an order that the appellant be reinstated, instead turned on the adjudicator's decision on a separate issue — whether the appellant was entitled to and, if so, received procedural fairness with regard to the employer's decision to terminate his employment. This issue is discrete and isolated from the statutory interpretation issue, and it raises very different considerations.

IV. Issue 2: Review of the Adjudicator's Procedural Fairness Determination

[77] Procedural fairness has many faces. It is at issue where an administrative body may have prescribed rules of procedure that have been breached. It is also concerned with general principles involving the right to answer and defence where one's rights are affected. In this case, the appellant raised in his grievance letter that the reasons for the employer's dissatisfaction were not specified and that he did not have a reasonable opportunity to respond to the employer's concerns. There was, in his view, lack of due process and a breach of procedural fairness.

[78] The procedural fairness issue was dealt with only briefly by the Court of Appeal. Robertson J.A. mentioned at the end of his reasons that a duty of fairness did not arise in this case since the appellant had been terminated with notice and had exercised his right to grieve. Before this Court, however, the appellant argued that he was entitled to procedural fairness as a result of this Court's jurisprudence. Although ultimately we do not agree with the appellant, his contention raises important issues that need to be examined more fully.

A. Duty of Fairness

[79] Procedural fairness is a cornerstone of modern Canadian administrative law. Public decision makers are required to act fairly in coming to decisions that affect the rights, privileges or interests of an individual. Thus stated the principle is easy to grasp. It is not, however, always easy to apply. As has been noted many times, "the concept of procedural fairness is eminently variable and its content is to be decided in the specific context of each case" (Knight, at p. 682; Baker, at para. 21; Moreau-Bérubé v. New Brunswick (Judicial Council), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 249, 2002 SCC 11, at paras. 74-75).

[80] This case raises the issue of the extent to which a duty of fairness applies to the dismissal of a public employee pursuant to a contract of employment. The grievance adjudicator concluded that the appellant had been denied procedural fairness because he had not been granted a hearing by the employer before being dismissed with four months' pay in lieu of notice. This conclusion was said to flow from this Court's decision in Knight, where it was held that the holder of an office “at pleasure” was entitled to be given the reasons for his or her dismissal and an opportunity to be heard before being dismissed (p. 683).

[81] We are of the view that the principles established in Knight relating to the applicability of a duty of fairness in the context of public employment merit reconsideration. While the majority opinion in Knight properly recognized the important place of a general duty of fairness in administrative law, in our opinion, it incorrectly analyzed the effects of a contract of employment on such a duty. The majority in Knight proceeded on the premise that a duty of fairness based on public law applied unless expressly excluded by the employment contract or the statute (p. 681), without consideration of the terms of the contract with regard to fairness issues. It also upheld the distinction between office holders and contractual employees for procedural fairness purposes (pp. 670-76). In our view, what matters is the nature of the employment relationship between the public employee and the public employer. Where a public employee is employed under a contract of employment, regardless of his or her status as a public office holder, the applicable law governing his or her dismissal is the law of contract, not general principles arising out of public law. What Knight truly stands for is the principle that there is always a recourse available where the employee is an office holder and the applicable law leaves him or her without any protection whatsoever when dismissed.

[82] This conclusion does not detract from the general duty of fairness owed by administrative decision makers. Rather it acknowledges that in the specific context of dismissal from public employment, disputes should be viewed through the lens of contract law rather than public law.

[83] In order to understand why a reconsideration of Knight is warranted, it is necessary to review the development of the duty of fairness in Canadian administrative law. As we shall see, its development in the public employment context was intimately related to the distinction between public office holders and contractual employees, a distinction which, in our view, has become increasingly difficult to maintain both in principle and in practice.

(1) The Preliminary Issue of Jurisdiction

[84] Before dealing with the scope of the duty of fairness in this case, a word should be said about the respondent's preliminary objection to the jurisdiction of the adjudicator under the PSLRA to consider procedural fairness. The respondent argues that allowing adjudicators to consider procedural fairness risks granting them the inherent powers of a court. We disagree. We can see nothing problematic with a grievance adjudicator considering a public law duty of fairness issue where such a duty exists. It falls squarely within the adjudicator's task to resolve a grievance. However, as will be explained below, the proper approach is to first identify the nature of the employment relationship and the applicable law. Where, as here, the relationship is contractual, a public law duty of fairness is not engaged and therefore should play no role in resolving the grievance.

(2) The Development of the Duty of Fairness in Canadian Public Law

[85] In Canada, the modern concept of procedural fairness in administrative law was inspired by the House of Lords' landmark decision in Ridge v. Baldwin, [1963] 2 All E.R. 66, a case which involved the summary dismissal of the chief constable of Brighton. The House of Lords declared the chief constable's dismissal a nullity on the grounds that the administrative body which had dismissed him had failed to provide the reasons for his dismissal or to accord him an opportunity to be heard in violation of the rules of natural justice. Central to the reasoning in the case was Lord Reid's distinction between (i) master-servant relationships (i.e. contractual employment), (ii) offices held "at pleasure", and (iii) offices where there must be cause for dismissal, which included the chief constable's position. According to Lord Reid, only the last category of persons was entitled to procedural fairness in relation to their dismissal since both contractual employees and office holders employed "at pleasure" could be dismissed without reason (p. 72). As the authors Wade and Forsyth note that, after a period of retreat from imposing procedural fairness requirements on administrative decision makers, Ridge v. Baldwin "marked an important change of judicial policy, indicating that natural justice was restored to favour and would be applied on a wide basis" (W. Wade and C. Forsyth, Administrative Law (8th ed. 2000), at p. 438).

[86] The principles established by Ridge v. Baldwin were followed by this Court in Nicholson v. Haldimand-Norfolk Regional Board of Commissioners of Police, 1978 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1979] 1 S.C.R. 311. Nicholson, like its U.K. predecessor, marked the return to a less rigid approach to natural justice in Canada (see Brown and Evans, at pp. 7-5 to 7-9). Nicholson concerned the summary dismissal of a probationary police officer by a regional board of police commissioners. Laskin C.J., for the majority, at p. 328, declared the dismissal void on the ground that the officer fell into Lord Reid's third category and was therefore entitled to the same procedural protections as in Ridge v. Baldwin.

[87] Although Ridge v. Baldwin and Nicholson were concerned with procedural fairness in the context of the dismissal of public office holders, the concept of fairness was quickly extended to other types of administrative decisions (see e.g. Martineau v. Matsqui Institution Disciplinary Board, 1979 CanLII 184 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 602; Kane v. Board of Governors of the University of British Columbia, 1980 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1105; Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, 1980 CanLII 21 (SCC), [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735). In Cardinal v. Director of Kent Institution, 1985 CanLII 23 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 643, Le Dain J. stated that the duty of fairness was a general principle of law applicable to all public authorities:

This Court has affirmed that there is, as a general common law principle, a duty of procedural fairness lying on every public authority making an administrative decision which is not of a legislative nature and which affects the rights, privileges or interests of an individual [p. 653]

(See also Baker, at para. 20.)

[88] In Knight, the Court relied on the statement of Le Dain J. in Cardinal v. Director of Kent Institution that the existence of a general duty to act fairly will depend on “(i) the nature of the decision to be made by the administrative body; (ii) the relationship existing between that body and the individual; and (iii) the effect of that decision on the individual’s rights” (Knight, at p. 669).

[89] The dispute in Knight centred on whether a board of education had failed to accord procedural fairness when it dismissed a director of education with three months’ notice pursuant to his contract of employment. The main issue was whether the director’s employment relationship with the school board was one that attracted a public law duty of fairness. L’Heureux-Dubé J., for the majority, held that it did attract such a duty on the ground that the director’s position had a “strong ‘statutory flavour’” and could thus be qualified as a public office (p. 672). In doing so, she specifically recognized that, contrary to Lord Reid’s holding in Ridge v. Baldwin, holders of an office “at pleasure”, were also entitled to procedural fairness before being dismissed (pp. 673-74). The fact that the director’s written contract of employment specifically provided that he could be dismissed with three months’ notice was held not to be enough to displace a public law duty to act fairly (p. 681).

[90] From these foundational cases, procedural fairness has grown to become a central principle of Canadian administrative law. Its overarching purpose is not difficult to discern: administrative decision makers, in the exercise of public powers, should act fairly in coming to decisions that affect the interests of individuals. In other words, “[t]he observance of fair procedures is central to the notion of the ‘just’ exercise of power” (Brown and Evans, at p. 7-3). What is less clear, however, is whether this purpose is served by imposing public law procedural fairness requirements on public bodies in the exercise of their contractual rights as employers.

(3) Procedural Fairness in the Public Employment Context

[91] Ridge v. Baldwin and Nicholson established that a public employee’s right to procedural fairness depended on his or her status as an office holder. While Knight extended a duty of fairness to office holders during pleasure, it nevertheless upheld the distinction between office holders and contractual employees as an important criterion in establishing whether a duty of fairness was owed. Courts have continued to rely on this distinction, either extending or denying procedural protections depending on the characterization of the public employee’s legal status as an office holder or contractual employee (see e.g. Reglin v. Creston (Town) (2004), 34 C.C.E.L. (3d) 123, 2004 BCSC 790; Gismondi v. Toronto (City) (2003), 2003 CanLII 52143 \(ON CA\), 64 O.R. (3d) 688 (C.A.); Seshia v. Health Sciences Centre (2001), 160 Man. R. (2d) 41, 2001 MBCA 151; Rosen v. Saskatoon District Health Board (2001), 202 D.L.R. (4th) 35, 2001 SKCA 83; Hanis v. Teevan (1998), 1998 CanLII 7126 \(ON CA\), 111 O.A.C. 91; Gerrard v. Sackville (Town) (1992), 1992 CanLII 2435 \(NB CA\), 124 N.B.R. (2d) 70 (C.A.)).

[92] In practice, a clear distinction between office holders and contractual employees has been difficult to maintain:

Although the law makes such a sharp distinction between office and service in theory, in practice it may be difficult to tell which is which. For tax purposes “office” has long been defined as a “subsisting, permanent substantive position which has an existence independent of the person who fills it”, but for the purposes of natural justice the test may not be the same. Nor need an office necessarily be statutory, although nearly all public offices of importance in administrative law are statutory. A statutory public authority may have many employees who are in law merely its servants, and others of higher grades who are office-holders.

(Wade and Forsyth, at pp. 532-33)

[93] Lord Wilberforce noted that attempting to separate office holders from contractual employees involves the risk of a compartmental approach which, although convenient as a solvent, may lead to narrower distinctions than are appropriate to the broader issues of administrative law. A comparative list of situations in which persons have been held entitled or not entitled to a hearing, or to observation of rules of natural justice, according to the master and servant test, looks illogical and even bizarre.

(Malloch v. Aberdeen Corp., [1971] 2 All E.R. 1278 (H.L.), at p. 1294)

[94] There is no reason to think that the distinction has been easier to apply in Canada. In Knight, as has been noted, the majority judgment relied on whether the public employee’s position had a “strong ‘statutory flavour’” (p. 672), but as Brown and Evans observe, “there is no simple test for determining whether there is a sufficiently strong ‘statutory flavour’ to a job for it to be classified as an ‘office’” (p. 7-19). This has led to uncertainty as to whether procedural fairness attaches to particular positions. For instance, there are conflicting decisions on whether the position of a “middle manager” in a municipality is sufficiently important to attract a duty of fairness (compare Gismondi, at para. 53, and Hughes v. Moncton (City) (1990), 1990 CanLII 6545 (NB QB), 111 N.B.R. (2d) 184 (Q.B.), aff’d (1991), 1991 CanLII 4226 (NB CA), 118 N.B.R. (2d) 306 (C.A.)). Similarly, physicians working in the public health system may or may not be entitled to a duty of fairness (compare Seshia and Rosen v. Saskatoon District Health Board, [2000] 4 W.W.R. 606, 2000 SKQB 40).

[95] Further complicating the distinction is the fact that public employment is for the most part now viewed as a regular contractual employment relationship. The traditional position at common law was that public servants were literally “servants of the Crown” and could therefore be dismissed at will. However, it is now recognized that most public employees are employed on a contractual basis: Wells v. Newfoundland, 1999 CanLII 657 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 199.

[96] Wells concerned the dismissal without compensation of a public office holder whose position had been abolished by statute. The Court held that, while Wells’ position was created by statute, his employment relationship with the Crown was contractual and therefore he was entitled to be compensated for breach of contract according to ordinary private law principles. Indeed, Wells recognized that most civil servants and public officers are employed under contracts of employment, either as members of unions bound by collective agreements or as non-unionized employees under individual contracts of employment (paras. 20-21 and 29-32). Only certain officers, like ministers of the Crown and “others who fulfill constitutionally defined state roles”, do not have a contractual relationship with the Crown, since the terms of their positions cannot be modified by agreement (Wells, at paras. 29-32).

[97] The effect of Wells, as Professors Hogg and Monahan note, is that

[t]he government’s common law relationship with its employees will now be governed, for the most part, by the general law of contract, in the same way as private employment relationships. This does not mean that governments cannot provide for a right to terminate employment contracts at pleasure. However, if the government wishes to have such a right, it must either contract for it or make provision (expressly or by necessary implication) by way of statute.

(P. W. Hogg and P. J. Monahan, Liability of the Crown (3rd ed. 2000), at p. 240)

The important point for our purposes is that Wells confirmed that most public office holders have a contractual employment relationship. Of course, office holders' positions will also often be governed by statute and regulations, but the essence of the employment relationship is still contractual. In this context, attempting to make a clear distinction between office holders and contractual employees for the purposes of procedural fairness becomes even more difficult.

[98] If the distinction has become difficult to maintain in practice, it is also increasingly hard to justify in principle. There would appear to be three main reasons for distinguishing between office holders and contractual employees and for extending procedural fairness protections only to the former, all of which, in our view, are problematic.

[99] First, historically, offices were viewed as a form of property, and thus could be recovered by the office holder who was removed contrary to the principles of natural justice. Employees who were dismissed in breach of their contract, however, could only sue for damages, since specific performance is not generally available for contracts for personal service (Wade and Forsyth, at pp. 531-32). This conception of public office has long since faded from our law: public offices are no longer treated as a form of private property.

[100] A second and more persuasive reason for the distinction is that dismissal from public office involves the exercise of delegated statutory power and should therefore be subject to public law controls like any other administrative decision (Knight, at p. 675; Malloch, at p. 1293, per Lord Wilberforce). In contrast, the dismissal of a contractual employee only implicates a public authority's private law rights as an employer.

[101] A third reason is that, unlike contractual employees, office holders did not typically benefit from contractual rights protecting them from summary discharge. This was true of the public office holders in Ridge v. Baldwin and Nicholson. Indeed, in both cases the statutory language purported to authorize dismissal without notice. The holders of an office “at pleasure” were in an even more tenuous position since by definition they could be dismissed without notice and without reason (Nicholson, at p. 323; Black’s Law Dictionary (8th ed. 2004), at p. 1192 “pleasure appointment”). Because of this relative insecurity it was seen to be desirable to impose minimal procedural requirements in order to ensure that office holders were not deprived of their positions arbitrarily (Nicholson, at pp. 322-23; Knight, at pp. 674-75; Wade and Forsyth, at pp. 536-37).

[102] In our view, the existence of a contract of employment, not the public employee’s status as an office holder, is the crucial consideration. Where a public office holder is employed under a contract of employment the justifications for imposing a public law duty of fairness with respect to his or her dismissal lose much of their force.

[103] Where the employment relationship is contractual, it becomes difficult to see how a public employer is acting any differently in dismissing a public office holder and a contractual employee. In both cases, it would seem that the public employer is merely exercising its private law rights as an employer. For instance, in Knight, the director’s position was terminated by a resolution passed by the board of education pursuant to statute, but it was done in accordance with the contract of employment, which provided for dismissal on three months’ notice. Similarly, the appellant in this case was dismissed pursuant to s. 20 of the New Brunswick Civil Service Act, but that section provides that the ordinary rules of contract govern dismissal. He could therefore only be dismissed for just cause or on reasonable notice, and any failure to do so would give rise to a right to damages. In seeking to end the employment relationship with four months’ pay in lieu of notice, the respondent was acting no differently than any other employer at common law. In Wells, Major J. noted that public employment had all of the features of a contractual relationship:

A common-sense view of what it means to work for the government suggests that these relationships have all the hallmarks of contract. There are negotiations leading to agreement and employment. This gives rise to enforceable obligations on both sides. The Crown is acting much as an ordinary citizen would, engaging in mutually beneficial commercial relations with individual and corporate actors. Although the Crown may have statutory guidelines, the result is still a contract of employment. [Emphasis added; para. 22.]

If the Crown is acting as any other private actor would in hiring its employees, then it follows that the dismissal of its employees should be viewed in the same way.

[104] Furthermore, while public law is rightly concerned with preventing the arbitrary exercise of delegated powers, the good faith exercise of the contractual rights of an employer, such as the right to end the employment relationship on reasonable notice, cannot be qualified as arbitrary. Where the terms of the employment contract were explicitly agreed to, it will be assumed that procedural fairness was dealt with by the parties (see, for example, in the context of collective agreements: School District No. 5 (Southeast Kootenay) and B.C.T.F. (Yellowaga) (Re) (2000), 2000 CanLII 50084 (BC LA), 94 L.A.C. (4th) 56). If, however, the contract of employment is silent, the fundamental terms will be supplied by the common law or the civil law, in which case dismissal may only be for just cause or on reasonable notice.

[105] In the context of this appeal, it must be emphasized that dismissal with reasonable notice is not unfair per se. An employer's right to terminate the employment relationship with due notice is simply the counterpart to the employee's right to quit with due notice (G. England, Employment Law in Canada (4th ed. (loose-leaf)), at para. 13.3). It is a well-established principle of the common law that, unless otherwise provided, both parties to an employment contract may end the relationship without alleging cause so long as they provide adequate notice. An employer's right to terminate on reasonable notice must be exercised within the framework of an employer's general obligations of good faith and fair dealing: Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd., 1997 CanLII 332 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 701, at para. 95. But the good faith exercise of a common law contractual right to dismiss with notice does not give rise to concerns about the illegitimate exercise of public power. Moreover, as will be discussed below, where public employers do act in bad faith or engage in unfair dealing, the private law provides a more appropriate form of relief and there is no reason that they should be treated differently than private sector employers who engage in similar conduct.

[106] Of course, a public authority must abide by any statutory restrictions on the exercise of its discretion as an employer, regardless of the terms of an employment contract, and failure to do so may give rise to a public law remedy. A public authority cannot contract out of its statutory duties. But where a dismissal decision is properly within the public authority's powers and is taken pursuant to a contract of employment, there is no compelling public law purpose for imposing a duty of fairness.

[107] Nor is the protection of office holders a justification for imposing a duty of fairness when the employee is protected from wrongful dismissal by contract. The appellant's situation provides a good illustration of why this is so. As an office holder, the appellant was employed "at pleasure", and could therefore be terminated without notice or reason (Interpretation Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. I-13, s. 20). However, he was also a civil servant and, pursuant to s. 20 of the Civil Service Act, his dismissal was governed by the ordinary rules of contract. If his employer had dismissed him without notice and without cause he would have been entitled to claim damages for breach of contract. Even if he was dismissed with notice, it was open to him to challenge the length of notice or amount of pay in lieu of notice given. On the facts, the respondent gave the appellant four months' worth of pay in lieu of notice, which he was successful in having increased to eight months before the grievance adjudicator.

[108] It is true that the remedy of reinstatement is not available for breach of contract at common law. In this regard, it might be argued that contractual remedies, on their own, offer insufficient protection to office holders (see de Smith, Woolf & Jowell: Judicial Review of Administrative Action (5th ed. 1995), at p. 187). However, it must be kept in mind that breach of a public law duty of fairness also does not lead to full reinstatement. The effect of a breach of procedural fairness is to render the dismissal decision void ab initio (Ridge v. Baldwin, at p. 81). Accordingly, the employment is deemed to have never ceased and the office holder is entitled to unpaid wages and benefits from the date of the dismissal to the date of judgment (see England, at para. 17.224). However, an employer is free to follow the correct procedure and dismiss the office holder again. A breach of the duty of fairness simply requires that the dismissal decision be retaken. It therefore is incorrect to equate it to reinstatement (see Malloch, at p. 1284).

[109] In addition, a public law remedy can lead to unfairness. The amount of unpaid wages and benefits an office holder is entitled to will be a function of the length of time the judicial process has taken to wend its way to a final resolution rather than criteria related to the employee's situation. Furthermore, in principle, there is no duty to mitigate since unpaid wages are not technically damages. As a result, an employee may recoup much more than he or she actually lost (see England, at para. 17.224).

[110] In contrast, the private law offers a more principled and fair remedy. The length of notice or amount of pay in lieu of notice an employee is entitled to depends on a number of factors including length of service, age, experience and the availability of alternative employment (see Wallace, at paras. 81 ff.). The notice period may be increased if it is established that the employer acted in bad faith or engaged in unfair dealing when acting to dismiss the employee (Wallace, at para. 95). These considerations aim at ensuring that dismissed employees are afforded some measure of protection while looking for new employment.

[111] It is important to note as well that the appellant, as a public employee employed under a contract of employment, also had access to all of the same statutory and common law protections that surround private sector employment. He was protected from dismissal on the basis of a prohibited ground of discrimination under the Human Rights Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. H-11. His employer was bound to respect the norms laid down by the Employment Standards Act, S.N.B. 1982, c. E-7.2. As has already been mentioned, if his dismissal had been in bad faith or he had been subject to unfair dealing, it would have been open to him to argue for an extension of the notice period pursuant to the principles laid down in Wallace. In short, the appellant was not without legal protections or remedies in the face of his dismissal.

(4) The Proper Approach to the Dismissal of Public Employees

[112] In our view, the distinction between office holder and contractual employee for the purposes of a public law duty of fairness is problematic and should be done away with. The distinction is difficult to apply in practice and does not correspond with the justifications for imposing public law procedural fairness requirements. What is important in assessing the actions of a public employer in relation to its employees is the nature of the employment relationship. Where the relationship is contractual, it should be viewed as any other private law employment relationship regardless of an employee's status as an office holder.

[113] The starting point, therefore, in any analysis, should be to determine the nature of the employment relationship with the public authority. Following Wells, it is assumed that most public employment relationships are contractual. Where this is the case, disputes relating to dismissal should be resolved according to the express or implied terms of the contract of employment and any applicable statutes and regulations, without regard for whether the employee is an office holder. A public authority which dismisses an employee pursuant to a contract of employment should not be subject to any additional public law duty of fairness. Where the dismissal results in a breach of contract, the public employee will have access to ordinary contractual remedies.

[114] The principles expressed in Knight in relation to the general duty of fairness owed by public authorities when making decisions that affect the rights, privileges or interests of individuals are valid and important. However, to the extent that the majority decision in Knight ignored the important effect of a contract of employment, it should not be followed. Where a public employee is protected from wrongful dismissal by contract, his or her remedy should be in private law, not in public law.

[115] The dismissal of a public employee should therefore generally be viewed as a typical employment law dispute. However, there may be occasions where a public law duty of fairness will still apply. We can envision two such situations at present. The first occurs where a public employee is not, in fact, protected by a contract of employment. This will be the case with judges, ministers of the Crown and others who “fulfill constitutionally defined state roles” (Wells, at para. 31). It may also be that the terms of appointment of some public office holders expressly provide for summary dismissal or, at the very least, are silent on the matter, in which case the office holders may be deemed to hold office “at pleasure” (see e.g. New Brunswick Interpretation Act, s. 20; Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, s. 23(1)). Because an employee in this situation is truly subject to the will of the Crown, procedural fairness is required to ensure that public power is not exercised capriciously.

[116] A second situation occurs when a duty of fairness flows by necessary implication from a statutory power governing the employment relationship. In Malloch, the applicable statute provided that dismissal of a teacher could only take place if the teacher was given three weeks’ notice of the motion to dismiss. The House of Lords found that this necessarily implied a right for the teacher to make representations at the meeting where the dismissal motion was being considered. Otherwise, there would have been little reason for Parliament to have provided for the notice procedure in the first place (p. 1282). Whether and what type of procedural requirements result from a particular statutory power will of course depend on the specific wording at issue and will vary with the context (Knight, at p. 682).

B. Conclusion

[117] In this case, the appellant was a contractual employee of the respondent in addition to being a public office holder. Section 20 of the Civil Service Act provided that, as a civil servant, he could only be dismissed in accordance with the ordinary rules of contract. In these circumstances it was unnecessary to consider any public law duty of procedural fairness. The respondent was fully within its rights to dismiss the appellant with pay in lieu of notice without affording him a hearing. The respondent dismissed the appellant with four months' pay in lieu of notice. The appellant was successful in increasing this amount to eight months. The appellant was protected by contract and was able to obtain contractual remedies in relation to his dismissal. By imposing procedural fairness requirements on the respondent over and above its contractual obligations and ordering the full "reinstatement" of the appellant, the adjudicator erred in his application of the duty of fairness and his decision was therefore correctly struck down by the Court of Queen's Bench.

V. Disposition

[118] We would dismiss the appeal. There will be no order for costs in this Court as the respondent is not requesting them.

The following are the reasons delivered by [119] BINNIE J. — I agree with my colleagues that the appellant’s former employment relationship with the respondent is governed by contract. The respondent chose to exercise its right to terminate the employment without alleging cause. The adjudicator adopted an unreasonable interpretation of s. 20 of the Civil Service Act, S.N.B. 1984, c. C-5.1, and of ss. 97(2.1) and 100.1 of the Public Service Labour Relations Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. P-25. The appellant was a non-unionized employee whose job was terminated in accordance with contract law. Public law principles of procedural fairness were not applicable in the circumstances. These conclusions are enough to dispose of the appeal.

[120] However, my colleagues Bastarache and LeBel JJ. are embarked on a more ambitious mission, stating that:

Although the instant appeal deals with the particular problem of judicial review of the decisions of an adjudicative tribunal, these reasons will address first and foremost the structure and characteristics of the system of judicial review as a whole.

...

... The time has arrived to re-examine the Canadian approach to judicial review of administrative decisions and develop a principled framework that is more coherent and workable. [Emphasis added; paras. 33 and 32.]

[121] The need for such a re-examination is widely recognized, but in the end my colleagues’ reasons for judgment do not deal with the “system as a whole”. They focus on administrative tribunals. In that context, they reduce the applicable standards of review from three to two (“correctness” and “reasonableness”), but retain the pragmatic and functional analysis, although now it is to be called the “standard of review analysis” (para. 63). A broader reappraisal is called for. Changing the name of the old pragmatic and functional test represents a limited advance, but as the poet says:

What's in a name? that which we call a rose
By any other name would smell as sweet;

(Romeo and Juliet, Act II, Scene ii)

[122] I am emboldened by my colleagues' insistence that "a holistic approach is needed when considering fundamental principles" (para. 26) to express the following views. Judicial review is an idea that has lately become unduly burdened with law office metaphysics. We are concerned with substance not nomenclature. The words themselves are unobjectionable. The dreaded reference to "functional" can simply be taken to mean that generally speaking courts have the last word on what they consider the correct decision on legal matters (because deciding legal issues is their "function"), while administrators should generally have the last word within their function, which is to decide administrative matters. The word "pragmatic" not only signals a distaste for formalism but recognizes that a conceptually tidy division of functions has to be tempered by practical considerations: for example, a labour board is better placed than the courts to interpret the intricacies of provisions in a labour statute governing replacement of union workers; see e.g. Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 963 v. New Brunswick Liquor Corp., 1979 CanLII 23 (SCC), [1979] 2 S.C.R. 227.

[123] Parliament or a provincial legislature is often well advised to allocate an administrative decision to someone other than a judge. The judge is on the outside of the administration looking in. The legislators are entitled to put their trust in the viewpoint of the designated decision maker (particularly as to what constitutes a reasonable outcome), not only in the case of the administrative tribunals of principal concern to my colleagues but (taking a "holistic approach") also in the case of a minister, a board, a public servant, a commission, an elected council or other administrative bodies and statutory decision makers. In the absence of a full statutory right of appeal, the court ought generally to respect the exercise of the administrative discretion, particularly in the face of a privative clause.

[124] On the other hand, a court is right to insist that its view of the correct opinion (i.e. the “correctness” standard of review) is accepted on questions concerning the Constitution, the common law, and the interpretation of a statute other than the administrator’s enabling statute (the “home statute”) or a rule or statute closely connected with it; see generally D. J. M. Brown and J. M. Evans, Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada (loose-leaf), at para. 14:2210.

[125] Thus the law (or, more grandly, the “rule of law”) sets the boundaries of potential administrative action. It is sometimes said by judges that an administrator acting within his or her discretion “has the right to be wrong”. This reflects an unduly court-centred view of the universe. A disagreement between the court and an administrator does not necessarily mean that the administrator is wrong.

A. Limits on the Allocation of Decision Making

[126] It should not be difficult in the course of judicial review to identify legal questions requiring disposition by a judge. There are three basic legal limits on the allocation of administrative discretion.

[127] Firstly, the Constitution restricts the legislator’s ability to allocate issues to administrative bodies which s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 has allocated to the courts. The logic of the constitutional limitation is obvious. If the limitation did not exist, the government could transfer the work of the courts to administrative bodies that are not independent of the executive and by statute immunize the decisions of these bodies from effective judicial review. The country would still possess an independent judiciary, but the courts would not be available to citizens whose rights or interests are trapped in the administration.

[128] Secondly, administrative action must be founded on statutory or prerogative (i.e. common law) powers . This too is a simple idea. No one can exercise a power they do not possess. Whether or not the power (or jurisdiction) exists is a question of law for the courts to determine, just as it is for the courts (not the administrators) to have the final word on questions of general law that may be relevant to the resolution of an administrative issue. The instances where this Court has deferred to an administrator's conclusion of law outside his or her home statute, or a statute "intimately" connected thereto, are exceptional. We should say so. Instead, my colleagues say the court's view of the law will prevail where the question at issue is one of general law "that is both of central importance to the legal system as a whole and outside the adjudicator's specialized area of expertise". [para. 60]

It is, with respect, a distraction to unleash a debate in the reviewing judge's courtroom about whether or not a particular question of law is "of central importance to the legal system as a whole". It should be sufficient to frame a rule exempting from the correctness standard the provisions of the home statute and closely related statutes which require the expertise of the administrative decision maker (as in the labour board example). Apart from that exception, we should prefer clarity to needless complexity and hold that the last word on questions of general law should be left to judges.

[129] Thirdly, a fair procedure is said to be the handmaiden of justice. Accordingly, procedural limits are placed on administrative bodies by statute and the common law. These include the requirements of “procedural fairness”, which will vary with the type of decision maker and the type of decision under review. On such matters, as well, the courts have the final say. The need for such procedural safeguards is obvious. Nobody should have his or her rights, interests or privileges adversely dealt with by an unjust process. Nor is such an unjust intent to be attributed easily to legislators. Hansard is full of expressions of concern by Ministers and Members of Parliament regarding the fairness of proposed legislative provisions. There is a dated hauteur about judicial pronouncements such as that the “justice of the common law will supply the omission of the legislature” (Cooper v. Wandsworth Board of Works (1863), 14 C.B. (N.S.) 180, 143 E.R. 414 (C.P.), at p. 420). Generally speaking, legislators and judges in this country are working with a common set of basic legal and constitutional values. They share a belief in the rule of law. Constitutional considerations aside, however, statutory protections can nevertheless be repealed and common law protections can be modified by statute, as was demonstrated in Ocean Port Hotel Ltd. v. British Columbia (General Manager, Liquor Control and Licensing Branch), [2001] 2 S.C.R. 781, 2001 SCC 52.

B. Reasonableness of Outcome

[130] At this point, judicial review shifts gears. When the applicant for judicial review challenges the substantive outcome of an administrative action, the judge is invited to cross the line into second-guessing matters that lie within the function of the administrator. This is controversial because it is not immediately obvious why a judge’s view of the reasonableness of an administrative policy or the exercise of an administrative discretion should be preferred to that of the administrator to whom Parliament or a legislature has allocated the decision, unless there is a full statutory right of appeal to the courts, or it is otherwise indicated in the conferring legislation that a “correctness” standard is intended.

[131] In U.E.S., Local 298 v. Bibeault, 1988 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 1048, Beetz J. adopted the view that “[t]o a large extent judicial review of administrative action is a specialized branch of statutory interpretation” (p. 1087 (emphasis deleted)). Judicial intervention in administrative decisions on grounds of substance (in the absence of a constitutional challenge) has been based on presumed legislative intent in a line of cases from Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corp., [1947] 2 All E.R. 680 (C.A.) (“you may have something so absurd that no sensible person could ever dream that it lay within the powers of the authority” (p. 683)) to Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 963 v. New Brunswick Liquor Corp. (“was the Board’s interpretation so patently unreasonable that its construction cannot be rationally supported by the relevant legislation . . . ?” (p. 237)). More recent examples are Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 (SCC), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817 (para. 53), and Mount Sinai Hospital Center v. Quebec (Minister of Health and Social Services), [2001] 2 S.C.R. 281, 2001 SCC 41 (paras. 60-61). Judicial review proceeds on the justified presumption that legislators do not intend results that depart from reasonable standards.

C. The Need to Reappraise the Approach to Judicial Review

[132] The present difficulty, it seems, does not lie in the component parts of judicial review, most of which are well entrenched in decades of case law, but in the current methodology for putting those component parts into action. There is afoot in the legal profession a desire for clearer guidance than is provided by lists of principles, factors and spectrums. It must be recognized, of course, that complexity is inherent in all legal principles that must address the vast range of administrative decision making. The objection is that our present “pragmatic and functional” approach is more complicated than is required by the subject matter.

[133] People who feel victimized or unjustly dealt with by the apparatus of government, and who have no recourse to an administrative appeal, should have access to an independent judge through a procedure that is quick and relatively inexpensive. Like much litigation these days, however, judicial review is burdened with undue cost and delay. Litigants understandably hesitate to go to court to seek redress for a perceived administrative injustice if their lawyers cannot predict with confidence even what standard of review will be applied. The disposition of the case may well turn on the choice of standard of review. If litigants do take the plunge, they may find the court's attention focussed not on their complaints, or the government's response, but on lengthy and arcane discussions of something they are told is the pragmatic and functional test. Every hour of a lawyer's preparation and court time devoted to unproductive "lawyer's talk" poses a significant cost to the applicant. If the challenge is unsuccessful, the unhappy applicant may also face a substantial bill of costs from the successful government agency. A victory before the reviewing court may be overturned on appeal because the wrong "standard of review" was selected. A small business denied a licence or a professional person who wants to challenge disciplinary action should be able to seek judicial review without betting the store or the house on the outcome. Thus, in my view, the law of judicial review should be pruned of some of its unduly subtle, unproductive, or esoteric features.

D. Standards of Review

[134] My colleagues conclude that three standards of review should be reduced to two standards of review. I agree that this simplification will avoid some of the arcane debates about the point at which "unreasonableness" becomes "patent unreasonableness". However, in my view the repercussions of their position go well beyond administrative tribunals. My colleagues conclude, and I agree:

Looking to either the magnitude or the immediacy of the defect in the tribunal's decision provides no meaningful way in practice of distinguishing between a patently unreasonable and an unreasonable decision. [para. 41]

More broadly, they declare that “the analytical problems that arise in trying to apply the different standards undercut any conceptual usefulness created by the inherently greater flexibility of having multiple standards of review” (para. 44), and “any actual difference between them in terms of their operation appears to be illusory” (para. 41). A test which is incoherent when applied to administrative tribunals does not gain in coherence or logic when applied to other administrative decision makers such as mid-level bureaucrats or, for that matter, Ministers. If logic and language cannot capture the distinction in one context, it must equally be deficient elsewhere in the field of judicial review. I therefore proceed on the basis that the distinction between “patent unreasonableness” and “reasonableness simpliciter” has been declared by the Court to be abandoned. I propose at this point to examine what I see as some of the implications of this abandonment.

E. Degrees of Deference

[135] The distinction between reasonableness simpliciter and patent unreasonableness was not directed merely to “the magnitude or the immediacy of the defect” in the administrative decision (para. 41). The distinction also recognized that different administrative decisions command different degrees of deference, depending on who is deciding what.

[136] A minister making decisions under the Extradition Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-23, to surrender a fugitive, for example, is said to be “at the extreme legislative end of the continuum of administrative decision-making” (Idziak v. Canada (Minister of Justice), 1992 CanLII 51 (SCC), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 631, at p. 659). On the other hand, a ministerial delegate making a deportation decision according to ministerial guidelines was accorded considerably less deference in Baker (where the “reasonableness simpliciter” standard was applied). The difference does not lie only in the judge’s view of the perceived immediacy of the defect in the administrative decision. In Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3, 2002 SCC 1, a unanimous Court adopted the caution in the context of counter-terrorism measures that “[i]f the people are to accept the consequences of such decisions, they must be made by persons whom the people have elected and whom they can remove” (para. 33). Administrative decision makers generally command respect more for their expertise than for their prominence in the administrative food chain. Far more numerous are the lesser officials who reside in the bowels and recesses of government departments adjudicating pension benefits or the granting or withholding of licences, or municipal boards poring over budgets or allocating costs of local improvements. Then there are the Cabinet and Ministers of the Crown who make broad decisions of public policy such as testing cruise missiles, Operation Dismantle Inc. v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 74 \(SCC\), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441, or policy decisions arising out of decisions of major administrative tribunals, as in Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, 1980 CanLII 21 \(SCC\), [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735, at p. 753, where the Court said: “The very nature of the body must be taken into account in assessing the technique of review which has been adopted by the Governor in Council.”

[137] Of course, the degree of deference also depends on the nature and content of the question. An adjudicative tribunal called on to approve pipelines based on “public convenience and necessity” (Westcoast Energy Inc. v. Canada (National Energy Board), 1998 CanLII 813 \(SCC\), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 322) or simply to take a decision in the “public interest” is necessarily accorded more room to manoeuvre than is a professional body, given the task of determining an appropriate sanction for a member’s misconduct (Law Society of New Brunswick v. Ryan, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 247, 2003 SCC 20).

[138] In our recent jurisprudence, the “nature of the question” before the decision maker has been considered as one of a number of elements to be considered in choosing amongst the various standards of review. At this point, however, I believe it plays a more important role in terms of substantive review. It helps to define the range of reasonable outcomes within which the administrator is authorized to choose.

[139] The judicial sensitivity to different levels of respect (or deference) required in different situations is quite legitimate. “Contextualizing” a single standard of review will shift the debate (slightly) from choosing between two standards of reasonableness that each represent a different level of deference to a debate within a single standard of reasonableness to determine the appropriate level of deference. In practice, the result of today’s decision may be like the bold innovations of a traffic engineer that in the end do no more than shift rush hour congestion from one road intersection to another without any overall saving to motorists in time or expense.

[140] That said, I agree that the repeated attempts to define and explain the difference between reasonableness simpliciter and “patent” unreasonableness can be seen with the benefit of hindsight to be unproductive and distracting. Nevertheless, the underlying issue of degrees of deference (which the two standards were designed to address) remains.

[141] Historically, our law recognized “patent” unreasonableness before it recognized what became known as reasonableness simpliciter. The adjective “patent” initially underscored the level of respect that was due to the designated decision maker, and signalled the narrow authority of the courts to interfere with a particular administrative outcome on substantive grounds. The reasonableness simpliciter standard was added at a later date to recognize a reduced level of deference. Reducing three standards of review to two standards of review does not alter the reality that at the high end “patent” unreasonableness (in the sense of manifestly indefensible) was not a bad description of the hurdle an applicant had to get over to have an administrative decision quashed on a ground of substance. The danger of labelling the most “deferential” standard as “reasonableness” is that it may be taken (wrongly) as an invitation to reviewing judges not simply to identify the usual issues, such as whether irrelevant matters were taken into consideration, or relevant matters were not taken into consideration, but to reweigh the input that resulted in the administrator’s decision as if it were the judge’s view of “reasonableness” that counts. At this point, the judge's role is to identify the outer boundaries of reasonable outcomes within which the administrative decision maker is free to choose.

F. Multiple Aspects of Administrative Decisions

[142] Mention should be made of a further feature that also reflects the complexity of the subject matter of judicial review. An applicant may advance several grounds for quashing an administrative decision. He or she may contend that the decision maker has misinterpreted the general law. He or she may argue, in the alternative, that even if the decision maker got the general law straight (an issue on which the court's view of what is correct will prevail), the decision maker did not properly apply it to the facts (an issue on which the decision maker is entitled to deference). In a challenge under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to a surrender for extradition, for example, the minister will have to comply with the Court's view of Charter principles (the "correctness" standard), but if he or she correctly appreciates the applicable law, the court will properly recognize a wide discretion in the application of those principles to the particular facts. The same approach is taken to less exalted decision makers (Moreau-Bérubé v. New Brunswick (Judicial Council), [2002] 1 S.C.R. 249, 2002 SCC 11). In the jargon of the judicial review bar, this is known as "segmentation".

G. The Existence of a Privative Clause

[143] The existence of a privative clause is currently subsumed within the "pragmatic and functional" test as one factor amongst others to be considered in determining the appropriate standard of review, where it supports the choice of the patent unreasonableness standard. A single standard of "reasonableness" cannot mean that the degree of deference is unaffected by the existence of a suitably worded privative clause. It is certainly a relevant contextual circumstance that helps to calibrate the intrusiveness of a court's review. It signals the level of respect that must be shown. Chief Justice Laskin during argument once memorably condemned the quashing of a labour board decision protected by a strong privative clause, by saying “what’s wrong with these people [the judges], can’t they read?” A system of judicial review based on the rule of law ought not to treat a privative clause as conclusive, but it is more than just another “factor” in the hopper of pragmatism and functionality. Its existence should presumptively foreclose judicial review on the basis of outcome on substantive grounds unless the applicant can show that the clause, properly interpreted, permits it or there is some legal reason why it cannot be given effect.

H. A Broader Reappraisal

[144] “Reasonableness” is a big tent that will have to accommodate a lot of variables that inform and limit a court’s review of the outcome of administrative decision making.

[145] The theory of our recent case law has been that once the appropriate standard of review is selected, it is a fairly straightforward matter to apply it. In practice, the criteria for selection among “reasonableness” standards of review proved to be undefinable and their application unpredictable. The present incarnation of the “standard of review” analysis requires a threshold debate about the four factors (non-exhaustive) which critics say too often leads to unnecessary delay, uncertainty and costs as arguments rage before the court about balancing expertise against the “real” nature of the question before the administrator, or whether the existence of a privative clause trumps the larger statutory purpose, and so on. And this is all mere preparation for the argument about the actual substance of the case. While a measure of uncertainty is inherent in the subject matter and unavoidable in litigation (otherwise there wouldn’t be any), we should at least (i) establish some presumptive rules and (ii) get the parties away from arguing about the tests and back to arguing about the substantive merits of their case.

[146] The going-in presumption should be that the standard of review of any administrative outcome on grounds of substance is not correctness but reasonableness (“contextually” applied). The fact that the legislature designated someone other than the court as the decision maker calls for deference to (or judicial respect for) the outcome, absent a broad statutory right of appeal. Administrative decisions generally call for the exercise of discretion. Everybody recognizes in such cases that there is no single “correct” outcome. It should also be presumed, in accordance with the ordinary rules of litigation, that the decision under review is reasonable until the applicant shows otherwise.

[147] An applicant urging the non-deferential “correctness” standard should be required to demonstrate that the decision under review rests on an error in the determination of a legal issue not confided (or which constitutionally could not be confided) to the administrative decision maker to decide, whether in relation to jurisdiction or the general law. Labour arbitrators, as in this case, command deference on legal matters within their enabling statute or on legal matters intimately connected thereto.

[148] When, then, should a decision be deemed “unreasonable”? My colleagues suggest a test of irrationality (para. 46), but the editors of de Smith point out that “many decisions which fall foul of [unreasonableness] have been coldly rational” (de Smith, Woolf & Jowell: Judicial Review of Administrative Action (5th ed. 1995), at para. 13-003). A decision meeting this description by this Court is C.U.P.E. v. Ontario (Minister of Labour), [2003] 1 S.C.R. 539, 2003 SCC 29, where the Minister’s appointment of retired judges with little experience in labour matters to chair “interest” arbitrations (as opposed to “grievance” arbitrations) between hospitals and hospital workers was “coldly rational” in terms of the Minister’s own agenda, but was held by a majority of this Court to be patently unreasonable in terms of the history, object and purpose of the authorizing legislation. He had not used the appointment power for the purposes for which the legislature had conferred it.

[149] Reasonableness rather than rationality has been the traditional standard and, properly interpreted, it works. That said, a single “reasonableness” standard will now necessarily incorporate both the degree of deference formerly reflected in the distinction between patent unreasonableness and reasonableness simpliciter, and an assessment of the range of options reasonably open to the decision maker in the circumstances, in light of the reasons given for the decision. Any reappraisal of our approach to judicial review should, I think, explicitly recognize these different dimensions to the “reasonableness” standard.

I. Judging “Reasonableness”

[150] I agree with my colleagues that “reasonableness” depends on the context. It must be calibrated to fit the circumstances. A driving speed that is “reasonable” when motoring along a four-lane interprovincial highway is not “reasonable” when driving along an inner city street. The standard (“reasonableness”) stays the same, but the reasonableness assessment will vary with the relevant circumstances.

[151] This, of course, is the nub of the difficulty. My colleagues write:

In judicial review, reasonableness is concerned mostly with the existence of justification, transparency and intelligibility within the decision-making process. But it is also concerned with whether the decision falls within a range of possible, acceptable outcomes which are defensible in respect of the facts and law. [para. 47]

I agree with this summary but what is required, with respect, is a more easily applied framework into which the judicial review court and litigants can plug in the relevant context. No one doubts that in order to overturn an administrative outcome on grounds of substance (i.e. leaving aside errors of fairness or law which lie within the supervising “function” of the courts), the reviewing court must be satisfied that the outcome was outside the scope of reasonable responses open to the decision maker under its grant of authority, usually a statute. “[T]here is always a perspective”, observed Rand J., “within which a statute is intended [by the legislature] to operate”: Roncarelli v. Duplessis, 1959 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1959] S.C.R. 121, at p. 140. How is that “perspective” to be ascertained? The reviewing judge will obviously want to consider the precise nature and function of the decision maker including its expertise, the terms and objectives of the governing statute (or common law) conferring the power of decision, including the existence of a privative clause and the nature of the issue being decided. Careful consideration of these matters will reveal the extent of the discretion conferred, for example, the extent to which the decision formulates or implements broad public policy. In such cases, the range of permissible considerations will obviously be much broader than where the decision to be made is more narrowly circumscribed, e.g., whether a particular claimant is entitled to a disability benefit under governmental social programs. In some cases, the court will have to recognize that the decision maker was required to strike a proper balance (or achieve proportionality) between the adverse impact of a decision on the rights and interests of the applicant or others directly affected weighed against the public purpose which is sought to be advanced. In each case, careful consideration will have to be given to the reasons given for the decision. To this list, of course, may be added as many “contextual” considerations as the court considers relevant and material.

[152] Some of these indicia were included from the outset in the pragmatic and functional test itself (see Bibeault, at p. 1088). The problem, however, is that under Bibeault, and the cases that followed it, these indicia were used to choose among the different standards of review, which were themselves considered more or less fixed. In Law Society of New Brunswick v. Ryan, for example, the Court rejected the argument that “it is sometimes appropriate to apply the reasonableness standard more deferentially and sometimes less deferentially depending on the circumstances” (para. 43). It seems to me that collapsing everything beyond “correctness” into a single “reasonableness” standard will require a reviewing court to do exactly that.

[153] The Court’s adoption in this case of a single “reasonableness” standard that covers both the degree of deference assessment and the reviewing court’s evaluation, in light of the appropriate degree of deference, of whether the decision falls within a range of reasonable administrative choices will require a reviewing court to juggle a number of variables that are necessarily to be considered together. Asking courts to have regard to more than one variable is not asking too much, in my opinion. In other disciplines, data are routinely plotted simultaneously along both an X axis and a Y axis, without traumatizing the participants.

[154] It is not as though we lack guidance in the decided cases. Much has been written by various courts about deference and reasonableness in the particular contexts of different administrative situations. Leaving aside the “pragmatic and functional” test, we have ample precedents to show when it is (or is not) appropriate for a court to intervene in the outcome of an administrative decision. The problem is that courts have lately felt obliged to devote too much time to multi-part threshold tests instead of focussing on the who, what, why and wherefor of the litigant’s complaint on its merits.

[155] That having been said, a reviewing court ought to recognize throughout the exercise that fundamentally the “reasonableness” of the outcome is an issue given to others to decide. The exercise of discretion is an important part of administrative decision making. Adoption of a single “reasonableness” standard should not be seen by potential litigants as a lowering of the bar to judicial intervention.

[156] Labour arbitrators often have to juggle different statutory provisions in disposing of a grievance. The courts have generally attached great importance to their expertise in keeping labour peace. In this case, the adjudicator was dealing with his “home statute” plus other statutes intimately linked to public sector relations in New Brunswick. He was working on his “home turf”, and the legislature has made clear in the privative clause that it intended the adjudicator to determine the outcome of the appellant’s grievance. In this field, quick and cheap justice (capped by finality) advances the achievement of the legislative scheme. Recourse to judicial review is discouraged. I would therefore apply a reasonableness standard to the adjudicator’s interpretation of his “home turf” statutory framework.

[157] Once under the flag of reasonableness, however, the salient question before the adjudicator in this case was essentially legal in nature, as reflected in the reasons he gave for his decision. He was not called on to implement public policy; nor was there a lot of discretion in dealing with a non-unionized employee. The basic facts were not in dispute. He was disposing of a lis which he believed to be governed by the legislation. He was right to be conscious of the impact of his decision on the appellant, but he stretched the law too far in coming to his rescue. I therefore join with my colleagues in dismissing the appeal.

The reasons of Deschamps, Charron and Rothstein JJ. were delivered by [158] DESCHAMPS J. — The law of judicial review of administrative action not only requires repairs, it needs to be cleared of superfluous discussions and processes. This area of the law can be simplified by examining the substance of the work courts are called upon to do when reviewing any case, whether it be in the context of administrative or of appellate review. Any review starts with the identification of the questions at issue as questions of law, questions of fact or questions of mixed fact and law. Very little else needs to be done in order to determine whether deference needs to be shown to an administrative body.

[159] By virtue of the Constitution, superior courts are the only courts that possess inherent jurisdiction. They are responsible both for applying the laws enacted by Parliament and the legislatures and for insuring that statutory bodies respect their legal boundaries. Parliament and the legislatures cannot totally exclude judicial oversight without overstepping the division between legislative or executive powers and judicial powers. Superior courts are, in the end, the protectors of the integrity of the rule of law and the justice system. Judicial review of administrative action is rooted in these fundamental principles and its boundaries are largely informed by the roles of the respective branches of government.

[160] The judicial review of administrative action has, over the past 20 years, been viewed as involving a preliminary analysis of whether deference is owed to an administrative body based on four factors: (1) the nature of the question, (2) the presence or absence of a privative clause, (3) the expertise of the administrative decision maker and (4) the object of the statute. The process of answering this preliminary question has become more complex than the determination of the substantive questions the court is called upon to resolve. In my view, the analysis can be made plainer if the focus is placed on the issues the parties need to have adjudicated rather than on the nature of the judicial review process itself. By focusing first on “the nature of the question”, to use what has become familiar parlance, it will become apparent that all four factors need not be considered in every case and that the judicial review of administrative action is often not distinguishable from the appellate review of court decisions.

[161] Questions before the courts have consistently been identified as either questions of fact, questions of law or questions of mixed fact and law. Whether undergoing appellate review or administrative law review, decisions on questions of fact always attract deference. The use of different terminology — “palpable and overriding error” versus “unreasonable decision” — does not change the substance of the review. Indeed, in the context of appellate review of court decisions, this Court has recognized that these expressions as well as others all encapsulate the same principle of deference with respect to a trial judge’s findings of fact: H.L. v. Canada (Attorney General), [2005] 1 S.C.R. 401, 2005 SCC 25, at paras. 55-56. Therefore, when the issue is limited to questions of fact, there is no need to enquire into any other factor in order to determine that deference is owed to an administrative decision maker.

[162] Questions of law, by contrast, require more thorough scrutiny when deference is evaluated, and the particular context of administrative decision making can make judicial review different than appellate review. Although superior courts have a core expertise to interpret questions of law, Parliament or a legislature may have provided that the decision of an administrative body is protected from judicial review by a privative clause. When an administrative body is created to interpret and apply certain legal rules, it develops specific expertise in exercising its jurisdiction and has a more comprehensive view of those rules. Where there is a privative clause, Parliament or a legislature’s intent to leave the final decision to that body cannot be doubted and deference is usually owed to the body.

[163] However, privative clauses cannot totally shield an administrative body from review. Parliament, or a legislature, cannot have intended that the body would be protected were it to overstep its delegated powers. Moreover, if such a body is asked to interpret laws in respect of which it does not have expertise, the constitutional responsibility of the superior courts as guardians of the rule of law compels them to insure that laws falling outside an administrative body’s core expertise are interpreted correctly. This reduced deference insures that laws of general application, such as the Constitution, the common law and the Civil Code, are interpreted correctly and consistently. Consistency of the law is of prime societal importance. Finally, deference is not owed on questions of law where Parliament or a legislature has provided for a statutory right of review on such questions.

[164] The category of questions of mixed fact and law should be limited to cases in which the determination of a legal issue is inextricably intertwined with the determination of facts. Often, an administrative body will first identify the rule and then apply it. Identifying the contours and the content of a legal rule are questions of law. Applying the rule, however, is a question of mixed fact and law. When considering a question of mixed fact and law, a reviewing court should show an adjudicator the same deference as an appeal court would show a lower court.

[165] In addition, Parliament or a legislature may confer a discretionary power on an administrative body. Since the case at bar does not concern a discretionary power, it will suffice for the purposes of these reasons to note that, in any analysis, deference is owed to an exercise of discretion unless the body has exceeded its mandate.

[166] In summary, in the adjudicative context, the same deference is owed in respect of questions of fact and questions of mixed fact and law on administrative review as on an appeal from a court decision. A decision on a question of law will also attract deference, provided it concerns the interpretation of the enabling statute and provided there is no right of review.

[167] I would be remiss were I to disregard the difficulty inherent in any exercise of deference. In Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 77, 2003 SCC 63, LeBel J. explained why a distinction between the standards of patent unreasonableness and unreasonableness simpliciter is untenable. I agree. The problem with the definitions resides in attempts by the courts to enclose the concept of reasonableness in a formula fitting all cases. No matter how this Court defines this concept, any context considered by a reviewing court will, more often than not, look more like a rainbow than a black and white situation. One cannot change this reality. I use the word “deference” to define the contours of reasonableness because it describes the attitude adopted towards the decision maker. The word “reasonableness” concerns the decision. However, neither the concept of reasonableness nor that of deference is particular to the field of administrative law. These concepts are also found in the context of criminal and civil appellate review of court decisions. Yet, the exercise of the judicial supervisory role in those fields has not given rise to the complexities encountered in administrative law. The process of stepping back and taking an ex post facto look at the decision to determine whether there is an error justifying intervention should not be more complex in the administrative law context than in the criminal and civil law contexts.

[168] In the case at bar, the adjudicator was asked to adjudicate the grievance of a non-unionized employee. This meant that he had to identify the rules governing the contract. Identifying those rules is a question of law. Section 20 of the Civil Service Act, S.N.B. 1984, c. C-5.1, incorporates the rules of the common law, which accordingly become the starting point of the analysis. The adjudicator had to decide whether those rules had been ousted by the Public Service Labour Relations Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. P-25 (“PSLRA”), as applied, mutatis mutandis, to the case of a non-unionized employee (ss. 97(2.1), 100.1(2) and 100.1(5)). The common law rules relating to the dismissal of an employee differ completely from the ones provided for in the PSLRA that the adjudicator is regularly required to interpret. Since the common law, not the adjudicator’s enabling statute, is the starting point of the analysis, and since the adjudicator does not have specific expertise in interpreting the common law, the reviewing court does not have to defer to his decision on the basis of expertise. This leads me to conclude that the reviewing court can proceed to its own interpretation of the rules applicable to the non-unionized employee’s contract of employment and determine whether the adjudicator could enquire into the cause of the dismissal. The applicable standard of review is correctness.

[169] It is clear from the adjudicator's reasoning that he did not even consider the common law rules. He said:

An employee to whom section 20 of the Civil Service Act and section 100.1 of the PSLR Act apply may be discharged for cause, with reasonable notice or with severance pay in lieu of reasonable notice. A discharge for cause may be for disciplinary or non-disciplinary reasons. [p. 5]

[170] The employer's common law right to dismiss without cause is not alluded to in this key passage of the decision. Unlike a unionized employee, a non-unionized employee does not have employment security. His or her employment may be terminated without cause. The corollary of the employer's right to dismiss without cause is the employee's right to reasonable notice or to compensation in lieu of notice. The distinction between the common law rules of employment and the statutory rules applicable to a unionized employee is therefore essential if s. 97(2.1) is to be applied mutatis mutandis to the case of a non-unionized employee as required by s. 100.1(5). The adjudicator's failure to inform himself of this crucial difference led him to look for a cause, which was not relevant in the context of a dismissal without cause. In a case involving dismissal without cause, only the amount of the compensation or the length of the notice is relevant. In a case involving dismissal for cause, the employer takes the position that no compensation or notice is owed to the employee. This was not such a case. In the case at bar, the adjudicator's role was limited to evaluating the length of the notice. He erred in interpreting s. 97(2.1) in a vacuum. He overlooked the common law rules, misinterpreted s. 100.1(5) and applied s. 97(2.1) literally to the case of a non-unionized employee.

[171] This case is one where, even if deference had been owed to the adjudicator, his interpretation could not have stood. The legislature could not have intended to grant employment security to non-unionized employees while providing only that the PSLRA was to apply mutatis mutandis. This right is so fundamental to an employment relationship that it could not have been granted in so indirect and obscure a manner.

[172] In this case, the Court has been given both an opportunity and the responsibility to simplify and clarify the law of judicial review of administrative action. The judicial review of administrative action need not be a complex area of law in itself. Every day, reviewing courts decide cases raising multiple questions, some of fact, some of mixed fact and law and some purely of law; in various contexts, the first two of these types of questions tend to require deference, while the third often does not. Reviewing courts are already amply equipped to resolve such questions and do not need a specialized analytical toolbox in order to review administrative decisions.

[173] On the issue of natural justice, I agree with my colleagues. On the result, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

APPENDIX

Relevant Statutory Provisions

Civil Service Act, S.N.B. 1984, c. C-5.1

20 Subject to the provisions of this Act or any other Act, termination of the employment of a deputy head or an employee shall be governed by the ordinary rules of contract.

Public Service Labour Relations Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. P-25

92(1) Where an employee has presented a grievance up to and including the final level in the grievance process with respect to

(a) the interpretation or application in respect of him of a provision of a collective agreement or an arbitral award, or

(b) disciplinary action resulting in discharge, suspension or a financial penalty, and his grievance has not been dealt with to his satisfaction, he may, subject to subsection (2), refer the grievance to adjudication.

Public Service Labour Relations Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. P-25, as amended

97(2.1) Where an adjudicator determines that an employee has been discharged or otherwise disciplined by the employer for cause and the collective agreement or arbitral award does not contain a specific penalty for the infraction that resulted in the employee being discharged or otherwise disciplined, the adjudicator may substitute such other penalty for the discharge or discipline as to the adjudicator seems just and reasonable in all the circumstances.

...

100.1(2) An employee who is not included in a bargaining unit may, in the manner, form and within such time as may be prescribed, present to the employer a grievance with respect to discharge, suspension or a financial penalty.

100.1(3) Where an employee has presented a grievance in accordance with subsection (2) and the grievance has not been dealt with to the employee's satisfaction, the employee may refer the grievance to the Board who shall, in the manner and within such time as may be prescribed, refer the grievance to an adjudicator appointed by the Board.

...

100.1(5) Sections 19, 97, 98.1, 101, 108 and 111 apply mutatis mutandis to an adjudicator to whom a grievance has been referred in accordance with subsection (3) and in relation to any decision rendered by such adjudicator.

...

101(1) Except as provided in this Act, every order, award, direction, decision, declaration or ruling of the Board, an arbitration tribunal or an adjudicator is final and shall not be questioned or reviewed in any court.

101(2) No order shall be made or process entered, and no proceedings shall be taken in any court, whether by way of injunction, judicial review, or otherwise, to question, review, prohibit or restrain the Board, an arbitration tribunal or an adjudicator in any of its or his proceedings.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant: Stewart McKelvey, Fredericton.

Solicitor for the respondent: Attorney General of New Brunswick, Fredericton.

TAB 12

R. v. Evans, 1991 CanLII 98 (SCC), [1991] 1 SCR 869

Source:	Supreme Court of Canada
Date:	1991-04-18
File number:	21375
Other citations:	124 NR 278 — 4 CR (4th) 144 — 63 CCC (3d) 289 — 12 WCB (2d) 579 — 3 CRR (2d) 315 — [1991] CarswellBC 417 — JE 91-689 — [1991] SCJ No 31 (QL)
Citation:	R. v. Evans, 1991 CanLII 98 (SCC), [1991] 1 SCR 869, < https://canlii.ca/t/1fsml >, retrieved on 2026-03-22
Most recent unfavourable mention	R v. Bilyea , 2013 ONSC 1454 (CanLII) [...] The subject case is distinguishable from the Evans , Borden and Sawatsky trilogy because the Applicant was not at risk of self-incrimination in relation to the other offence, that is, the Peace Garden incident. [...]

R. v. Evans, [1991] 1 S.C.R. 869

Wesley Gareth Evans Appellant

v.

Her Majesty The Queen

Respondent

Indexed as: R. v. Evans

File No.: 21375.

1991: January 21; 1991: April 18.

Present: Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin and Stevenson JJ.

on appeal from the court of appeal for british columbia

Constitutional law -- Charter of Rights -- Right to be advised of reason for detention -- Right to counsel -- Accused not understanding right -- Police initially investigating drug offence -- Investigation changing to murder investigation -- Accused initially waived right to counsel -- Accused not formally informed of change of nature of investigation -- Accused not informed of right to counsel when nature of investigation changed -- Incriminating statements made during investigation -- Whether or not infringement of accused's right to be informed of reason for detention -- Whether or not infringement of accused's right to counsel -- Whether or not statements should be excluded for bringing administration of justice into disrepute -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 10(a), (b), 24(2).

Evidence -- Admissibility -- Charter of Rights -- Right to be advised of reason for detention -- Right to counsel -- Accused not understanding right -- Police initially investigating drug offence -- Investigation changing to murder investigation -- Accused initially waived right to counsel -- Accused not formally informed of change of nature of investigation -- Accused not informed of right to counsel when nature of investigation changed -- Incriminating statements made during investigation -- Whether or not infringement of accused's right to be informed of reason for detention -- Whether or not infringement of accused's right to counsel -- Whether or not statements should be excluded for bringing administration of justice into disrepute -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 10(a), (b), 24(2).

Appellant, a youth of subnormal mental capacity, was convicted of first degree murder in the brutal killings of two women. Initially, the police thought his brother had committed the murders and arrested the appellant on a marijuana charge in the hope that he would be able to provide evidence against his brother. The police informed Evans of his right to counsel but were given a negative answer when asked if he understood his rights. Any understanding that the accused may have had of his rights was confined to a garbled version based on American television. No attempt was made to communicate the meaning of his right to counsel to him. During the course of the interrogation that followed, Evans became the prime suspect in the two murders. The police did not formally advise the appellant that he was then being detained for murder, nor did they reiterate his right to counsel. The police investigation was aggressive and marked by their lying about finding the appellant's fingerprint at one of the murder scenes. Eventually incriminating statements were obtained from the appellant. These statements formed virtually the entire basis of his conviction for the two murders. An appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed. At issue here is whether appellant's rights under ss. 7, 10(a) and 10(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms were violated so that the resultant confessions should have been excluded pursuant to s. 24(2) of the Charter.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

Per Gonthier, Cory and McLachlin JJ.: The right to be promptly advised of the reason for one's detention embodied in s. 10(a) of the Charter is founded most fundamentally on the notion that one is not obliged to submit to an arrest if one does not know the reasons for it. A second aspect of the right lies in its role as an adjunct to the right to counsel conferred by s. 10(b) of the Charter. In interpreting s. 10(a) in a purposive manner, regard must be had to the double rationale underlying the right.

When considering whether there has been a breach of s. 10(a) of the Charter, the substance of what the accused can reasonably be supposed to have understood, rather than the formalism of the precise words used, must govern. What the accused was told, viewed reasonably in all the circumstances of the case, must be sufficient to permit him to make a reasonable decision to decline to submit to arrest or, alternatively, to undermine his right to counsel under s. 10(b).

The police indicated that they were investigating the appellant for murder shortly after he became the prime suspect in the killings and the appellant in turn seemed to recognize that the nature of the questioning had altered. The appellant therefore was given the facts relevant to determining whether he should continue to submit to the detention. Any failure to comply with s. 10(b) cannot be attributed to failure to advise the accused of the reasons why his detention and questioning was continuing.

The police did not comply with s. 10(b) at the time of the initial arrest. Although they informed the appellant of his right to counsel, they did not explain that right when he indicated that he did not understand it. A person who does not understand his or her right cannot be expected to assert it. The purpose of s. 10(b) is to require the police to communicate the right to counsel to the detainee. In most cases one can infer from the circumstances that the accused understands what he has been told. But where, as here, there is a positive indication that the accused does not understand his right to counsel, the police cannot rely on their mechanical recitation of the right to the accused; they must take steps to facilitate that understanding.

A second violation of the appellant's s. 10(b) right occurred when the police failed to reiterate the appellant's right to counsel after the nature of their investigation changed and the appellant became a suspect in the two killings. The police have a duty to advise the accused of his or her right to counsel a second time when new circumstances arise indicating that the accused is a suspect for a different, more serious crime than was the case at the time of the first warning. The accused's decision as to whether to obtain a lawyer may well be affected by the seriousness of the charge. The new circumstances may require reconsideration of an initial waiver of the right to counsel. The police in the course of an exploratory investigation, however, need not reiterate the right to counsel every time that the investigation touches on a different offence.

The reception of the appellant's statements would tend to bring the administration of justice into disrepute. Three broad categories of factors bear on a s. 24(2) determination: (a) the effect of the admission of the evidence on the fairness of the trial; (b) the seriousness of the Charter violation; and, (c) the effect of exclusion on the repute of the administration of justice.

The admission of appellant's statements, which were essential to his conviction, worked an unfairness against him. Using an incriminating statement, obtained from an accused in violation of his rights, generally results in unfairness because it infringes his privilege against self-incrimination and does so in a most prejudicial way -- by supplying evidence which would not be otherwise available. There can be no greater unfairness to an accused than to convict him or her by use of unreliable evidence. Here the appellant's deficient mental state, combined with the circumstances in which the statements were taken, cast significant doubt on their reliability.

The violation of the accused's right to counsel was very serious. The police, despite knowledge of the appellant's deficient mental status and despite his statement to them that he did not understand his right to counsel, proceeded to subject him to a series of interviews and other investigative techniques. Moreover, they lied to him in the course of the interviews, falsely suggesting that his fingerprint had been found. The pressure the police were under to find a suspect did not justify their conducting repeated and dishonest interrogations of a weak person in violation of his Charter rights. The seriousness of this Charter violation was not mitigated by appellant's notion of his rights. This "understanding" was confined to a garbled version based on American television. The appellant had, moreover, initially asserted to the police that he did not understand what his right to counsel entailed.

The exclusion of this evidence would not bring the administration of justice into disrepute. Its admission was not required in order to avoid the disrepute that would follow the acquittal of a self-confessed killer on the basis of Charter infringement. Such reasoning was flawed because it rests on the questionable assumption that the confessions were reliable and true. More fundamentally, it rests on the assumption that the appellant is guilty. The appellant was entitled not to be found guilty except upon a fair trial. To justify the unfairness of his trial by presuming his guilt is to stand matters on their head and violate that most fundamental of rights, the presumption of innocence. Few things could be more calculated to bring the administration of justice into disrepute than to permit the imprisonment of a man without a fair trial. As a practical matter, it cannot be said that such imprisonment would prevent further murders by the killer. Only a conviction after a fair trial based on reliable evidence could give the public that assurance.

Per Sopinka J.: The conclusions of McLachlin J. with respect to ss. 10(b) and 24(2) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms were agreed with. Section 10(a) was violated as well.

Section 10(a) requires that a person be informed of the reasons for the arrest or detention so that he or she can immediately undertake his or her defence, including a decision as to what response, if any, to make to the accusation. This information should therefore be conveyed prior to questioning and obtaining a response from the person under arrest or detention.

The initial questions put before an incriminatory response is obtained can, but did not here, disclose the true ground for an arrest. The appellant, whose mental development was equated to that of a 14-year-old, should not have been required to deduce from the content of questions that the initial explicit reason for his arrest had shifted to a far more serious ground. The arresting officers had advised him that he was in jeopardy for trafficking in narcotics and were obliged to disabuse him of this false information before seeking to elicit incriminatory evidence from him. This could only be accomplished by an equally explicit statement of the true ground for his arrest.

Per Stevenson J.: The police violated s. 10(b) of the Charter in failing to make a reasonable effort to explain to the accused his right to counsel and the appeal should be allowed solely on this ground. This was not a case in which to decide whether there is an obligation to reiterate the right to counsel when the course of the investigation takes some change.

Section 10 does not apply to police investigations or questioning in the absence of detention. The object of the section is to provide safeguards in the circumstances of detention. On one hand, the police may be found to have detained someone on one charge with the object of questioning on another charge. On the other extreme, there can be cases in which an accused under detention fortuitously discloses information relating to other activities. These raise fact issues not dependent on the nature or seriousness of the other activities. One extreme would be readily characterized as an abuse of the detention and a violation of s. 10(a) and (b), while the other does not appear to violate the section.

McLachlin J.'s analysis and application of s. 24 of the Charter was agreed with.

Cases Cited

By McLachlin J.

Referred to: R. v. Kelly (1985), 1985 CanLII 3483 (ON CA), 17 C.C.C. (3d) 419; R. v. Black, 1989 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 138; R. v. Manninen, 1987 CanLII 67 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1233; R. v. Ross, 1989 CanLII 134 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 3; R. v. Anderson (1984), 1984 CanLII 2197 (ON CA), 10 C.C.C. (3d) 417; R. v. Nelson (1982), 1982 CanLII 3760 (MB QB), 32 C.R. (3d) 256; R. v. Broyles (1987), 1987 ABCA 222 (CanLII), 82 A.R. 238; Clarkson v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 61 (SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 383; Korponay v. Attorney General of Canada, 1982 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 41; R. v. Collins, 1987 CanLII 84 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265.

By Sopinka J.

Referred to: Christie v. Leachinsky, [1947] A.C. 573.

By Stevenson J.

Distinguished: R. v. Broyles (1987), 1987 ABCA 222 (CanLII), 82 A.R. 238; referred to: R. v. Black, 1989 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 138.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 7, 10(a), (b), 24(2).

Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, s. 218.

APPEAL from a judgment of the British Columbia Court of Appeal (1988), 1988 CanLII 3282 \(BC CA\), 45 C.C.C. (3d) 523, dismissing an appeal from conviction by Callaghan J. sitting with jury. Appeal allowed.

Glen Orris, Q.C., for the appellant.

John E. Hall, Q.C., for the respondent.

//Sopinka J.//

The following are the reasons delivered by

SOPINKA J. -- I agree with the conclusion reached by Justice McLachlin with respect to s. 10\(b\) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and that the admission of the statements would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. I also agree with her disposition of the appeal. As was Southin J.A., however, I am of the opinion that s. 10\(a\) was violated as well.

Section 10(a) and (b) set out very fundamental rights of a person arrested or detained. The instructions to the authorities which they contain are relatively simple. In each case, the detainee is to be "informed". In the case of s. 10\(a\), the right is to be informed of the reasons for the arrest or detention. The right to be informed of the true grounds for the arrest or detention is firmly rooted in the common law which required that the detainee be informed in sufficient detail that he or she "knows in substance the reason why it is claimed that this restraint should be imposed" (Christie v. Leachinsky, [1947] A.C. 573, at pp. 587-88). When an arrest is made pursuant to a warrant, this is set out in writing in the warrant. An arrest without warrant is only lawful if the type of information which would have been contained in the warrant is conveyed orally. The purpose of communicating this information to the accused in either case is, inter alia, to enable the person under arrest or detention to immediately undertake his or her defence, including a decision as to what response, if any, to make to the accusation. It seems axiomatic, therefore, that this information should be conveyed prior to questioning and obtaining a response from the person under arrest or detention. These basic and important values are included in s. 10(a) of the Charter.

In this case, the arresting officers were forewarned that they were dealing with a person of subnormal intelligence. In these circumstances, it was incumbent on them to be scrupulous in ensuring that his rights were respected. Instead, they concocted a ground for the arrest in order to question him about the involvement of his brother in the murders. In my opinion, having explicitly advised the appellant that he was in jeopardy for trafficking in narcotics, the arresting officers were obliged to disabuse him of this false information before seeking to elicit incriminatory evidence from him. This could only be accomplished by an equally explicit statement of the true ground for his arrest.

While in some circumstances the initial questions, which are put before an incriminatory response is obtained, may disclose the true ground for an arrest, in my opinion this is not such a case. The appellant, whose mental development was equated to that of a 14-year-old, should not have been required to deduce from the content of questions that the initial explicit reason for his arrest had shifted to a far more serious ground.

I have agreed that the statements referred to in the reasons of McLachlin J. should be excluded by reason of the violation of s. 10(b). The violation of s. 10(a) gives added support to the reasons for such exclusion.

//McLachlin J.//

The judgment of Gonthier, Cory and McLachlin JJ. was delivered by

MCLACHLIN J. --

Introduction

The appellant Evans, a youth of subnormal mental capacity, was convicted of first degree murder in the brutal killings of two women. Initially, the police thought his brother had committed the murders, and arrested the appellant on a marijuana charge in the hope that he would be able to provide evidence against his brother. The police informed Evans of his right to counsel, but when asked if he understood his rights he replied: "No". During the course of the interrogation that followed, Evans became the prime suspect in the two murders. The police did not formally advise the appellant that he was then being detained for murder, nor did they reiterate his right to counsel. Eventually incriminating statements were obtained from the appellant. These statements formed virtually the entire basis of his conviction for the two murders.

The appellant appeals his conviction to this Court both as of right and by leave. He argues, inter alia, that his rights under ss. 7, 10(a) and 10(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms were violated and that the resultant confessions should have been excluded pursuant to s. 24(2) of the Charter.

I have concluded that the appeal should be allowed on the basis that the statements were obtained in violation of the appellant's right to counsel, as guaranteed by s. 10(b) of the Charter, and that the repute of the administration of justice requires their exclusion under s. 24(2) of the Charter.

Facts

The appellant was convicted by a jury of first degree murder contrary to s. 218 (now s. 235) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, in relation to the deaths of Lavonne Cheryl Willems and Beverley Mary-Ann Seto. The British Columbia Court of Appeal (Hutcheon J.A. dissenting) dismissed an appeal from that verdict.

The body of Ms. Willems was discovered on November 24, 1984 in a home in Matsqui. She had been in the home alone, house sitting while the residents were away on vacation. In addition to having received some minor bruises, her body had been stabbed 25 times. Some months later on March 31, 1985, the body of Ms. Seto was discovered in the bedroom of a newly constructed house in Abbotsford. Ms. Seto was a real estate agent and had been conducting an open house at the home.

She, too, died as a result of multiple stab wounds as well as a severe cutting wound to the front of the neck.

The appellant Evans was born on July 7, 1964. At the age of 9 he was hit by a truck at a cross-walk and suffered brain injuries. Two years later as a result of an accident with a cigarette lighter he suffered extensive third degree burns to the upper part of his body. He has undergone numerous skin grafts to his torso in order to repair the burn damage and remains heavily scarred. He has attained a grade 5 or 6 equivalency in education and spent many years in rehabilitation for "the brain-injured victim" to improve his coordination, speech and living skills. A psychiatrist and a psychologist, who examined him after he was charged, concluded that he has an IQ between 60 and 80 (borderline retardation) and functions at an emotional level of a 14-year-old.

The appellant was arrested on August 1, 1985 along with his older brother, Ron Evans. At the time, Ron Evans was the principal suspect in the murders of Ms. Willems and Ms. Seto. The appellant was ostensibly brought in on a charge of trafficking in narcotics (the police, in the course of their investigation of Ron Evans, had obtained some wiretap evidence indicating that the appellant may have been involved in the sale of a small amount of marijuana), but the police acknowledge that a collateral purpose in arresting the appellant was to try to obtain evidence against Ron Evans, with whom the appellant lived, in relation to the murders of Ms. Willems and Ms. Seto. Some time during the course of the police's first interview with the appellant, police suspicion turned to the appellant and he became the prime suspect in the murders of Ms. Willems and Ms. Seto.

Prior to arresting the appellant, the arresting officers, Detectives Brian Metzgnier and John Spring, had been informed of the appellant's mental deficiency and were cautioned to make sure that the appellant understood the warnings given to him. The arrest took place at 9:52 a.m., shortly after the appellant's brother, Ron Evans, had been arrested and taken from the house. Detective Metzgnier informed the appellant that: "I am arresting you for trafficking in narcotics". He then gave the appellant the Charter warning and the standard police warning in the following terms: "It is my duty to inform you that you have the right to retain and instruct counsel without delay. You are not obliged to say anything but anything you do say may be given in evidence. Do you understand?". To the question: "Do you understand?", the appellant replied: "No". Detective Metzger then instructed the appellant that, "You have to come down to the police office with us now for trafficking in narcotics". No attempt was made to explain the Charter or police warning to the appellant.

While the appellant was in custody, the following events occurred: Detectives Metzger and Spring interviewed the appellant on three occasions; an undercover officer was placed in the same cell as the appellant (the "cell plant interviews"); the detectives took the appellant to the scenes of the crimes (the "show and tell expedition"); a police physician interviewed the appellant; and a telephone conversation between the appellant and his oldest brother, Tim Evans, was recorded.

At the commencement of the first interview (10:59 a.m. -- 12:11 p.m.), the following exchange took place:

JS: Okay Wesley, you understand why you're here, eh?

WE: Yes sir, I do.

JS:I think that to explain the prior, that um you are not obliged to say anything unless you wish to do so, but anything you do say, may be given in evidence. And ah I'll also add, we'd like to cancel the delay which was explained to you earlier. You're on a charge of trafficking in soft drugs

WE:. Yes sir.

JS:. and ah it's um marijuana. Do you know what marijuana is?

WE:Yes sir, I do.

JS:And ah you've heard the allegations and anything you'd like to say to us with regards to the allegations being made to you.

WE:No sir. [Emphasis added.]

The emphasized portion was the subject of a dispute at trial. Detective Metzger testified on the voir dire at trial that the sentence should read: "I'd like to say you have the right to counsel without delay which was explained to you earlier". However, Crown counsel, Mr. Gillen, stated that he didn't "come close to" sharing Detective Metzger's interpretation of the sentence and stated that in his view the sentence was correctly transcribed. The trial judge, after listening to the tape himself, ultimately accepted Detective Metzger's version.

During this first interview, the appellant admitted to involvement in a plan to sell marijuana to a girl known to him. Toward the end of the interview the police's focus began to shift, as the following excerpt demonstrates:

WE:Are you saying that I killed that lady?

BM:Did you Wes?

WE:Nuts no.

BM:Do you know who did?

WE:No. I don't know. I don't even know why I'm here.

JS:Well, we already explained to you about that earlier on when you were here.

WE:Yeah but

JS: This is quite a serious offence (we're talking about).

WE:(Why me)?

JS: (LONG PAUSE) To traffic marijuana, that was originally why we're here. But now that things have taken quite a change.

WE:Yeah but why are you asking me this? I never killed no one I don't know who did. It's none of my business.

The second interview (1:32 p.m. -- 2:27 p.m.) began with Detective Metzger informing the appellant that he was not compelled to say anything. Referring to a search of the appellant's residence that had occurred between the first and the second interviews, Detective Spring also stated the following at the outset of the second interview:

JS:And we've come up with a few little things which ah I feel are um important in this case and that um ah they also um point to towards you as possibly being the person who committed that crime that night that we were discussing.

During the interview, the following exchange also took place:

BM:(LONG PAUSE) Why can you not explain, or can you give us an explanation as to why your fingerprint would be found inside the house?

WE:(LONG PAUSE) I can't give you an explanation.

BM:No?

WE:Although, all's I can say is I wasn't inside that house. (LONG PAUSE) You said tell the truth right? I'm tellin' the truth.

In suggesting that the appellant's fingerprints were found in the home where Ms. Seto was killed, Detective Metzger lied to the appellant; none of the fingerprints found matched those of the appellant. Nevertheless, by the end of the second interview the appellant had confessed to the killing of Ms. Seto.

By the end of the third interview (3:14 p.m. -- 4:02 p.m.) the appellant had also confessed to the killing of Ms. Willems. With the possible exception of the disputed passage at the commencement of the first interview, at no time during the three interviews was the appellant informed of his right to counsel.

After the interviews, the appellant was placed in a cell where his conversations with an undercover police officer in the cell next to his were recorded. The appellant had two conversations with the undercover officer, Constable Lee Ryan. The first took place between 4:20 p.m. and 5:25 p.m., while the second lasted from 7:30 p.m. to 8:32 p.m. During these conversations, the following exchanges took place:

LR:You confessed?

WE:Yeah.

LR:Did you do it?

WE:No.

LR:Well why did you confess.

WE:Well they, they wouldn't give me a rest until I confessed.

LR:Oh.

WE:So what else, what else was I gonna do

. . .

WE:I wonder if they'd give me a chance and let me talk to a lawyer? I hope so. Cause with a lawyer maybe things could go a little better with me, or for me I should say.

. . .

WE: You know it's funny, I don't remember killing them.

LR: No?

WE: Um-um.

LR: Yeah that is funny.

WE: Yeah. Usually I won't forget somein [sic] like that.

Prior to the third exchange reproduced above, the appellant had told the undercover officer that he had killed Ms. Willems and Ms. Seto.

Between the two conversations with the undercover officer, Detectives Metzger and Spring took the appellant to the scenes of the two killings. No evidence was found on this "show and tell expedition", but at one point the appellant did tell the detectives that: "I was going to kill again but I didn't have anyone picked out though".

At approximately 8:30 p.m. that evening the appellant was taken from his cell and asked to provide a written statement. Prior to the writing of the statement the appellant was asked if he wanted to speak to a lawyer. He stated that he did. He was directed to a telephone and provided with a phone book but returned a minute later stating that he was unable to reach a lawyer; he had been advised on the telephone that his lawyer was on vacation and could not be reached at that time. Detective Metzger then told the appellant that he could either contact his lawyer later or continue with the written statement. The appellant stated that he would proceed with the written statement. During the next hour the appellant then wrote a two-paragraph statement in which he confessed to the two killings.

Later that evening, the appellant was introduced to Dr. Swanney, a general practitioner who had come to take hair and blood samples from him. During this interview, the appellant told Dr. Swanney that he had killed the two women because of his frustration with women in general. This, incidentally, is consistent with a suggestion put to the appellant by Detectives Metzger and Spring during their interrogation of him. The appellant also informed Dr. Swanney that he expected to receive 25 years in jail for the crimes.

The following morning, the appellant spoke with his brother, Tim Evans, on the telephone.

The conversation was recorded, and the following exchanges occurred:

TE:Your rights? Do you know what your rights are?

WE:Yeah, the right to remain silent, I know.

TE:Well tell me. Let, let me hear it. Wha-, what kinda rights do you have?

WE:I have the right to remain silent, if I give up the right to remain silent, anything I can and say will be used against me in a court of law. I have a right to speak with an attorney, or to have an attorney present during questioning.

TE:Yeah?

WE:I know that.

TE:How many times did they say that to ya? How many times? Once?

WE:More than once, a couple.

TE:Yeah?

WE:They didn't ask me if I wanted a lawyer until just before I filled out the ass- the assessment, or statement I mean.

TE:Did you know that you had, you were entitled to a lawyer or?

WE:Oh yeah, I know, I watch T.V. man, I know what's goin' on.

...

TE:Are you guilty?

WE:No.

Judgments

At trial, a voir dire was held to determine the admissibility of the oral and written statements made by the appellant while in custody. The appellant argued the statements were not freely and voluntarily made and had been obtained in violation of ss. 10(a) and (b) of the Charter and ought to be excluded from evidence pursuant to s. 24(2) of the Charter. Callaghan J. rejected these arguments and held that the statements were admissible. In his view, the statements were voluntary, and the appellant's rights under the Charter had not been violated. At the time of his arrest, he had been properly advised of the reasons for his arrest and his right to counsel. Moreover, he had offered his knowledge of these rights in the telephone conversation with his brother.

Finally, even if there had been a breach of the Charter, Callaghan J. was of the view that admission of the evidence in these circumstances would not bring the administration of justice into disrepute under s. 24(2) of the Charter, since the officers had acted in good faith.

The majority of the British Columbia Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. Southin J.A. wrote the principal judgment of the Court of Appeal. She agreed that the statements were voluntary. While she concluded there had been a breach of s. 10(a) of the Charter by reason of the failure of the police to advise Evans at the critical juncture that he was under arrest for murder, she found no breach of his s. 10(b) right to be advised of his right to counsel. On the assumption, however, that both ss. 10(a) and 10(b) had been breached, Southin J. concluded that the evidence should be admitted under s. 24(2) since nothing could bring the administration of justice into greater disrepute than freeing a confessed murderer to kill again, notwithstanding a violation of the Charter.

Craig J.A. agreed that the appeal should be dismissed and added comments with respect to the voluntariness of statements made by the appellant and the Charter issues. He was of the view there had been no breach of s. 10(b) and was doubtful whether s. 10(a) had been violated. Even if there had been a breach of s. 10(a) by virtue of the failure of the police to inform the appellant during the second interview that he was being detained as a suspect in the killings of the two women, Craig J.A. would not have excluded the evidence under s. 24(2), in view of the seriousness of the charges and Evans' statement on the "show and tell" expedition that he would have killed again.

Hutcheon J.A. dissented. He held that the appellant's s. 10(b) right had been infringed and that the four statements made by the appellant on the day of his arrest ought to have been excluded under s. 24(2) of the Charter, in view of the serious and deceptive nature of the police violations of the Charter and the suspected reliability of the statements, given Evans' immaturity and defective mental capacity.

Relevant Legislation

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

10. Everyone has the right on arrest or detention

(a) to be informed promptly of the reasons therefor;

(b) to retain and instruct counsel without delay and to be informed of that right; . . .

24. . . .

(2) Where, in proceedings under subsection (1), a court concludes that evidence was obtained in a manner that infringed or denied any rights or freedoms guaranteed by this Charter, the evidence shall be excluded if it is established that, having regard to all the circumstances, the admission of it in the proceedings would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

Issues

(1) Were the appellant's s. 10(a) rights infringed or denied and if so should the evidence obtained be excluded pursuant to s. 24(2) of the Charter?

(2) Were the appellant's s. 10(b) rights infringed or denied and if so should the evidence obtained be excluded pursuant to s. 24(2) of the Charter?

(3) Were the undercover cell plant statements obtained in a manner that infringed the appellant's s. 7 rights and if so, should the evidence be excluded pursuant to s. 24(2) of the Charter?

(4) Were the statements made by the appellant to the police voluntarily made and hence admissible into evidence?

(5) Did the trial judge err by failing to adequately review for the jury the defence and the evidence in support thereof?

Analysis

1. Section 10(a) of the Charter

The right to be promptly advised of the reason for one's detention embodied in s. 10(a) of the Charter is founded most fundamentally on the notion that one is not obliged to submit to an arrest if one does not know the reasons for it: R. v. Kelly (1985), 1985 CanLII 3483 (ON CA), 17 C.C.C. (3d) 419 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 424. A second aspect of the right lies in its role as an adjunct to the right to counsel conferred by s. 10(b) of the Charter. As Wilson J. stated for the Court in R. v. Black, 1989 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 138, at pp. 152-53, "[a]n individual can only exercise his s. 10(b) right in a meaningful way if he knows the extent of his jeopardy". In interpreting s. 10(a) in a purposive manner, regard must be had to the double rationale underlying the right.

The majority of the Court of Appeal inclined to the view that the accused's right to be advised of the reasons for his detention was violated by the failure of the police to advise him when the focus of the investigation changed that he was then suspected of murder.

While serious issue was not taken with this conclusion, I am hesitant to let it pass without comment lest the inference be drawn that police conduct, such as that found in this case, necessarily results in a breach of s. 10(a). In fact the police informed the appellant that he was a suspect in the killings shortly after their suspicion of him formed, as the following portion of the interview discloses:

JS:(LONG PAUSE) To traffic marijuana, that was originally why we're here. But now that things have taken quite a change.

WE:Yeah but . . . why are you asking me this? I never killed no one . . . I don't know who did. It's none of my business.

This passage suggests to me that both parties, the police and the appellant, were aware that the appellant was at that point under investigation for murder. Any doubt about that fact is resolved at the beginning of the second interview when Detective Spring states the following:

JS:And we've come up with a few little things which ah I feel are um important in this case and that um ah they also um point to towards you as possibly being the person who committed that crime that night that we were discussing.

Thus, very shortly after the point where the appellant became the prime suspect in the killings, the police indicated that they were investigating the appellant for that purpose, and the appellant in turn seemed to recognize that the nature of the questioning had altered.

When considering whether there has been a breach of s. 10(a) of the Charter, it is the substance of what the accused can reasonably be supposed to have understood, rather than the formalism of the precise words used, which must govern. The question is whether what the accused was told, viewed reasonably in all the circumstances of the case, was sufficient to permit him to make a reasonable decision to decline to submit to arrest, or alternatively, to undermine his right to counsel under s. 10(b).

The appellant's response to the officer's statement that, while he had originally been arrested on marijuana charges, things had now taken "quite a change", indicates that the appellant was aware that the focus of the questioning had changed and that he was then being questioned with respect to the killings. It might, therefore, be argued that he was given the facts relevant to determining whether he should continue to submit to the detention. Nor can any failure to comply with s. 10(b) be attributed to failure to advise the accused of the reasons why his detention and questioning was continuing.

These considerations suggest that the requirements of s. 10(a) were met in the case at bar.

2. Section 10(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

The police, on arresting the accused in connection with the marijuana charges, properly advised him that he had the right to retain counsel without delay. When they asked him whether he understood, he answered in the negative. Nevertheless, no attempt was made to clarify his appreciation of his right to counsel. The police proceeded to take him into custody and question him in the absence of counsel. Depending on how a disputed portion of the transcript is read, there may have been a further attempt at the beginning of the first interview to repeat the advice regarding counsel, but again no attempt was made to explain it to the accused. At a certain point, the police became suspicious that the appellant might have committed the two killings. The focus of the investigation changed from a drug offence to murder. Nothing more, however, was said about counsel. Two more police interviews followed, as well as a cell interview by an undercover agent, a "show and tell" expedition to the scenes of the crimes, and an interview by a police physician -- all without the benefit of counsel. In the course of his conversation with the undercover police officer, the appellant, after telling the officer he confessed because "they wouldn't give me a rest until I confessed So what else, what else was I gonna do . . .", stated:

I wonder if they'd give me a chance and let me talk to a lawyer? I hope so. Cause with a lawyer maybe things could go a little better with me, or for me I should say.

The next mention of a lawyer by the police came with the request to provide a written statement at approximately 8:39 p.m. The appellant was asked if he wanted to speak with a lawyer. He stated that he did. He was directed to a telephone and provided with a phone book but returned about one minute later stating that he was unable to reach a lawyer; he had been told on the telephone that his lawyer was on vacation and could not be reached at that time. Detective Metzger then told the appellant that he could either contact his lawyer later or continue with the written statement. The appellant stated that he would proceed with the written statement. During the next hour the appellant wrote a two- paragraph statement in which he confessed to the two killings. Later, in a telephone conversation with his brother the accused recited a version of his rights suggestive of the United States and to the question of whether he knew he was entitled to a lawyer, said: "Oh yeah, I know, I watch T.V. man, I know what's goin' on."

This evidence must be viewed against the background that the police from the outset were aware that the accused was hampered by a mental deficiency bordering on retardation and that they should take special care to make sure that he understood the warnings required to be given to him. Psychiatric evidence also established that the accused was easily influenceable.

The trial judge rejected the submission that the accused's s. 10(b) right had been violated on the ground that the accused had told his brother he understood that he was entitled to a lawyer. The majority in the Court of Appeal declined to interfere with the conclusion of the trial judge.

The jurisprudence establishes that the duty on the police to inform a detained person of his or her right to counsel encompasses three subsidiary duties: (1) the duty to inform the detainee of his right to counsel; (2) the duty to give the detainee who so wishes a reasonable opportunity to exercise the right to retain and instruct counsel without delay; and (3) the duty to refrain from eliciting evidence from the detainee until the detainee has had a reasonable opportunity to retain and instruct counsel: R. v. Manninen, 1987 CanLII 67 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1233; R. v. Ross, 1989 CanLII 134 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 3; R. v. Black, supra. In Black, the rider was added that the accused must be reasonably diligent in attempting to obtain counsel if he wishes to do so, otherwise the correlative duty on the police to refrain from questioning him is suspended.

The right to be advised of the right to counsel arguably arises at three points in the dealings of the police with the appellant. The first is the failure of the police upon arresting the appellant to take steps to assist him in understanding his right after he indicated he did not. The second is the failure of the police to reaffirm the appellant's right to counsel when the nature of the investigation changed. The third is the taking of a written statement after the appellant indicated that he would like to speak to a lawyer.

Dealing first with the initial arrest, I am satisfied that the police did not comply with s. 10(b). It is true that they informed the appellant of his right to counsel. But they did not explain that right when he indicated that he did not understand it. A person who does not understand his or her right cannot be expected to assert it. The purpose of s. 10(b) is to require the police to communicate the right to counsel to the detainee. In most cases one can infer from the circumstances that the accused understands what he has been told. In such cases, the police are required to go no further (unless the detainee indicates a desire to retain counsel, in which case they must comply with the second and third duties set out above). But where, as here, there is a positive indication that the accused does not understand his right to counsel, the police cannot rely on their mechanical recitation of the right to the accused; they must take steps to facilitate that understanding.

This is recognized in R. v. Anderson (1984), 1984 CanLII 2197 \(ON CA\), 10 C.C.C. (3d) 417 (Ont. C.A.), where the Court, per Tarnopolsky J.A., stated at p. 431:

. . . I am of the view that, absent proof of circumstances indicating that the accused did not understand his right to retain counsel when he was informed of it, the onus has to be on him to prove that he asked for the right but it was denied or he was denied any opportunity to even ask for it. No such evidence was put forth in this case. [Emphasis added.]

The question is whether the circumstances here indicated that the accused did not understand his right to retain counsel. In my view, they did. Asked whether he understood his rights, he replied in the negative. The police had no reason to assume otherwise, given their knowledge of his limited mental capacity. The only question is whether his subsequent statement to his brother that he was aware of his right to counsel can be reasonably seen as indicating that the appellant, despite his initial indication to the contrary, in fact understood his right. In my view, it cannot. While the appellant had some idea -- based on U.S. television -- that he was allowed to speak to a lawyer, it is far from clear that the appellant understood from the outset when he was entitled to exercise his right to counsel and how he was permitted to do so. In these circumstances, the failure of the police to make a reasonable effort to explain to the accused his right to counsel violated s. 10\(b\) of the Charter.

A second violation of the appellant's s. 10\(b\) right occurred when the police failed to reiterate the appellant's right to counsel after the nature of their investigation changed and the appellant became a suspect in the two killings. This Court's judgment in R. v. Black, supra, per Wilson J., makes it clear that there is a duty on the police to advise the accused of his or her right to counsel a second time when new circumstances arise indicating that the accused is a suspect for a different, more serious crime than was the case at the time of the first warning. This is because the accused's decision as to whether to obtain a lawyer may well be affected by the seriousness of the charge he or she faces. The new circumstances give rise to a new and different situation, one requiring reconsideration of an initial waiver of the right to counsel. On this point I prefer the judgment of R. v. Nelson (1982), 1982 CanLII 3760 \(MB QB\), 32 C.R. (3d) 256 (Man. Q.B.), to the decision in R. v. Broyles (1987), 1987 ABCA 222 \(CanLII\), 82 A.R. 238 (C.A.). I add that to hold otherwise leaves open the possibility of police manipulation, whereby the police -- hoping to question a suspect in a serious crime without the suspect's lawyer present -- bring in the suspect on a relatively minor offence, one for which a person may not consider it necessary to have a lawyer immediately present, in order to question him or her on the more serious crime.

I should not be taken as suggesting that the police, in the course of an exploratory investigation, must reiterate the right to counsel every time that the investigation touches on a different offence. I do, however, affirm that in order to comply with the first of the three duties set out above, the police must restate the accused's right to counsel when there is a fundamental and discrete change in the purpose of the investigation, one involving a different and unrelated offence or a significantly more serious offence than that contemplated at the time of the warning.

It remains to consider the appellant's decision to provide a written statement after an unsuccessful attempt to contact his lawyer. Prior to preparation of the written statement, the appellant was asked in terms he could understand whether he wanted to speak to a lawyer. The appellant was then given the choice of contacting his lawyer later or proceeding with the written statement, and he apparently agreed to continue with the written statement. At this point, the appellant both understood that he had a right to counsel and knew that he faced a charge of murder. The Crown argues that this "cured" the earlier s. 10(b) violations, with the result that the written confession was obtained in conformity with s. 10\(b\) of the Charter.

Such an argument could only succeed if it were concluded that by making the written confession the appellant had waived his s. 10(b) right. In Manninen, supra, this Court held that a person may implicitly, by words or conduct, waive his or her rights under s. 10(b). The Court cautioned, however, that "the standard will be very high" (at p. 1244) and referred to its judgment in Clarkson v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 61 \(SCC\), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 383, where it was held that for a voluntary waiver to be valid and effective it must be premised on a true appreciation of the consequences of giving up the right. In view of the appellant's subnormal mental capacity and the circumstances surrounding his arrest -- the fact that no attempt was made to explain his rights to him after he indicated that he did not understand them, as well as the fact that he was subjected to a day of aggressive and at times deceptive interrogation which apparently left him feeling as if he had "no choice" but to confess -- I am not satisfied that he appreciated the consequences of making the written statement and thereby waiving his right to counsel or, to put it another way, that he waived his right "with full knowledge of the rights the procedure was enacted to protect and of the effect the waiver will have on those rights in the process": Korponay v. Attorney General of Canada, 1982 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 41, at p. 49, as cited in Clarkson v. The Queen, supra, at p. 395 (emphasis deleted). Accordingly, I am of the view that the written statement was also taken in violation of the appellant's s. 10(b) right.

3. Other Charter Violations

In view of the fact that the statements made to an undercover policeman were not put in evidence, it is unnecessary to consider whether they constituted a violation of s. 7 of the Charter or whether they were voluntary.

4. Section 24(2) of the Charter

I have concluded that the statements of the accused were obtained in a manner that infringed the appellant's right to counsel. Section 24(2) provides that where this is the case, "the evidence shall be excluded if it is established that, having regard to all the circumstances, the admission of it in the proceedings would bring the administration of justice into disrepute."

The majority of the Court of Appeal concluded that admitting the statements in evidence at the appellant's trial would not bring the administration of justice into disrepute. Southin J.A. considered the matter on the basis that both ss. 10(a) and 10(b) had been violated, and assumed further that had the appellant had access to counsel, he would have been advised to remain, and in fact remained silent. In her view, it was necessary to weigh the appellant's right to "adjudicative fairness" against the s. 7 right to life of possible future victims. Concluding, at p. 563, that something had to be done "to prevent another young woman who has never done Evans any harm [from] being killed by him without a fair trial", Southin J.A. held that the statements should not be excluded. She concluded with the following peroration at p. 564:

If there be anything more likely, by every rational community standard, to bring the administration of justice into disrepute than letting the accused, a self-confessed killer, go free to kill again on the basis of such infringements, I do not know what it is.

Seventy-five years ago, Wesley Evans would have been hanged for these murders. Twenty-five years ago he would probably have had his death sentence commuted to life imprisonment.

I cannot think that the framers of the Charter intended that today in the name of adjudicative fairness he should by the application of the Charter be let free to kill again. Such a result would not be the act of a civilized, but of an uncivilized, society.

Craig J.A. found that reception of the statements would not bring the administration of justice into disrepute on the ground that the appellant knew about his right to counsel and was likely, if released, to kill again, in view of his statement after the "show and tell" expedition.

Hutcheon J.A., dissenting, held that the evidence should have been excluded in view of the following considerations: (i) the confessions came into existence following a serious breach of the right to counsel; (ii) the police officers lied to the appellant concerning the discovery of his fingerprints in the house; and (iii) the statements were those of a person who is immature and borderline mentally retarded and there is evidence to cast doubt upon their reliability.

I share the view of Hutcheon J.A. that reception of the written statements would tend to bring the administration of justice into disrepute. In R. v. Collins, 1987 CanLII 84 \(SCC\), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265, this Court identified three broad categories of factors bearing on a s. 24(2) determination:

- (a) the effect of the admission of the evidence on the fairness of the trial;
- (b) the seriousness of the Charter violation; and
- (c) the effect of exclusion on the repute of the administration of justice.

The effect of the reception of this evidence on the fairness of the trial is the first matter which must be considered. There can be little doubt that the use of these statements at trial worked an unfairness against the accused. Generally speaking, the use of an incriminating statement, obtained from an accused in violation of his rights, results in unfairness because it infringes his privilege against self-incrimination and does so in a most prejudicial way -- by supplying evidence which would not be otherwise available: Collins, supra; Black, supra. For these reasons, Lamer J. (as he then was) stated in Collins, at pp. 284-85, that "[t]he use of self-incriminating evidence obtained following a denial of the right to counsel will generally go to the very fairness of the trial and should generally be excluded."

Admission of the statements taken from the appellant is unfair for the reasons enunciated in Collins and Black. The statements were obtained in violation of the appellant's rights. They were highly incriminatory. And they provide evidence which was not otherwise available. The Crown concedes that without the confessions, it has no case against the appellant.

This suggests a further reason why it would be unfair to use the statements against the accused. There can be no greater unfairness to an accused than to convict him or her by use of unreliable evidence. Here the appellant's deficient mental state, combined with the circumstances in which the statements were taken, cast significant doubt on their reliability. Consider the record. A young man, borderline mentally retarded, emotionally immature and by his nature subject to suggestion, after being denied his right to counsel, is interviewed at length. The police falsely suggest to him that they have real evidence linking him to the murders. They tell him that his fingerprints place him at the house where one of the victims was killed, when none of his fingerprints has been found there. Asked why he cannot explain why his fingerprints were found inside the house, his response is simple: "... all's I can say is I wasn't inside that house." Nevertheless, by the end of the second interview he has admitted to killing Ms. Seto and by the end of the third interview, to killing Ms. Willems. A little while later in the cells, he denies his involvement to the undercover officer. Asked why he had confessed, he alludes to police pressure -- ". . . they wouldn't give me a rest until I confessed . . . So what else, what else was I gonna do" And then, most significantly, the following exchange occurs, suggesting that the accused has no memory of the matters he has just confessed to:

WE: You know it's funny, I don't remember killing them.

LR: No?

WE: Um-um.

LR: Yeah that is funny.

WE: Yeah. Usually I won't forget somein [sic] like that.

Later, in a taped telephone call to his brother, the appellant once more denies his guilt.

In all the circumstances, the appellant's statements must be regarded as highly unreliable. It would be most unfair to convict him entirely on their strength. I note in passing that significant portions of the evidence which undermines the reliability of the statements was not before the jury.

The second factor relevant to a s. 24(2) determination is the seriousness of the Charter violation. In my view, the violation of the accused's right to counsel in this case was highly serious. The police, despite knowledge of the appellant's deficient mental status and despite his statement to them that he did not understand his right to counsel, proceeded to subject him to a series of interviews and other investigative techniques. Moreover, they lied to him in the course of the interviews, falsely suggesting that his fingerprints had been found in the house where Ms. Seto died. One can appreciate the pressure the police were under to find a suspect in these two terrible killings. But that did not justify their conducting repeated and dishonest interrogations of a weak person in violation of his Charter rights.

It is argued that the police conduct should not be considered serious since the accused himself stated in his conversation with his brother after the interviews that he knew he had a right to counsel. The strength of this argument is undercut, however, by the fact that the same conversation reveals that the appellant's notion of his rights was confined to a garbled version based on American television. The argument is also weakened by the appellant's initial assertion to the police that he did not understand what his right to counsel entailed.

I turn finally to the third factor outlined in Collins -- the effect of exclusion on the repute of the administration of justice. To Southin J.A.'s mind, the admission of the statement would not bring the administration of justice into disrepute; on the contrary, its admission was required since nothing could be more detrimental to the repute of the administration of justice "than letting the accused, a self-confessed killer, go free to kill again on the basis of such infringements"

The fallacy in this reasoning, with the greatest respect, is that it rests on the questionable assumption that the confessions were reliable and true. More fundamentally, it rests on the assumption that the appellant is guilty. But the very question before the Court of Appeal was whether the appellant was, in fact, guilty -- that is, whether the jury, after a trial conducted in accordance with the law, had properly found him guilty. The appellant was entitled not to be found guilty except upon a fair trial. To justify the unfairness of his trial by presuming his guilt is to stand matters on their head and violate that most fundamental of rights, the presumption of innocence. Few things could be more calculated to bring the administration of justice into disrepute than to permit the imprisonment of a man without a fair trial. Nor, as a practical matter, can it be said that such imprisonment would achieve the end sought by Southin J.A., namely, the prevention of further murders by the killer of Ms. Seto and Ms. Willems. Only a conviction after a fair trial based on reliable evidence could give the public that assurance.

I conclude that the admission of the accused's statements obtained in violation of his Charter rights would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

5. Other Issues

The appellant contends that the charge to the jury failed to sufficiently emphasize the unreliability of the statements put in evidence. In view of my conclusion that the statements should never have been admitted, nothing turns on this allegation, and I need not consider it further. For the same reason, it is unnecessary for me to consider the appellant's argument concerning the voluntariness of the statements made to the police.

Conclusion

I would allow the appeal. The conviction should be set aside and an acquittal entered.

//Stevenson J.//

The following are the reasons delivered by

STEVENSON J. -- I have had the advantage of reading the judgment of my colleague, Justice McLachlin, and agree with her disposition of the appeal.

I restrict my agreement to the principal ground, namely that the police violated s. 10\(b\) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in failing to make a reasonable effort to explain to the accused his right to counsel. In my view, this is not a case in which to decide whether there is an obligation to reiterate the right to counsel when the course of the investigation takes some change.

Counsel for the accused properly distinguished R. v. Broyles (1987), 1987 ABCA 222 \(CanLII\), 82 A.R. 238, a decision I gave for the Alberta Court of Appeal. He correctly distinguished it on the basis that it was "not dealing with somebody who did not understand his rights". Counsel thus staked his position on the "understanding" question and we did not, therefore, have the benefit of full argument on the reiteration question.

In R. v. Black, 1989 CanLII 75 \(SCC\), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 138, this Court considered the applicability of s. 10\(b\) of the Charter to a situation in which the accused, having first been detained for attempted murder was subsequently charged with first degree murder and then gave inculpatory statements. The accused was at that point detained for the purposes of that second charge. These statements were obtained notwithstanding the accused's request to speak to the lawyer she had consulted in relation to the first charge. This Court held that the accused had not fully exercised her Charter right to counsel when she spoke to her lawyer about the first charge. Any waiver in relation to the first charge did not extend to the reiteration of the request for counsel in relation to the second charge.

Section 10 does not apply to police investigations or questioning in the absence of detention. The object of the section is to provide safeguards in the circumstances of detention. On one hand, the police may be found to have detained someone on one charge with the object of questioning on another charge. On the other extreme, there can be cases in which an accused under detention fortuitously discloses information relating to other activities. These raise fact issues not dependent on the nature or seriousness of the other activities. One extreme would be readily characterized as an abuse of the detention and a violation of s. 10(a) and (b), while the other does not appear to violate the section.

We do not, of course, lay down rules that determine facts and I am not persuaded that this is a case in which we should attempt to formulate rules that will indelibly characterize some changes in the purpose of an investigation as imposing specific new duties, the breach of which are Charter violations.

I agree with McLachlin J.'s analysis and application of s. 24 and would allow the appeal.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant: Orris Burns, Vancouver.

Solicitors for the respondent: DuMoulin, Black, Vancouver.

TAB 13

R. v. Feeney, 1997 CanLII 342 (SCC), [1997] 2 SCR 13

Source:	Supreme Court of Canada
Date:	1997-05-22
File number:	24752
Other citations:	146 DLR (4th) 609 — 212 NR 83 — 148 WAC 1 — [1997] 6 WWR 634 — AZ-97111056 — 115 CCC (3d) 129 — 7 CR (5th) 101 — 91 BCAC 1 — 34 WCB (2d) 266 — 44 CRR (2d) 1 — [1997] CarswellBC 1015 — EYB 1997-00866 — JE 97-1133 — [1997] SCJ No 49 (QL) — [1997] ACS no 49
Citation:	R. v. Feeney, 1997 CanLII 342 (SCC), [1997] 2 SCR 13, < https://canlii.ca/t/1fr1w >, retrieved on 2026-03-22
Most recent unfavourable mention	R. v. Ndikuriyo , 2018 ONSC 7592 (CanLII) [...] As such, this case is distinguishable from those cases recognizing that a Feeny Warrant is required where police enter a dwelling for purposes of arresting an occupant. [...]

R. v. Feeney, [1997] 2 S.C.R. 13

Michael Feeney

Appellant

v.

Her Majesty The Queen

Respondent

Indexed as: R. v. Feeney

File No.: 24752.

1996: June 11; 1997: May 22.*

Present: Lamer C.J. and La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci and Major JJ.

on appeal from the court of appeal for british columbia

Criminal law -- Arrest -- Warrantless arrest occurring at home -- Police entering home forcibly -- No subjective or objective reason for concluding suspect had committed indictable offence -- Arrest effected after evidence found -- Conditions required for valid arrest.

Constitutional law -- Charter of Rights -- Right to counsel -- Caution read on arrest but no mention made of right to immediate legal counsel or of toll-free telephone to duty counsel -- Whether accused's rights to immediate legal counsel violated -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 10\(b\).

Constitutional law -- Charter of Rights -- Search and seizure -- Police looking for suspect in serious crime -- Police entering home uninvited and without warrant -- Whether accused's privacy interest violated -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 8.

Constitutional law -- Charter of Rights -- Admissibility of evidence -- Statement given by accused on questioning after caution read but before opportunity to consult legal counsel given -- Finger prints taken on arrest -- Objects seized from home -- Charter breaches serious -- Whether admission of evidence bringing administration of justice into disrepute -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 24\(2\).

The police, during a murder investigation in 1991, entered the accused's house (an equipment trailer) without permission. When they received no answer at the door, they entered, roused the accused, touched his leg, ordered him to get up and took him to the front of the trailer for better lighting. The police arrested him after seeing blood on his shirt. Following a caution with respect to the right to counsel but not the right to immediate counsel, the police asked the accused a couple of questions which he answered. The accused's shirt was seized and he was taken to the police detachment where, before the accused had consulted with counsel, further statements and the accused's fingerprints were taken. The police seized cash, cigarettes and shoes under a warrant obtained on the basis of the initial search of the trailer (the shirt and shoes), the initial interview (the shoes) and the later interview at the detachment (the cash under the mattress).

The accused was convicted of second degree murder and his appeal was unanimously dismissed. At issue here are whether the police violated the Charter right to be secure from unreasonable search or seizure (s. 8) and the right on arrest or detention to retain and instruct counsel without delay and to be informed of that right (s. 10(b)) in their investigation of the accused and, if so, what evidence, if any, should be excluded under s. 24(2).

Held (Lamer C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier and McLachlin JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed.

Per La Forest, Sopinka, Cory, Iacobucci and Major JJ.: Under the pre-Charter common law, a warrantless arrest following a forced entry into private premises is legal if: (a) the officer has reasonable grounds to believe that the person sought is within the premises; (b) proper announcement is made; (c) the officer believes reasonable grounds for the arrest exist; and (d) objectively speaking, reasonable and probable grounds for the arrest exist. Except in exigent circumstances, police should give notice of presence by knocking or ringing the doorbell, give notice of authority by identifying themselves as law enforcement police officers and give notice of purpose by stating a lawful reason for entry. Furthermore, before forcing entry, police should, at minimum, request admission and have admission denied.

The subjective requirement for arrest was not met and its absence rendered the arrest unlawful even under the pre-Charter common law. The arresting officer did not believe he had reasonable grounds to arrest prior to the forcible entry. The police officer's testimony and the fact that he did not arrest the accused until after he saw the blood-stained shirt support this conclusion. An objective standard cannot be exclusively relied on because its addition to the requirements for valid arrest at common law did not displace the subjective requirement. Indeed, it would be inconsistent with the spirit of the Charter to permit a police officer to make an arrest without a warrant even though he or she does not believe reasonable grounds for the arrest exist.

The question of whether, objectively speaking, reasonable and probable grounds to arrest existed prior to the entry into the trailer is open to review by this Court. The trial judge erred in law by considering an irrelevant factor (the preservation of evidence) and by failing to explain why the officer in charge was incorrect in his conclusion that grounds to arrest did not exist prior to entry into the trailer.

The objective test is that a reasonable person, standing in the shoes of the officer, would have believed that reasonable and probable grounds to make the arrest existed. Any finding that the subjective test is not met will generally imply that the objective test is not met, unless the officer is to be considered to have an unreasonably high standard. An arrest cannot be made solely for the purpose of investigation but, if grounds exist on a subjective and objective basis, the fact that police intend to continue the investigation and do so does not invalidate the arrest. The objective test was not met regardless of the officer's views.

The Landry test for warrantless searches, essentially a balancing between aiding the police in their protection of society on the one hand and the privacy interests of individuals in their dwellings on the other, no longer applies. It must be adjusted to comport with Charter values which, notwithstanding the high value on the security and privacy of the home at common law, significantly increase the importance of the legal status of the privacy of the home. In general, the privacy interest now outweighs the interest of the police and warrantless arrests in dwelling houses are prohibited.

Generally a warrant is required to make an arrest in a dwelling house. There are exceptions with respect to the unreasonableness of warrantless searches for things. A warrantless search will respect s. 8 if authorized by law, and both the law and the manner in which the search is conducted are reasonable. In cases of hot pursuit, the privacy interest must give way to the interest of society in ensuring adequate police protection.

An arrest warrant alone is insufficient protection of the suspect's privacy rights. Even though the Criminal Code is silent on prior authorization of a search for persons, warrantless searches for persons are not permissible. Privacy rights under the Charter demand that the police, in general, obtain prior judicial authorization of entry into the dwelling house in order to arrest the person. If the Code currently fails to provide specifically for a warrant containing such prior authorization, such a provision should be read in. While the absence of such a provision could have a profound influence on the common law power of arrest, its absence cannot defeat a constitutional right of the individual. Once a procedure to obtain such prior authorization is created, the concern that suspects may find permanent sanctuary in a dwelling house disappears.

Warrantless arrests in dwelling houses are in general prohibited. Prior to such an arrest, the police officer must obtain judicial authorization for the arrest by obtaining a warrant to enter the dwelling house for the purpose of arrest. Such a warrant will only be authorized if there are reasonable grounds for the arrest, and reasonable grounds to believe that the person will be found at the address named, thus providing individuals' privacy interests in an arrest situation with the protection this Court has required with respect to searches and seizures. Requiring a warrant prior to arrest avoids the ex post facto analysis of the reasonableness of an intrusion and invasive arrests without a basis of reasonable and probable grounds are prevented, rather than remedied after the fact.

The protection of privacy does not end with a warrant; before forcibly entering a dwelling house to make an arrest with a warrant for an indictable offence, proper announcement must be made. An exception occurs where there is a case of hot pursuit. Whether or not there is an exception for exigent circumstances generally has not been fully addressed by this Court.

The arrest was unlawful both because the requirements for a warrantless arrest under s. 495 of the Code were not met, and, in any event, the police cannot make warrantless arrests in private dwellings unless exceptional circumstances, which were not present here, exist. Consequently, the entry into the trailer and the search and seizure of the accused's clothing violated s. 8 of the Charter.

The requirement that a person be informed of his or her s. 10(b) rights begins upon detention or arrest. Detention under s. 10 of the Charter occurs when a peace officer assumes control over the movement of a person by a demand or direction. Here, detention began once the officer touched the accused's leg and ordered him to get out of bed. The accused was not given any caution at this time and his s. 10(b) rights were therefore violated.

The accused was not given adequate opportunity to secure counsel. He was not given access to a telephone before being questioned; the police gave him the caution in the trailer, where no telephone existed. The police simply asked him whether he understood his rights, and given an indication that he did, proceeded to ask him questions about the blood on his shirt and his shoes. These police actions violated the accused's s. 10(b) rights.

The police came to know about the cash, the cigarettes and the shoes as the result of violations of ss. 8 and 10(b) of the Charter and would not have had grounds for a warrant supporting the second search without the violations. Consequently, the search and seizure under the warrant also violated s. 8. It would be artificial to distinguish the constitutionality of the second search from that of the initial entry into the trailer.

Fingerprinting as an incident to a lawful arrest has been held not to violate the Charter. Here, however, the arrest was unlawful and involved a variety of Charter breaches. Compelling the accused to provide fingerprints in this context was a violation of s. 8 of the Charter for it involved a search and seizure related to the accused's body for which, absent a lawful arrest, there is clearly a high expectation of privacy. Procedures that are taken incidental to and following an unlawful arrest and which impinge on the arrestee's reasonable expectation of privacy breach s. 8 of the Charter.

The first step in the trial fairness analysis is to consider whether the particular evidence is conscriptive or non-conscriptive. Evidence will be conscriptive when an accused, in violation of his or her Charter rights, is compelled to incriminate him- or herself at the behest of the State by means of a statement, the use of the body or the production of bodily samples.

The statements in the trailer, at the detachment, and the fingerprints were conscriptive and therefore inadmissible as affecting the fairness of the trial. The bloody shirt, the shoes, the cigarettes and the money were not conscriptive evidence, and this evidence, while its admission would not affect trial fairness, must be analysed in light of the second and third branches of the Collins test which may require its exclusion.

The violations were very serious in the present case. One of the indicia of seriousness is whether the violations were undertaken in good faith. One indication of bad faith is that the Charter violation was undertaken without any lawful authority. In light of a pattern of disregard for the accused's rights, the seizure of the shirt, shoes, cigarettes and money was associated with very serious Charter violations. The serious disregard for the accused's Charter rights suggests that the admission of the evidence would bring greater harm to the reputation of the administration of justice than its exclusion.

Neither of the judgments below should be afforded particular deference with respect to their s. 24(2) findings. First, neither found a breach with respect to the taking of the evidence in question and this error in law likely influenced their alternative conclusion that the breaches, if they existed, were not serious. Second, the trial judge erred in concluding that the police acted in good faith. Third, the reasons of the trial judge and the Court of Appeal were so brief and conclusionary that it was difficult to say whether other errors were made.

Per L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier and McLachlin JJ. (dissenting): A warrantless entry is presumed to be unreasonable and in contravention of s. 8 of the Charter but this presumption can be rebutted (a) if the search was authorized by law, (b) if the law authorizing the search was reasonable, and (c) if the manner in which the search was conducted was reasonable.

The entry was authorized as an incident to a lawful arrest. Four requirements necessary to effect a lawful arrest on private premises are: (1) the offence must be indictable; (2) the person who is the subject of the arrest must have committed the offence in question, or the peace officer, on reasonable and probable grounds, must believe that the person has committed the offence; (3) there must be reasonable and probable grounds for the belief that the person sought is within the premises; and (4) there must be a proper announcement before entry. That criteria 1 and 3 were fulfilled was not contested here.

In order to arrest, the officer must have a subjective belief in these reasonable and probable grounds, and this belief must be justifiable objectively as well. A reasonable person with the officer's knowledge would have had little difficulty in believing that the accused had committed the offence in question. The combined effect of the facts in light of the particular context of this case must be taken into account.

Different standards may apply to rural and urban settings. The trial judge demonstrated he was sensitive to the nature of the information received, and to the setting in which it was discovered.

A peace officer, before arresting without a warrant, must possess a subjective belief that reasonable and probable grounds to arrest exist. The evidence indicates that the officer held this subjective belief. A police officer seeking to apply this standard should not be held to the strict exactitude of a lawyer or of a justice swearing out a warrant. The existence of reasonable and probable grounds is a legal standard and subject to interpretation and at its core a “common-sense” concept which should incorporate the experience of the officer.

The police, upon entrance into a private dwelling, do not have to focus solely upon arrest and can enter, as here, with the subsidiary intention of investigating to either clear or implicate the suspect. The key element of an arrest is the existence of reasonable and probable grounds. The police are not obliged to arrest in all situations. On the contrary, it is perfectly acceptable for the police to enter for the purpose of arrest, while recognizing that evidence discovered within may well dispel their reasonably held belief. By seeking to confirm the reasonable belief they held, the police are able to avoid using the more intrusive procedure (an arrest) by substituting the less intrusive procedure first (the search). Continuing an investigation after an arrest is made is not improper.

No notice of purpose was given prior to entry. Such a shortcoming is not necessarily fatal to the arrest. If the ability of the officers to make an announcement is frustrated by the refusal of the person sought to come to the door, the officers' obligation to provide complete notice is suspended, and they may enter the premises. The duty to announce their purpose is re-engaged when it becomes feasible to do so, that is, once they encounter someone to whom notice can be given. The only effective way to satisfy the notice requirement here was to suspend its delivery until the accused was in a position to receive it. The arresting officer informed the accused of his purpose for entry, and restated his identity the moment it was feasible to do so.

The law permitting warrantless arrests in a dwelling house is reasonable in certain circumstances. The power of arrest is a crucial part of law enforcement. It is unrealistic to suggest that the police can never enter private premises without a warrant for the purposes of arrest. The ability of police to capture persons suspected of criminal activity and to preserve evidence necessary to convict them would be severely impeded. Further, hot pursuit is not the only circumstance in which the police are permitted to enter a dwelling house. Other situations will arise in which the threat to society and the danger of having important law enforcement aims frustrated will outweigh concerns about privacy.

Exigent circumstances have always been held to constitute an exception to the notion that “a man’s home is his castle”. A genuine fear that evidence of the crime will be lost can constitute the necessary exigent circumstances for a warrantless entry. Whether these exigent circumstances exist is a finding of fact for the trial judge. Here, the trial judge and the Court of Appeal were of the view that a serious danger existed that evidence would have been destroyed had the police not immediately entered the trailer to arrest the accused.

The suggestion that the police could have simply watched the trailer while waiting for a warrant, failed to recognize the distance and consequent time constraints for obtaining a warrant here. The nature of the crime is also an important factor to consider. There is a greater urgency to investigate quickly in a case of violence.

The police lawfully entered the trailer to effect an arrest of the accused; they accordingly were entitled to search incident to arrest and to seize evidence. The authority to search incident to arrest is well established at common law and has withstood Charter scrutiny as well. Similarly, fingerprinting as an incident of a legal arrest does not violate the Charter.

The warrant was properly obtained, even assuming the original entry was unlawful. Where a warrant is obtained partially on the strength of tainted evidence, and partially on evidence which was properly obtained, the role of the court is to consider whether the warrant would have been issued solely on the strength of the evidence which was properly obtained. Here, the trial judge ruled that before the officers entered the trailer and arrested the accused there existed reasonable and probable grounds to believe the accused was the culprit. This ruling is sufficient to infer that the search warrant could properly have been issued based solely on the strength of the information which was obtained prior to the arrest.

Given the finding that the arrest was lawful, ss. 7 and 9 of the Charter were not violated.

The police fulfilled their s. 10(b) obligations. They are not obliged to read an accused his or her s. 10(b) rights at the moment of arrest or detention. Rather, they must be permitted the latitude to assess and gain control of the situation and determine whether a potentially dangerous situation exists. The delay here was minimal. A Charter breach could not be said to have occurred as the result of this short delay.

Section 10(b) imposes the following duties on law enforcement agents: (1) to inform the detainee of his or her right to retain and instruct counsel without delay and of the existence and availability of legal aid and duty counsel; (2) if a detainee has indicated a desire to exercise this right, to provide the detainee with a reasonable opportunity to exercise the right (except in urgent and dangerous circumstances); and (3) to refrain from eliciting evidence from the detainee until he or she had that reasonable opportunity (again, except in cases of urgency or danger). The second and third duties are implementational duties and are not triggered unless and until a detainee indicates a desire to exercise his or her right to counsel. This duty, therefore, does not come into existence until the detainee asserts it.

It was unnecessary to consider s. 24(2). Had it been necessary, however, excluding this evidence would clearly bring the administration of justice into disrepute in light of the exigent circumstances and seriousness of the crime.

Per Lamer C.J. (dissenting): Substantial agreement was expressed with the reasons of Lambert J.A. in the Court of Appeal. The reasons and conclusion were not to be taken as a disagreement with the principles of R. v. Stillman as expressed in the reasons of Sopinka J.

Cases Cited

By Sopinka J.

Considered: Cloutier v. Langlois, 1990 CanLII 122 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 158; Eccles v. Bourque, 1974 CanLII 191 \(SCC\), [1975] 2 S.C.R. 739; R. v. Landry, 1986 CanLII 48 \(SCC\), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 145; R. v. Storrey, 1990 CanLII 125 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 241; Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 \(SCC\), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145; R. v. Grant, 1993 CanLII 68 \(SCC\), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 223; R. v. Maccooh, 1993 CanLII 107 \(SCC\), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 802; R. v. Kokesch, 1990 CanLII 55 \(SCC\), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 3; R. v. Stillman, 1997 CanLII 384 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 607; referred to: R. v. Collins, 1987 CanLII 84 \(SCC\), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265; R. v. Bartle, 1994 CanLII 64 \(SCC\), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 173; R. v. Burns, 1994 CanLII 127 \(SCC\), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 656; R. v. R. (D.), 1996 CanLII 207 \(SCC\), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 291; Harper v. The Queen, 1982 CanLII 11 \(SCC\), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 2; Dumbell v. Roberts, [1944] 1 All E.R. 326; Colet v. The Queen, 1981 CanLII 11 \(SCC\), [1981] 1 S.C.R. 2; Semayne's Case (1604), 5 Co. Rep. 91a, 77 E.R. 194; R. v. Brydges, 1990 CanLII 123 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 190; R. v. Pozniak, 1994 CanLII 66 \(SCC\), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 310; R. v. Therens, 1985 CanLII 29 \(SCC\), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 613; R. v. Manninen, 1987 CanLII 67 \(SCC\), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1233; R. v. Beare, 1988 CanLII 126 \(SCC\), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 387; R. v. Burlingham, 1995 CanLII 88 \(SCC\), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 206; R. v. Black, 1989 CanLII 75 \(SCC\), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 138; R. v. Genest, 1989 CanLII 109 \(SCC\), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 59; R. v. Silveira, 1995 CanLII 89 \(SCC\), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 297.

By L'Heureux-Dubé J. (dissenting)

R. v. Bartle, 1994 CanLII 64 \(SCC\), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 173; R. v. Edwards, 1996 CanLII 255 \(SCC\), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 128; Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 \(SCC\), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145; R. v. Collins, 1987 CanLII 84 \(SCC\), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265; R. v. Debot, 1989 CanLII 13

(SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 1140, aff'g (1986), 1986 CanLII 113 \(ON CA\), 30 C.C.C. (3d) 207; Eccles v. Bourque, 1974 CanLII 191 \(SCC\), [1975] 2 S.C.R. 739; R. v. Landry, 1986 CanLII 48 \(SCC\), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 145; R. v. Storrey, 1990 CanLII 125 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 241; R. v. Wilson, 1990 CanLII 109 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1291; R. v. Grunwald, [1991] B.C.J. No. 235 (QL); R. v. Zastowny (1992), 1992 CanLII 580 \(BC CA\), 76 C.C.C. (3d) 492; R. v. Breton (1994), 1994 CanLII 939 \(ON CA\), 74 O.A.C. 99; Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983); People v. Simon, 290 P.2d 531 (1955); Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98 (1980); R. v. Charlton (1992), 1992 CanLII 367 \(BC CA\), 15 B.C.A.C. 272; R. v. Miller, 1988 CanLII 99 \(SCC\), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 230, aff'g (1986), 1986 CanLII 4621 \(SK CA\), 25 C.C.C. (3d) 554; R. v. Jenkins, [1992] O.J. No. 672 (QL); R. v. Bennett, [1996] O.J. No. 4137 (QL); R. v. Dupuis (1994), 1994 ABCA 401 \(CanLII\), 162 A.R. 197; R. v. Anderson (1996), 1996 CanLII 8301 \(ON SC\), 49 C.R. (4th) 305; Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980); R. v. Maccooh, 1993 CanLII 107 \(SCC\), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 802; R. v. Silveira, 1995 CanLII 89 \(SCC\), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 297; Lyons v. The Queen, 1984 CanLII 30 \(SCC\), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 633; United States v. Reid, 69 F.3d 1109 (1995); United States v. Scroger, 98 F.3d 1256 (1996); United States v. Wicks, 995 F.2d 964 (1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 482 (1993); R. v. Grant, 1993 CanLII 68 \(SCC\), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 223; People v. Johnson, 637 P.2d 676 (1981); People v. Williams, 641 N.E.2d 296 (1994); State v. Storvick, 428 N.W.2d 55 (1988); State v. Gonsalves, 553 A.2d 1073 (1989); People v. Smith, 604 N.E.2d 858 (1992); R. v. Kokesch, 1990 CanLII 55 \(SCC\), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 3; Cloutier v. Langlois, 1990 CanLII 122 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 158; R. v. Beare, 1988 CanLII 126 \(SCC\), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 387; R. v. Evans, 1996 CanLII 248 \(SCC\), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 8; R. v. Strachan, 1988 CanLII 25 \(SCC\), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 980; R. v. Manninen, 1987 CanLII 67 \(SCC\), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1233; R. v. Cobham, 1994 CanLII 69 \(SCC\), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 360; R. v. Latimer, 1997 CanLII 405 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 217, aff'g (1995), 1995 CanLII 3993 \(SK CA\), 99 C.C.C. (3d) 481; R. v. Lorincz (1995), 9 M.V.R. (3d) 186; R. v. Loudon, [1995] B.C.J. No. 2446 (QL); R. v. Anderson (1984), 1984 CanLII 2197 \(ON CA\), 10 C.C.C. (3d) 417; R. v. Sabourin (1984), 1984 CanLII 3535 \(MB CA\), 13 C.C.C. (3d) 68; R. v. Evans, 1991 CanLII 98 \(SCC\), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 869; R. v. Baig, 1987 CanLII 40 \(SCC\), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 537; R. v. Brydges, 1990 CanLII 123 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 190.

By Lamer C.J. (dissenting)

R. v. Stillman, 1997 CanLII 384 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 607.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 7, 8, 9, 10(b), 24(2).

Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, s. 495(1)(a), (b), (c) [rep. & sub. c. 27 (1st Supp.), s. 75] (formerly R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, s. 450).

Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. N-1, s. 10.

Authors Cited

Canada. Law Reform Commission. Working Paper 41. Arrest. Ottawa: The Commission, 1985.

Fontana, James A. The Law of Search and Seizure in Canada, 3rd ed. Toronto: Butterworths, 1992.

LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment, vol. 3, 3rd ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co., 1996.

Parker, Graham. "Developments in Criminal Law: The 1985-86 Term" (1987), 9 Sup. Ct. L. Rev. 247.

Slobogin, Christopher. "Testilying: Police Perjury and What to Do About It" (1996), 67 U. Colo. L. Rev. 1037.

APPEAL from a judgment of the British Columbia Court of Appeal (1995), 1995 CanLII 1016 \(BC CA\), 54 B.C.A.C. 228, 88 W.A.C. 228, dismissing an appeal from conviction by Leggatt J. sitting with jury. Appeal allowed, Lamer C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier and McLachlin JJ. dissenting.

Charles Lugosi, for the appellant.

William F. Ehrcke, for the respondent.

The following are the reasons delivered by

1 THE CHIEF JUSTICE (dissenting) -- I have had the benefit of the reasons of both of my colleagues, Justice L'Heureux-Dubé and Justice Sopinka, and cannot agree with either of them. I do agree with L'Heureux-Dubé J. in the result, but substantially for the reasons given by Lambert J.A. of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia (1995), 1995 CanLII 1016 \(BC CA\), 54
B.C.A.C. 228.

2 My reasons and conclusion are not to be taken as disagreeing in any way with the principles of R. v. Stillman, 1997 CanLII 384 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 607, as expressed in the reasons of Sopinka J. I agree with those principles as stated therein. My disagreement is with their application on the facts of this case.

3 I would accordingly dismiss this appeal.

The judgment of La Forest, Sopinka, Cory, Iacobucci and Major JJ. was delivered by

4. SOPINKA J. -- This appeal concerns a number of alleged violations of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms during the police investigation of the beating death of Frank Boyle in Likely, British Columbia in June, 1991. Acting on tips, the police without permission entered the appellant's dwelling house, an equipment trailer he occupied by arrangement with his sister and her spouse equivalent, detained the appellant, searched his clothing and, upon seeing blood on his shirt, arrested him. Following a caution with respect to the right to counsel, which the appellant submitted was inadequate, the police asked the appellant a couple of questions which he answered. The appellant's shirt was seized and he was taken to the Williams Lake RCMP detachment where, before the appellant had consulted with counsel, further statements and the appellant's fingerprints were taken.

5. The appellant argued that the police violated ss. 7, 8, 9 and 10(b) of the Charter. In my view, the police indeed violated ss. 8 and 10(b) and the evidence gathered as a result of these violations should have been excluded under s. 24(2) of the Charter. Because of these conclusions, it is unnecessary to consider whether other sections of the Charter were also breached.

Facts

6. On Saturday, June 8, 1991, at around 8:20 a.m., the body of Frank Boyle, aged 85 years, was found at his home on Cedar Creek Road in Likely, British Columbia. He had died following a fierce attack involving five blows to the head, each of sufficient force to kill him, with an iron bar or similar object. While the exact time of death could not be ascertained, he was last seen alive the previous evening. The officer in charge of the investigation noted that blood was spattered everywhere at the Boyle residence, and noted also Sportsman brand cigarettes at the scene.
7. As a result of information provided by several bystanders, the three investigating officers went to the scene of a motor vehicle accident, which involved the deceased's red Datsun pickup truck, about half a kilometre west of the Boyle residence. Two local residents, Kelly Spurn and Cindy Potter, offered new information to the police. Cindy Potter told the police that she had seen Boyle's truck in the ditch at 6:45 that morning. Furthermore, she stated that she had seen someone she identified as Michael walking in an easterly direction along Cedar Creek Road a few minutes earlier with a beer or a coffee cup in his hand. The officer in charge testified that Kelly Spurn told him that the appellant was living on Spurn's property which he was renting out to the appellant's sister, Angela Feeney, and her spouse equivalent, Dale Russell. Spurn suggested that the police go and speak to Russell. Spurn testified that he had told the police that he assumed it was the appellant who had crashed the pickup truck because the skid marks and the location of the accident were in the same place as skid marks from another accident earlier that morning which had involved the appellant and a blue flatbed truck.

8. Upon arrival at the Spurn property where Dale Russell, Angela Feeney and the appellant were living, Russell told police that the appellant had stolen a truck from the Spurn property earlier that morning and that he found it just down from Boyle's residence, exactly where Boyle's truck was found later. He also said that the appellant had come home at 7:00 a.m. after a night of drinking and was now asleep in the trailer behind his residence.

9. The officer in charge went to the windowless trailer and knocked on the door and said, "Police". Receiving no answer, he entered the trailer with his gun drawn and pointing downward, went to the appellant's bed, shook the appellant's leg and said "I want to talk to you." The officer then asked the appellant to get out of bed and move into the better light at the front of the trailer. The officer stated in evidence that he did so in order to inspect the appellant's clothes for bloodstains. The officer conceded that he may have touched the appellant in leading him to the door. The officer noticed blood spattered all over the front of the appellant and had another officer read the appellant his rights in these terms ((1995), 1995 CanLII 1016 \(BC CA\), 54 B.C.A.C. 228, at p. 230):

It is my duty to inform you that you have the right to retain and instruct counsel without delay. You may call any lawyer you want. A Legal Aid duty lawyer is available to provide legal advice to you without charge and can explain the Legal Aid plan to you. If you wish to contact a Legal Aid duty lawyer, I can provide you with a telephone number. Do you understand?...You are not obliged to say anything but anything you do say may be given in evidence.

10. The appellant was arrested and asked whether he understood his rights. He did not respond at first, but when asked again he stated (at p. 230), "Of course, do you think I am illiterate?" or words to that effect. The officer in charge immediately asked the appellant how he got blood on himself, to which the appellant replied that he had been hit in the face with a baseball the day before. When asked whether a particular pair of shoes were the shoes he had worn the previous evening, the appellant replied that they were the only shoes he owned. There was also some discussion with him about a package of Sportsman cigarettes observed in the trailer.

11. The appellant was led to the police vehicle where the tee shirt he was wearing was seized. He was taken to the Williams Lake RCMP detachment. At around 12:00 noon the appellant tried unsuccessfully several times to contact a lawyer. At 12:17 p.m. he left a message for the lawyer to call back. At 12:23 p.m. a breathalyzer sample was taken from the appellant, who was not told that he had a choice in the matter. The appellant was kept in an observation cell for over eight hours. At 9:10 p.m. two detectives began questioning the appellant. The appellant stated, at p. 231, “I should have a lawyer”, but the interview continued. The appellant admitted to striking Boyle, stealing cigarettes, beer, and cash from Boyle’s residence and stated that he had put the cash under his mattress in his trailer. The police then obtained a search warrant authorizing them to seize the shoes, the Sportsman cigarettes, and the money under the mattress. The appellant was interviewed again for approximately 1 1/2 hours at 3:05 a.m. on June 9. The appellant had still not seen a lawyer. On Monday, June 10, at 9:25 a.m., and again at 10:54 a.m., the accused was fingerprinted. In between these fingerprinting sessions the appellant met with a lawyer for the first time since he had been arrested.

12. The appellant was ultimately convicted of second degree murder following a jury trial in the Supreme Court of British Columbia. The British Columbia Court of Appeal unanimously dismissed his appeal.

Relevant Legislation

13. Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46

495. (1) A peace officer may arrest without warrant

(a) a person who has committed an indictable offence or who, on reasonable grounds, he believes has committed or is about to commit an indictable offence;

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

8. Everyone has the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure.

...

10. Everyone has the right on arrest or detention

...

(b) to retain and instruct counsel without delay and to be informed of that right; ...

...

24. ...

(2) Where, in proceedings under subsection (1), a court concludes that evidence was obtained in a manner that infringed or denied any rights or freedoms guaranteed by this Charter, the evidence shall be excluded if it is established that, having regard to all the circumstances, the admission of it in the proceedings would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

Prior Judgments

Supreme Court of British Columbia (voir dire)

14. In determining the admissibility of the items seized, Leggatt J. first noted that Likely is a small community of about 300 people. He also noted that there is light to no traffic on Cedar Creek Road “at that time” (presumably in the early morning when Potter observed “Michael” walking along the road), and that it would have been a very unusual occurrence to see an accident and the accused walking away from it. Taking all the circumstances into account, Leggatt J. concluded that, objectively speaking, reasonable grounds to arrest existed and the arrest was lawful under both the Code and the Charter. The arrest being lawful implied that the seizure of the appellant’s shirt was also lawful, as was the search incidental to the arrest. Leggatt J. also held that technical omissions in the search warrant did not justify excluding the evidence later obtained under the warrant.

15. Leggatt J. stated that if his rulings with respect to the entry, arrest, incidental search and search warrant were in error, then the evidence should be admitted under s. 24\(2\) of the Charter and R. v. Collins, 1987 CanLII 84 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265: the exclusion of such evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. In reaching this conclusion, Leggatt J. noted, inter alia, the urgent circumstances, the good faith of the officers and the fact that real evidence was at issue.
16. The trial judge then turned to the appellant's initial statements at the time of his arrest. Leggatt J. found that when the appellant was given his s. 10\(b\) Charter warning he clearly understood his right to counsel but did not assert his right at that time. Consequently, the trial judge held that the initial statements were admissible. If he erred in that holding, Leggatt J. stated that to exclude the statements would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.
17. With respect to the two longer statements given to police while the appellant was detained at Williams Lake, the trial judge noted that the appellant tried three times to invoke his right to counsel (when he arrived at Williams Lake he left a message for a lawyer, and in each of the two later interviews he indicated his desire to have a lawyer present), but the police overrode that right and questioned him despite the continued absence of counsel. Leggatt J. found this breach of the appellant's right to counsel to be very serious and held that the admission of the longer statements could bring the administration of justice into disrepute. Consequently, he ruled the longer statements inadmissible. However, the real evidence obtained under the search warrant that resulted from information contained in the inadmissible statements was admissible under the real evidence test in Collins. Leggatt J. also found that the breathalyser test was performed after the appellant had attempted to invoke his right to counsel and, since it failed the real evidence test in Collins, was therefore inadmissible. He added that all other evidence was admissible.

18. In dealing with the appellant's contention that his rights under the Charter were violated by the police, Lambert J.A. stated at p. 234, "I do not think that it is necessary to consider each of the alleged Charter breaches in this case. Each of them attracts a good deal of jurisprudence and some nice analytical concepts. For the reason that it is not necessary to do so, it is not desirable to do so." The court noted that there had been a savage attack in a small community and that the police had a duty to protect the community. The police thus had a duty to locate and neutralize the killer, as well as to gather evidence to satisfy themselves and others that the killer had been apprehended. Lambert J.A. stated that the police were facing a situation which could be classified as an emergency, or as exigent circumstances which required immediate action. Furthermore, there was a real possibility that evidence, particularly bloodstains, could be destroyed.
19. The court held at p. 234 that the search of the trailer was lawful within "recognized additions" to the rule that a search must be based on reasonable and probable grounds. These additions are where there is an emergency, or where there are exigent circumstances, or where the prevention of the destruction of evidence on an immediate basis is called for. Lambert J.A. stated that it was unnecessary to deal with any particular principle relating to articulable cause creating a basis for entry and search at a level less than reasonable and probable cause. The considerations about emergency, exigency and the potential destruction of evidence also made lawful the detention of the appellant in his bed, if it was a detention, and the requirement that the appellant move to the door of the trailer so that he could be better inspected.
20. Lambert J.A. stated that even if there were Charter breaches, having regard to all the circumstances, he would hold the evidence obtained through the police conduct admissible as its admission would not have brought the administration of justice into disrepute.

21. After considering and rejecting the appellant's submissions about drunkenness (an issue which is not under appeal here), the court found that the informational component of the warning that was made at the time of arrest was consistent with this Court's decision in R. v. Bartle, 1994 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 173. For these reasons, the court dismissed the appeal. I note here that the respondent did not rely on the Court of Appeal's reasons in argument. The following analysis will only deal with these reasons to the extent that they overlap with the respondent's submissions.

Issues

22. 1. Did the police violate s. 8 of the Charter in their investigation of the appellant?
2. Did the police violate s. 10(b) of the Charter in their investigation of the appellant?
3. What evidence, if any, should be excluded under s. 24(2) of the Charter?

Analysis

The Lawfulness of the Arrest

23. In arguing that the police conduct in the present case did not violate the Charter, the respondent relied heavily on the lawfulness of the arrest. Since the arrest was lawful, the argument runs, the search and seizures incidental to the arrest were lawful and complied with the Charter according to Cloutier v. Langlois, 1990 CanLII 122 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 158. In what follows, I will consider first whether the arrest was lawful under the common law rules relating to arrests in a dwelling house. Subsequently, I will consider whether the common law rules are no longer appropriate in light of the Charter. I conclude that the arrest was unlawful under either the rules of the common law or the Charter.

The Pre-Charter Law of Arrests in Dwelling Houses

24. In setting out the law of arrests in dwelling houses following forcible entry, Eccles v. Bourque, 1974 CanLII 191 \(SCC\), [1975] 2 S.C.R. 739, at p. 744, stated that the following rule applies:

Entry can be made against the will of the householder only if (a) there are reasonable and probable grounds for the belief that the person sought is within the premises and (b) proper announcement is made prior to entry.

This case, however, pertained only to arrests with a warrant. In R. v. Landry, 1986 CanLII 48 \(SCC\), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 145, a majority of the Court held that police may enter a private dwelling without permission to make a warrantless arrest if the requirements in Eccles, supra, are met and the requirements in s. 450 [now s. 495] of the Code are met. Recall that s. 495(1)(a) states:

495. (1) A peace officer may arrest without warrant

(a) a person who has committed an indictable offence or who, on reasonable grounds, he believes has committed or is about to commit an indictable offence;

Section 495(1)(a) sets out the subjective requirement for a warrantless arrest: the peace officer himself or herself must believe reasonable grounds exist. An objective requirement was added in R. v. Storrey, 1990 CanLII 125 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 241: objectively there must exist reasonable and probable grounds for the warrantless arrest to be legal. Combining Eccles, Landry, Storrey, and s. 495 leads to the following proposition: a warrantless arrest following a forced entry into private premises is legal if: (a) the officer has reasonable grounds to believe that the person sought is within the premises; (b) proper announcement is made; (c) the officer believes reasonable grounds for the arrest exist; and (d) objectively speaking, reasonable and probable grounds for the arrest exist. I will consider these requirements in turn and apply them to the case at bar.

(a) Reasonable Grounds to Believe the Appellant Was in the Trailer

25. Given that Russell told him that the appellant was in the trailer, the officer had reasonable grounds to believe that the appellant was in the trailer.

(b) Proper Announcement

26. Eccles, supra, set out the following requirement for announcements prior to entry of private premises without permission: except in exigent circumstances, police should give notice of presence by knocking or ringing the doorbell, give notice of authority by identifying themselves as law enforcement police officers and give notice of purpose by stating a lawful reason for entry. Furthermore, before forcing entry, police should, at minimum, request admission and have admission denied. In the case at bar, the police officers knocked and said, “Police”, but were not denied admission nor did they announce their purpose before forcing entry. The respondent defends these apparent defects in the announcement by noting that no response was forthcoming since the appellant was asleep and by arguing that the urgency of the situation and the fear of the destruction of evidence legitimized a relatively brief announcement. In my view, this defence is largely inadequate. As I will conclude below, this situation did not appear to comprise exigent circumstances any more than any other situation following shortly after a serious crime. However, whether or not the announcement requirement was met, in my view the subjective and objective requirements for a legal arrest were not met. The announcement question thus does not need to be finally resolved.

(c) Subjective Grounds

27. In my view, it is clear that the subjective requirement was not met in the case at bar. The officer in charge who knocked and entered, Sgt. Madrigga, testified in cross-examination that he did not believe he had reasonable grounds to arrest the appellant when he entered the trailer. Consider the following testimony:

Q And at that point as you are going to the trailer, you would agree with me you had no intention of arresting Mr. Feeney?

A No, I just wanted to check what he had been doing.

Q And, of course, you didn't have a warrant for his arrest?

A No, I did not.

Q Because basically there wouldn't have been enough information to obtain a warrant?

A That's correct.

Later in the cross-examination, the following exchange took place:

Q And from the time you went into the trailer, there was no suggestion that you were going to let Mr. Feeney walk out of the trailer and go away?

A If I had no further evidence. If I had -- when I went in and talked to him, if I had nothing to indicate that he was involved in this, I would -- it was shaky if I would have had grounds for his arrest at that time, but I had to check it out because I had people ask or tell me that this person was in the area.

Q All right, so let's see if we agree on something. At the time you went into the trailer, you didn't feel that you had grounds for his arrest, but when you saw the blood splatter on him after looking at him, that's why you said --

A I had grounds to suspect that he could have been involved, sir, and I would be negligent in my duty if I did not check that out.

Q Oh, I'm not arguing that point, Sargent [sic]. But you didn't have grounds for an arrest?

A Not for an arrest at that time.

Such testimony appears to decide the matter, but the respondent claimed that other testimony indicates that Sgt. Madrigga indeed had a subjective belief that he had reasonable grounds to arrest. For example, the respondent referred to the following testimony:

Q On the other hand, what made you think you could walk in?

- A Well, I had, in my mind, sir, I had, as far as I was concerned, I had a suspect. If he would have, as I stated, if he would have come out when I knocked on the door, then I wouldn't have gone in. However, I had two people stating he had been in the area. I had Dale telling me that a vehicle of his had been dumped basically in the same spot that Mr. Boyle's vehicle had been dumped a short time after, like Mr. [sic] or Dale had moved his vehicle and then this other vehicle was dumped there, puts Mr. Feeney right at the area. I have him walking away from the area a short while later. To me that gave me --

Sgt. Madrigga was interrupted at this point, but the respondent argued that one can infer that he believed he had reasonable grounds to enter the trailer and arrest the appellant.

28. I cannot accept the argument of the respondent on this issue. First, the respondent relies on questionable inferences from the officer's testimony, whereas the appellant may simply point to the frank testimony of the officer that he did not believe he had reasonable grounds to arrest. On balance, the testimony suggests the absence of a subjective belief. Second, if the officer believed he had reasonable grounds to arrest the appellant prior to entry, why did he not in fact arrest the appellant until after he had seen the bloodstains on the appellant's shirt? Both the words and actions of the officer suggest that he did not believe he had reasonable grounds to make an arrest when he forcibly entered the trailer.

29. In considering the legality of the arrest in the case at bar under pre-Charter law, the trial judge did not consider adequately the lack of subjective belief in the reasonableness of the grounds to arrest. Leggatt J. set out the reasonableness test as an objective one: so long as there were, objectively speaking, reasonable and probable grounds, the standard is satisfied. He stated:

The test is really this. A reasonable person standing in the shoes of the officer would believe reasonable grounds exist. It is an objective test.

Whether or not the trial judge was correct in concluding that the objective standard was met, a conclusion with which I disagree below, the trial judge erred by relying exclusively on an objective standard. According to the plain wording of s. 495, the peace officer may arrest someone only if, on reasonable grounds, he or she believes the person to have committed an indictable offence. An objective standard was added in Storrey, supra, but this did not displace the subjective requirement: see Storrey, supra, at p. 250. Indeed, it would be inconsistent with the spirit of the Charter to permit a police officer to make an arrest without a warrant even though he or she does not believe reasonable grounds for the arrest exist. The absence of subjective belief, therefore, rendered the arrest in the present case unlawful irrespective of the existence of objective grounds for the arrest and the effect of the Charter on powers of police officers to enter a dwelling house without a warrant in order to effect an arrest.

(d) Objective Grounds

30. The finding by a trial judge of whether, objectively speaking, reasonable and probable grounds for arrest existed clearly has a significant factual element and thus is owed some deference by an appellate court. In the present case, in arriving at his conclusion that objective grounds for arrest existed, in my view the trial judge committed two errors in principle that invite review of his finding. First, he considered factors that are not relevant to the question of reasonable and probable grounds. In considering the objective test, he stated:

As I have said, in my view it is an objective test. Given the surrounding circumstances I have outlined, the need to preserve evidence, the clear indication that the accused was a prime suspect, I believe the arrest took place in compliance with both the Criminal Code and the Charter. [Emphasis added.]

In concluding that reasonable and probable grounds for arrest existed, the trial judge considered the need to preserve evidence. In my view, it was an error of law for the trial judge to consider the need to preserve evidence in considering whether reasonable and probable grounds, objectively speaking, existed. Whether or not there is a need to preserve evidence is logically irrelevant to the question of whether there are reasonable and probable grounds for an arrest. The trial judge thus erred in law and his view on reasonable and probable grounds is open to appellate review.

31. Even if the trial judge did not err in considering the need to preserve evidence, in my view the trial judge erred in failing to appreciate the evidence of the officer in charge at the scene of the trailer. The trial judge noted that Sgt. Madrigga testified that he did not think he had sufficient grounds to arrest until he observed the blood on the appellant, but did not advert to this evidence in concluding that reasonable and probable grounds to arrest existed prior to the entry into the trailer. In order to conclude that, objectively speaking, reasonable and probable grounds for arrest existed, one must conclude that the officer on the scene was unreasonable in reaching a different conclusion. The trial judge, however, did not explain his dismissal of the officer's evidence in this respect. In my view, such a failure to clarify the basis for his finding that the objective test was satisfied constituted an error of law. In R. v. Burns, 1994 CanLII 127 \(SCC\), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 656, McLachlin J., writing for the Court, stated at p. 665:

This statement should not be read as placing on trial judges a positive duty to demonstrate in their reasons that they have completely appreciated each aspect of relevant evidence. The statement does not refer to the case where the trial judge has failed to allude to difficulties in the evidence, but rather to the case where the trial judge's reasons demonstrate that he or she has failed to grasp an important point or has chosen to disregard it, leading to the conclusion that the verdict was not one which the trier of fact could reasonably have reached.

Major J. elaborated on this passage in R. v. R. (D.), 1996 CanLII 207 \(SCC\), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 291. On behalf of the majority, he stated at p. 318:

The above-quoted passage does not stand for the proposition that trial judges are never required to give reasons. Nor does it mean that they are always required to give reasons. Depending on the circumstances of a particular case, it may be desirable that trial judges explain their conclusions. Where the reasons demonstrate that the trial judge has considered the important issues in a case, or where the record clearly reveals the trial judge's reasons, or where the evidence is such that no reasons are necessary, appellate courts will not interfere. Equally, in cases such as this, where there is confused and contradictory evidence, the trial judge should give reasons for his or her conclusions.

32. In the present case, the officer in charge did not believe reasonable grounds to arrest existed prior to entry into the trailer. In order to explain why he ignored this evidence, or why he viewed Sgt. Madrigga to be unreasonable, in my view there was a duty on the trial judge to set out his reasons for his conclusions on reasonable and probable grounds. The trial judge, however, simply stated that “[g]iven the surrounding circumstances”, the objective test was met. In essence, the trial judge simply provided his conclusion, not his reasons. As Harper v. The Queen, 1982 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 2, stated at p. 14, “[w]here the record, including the reasons for judgment, discloses a lack of appreciation of relevant evidence and more particularly the complete disregard of such evidence, then it falls upon the reviewing tribunal to intercede.” Given the testimony of the officer in charge, in my view, the absence of reasons constituted an error of law.

33. I have concluded that the trial judge erred in law by considering an irrelevant factor, the preservation of evidence, and by failing to explain why the officer in charge was incorrect in his conclusion that grounds to arrest did not exist prior to entry into the trailer. Consequently, the question of whether, objectively speaking, reasonable and probable grounds to arrest existed prior to the entry to the trailer is open to review by this Court.

34. In my view, as the lack of subjective belief on the part of the officer would suggest, the requirement that, objectively speaking, reasonable and probable grounds for an arrest exist prior to forcible entry is not met. The objective test as set out in Storrey, supra, is whether a reasonable person, standing in the shoes of the officer, would have believed that reasonable and probable grounds to make the arrest existed. Any finding that the subjective test is not met will generally imply that the objective test is not met, unless the officer is to be considered to have an unreasonably high standard.

35. In any event, in my view the objective test was not met regardless of the officer’s views. An arrest cannot be made solely for the purpose of investigation, but if grounds exist on a subjective and objective basis, the fact that police intend to continue the investigation and do so does not invalidate the arrest: see Storrey, supra. A lawful arrest may be made that allows the police to continue their investigation, such as in Storrey where the police arrested a suspect in order to place him in a police line-up to be identified or not, but it is a fundamental pre-requisite that the police have reasonable grounds to arrest prior to arrest, whether or not the investigation is ongoing, particularly where an arrest is made without the safeguards to the citizen resulting from the warrant process. As Cory J. stated in Storrey, at p. 249:

Section 450(1) [s. 495(1)] makes it clear that the police were required to have reasonable and probable grounds that the appellant had committed the offence of aggravated assault before they could arrest him. Without such an important protection, even the most democratic society could all too easily fall prey to the abuses and excesses of a police state. In order to safeguard the liberty of citizens, the Criminal Code requires the police, when attempting to obtain a warrant for an arrest, to demonstrate to a judicial officer that they have reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the person to be arrested has committed the offence. In the case of an arrest made without a warrant, it is even more important for the police to demonstrate that they have those same reasonable and probable grounds upon which they base the arrest. [Emphasis added.]

Or, as Scott L.J. stated in Dumbell v. Roberts, [1944] 1 All E.R. 326 (C.A.), at p. 329:

The power possessed by constables to arrest without warrant, whether at common law for suspicion of felony, or under statutes for suspicion of various misdemeanours, provided always they have reasonable grounds for their suspicion, is a valuable protection to the community; but the power may easily be abused and become a danger to the community instead of a protection....

The duty of the police when they arrest without warrant is, no doubt, to be quick to see the possibility of crime, but equally they ought to be anxious to avoid mistaking the innocent for the guilty.... I am not suggesting a duty on the police to try to prove innocence; that is not their function; but they should act on the assumption that their prima facie suspicion may be ill-founded.

36. In my view, these admonitions were not heeded by the police when they entered the trailer and arrested the appellant. The salient facts known to the police prior to their entry of the trailer are as follows: (a) it appeared that Boyle's truck had been stolen before being in an accident, and Cindy Potter claimed to have seen "Michael" walking near the site of the accident; (b) Kelly Spurn told police that he assumed the appellant had crashed Boyle's truck since the appellant had crashed earlier that morning in about the same place with a different truck; and (c) Dale Russell told police that the appellant came home around 7:00 a.m. after drinking all night and that the appellant had earlier crashed a vehicle at the spot where Boyle's truck was found. In my view, these facts did not constitute reasonable and probable grounds to arrest the appellant for the murder of Boyle. Whether or not the appellant had been involved in two similar truck accidents, or might have stolen Boyle's truck, does not raise reasonable and probable grounds to believe that he had murdered Boyle. This evidence may have pointed to the appellant as a suspect, but these facts without more do not justify an arrest. When the police entered the trailer, objectively reasonable and probable grounds for an arrest, as opposed to grounds for prima facie suspicion, did not exist.

(e) Conclusion on Lawful Arrest

37. It is questionable whether the police met the announcement requirement prior to forcibly entering the trailer to make a warrantless arrest. This issue does not need to be settled, in my view, since the requirement that the officer must believe he has reasonable grounds to arrest before forcibly entering private premises was not met. The failure to meet this subjective test is sufficient to render the arrest unlawful. However, even if the subjective test were met, objectively reasonable and probable grounds for the arrest did not exist prior to the forced entry into the trailer. Thus, the arrest was unlawful and could not support the entry into the appellant's dwelling irrespective of the effect of the Charter on the right to enter dwellings for the purpose of arrest. In any event, even if the police met the standards of Landry and the other cases, a warrantless arrest in the circumstances of the case at bar following a forcible entry is no longer lawful in light of the Charter; I turn to this issue now.

The Post-Charter Law of Arrests in Dwelling Houses

(a) Principles in the Common Law

38. As noted, Landry, supra, set out the law concerning warrantless arrests following forcible entry into a dwelling house. While the case was decided in 1986, it arose before the Charter came into effect, as the majority took care to point out at p. 165. In my view, the Charter suggests that the Landry test for warrantless arrests no longer applies. Before addressing this issue, it is useful first to review extensively the principles underlying the reasons in Landry itself.

39. Dickson C.J., writing for the majority, began his analysis of s. 450 (now s. 495) of the Code by reviewing the case law on warrantless arrests, with particular emphasis on Eccles, supra. Dickson C.J. cited at pp. 156-57 the following passage from Eccles at pp. 742-43, which he relied upon in Landry to help establish the common law's sanction of warrantless arrests:

For these principles, we go back to vintage common law, to 1604, and Semayne's Case [(1604), 5 Co. Rep. 91a, 77 E.R. 194], in which the principle, so firmly entrenched in our jurisprudence, that every man's house is his castle, was expressed.... That, then, is the basic principle, as important today as in Biblical times (Deuteronomy 24:10) or in the 17th century. But there are occasions when the interest of a private individual in the security of his house must yield to the public interest, when the public at large has an interest in the process to be executed. The criminal is not immune from arrest in his own home nor in the home of one of his friends. So it is that in Semayne's Case a limitation was put on the "castle" concept and the Court resolved that:

In all cases when the King is party, the Sheriff (if the doors be not open) may break the party's house, either to arrest him, or to do other execution of the K.'s process, if otherwise he cannot enter. But before he breaks it, he ought to signify the cause of his coming, and to make request to open doors...

In Dickson C.J.'s view, the authorities supported the proposition that a warrantless arrest in a dwelling is legal so long as: the officer believes, on reasonable and probable grounds, the person to be the subject of the arrest to have committed an indictable offence; there are reasonable and probable grounds to believe the person sought is within the premises; and proper announcement is made prior to entry.

40. Dickson C.J. also concluded that there were sound policy reasons to retain the law as it was. One policy reason supporting warrantless arrests in dwelling houses was stated to be the absence of alternative means of arresting a suspect who has taken refuge in a private dwelling house. Dickson C.J. stated, at p. 160, that:

The policy underlying the cases, older and more recent, on this issue, is clear and compelling: there should be no place which gives an offender sanctuary from arrest. While the Criminal Code empowers a justice to issue a warrant, on proper grounds being shown, authorizing a search for things, there is no power to issue a warrant to search for a person. If the police did not possess the power to arrest on private premises, then a criminal offender might find complete and permanent protection from the law in his or her own home or the home of another.

41. Dickson C.J. further held that there were compelling practical reasons not to require the police to obtain always a warrant for arrest prior to entering a private dwelling to make an arrest. He outlined various scenarios, such as where the police officer witnesses a crime or arrives on the scene shortly thereafter and does not know the name of the suspect whom he or she has seen take refuge in a dwelling house, that illustrate the impracticality and undesirability of obtaining a warrant before making a forcible entry. In Landry, as in other cases on the subject, the issue boiled down to a balance between aiding the police in their protection of society on the one hand, and the privacy interests of individuals in their dwellings on the other. Dickson C.J. held at p. 161 that the requirements for warrantless arrest that the majority set out reached the appropriate balance:

These serious limitations against effective police work and public protection must be balanced against the intrusiveness of arresting a person in a house or apartment. This intrusiveness is carefully delineated and restricted by the requirement of reasonable and probable grounds for the belief that the person sought is within the premises, and the requirements of notice of presence, notice of authority and notice of purpose. These requirements minimize the invasiveness of arrest in a dwelling and permit the offender to maintain his dignity and privacy by walking to the doorway and surrendering himself.

(b) The Charter

42. In my view, the conditions set out in Landry for warrantless arrests are overly expansive in the era of the Charter. As noted, Landry was largely based on a balance between privacy and the effectiveness of police protection, but in the Charter era, as I will presently seek to demonstrate, the emphasis on privacy in Canada has gained considerable importance. Consequently, the test in Landry must be adjusted to comport with Charter values.

43. There is no question that the common law has always placed a high value on the security and privacy of the home. This emphasis was illustrated as early as the seventeenth century, as evidenced by Semayne's Case (1604), 5 Co. Rep. 91a, 77 E.R. 194, and has been illustrated more recently by cases such as Colet v. The Queen, 1981 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1981] 1 S.C.R. 2, which held that the police entered Colet's home, a rudimentary shelter, illegally since they did not have explicit authority to search for weapons, but only to seize them. Indeed, the existing legal protection of the security of the home was the basis for the dissenting opinion of La Forest J. in Landry, supra, which contained an extensive analysis of doctrine that concluded warrantless arrests in dwelling houses were illegal; see also Graham Parker, "Developments in Criminal Law: The 1985-86 Term" (1987), 9 Sup. Ct. L. Rev. 247. Notwithstanding its prior importance, however, the legal status of the privacy of the home was significantly increased in importance with the advent of the Charter. Section 8 prevents all unreasonable searches and seizures. In Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, the seminal case on s. 8, Dickson J. (as he then was), writing for the Court, discussed the impact of the Charter on searches and seizure in these terms (at p. 158):

In my view the interests protected by s. 8 are of a wider ambit than those enunciated in Entick v. Carrington [(1765), 19 St. Tr. 1029, 1 Wils. K.B. 275; a common law case on searches and trespass]. Section 8 is an entrenched constitutional provision. It is not therefore vulnerable to encroachment by legislative enactments in the same way as common law protections. There is, further, nothing in the language of the section to restrict it to the protection of property or to associate it with the law of trespass. It guarantees a broad and general right to be secure from unreasonable search and seizure.

The shift in emphasis in the law of searches from trespass and basic property rights to the reasonableness of the search had a significant effect on the disposition of Hunter. In that case, there were provisions in the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23, which permitted searches and seizures on the authority of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. The Supreme Court held that searches and seizures may only be undertaken after authorization from an independent judicial body, which has considered the reasonableness of the proposed search and seizure, has been granted. Dickson J. stated at p. 160:

If the issue to be resolved in assessing the constitutionality of searches under [the Combines Investigation Act] was in fact the governmental interest in carrying out a given search outweighed that of the individual in resisting the governmental intrusion upon his privacy, then it would be appropriate to determine the balance of the competing interests after the search had been conducted. Such a post facto analysis would, however, be seriously at odds with the purpose of s. 8. That purpose is, as I have said, to protect individuals from unjustified state intrusions upon their privacy. That purpose requires a means of preventing unjustified searches before they happen, not simply of determining, after the fact, whether they ought to have occurred in the first place. This, in my view, can only be accomplished by a system of prior authorization, not one of subsequent validation. [Emphasis in original.]

44. In my view, Hunter is helpful in analyzing the case at bar. The analysis in Landry was based on a balance between the individual's privacy interest in the dwelling house and society's interest in effective police protection. This Court held that the latter interest prevailed and warrantless arrests in dwelling houses were permissible in certain circumstances. While such a conclusion was debatable at the time, in my view, the increased protection of the privacy of the home in the era of the Charter changes the analysis in favour of the former interest: in general, the privacy interest outweighs the interest of the police and warrantless arrests in dwelling houses are prohibited.

45. Such a conclusion is consistent not only with the general treatment of privacy in Hunter, but also with the specific implications of the privacy interest found in that case. Hunter held that a search and seizure violated s. 8 unless there was prior authorization. The purpose of the Charter is to prevent unreasonable intrusions on privacy, not to sort them out from reasonable intrusions on an ex post facto analysis. If Landry were to be adopted in the post-Charter era, there would be the anomalous result that prior judicial authorization is required to intrude on an individual's privacy with respect to a search for things, but no authorization is required prior to an intrusion to make an arrest. The result becomes more anomalous when Cloutier v. Langlois, supra, is considered. Cloutier held that a search incidental to a lawful arrest does not violate s. 8. Putting this proposition together with the proposition that a warrantless arrest in a dwelling house is legal may lead to the conclusion that a warrantless search of a dwelling house is legal so long as it is accompanied by a lawful arrest. Such a conclusion is clearly at odds with Hunter, which held that warrantless searches are prima facie unreasonable. I conclude that generally a warrant is required to make an arrest in a dwelling house.

46. I recognize that there are exceptions with respect to the unreasonableness of warrantless searches for things. A warrantless search will respect s. 8 if authorized by law, and both the law and the manner in which the search is conducted are reasonable. In R. v. Grant, 1993 CanLII 68 (SCC), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 223, for example, it was held that s. 10 of the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. N-1, which provided that a peace officer may search a place that is not a dwelling house without a warrant so long as he believes on reasonable grounds that a narcotic offence had been committed, was consistent with s. 8 of the Charter if s. 10 were read down to permit warrantless searches only where there were exigent circumstances. In the present context of searches for persons, in my view, there are also exceptions to the Charter prohibition of warrantless arrests in dwelling houses. Indeed, these exceptions answer Dickson C.J.'s policy argument about hampering the effectiveness of police investigations.

47. Dickson C.J. observed that police work might be greatly impeded by a warrant requirement. He provided the example of an officer's arriving on the scene shortly after an offender has slipped into a private dwelling. By the time the officer has discovered the suspect's name and has obtained a warrant, the criminal will have sought refuge elsewhere. In my view, in circumstances such as these there is an exception to the general rule that warrantless arrests in private dwellings are prohibited. In cases of hot pursuit, the privacy interest must give way to the interest of society in ensuring adequate police protection. This Court explicitly held this to be true in R. v. Maccooh, 1993 CanLII 107 \(SCC\), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 802. In Maccooh, a police officer was in hot pursuit of a person he had seen drive through several stop signs when the person sought refuge in a private apartment. The officer announced his presence and eventually entered the apartment without permission and arrested the person. There was a question whether Landry would apply in Maccooh given that the suspect was sought pursuant to an offence that was not indictable, but this Court held that the officer was acting under the well-established common law power of the police to enter private premises to make an arrest in hot pursuit. The policy behind such a rule is captured by the following passage from the dissent of La Forest J. in Landry, at p. 179, cited with approval by this Court in Maccooh:

As has been seen the common law sets a high value on the security and privacy of the home. The situations where it permitted entry by police without the consent of the owner or occupier were all demonstrably compelling. For example, entry to prevent murder is obviously justified. So too is entry on hot pursuit. Apart from the obvious practicality of that approach, in the case of hot pursuit the police officer is himself cognizant of the facts justifying entry; he acts on the basis of personal knowledge.

In cases of hot pursuit, society's interest in effective law enforcement takes precedence over the privacy interest and the police may enter a dwelling to make an arrest without a warrant. However, the additional burden on the police to obtain a warrant before forcibly entering a private dwelling to arrest, while not justified in a case of hot pursuit, is, in general, well worth the additional protection to the privacy interest in dwelling houses that it brings. I leave for another day the question of whether exigent circumstances other than hot pursuit may justify a warrantless entry in order to arrest. I do not agree with my colleague L'Heureux-Dubé J. that exigent circumstances generally necessarily justify a warrantless entry -- in my view, it is an open question. As with other matters in her reasons, I note that in reaching her conclusion she cites at paras. 153-54 a dissenting opinion: R. v. Silveira, 1995 CanLII 89 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 297, per L'Heureux-Dubé J.

48. While I have decided that a warrant is required prior to entering a dwelling house to make an arrest, I have not yet set out the type of warrant that is required. In my view, an arrest warrant alone is insufficient protection of the privacy rights of the suspect. I agree with Dickson C.J. when he stated in Landry at p. 162 that it was questionable whether an arrest warrant would be useful in safeguarding privacy:

I am unable, in any event, to fathom how a warrant for arrest can be perceived as a solution to the question of police authority to trespass incidental to arrest. The warrant is a judicial authorization to arrest and contains no express power of trespass. The justice of the peace must be given evidence as to the reasonable and probable grounds for making an arrest, but hears no evidence as to the likelihood or otherwise that the offender can be found at any particular location. There is no good reason, therefore, why the presence or absence of a warrant of arrest should have any bearing on the right to make an arrest in one particular place or another.

Dickson C.J. concluded that since an arrest warrant would not be useful in safeguarding privacy, and since there was (and is) no provision in the Code authorizing a search for persons, warrantless arrests in dwelling houses were permissible; otherwise suspects could take permanent refuge in a dwelling house. While I agree that an arrest warrant fails to safeguard privacy adequately, I disagree that since the Code is silent on prior authorization of a search for persons, warrantless searches for persons are permissible. In my view, privacy rights under the Charter demand that the police, in general, obtain prior judicial authorization of entry into the dwelling house in order to arrest the person. If the Code currently fails to provide specifically for a warrant containing such prior authorization, such a provision should be read in. While the absence of such a provision could have a profound influence on the common law power of arrest, its absence cannot defeat a constitutional right of the individual. Once a procedure to obtain such prior authorization is created, the concern that suspects may find permanent sanctuary in a dwelling house disappears.

49. In my view, then, warrantless arrests in dwelling houses are in general prohibited. Prior to such an arrest, it is incumbent on the police officer to obtain judicial authorization for the arrest by obtaining a warrant to enter the dwelling house for the purpose of arrest. Such a warrant will only be authorized if there are reasonable grounds for the arrest, and reasonable grounds to believe that the person will be found at the address named, thus providing individuals' privacy interests in an arrest situation with the protection Hunter required with respect to searches and seizures. Requiring a warrant prior to arrest avoids the ex post facto analysis of the reasonableness of an intrusion that Hunter held should be avoided under the Charter; invasive arrests without a basis of reasonable and probable grounds are prevented, rather than remedied after the fact. Such a policy was reflected in the following recommendation of the Law Reform Commission of Canada (Working Paper 41, Arrest (1985), at p. 115):

The sanctity of the family dwelling is such in our legal tradition that, as with search, there ought to be no forcible entry into a private dwelling unless such entry is authorized by judicial authority.

50. I would add that the protection of privacy does not end with a warrant; the other requirements in Landry for an arrest in a dwelling house must be met along with the warrant requirement. Specifically, before forcibly entering a dwelling house to make an arrest with a warrant for an indictable offence, proper announcement must be made. As Dickson C.J. stated in Landry, at p. 161, these additional requirements “minimize the invasiveness of arrest in a dwelling and permit the offender to maintain his dignity and privacy by walking to the doorway and surrendering himself”.

51. To summarize, in general, the following requirements must be met before an arrest for an indictable offence in a private dwelling is legal: a warrant must be obtained on the basis of reasonable and probable grounds to arrest and to believe the person sought is within the premises in question; and proper announcement must be made before entering. An exception to this rule occurs where there is a case of hot pursuit. Whether or not there is an exception for exigent circumstances generally has not been fully addressed by this Court, nor does it need to be decided in the present case given my view that exigent circumstances did not exist when the arrest was made. I will elaborate on this last point presently.

(c) Application to the Case at Bar

52. When the police entered the trailer where Feeney was sleeping, which constituted his dwelling house (recall that Colet, supra, stated that a rudimentary shelter may constitute a dwelling house), they did not have a warrant. Consequently, regardless of whether reasonable and probable grounds existed, or whether proper announcement was made, the arrest was illegal, unless there were exceptional circumstances. This clearly was not a case of hot pursuit, nor, in my view, did exigent circumstances exist. Lambert J.A., for a unanimous Court of Appeal, stated at p. 234 that, “the police were facing a situation which could be classified as an emergency, or as exigent circumstances which would require immediate action, and that in addition they were facing circumstances where the possibility of the destruction of evidence, particularly evidence in relation to bloodstains, was a real one and had to be addressed”. I do not agree with this characterization of the circumstances. According to James A. Fontana (The Law of Search and Seizure in Canada (3rd ed. 1992), at pp. 786-89), exigent circumstances arise usually where immediate action is required for the safety of the police or to secure and protect evidence of a crime. With respect to safety concerns, in my view, it was not apparent that the safety of the police or the community was in such jeopardy that there were exigent circumstances in the present case. The situation was the same as in any case after a serious crime has been committed and the perpetrator has not been apprehended. In any event, even if they existed, safety concerns could not justify the warrantless entry into the trailer in the present case. A simple watch of the trailer in which the police were told the appellant was sleeping, not a warrantless entry, would have sufficiently addressed any safety concerns involving the appellant. With respect to concern about the potential destruction of evidence, at the time the police entered the trailer, they had no knowledge of evidence that might be destroyed; at best, they had a suspicion that the appellant was involved in the murder. Simply because the hunch may have turned out to be justified does not legitimize the actions of the police at the time they entered the trailer. As I stated in R. v. Kokesch, 1990 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 3, at p. 29, “[i]t should not be forgotten that ex post facto justification of searches by their results is precisely what the Hunter standards were designed to prevent”.

53. The circumstances surrounding the police entry into the trailer were similar to those following any serious crime: a dangerous person is on the loose and there is a risk that he or she will attempt to destroy evidence linking him or her to the crime. To define these as exigent circumstances is to invite such a characterization of every period after a serious crime. In my view, exigent circumstances did not exist when the police entered the trailer. Consequently, even if there is an exception to the warrant requirement in exigent circumstances generally, rather than only in hot pursuit, which I refrain from deciding in the present case, the forcible entry in this case required a warrant. Given that the police had not obtained a warrant, the arrest was illegal.

The Constitutionality of the Initial Search of the Trailer

54. Hunter held that, under s. 8 of the Charter, there is a presumption that warrantless searches of premises where the occupant has a reasonable expectation of privacy is unreasonable; the onus is on the party who performed the search to prove its reasonableness. Collins, supra, outlined three requirements for a search to be reasonable: (a) the search must be authorized by law; (b) the law itself must be reasonable; and (c) the manner in which the search is carried out must be reasonable. In the specific case of arrest, Cloutier, supra, held that searches incidental to a lawful arrest may comply with s. 8. In the present case, however, the search was performed without a warrant or any other legal authority, and was not incidental to a lawful arrest. The arrest was unlawful both because the requirements for a warrantless arrest under s. 495 of the Code were not met, and, in any event, the police cannot make warrantless arrests in private dwellings unless exceptional circumstances, which were not present here, exist. Consequently, the entry into the trailer and the search and seizure of the appellant's clothing violated s. 8 of the Charter. The other evidence, the shoes, the cash and the cigarettes, was obtained under a search warrant the following day. I will return below to the question of whether this search and seizure violated the Charter.

Section 10(b)

55. Section 10(b) states that, “[e]veryone has the right on arrest or detention ... to retain and instruct counsel without delay and to be informed of that right.” With respect to the informational component of a proper s. 10(b) caution, R. v. Brydges, 1990 CanLII 123 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 190, held that the detainee must be informed of the applicable duty counsel and legal aid systems available in the jurisdiction. R. v. Pozniak, 1994 CanLII 66 (SCC), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 310, and Bartle, supra, further held that the detainee must be informed of any opportunity to access immediate, free legal advice, such as the existence of a 1-800 telephone number.

56. The requirement that a person be informed of his or her s. 10(b) rights begins upon detention or arrest. According to R. v. Therens, 1985 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 613, detention under s. 10 of the Charter occurs when a peace officer assumes control over the movement of a person by a demand or direction. In the case at bar, upon entering the trailer with gun drawn, the police officer shook the appellant's leg and told him to get out of bed. I agree with the appellant that detention began once the officer touched the appellant's leg and ordered him to rise. The appellant was not given any caution at this time. Only after the appellant had been escorted to the light, where the bloodstains were seen, and was placed under arrest was any information regarding counsel provided. In my view, the appellant had his s. 10(b) rights violated at the time of his initial detention.

57. Moreover, the majority in R. v. Manninen, 1987 CanLII 67 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1233, stated at pp. 1241-43 that:

... [section] 10(b) imposes at least two duties on the police in addition to the duty to inform the detainee of his rights. First, the police must provide the detainee with a reasonable opportunity to exercise the right to retain and instruct counsel without delay. The detainee is in the control of the police and he cannot exercise his right to counsel unless the police provide him with a reasonable opportunity to do so.

...

Further, s. 10(b) imposes on the police the duty to cease questioning or otherwise attempting to elicit evidence from the detainee until he has had a reasonable opportunity to retain and instruct counsel. The purpose of the right to counsel is to allow the detainee not only to be informed of his rights and obligations under the law but, equally if not more important, to obtain advice as to how to exercise those rights.

In the case at bar, the appellant was not given adequate opportunity to secure counsel. He was not given access to a telephone before being questioned; the police gave him the caution in the trailer, where no telephone existed. The police simply asked him whether he understood his rights, to which he replied, “Of course, do you think I am illiterate?”, or words to that effect, and then proceeded to ask him questions about the blood on his shirt and his shoes. The appellant’s s. 10(b) rights were violated by these police actions.

58. While the trial judge found a violation of the appellant’s s. 10(b) rights only after he had been taken to the Williams Lake detachment, in my view these rights were violated from the moment of detention forward. The appellant was not cautioned in any way when he was first detained, and the caution that was eventually given did not satisfy the informational requirements of s. 10(b). Furthermore, the appellant was not given an adequate opportunity to consult with counsel before being questioned. For these reasons, in my view, the statements taken in the trailer (the appellant claimed that he had been hit in the face with a baseball the previous day and stated that he only owned one pair of shoes) were taken in violation of the Charter.

Section 8 and the Search with the Warrant

59. After the initial search of the trailer and during the detention of the appellant, the police obtained a search warrant of the trailer, swearing an information that they believed they would find $300 in cash, Sportsman cigarettes, and the appellant's shoes. They then found and seized these items in the trailer. According to Kokesch, supra, and Grant, supra, the police cannot constitutionally rely upon a search warrant issued on the basis of information obtained as the result of prior Charter violations. In Kokesch, a warrant was issued on the basis of information obtained in an earlier unconstitutional, warrantless perimeter search; the search under the warrant was held to be in violation of s. 8. In the case at bar, the police obtained a warrant on the basis of the initial search of the trailer (the shirt and shoes), the initial interview (the shoes) and the later interview at Williams Lake (the cash under the mattress). As I have outlined above, in my view the police came to know about these items as the result of violations of ss. 8 and 10(b) of the Charter and would not have had grounds for a warrant supporting the second search without the violations. Consequently, the search and seizure under the warrant also violated s. 8. It would be artificial to distinguish the constitutionality of the second search from that of the initial entry into the trailer.

Section 8 and the Fingerprints

60. After he was taken to the Williams Lake detachment, the appellant was fingerprinted. The fingerprints matched prints found on the deceased's refrigerator and on an empty beer can in the deceased's truck. R. v. Beare, 1988 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 387, held that fingerprinting as an incident to a lawful arrest did not violate the Charter. In the present case, however, the arrest was unlawful and involved a variety of Charter breaches. Compelling the accused to provide fingerprints in the present context was, in my view, a violation of s. 8 of the Charter, involving as it did a search and seizure related to the appellant's body, about which, at least in the absence of an lawful arrest, there is clearly a high expectation of privacy. I should add that procedures that are taken incidental to and following an unlawful arrest, which impinge on the reasonable expectation of privacy of the arrestee, will generally constitute a breach of s. 8. Where, however, the arrest is unlawful by reason of a technicality, the product of the search may be admissible under s. 24\(2\) of the Charter.

Section 24(2)

61. Having found Charter breaches in the gathering of much of the evidence, it remains to determine whether the evidence should be excluded pursuant to s. 24(2). The evidence to consider in the s. 24(2) analysis is comprised of the bloody shirt, the initial statements given in the trailer that the appellant had been bloodied at a baseball game the previous evening and that he owned only one pair of shoes, the shoes themselves, the Sportsman cigarettes, the cash under the mattress and the fingerprints taken at Williams Lake. The inculpatory statements the appellant made at Williams Lake virtually admitting guilt, and the breathalyser sample also taken at Williams Lake, were excluded by the trial judge and these rulings are not before this Court.

Trial Fairness

62. Collins, supra, stated that the first set of factors to be considered under s. 24(2) pertains to the fairness of the trial. The majority in R. v. Stillman, 1997 CanLII 384 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 607, building on Collins and more recent authorities, refined and clarified the trial fairness aspect of the Collins test. Cory J. provided a helpful summary of trial fairness analysis at para. 119:

1. Classify the evidence as conscriptive or non-conscriptive based upon the manner in which the evidence was obtained. If the evidence is non-conscriptive, its admission will not render the trial unfair and the court will proceed to consider the seriousness of the breach and the effect of exclusion on the repute of the administration of justice.
2. If the evidence is conscriptive and the Crown fails to demonstrate on a balance of probabilities that the evidence would have been discovered by alternative non-conscriptive means, then its admission will render the trial unfair. The Court, as a general rule, will exclude the evidence without considering the seriousness of the breach or the effect of exclusion on the repute of the administration of justice. This must be the result since an unfair trial would necessarily bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

3. If the evidence is found to be conscriptive and the Crown demonstrates on a balance of probabilities that it would have been discovered by alternative non-conscriptive means, then its admission will generally not render the trial unfair. However, the seriousness of the Charter breach and the effect of exclusion on the repute of the administration of justice will have to be considered. [Emphasis in original.]

63. Thus, the first step in the trial fairness analysis is to consider whether the particular evidence is conscriptive or non-conscriptive. In defining non-conscriptive evidence, Cory J. stated at para. 75:

If the accused was not compelled to participate in the creation or discovery of the evidence (i.e., the evidence existed independently of the Charter breach in a form useable by the state), the evidence will be classified as non-conscriptive.

In defining conscriptive evidence, Cory J. stated at para. 80:

Evidence will be conscriptive when an accused, in violation of his Charter rights, is compelled to incriminate himself at the behest of the state by means of a statement, the use of the body or the production of bodily samples.

64. Characterizing the evidence in the case at bar, the first step in the trial fairness inquiry, I conclude that the bloody shirt is non-conscriptive, and thus its admission does not go to trial fairness. The bloody shirt existed in a form useable by the state independent of any actions by the state. Moreover, with respect to the bloody shirt, the appellant was not compelled to incriminate himself by means of a statement, the use of the body, or the production of bodily samples. While the appellant was asked to step into the light in order better to see him, equally the police could have simply turned on a light or inspected the shirt closely in order to examine it. The taking of the shirt did not involve the use of the appellant's body or bodily samples in a manner that rendered the evidence conscriptive; his body was not integral to the taking of the bloody shirt and thus the shirt is not conscriptive.

65. On the other hand, the statements obtained by the police in the trailer in violation of the appellant's s. 10(b) rights are clearly conscriptive evidence. By not informing the appellant of his immediate right to counsel, the police in effect compelled the statements, which statements are paradigmatic self-incriminating evidence. Having found the statements conscriptive, the next question set out in Stillman is whether alternative legal means to obtain the conscriptive evidence existed. As the Crown did not attempt to prove that the statements would have been made even in the absence of a violation of s. 10(b) (see Harper, supra, where such proof was tendered), I conclude that the statements were conscriptive and would not have been obtained without breaching the Charter. Thus, following the Stillman analysis, the statements were not "discoverable". The admission of the statements therefore would affect the fairness of the trial. Given that no exceptional circumstances exist in this case, the admission of the conscriptive, non-discoverable statements would render the trial unfair; thus the statements are inadmissible under s. 24(2).

66. The shoes were observed by the police during the initial unconstitutional search of the trailer. The shoes were later seized in a search which I have concluded violated s. 8. The shoes are clearly non-conscriptive evidence, given that they are not compelled statements or bodily samples, and did not involve the use of the appellant's body. The admission of the shoes would thus not affect trial fairness.

67. The cigarettes were also observed by the police in the initial unconstitutional search of the trailer. Later, the appellant, in the inadmissible statements given at Williams Lake, told the police that he had stolen both cash and cigarettes from Boyle. While the cigarettes, like the shoes, are facially non-conscriptive, Stillman, following on earlier cases such as R. v. Burlingham, 1995 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 206, confirmed that evidence may be considered conscriptive if it was found as the result of other conscriptive evidence, typically a statement. A characterization of such evidence as conscriptive, "derivative evidence" is appropriate where the initial conscriptive evidence is a necessary cause of the obtention of the derivative evidence. In the present case, the statements given to the police at Williams Lake did not indicate the location of the cigarettes; thus the statements could not even have been a sufficient cause for obtaining the cigarettes. While the statements might, if admissible, have added evidentiary significance to the cigarettes, the statements were not related to the discovery and seizure of the evidence; thus the cigarettes are not conscriptive, derivative evidence. Their admission would not affect trial fairness.

68. Also in making a conscriptive statement at Williams Lake, the appellant told police that he had stolen cash and had hidden it under his mattress. In the second unconstitutional search of the trailer, the police seized the cash. Like the cigarettes and the shoes, the cash is facially non-conscriptive evidence. Unlike the statement about the cigarettes, however, the conscriptive statement at Williams Lake about the cash was a sufficient cause for obtaining the cash, stating as it did the location of the cash. However, in my view, the statement was not a necessary cause of the taking of the cash. The police clearly intended to search the trailer again and I am satisfied would have done so even in the absence of the statement as to the location of the money. In conducting a second search, in my view they would have located the cash under the mattress. Given that the conscriptive statement was not a necessary cause of the taking of the money, the money was not conscriptive, derivative evidence. In this respect, this situation is similar to R. v. Black, 1989 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 138.

69. It is important to note the distinction between the test for characterizing evidence as conscriptive, derivative evidence and the test for determining whether conscriptive evidence is discoverable. Discoverability is concerned with whether a Charter breach was necessary to the discovery and obtaining of conscriptive evidence. If the conscriptive evidence would have been obtained even if the Charter had not been breached, the evidence is discoverable and its admission, despite the conscription of the accused, would not affect trial fairness. In determining discoverability, therefore, the alternative means to obtain the evidence must comply with the Charter.

70. The derivative evidence inquiry, on the other hand, is directed at determining whether a piece of evidence should be viewed as having a conscriptive nature because of its intimate relationship with other conscriptive evidence. Evidence is derivative evidence if it would not have been obtained but for the conscriptive evidence. In analyzing this question, it is not relevant whether the means by which the evidence would have been discovered in the absence of the conscription were constitutional. The inquiry is directed at whether evidence should be treated as a product of the accused's mind or body for the purposes of s. 24(2), which treatment does not depend on the constitutionality of the alternative means of discovery. Thus, in the present case, to conclude that the cash is not derivative evidence, it is sufficient to conclude that the police would have discovered the cash even if the conscripted statement at Williams Lake had not been made. It is irrelevant for the purpose of the derivative evidence inquiry that the police would have found the evidence by unconstitutional means such as the second search. Given the probable, although unconstitutional, discovery of the cash even if the conscripted statement had not been made, the cash was not conceptually a product of the appellant's mind or body. The cash, therefore, should be treated not as derivative evidence, but as non-conscriptive evidence; its admission would not affect trial fairness. I note, of course, that the unconstitutionality of the second search is a factor to be considered under other branches of the Collins test.

71. The fingerprints, as stated above, were taken in violation of the Charter. Moreover, they were conscriptive evidence -- the appellant was compelled to provide evidence from his body, his fingerprints, which incriminated him. The police would not have obtained this evidence without violating the appellant's Charter rights as they did not have reasonable and probable grounds to arrest him. The fingerprints were not discoverable. The fingerprints were conscriptive, non-discoverable evidence whose admission, given the absence of exceptional circumstances, would render the trial unfair. Consequently, the fingerprints are inadmissible.

72. Summarizing the trial fairness analysis, the bloody shirt, the shoes, the cigarettes and the money were not conscriptive evidence and thus their admission would not affect trial fairness; the statements in the trailer, as well as those at the Williams Lake detachment, and the fingerprints were conscriptive and were not discoverable, thus their admission would affect trial fairness. The statements and the fingerprints are inadmissible. The other evidence which does not affect trial fairness must be analyzed in light of the second and third branches. Analyses under these branches of the Collins test may require exclusion of the evidence.

Seriousness of the Violation

73. The violations were, in my view, very serious in the present case. One of the indicia of seriousness is whether the violations were undertaken in good faith: see Therens, supra, at p. 652; Collins, supra, at p. 285. One indication of bad faith is that the Charter violation was undertaken without any lawful authority. In R. v. Genest, 1989 CanLII 109 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 59, for example, the Court held that a search in violation of well-known common law principles was performed in bad faith. In the instant case, the police did not even have subjective belief in reasonable and probable grounds for the appellant's arrest prior to their warrantless, forced entry into his dwelling house where he was sleeping. Aside from the impact of the Charter on the requirements for warrantless arrests in dwelling houses, the absence of subjective belief in reasonable grounds indicated that the police could not have lawfully arrested the appellant under s. 495 of the Code even had he been in a public place. That they flagrantly disobeyed the law of warrantless arrests in dwelling houses as set out in Landry certainly renders the more serious the violation which directly led to the taking of the bloody shirt, and indirectly led to the taking of the shoes, cigarettes and money.

74. The trial judge found that the breach in searching the trailer “was not deliberate, wilful or flagrant and that if it occurred, it was committed in good faith”. In my view, the following passage from the majority in Kokesch, supra, at p. 32, is instructive in the present case:

The police must be taken to be aware of this Court’s judgments in Eccles and Colet, and the circumscription of police powers that those judgments represent.

Either the police knew they were trespassing, or they ought to have known. Whichever is the case, they cannot be said to have proceeded in “good faith”, as that term is understood in s. 24(2) jurisprudence.

In the present case, the police did not have subjective grounds to arrest, and thus the requirements for a warrantless arrest in a dwelling house set out in Landry were not met. Indeed, the statutory requirements to make a warrantless arrest in any location were not met. In these circumstances, as in Kokesch, the police either knew they were trespassing, or they ought to have known. The police could not be held to have acted in good faith and the trial judge erred in this respect.

75. The respondent submits that the seriousness of the violation is mitigated by the fact that if the grounds for arrest fell short of reasonable and probable grounds, they did not fall far short. I disagree that this is a mitigating factor. As discussed above, Sgt. Madrigga himself did not believe that there were reasonable grounds to arrest the appellant. In my view, the absence of a subjective belief that a necessary element of a lawful entry and arrest was present is a strong suggestion of bad faith.

76. The respondent argued that the evidence of the bloody shirt would have been discovered in any event, stating in its factum: “The police could have waited outside the trailer until the appellant eventually came out. At that time they would have observed the bloodstains on him, unless he had destroyed that evidence.” The respondent assumes that the appellant would walk out in broad daylight with bloodstains on his shirt. In my view, this suggestion is unrealistic. Moreover, the appellant need not have destroyed the evidence on the shirt in order to avoid displaying it in public, but simply could have stored the shirt in the trailer. In any event, the availability of alternative constitutional means to discover the shirt does not mitigate the seriousness of the violation even if such means did exist. As Lamer J. (as he then was) stated in Collins, supra, at p. 285, “the availability of other investigatory techniques and the fact that the evidence could have been obtained without the violation of the Charter tend to render the Charter violation more serious”. If other techniques were indeed available, it is demonstrative of bad faith and is particularly serious that the police chose to violate the appellant’s rights.

77. A conclusion that the violations were serious is reinforced by the fact that they involved the unconstitutional entry of the appellant’s dwelling house. The sanctity of the home has been recognized time and again by courts at least since Semayne’s Case, supra. The police in the present case did not have sufficient grounds either to arrest the appellant, or to obtain a search warrant, yet they forcibly entered the sleeping appellant’s one-room dwelling with guns drawn, shook him awake and began questioning him. Such behaviour is antithetical to the privacy interests protected by the Charter and cannot be condoned. I note that the respondent suggested that the police did not know the trailer was a dwelling house, but this is clearly contradicted by the evidence that Spurn had told police that the appellant was living on land he owned and that Russell had told police that the appellant was sleeping in the trailer.

78. The respondent argued that the seriousness of the intrusion into the dwelling house is mitigated by Sgt. Madrigga’s belief that the owner of the trailer had given his tacit consent to enter the trailer. In my view, this submission is unacceptable. First, the owner of the trailer did not consent to the search, but rather did not object when the police stated that they were going to “check it out” at the trailer. An inference of consent to a warrantless, forcible entry from Russell’s silence is dubious. However, even accepting that Russell had consented, this would not have justified the search nor should it mitigate the seriousness of the violation entailed by the search. Hunter, supra, was clear that an ownership interest is unnecessary in invoking s. 8; what is required is a reasonable expectation of privacy. It would be inconsistent with this emphasis on the expectation of privacy to mitigate the seriousness of the violation based on the consent of the owner of the premises rather than the person with the profound expectation of privacy associated with his dwelling house.

79. The respondent also argued that there were exigent circumstances in this case, which, according to Silveira, supra, may be a relevant consideration in a s. 24(2) analysis. As discussed above, in my view exigent circumstances did not exist in this case any more than they would exist in any situation following a serious crime. After any crime is committed, the possibility that evidence might be destroyed is inevitably present. To tend to admit evidence because of the mitigating effect of such allegedly exigent circumstances would invite the admission of all evidence obtained soon after the commission of a crime. In my view, however, there were no exigent circumstances in this case that mitigated the seriousness of the Charter breach. This is not to say that there may not be exigent circumstances arising out of matters other than the recent commission of the offence that serve to mitigate the seriousness of the breach.

80. In summary, the violations in the instant case that were associated with the gathering of the shirt, shoes, cigarettes and money were serious. The police flagrantly disregarded the appellant's privacy rights and moreover showed little regard for his s. 10(b) rights. Indeed, while such misconduct was not directly responsible for the gathering of the shirt, shoes, cigarettes and money, the fact that the appellant did not speak with a lawyer for two days following his detention, yet the police did not cease in their efforts to gather evidence from him, indicates the lack of respect for the appellant's rights displayed by the police. In light of this pattern of disregard for the rights of the appellant, in my view the obtention of the shirt, shoes, cigarettes and money was associated with very serious Charter violations.

Effect of Exclusion on the Repute of the Administration of Justice

81. The admission of the conscriptive evidence, the statements and the fingerprints, would, as discussed above, impact on the fairness of the trial. Consequently, the repute of the administration of justice would be harmed by their admission and they are inadmissible. The other evidence, while not conscriptive, was obtained as the result of a very serious intrusion of the appellant's privacy rights. Moreover, the evidence was associated with serious violations of the appellant's s. 10(b) rights, indicating a pattern of disregard for the Charter by the police in the present case.

82. While the appellant stood accused of a very serious crime, in my view the following words of Iacobucci J. in Burlingham, supra, at p. 242, apply to the present case:

... we should never lose sight of the fact that even a person accused of the most heinous crimes, and no matter the likelihood that he or she actually committed those crimes, is entitled to the full protection of the Charter. Short-cutting or short-circuiting those rights affects not only the accused, but also the entire reputation of the criminal justice system. It must be emphasized that the goals of preserving the integrity of the criminal justice system as well as promoting the decency of investigatory techniques are of fundamental importance in applying s. 24(2).

83. The serious disregard for the appellant's Charter rights in the case at bar suggests that the admission of the evidence would bring greater harm to the repute of the administration of justice than its exclusion. The shirt, shoes, cigarettes and money were inadmissible under s. 24(2), along with the statements and the fingerprints. If the exclusion of this evidence is likely to result in an acquittal of the accused as suggested by L'Heureux-Dubé J. in her reasons, then the Crown is deprived of a conviction based on illegally obtained evidence. Any price to society occasioned by the loss of such a conviction is fully justified in a free and democratic society which is governed by the rule of law.

Conclusion on Section 24(2)

84. As stated, in my view the statements, fingerprints, shirt, shoes and money are inadmissible under s. 24(2). The respondent pointed out that this Court has stated that appellate courts owe deference to lower courts on the question of the admissibility of evidence under s. 24(2): see, e.g., Grant, supra. In the case at bar, both the trial judge and the Court of Appeal held, as alternative holdings, that they would admit the evidence in question even if there had been breaches of the Charter. In my view, both the trial judge and the Court of Appeal erred in these alternative conclusions, and it is difficult to evaluate their reasoning since very little was said in this respect. The trial judge simply listed the factors set out in Collins, supra, with a brief conclusion on each point. The trial judge did not group the points into the three broad factors, nor did he set out his reasons for each conclusion. The Court of Appeal listed the Collins factors and stated its conclusion that, on balance, the evidence should be admitted. In my view, neither of these judgments should be afforded particular deference. First, neither the trial judge nor the Court of Appeal found a breach with respect to the taking of the evidence in question, which error in law likely influenced their alternative conclusion that the breaches, if they existed, were not serious. Second, as noted above, the trial judge erred in concluding that the police acted in good faith. Third, the reasons of the trial judge and the Court of Appeal were so brief and conclusionary that it is difficult to say whether other errors were made. In my view, pursuant to s. 24(2), the shirt, the statements, the shoes, the cigarettes, the cash and the fingerprints should not have been admitted.

Conclusion and Disposition

85. The trial judge erred by failing to find a Charter breach with respect to the taking of the bloody shirt, the statements in the trailer, the shoes, the cigarettes and the fingerprints. Moreover, the evidence was inadmissible according to s. 24(2) of the Charter. I would allow the appeal, set aside the conviction and order a new trial.

The reasons of L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier and McLachlin JJ. were delivered by

86. L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ J. (dissenting) -- The main issue raised in this appeal concerns the authority of the police to enter a private dwelling without a warrant in order to effect an arrest. I have had the advantage of reading the reasons of my colleague Justice Sopinka, but am unable to agree with his disposition of this case, or with many of his conclusions. Although Sopinka J. has set out the facts and judgments, the particular circumstances of this case are important to the ultimate decision I reach, and I will thus recount the salient facts in some detail and outline aspects of the judgments which I find of particular relevance to the issues.

I. Facts

87. Early on the morning of June 8, 1991, at around 8:20 a.m., 85-year-old Frank Boyle was found dead in his home, the victim of several vicious blows to the head from a blunt, metal instrument. The blows were apparently struck with such force that the pathologist called to give evidence testified that any one of them by itself could have caused death. The murder scene was covered with the deceased's blood which was spattered over the surrounding walls and furniture. The murder took place near the town of Likely, British Columbia, a small, isolated community with a population of roughly 300 people.

88. The nearest RCMP detachment was in Williams Lake, over one hour's drive from the Boyle residence. Among the first officers to arrive, at around 9:30 a.m., was Sergeant Madrigga, who took charge of the investigation. After examining the murder scene, the officers learned that the victim's red Datsun pickup truck had been found abandoned in a ditch, driven off the road that morning about half a kilometer west of the Boyle residence on Cedar Creek Road. The police attended there and were met by a resident of the area, Cindy Potter, who informed them that she had driven along that road near the victim's home earlier that morning. At that time, she noticed the appellant walking away from the scene of the truck accident toward his home. He had something in his hand which looked like a stick or a beer.

89. The police also spoke with Kelly Spurn, another resident of the area, who informed them that there had been a second accident at exactly the same spot earlier that morning. Spurn had been told by Dale Russell that the appellant, who lived on the property of his sister and Mr. Russell, had stolen a vehicle off Russell's property that morning and crashed it on the same spot as the pickup truck which was later discovered. Spurn examined the site and assumed that the two accidents were caused by the same person because "the skid marks were the same and it was crashed on the same side of the road". Neither resident believed Boyle had been driving his vehicle at the time of the crash as he was known to be a slow, extremely cautious driver. Spurn urged the police to speak with Russell who, he said, had some information about the crime. At this point, the police began to proceed on the assumption that whoever had stolen the victim's vehicle was likely to have been involved in the murder as well. Sgt. Madrigga also suspected that the murderer would likely be covered in blood, given the severity of the crime.

90. When the police arrived at the property where the appellant was living, Russell confirmed that the appellant was staying with them as a guest. He added that earlier that morning the appellant had stolen a vehicle and crashed it into a telephone pole just down from Boyle's residence, in exactly the same spot as Boyle's truck was later found. After retrieving the vehicle, Russell returned home. Around 7:00 a.m. he saw the appellant return home and go to bed in a small storage trailer behind the house where he normally slept.

91. After receiving all this information, Sgt. Madrigga, accompanied by two other officers, went to the trailer, knocked on the door and yelled, "Police". There was no answer. With his gun drawn, but by his side, he opened the door and entered. He saw the appellant lying on a bunk at the back of the trailer, apparently asleep. Sgt. Madrigga walked into the trailer, shook the appellant's leg and said, "Wake up, police. I want to talk to you." The officer asked the appellant to step to the entrance because the trailer was dark and he could not see well. They moved toward the door, and the officer saw that the appellant's shirt was splattered with blood. Sgt. Madrigga then placed the appellant under arrest and advised another officer to read him his rights. The appellant acknowledged that he understood his rights.

92. Sgt. Madrigga then asked the appellant how he got the blood on him. He replied that he had been hit in the face by a baseball the previous day. The appellant had no marks on his face. The police removed the shirt the appellant was wearing and took him to the Williams Lake RCMP detachment. Nothing was seized from the trailer at that time. The police subsequently obtained a search warrant and retrieved a sum of money hidden under a mattress, a package of cigarettes, and the appellant's running shoes.

93. Once at the police station, the appellant tried several times unsuccessfully to contact a lawyer. A few minutes later, the police administered a breathalyser test without telling the appellant he had any choice in the matter. His alcohol blood readings, taken 17 minutes apart, were .08 and .07.

94. That evening, despite the fact that he wished to speak with a lawyer and had not yet done so, the appellant was questioned. He eventually admitted striking Boyle, and stealing beer, money and cigarettes from his residence. The next morning, the appellant was fingerprinted and photographed and finally spoke with a lawyer.

II. Judgments

95. During the course of a lengthy voir dire, the appellant challenged the admissibility of most of the evidence sought to be adduced against him, alleging violations of ss. 7, 8, 9 and 10(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Essentially, the appellant's position was that the initial entry into the trailer was an unlawful one as the police officers lacked any legal authority to enter. As such, it was an unreasonable search which contravened s. 8 of the Charter. The arrest which subsequently took place was an arbitrary one as it was not based on reasonable and probable grounds as required by law. The appellant argued that the officer who entered the trailer had only a mere suspicion that the appellant was involved in the crime, which was confirmed when he saw the bloody shirt. As for the statements, breathalyser results and fingerprints, these were the product of the appellant's not having been properly informed of his right to counsel and being prevented from exercising it. As a result, the appellant asked the court to exclude the evidence pursuant to s. 24(2) as admitting it would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

96. Leggatt J. made several important findings of fact in making his ruling. At the outset, he stated that "it [was] important to note that Likely is a small community of about 300 people". He found that normally there tended to be very little traffic on Cedar Creek Road that early in the morning and it was therefore an unusual occurrence to see an accident and the appellant walking away from it at that time. Taking into consideration the totality of the circumstances, it was reasonable to assume that the appellant was a prime suspect in the murder. In addition, he found that the investigating officer "had to be concerned about the destruction of vital evidence" when he went to the trailer and that he was "in active pursuit of what had to be his prime suspect, not long after the alleged crime". He also accepted the testimony of the investigating officer that a proper announcement was made before entry. Perhaps most importantly, he found that when Sgt. Madrigga entered the trailer, objectively, there were reasonable and probable grounds for the arrest of the appellant.

97. The trial judge found that both the entry and the subsequent arrest were lawful, concluding:

Given the surrounding circumstances I have outlined, the need to preserve evidence, the clear indication that the accused was a prime suspect, I believe the arrest took place in compliance with both the Criminal Code and the Charter. I rule the arrest is lawful.

The arrest being lawful, the action to seize the accused's shirt was reasonable. That being the case the incidental search to the arrest was also lawful.

He subsequently went on to discuss s. 24(2), and found that in the event he was mistaken with regard to the arrest and entry, he would admit the evidence anyway, as to exclude it would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. Since the initial entry was ruled lawful, it also followed that the search warrant withstood scrutiny.

98. As for the statements, Leggatt J. found that the appellant's initial response regarding why his shirt was covered with blood was made after the appellant had been properly informed of his rights under s. 10(b) of the Charter and thus, was admissible. He did find, however that both the breathalyser evidence and the statements made at the police station were obtained as a result of a breach of the right to counsel. Pursuant to s. 24(2) of the Charter, this evidence was excluded. The rulings with respect to the statements at the police station and the breathalyser results were not disputed on appeal by the respondent, and are not at issue here.

99. After the impugned evidence was admitted, the appellant was found guilty by a jury of second degree murder.

British Columbia Court of Appeal (1995), 1995 CanLII 1016 \(BC CA\), 54 B.C.A.C. 228

100. A unanimous court dismissed the appeal. The court refrained from dealing individually with each of the alleged Charter breaches related to the entry of the trailer, as it found that even had the trial judge made an error on the resolution of these issues, the police conduct in question was justified by the existence of exigent circumstances.

Lambert J.A. concluded at p. 234:

...in my opinion, the search of the premises constituted by the trailer was lawful within recognized additions to the rule that a search must be based on reasonable and probable grounds. Those additions are that reasonable and probable grounds may not be necessary where there is an emergency or where there are exigent circumstances or where the prevention of the destruction of evidence on an immediate basis is called for. It is therefore not necessary in this case to deal with any particular principle relating to articulable cause creating a basis for entry and search at a level less than reasonable and probable cause.

The same emergency and exigency and fear for the destruction of evidence also made lawful the detention of the appellant in his bed, if it was a detention, and the requirement that he move to the door of the trailer where his clothing and appearance could be seen.

Continuing, Lambert J.A. said inter alia:

Quite separately, even if there could be said to have been a Charter breach or a number of Charter breaches lying in the police conduct before the arrest, it is my opinion that “having regard to all of the circumstances” (to use the words of s. 24(2) of the Charter) the admission of the evidence that was obtained by the police conduct and admitted by the trial judge was not such that its “admission ... in the proceedings would bring the administration of justice into disrepute”.

101. Lambert J.A. went on to address s. 10(b) and concluded that the warning given to the accused was in compliance with the requirements mandated by the decision of this Court in R. v. Bartle, 1994 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 173.

III. Analysis

102. The appellant’s position before this Court is that the police investigation included several violations of the Charter. During the course of their inquiries, the police are alleged to have breached ss. 7, 8, 9 and 10(b) of the Charter. Essentially, with the exception of the s. 10(b) argument, with which I propose to deal separately, the allegations focus upon the conduct of the police from the point they entered the trailer where the appellant was sleeping. According to the appellant, the police did not have reasonable and probable grounds to believe that he was the perpetrator of the crime, and thus the entry into the trailer was unlawful. As a result, the entry, along with the search that followed, contravened s. 8 of the Charter. The appellant also maintains that the arrest only occurred after the police officer confirmed his “hunch” by discovering new evidence, and thus violated ss. 7 and 9 of the Charter. Finally, the subsequent search of the trailer was performed on the basis of a search warrant obtained primarily on the strength of unconstitutionally obtained evidence and the resulting evidence should also be excluded.

103. As can be seen, all of these contentions are linked by a common focal point: they stand or fall on the strength of the appellant’s argument that the original entry by the police into the trailer was unlawful. The trial judge, after carefully weighing the evidence, determined that the police entered the trailer in order to arrest the appellant and were justified in so doing. In my view, this finding was a proper one, and this appeal therefore need not be resolved in the manner chosen by the Court of Appeal.

(A) Section 8 of the Charter -- The Initial Entry

104. The appellant has contended that the initial entry by the police trespassed upon his right to privacy under s. 8 of the Charter. In analyzing a potential s. 8 breach, two inquiries must take place. The first is concerned with determining whether the police conduct, taking into account all of the circumstances, interfered with the reasonable expectations of privacy enjoyed by the appellant. If so, the second part of the s. 8 analysis relates to whether this interference was reasonable: R. v. Edwards, 1996 CanLII 255 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 128, at para. 33.

105. The first inquiry is easily satisfied here. Notwithstanding the fact that he was not the owner of the trailer, the appellant clearly enjoyed a reasonable expectation of privacy there: Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, at pp. 158-59.

The facts demonstrate that he was the usual occupant of the premises, paid rent to his sister, and thus, under normal circumstances had a right to be left alone.

106. The second inquiry raises more cause for concern. A warrantless entry such as the one in the case at hand is presumed to be unreasonable and in contravention of s. 8 of the Charter. The Crown can rebut this presumption, and demonstrate that the invasion of privacy was reasonable if:

(a) the search was authorized by law;

(b) the law authorizing the search was reasonable, and;

(c) the manner in which the search was conducted was reasonable.

(See R. v. Collins, 1987 CanLII 84 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265, at p. 278, and R. v. Debot, 1989 CanLII 13 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 1140.)

107. The respondent has argued that the entry in this instance was authorized by law as a valid exercise of the police arrest power. According to this theory, Sgt. Madrigga's entry into the trailer was justified on the basis of its being necessary to exercise his power of arrest without a warrant under s. 495(1) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46. In addition, reliance is placed upon the common law authority to enter a private residence for the purpose of arrest as described in the pre-Charter case of Eccles v. Bourque, 1974 CanLII 191 (SCC), [1975] 2 S.C.R. 739, and the post-Charter case of R. v. Landry, 1986 CanLII 48 (SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 145 (although the offence was committed prior to the advent of the Charter).

108. My colleague Sopinka J. has concluded that the entry and subsequent search in the case at bar did, in fact, violate s. 8 of the Charter. He comes to this conclusion essentially for two reasons: (1) the entry did not comply with the common law and statutory requirements, and hence was not authorized by law and, (2) even assuming the entry was authorized by law, the common law as set out in Landry, supra, and Eccles, supra, cannot withstand Charter scrutiny. With respect, I am unable to agree with either of these conclusions. As will be seen, I am of the view that the officers did, in fact, comply with the legal requirements necessary to effect an arrest upon private premises, and that arrests of this kind maintain the appropriate balance between privacy and the need to enforce the law in the Charter era.

Was the Search Authorized by Law?

109. The Code provides for several situations where a police officer may arrest a suspect without a warrant. These are specifically enumerated in s. 495(1) which states:

495. (1) A peace officer may arrest without warrant

(a) a person who has committed an indictable offence or who, on reasonable grounds, he believes has committed or is about to commit an indictable offence;

(b) a person whom he finds committing a criminal offence; or

(c) a person in respect of whom he has reasonable grounds to believe that a warrant of arrest or committal, in any form set out in Part XXVIII in relation thereto, is in force within the territorial jurisdiction in which the person is found.

110. Aside from these requirements, however, the Code does not offer guidance as to exactly where an arrest can be effected. In the case at bar, the appellant's concern is that the arrest occurred in a private residence, where, it has been suggested, different rules apply as to exactly when the police may enter without the consent of the occupant.

111. As Sopinka J. sets out, however, the power to arrest without warrant on private premises was confirmed at common law in the cases of Eccles, supra and Landry, supra. In Landry, Dickson C.J., at p. 165, set out four requirements necessary to effect a lawful arrest on private premises:

(1) The offence must be indictable.

(2) The person who is the subject of the arrest must have committed the offence in question, or the peace officer, on reasonable and probable grounds, must believe that the person has committed the offence.

(3) There must be reasonable and probable grounds for the belief that the person sought is within the premises.

(4) There must be a proper announcement before entry.

112. I agree with my colleague Sopinka J. that both criteria 1 and 3 were fulfilled in the case at bar. Therefore, the issues remaining to be resolved are whether the requisite reasonable and probable grounds for arrest existed, and whether proper announcement was made prior to entry.

113. The police are never required to demonstrate that they possessed anything more than reasonable and probable grounds prior to making an arrest. It is not necessary to establish that proof of culpability exists beyond a reasonable doubt, or that there is even a prima facie case for conviction: R. v. Storrey, 1990 CanLII 125 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 241, at p. 250. In Storrey, this Court ruled that in order to arrest, the officer must have a subjective belief in these reasonable and probable grounds, and that this belief must be justifiable objectively as well.

114. The trial judge found that, objectively speaking, there were reasonable and probable grounds to arrest the appellant. In my view, he was justified in coming to that conclusion. A reasonable person with the officer's knowledge would have had little difficulty in believing that the appellant had committed the offence in question. The reasonable grounds could be based on the following:

- (a) the victim had been very recently murdered and his home ransacked;
- (b) the killing took place in a small community at a time when there would not be very many people moving around;
- (c) the victim's pickup truck was driven off the road one-half kilometer from his home at some time between 6:20 a.m. and 6:48 a.m.;
- (d) the circumstances of the accident made it apparent that the driver of the pickup was not the victim since he was known to be a very slow and cautious driver;
- (e) the garage where the pickup was normally kept was left open which, according to one witness, was rather unusual;
- (f) the reasonable inference from these facts that someone had stolen the victim's vehicle and that this person was also the one who had ransacked his home and killed him, or at least had been involved in the crime;
- (g) a witness who saw the appellant walking along the road away from the scene of the accident toward his home;
- (h) the fact that earlier the same morning, the appellant had stolen another vehicle and had driven it off the road in exactly the same spot;
- (I) the statement of a resident of the community who had examined skid marks from both accidents and based on his knowledge of the circumstances of the first accident, believed that the appellant had also taken the victim's car.

115. My colleague, at para. 36, has concluded that these facts, taken together, do not constitute sufficient reasonable and probable grounds, as all the police were aware of was the following:

The salient facts known to the police prior to their entry of the trailer are as follows: (a) it appeared that Boyle's truck had been stolen before being in an accident, and Cindy Potter claimed to have seen "Michael" walking near the site of the accident; (b) Kelly Spurn told police that he assumed the appellant had crashed Boyle's truck since the appellant had crashed earlier that morning in about the same place with a different truck; and (c) Dale Russell told police that the appellant came home around 7:00 a.m. after drinking all night and that the appellant had earlier crashed a vehicle at the spot where Boyle's truck was found. In my view, these facts did not constitute reasonable and probable grounds to arrest the appellant for the murder of Boyle. Whether or not the appellant had been involved in two similar truck accidents, or might have stolen Boyle's truck, does not raise reasonable and probable grounds to believe that he had murdered Boyle. This evidence may have pointed to the appellant as a suspect, but these facts without more do not justify an arrest.

116. In my view, this approach, with respect, fails to take into account the combined effect of the facts in light of the particular context of this case. On the contrary, it would seem that my colleague has lifted these circumstances from where they occurred and instead, treated them as if they took place in a vacuum. Once the facts are returned to their proper setting, however, I believe a much different picture emerges.

117. As the trial judge recognized, this crime occurred in a very small community, at a time of day when there was not likely to be a lot of traffic on the road. For the appellant to be seen walking a short distance away from the scene of a motor vehicle accident involving the victim's car at that time of the morning, was, as three separate witnesses testified, an extremely unusual occurrence. While the mere fact of the appellant's being present at the scene of an accident involving the deceased's car might not be particularly probative in a city with thousands of people, it is extremely probative given the location, the time in which it occurred and the remote possibility, given the corroborating evidence to that effect, that someone else in the small community was the person who had driven the car off the road. I find it extremely significant that several officers as well as residents of the area all immediately came to the conclusion that it was the appellant who had taken the victim's car and driven it off the road. As one witness put it, "A led to B and C and we assumed that it was caused by him." In my view, it was a logical inference for the police to suppose that whoever had stolen the vehicle was also the person who had committed the murder. Once the police linked the appellant to the accident scene, it was obvious that he was the prime suspect.

118. In this regard, I note that our Court has previously discussed the different standards applicable to rural and urban settings in R. v. Wilson, 1990 CanLII 109 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1291. What may not reach the level of reasonable and probable grounds in one place may well in another. Here, the unusual circumstances of the offence that the officers were informed of should not be examined as if they occurred in downtown Vancouver. The trial judge demonstrated that he was sensitive to the nature of the information received and to the setting in which it was discovered. On the basis of these facts, I concur with his finding that there existed reasonable and probable grounds to conclude that it was the appellant who had committed the offence.

119. This finding of objectively reasonable and probable grounds is not determinative, however. As aforementioned, a peace officer, before arresting without warrant, must possess a subjective belief that reasonable and probable grounds to arrest exist. The appellant has alleged that in the case at bar, this subjective belief was manifestly lacking. In support of his argument he has referred to Sgt. Madrigga's testimony on the voir dire, in which the officer responded to cross-examination as follows:

Q Okay. Now at that point, the three of you were going to see Mr. Feeney?

A That's correct.

Q Because you wanted to question him about this, right?

A That's correct.

Q And at that point as you are going to the trailer, you would agree with me you had no intention of arresting Mr. Feeney?

A No, I just wanted to check what he had been doing.

Q And, of course, you didn't have a warrant for his arrest?

A No, I did not.

Q Because basically there wouldn't have been enough information to obtain a warrant?

A That's correct.

A few minutes later, the following exchange occurred:

Q And from the time you went into the trailer, there was no suggestion that you were going to let Mr. Feeney walk out of the trailer and go away?

A If I had no further evidence. If I had -- when I went in and talked to him, if I had nothing to indicate that he was involved in this, I would -- it was shaky if I would have had grounds for his arrest at that time, but I had to check it out because I had people ask or tell me that this person was in the area.

Q All right, so let's see if we agree on something. At the time you went into the trailer, you didn't feel that you had grounds for his arrest, but when you saw the blood splatter on him after looking at him, that's why you said --

A I had grounds to suspect he could have been involved, sir, and I would be negligent in my duty if I did not check that out.

Q Oh, I'm not arguing that point, Sargent [sic]. But you didn't have grounds for an arrest?

A Not for an arrest at that time.

120. The appellant alleges that these paragraphs support the inference that Sgt. Madrigga, upon entering the trailer, did not have reasonable and probable grounds to arrest. In my view, these paragraphs must be viewed in context and cumulatively with all the evidence of the officer. Later on in Sgt. Madrigga's testimony, he said the following:

Q On the other hand, what made you think you could walk in [to the trailer]?

A Well, I had, in my mind, sir, I had, as far as I was concerned, I had a suspect. If he would have, as I stated, if he would have come out when I knocked on the door, then I wouldn't have gone in. However, I had two people stating he had been in the area. I had Dale telling me that a vehicle of his had been dumped basically in the same spot that Mr. Boyle's vehicle had been dumped a short time after, like Mr. [sic] or Dale had moved his vehicle and then this other vehicle was dumped there, puts Mr. Feeney right at the area. I have him walking away from the area a short while later. To me that gave me --

Q Walking to his home?

A Walking to his home, coming from, basically from the area. Now, in Likely there is not a lot of people walking on the streets maybe at night in Likely but in the morning, I policed this area for seven years and I'm not saying that it is not unusual but when the people first started moving, which Cindy Potter was going to work, and she drives that road quite regular and to her, it was unusual that this person was walking down there because that's why she mentioned it to us.

...

Q Let's get this plain. You had no permission from anybody to walk into that building? Permission, not somebody stopping you?

A No, not verbal permission as such but, yes, but then I felt a person who was involved in a crime was in that residence.

121. These passages in their totality give a much better impression of the arresting officer's state of mind leading up to the arrest. What they illustrate is an officer who knew that a suspect, someone involved in a crime, was inside the trailer. These responses demonstrate that, contrary to what some of the earlier passages might suggest, the officer did indeed possess the requisite reasonable and probable grounds to enter the house.

122. Of course, the phrase "reasonable and probable grounds" is not a term of everyday usage and when precisely that threshold is reached is open to some debate. A police officer seeking to apply this standard should not be held to the strict exactitude of a lawyer, or justice swearing out a warrant. Where, as here, a skillful cross-examination elicits the desired responses from an officer, it should not automatically be assumed that the officer lacked the required justification to effect an arrest. The statements of Macfarlane J.A. in R. v. Grunwald, [1991] B.C.J. No. 235, at pp. 19-20, are apposite:

In short, the appellant submits that the police had nothing but suspicion before the vehicle was searched, and that the appellant had the right to be left alone. Reference is made to the cross-examination of Constable McGowan who testified that he "was speculating" that a drug transaction had occurred between Cundict and the appellant and that "I believed there were narcotics in that blue bag and I wanted to confirm my suspicions".

Taken at face value, these words would support a conclusion that "he did not believe on reasonable grounds" but one must be careful when addressing a question of this kind of proceeding on the footing that police constables use words with the precision of a judge or a professor of classics. [Emphasis added.]

(See also: R. v. Zastowny (1992), 1992 CanLII 580 \(BC CA\), 76 C.C.C. (3d) 492 (B.C.C.A.), at p. 499.)

123. I find further support for this conclusion in the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in R. v. Breton (1994), 1994 CanLII 939 \(ON CA\), 74 O.A.C. 99. In that case, a police officer was questioned on a voir dire as to whether he believed he possessed the requisite reasonable and probable grounds to obtain a search warrant. Under cross-examination, the officer testified that he “suspected” the accused was engaging in criminal behavior. After adopting Grunwald, supra, Morden A.C.J.O., at p. 106, went on to say that the officer “used the term ‘suspected’ to refer to persons whom he believed had committed an offence”. Virtually identical language was used by the arresting officer in this case.

124. The existence of reasonable and probable grounds is a legal standard and is subject to interpretation. Furthermore, I believe that, at its core, reasonable and probable grounds is “a ‘common-sense’ concept which should incorporate the experience of the officer”: Christopher Slobogin, “Testilying: Police Perjury and What to Do About It” (1996), 67 U. Colo. L. Rev. 1037, at p. 1056. There are no absolute magic words necessary to define when this standard has been reached. As the United States Supreme Court stated in Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983), at pp. 231-32:

... the central teaching of our decisions bearing on the probable-cause standard is that it is a “practical, nontechnical conception.” Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160, 176 ... (1949). “In dealing with probable cause, ... as the very name implies, we deal with probabilities. These are not technical; they are the factual and practical considerations of everyday life on which reasonable and prudent men, not legal technicians, act.” Our observation in United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411, 418 ... (1981), regarding “particularized suspicion,” is also applicable to the probable-cause standard:

“The process does not deal with hard certainties, but with probabilities. Long before the law of probabilities was articulated as such, practical people formulated certain common-sense conclusions about human behavior; jurors as fact-finders are permitted to do the same -- and so are law enforcement officers. Finally, the evidence thus collected must be seen and weighed not in terms of library analysis by scholars, but as understood by those versed in the field of law enforcement.”

As these comments illustrate, probable cause is a fluid concept -- turning on the assessment of probabilities in particular factual contexts -- not readily, or even usefully, reduced to a neat set of legal rules. [Emphasis added.]

125. Here, an officer believed he was legally justified in entering a private dwelling to pursue a suspect whom he felt had been involved in a serious criminal offence. His belief was also supported by an objective assessment of the evidence at hand. The fact that a skillful cross examination elicited a response which could be interpreted as doubt should not detract from this intention. An officer's inability to articulate the legal terminology properly which granted the authority to enter should not invalidate a proper entry.

126. In summary, I conclude that in effecting the arrest of the appellant, the officer possessed the requisite reasonable and probable grounds. As a result, it is unnecessary for me to consider the suggestion of the Court of Appeal that, had the police not possessed reasonable and probable grounds to arrest, they would have nonetheless been authorized to enter because of the presence of exigent circumstances.

127. As a secondary argument, counsel for the appellant also stressed that upon entry Sgt. Madrigga did not possess an intention to arrest the appellant, and that that shortcoming is fatal to any claim to have entered lawfully on that basis. According to this view, upon entrance into a private dwelling the police must be focused solely upon arrest, and cannot enter, as here, with the subsidiary intention of investigating to either "clear or implicate Mr. Feeney". I disagree. It is well established that the key element of an arrest is the existence of reasonable and probable grounds. The police are not obliged to arrest in all situations. On the contrary, it is perfectly acceptable for the police to enter for the purpose of arrest, while recognizing that evidence discovered within may well dispel their reasonably held belief. As Traynor J., for a majority of the Supreme Court of California said in People v. Simon, 290 P.2d 531 (1955), at p. 533:

Thus, if the officer is entitled to make an arrest on the basis of information available to him before he searches, and as an incident to that arrest is entitled to make a reasonable search of the person arrested and the place where he is arrested, there is nothing unreasonable in his conduct if he makes the search before instead of after the arrest. In fact, if the person searched is innocent and the search convinces the officer that his reasonable belief to the contrary is erroneous, it is to the advantage of the person searched not to be arrested. On the other hand, if he is not innocent or the search does not establish his innocence, the security of his person, house, papers, or effects suffers no more from a search preceding his arrest than it would from the same search following it. In either case the important considerations are whether the officer had reasonable cause before the search to make an arrest and whether the search and any seizures incident thereto were or were not more extensive than would reasonably be justified as incident to an arrest. [Emphasis added.]

This statement has been approved of by the United States Supreme Court: Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98 (1980), at pp. 109-110; and by various appellate courts in Canada: R. v. Debot (1986), 1986 CanLII 113 (ON CA), 30 C.C.C. (3d) 207 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 225, appeal dismissed without reference to this point, 1989 CanLII 13 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 1140; R. v. Charlton (1992), 1992 CanLII 367 (BC CA), 15 B.C.A.C. 272, at p. 280.

128. This approach has much to commend it. As Martin J.A. stated in Debot, supra, at p. 225:

The reasoning of Traynor J. contemplates the situation where an officer has probable cause to arrest the suspect but postpones his or her decision to arrest the suspect. The officer, thus, avoids making an actual arrest, if the search proves that his or her belief that there was probable cause was erroneous. In my view, it may also very well be that a police officer, notwithstanding that he or she has reasonable and probable grounds upon which to make an arrest, may decide that, if the search does not disclose evidence of the offence, there would be no chance of obtaining a conviction. Hence, the officer may decide not to proceed further by making an arrest.

129. This type of procedure has the benefit of being less intrusive than an arrest. By seeking to confirm the reasonable belief they held, the police are able to avoid using the more intrusive procedure (an arrest) by substituting the less intrusive procedure (the search) first. There is, of course, nothing improper about continuing an investigation after an arrest is made: Storrey, supra, at pp. 252-55.

130. It follows, therefore, that the arrest in the case at bar complied with the second requirement set out in Landry, supra, in that the necessary reasonable and probable grounds were present. The sole remaining factor to consider is whether a proper announcement was made before the police entered the premises.

131. My colleague Sopinka J. implies, albeit without firmly deciding, that the announcement in this case was somehow deficient by virtue of the fact that the police did not state their purpose prior to entry as required by Eccles, supra. In that case, Dickson J. (as he then was) described the requirements for a proper announcement as follows, at p. 747:

In the ordinary case police officers, before forcing entry, should give (i) notice of presence by knocking or ringing the doorbell, (ii) notice of authority, by identifying themselves as law enforcement officers and (iii) notice of purpose, by stating a lawful reason for entry. Minimally they should request admission and have admission denied although it is recognized there will be occasions on which, for example, to save someone within the premises from death or injury or to prevent destruction of evidence or if in hot pursuit notice may not be required.

132. It is not contested by the appellant that, in the case at bar, the first two criteria were satisfied. He does submit, however, that the notice of purpose was not properly made. I agree with him to the extent that no notice of purpose was given prior to entry. Nevertheless, in my view, such a shortcoming is not necessarily fatal.

133. This is not the first time this Court has been faced with an allegedly deficient notice requirement. In R. v. Miller, 1988 CanLII 99 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 230, aff'g (1986), 1986 CanLII 4621 (SK CA), 25 C.C.C. (3d) 554 (Sask. C.A.), the police entered a dwelling house and did not make an announcement of their purpose until they actually encountered the owner of the property. The trial judge found that this late notice of purpose was unlawful. The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal, however, unanimously reversed, making it clear that the exact requirements of an announcement would depend on the unique circumstances of each case. As stated by Vancise J.A., at pp. 565-66:

In the circumstances of this case, I am satisfied that the police officers made “a proper announcement” of their identity and their purpose as soon as possible to the owner and that in these circumstances they discharged their duty to gain entry for the purpose of arresting without warrant.... [Emphasis added.]

134. This Court unanimously dismissed the appeal as of right, Dickson C.J. stating at p. 230 that “We find no error on the part of the Court of Appeal”.

135. In R. v. Jenkins, [1992] O.J. No. 672 (Prov. Div.), a similar situation arose. In that case, the officers had good reason to believe that the subject of the arrest was choosing to ignore the arrival of the officers. After knocking for some time, and aware that the suspect was inside, one of the officers finally entered the apartment. The accused contended that the entry was unlawful as there was no notice of purpose. MacDonnell Prov. Div. J. disagreed, holding:

In my opinion, it follows that while the police must satisfy certain requirements before entering a dwelling house to effect an arrest, and in particular must make a proper announcement, the person sought cannot yet obtain sanctuary by placing him or herself within the house in a position where no proper announcement can be heard and no request for permission to enter can be made. If the ability of the officers to make an announcement is frustrated by the refusal of the person sought to come to the door, the officers' obligation to provide complete notice is suspended, and they may enter the premises. The duty to announce their purpose is re-engaged when it becomes feasible to do so, that is, once they encounter someone to whom notice can be given. [Emphasis added.]

See also: R. v. Bennett, [1996] O.J. No. 4137 (Gen. Div.).

136. I agree. Simply stated, the notice of purpose requirement would be rather hollow if it had to be made, in all cases, in such a way that the entire reason for giving it would be defeated. As stated by Dickson C.J. in Landry, supra, at p. 161 the notice requirement “permit[s] the offender to maintain his dignity and privacy by walking to the doorway and surrendering himself.” The approach suggested above recognizes that in some cases it would be contrary to common sense to announce the purpose of entry once it was clear that the person inside was refusing or unable to answer the request to enter.

137. In my view, we are clearly faced with such a case here. Before entering, the officers were informed that the appellant was, in all likelihood, sound asleep. After knocking on the door, calling out “police” and receiving no answer, they were perfectly entitled to assume that the appellant was either asleep or ignoring their requests to enter. In either case, it would have been useless for them to have called out their purpose for entry. On the contrary, the only effective way to satisfy the notice requirement was to suspend its delivery until the appellant was in a position to receive it.

138. It is clear from the facts that the arresting officer informed the appellant of his purpose for entry, and restated his identity the moment it was feasible to do so. As he woke the appellant, Sgt. Madrigga stated: “Wake up, it’s the police. I want to talk to you.” While this is not the most complete notice of purpose imaginable, I do not believe this requirement was ever intended to compel the police to make complex legal statements: R. v. Dupuis (1994), 1994 ABCA 401 \(CanLII\), 162 A.R. 197 (C.A.), at p. 199. In this light, I agree with the comments of Hill J. in R. v. Anderson (1996), 1996 CanLII 8301 \(ON SC\), 49 C.R. (4th) 305 (Ont. Gen. Div.), at p. 317, that “[p]rovided that the words of the police bear some rough equivalency in terms of communicating notice of a lawful exercise of duty the announcement is adequate”. In my view, given the circumstances of this case, the wording utilized by the officer was sufficient.

139. I note in passing that my colleague Sopinka J. also appears to suggest that the announcement requirement might not have been met in this case because of the fact that the officers were not denied admission prior to entering. I disagree. Having admission denied does not require a formal refusal by the person within the premises into which entrance is sought. Such a requirement would be completely inconsistent with the entire justification for entry. It would be a rather strange result if a person evading arrest could avoid capture merely by ignoring the request of the police for admission. Surely, where the police have reasonable and probable grounds to believe the person is actually on the premises, silence must be taken to amount to an implied denial of the request to enter.

140. I conclude therefore, that the announcement in this case was properly made. It follows, therefore, that the criteria set out in Landry were indeed met, and correspondingly that the entry into the appellant's trailer was indeed authorized as part of a lawful arrest. It remains to consider whether or not the law authorizing this entry is reasonable under the Charter.

Is the law reasonable?

141. As my colleague Sopinka J. points out, the law concerning warrantless arrests following forcible entry into a dwelling house was set out in Landry, supra, which was, at least technically, a pre-Charter case. Essentially, Landry stands for the proposition that an entry into private premises is, assuming certain steps are followed, permissible any time the police wish to effect an arrest. Sopinka J. concludes that, at least in the case of a standard arrest in which there is no urgency present, this wide discretion is "overly expansive in the era of the Charter" (para. 42). He explicitly refrains from deciding upon situations in which exigent circumstances exist, as he is of the view that no such circumstances are present in this case.

142. I am unable to agree with my colleague that exigent circumstances were not present here, especially given the conclusions of the trial judge and the Court of Appeal in that regard. As such, it is neither necessary nor desirable for me to make a conclusive determination as to whether Landry is constitutionally sound in all cases in which the police wish to make an arrest in a dwelling house. The reasonableness of the common law was a relatively minor issue at trial and on appeal, and I am wary of addressing such an important question in the absence of argument with regards to the potential impact a change in this area would have upon the police, as well as some context regarding the frequency in which these types of arrests occur. In addition, when this issue was decided by the United States Supreme Court, in Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980), it provoked strong opposing views which are also worthy of consideration. While the majority adopted a solution similar to that of Sopinka J., there was a forceful dissent by White J. who was gravely concerned about the effect this restriction would have upon legitimate law enforcement techniques.

143. I believe it is preferable to deal with each situation as it arises, consistent with the approach taken by this Court in R. v. Maccooh, 1993 CanLII 107 (SCC), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 802. Therefore, I propose to analyze whether the presence of exigent circumstances, combined with the requirements established by Landry, can be considered “reasonable” for the purposes of s. 8 of the Charter.

144. The common law limitations to the principle of the sanctity of the home have recently been addressed by this Court in R. v. Silveira, 1995 CanLII 89 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 297. It is well recognized, of course, that a private residence does not guarantee sanctuary from a police investigation. The policy underlying the common law cases is that there should be no place which gives an offender sanctuary. As Dickson J. stated in Eccles, supra, at p. 743: “[t]he criminal is not immune from arrest in his own home nor in the home of one of his friends”.

145. In Landry, supra, Dickson C.J., examining the common law, found no reason to limit the ability of the police to enter a private dwelling to situations where they possessed a warrant. In his view, police officers could not afford to waste valuable time searching out a warrant when a suspect could easily flee the premises and remain at large in a community. While there are obvious privacy interests at issue, these are balanced to a large extent by the requirements set out by the Code and the common law (at p. 161):

This intrusiveness is carefully delineated and restricted by the requirement of reasonable and probable grounds for the belief that the person sought is within the premises, and the requirements of notice of presence, notice of authority and notice of purpose. These requirements minimize the invasiveness of arrest in a dwelling and permit the offender to maintain his dignity and privacy by walking to the doorway and surrendering himself.

146. In concurring reasons, Estey J. added in Landry (Beetz and McIntyre JJ. concurring), at p. 166, that the ancient principle of the inviolability of the home "must yield to the legitimate requirements of law enforcement" and cited the following passage from the case of Lyons v. The Queen, 1984 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 633, where for the majority he wrote, at p. 657:

The home is not a castle in isolation; it is a castle in a community and draws its support and security of existence from the community. The law has long recognized many compromises and outright intrusions on the literal sense of this concept. . . . [Emphasis added.]

147. In Macooh, supra, this Court considered the constitutionality of arrests made without warrant in residential premises in cases of "hot pursuit" and concluded that these types of entries were acceptable under the Charter. I would note that, in a real sense, "hot pursuit" is actually nothing more than a variety of exigent circumstances, and not really a separate doctrine. While there are several criteria which must be satisfied for "hot pursuit" to apply, the underlying concern is to prevent the escape of the offender, in the sense that he or she could frustrate a police investigation merely by closing the front door.

148. It is clear from the foregoing that the power of arrest is a crucial part of law enforcement. For that reason, it is unrealistic to suggest that the police can never enter private premises without a warrant for the purposes of arrest. As our jurisprudence has always recognized, this would severely impede the ability of police to capture persons suspected of criminal activity and to preserve evidence necessary to convict them. Neither can I accept that it is only in circumstances of hot pursuit that the police are permitted to enter a dwelling house without a warrant for the purpose of arrest.

149. This conclusion is not unique. In fact, it has been accepted in the United States for some time. While it is recognized that an arrest warrant is the preferable manner to proceed, the American experience clearly demonstrates that it is not always practical or possible for the officers to obtain a warrant. Where these types of exigent circumstances exist, arrests without warrant upon private premises have been deemed lawful: Payton v. New York, supra; United States v. Reid, 69 F.3d 1109 (11th Cir. 1995); United States v. Scroger, 98 F.3d 1256 (10th Cir. 1996). Simply as a matter of logic, it is reasonable to assume that aside from cases of hot pursuit, situations will arise in which the threat to society and the danger of having important law enforcement aims frustrated will outweigh concerns about privacy.

150. What types of circumstances will be considered exigent? While I believe a number of factors can indicate a situation of urgency, it is best not to attempt to define conclusively every possible type of exigent circumstances, as this can preferably be determined on a case by case basis. As stated by Barrett J. of the United States Court of Appeals, in Scroger, at p. 1259, quoting United States v. Wicks, 995 F.2d 964 (10th Cir. 1993), at p. 970, cert. denied 114 S.Ct. 482 (1993):

“(T)here is no absolute test for the presence of exigent circumstances because such a determination depends on the unique facts of each controversy.”

See also United States v. Scroger, supra, and Anderson, supra.

151. In this vein, I do not wish to decide authoritatively upon exactly what is required to constitute exigent circumstances for the purposes of arrest, especially given that this is the first case on this subject to come before this Court. I would prefer to examine the particular factors at issue in the case at bar.

152. The main factor relied upon by the respondent, and also cited by both the trial judge and the Court of Appeal, was that the police were gravely concerned about the potential destruction of evidence. In addition, the Court of Appeal noted the serious and violent nature of the offence, the fact that it had very recently occurred, and that a murderer was likely at large in the community. I propose to examine each of these factors.

153. It has been recognized on more than one occasion that the potential destruction of evidence can constitute exigent circumstances: Silveira, supra; R. v. Grant, 1993 CanLII 68 (SCC), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 223; Collins, supra. In Silveira, I stated that this rationale necessitated an exception to the principle of the sanctity of the home at paras. 112 and 114:

Finally, with respect to the American case law, Martin J.A. observed at p. 119 of Rao that a number of American appellate courts have specifically found that an entry and search of premises to prevent the removal or destruction of illicit drugs fall within the "exigent circumstances" exception. (See United States v. Edwards, 602 F.2d 458 (1st Cir. 1979); Commonwealth v. Amaral, 450 N.E.2d 656 (Mass. 1983); for more recent examples, see United States v. Mabry, 809 F.2d 671 (10th Cir. 1987); United States v. Riley, 968 F.2d 422 (5th Cir. 1992).) It therefore appears that exigent circumstances are described by American case law in the same way as they have been defined by this Court, i.e., in terms of imminent loss of evidence, amongst others, notably in the cases of Eccles, Macooh and more recently in Grant, supra.

...

Sopinka J. reiterated in Grant, at pp. 241-42, that exigent circumstances have generally been held to exist if there is an imminent danger of the loss, removal, destruction or disappearance of the evidence if the search or seizure is delayed. Although the case in Grant dealt with warrantless perimeter searches as opposed to warrantless entries into dwelling-houses, I am of the view that the same reasoning must apply in all cases of exigent circumstances. [Emphasis in original.]

154. As I stated in Silveira, supra, preventing the removal or destruction of evidence is a legitimate law enforcement concern which warrants setting aside the strict rules concerning the sanctity of the home. Frankly, I see no reason why this rationale should be addressed any differently in the context of arrest than it is in the context of a search. Indeed, given the restrictions needed to effect an arrest in a dwelling house, it is arguable that these types of intrusion are in most cases considerably less invasive of privacy than warrantless searches. The announcement requirement, for example, allows the suspect to surrender him- or herself at the door of the residence and prevent any real intrusion of the premises.

155. I also find it instructive that the prevention of the destruction of evidence is part of the basis upon which the “hot pursuit” exception to the arrest warrant requirement is founded. As the Chief Justice stated in Maccooh, supra, at p. 816, without such an exception authorizing police entry into private dwellings, “evidence of the offence leading to the pursuit or a related offence may be lost”.

156. In my view, where there is a genuine fear that evidence of the crime will be lost, this can constitute the necessary exigent circumstances for a warrantless entry. Whether these exigent circumstances exist in a given case, is, of course, a finding of fact for the trial judge.

157. In this case, the trial judge, who had the advantage of hearing all the evidence, was of the view that a serious danger existed that had the police not immediately entered the trailer to arrest the appellant, evidence would have been destroyed. As he found, after reviewing the facts:

Were there other investigatory techniques available? The answer is no, when one looks at the bloody shirt evidence. There was a real risk that that shirt would not have been available had they simply sealed the premises.

158. The Court of Appeal came to the same conclusion, as Lambert J.A. stated at p. 234 that the police were “facing circumstances where the possibility of the destruction of evidence, particularly evidence in relation to bloodstains, was a real one and had to be addressed”.

159. My colleague, however, concludes that both the trial judge and the Court of Appeal were in error, and that in actuality there was no fear that evidence would be destroyed. He states, at paras. 52 and 53:

In any event, even if they existed, safety concerns could not justify the warrantless entry into the trailer in the present case. A simple watch of the trailer in which the police were told the appellant was sleeping, not a warrantless entry, would have sufficiently addressed any safety concerns involving the appellant. With respect to concern about the potential destruction of evidence, at the time the police entered the trailer, they had no knowledge of evidence that might be destroyed; at best, they had a suspicion that the appellant was involved in the murder. Simply because the hunch may have turned out to be justified does not legitimize the actions of the police at the time they entered the trailer. As I stated in R. v. Kokesch, 1990 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 3, at p. 29, “[i]t should not be forgotten that ex post facto justification of searches by their results is precisely what the Hunter standards were designed to prevent.”

The circumstances surrounding the police entry into the trailer were similar to those following any serious crime: a dangerous person is on the loose and there is a risk that he or she will attempt to destroy evidence linking him or her to the crime. To define these as exigent circumstances is to invite such a characterization of every period after a serious crime.

160. In my view, Sopinka J. has not shown appropriate deference to a factual finding made by the trial judge who was in a much better position to assess the particular circumstances. Furthermore, I find that the trial judge’s assessment was, in fact, the correct one in that there was good reason for the police to believe that absent immediate intervention, crucial evidence would have been destroyed. Several elements point to this conclusion, most importantly the fact that the police were pursuing the offender a short time after the occurrence of the crime. They had every reason to believe that the killer, if apprehended quickly, would still have bloodstains on him, which would be important evidence. I cannot agree with my colleague that “[the police] had no knowledge of evidence that might be destroyed” (para. 52). Sgt. Madrigga clearly testified as to his belief that the perpetrator of the crime would possess clothing with bloodstains on it. It was reasonable for him to fear that if he did not act quickly, the killer would have an opportunity to destroy that vital evidence.

161. As the trial judge stated, not only was there a real fear that evidence would be lost, but it was also crucial evidence which “form[ed] a very important part of the chain of evidence the Crown seeks to introduce”.

162. In any event, I would point out that it was not only the potential destruction of evidence which motivated the actions of the police in the case at bar. As stated by Lambert J.A. in the Court of Appeal, at p. 234, the police were investigating the commission of an extremely violent crime, and they felt an obligation to find out for certain who the offender was as soon as possible:

The fundamental point in relation to the police conduct in this case was that there had been a savage attack on an elderly man in a small community which suggested a killer who was out of control in the community and that the police had a duty to protect the community. They also had a duty to try to locate and neutralize the killer and if possible to gather evidence that would satisfy them then and there that the killer had been apprehended, and that would later tend to establish that the correct person had been apprehended and made to stand trial.

In those circumstances it is my opinion that the police were facing a situation which could be classified as an emergency, or as exigent circumstances which would require immediate action, and that in addition they were facing circumstances where the possibility of the destruction of evidence, particularly evidence in relation to bloodstains, was a real one and had to be addressed.

163. I completely agree. The nature of the crime is an important factor to consider. There can be little doubt that there is a greater urgency to investigate quickly in a case of violence than, for example, a case of theft: see United States v. Scroger, supra, at p. 1260.

164. Additionally, the serious nature of the crime is not a factor to be examined in isolation. It must be recognized that, especially in the case of violent crimes, it is a sound practice for the police to try and apprehend the offender as quickly and with as much certainty as possible. In this regard the learned author of Wayne R. LaFave, Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment (3rd ed. 1996), vol. 3, at p. 271, has noted that the courts should recognize a distinction between a “planned” arrest and one which is the product of an “in the field” investigation. Indeed, he believes, at pp. 271-74, that this should be the defining criterion in making a determination as to whether exigent circumstances are present in a given case:

Although it is not readily apparent how a more workable but yet fair warrantless entry standard could best be expressed, it would seem that a solution is most likely to be found by distinguishing the truly “planned” arrest from the arrest which is made in the course of an ongoing investigation in the field. A “planned” arrest is one which is made after a criminal investigation has been fully completed at another location and the police make a deliberate decision to go to a certain place, either the arrestee’s home or some other premises where he is believed to be in order to take him into custody.... Courts have understandably been reluctant to accept police claims of exigent circumstances in these situations, for it ordinarily appears that whatever exigencies thereafter arose were foreseeable at the time the arrest decision was made, when a warrant could have readily been obtained. In the “planned” arrest situation, then, the only exception to any existing warrant requirement would be the presence of exigent circumstances prior to the time the officers went out into the field for the purpose of making the arrest.

On the other hand, when the occasion for arrest arises while the police are already out in the field investigating the prior or ongoing conduct which is the basis for the arrest, there should be a far greater reluctance to fault the police for not having an arrest warrant. Here, the presumption should be in favor of a warrantless arrest rather than against it, as the probabilities are high that it is not feasible for the police to delay the arrest while one of their number leaves the area, finds a magistrate and obtains a warrant, and then returns with it. [Emphasis added.]

165. This rationale has been accepted in the U.S., and applied in a number of decisions with facts which closely mirror the situation in the case at bar. In People v. Johnson, 637 P.2d 676 (Cal. 1981), for example, the police investigated a shooting in which the accused shot a man whom he believed had kicked his car. Within 75 minutes of the incident, the police located the accused’s car at his girlfriend’s home, entered, and arrested him. The California Supreme Court ruled that this was permissible given the circumstances, concluding at p. 680:

As we ... recently reaffirmed in People v. Escudero (1979) ... 592 P.2d 312, “in appropriate circumstances the fresh pursuit of a fleeing felon may constitute a sufficiently grave emergency to justify an exception to the warrant requirement and make it constitutionally reasonable for the police to enter a private dwelling without prior authorization of a magistrate”. In that case we approved an arrest within a defendant’s residence when he had been surprised in the act of committing a burglary, had escaped, and had been identified through a description and car registration. The police then proceeded directly to the defendant's residence, made a warrantless entry and arrested him. We observed "that although 'fresh pursuit' of a fleeing felon must be substantially continuous and afford the law enforcement authorities no reasonable opportunity to obtain a warrant, it is not necessary that the suspect be kept physically in view at all times." Here, the officers were in expeditious pursuit which was continuous and direct.

Moreover, as we have stated, defendant was suspected of a violent offense involving the repeated discharge of a firearm. Exigent circumstances validating a defendant's arrest within a dwelling may be deemed to exist when there is a "likelihood that one of the suspects may have been an armed killer (see James v. Superior Court (1978) ... 151 Cal.Rptr. 270)".

166. Another decision worthy of consideration is People v. Williams, 641 N.E.2d 296 (Ill. 1994). In that case, the police investigated a murder where a woman was shot to death while in the process of entering her apartment building. After a 27-hour investigation, the officers proceeded to the accused's residence, and without a warrant forcibly entered and arrested him. Despite argument by the accused that the entry was unconstitutional, the court ruled at pp. 306-7 that in the circumstances, it was entirely proper:

The crime invoked was of the most serious nature, involving unprovoked, deadly violence against the victim. From the time of the murder until defendant's arrest only 27 hours later, the police conducted an around-the-clock investigation, acting on every lead they received without delay....

Defendant's argument that, given the time lapse between Golden's statement and his arrest, the police could have obtained an arrest warrant is unpersuasive.... The officers clearly acted without delay in initiating efforts to apprehend defendant following receipt of information from Golden concerning defendant and his possible whereabouts.

See also: State v. Storvick, 428 N.W.2d 55 (Minn. 1988); State v. Gonsalves, 553 A.2d 1073 (R.I. 1989); People v. Smith, 604 N.E.2d 858 (Ill. 1992).

167. In my view, these cases illuminate the difficulties which can be faced by police when conducting an investigation "in the field". They also recognize that a finding of exigency will vary depending on the nature of the crime and the manner in which the investigation is conducted as a result of legitimate fears that the suspect will either abscond, commit further violence or otherwise frustrate law enforcement efforts.

168. Furthermore, I believe that many of the factors gleaned from the above noted authorities were present in the case at bar. In particular, I note that:

- (a) the police were investigating a very violent murder;
- (b) the arrest was made “in the field” in the midst of an ongoing investigation. As LaFave notes, this should lead to the presumption of a lawful arrest;
- (c) as set out previously, it was extremely impractical to obtain an arrest or search warrant given the location of the community;
- (d) the police were in the midst of a “fresh pursuit” which was continuous and direct;
- (e) the police had a reasonable fear that if they did not neutralize the killer, he would commit further violence.

169. This should not be taken as an exhaustive list of factors which are necessary in every case. Nevertheless, when combined with the earlier mentioned concern about the loss of evidence, they leave no doubt in my mind that exigent circumstances existed here. I am further persuaded by the fact that the officers involved, the trial judge and the Court of Appeal were all of the view that an emergency situation existed. This is not a factor which should be discounted lightly. As I stated in my minority reasons in Silveira, supra, at para. 121:

On the facts of this case, the trial judge, with the benefit of having heard the whole of the evidence regarding the circumstances which led the police to enter the appellant's private dwelling, did not find that in so doing, the police had acted in bad faith.... It is not the proper function of this Court to now second-guess the trial judge on pure findings of fact, particularly when no error of the kind that would attract appellate intervention has been demonstrated with respect to the trial judge's findings of fact on this point (see, e.g., R. v. L. (D.O.), 1993 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 419, at p. 467).

170. Sopinka J., however, suggests that simply watching the trailer would have been a sufficient response by the officers and would have prevented the appellant from committing any further harm or destroying evidence. In my view, this conclusion appears to utilize the same sort of ex post facto reasoning of which my colleague so strongly disapproves: R. v. Kokesch, 1990 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 3. I agree that this type of reasoning is of little help in determining whether an entry was justified; however, I believe that, in fairness, the same approach should apply to a review of the presence of exigent circumstances. My colleague's conclusion is dependant upon the fact that the appellant was actually in the trailer and not in the process of committing other harm or destroying evidence. Given the urgency of the situation, if the police had adopted the procedure suggested by my colleague and had been incorrect as to their belief of his presence inside the trailer, this error could have had grave consequences.

171. While it may be true that the appellant at the time of arrest was asleep, in the trailer and not in the process of destroying evidence, this does not displace the legitimate concern the police possessed. It is highly likely that, given enough time, the appellant would have destroyed the evidence.

172. Furthermore, the suggestion that the police could have simply watched the trailer while waiting for a warrant, fails to recognize that the nearest police station was over one hour's drive away. Even assuming that it would have been possible to see a Justice of the Peace and obtain a warrant at that time, the entire procedure of communicating with the station, conveying the necessary information and arranging for another officer to obtain a warrant and drive to Likely, would probably have taken, at a minimum, close to two hours. This would have given the appellant ample time to destroy evidence. In addition, as stated above, this delay would have had even greater significance if in actuality the police had been incorrect about the appellant's whereabouts or his involvement in the crime. In that case, the delay likely would have allowed for the offender to escape.

173. For all of the reasons set out above, I believe that exigent circumstances were indeed present in the case at bar. Additionally, I am of the view that where these circumstances exist, the common law authorizing entries onto private premises constitutes a “reasonable” entry for the purposes of s. 8 of the Charter.

Was the search conducted in a reasonable manner?

174. The entry into the trailer was conducted in as non-intrusive a manner as possible. Sergeant Madrigga announced himself and waited for the appellant to answer. As he testified, he would not even have entered had the appellant answered the door. He drew his gun, an entirely reasonable decision given the circumstances, but kept it at his side. Once inside, he woke the appellant, pulled him into the light and immediately arrested him. The search the police eventually conducted was also minimally intrusive. Despite having the legal authority to do so, the officer chose not to search the premises at that time but instead decided to obtain a search warrant. The search was reasonably conducted.

Conclusion

175. It follows that as the police's entry was for the purpose of effecting an arrest, there was no breach of s. 8 at that time. Given my conclusion that the police lawfully entered the trailer to effect an arrest of the appellant, it naturally follows that they were entitled to search incident to arrest, and to seize the appellant's shirt as evidence. The authority to search incident to arrest is well established at common law and has withstood Charter scrutiny as well. In Cloutier v. Langlois, 1990 CanLII 122 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 158, at pp. 180-81, I reviewed the history of this police power and concluded:

In general, despite certain comments in scholarly discussion, it seems beyond question that the common law as recognized and developed in Canada holds that the police have a power to search a lawfully arrested person and to seize anything in his or her possession or immediate surroundings to guarantee the safety of the police and the accused, prevent the prisoner's escape or provide evidence against him. The common thread in this line of authority is the objective of guaranteeing safety and applying the law effectively.

See also: R. v. Beare, 1988 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 387, at pp. 403-4; Debot, supra, at p. 1146, per Lamer J. (as he then was).

176. The search of the appellant consisted mainly of the shirt that he was wearing and his immediate surroundings. While the police would have been justified in doing so, they refrained from searching the immediate area and seizing objects which obviously could have been used as evidence. This minimal search incident to arrest did not violate the Charter.

(B) Section 8 -- The Search Warrant

177. The appellant has also submitted that the warrant which was obtained following the arrest was based on information obtained during an unlawful arrest. Given that I do not share the appellant's conclusion regarding the legality of the arrest, this line of argument must fail as well. In my view, the warrant was properly obtained.

178. Even were I to agree that the arrest which took place in this case was unlawful, I would have no difficulty concluding that the search warrant was properly issued. Where a warrant is obtained partially on the strength of tainted evidence, and partially on evidence which was properly obtained, the role of the court is to consider whether or not the warrant would have been issued solely on the strength of the evidence which was properly obtained: R. v. Evans, 1996 CanLII 248 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 8, at para. 26; Grant, supra, at pp. 251-52; Kokesch, supra. In the case at bar, the trial judge ruled that before the officers entered the trailer and arrested the appellant there existed reasonable and probable grounds to believe the appellant was the culprit. This ruling is sufficient to infer that a search warrant could properly have been issued based solely on the strength of the information which was obtained prior to the arrest.

(C) Section 8 and the Fingerprints

179. My colleague Sopinka J. has concluded that compelling the appellant to provide fingerprints was, in the circumstances of this case, a violation of s. 8 of the Charter, in that it occurred in the absence of a lawful arrest. As I have set out above, I am of the view that the arrest was, indeed, a lawful one. It is clear that fingerprinting as an incident of a legal arrest does not violate the Charter: Beare, supra. This ground of appeal must also be dismissed.

(D) Sections 7 and 9 of the Charter

180. The appellant has also raised arguments under ss. 7 and 9 of the Charter. His position is predicated on the assumption that the arrest which took place was unlawful. Given my finding that the arrest was not unlawful, it cannot be said that these sections of the Charter have been violated.

(E) Right to Counsel

181. The appellant additionally submits that his right to counsel was violated when the police first entered the trailer. His argument on this point is two-fold. First, he asserts that from the moment Sgt. Madrigga entered the trailer and shook him by the foot in order to wake him up, he was “detained”, and the officer was obliged to inform him of his right to counsel. The second branch of the argument deals with the caution itself, which was given a few minutes later after the appellant was arrested. The appellant asserts that the caution fell short of the standard mandated by this Court in the case of Bartle, supra. In my view, neither of these arguments possesses any merit.

182. Contrary to the appellant’s submissions, the police are not obliged to read an accused his s.10(b) rights the instant he is detained or arrested. The police must be permitted the latitude to assess and gain control of the situation and determine whether a potentially dangerous situation exists: R. v. Strachan, 1988 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 980. Here, the appellant was being sought for a very serious and violent crime, and there was no way for the officer entering the premises to know how the appellant might have reacted. In addition, the officer was walking into a dark room and the appellant was sleeping. Surely, the officer was not supposed to read the appellant his rights while he was asleep. The caution was given at the first reasonable opportunity. The delay in this case between the time Sgt. Madrigga grabbed the appellant’s leg to wake him up and the time he was read his right to counsel was no more than a few minutes. It is inconceivable that a Charter breach could be said to have occurred as the result of this short delay alone. I note in passing that a very similar situation occurred in the case of R. v. Manninen, 1987 CanLII 67 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1233. In that case, the accused was detained by two officers for approximately five minutes before being formally arrested and given his right to counsel. Despite concluding that there had been a s.10(b) violation owing to other irregularities, this Court found that there was nothing wrong with a short delay prior to reading the accused his or her rights.

183. As to the second concern, there was no indication in the case at bar that the appellant received a deficient s.10(b) warning. After being arrested, the appellant was informed:

It is my duty to inform you that you have the right to retain and instruct counsel without delay. You may call any lawyer you want. A Legal Aid duty lawyer is available to provide legal advice to you without charge and can explain the Legal Aid plan to you. If you wish to contact a Legal Aid duty lawyer, I can provide you with a telephone number. Do you understand?

184. After giving this portion of the warning, the appellant was asked if he understood.

He nodded in assent. The officer then proceeded to warn the accused that he was “not obliged to say anything but anything [he did] say may be given in evidence.”

185. The officer then asked the appellant once again if he understood. After staring blankly at him, the officer repeated the question, to which the appellant replied: “Yes, what do you think, I am illiterate?”

186. The appellant has argued that this caution falls short of the requirements set out by a majority of this Court in Bartle, supra. In that decision, the scope of the right to counsel and the information required to be given to an accused upon arrest was considerably enlarged. Specifically, Lamer C.J. set out the expanded duty of police officers as follows at p. 198:

...police authorities are required to inform detainees about Legal Aid and duty counsel services which are in existence and available in the jurisdiction at the time of detention. In case there is any doubt, I would add here that basic information about how to access available services which provide free, preliminary legal advice should be included in the standard s.10(b) caution. This need consist of no more than telling a detainee in plain language that he or she will be provided with a phone number should he or she wish to contact a lawyer....

At the time, I stated at p. 224, that s. 10(b) should not require the police to inform all detainees of existing duty counsel programs, absent an expression of concern by the detainee regarding his or her ability to afford a lawyer. To require the police to do otherwise is to require a standard of perfection not mandated by s. 10(b) of the Charter.

187. In any event, the warning given in the case at bar clearly satisfied the components set out by the majority of this Court in Bartle. The appellant was informed that free legal advice was available to him and that he could telephone to receive it. In addition, the officer offered to provide the number to the appellant if requested. The appellant was advised that he was under no obligation to say anything at all. As the Chief Justice stated in Bartle, at p. 198, a satisfactory warning “need consist of no more than telling a detainee in plain language that he or she will be provided with a phone number should he or she wish to contact a lawyer”. This requirement was obviously satisfied here. The warning, therefore, was not deficient.

188. I would also note that the retroactive application of Bartle and its companion cases has recently come into question as a result of events following the Court’s decision in those cases. Immediately after the decisions were handed down, the Attorney General for Alberta, who had been a party to the case of R. v. Cobham, 1994 CanLII 69 \(SCC\), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 360, sought a stay of the operation of Cobham for a 21-day period until October 20, 1994. On October 20, 1994, this Court handed down an order which stated:

The application for a re-hearing is granted on the issue of whether there should be a transition period, and the operation of the judgment herein [i.e. Cobham] is stayed for a period of 21 days from the date such judgment was issued, namely September 29, 1994.

There has been some question as to whether this order has the effect of suspending the retroactive application of Bartle throughout Canada to all potential violations which took place prior to October 20, 1994. I note that more than one court has reached exactly this conclusion: R. v. Latimer (1995), 1995 CanLII 3993 \(SK CA\), 99 C.C.C. (3d) 481 (Sask. C.A.), aff’d without reference to this point, 1997 CanLII 405 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 217; R. v. Lorincz (1995), 9 M.V.R. (3d) 186 (Alta. C.A.); R. v. Loudon, [1995] B.C.J. No. 2446 (S.C.). In Latimer, supra, this issue was raised before this Court but the Chief Justice declined to address the point as it was not necessary to decide it in order to resolve the case. I take a similar position here.

189. Aside from the caution's actual wording, Sopinka J. finds that the police violated the appellant's s. 10(b) rights by not affording him a proper opportunity to contact counsel before questioning him. Additionally, the appellant submits that the police erred in merely reading him the standard warning. He asserts that the police were obligated to ensure that he understood exactly what his rights were. In my view, this reasoning is based upon a fundamental misconception of how the right to counsel operates.

190. Contrary to the appellant's submissions, the police are not under an obligation to assure themselves positively that an accused understands what his right to counsel entails. It was recognized very early in Charter jurisprudence that placing this burden on the police would be prohibitive and would inhibit legitimate police investigative techniques: R. v. Anderson (1984), 1984 CanLII 2197 (ON CA), 10 C.C.C. (3d) 417 (Ont. C.A.); R. v. Sabourin (1984), 1984 CanLII 3535 (MB CA), 13 C.C.C. (3d) 68 (Man. C.A.). This principle has been affirmed numerous times. As McLachlin J. stated in R. v. Evans, 1991 CanLII 98 (SCC), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 869, at p. 891:

The purpose of s. 10(b) is to require the police to communicate the right to counsel to the detainee. In most cases one can infer from the circumstances that the accused understands what he has been told. In such cases, the police are required to go no further.... [Emphasis in original.]

See also R. v. Baig, 1987 CanLII 40 (SCC), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 537, at p. 540; Bartle, supra, at p. 204; Latimer, supra.

191. Once an accused has indicated that he understands the rights which have been explained to him in plain language, the police are perfectly entitled, in the absence of clear indications demonstrating otherwise, to accept what he says and are not obliged to inquire further. Here, the police had no reason whatsoever to conclude that the appellant did not understand his s.10(b) rights. On the contrary, the appellant expressly responded twice that he did understand them. I see no reason why the police should not have taken him at his word.

192. I am also unable to agree with Sopinka J. that the police were obliged to refrain from questioning the appellant until he had an opportunity to exercise his right to counsel. An accused must indicate a desire to exercise this right before the police are under any obligation to provide an opportunity to do so. As the Chief Justice stated in Bartle, supra, at p. 192, s. 10(b) imposes the following duties on law enforcement agents:

(1) to inform the detainee of his or her right to retain and instruct counsel without delay and of the existence and availability of legal aid and duty counsel;

(2) if a detainee has indicated a desire to exercise this right, to provide the detainee with a reasonable opportunity to exercise the right (except in urgent and dangerous circumstances); and

(3) to refrain from eliciting evidence from the detainee until he or she has had that reasonable opportunity (again, except in cases of urgency or danger). [Emphasis added.]

(See also Evans, supra, at p. 890; Manninen, supra, at pp. 1241-42; R. v. Brydges, 1990 CanLII 123 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 190, at pp. 203-4.)

193. Lamer C.J. went on to add that, at p. 192, the second and third duties are “implementation duties and are not triggered unless and until a detainee indicates a desire to exercise his or her right to counsel” (emphasis in original). This duty, thus, does not come into existence until the detainee invokes it. Consequently, it cannot be said that the police here were in violation of their s. 10(b) obligations in this regard.

194. The appellant in this case had the benefit of a caution which informed him of all the essential components mandated by Bartle, supra. Prior to their questioning him, the police had no indication from the accused that he wanted to speak with a lawyer or that he was confused as to the scope of his rights. I therefore conclude that at this stage of the investigation there was no breach of s. 10(b) of the Charter.

IV. Conclusion

195. As I have found that the actions of the police in this case did not breach the Charter, it is unnecessary for me to consider s. 24(2). Had it been necessary, however, I would have concurred with the findings of the trial judge and the Court of Appeal that considering the exigent circumstances and seriousness of the crime, excluding this evidence would clearly bring the administration of justice into disrepute, particularly since this result would likely preclude the appellant, who was convicted by a jury, of being brought to justice.
196. This is sufficient to dispose of the appeal. Before concluding, however, I feel compelled to address some of the statements made by my colleague Sopinka J. in his reasons. Reading his assessment of the conduct of the investigation in this case, one might draw the conclusion that the police officers were operating as lawless vigilantes, flagrantly and deliberately violating the Charter at every turn. Frankly, I could not disagree more. As I have described above, I am of the view that this “litany” of Charter abuses does not stand up to close scrutiny.
197. Indeed, although this is in no way determinative, if the conduct of the police was truly of such a horrific nature I find it rather peculiar that neither the trial judge nor three judges of the Court of Appeal had a similar appreciation of the facts. On the contrary, they found that for the most part, the actions of the police were not such as to have been in violation of the appellant’s Charter rights.
198. In my view, from the first stages of the investigation through to the apprehension of the appellant the police proceeded in a forthright and proper manner; indeed, had the police not moved immediately to arrest, it is likely that they would have been criticized for allowing a murderer to continue to remain at large in the community. This was indeed the view of the Sgt. Madrigga, who testified:

... I had to check it out because I had people ask or tell me that this person was in the area.

...

I had grounds to suspect he could have been involved, sir, and I would be negligent in my duty if I did not check that out.

199. The police were in the process of investigating a serious crime, one which had recently been committed and involved a savage, physical beating inflicted on a helpless victim for no apparent reason. Given the brutality of the murder scene and the seeming randomness of the act, there is little doubt that the police felt obliged to act quickly in order to prevent any further violence of that nature in the community. For this foresight, they should be commended, not rebuked.

200. I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal allowed, LAMER C.J. and L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ, GONTHIER and MCLACHLIN JJ. dissenting.

Solicitors for the appellant: Lugosi & Company, Prince George.

Solicitor for the respondent: The Attorney General of British Columbia, Vancouver.

* See: 1997 CanLII 343 \(SCC\), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 117.

TAB 14

R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32 (CanLII), [2009] 2 SCR 353

Source:	Supreme Court of Canada
Date:	2009-07-17
File number:	31892
Other citations:	97 OR (3d) 318 — 309 DLR (4th) 1 — 391 NR 1 — 253 OAC 124 — AZ-50566222 — 245 CCC (3d) 1 — 66 CR (6th) 1 — 193 CRR (2d) 1 — [2009] CarswellOnt 4104 — EYB 2009-161617 — JE 2009-1379 — [2009] SCJ No 32 (QL) — [2009] ACS no 32 — 82 MVR (5th) 1
Citation:	R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32 (CanLII), [2009] 2 SCR 353, < https://canlii.ca/t/24kwz >, retrieved on 2026-03-22
Most recent unfavourable mention	R. v. Carmola-Chambers , 2020 ONCJ 493 (CanLII) [...] Despite this, in applying the Grant [6] analysis, I find that the applicant/defendant has failed to establish that the admission of the breath samples into evidence at trial would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. [...]

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

CITATION: R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 353

DATE: 20090717

DOCKET: 31892

BETWEEN:

Donnohue Grant
Appellant
and
Her Majesty The Queen

Respondent
- and -
Director of Public Prosecutions of Canada, Attorney General of British Columbia, Canadian Civil Liberties Association and Criminal Lawyers' Association (Ontario)
Intervenors

OFFICIAL ENGLISH TRANSLATION: Reasons of Deschamps J.

CORAM: McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella and Charron JJ.

JOINT REASONS FOR JUDGMENT: McLachlin C.J. and Charron J. (LeBel, Fish and Abella JJ. c (paras. 1 to 149) oncurring)

PARTIALLY CONCURRING REASONS: Binnie J.
(paras. 150 to 184)

PARTIALLY CONCURRING REASONS:
(paras. 185 to 230) Deschamps J.

R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 353

Donnohue Grant

Appellant

v.

Her Majesty The Queen

Respondent

and

Director of Public Prosecutions of Canada,
Attorney General of British Columbia,
Canadian Civil Liberties Association and Criminal Lawyers' Association (Ontario)

Intervenors

Indexed as: R. v. Grant

Neutral citation: 2009 SCC 32.

File No.: 31892.

2008: April 24; 2009: July 17.

Present: McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella and Charron JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Arbitrary detention — Right to counsel — Encounter between accused and police going from general neighbourhood policing to situation where police effectively took control over accused and attempted to elicit incriminating information — Whether police conduct would cause a reasonable person in accused's position to conclude that he or she was not free to go and had to comply with police demand — Whether accused arbitrarily detained — Whether accused's right to counsel infringed — Meaning of "detention" in ss. 9 and 10 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Enforcement — Exclusion of evidence — Firearm discovered as result of accused's statements taken in breach of his right against arbitrary detention and right to counsel — Firearm admitted into evidence at trial and accused convicted of five firearms offences — Whether admission of firearm bringing administration of justice into disrepute — Revised framework for determining whether evidence obtained in breach of constitutional rights must be excluded — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 24(2).

Criminal law — Firearms — Possession of firearm for purposes of weapons trafficking — Whether simple movement of firearm from one place to another without changing hands amounts to weapons trafficking — Meaning of "transfer" of weapon for purposes of ss. 84, 99 and 100 of Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46.

Three police officers were on patrol for the purposes of monitoring an area near schools with a history of student assaults, robberies, and drug offences. W and F were dressed in plainclothes and driving an unmarked car. G was in uniform and driving a marked police car. The accused, a young black man, was walking down a sidewalk when he came to the attention of W and F. As the two officers drove past, the accused stared at them, while at the same time fidgeting with his coat and pants in a way that aroused their suspicions. W and F suggested to G that he have a chat with the approaching accused to determine if there was any need for concern. G initiated an exchange with the accused, while standing on the sidewalk directly in his intended path. He asked him what was going on, and requested his name and address. At one point, the accused, behaving nervously, adjusted his jacket, which prompted the officer to ask him to keep his hands in front of him. After a brief period observing the exchange from their car, W and F approached the pair on the sidewalk, identified themselves to the accused as police officers by flashing their badges, and took up positions behind G, obstructing the way forward. G then asked the accused whether he had anything he should not have, to which he answered that he had “a small bag of weed” and a firearm. At this point, the officers arrested and searched the accused, seizing the marijuana and a loaded revolver. They advised him of his right to counsel and took him to the police station.

At trial, the accused alleged violations of his rights under ss. 8, 9 and 10(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The trial judge found no Charter breach and admitted the firearm. The accused was convicted of five firearms offences. The Court of Appeal upheld the convictions for different reasons. It concluded that a detention had crystallized during the conversation with G, before the accused made his incriminating statements, and that the detention was arbitrary and in breach of s. 9 of the Charter. However, it held that the gun should be admitted into evidence under s. 24(2) of the Charter. The court agreed with the trial judge that the accused’s act of moving the gun from one place to another fell within the definition of “transfer” in the Criminal Code, and that this justified the conviction for possession of a firearm for the purposes of weapons trafficking.

Held : The appeal should be allowed on the trafficking charge and an acquittal entered. The appeal should be dismissed on all other counts.

Per McLachlin C.J. and LeBel, Fish, Abella and Charron JJ.: Existing jurisprudence on the issues of detention and exclusion of evidence is difficult to apply and may lead to unsatisfactory results. It is the duty of the Court, without undermining the principles that animate the jurisprudence to date, to take a fresh look at the frameworks that have been developed for the resolution of these two issues. [3]

Detention under ss. 9 and 10 of the Charter refers to a suspension of the individual's liberty interest by a significant physical or psychological restraint. Psychological detention is established either where the individual has a legal obligation to comply with a restrictive request or demand, or a reasonable person would conclude by reason of the state conduct that he or she had no choice but to comply. In cases where there is no physical restraint or legal obligation, it may not be clear whether a person has been detained. To determine whether the reasonable person in the individual's circumstances would conclude that he or she had been deprived by the state of the liberty of choice, the court may consider, inter alia, the following factors: (a) the circumstances giving rise to the encounter as they would reasonably be perceived by the individual; (b) the nature of the police conduct; and (c) the particular characteristics or circumstances of the individual where relevant. To answer the question whether there is a detention involves a realistic appraisal of the entire interaction as it developed, not a minute parsing of words and movements. In those situations where the police may be uncertain whether their conduct is having a coercive effect on the individual, it is open to them to inform the subject in unambiguous terms that he or she is under no obligation to answer questions and is free to go. It is for the trial judge, applying the proper legal principles to the particular facts of the case, to determine whether the line has been crossed between police conduct that respects liberty and the individual's right to choose, and conduct that does not. Deference is owed to the trial judge's findings of fact, although application of the law to the facts is a question of law. [32] [43-44]

In this case, the accused was detained within the meaning of ss. 9 and 10 of the Charter before being asked the questions that led him to disclose his possession of the firearm. The encounter began with G approaching the accused and making general inquiries. Such preliminary questioning is a legitimate exercise of police powers. G then told the accused to keep his hands in front of him. While this act, in isolation, might be insufficient to indicate detention, consideration of the entire context of what transpired from that point forward leads to the conclusion that the accused was detained. Two other officers approached, flashed their badges and took tactical adversarial positions behind G, who began to engage in questioning driven by, and indicative of, focussed suspicion of the accused. The sustained and restrictive tenor of the conduct after the direction to the accused to keep his hands in front of him reasonably supports the conclusion that the officers were putting him under their control and depriving him of his choice as to how to respond. At this point, the accused's liberty was clearly constrained and he was in need of the Charter protections associated with detention. The encounter took on the character of an interrogation, going from general neighbourhood policing to a situation where the police had effectively taken control over the accused and were attempting to elicit incriminating information. Although G's questioning was respectful, the encounter was inherently intimidating. The power imbalance was obviously exacerbated by the accused's youth and inexperience. Because the test is an objective one, the fact that the accused did not testify as to his perceptions of the interaction is not fatal to his argument that there was a detention. The evidence supports his contention that a reasonable person in his position would conclude that his or her right to choose how to act had been removed by the police, given their conduct. [45] [47-52]

The evidence of the firearm was obtained in a manner that breached the accused's rights under ss. 9 and 10(b) of the Charter. An unlawful detention is necessarily arbitrary, in violation of s. 9. The officers acknowledged at trial that they did not have legal grounds or a reasonable suspicion to detain the accused prior to his incriminating statements. Therefore, the detention was arbitrary. The police also failed to advise the accused of his right to speak to a lawyer before the questioning that led to the discovery of the firearm. The right to counsel arises immediately upon detention, whether or not the detention is solely for investigative purposes. [11]

[55] [57-58]

The criteria relevant to determining when, in “all the circumstances”, admission of evidence obtained by a Charter breach “would bring the administration of justice into disrepute” must be clarified. The purpose of s. 24(2), as indicated by its wording, is to maintain the good repute of the administration of justice. Viewed broadly, the term “administration of justice” embraces maintaining the rule of law and upholding Charter rights in the justice system as a whole. The phrase “bring the administration of justice into disrepute” must be understood in the long-term sense of maintaining the integrity of, and public confidence in, the justice system. While exclusion of evidence resulting in an acquittal may provoke immediate criticism, s. 24(2) does not focus on immediate reaction to the individual case. Rather, it looks to whether the overall repute of the justice system, viewed in the long term, will be adversely affected by admission of the evidence. The inquiry is objective. It asks whether a reasonable person, informed of all relevant circumstances and the values underlying the Charter, would conclude that the admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. Section 24(2)’s focus is not only long-term, but prospective. The fact of the Charter breach means damage has already been done to the administration of justice. Section 24(2) starts from that proposition and seeks to ensure that evidence obtained through that breach does not do further damage to the repute of the justice system. Section 24(2)’s focus is also societal. Section 24(2) is not aimed at punishing the police or providing compensation to the accused, but rather at systemic concerns. [66-70]

When faced with an application for exclusion under s. 24(2), a court must assess and balance the effect of admitting the evidence on society’s confidence in the justice system having regard to: (1) the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct, (2) the impact of the breach on the Charter-protected interests of the accused, and (3) society’s interest in the adjudication of the case on its merits. At the first stage, the court considers the nature of the police conduct that infringed the Charter and led to the discovery of the evidence. The more severe or deliberate the state conduct that led to the Charter violation, the greater the need for the courts to dissociate themselves from that conduct, by excluding evidence linked to that conduct, in order to preserve public confidence in and ensure state adherence to the rule of law. The second stage of the inquiry calls for an evaluation of the extent to which the breach actually undermined the interests protected by the infringed right. The more serious the incursion on these interests, the greater the risk that admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. At the third stage, a court asks whether the truth-seeking function of the criminal trial process would be better served by admission of the evidence or by its exclusion. Factors such as the reliability of the evidence and its importance to the Crown's case should be considered at this stage. The weighing process and the balancing of these concerns is a matter for the trial judge in each case. Where the trial judge has considered the proper factors, appellate courts should accord considerable deference to his or her ultimate determination. [71-72] [76-77] [79] [86] [127]

Here, the gun was discovered as a result of the accused's statements taken in breach of the Charter. When the three-stage inquiry is applied to the facts of this case, a balancing of the factors favours the admission of the derivative evidence. The Charter-infringing police conduct was neither deliberate nor egregious and there was no suggestion that the accused was the target of racial profiling or other discriminatory police practices. The officers went too far in detaining the accused and asking him questions, but the point at which an encounter becomes a detention is not always clear and the officers' mistake in this case was an understandable one. Although the impact of the Charter breach on the accused's protected interests was significant, it was not at the most serious end of the scale. Finally, the gun was highly reliable evidence and was essential to a determination on the merits. The balancing mandated by s. 24(2) is qualitative in nature and therefore not capable of mathematical precision. However, when all these concerns are weighed, the courts below did not err in concluding that the admission of the gun into evidence would not, on balance, bring the administration of justice into disrepute. The significant impact of the breach on the accused's Charter-protected rights weighs strongly in favour of excluding the gun, while the public interest in the adjudication of the case on its merits weighs strongly in favour of its admission. However, the police officers were operating in circumstances of considerable legal uncertainty, and this tips the balance in favour of admission. [132-133] [139-140]

The accused's conviction for possession of a firearm for the purposes of weapons trafficking under s. 100(1) of the Criminal Code should be quashed on the ground that he did not "transfer" the firearm within the meaning of that section. A contextual reading of s. 100 and the related provisions reveals that Parliament intended to reserve the stiffest penalties for transfers that amount to weapons trafficking, not for the mere movement of a firearm from place to place. Since the trial judge did not find that the accused was in possession of the gun for the purpose of transferring it to another person, the s. 100(1) conviction cannot stand. [141] [143]

Per Binnie J.: The majority's approach to the definition of "detention" in ss. 9 and 10 of the Charter lays too much emphasis on the claimant's perception of psychological pressure, albeit as filtered through the eyes of the hypothetical reasonable person in the claimant's situation. The objective facts of such encounters as well as the perception of the police in initiating the encounter, and whatever information the police possess at the time or acquire as the encounter proceeds, all of which may or may not be known to the person stopped, should be factored into a more comprehensive analysis of when a "detention" occurs for Charter purposes. [150] [180]

The Court's embrace of a wholly claimant-centred approach may lead to the impression that it is more important to enquire whether the hypothetical reasonable person "in the individual's circumstances" would think himself or herself to be detained than whether he or she is detained. The perspective of the person stopped is important and it is true that there can be no detention unless the liberty of the person stopped is (or is reasonably perceived by that person to be) significantly constrained, but this does not exhaust the relevant considerations. [151]

It is important to be able to determine at what moment an interaction between the police and a member of the public is converted into a detention of that individual, thereby triggering the rights subsidiary to detention including the right to involve his or her lawyer.

Re-examining the concept of “psychological detention” with a view to broadening the perspectives from which the encounter is viewed is one way to ease the “obvious tension” between the requirement to inform detained persons of their right to counsel and the proper and effective use of brief investigative detentions. The police know, but the claimant may not know, the point at which he or she graduates from being a person of interest to a person around whom suspicion is starting to focus, and becomes a person whose legal rights are seriously in issue. [153] [160] [165] [177]

There are a number of problems with the Court’s continuing endorsement of the Therens approach for the purpose of determining when a simple interaction crystallizes into a detention. Insistence that the claimant’s circumstances be viewed from the more detached perspective of a “reasonable person” in some cases exaggerates the ability of ordinary people to stand up to police assertion of authority, and may compel the conclusion that the claimant had the choice to walk away whereas in reality no such choice existed. On the other hand, if the concept of the reasonable person is intended to describe average cooperative members of the public, the Canadian reality is that such people will almost always regard a direction from a police officer as a demand that must be complied with. Viewed in this way, police instructions or demands readily constrain a claimant’s choice to leave and, therefore, even the less intrusive encounters between the police and citizens ought frequently to be declared detentions under the claimant-centred approach adopted by the majority. [166] [170]

A further problem in calibrating the “reasonable person” is to define exactly what information this fictional person possesses and what experience he or she brings to the assessment of the encounter. This is of particular relevance to visible minorities who may, because of their background and experience, feel especially unable to disregard police directions, and feel that assertion of their right to walk away will itself be taken as evasive and subsequently argued by the police to be sufficient grounds of suspicion to justify a Mann detention. The police perspective on such encounters, whether or not conveyed to the person stopped, is relevant. In the absence of explicit criteria various judges will tend to read into the “reasonable person” their own projections of the moment at which, in their view, the person stopped ought to be able to call a lawyer. This may encourage a results-oriented analysis. [169] [172-174]

The Therens approach does not take into account adequately what the police know and when they knew it except insofar as this information is conveyed to the person stopped, but the police may not consider it to be in their interest to convey the information. Apparent general inquiries by the police may be designed, unknown to the person stopped, to elicit the missing piece by way of self-incrimination. Possession of such knowledge may in fact place the police in an adversarial relationship with the person approached whether that person is aware of the jeopardy or not. It is the adversarial relationship together with the “stop” that generates the need for counsel. On the other hand, a more benign police purpose may deprive even an unambiguous police command of the legal effect of a detention, and thereby enure to the benefit of the prosecution. [167] [178-179]

A finding of detention requires a police command or direction as well as compliance by the person claiming a s. 9 detention in the reasonable belief that there was no other choice. However, police words and conduct should be interpreted in light of the purpose of the encounter from the police perspective, whether disclosed to the person from whom cooperation was requested or not. Moreover, when considering the perception of the person stopped, serious weight should be given to the values and experience of the person actually stopped, including the experience of visible minorities. [176-177]

On the facts of this case, the conclusion of the majority that the accused was arbitrarily detained is agreed with. The purpose of the police officers was to investigate crime, whether actual or anticipated. The police had no information whatsoever that the accused may have been implicated in criminal activity or even whether a crime had been committed. The police order to the accused to “keep his hands in front of him” crystallized the detention. However, the finding of a detention is properly the product not only of the accused’s perception (filtered through the hypothetical reasonable person) but also of the objective facts of why the encounter was initiated

(crime detection) and the perception of the police, who at the outset lacked any information on which to base such aggressive tactics. The majority's analysis under s. 24(2) and the consequent disposition of the appeal are also agreed with. [181-184]

Per Deschamps J.: The facts of this case, considered as a whole, support the conclusion that the accused was detained. The detention came to a head when the officers asked him certain direct questions that, viewed objectively, might have caused a reasonable person to feel singled out, cornered and, therefore, detained. Owing to the nature of the questions asked by G, the line between prevention and suppression was crossed. G asked the accused if he had committed a crime. Once such a question had been asked of a person who had known he was being watched from the time he had crossed paths with W and F — who had since arrived on the scene — the encounter could no longer be described simply as an interaction between a police officer and a member of the public. The exchange was no longer an impromptu conversation that the accused would think he could walk away from as he pleased. [191]

Regarding the factors to consider in deciding whether to admit or exclude evidence obtained in violation of a Charter right, the new test proposed by the majority is inconsistent with the purpose of s. 24(2) of the Charter, which is to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice. The statement that s. 24(2) has a long-term societal purpose is of great significance for the identification of the factors to be considered in the analysis. The proposed test, by focussing the analysis on the conduct of the police in the first branch and on the interest of the accused in the second, and by attaching less importance to the seriousness of the offence in the third, does not give sufficient consideration to the long-term societal interest that must guide the judge in reaching a decision. In determining whether the maintenance of confidence in the administration of justice would be better served by admitting the evidence or by excluding it, the judge must instead strike a fair balance between two societal interests: the public interest in protecting Charter rights and the public interest in an adjudication on the merits. On the first branch, any facts that help show the effect of the violation on the protected rights must be considered, including the state conduct that gave rise to the violation. The impact of a violation on protected interests will vary with the circumstances, and the judge must therefore consider all the facts that will enable him or her to assess the long-term impact of his or her decision on the reputation of the administration of justice, that is, not on the rights of the accused being tried, but rather on those of every individual whose rights might be violated in a similar way. As for the second branch, whether the evidence is reliable and whether it is essential or peripheral are factors that are crucial to the maintenance of public confidence, as is the seriousness of the offence. [185] [195] [198] [202] [223-226]

In this case, to admit the weapon in evidence would have a positive effect on the reputation of the administration of justice. According to the trial judge's findings of fact, the exchange lasted only a few minutes, the officers were polite to the accused, and they were motivated by a desire to take a proactive approach in patrolling an area near schools with serious problems related to youth crime and safety. On the protection of the public, it should be noted that the charge is firearms-related, that it would be impossible to establish guilt without the evidence and that the evidence is eminently reliable. When balanced against each other, the limited impact of the violation on the protected interests and the great importance of the evidence for the purposes of the trial favour admitting the physical evidence. [228-229]

There is agreement with the majority on the charge of possession of a firearm for the purposes of trafficking. [229]

Cases Cited

By McLachlin C.J. and Charron J.

Not followed: R. v. Collins, 1987 CanLII 84 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265; R. v. Stillman, 1997 CanLII 384 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 607; applied: R. v. Therens, 1985 CanLII 29

(SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 613; referred to: R. v. Mann, 2004 SCC 52, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 59; R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 \(SCC\), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295; Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3; Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307; R. v. Esposito (1985), 1985 CanLII 118 \(ON CA\), 24 C.C.C. (3d) 88; Dedman v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 41 \(SCC\), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 2; Application under s. 83.28 of the Criminal Code (Re), 2004 SCC 42, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 248; R. v. Hebert, 1990 CanLII 118 \(SCC\), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 151; R. v. Grafe (1987), 1987 CanLII 170 \(ON CA\), 36 C.C.C. (3d) 267; Charkaoui v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 SCC 9, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 350; R. v. Duguay (1985), 1985 CanLII 112 \(ON CA\), 18 C.C.C. (3d) 289; R. v. Hufsky, 1988 CanLII 72 \(SCC\), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 621; R. v. Ladouceur, 1990 CanLII 108 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1257; R. v. Suberu, 2009 SCC 33, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 460; R. v. Brydges, 1990 CanLII 123 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 190; R. v. Burlingham, 1995 CanLII 88 \(SCC\), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 206; R. v. Orbanski, 2005 SCC 37, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 3; R. v. Harrer, 1995 CanLII 70 \(SCC\), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 562; R. v. Silveira, 1995 CanLII 89 \(SCC\), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 297; R. v. Genest, 1989 CanLII 109 \(SCC\), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 59; R. v. Kokesch, 1990 CanLII 55 \(SCC\), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 3; R. v. Buhay, 2003 SCC 30, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 631; R. v. White, 1999 CanLII 689 \(SCC\), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 417; R. v. Askov, 1990 CanLII 45 \(SCC\), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1199; R. v. Wray, 1970 CanLII 2 \(SCC\), [1971] S.C.R. 272; R. v. Kitaitchik (2002), 2002 CanLII 45000 \(ON CA\), 166 C.C.C. (3d) 14; R. v. Henry, 2005 SCC 76, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 609; R. v. Harper, 1994 CanLII 68 \(SCC\), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 343; R. v. Schedel (2003), 2003 BCCA 364 \(CanLII\), 175 C.C.C. (3d) 193; R. v. Richfield (2003), 2003 CanLII 52164 \(ON CA\), 178 C.C.C. (3d) 23; R. v. Dolynchuk (2004), 2004 MBCA 45 \(CanLII\), 184 C.C.C. (3d) 214; R. v. Banman, 2008 MBCA 103, 236 C.C.C. (3d) 547; R. v. S.A.B., 2003 SCC 60, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 678; R. v. Shepherd, 2007 SKCA 29, 218 C.C.C. (3d) 113, aff'd 2009 SCC 35, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 527; R. v. Padavattan (2007), 2007 CanLII 18137 \(ON SC\), 223 C.C.C. (3d) 221; R. v. Simmons, 1988 CanLII 12 \(SCC\), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 495; R. v. Golden, 2001 SCC 83, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 679; R. v. St. Lawrence, 1949 CanLII 100 \(ON SC\), [1949] O.R. 215; R. v. Feeney, 1997 CanLII 342 \(SCC\), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 13; R. v. Grant, 1993 CanLII 68 \(SCC\), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 223; R. v. Harris, 2007 ONCA 574, 225 C.C.C. (3d) 193; R. v. Strachan, 1988 CanLII 25 \(SCC\), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 980; R. v. Goldhart, 1996 CanLII 214 \(SCC\), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 463; R. v. Harrison, 2009 SCC 34, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 494; McDiarmid Lumber Ltd. v. God's

Lake First Nation, 2006 SCC 58, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 846; R. v. Davis, 1999 CanLII 638 \(SCC\), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 759.

By Binnie J.

Not followed: R. v. Therens, 1985 CanLII 29 \(SCC\), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 613; referred to: R. v. Golden, 2001 SCC 83, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 679; United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544 (1980); Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491 (1983); California v. Beheler, 463 U.S. 1121 (1983); Oregon v. Mathiason, 429 U.S. 492 (1977); Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964); Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966); Thompson v. Keohane, 516 U.S. 99 (1995); Stansbury v. California, 511 U.S. 318 (1994); R. v. Mann, 2004 SCC 52, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 59; R. v. Suberu, 2009 SCC 33, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 460, aff'g 2007 ONCA 60, 85 O.R. (3d) 127; R. v. Moran (1987), 1987 CanLII 124 \(ON CA\), 36 C.C.C. (3d) 225, leave to appeal refused, [1988] 1 S.C.R. xi; R. v. Grafe (1987), 1987 CanLII 170 \(ON CA\), 36 C.C.C. (3d) 267; Practice Note (Judges' Rules), [1964] 1 W.L.R. 152.

By Deschamps J.

Not followed: R. v. Collins, 1987 CanLII 84 \(SCC\), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265; referred to: R. v. Orellana, [1999] O.J. No. 5746 (QL); R. v. Suberu, 2009 SCC 33, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 460; R. v. Kang-Brown, 2008 SCC 18, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 456; R. v. Conway, 1989 CanLII 66 \(SCC\), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659; R. v. Regan, 2002 SCC 12, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 297; R. v. Greffe, 1990 CanLII 143 \(SCC\), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 755; R. v. Stillman, 1997 CanLII 384 \(SCC\), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 607; R. v. Burlingham, 1995 CanLII 88 \(SCC\), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 206; R. v. Strachan (1986), 1986 CanLII 1281 \(BC CA\), 25 D.L.R. (4th) 567; Herring v. United States, 555 U.S. 1 (2009); R. v. Duguay, 1989 CanLII 110 \(SCC\), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 93; Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Tobias, 1997 CanLII 322 \(SCC\), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 391; R. v. Taillefer, 2003 SCC 70, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 307; R. v. O'Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 \(SCC\), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411; R. v. Harrison, 2009 SCC 34, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 494.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 1, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11(c), 13, 24.

Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, ss. 84 “transfer”, 86(2), 99, 100.

Firearms Act, S.C. 1995, c. 39, s. 21 “transfer”.

Model Code of Pre-Arrest Procedure (ALI 1975), s. 110.1(2).

Authors Cited

Butterfoss, Edwin J. “Bright Line Seizures: The Need for Clarity in Determining When Fourth Amendment Activity Begins” (1988-1989), 79 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 437.

Canada. Law Reform Commission. Working Paper 10. Evidence — The Exclusion of Illegally Obtained Evidence. Ottawa: The Commission, 1974.

Hogg, Peter W. Constitutional Law of Canada, 5th ed. Supp., vol. 2. Scarborough, Ont.: Thomson/Carswell, 2007 (updated 2007, release 1).

LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment, 4th ed., vol. 1. St. Paul, Minn.: Thomson/West, 2004.

Mahoney, Richard. “Problems with the Current Approach to s. 24(2) of the Charter: An Inevitable Discovery” (1999), 42 Crim. L.Q. 443.

McLellan, A. Anne, and Bruce P. Elman. “The Enforcement of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms: An Analysis of Section 24” (1983), 21 Alta. L. Rev. 205.

Mirfield, Peter. “The Early Jurisprudence of Judicial Disrepute” (1987-88), 30 Crim. L.Q. 434.

Ontario. Commission on Systemic Racism in the Ontario Criminal Justice System. Report of the Commission on Systemic Racism in the Ontario Criminal Justice System. Toronto: The Commission, 1995.

Ontario. Ontario Human Rights Commission. Inquiry Report. Paying the Price: The Human Cost of Racial Profiling. Toronto: The Commission, 2003 (online: www.ohrc.on.ca/en).

Paciocco, David M. “Stillman, Disproportion and the Fair Trial Dichotomy under Section 24(2)” (1997), 2 Can. Crim. L.R. 163.

Paciocco, David M. “The Judicial Repeal of s. 24(2) and the Development of the Canadian Exclusionary Rule” (1989-90), 32 Crim. L.Q. 326.

Penney, Steven. “Taking Deterrence Seriously: Excluding Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence Under Section 24(2) of the Charter” (2004), 49 McGill L.J. 105.

- Perrin, L. Timothy, et al. "If It's Broken, Fix It: Moving Beyond the Exclusionary Rule — A New and Extensive Empirical Study of the Exclusionary Rule and a Call for a Civil Administrative Remedy to Partially Replace the Rule" (1998), 83 Iowa L. Rev. 669.
- Roach, Kent. "Constitutionalizing Disrepute: Exclusion of Evidence after Therens" (1986), 44 U.T. Fac. L. Rev. 209.
- Shearing, Clifford D., and Philip C. Stenning assisted by David Denberg. Police Training in Ontario: An Evaluation of Recruit and Supervisory Courses. Working Paper. Toronto: Centre of Criminology, University of Toronto, 1980.
- Stuart, Don. Charter Justice in Canadian Criminal Law, 4th ed. Toronto, Ont.: Thomson/Carswell, 2005.
- Stuart, Don. "Questioning the Discoverability Doctrine in Section 24(2) Rulings" (1996), 48 C.R. (4th) 351.
- Stuesser, Lee. "R. v. S.A.B.: Putting 'Self-Incrimination' in Context" (2004), 42 Alta. L. Rev. 543.
- Sullivan, Ruth. Driedger on the Construction of Statutes, 3rd ed. Toronto: Butterworths, 1994.
- Sullivan, Ruth. Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes, 5th ed. Markham, Ont.: LexisNexis, 2008.
- Tanovich, David M. "Using the Charter to Stop Racial Profiling: The Development of an Equality-Based Conception of Arbitrary Detention" (2002), 40 Osgoode Hall L.J. 145.
- Young, Alan. "All Along the Watchtower: Arbitrary Detention and the Police Function" (1991), 29 Osgoode Hall L.J. 329.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal (McMurtry C.J.O. and Laskin and Lang JJ.A.) (2006), 2006 CanLII 18347 \(ON CA\), 81 O.R. (3d) 1, 213 O.A.C. 127, 209 C.C.C. (3d) 250, 38 C.R. (6th) 58, 143 C.R.R. (2d) 223, 2006 CarswellOnt 3352, [2006] O.J. No. 2179 (QL), affirming the accused's conviction entered by M. H. Harris J., 2004 CarswellOnt 8783. Appeal allowed in part.

Jonathan Dawe and Frank R. Addario, for the appellant.

Michal Fairburn and John Corelli, for the respondent.

James C. Martin and Paul Adams, for the intervener the Director of Public Prosecutions of Canada.

Michael Brundrett and Margaret A. Mereigh, for the intervener the Attorney General of British Columbia.

Don Stuart and Graeme Norton, for the intervener the Canadian Civil Liberties Association.

Marlys A. Edwardh and Jessica R. Orkin, for the intervener the Criminal Lawyers' Association (Ontario).

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and LeBel, Fish, Abella and Charron JJ. was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND CHARRON J. —

I. Overview

[1] Mr. Grant appeals his convictions on a series of firearms offences, relating to a gun seized by police during an encounter on a Toronto sidewalk. The gun was entered as evidence against Mr. Grant and formed the basis of his convictions. The question on this appeal is whether that evidence was obtained in breach of Mr. Grant's Charter rights, and if so, whether the evidence should have been excluded under s. 24(2) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[2] Resolving these questions requires us to revisit two important and contentious areas of criminal law Charter jurisprudence. The first is the definition of “detention” under ss. 9 and 10 of the Charter. The second is the test for exclusion of evidence obtained in violation of the Charter pursuant to s. 24(2).

[3] The submissions before us reveal that existing jurisprudence on the issues of detention and exclusion of evidence is difficult to apply and may lead to unsatisfactory results. Without undermining the principles that animate the jurisprudence to date, we find it our duty, given the difficulties that have been pointed out to us, to take a fresh look at the frameworks that have been developed for the resolution of these two issues. We will also consider the subsidiary issue that arises in this case: the meaning of “transfer” of a weapon for the purposes of ss. 84, 99 and 100 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46.

II. Facts

[4] The encounter at the centre of this appeal occurred at mid-day on November 17, 2003, in the Greenwood and Danforth area of Toronto. With four schools in the area and a history of student assaults, robberies, and drug offences occurring over the lunch hour, the three officers involved in the encounter were on patrol for the purposes of monitoring the area and maintaining a safe student environment. Two of the officers, Constables Worrell and Forde, were dressed in plainclothes and driving an unmarked car. Although on patrol, their primary task was to visit the various schools to determine if there were persons on school property who should not have been there — either non-students or students from another school. The third officer, Constable Gomes, was in uniform and driving a marked police car. On “directed patrol”, he had been tasked with maintaining a visible police presence in the area in order to provide student reassurance and to deter crime during the high school lunch period.

[5] Mr. Grant, a young black man, was walking northbound on Greenwood Avenue when he came to the attention of Constables Worrell and Forde. As the two officers drove past, Cst. Worrell testified that the appellant “stared” at them in an unusually intense manner and continued to do so as they proceeded down the street, while at the same time “fidgeting” with his coat and pants in a way that aroused their suspicions. Given their purpose for being in the area and based on what he had just seen, Cst. Worrell decided that “maybe we should have a chat with this guy and see what’s up with him”. Cst. Worrell wanted to know whether Mr. Grant was a student at one of the schools they were assigned to monitor, and, if he was not, whether he was headed to one of the schools anyway. Noticing Cst. Gomes parked on the street ahead of Mr. Grant, and in light of his uniformed attire, the two plainclothes officers suggested to Cst. Gomes that he “have a chat” with the approaching appellant to determine if there was any need for concern.

[6] Cst. Gomes then got out of his car and initiated an exchange with Mr. Grant, while standing on the sidewalk directly in his intended path. The officer asked the appellant “what was going on”, and requested his name and address. In response, the appellant provided a provincial health card. At one point, the appellant, behaving nervously, adjusted his jacket, prompting the officer to ask him to “keep his hands in front of him”. By this point, the two other officers had returned and parked on the side of the street.

[7] Cst. Worrell testified on cross-examination that he and Cst. Forde pulled up because he got a funny feeling based on Mr. Grant’s way of looking over at them, looking around “all over the place”, and adjusting himself. On direct examination he said that “[h]e still seemed to be, I don’t know, looking a bit nervous the way he was looking around, looking at us, looking around when speaking to Officer Gomes. And at this time, I suggested to my partner, you know, I don’t think it would hurt if we just go up to Officer Gomes and just stand by, just to make sure everything was okay.” Thus, after a brief period observing the exchange from their car, the two officers approached the pair on the sidewalk, identified themselves to the appellant as police officers by flashing their badges, and took up positions behind Cst. Gomes, obstructing the way forward. The exchange between Cst. Gomes and Mr. Grant subsequent to the arrival of the two officers was as follows:

Q. Have you ever been arrested before?

A. I got into some trouble about three years ago.

Q. Do you have anything on you that you shouldn't?

A. No. Well, I got a small bag of weed.

Q. Where is it?

A. It's in my pocket.

Q. Is that it?

A. (Male puts his head down.) Yeah. Well, no.

Q. Do you have other drugs on you?

A. No, I just have the weed, that's it.

Q. Well, what is it that you have?

A. I have a firearm.

[8] At this point, the officers arrested and searched the appellant, seizing the marijuana and a loaded revolver. They then advised Mr. Grant of his right to counsel and took him to the police station.

-

III. Judgments Below

[9] At trial, Mr. Grant alleged violations of his rights under ss. 8, 9 and 10(b) of the Charter. The trial judge held that the officers' inquiries did not amount to a search within the meaning of s. 8. He further concluded that Mr. Grant was not detained prior to his arrest or, if he was detained, he waived his rights by cooperating with the officers' requests. Having found no Charter breach, he had no difficulty admitting the firearm: 2004 CarswellOnt 8779. Mr. Grant was convicted of five firearms offences, including possession of a restricted firearm for the purpose of transferring it without lawful authority (s. 100(1) of the Criminal Code).

[10] In the Ontario Court of Appeal, Laskin J.A. held that the trial judge's conclusion on the question of detention was undermined by several mischaracterizations as to what had occurred, thereby entitling the court to revisit the issue. He concluded that a detention had crystallized during the conversation with Cst. Gomes, before the appellant made his incriminating statements. Because the officers had no reasonable grounds to detain the appellant, the detention was arbitrary and a breach of s. 9 was established. Laskin J.A. did not deal with s. 10(b) and found no breach of s. 8. On the question of exclusion under s. 24(2), Laskin J.A. determined that the firearm was "derivative" evidence emanating from a self-incriminatory statement and would very often be excluded on that basis alone. However, after a review of recent developments in the s. 24(2) jurisprudence, Laskin J.A. concluded that the admission of the gun would not unduly undermine trial fairness. He held that the reputé of the administration of justice would be damaged more by the exclusion of the gun than by its admission. He therefore held that the gun was properly admitted into evidence. On the firearms issue, Laskin J.A. held that Mr. Grant's act of moving the gun from one place to another fell within the definition of "transfer" in s. 84 of the Code, justifying the conviction under s. 100(1). He therefore dismissed the appeal: (2006), 2006 CanLII 18347 (ON CA), 81 O.R. (3d) 1.

IV. Analysis

A. Breach of the Charter

[11] The first issue in this case is whether the evidence of the gun was obtained in a manner that breached Mr. Grant's rights under the Charter. Mr. Grant argues that the police breached his Charter rights by arbitrarily detaining him contrary to s. 9 and by failing to advise him of his right to speak to a lawyer contrary to s. 10(b), before the questioning that led to the discovery of the firearm that is the subject of these charges. Alternatively, if the Court finds he was not detained, Mr. Grant argues that the Court of Appeal erred in finding that there was no violation of s. 8's protection against unreasonable search and seizure.

[12] The threshold question is whether the appellant was detained before he produced the firearm and was arrested. If he was detained, the detention was arbitrary; all parties are agreed that the police lacked legal grounds to detain the appellant. Further, if detained, Mr. Grant was entitled to be advised of the right to counsel at that point, which would establish breach of s. 10(b) of the Charter.

1. The Meaning of "Detention" Under the Charter

- (a) The Positions of the Parties

[13] Mr. Grant argues that he was detained before he made his inculpatory statements and revealed the gun. He contends that his liberty to choose to remain or leave was taken away by the conduct of the police officers in blocking his path, and that this detention was arbitrary because at this point the officers lacked reasonable grounds to detain him under the standard for investigative detention elaborated in R. v. Mann, 2004 SCC 52, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 59. Because he was detained, he argues, the police were required to advise him under s. 10(b) that he had the right to speak to a lawyer.

[14] The Crown argues that Mr. Grant was not detained until the police arrested him after he disclosed his firearm, at which point they advised him of his right to talk to a lawyer. It says that the officers' prior conduct was not directed at curtailing the appellant's liberty, but rather at protecting their own safety while asking him some questions. The Crown says that the officers were engaging in community policing, which involves a dynamic interaction between the police and the citizens they serve. The Crown contends that preliminary, non-coercive questioning pursuant to police policy is a legitimate exercise of investigative police powers, is essential to the effective fulfilment of the police's duty to enforce the law, and does not amount to detention triggering the right to counsel.

(b) Interpretative Principles

[15] As for any constitutional provision, the starting point must be the language of the section. Where questions of interpretation arise, a generous, purposive and contextual approach should be applied.

[16] Constitutional guarantees such as ss. 9 and 10 should be interpreted in a “generous rather than . . . legalistic [way], aimed at fulfilling the purpose of the guarantee and securing for individuals the full benefit of the Charter’s protection” (R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 344). Unduly narrow, technical approaches to Charter interpretation must be avoided, given their potential to “subvert the goal of ensuring that right holders enjoy the full benefit and protection of the Charter” (Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 23).

[17] While the twin principles of purposive and generous interpretation are related and sometimes conflated, they are not the same. The purpose of a right must always be the dominant concern in its interpretation; generosity of interpretation is subordinate to and constrained by that purpose (P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), vol. 2, at pp. 36-30 and 36-31). While a narrow approach risks impoverishing a Charter right, an overly generous approach risks expanding its protection beyond its intended purposes. In brief, we must construe the language of ss. 9 and 10 in a generous way that furthers, without overshooting, its purpose: Big M Drug Mart, at p. 344.

[18] To interpret “detention” in ss. 9 and 10 generously, yet purposively, we must consider the context in which it is embedded — in other words, the role it plays in conjunction with related protections in the Charter.

(c) The Purpose of the Rights Linked to Detention

[19] Detention represents a limit on the broad right to liberty enjoyed by everyone in Canada at common law and by virtue of s. 7 of the Charter, which guarantees that liberty will only be curtailed in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Section 9 of the Charter establishes that “[e]veryone has the right not to be arbitrarily detained or imprisoned”. Section 10 accords certain rights to people who are arrested or detained, including the right to retain and instruct counsel.

[20] The purpose of s. 9, broadly put, is to protect individual liberty from unjustified state interference. As recognized by this Court in Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307, “liberty”, for Charter purposes, is not “restricted to mere freedom from physical restraint”, but encompasses a broader entitlement “to make decisions of fundamental importance free from state interference” (para. 49). Thus, s. 9 guards not only against unjustified state intrusions upon physical liberty, but also against incursions on mental liberty by prohibiting the coercive pressures of detention and imprisonment from being applied to people without adequate justification. The detainee’s interest in being able to make an informed choice whether to walk away or speak to the police is unaffected by the manner in which the detention is brought about.

[21] More specifically, an individual confronted by state authority ordinarily has the option to choose simply to walk away: R. v. Esposito (1985), 1985 CanLII 118 \(ON CA\), 24 C.C.C. (3d) 88 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 94; Dedman v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 41 \(SCC\), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 2, at p. 11, citing Martin J.A. in the Ontario Court of Appeal ((1981), 1981 CanLII 1631 \(ON CA\), 32 O.R. (2d) 641, at p. 653):

Although a police officer may approach a person on the street and ask him questions, if the person refuses to answer the police officer must allow him to proceed on his way, unless . . . [he] arrests him

See also Application under s. 83.28 of the Criminal Code (Re), 2004 SCC 42, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 248, at para. 131. Where this choice has been removed — whether by physical or psychological compulsion — the individual is detained. Section 9 guarantees that the state’s ability to interfere with personal autonomy will not be exercised arbitrarily. Once detained, the individual’s choice whether to speak to the authorities remains, and is protected by the s. 10 informational requirements and the s. 7 right to silence.

[22] “Detention” also identifies the point at which rights subsidiary to detention, such as the right to counsel, are triggered. These rights are engaged by the vulnerable position of the person who has been taken into the effective control of the state authorities. They are principally concerned with addressing the imbalance of power between the state and the person under its control. More specifically, they are designed to ensure that the person whose liberty has been curtailed retains an informed and effective choice whether to speak to state authorities, consistent with the overarching principle against self-incrimination. They also ensure that the person who is under the control of the state be afforded the opportunity to seek legal advice in order to assist in regaining his or her liberty. As this Court observed in R. v. Hebert, 1990 CanLII 118 (SCC), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 151:

In a broad sense, the purpose of ss. 7 to 14 is two-fold to preserve the rights of the detained individual, and to maintain the repute and integrity of our system of justice. More particularly, it is to the control of the superior power of the state vis-à-vis the individual who has been detained by the state, and thus placed in its power, that s. 7 and the related provisions that follow are primarily directed. The state has the power to intrude on the individual's physical freedom by detaining him or her. The individual cannot walk away. This physical intrusion on the individual's mental liberty in turn may enable the state to infringe the individual's mental liberty by techniques made possible by its superior resources and power. [Emphasis added; pp. 179-80.]

[23] By setting limits on the power of the state and imposing obligations with regard to the detained person through the concept of detention, the Charter seeks to effect a balance between the interests of the detained individual and those of the state. The power of the state to curtail an individual's liberty by way of detention cannot be exercised arbitrarily and attracts a reciprocal obligation to accord the individual legal protection against the state's superior power.

(d) Defining Detention

[24] The word "detention" admits of many meanings. Read narrowly, "detention" can be seen as indicating situations where the police take explicit control over the person and command obedience. Read expansively, "detention" can be read as extending to even a fleeting interference or delay. Neither of these extremes offers an acceptable definition of "detention" as used in ss. 9 and 10 of the Charter.

[25] The first extreme was rejected by this Court in R. v. Therens, 1985 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 613, which held that detention for Charter purposes occurs when a state agent, by way of physical or psychological restraint, takes away an individual's choice simply to walk away. This encompasses not only explicit interference with the subject's liberty by way of physical interference or express command, but any form of "compulsory restraint". A person is detained where he or she "submits or acquiesces in the deprivation of liberty and reasonably believes that the choice to do otherwise does not exist" (Therens, at p. 644). It is clear that a person may reasonably believe he or she has no choice in circumstances where there has been no formal assertion of police control. Thus the first interpretation must be rejected. This comports with the principle that a generous rather than legalistic approach must be applied to the interpretation of Charter principles and avoids cramping the purpose of the protections conferred by ss. 9 and 10 of the Charter.

[26] The second interpretation of "detention", reducing it to any interference, however slight, must also be rejected. As held in Mann, at para. 19, per Iacobucci J.:

. . . the police cannot be said to "detain", within the meaning of ss. 9 and 10 of the Charter, every suspect they stop for purposes of identification, or even interview. The person who is stopped will in all cases be "detained" in the sense of "delayed", or "kept waiting". But the constitutional rights recognized by ss. 9 and 10 of the Charter are not engaged by delays that involve no significant physical or psychological restraint.

It is clear that, while the forms of interference s. 9 guards against are broadly defined to include interferences with both physical and mental liberty, not every trivial or insignificant interference with this liberty attracts Charter scrutiny. To interpret detention this broadly would trivialize the applicable Charter rights and overshoot their purpose. Only the individual whose liberty is meaningfully constrained has genuine need of the additional rights accorded by the Charter to people in that situation.

[27] Having rejected the extreme positions advanced, the question is where between them the line that marks detention under ss. 9 and 10 is to be traced. This is a question that is not easily answered in the abstract; as in so many areas of the law, the most useful guidance derives from the decided cases. In what follows, we set out the general principle of choice that underlies the determination. We then discuss situations which illustrate where the line should be drawn.

[28] The general principle that determines detention for Charter purposes was set out in Therens: a person is detained where he or she “submits or acquiesces in the deprivation of liberty and reasonably believes that the choice to do otherwise does not exist” (per Le Dain J., at p. 644). This principle is consistent with the notion of choice that underlies our conception of liberty and, as such, shapes our interpretation of ss. 9 and 10 of the Charter. When detention removes the “choice to do otherwise” but comply with a police direction, s. 10(b) serves an indispensable purpose. It protects, among other interests, the detainee’s ability to choose whether to cooperate with the investigation by giving a statement. The ambit of detention for constitutional purposes is informed by the need to safeguard this choice without impairing effective law enforcement. This explains why the extremes of formally asserted control on the one hand and a passing encounter on the other have been rejected; the former restricts detention in a way that denies the accused rights he or she needs and should have, while the latter would confer rights where they are neither necessary or appropriate.

[29] The language of ss. 9 and 10 is consistent with this purpose-based approach to detention. The pairing of “detained” and “imprisoned” in s. 9 provides textual guidance for determining where the constitutional line between justifiable and unjustifiable interference should be drawn. “Imprisonment” connotes total or near-total loss of liberty. The juxtaposition of “imprisoned” with “detained” suggests that a “detention” requires significant deprivation of liberty. Similarly, the words “arrest or detention” in s. 10 suggest that a “detention” exists when the deprivation of liberty may have legal consequences. This linguistic context requires exclusion of police stops where the subject’s rights are not seriously in issue.

[30] Moving on from the fundamental principle of the right to choose, we find that psychological constraint amounting to detention has been recognized in two situations. The first is where the subject is legally required to comply with a direction or demand, as in the case of a roadside breath sample. The second is where there is no legal obligation to comply with a restrictive or coercive demand, but a reasonable person in the subject’s position would feel so obligated. The rationale for this second form of psychological detention was explained by Le Dain J. in Therens as follows:

In my opinion, it is not realistic, as a general rule, to regard compliance with a demand or direction by a police officer as truly voluntary, in the sense that the citizen feels that he or she has the choice to obey or not, even where there is in fact a lack of statutory or common law authority for the demand or direction and therefore an absence of criminal liability for failure to comply with it. Most citizens are not aware of the precise legal limits of police authority. Rather than risk the application of physical force or prosecution for wilful obstruction, the reasonable person is likely to err on the side of caution, assume lawful authority and comply with the demand. The element of psychological compulsion, in the form of a reasonable perception of suspension of freedom of choice, is enough to make the restraint of liberty involuntary. Detention may be effected without the application or threat of application of physical restraint if the person concerned submits or acquiesces in the deprivation of liberty and reasonably believes that the choice to do otherwise does not exist. [Emphasis added; p. 644.]

[31] This second form of psychological detention — where no legal compulsion exists — has proven difficult to define consistently. The question is whether the police conduct would cause a reasonable person to conclude that he or she was not free to go and had to comply with the police direction or demand. As held in Therens, this must be determined objectively, having regard to all the circumstances of the particular situation, including the conduct of the police. As discussed in more detail below and summarized at para. 44, the focus must be on the state conduct in the context of the surrounding legal and factual situation, and how that conduct would be perceived by a reasonable person in the situation as it develops.

[32] The objective nature of this inquiry recognizes that the police must be able to know when a detention occurs, in order to allow them to fulfill their attendant obligations under the Charter and afford the individual its added protections. However, the subjective intentions of the police are not determinative. (Questions such as police “good faith” may become relevant when the test for exclusion of evidence under s. 24(2) is applied, in cases where a Charter breach is found.) While the test is objective, the individual’s particular circumstances and perceptions at the time may be relevant in assessing the reasonableness of any perceived power imbalance between the individual and the police, and thus the reasonableness of any perception that he or she had no choice but to comply with the police directive. To answer the question whether there is a detention involves a realistic appraisal of the entire interaction as it developed, not a minute parsing of words and movements. In those situations where the police may be uncertain whether their conduct is having a coercive effect on the individual, it is open to them to inform the subject in unambiguous terms that he or she is under no obligation to answer questions and is free to go. It is for the trial judge, applying the proper legal principles to the particular facts of the case, to determine whether the line has been crossed between police conduct that respects liberty and the individual’s right to choose, and conduct that does not.

[33] In most cases, it will be readily apparent whether or not an encounter between the police and an individual results in a detention. Making the task easier is the fact that what would reasonably be understood by all concerned is often informed by generally understood legal rights and duties, as a few examples illustrate.

[34] At one end of the spectrum of possibilities, detention overlaps with arrest or imprisonment and the Charter will clearly apply. Similarly, a legal obligation to comply with a police demand or direction, such as a breath sample demand at the roadside, clearly denotes s. 9 detention. As Le Dain J. observed in Therens, “[i]t is not realistic to speak of a person who is liable to arrest and prosecution for refusal to comply with a demand which a peace officer is empowered by statute to make as being free to refuse to comply” (p. 643).

[35] At the other end of the spectrum lie encounters between individual and police where it would be clear to a reasonable person that the individual is not being deprived of a meaningful choice whether or not to cooperate with a police demand or directive and hence not detained.

[36] We may rule out at the outset situations where the police are acting in a non-adversarial role and assisting members of the public in circumstances commonly accepted as lacking the essential character of a detention. In many common situations, reasonable people understand that the police are not constraining individual choices, but rather helping people or gathering information. For instance, the reasonable person would understand that a police officer who attends at a medical emergency on a 911 call is not detaining the individuals he or she encounters. This is so even if the police, in taking control of the situation, effectively interfere with an individual’s freedom of movement. Such deprivations of liberty will not be significant enough to attract Charter scrutiny because they do not attract legal consequences for the concerned individuals.

[37] Another often-discussed situation is when police officers approach bystanders in the wake of an accident or crime, to determine if they witnessed the event and obtain information that may assist in their investigation. While many people may be happy to assist the police, the law is clear that, subject to specific provisions that may exceptionally govern, the citizen is free to walk away: R. v. Grafe (1987), 1987 CanLII 170 (ON CA), 36 C.C.C. (3d) 267 (Ont. C.A.). Given the existence of such a generally understood right in such circumstances, a reasonable person would not conclude that his or her right to choose whether to cooperate with them has been taken away. This conclusion holds true even if the person may feel compelled to cooperate with the police out of a sense of moral or civic duty. The Ontario Court of Appeal adverted to this concept in Grafe, where Krever J.A. wrote, at p. 271:

The law has long recognized that although there is no legal duty there is a moral or social duty on the part of every citizen to answer questions put to him or her by the police and, in that way to assist the police: see, for example, Rice v. Connolly, [1966] 2 All E.R. 649 at p. 652, per Lord Parker C.J. Implicit in that moral or social duty is the right of a police officer to ask questions even, in my opinion, when he or she has no belief that an offence has been committed. To be asked questions, in these circumstances, cannot be said to be a deprivation of liberty or security.

[38] In the context of investigating an accident or a crime, the police, unbeknownst to them at that point in time, may find themselves asking questions of a person who is implicated in the occurrence and, consequently, is at risk of self-incrimination. This does not preclude the police from continuing to question the person in the pursuit of their investigation. Section 9 of the Charter does not require that police abstain from interacting with members of the public until they have specific grounds to connect the individual to the commission of a crime. Nor does s. 10 require that the police advise everyone at the outset of any encounter that they have no obligation to speak to them and are entitled to legal counsel.

[39] Effective law enforcement is highly dependent on the cooperation of members of the public. The police must be able to act in a manner that fosters this cooperation, not discourage it. However, police investigative powers are not without limits. The notion of psychological detention recognizes the reality that police tactics, even in the absence of exercising actual physical restraint, may be coercive enough to effectively remove the individual's choice to walk away from the police. This creates the risk that the person may reasonably feel compelled to incriminate himself or herself. Where that is the case, the police are no longer entitled simply to expect cooperation from an individual. Unless, as stated earlier, the police inform the person that he or she is under no obligation to answer questions and is free to go, a detention may well crystallize and, when it does, the police must provide the subject with his or her s. 10(b) rights. That the obligation arises only on detention represents part of the balance between, on the one hand, the individual rights protected by ss. 9 and 10 and enjoyed by all members of society, and on the other, the collective interest of all members of society in the ability of the police to act on their behalf to investigate and prevent crime.

[40] A more complex situation may arise in the context of neighbourhood policing where the police are not responding to any specific occurrence, but where the non-coercive police role of assisting in meeting needs or maintaining basic order can subtly merge with the potentially coercive police role of investigating crime and arresting suspects so that they may be brought to justice. This is the situation that arises in this case.

[41] As discussed earlier, general inquiries by a patrolling officer present no threat to freedom of choice. On the other hand, such inquiries can escalate into situations where the focus shifts from general community-oriented concern to suspicion of a particular individual. Focussed suspicion, in and of itself, does not turn the encounter into a detention. What matters is how the police, based on that suspicion, interacted with the subject. The language of the Charter does not confine detention to situations where a person is in potential jeopardy of arrest. However, this is a factor that may help to determine whether, in a particular circumstance, a reasonable person would conclude he or she had no choice but to comply with a police officer's request. The police must be mindful that, depending on how they act and what they say, the point may be reached where a reasonable person, in the position of that individual, would conclude he or she is not free to choose to walk away or decline to answer questions.

[42] The length of the encounter said to give rise to the detention may be a relevant consideration. Consider the act of a police officer placing his or her hand on an individual's arm. If sustained, it might well lead a reasonable person to conclude that his or her freedom to choose whether to cooperate or not has been removed. On the other hand, a fleeting touch may not, depending on the circumstances, give rise to a reasonable conclusion that one's liberty has been curtailed. At the same time, it must be remembered that situations can move quickly, and a single forceful act or word may be enough to cause a reasonable person to conclude that his or her right to choose how to respond has been removed.

[43] Whether the individual has been deprived of the right to choose simply to walk away will depend, to reiterate, on all the circumstances of the case. It will be for the trial judge to determine on all the evidence. Deference is owed to the trial judge's findings of fact, although application of the law to the facts is a question of law.

[44] In summary, we conclude as follows:

1. Detention under ss. 9 and 10 of the Charter refers to a suspension of the individual's liberty interest by a significant physical or psychological restraint. Psychological detention is established either where the individual has a legal obligation to comply with the restrictive request or demand, or a reasonable person would conclude by reason of the state conduct that he or she had no choice but to comply.

2. In cases where there is no physical restraint or legal obligation, it may not be clear whether a person has been detained. To determine whether the reasonable person in the individual's circumstances would conclude that he or she had been deprived by the state of the liberty of choice, the court may consider, inter alia, the following factors:

- (a) The circumstances giving rise to the encounter as they would reasonably be perceived by the individual: whether the police were providing general assistance; maintaining general order; making general inquiries regarding a particular occurrence; or, singling out the individual for focussed investigation.

- (b) The nature of the police conduct, including the language used; the use of physical contact; the place where the interaction occurred; the presence of others; and the duration of the encounter.

- (c) The particular characteristics or circumstances of the individual where relevant, including age; physical stature; minority status; level of sophistication.

2. Was the Appellant Detained Prior to Incriminating Himself?

[45] Against this background, we return to the question at hand: Was Mr. Grant detained within the meaning of ss. 9 and 10 of the Charter before the questions that led him to disclose his firearm? The trial judge held that he was not. An appellate court must approach a trial judge's decision on this issue with appropriate deference. However, we agree with Laskin J.A. that the trial judge's conclusion on the question of detention is undermined by certain key findings of fact that cannot reasonably be supported by the evidence. In the circumstances, it is necessary to revisit the issue.

[46] This is not a clear case of physical restraint or compulsion by operation of law. Accordingly, we must consider all relevant circumstances to determine if a reasonable person in Mr. Grant's position would have concluded that his or her right to choose how to interact with the police (i.e. whether to leave or comply) had been removed.

[47] The encounter began with Cst. Gomes approaching Mr. Grant (stepping in his path) and making general inquiries. Such preliminary questioning is a legitimate exercise of police powers. At this stage, a reasonable person would not have concluded he or she was being deprived of the right to choose how to act, and for that reason there was no detention.

[48] Cst. Gomes then told the appellant to "keep his hands in front of him". This act, viewed in isolation, might be insufficient to indicate detention, on the ground that it was simply a precautionary directive. However, consideration of the entire context of what transpired from this point forward leads to the conclusion that Mr. Grant was detained.

[49] Two other officers approached, flashing their badges and taking tactical adversarial positions behind Cst. Gomes. The encounter developed into one where Mr. Grant was singled out as the object of particularized suspicion, as evidenced by the conduct of the officers. The nature of the questioning changed from ascertaining the appellant's identity to determining whether he "had anything that he should not". At this point the encounter took on the character of an interrogation, going from general neighbourhood policing to a situation where the police had effectively taken control over the appellant and were attempting to elicit incriminating information.

[50] Although Cst. Gomes was respectful in his questioning, the encounter was inherently intimidating. The power imbalance was obviously exacerbated by Mr. Grant's youth and inexperience. Mr. Grant did not testify, so we do not know what his perceptions of the interaction actually were. However, because the test is an objective one, this is not fatal to his argument that there was a detention. We agree with Laskin J.A.'s conclusion that Mr. Grant was detained. In our view, the evidence supports Mr. Grant's contention that a reasonable person in his position (18 years old, alone, faced by three physically larger policemen in adversarial positions) would conclude that his or her right to choose how to act had been removed by the police, given their conduct.

[51] The police conduct that gave rise to an impression of control was not fleeting. The direction to Mr. Grant to keep his hands in front, in itself inconclusive, was followed by the appearance of two other officers flashing their badges and by questioning driven by focussed suspicion of Mr. Grant. The sustained and restrictive tenor of the conduct after the direction to Mr. Grant to keep his hands in front of him reasonably supports the conclusion that the officers were putting him under their control and depriving him of his choice as to how to respond.

[52] We conclude that Mr. Grant was detained when Cst. Gomes told him to keep his hands in front of him, the other two officers moved into position behind Cst. Gomes, and Cst. Gomes embarked on a pointed line of questioning. At this point, Mr. Grant's liberty was clearly constrained and he was in need of the Charter protections associated with detention.

3. Was the Detention Arbitrary Under Section 9?

[53] We have determined that the appellant was detained prior to his arrest. The question at this point is whether the detention was “arbitrary” within the meaning of s. 9.

[54] The s. 9 guarantee against arbitrary detention is a manifestation of the general principle, enunciated in s. 7, that a person’s liberty is not to be curtailed except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. As this Court has stated: “This guarantee expresses one of the most fundamental norms of the rule of law. The state may not detain arbitrarily, but only in accordance with the law” (Charkaoui v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 SCC 9, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 350, at para. 88). Section 9 serves to protect individual liberty against unlawful state interference. A lawful detention is not arbitrary within the meaning of s. 9 (Mann, at para. 20), unless the law authorizing the detention is itself arbitrary. Conversely, a detention not authorized by law is arbitrary and violates s. 9.

[55] Earlier suggestions that an unlawful detention was not necessarily arbitrary (see R. v. Duguay (1985), 1985 CanLII 112 (ON CA), 18 C.C.C. (3d) 289 (Ont. C.A.)) have been overtaken by Mann, in which this Court confirmed the existence of a common law police power of investigative detention. The concern in the earlier cases was that an arrest made on grounds falling just short of the “reasonable and probable grounds” required for arrest should not automatically be considered arbitrary in the sense of being baseless or capricious. Mann, in confirming that a brief investigative detention based on “reasonable suspicion” was lawful, implicitly held that a detention in the absence of at least reasonable suspicion is unlawful and therefore arbitrary within s. 9.

[56] This approach mirrors the framework developed for assessing unreasonable searches and seizures under s. 8 of the Charter. Under R. v. Collins, 1987 CanLII 84 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265, and subsequent cases dealing with s. 8, a search must be authorized by law to be reasonable; the authorizing law must itself be reasonable; and the search must be carried out in a reasonable manner. Similarly, it should now be understood that for a detention to be non-arbitrary, it must be authorized by a law which is itself non-arbitrary. We add that, as with other rights, the s. 9 prohibition of arbitrary detention may be limited under s. 1 by such measures “prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society”: see R. v. Hufsky, 1988 CanLII 72 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 621, and R. v. Ladouceur, 1990 CanLII 108 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1257.

[57] Here, the officers acknowledged at trial that they did not have legal grounds or reasonable suspicion to detain the accused prior to his incriminating statements. No issue was taken with this concession on appeal. We therefore conclude that the detention was arbitrary and in breach of s. 9.

4. Was the Appellant’s Section 10(b) Right to Counsel Infringed?

[58] In R. v. Suberu, 2009 SCC 33, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 460, we conclude that the s. 10(b) right to counsel arises immediately upon detention, whether or not the detention is solely for investigative purposes. That being the case, s. 10(b) of the Charter required the police to advise Mr. Grant that he had the right to speak to a lawyer, and to give him a reasonable opportunity to obtain legal advice if he so chose, before proceeding to elicit incriminating information from him. Because he now faced significant legal jeopardy and had passed into the effective control of the police, the appellant was “in immediate need of legal advice”: R. v. Brydges, 1990 CanLII 123 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 190, at p. 206. Because the officers did not believe they had detained the appellant, they did not comply with their obligations under s. 10(b). The breach of s. 10(b) is established.

B. Exclusion of the Evidence

1. Background

[59] When must evidence obtained in violation of a person's Charter rights be excluded?

Section 24(2) of the Charter provides the following answer:

Where, in proceedings under subsection (1), a court concludes that evidence was obtained in a manner that infringed or denied any rights or freedoms guaranteed by this Charter, the evidence shall be excluded if it is established that, having regard to all the circumstances, the admission of it in the proceedings would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[60] The test set out in s. 24(2) — what would bring the administration of justice into disrepute having regard to all the circumstances — is broad and imprecise. The question is what considerations enter into making this determination. In Collins and in R. v. Stillman, 1997 CanLII 384 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 607, this Court endeavoured to answer this question. The Collins/Stillman framework, as interpreted and applied in subsequent decisions, has brought a measure of certainty to the s. 24(2) inquiry. Yet the analytical method it imposes and the results it sometimes produces have been criticized as inconsistent with the language and objectives of s. 24(2). In order to understand these criticisms, it is necessary to briefly review the holdings in Collins and Stillman.

[61] In Collins, the Court (per Lamer J., as he then was) proceeded by grouping the factors to be considered under s. 24(2) into three categories: (1) whether the evidence will undermine the fairness of the trial by effectively conscripting the accused against himself or herself; (2) the seriousness of the Charter breach; and (3) the effect of excluding the evidence on the long-term repute of the administration of justice. While Lamer J. acknowledged that these categories were merely a “matter of personal preference” (p. 284), they quickly became formalized as the governing test for s. 24(2).

[62] Collins shed important light on the factors relevant to determining admissibility of Charter-violative evidence under s. 24(2). However, the concepts of trial fairness and conscription under the first branch of Collins introduced new problems of their own. Moreover, questions arose about what work (if any) remained to be done under the second and third categories, once conscription leading to trial unfairness had been found. Finally, issues arose as to how to measure the seriousness of the breach under the second branch and what weight, if any, should be put on the seriousness of the offence charged in deciding whether to admit evidence.

[63] The admission of physical or “real” evidence obtained from the body of the accused in breach of his or her Charter rights proved particularly problematic. Ten years after Collins, the Court revisited this question in Stillman. The majority held that evidence obtained in breach of the Charter should, at the outset of the s. 24(2) inquiry, be classified as either “conscriptive” or “non-conscriptive”. Evidence would be classified as conscriptive where “an accused, in violation of his Charter rights, is compelled to incriminate himself at the behest of the state by means of a statement, the use of the body or the production of bodily samples”: Stillman, at para. 80, per Cory J. The category of conscriptive evidence was also held to include real evidence discovered as a result of an unlawfully conscripted statement. This is known as derivative evidence.

[64] Stillman held that conscriptive evidence is generally inadmissible — because of its presumed impact on trial fairness — unless if it would have been independently discovered. Despite reminders that “all the circumstances” must always be considered under s. 24(2) (see R. v. Burlingham, 1995 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 206, per Sopinka J., R. v. Orbanski, 2005 SCC 37, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 3, per LeBel J.), Stillman has generally been read as creating an all-but-automatic exclusionary rule for non-discoverable conscriptive evidence, broadening the category of conscriptive evidence and increasing its importance to the ultimate decision on admissibility.

[65] This general rule of inadmissibility of all non-discoverable conscriptive evidence, whether intended by Stillman or not, seems to go against the requirement of s. 24(2) that the court determining admissibility must consider “all the circumstances”. The underlying assumption that the use of conscriptive evidence always, or almost always, renders the trial unfair is also open to challenge. In other contexts, this Court has recognized that a fair trial “is one which satisfies the public interest in getting at the truth, while preserving basic procedural fairness to the accused”: R. v. Harrer, 1995 CanLII 70 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 562, at para. 45. It is difficult to reconcile trial fairness as a multifaceted and contextual concept with a near-automatic presumption that admission of a broad class of evidence will render a trial unfair, regardless of the circumstances in which it was obtained. In our view, trial fairness is better conceived as an overarching systemic goal than as a distinct stage of the s. 24(2) analysis.

[66] This brief review of the impact of Collins and Stillman brings us to the heart of our inquiry on this appeal: clarification of the criteria relevant to determining when, in “all the circumstances”, admission of evidence obtained by a Charter breach “would bring the administration of justice into disrepute”.

2. Overview of a Revised Approach to Section 24(2)

[67] The words of s. 24(2) capture its purpose: to maintain the good repute of the administration of justice. The term “administration of justice” is often used to indicate the processes by which those who break the law are investigated, charged and tried. More broadly, however, the term embraces maintaining the rule of law and upholding Charter rights in the justice system as a whole.

[68] The phrase “bring the administration of justice into disrepute” must be understood in the long-term sense of maintaining the integrity of, and public confidence in, the justice system. Exclusion of evidence resulting in an acquittal may provoke immediate criticism. But s. 24(2) does not focus on immediate reaction to the individual case. Rather, it looks to whether the overall reputation of the justice system, viewed in the long term, will be adversely affected by admission of the evidence. The inquiry is objective. It asks whether a reasonable person, informed of all relevant circumstances and the values underlying the Charter, would conclude that the admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[69] Section 24(2)’s focus is not only long-term, but prospective. The fact of the Charter breach means damage has already been done to the administration of justice. Section 24(2) starts from that proposition and seeks to ensure that evidence obtained through that breach does not do further damage to the reputation of the justice system.

[70] Finally, s. 24(2)’s focus is societal. Section 24(2) is not aimed at punishing the police or providing compensation to the accused, but rather at systemic concerns. The s. 24(2) focus is on the broad impact of admission of the evidence on the long-term reputation of the justice system.

[71] A review of the authorities suggests that whether the admission of evidence obtained in breach of the Charter would bring the administration of justice into disrepute engages three avenues of inquiry, each rooted in the public interests engaged by s. 24(2), viewed in a long-term, forward-looking and societal perspective. When faced with an application for exclusion under s.

24(2), a court must assess and balance the effect of admitting the evidence on society's confidence in the justice system having regard to: (1) the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct (admission may send the message the justice system condones serious state misconduct), (2) the impact of the breach on the Charter-protected interests of the accused (admission may send the message that individual rights count for little), and (3) society's interest in the adjudication of the case on its merits. The court's role on a s. 24(2) application is to balance the assessments under each of these lines of inquiry to determine whether, considering all the circumstances, admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. These concerns, while not precisely tracking the categories of considerations set out in Collins, capture the factors relevant to the s. 24(2) determination as enunciated in Collins and subsequent jurisprudence.

(a) *Seriousness of the Charter-Infringing State Conduct*

[72] The first line of inquiry relevant to the s. 24(2) analysis requires a court to assess whether the admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute by sending a message to the public that the courts, as institutions responsible for the administration of justice, effectively condone state deviation from the rule of law by failing to dissociate themselves from the fruits of that unlawful conduct. The more severe or deliberate the state conduct that led to the Charter violation, the greater the need for the courts to dissociate themselves from that conduct, by excluding evidence linked to that conduct, in order to preserve public confidence in and ensure state adherence to the rule of law.

[73] This inquiry therefore necessitates an evaluation of the seriousness of the state conduct that led to the breach. The concern of this inquiry is not to punish the police or to deter Charter breaches, although deterrence of Charter breaches may be a happy consequence. The main concern is to preserve public confidence in the rule of law and its processes. In order to determine the effect of admission of the evidence on public confidence in the justice system, the court on a s.

24(2) application must consider the seriousness of the violation, viewed in terms of the gravity of the offending conduct by state authorities whom the rule of law requires to uphold the rights guaranteed by the Charter.

[74] State conduct resulting in Charter violations varies in seriousness. At one end of the spectrum, admission of evidence obtained through inadvertent or minor violations of the Charter may minimally undermine public confidence in the rule of law. At the other end of the spectrum, admitting evidence obtained through a wilful or reckless disregard of Charter rights will inevitably have a negative effect on the public confidence in the rule of law, and risk bringing the administration of justice into disrepute.

[75] Extenuating circumstances, such as the need to prevent the disappearance of evidence, may attenuate the seriousness of police conduct that results in a Charter breach: R. v. Silveira, 1995 CanLII 89 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 297, per Cory J. “Good faith” on the part of the police will also reduce the need for the court to disassociate itself from the police conduct. However, ignorance of Charter standards must not be rewarded or encouraged and negligence or wilful blindness cannot be equated with good faith: R. v. Genest, 1989 CanLII 109 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 59, at p. 87, per Dickson C.J.; R. v. Kokesch, 1990 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 3, at pp. 32-33, per Sopinka J.; R. v. Buhay, 2003 SCC 30, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 631, at para. 59. Wilful or flagrant disregard of the Charter by those very persons who are charged with upholding the right in question may require that the court dissociate itself from such conduct. It follows that deliberate police conduct in violation of established Charter standards tends to support exclusion of the evidence. It should also be kept in mind that for every Charter breach that comes before the courts, many others may go unidentified and unredressed because they did not turn up relevant evidence leading to a criminal charge. In recognition of the need for courts to distance themselves from this behaviour, therefore, evidence that the Charter-infringing conduct was part of a pattern of abuse tends to support exclusion.

(b) Impact on the Charter-Protected Interests of the Accused [76] This inquiry focusses on the seriousness of the impact of the Charter breach on the Charter-protected interests of the accused. It calls for an evaluation of the extent to which the breach actually undermined the interests protected by the right infringed. The impact of a Charter breach may range from fleeting and technical to profoundly intrusive. The more serious the impact on the accused's protected interests, the greater the risk that admission of the evidence may signal to the public that Charter rights, however high-sounding, are of little actual avail to the citizen, breeding public cynicism and bringing the administration of justice into disrepute.

[77] To determine the seriousness of the infringement from this perspective, we look to the interests engaged by the infringed right and examine the degree to which the violation impacted on those interests. For example, the interests engaged in the case of a statement to the authorities obtained in breach of the Charter include the s. 7 right to silence, or to choose whether or not to speak to authorities (Hebert) — all stemming from the principle against self-incrimination: R. v. White, 1999 CanLII 689 (SCC), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 417, at para. 44. The more serious the incursion on these interests, the greater the risk that admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[78] Similarly, an unreasonable search contrary to s. 8 of the Charter may impact on the protected interests of privacy, and more broadly, human dignity. An unreasonable search that intrudes on an area in which the individual reasonably enjoys a high expectation of privacy, or that demeans his or her dignity, is more serious than one that does not.

(c) Society's Interest in an Adjudication on the Merits

[79] Society generally expects that a criminal allegation will be adjudicated on its merits. Accordingly, the third line of inquiry relevant to the s. 24(2) analysis asks whether the truth-seeking function of the criminal trial process would be better served by admission of the evidence, or by its exclusion. This inquiry reflects society's "collective interest in ensuring that those who transgress the law are brought to trial and dealt with according to the law": R. v. Askov, 1990 CanLII 45 (SCC), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1199, at pp. 1219-20. Thus the Court suggested in Collins that a judge on a s. 24(2) application should consider not only the negative impact of admission of the evidence on the repute of the administration of justice, but the impact of failing to admit the evidence.

[80] The concern for truth-seeking is only one of the considerations under a s. 24(2) application. The view that reliable evidence is admissible regardless of how it was obtained (see R. v. Wray, 1970 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1971] S.C.R. 272) is inconsistent with the Charter's affirmation of rights. More specifically, it is inconsistent with the wording of s. 24(2), which mandates a broad inquiry into all the circumstances, not just the reliability of the evidence.

[81] This said, public interest in truth-finding remains a relevant consideration under the s. 24(2) analysis. The reliability of the evidence is an important factor in this line of inquiry. If a breach (such as one that effectively compels the suspect to talk) undermines the reliability of the evidence, this points in the direction of exclusion of the evidence. The admission of unreliable evidence serves neither the accused's interest in a fair trial nor the public interest in uncovering the truth. Conversely, exclusion of relevant and reliable evidence may undermine the truth-seeking function of the justice system and render the trial unfair from the public perspective, thus bringing the administration of justice into disrepute.

[82] The fact that the evidence obtained in breach of the Charter may facilitate the discovery of the truth and the adjudication of a case on its merits must therefore be weighed against factors pointing to exclusion, in order to “balance the interests of truth with the integrity of the justice system”: Mann, at para. 57, per Iacobucci J. The court must ask “whether the vindication of the specific Charter violation through the exclusion of evidence exacts too great a toll on the truth-seeking goal of the criminal trial”: R. v. Kitaitchik (2002), 2002 CanLII 45000 (ON CA), 166 C.C.C. (3d) 14 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 47, per Doherty J.A.

[83] The importance of the evidence to the prosecution’s case is another factor that may be considered in this line of inquiry. Like Deschamps J., we view this factor as corollary to the inquiry into reliability, in the following limited sense. The admission of evidence of questionable reliability is more likely to bring the administration of justice into disrepute where it forms the entirety of the case against the accused. Conversely, the exclusion of highly reliable evidence may impact more negatively on the reputation of the administration of justice where the remedy effectively guts the prosecution.

[84] It has been suggested that the judge should also, under this line of inquiry, consider the seriousness of the offence at issue. Indeed, Deschamps J. views this factor as very important, arguing that the more serious the offence, the greater society’s interest in its prosecution (para. 226). In our view, while the seriousness of the alleged offence may be a valid consideration, it has the potential to cut both ways. Failure to effectively prosecute a serious charge due to excluded evidence may have an immediate impact on how people view the justice system. Yet, as discussed, it is the long-term reputation of the justice system that is s. 24(2)’s focus. As pointed out in Burlingham, the goals furthered by s. 24(2) “operate independently of the type of crime for which the individual stands accused” (para. 51). And as Lamer J. observed in Collins, “[t]he Charter is designed to protect the accused from the majority, so the enforcement of the Charter must not be left to that majority” (p. 282). The short-term public clamour for a conviction in a particular case must not deafen the s. 24(2) judge to the longer-term reputé of the administration of justice. Moreover, while the public has a heightened interest in seeing a determination on the merits where the offence charged is serious, it also has a vital interest in having a justice system that is above reproach, particularly where the penal stakes for the accused are high.

[85] To review, the three lines of inquiry identified above — the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct, the impact of the breach on the Charter-protected interests of the accused, and the societal interest in an adjudication on the merits — reflect what the s. 24(2) judge must consider in assessing the effect of admission of the evidence on the reputé of the administration of justice. Having made these inquiries, which encapsulate consideration of “all the circumstances” of the case, the judge must then determine whether, on balance, the admission of the evidence obtained by Charter breach would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[86] In all cases, it is the task of the trial judge to weigh the various indications. No overarching rule governs how the balance is to be struck. Mathematical precision is obviously not possible. However, the preceding analysis creates a decision tree, albeit more flexible than the Stillman self-incrimination test. We believe this to be required by the words of s. 24(2). We also take comfort in the fact that patterns emerge with respect to particular types of evidence. These patterns serve as guides to judges faced with s. 24(2) applications in future cases. In this way, a measure of certainty is achieved. Where the trial judge has considered the proper factors, appellate courts should accord considerable deference to his or her ultimate determination.

3. Application to Different Kinds of Evidence

[87] We have seen that a trial judge on a s. 24(2) application for exclusion of evidence obtained in breach of the Charter must consider whether admission would bring the administration of justice into disrepute, having regard to the results of the three lines of inquiry identified above.

[88] We now turn to some of the types of evidence the cases have considered.

(a) Statements by the Accused

[89] Statements by the accused engage the principle against self-incrimination, “one of the cornerstones of our criminal law”: R. v. Henry, 2005 SCC 76, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 609, at para. 2. This Court in White, at para. 44, per Iacobucci J., described the principle against self-incrimination as “an overarching principle within our criminal justice system, from which a number of specific common law and Charter rules emanate, such as the confessions rule, and the right to silence”. The principle also informs “more specific procedural protections such as, for example, the right to counsel in s. 10(b), the right to non-compellability in s. 11(c), and the right to use immunity set out in s. 13”. Residual protection for the principle against self-incrimination is derived from s. 7.

[90] This case concerns s. 24(2). However, it is important to note at the outset that the common law confessions rule, quite apart from s. 24(2), provides a significant safeguard against the improper use of a statement against its maker. Where a statement is made to a recognized person in authority, regardless of whether its maker is detained at the time, it is inadmissible unless the Crown can establish beyond a reasonable doubt that it was made voluntarily. Only if such a statement survives scrutiny under the confessions rule and is found to be voluntary, does the s. 24(2) remedy of exclusion arise. Most commonly, this will occur because of added protections under s. 10(b) of the Charter.

[91] There is no absolute rule of exclusion of Charter-infringing statements under s. 24(2), as there is for involuntary confessions at common law. However, as a matter of practice, courts have tended to exclude statements obtained in breach of the Charter, on the ground that admission on balance would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[92] The three lines of inquiry described above support the presumptive general, although not automatic, exclusion of statements obtained in breach of the Charter.

[93] The first inquiry focusses on whether admission of the evidence would harm the reputation of justice by associating the courts with illegal police conduct. Police conduct in obtaining statements has long been strongly constrained. The preservation of public confidence in the justice system requires that the police adhere to the Charter in obtaining statements from a detained accused.

[94] The negative impact on the justice system of admitting evidence obtained through police misconduct varies with the seriousness of the violation. The impression that courts condone serious police misconduct is more harmful to the reputation of the justice system than the acceptance of minor or inadvertent slips.

[95] The second inquiry considers the extent to which the breach actually undermined the interests protected by the right infringed. Again, the potential to harm the reputation of the justice system varies with the seriousness of the impingement on the individual's protected interests. As noted, the right violated by unlawfully obtained statements is often the right to counsel under s. 10(b). The failure to advise of the right to counsel undermines the detainee's right to make a meaningful and informed choice whether to speak, the related right to silence, and, most fundamentally, the protection against testimonial self-incrimination. These rights protect the individual's interest in liberty and autonomy. Violation of these fundamental rights tends to militate in favour of excluding the statement.

[96] This said, particular circumstances may attenuate the impact of a Charter breach on the protected interests of the accused from whom a statement is obtained in breach of the Charter. For instance, if an individual is clearly informed of his or her choice to speak to the police, but compliance with s. 10(b) was technically defective at either the informational or implementational stage, the impact on the liberty and autonomy interests of the accused in making an informed choice may be reduced. Likewise, when a statement is made spontaneously following a Charter breach, or in the exceptional circumstances where it can confidently be said that the statement in question would have been made notwithstanding the Charter breach (see R. v. Harper, 1994 CanLII 68 (SCC), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 343), the impact of the breach on the accused's protected interest in informed choice may be less. Absent such circumstances, the analysis under this line of inquiry supports the general exclusion of statements taken in breach of the Charter.

[97] The third inquiry focusses on the public interest in having the case tried fairly on its merits. This may lead to consideration of the reliability of the evidence. Just as involuntary confessions are suspect on grounds of reliability, so may, on occasion, be statements taken in contravention of the Charter. Detained by the police and without a lawyer, a suspect may make statements that are based more on a misconceived idea of how to get out of his or her predicament than on the truth. This danger, where present, undercuts the argument that the illegally obtained statement is necessary for a trial of the merits.

[98] In summary, the heightened concern with proper police conduct in obtaining statements from suspects and the centrality of the protected interests affected will in most cases favour exclusion of statements taken in breach of the Charter, while the third factor, obtaining a decision on the merits, may be attenuated by lack of reliability. This, together with the common law's historic tendency to treat statements of the accused differently from other evidence, explains why such statements tend to be excluded under s. 24(2).

(b) Bodily Evidence

[99] Bodily evidence is evidence taken from the body of the accused, such as DNA evidence and breath samples. Section 8 of the Charter protects against unreasonable search and seizure, and hence precludes the state from obtaining such evidence in a manner that is unreasonable.

[100] The majority in Stillman, applying a capacious definition of conscription, held that bodily evidence is “conscriptive” and that its admission would affect trial fairness. This resulted in a near-automatic exclusionary rule for bodily evidence obtained contrary to the Charter.

[101] Stillman has been criticized for casting the flexible in “all the circumstances” test prescribed by s. 24(2) into a straitjacket that determines admissibility solely on the basis of the evidence’s conscriptive character rather than all the circumstances; for inappropriately erasing distinctions between testimonial and real evidence; and for producing anomalous results in some situations: see, e.g., Burlingham, per L’Heureux-Dubé J.; R. v. Schedel (2003), 2003 BCCA 364 \(CanLII\), 175 C.C.C. (3d) 193 (B.C.C.A.), at paras. 67-72, per Esson J.A.; D. M. Paciocco, “Stillman, Disproportion and the Fair Trial Dichotomy under Section 24(2)” (1997), 2 Can. Crim. L.R. 163; R. Mahoney, “Problems with the Current Approach to s. 24\(2\) of the Charter: An Inevitable Discovery” (1999), 42 Crim. L.Q. 443; S. Penney, “Taking Deterrence Seriously: Excluding Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence Under Section 24(2) of the Charter” (2004), 49 McGill L.J. 105; D. Stuart, Charter Justice in Canadian Criminal Law (4th ed. 2005), at p. 581. We will briefly review each of these criticisms.

[102] The first criticism is that the Stillman approach transforms the flexible “all the circumstances” test mandated by s. 24(2) into a categorical conscriptive evidence test. Section 24(2) mandates a broad contextual approach rather than an automatic exclusionary rule: D. M. Paciocco, “The Judicial Repeal of s. 24(2) and the Development of the Canadian Exclusionary Rule” (1989-90), 32 Crim. L.Q. 326; A. A. McLellan and B. P. Elman, “The Enforcement of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms: An Analysis of Section 24” (1983), 21 Alta. L. Rev. 205, at pp. 205-8; Orbanski, at para. 93. As stated in Orbanski, per LeBel J., the inquiry under s. 24(2) “amounts to finding a proper balance between competing interests and values at stake in the criminal trial, between the search for truth and the integrity of the trial All the Collins factors remain relevant throughout this delicate and nuanced inquiry” (para. 94).

[103] A flexible, multi-factored approach to the admissibility of the evidence is required, not only by the wording of s. 24(2) but by the wide variation between different kinds of bodily evidence. The seriousness of the police conduct and the impact on the accused’s rights of taking the bodily evidence, may vary greatly. Plucking a hair from the suspect’s head may not be intrusive, and the accused’s privacy interest in the evidence may be relatively slight. On the other hand, a body cavity or strip search may be intrusive, demeaning and objectionable. A one-size-fits-all conscription test is incapable of dealing with such differences in a way that addresses the point of the s. 24(2) inquiry — to determine if the admission of the evidence will bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[104] Recent decisions suggest a growing consensus that the admissibility of bodily samples should not depend solely on whether the evidence is conscriptive: R. v. Richfield (2003), 2003 CanLII 52164 \(ON CA\), 178 C.C.C. (3d) 23 (Ont. C.A.), per Weiler J.A.; R. v. Dolynchuk (2004), 2004 MBCA 45 \(CanLII\), 184 C.C.C. (3d) 214 (Man. C.A.), per Steel J.A.; R. v. Banman, 2008

MBCA 103, 236 C.C.C. (3d) 547, per MacInnes J.A. This Court in R. v. S.A.B., 2003 SCC 60, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 678, dealing with the constitutionality of DNA warrant provisions in the Criminal Code, acknowledged that the Charter concerns raised by the gathering of non-testimonial evidence are better addressed by reference to the interests of privacy, bodily integrity and human dignity, than by a blanket rule that by analogy to compelled statements, such evidence is always inadmissible. See also: L. Stuesser, “R. v. S.A.B.: Putting ‘Self-Incrimination’ in Context” (2004), 42 Alta. L. Rev. 543.

[105] The second and related objection to a simple conscription test for the admissibility of bodily evidence under s. 24(2) is that it wrongly equates bodily evidence with statements taken from the accused. In most situations, statements and bodily samples raise very different considerations from the point of view of the administration of justice. Equating them under the umbrella of conscription risks erasing relevant distinctions and compromising the ultimate analysis of systemic disrepute. As Professor Paciocco has observed, “in equating intimate bodily substances with testimony we are not so much reacting to the compelled participation of the accused as we are to the violation of the privacy and dignity of the person that obtaining such evidence involves” (“Stillman, Disproportion and the Fair Trial Dichotomy under Section 24(2)”, at p. 170). Nor does the taking of a bodily sample trench on the accused’s autonomy in the same way as may the unlawful taking of a statement. The pre-trial right to silence under s. 7, the right against testimonial self-incrimination in s. 11(c), and the right against subsequent use of self-incriminating evidence in s. 13 have informed the treatment of statements under s. 24(2). These concepts do not apply coherently to bodily samples, which are not communicative in nature, weakening self-incrimination as the sole criterion for determining their admissibility.

[106] A third criticism of the conscription test for admissibility of bodily evidence under s. 24(2) is that from a practical perspective, the conscriptive test has sometimes produced anomalous results, leading to exclusion of evidence that should, in principle and policy, be admitted: see

Dolynchuk; R. v. Shepherd, 2007 SKCA 29, 218 C.C.C. (3d) 113 (per Smith J.A. dissenting), aff'd 2009 SCC 35, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 527 (released concurrently); and R. v. Padavattan (2007), 2007 CanLII 18137 (ON SC), 223 C.C.C. (3d) 221 (Ont. S.C.J.), per Ducharme J. Notably, breath sample evidence tendered on impaired driving charges has often suffered the fate of automatic exclusion even where the breach in question was minor and would not realistically bring the administration of justice into disrepute. More serious breaches in other kinds of cases — for instance, those involving seizures of illegal drugs in breach of s. 8 — have resulted in admission on the grounds that the evidence in question was non-conscriptive. This apparent incongruity has justifiably raised concern.

[107] We conclude that the approach to admissibility of bodily evidence under s. 24(2) that asks simply whether the evidence was conscripted should be replaced by a flexible test based on all the circumstances, as the wording of s. 24(2) requires. As for other types of evidence, admissibility should be determined by inquiring into the effect admission may have on the reputation of the justice system, having regard to the seriousness of the police conduct, the impact of the Charter breach on the protected interests of the accused, and the value of a trial on the merits.

[108] The first inquiry informing the s. 24(2) analysis — the seriousness of the Charter-infringing conduct — is fact-specific. Admission of evidence obtained by deliberate and egregious police conduct that disregards the rights of the accused may lead the public to conclude that the court implicitly condones such conduct, undermining respect for the administration of justice. On the other hand, where the breach was committed in good faith, admission of the evidence may have little adverse effect on the reputation of the court process.

[109] The second inquiry assesses the danger that admitting the evidence may suggest that Charter rights do not count, thereby negatively impacting on the reputation of the system of justice.

This requires the judge to look at the seriousness of the breach on the accused's protected interests. In the context of bodily evidence obtained in violation of s. 8, this inquiry requires the court to examine the degree to which the search and seizure intruded upon the privacy, bodily integrity and human dignity of the accused. The seriousness of the intrusion on the accused may vary greatly. At one end of the spectrum, one finds the forcible taking of blood samples or dental impressions (as in Stillman). At the other end of the spectrum lie relatively innocuous procedures such as fingerprinting or iris-recognition technology. The greater the intrusion on these interests, the more important it is that a court exclude the evidence in order to substantiate the Charter rights of the accused.

[110] The third line of inquiry — the effect of admitting the evidence on the public interest in having a case adjudicated on its merits — will usually favour admission in cases involving bodily samples. Unlike compelled statements, evidence obtained from the accused's body is generally reliable, and the risk of error inherent in depriving the trier of fact of the evidence may well tip the balance in favour of admission.

[111] While each case must be considered on its own facts, it may be ventured in general that where an intrusion on bodily integrity is deliberately inflicted and the impact on the accused's privacy, bodily integrity and dignity is high, bodily evidence will be excluded, notwithstanding its relevance and reliability. On the other hand, where the violation is less egregious and the intrusion is less severe in terms of privacy, bodily integrity and dignity, reliable evidence obtained from the accused's body may be admitted. For example, this will often be the case with breath sample evidence, whose method of collection is relatively non-intrusive.

(c) Non-Bodily Physical Evidence

[112] The three inquiries under s. 24(2) will proceed largely as explained above. Again, under the first inquiry, the seriousness of the Charter-infringing conduct will be a fact-specific determination. The degree to which this inquiry militates in favour of excluding the bodily evidence will depend on the extent to which the conduct can be characterized as deliberate or egregious.

[113] With respect to the second inquiry, the Charter breach most often associated with non-bodily physical evidence is the s. 8 protection against unreasonable search and seizure: see, e.g., Buhay. Privacy is the principal interest involved in such cases. The jurisprudence offers guidance in evaluating the extent to which the accused's reasonable expectation of privacy was infringed. For example, a dwelling house attracts a higher expectation of privacy than a place of business or an automobile. An illegal search of a house will therefore be seen as more serious at this stage of the analysis.

[114] Other interests, such as human dignity, may also be affected by search and seizure of such evidence. The question is how seriously the Charter breach impacted on these interests. For instance, an unjustified strip search or body cavity search is demeaning to the suspect's human dignity and will be viewed as extremely serious on that account: R. v. Simmons, 1988 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 495, at pp. 516-17, per Dickson C.J.; R. v. Golden, 2001 SCC 83, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 679. The fact that the evidence thereby obtained is not itself a bodily sample cannot be seen to diminish the seriousness of the intrusion.

[115] The third inquiry, whether the admission of the evidence would serve society's interest in having a case adjudicated on its merits, like the others, engages the facts of the particular case. Reliability issues with physical evidence will not generally be related to the Charter breach. Therefore, this consideration tends to weigh in favour of admission.

(d) Derivative Evidence

[116] The class of evidence that presents the greatest difficulty is evidence that combines aspects of both statements and physical evidence — physical evidence discovered as a result of an unlawfully obtained statement. The cases refer to this evidence as derivative evidence. This is the type of evidence at issue in this case.

[117] We earlier saw that at common law, involuntary confessions are inadmissible. The common law's automatic exclusion of involuntary statements is based on a sense that it is unfair to conscript a person against himself or herself and, most importantly, on a concern about the unreliability of compelled statements. However, the common law drew the line of automatic inadmissibility at the statements themselves and not the physical or "real" evidence found as a result of information garnered from such statements. Because reliability was traditionally the dominant focus of the confessions rule, the public interest in getting at the truth through reliable evidence was seen to outweigh concerns related to self-incrimination: Wray and R. v. St. Lawrence, 1949 CanLII 100 (ON SC), [1949] O.R. 215 (H.C.J.).

[118] Section 24(2) of the Charter implicitly overruled the common law practice of always admitting reliable derivative evidence. Instead, the judge is required to consider whether admission of derivative evidence obtained through a Charter breach would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[119] The s. 24(2) jurisprudence on derivative physical evidence has thus far been dominated by two related concepts — conscription and discoverability. Physical evidence that would not have been discovered but for an inadmissible statement has been considered conscriptive and hence is inadmissible: R. v. Feeney, 1997 CanLII 342 (SCC), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 13, and Burlingham. The doctrine of “discoverability” has been developed in order to distinguish those cases in which the accused’s conscription was necessary to the collection of the evidence, from those cases where the evidence would have been obtained in any event. In the former cases, exclusion was the rule, while in the latter, admission was more likely.

[120] The conscription-discoverability doctrine has been justifiably criticized as overly speculative and capable of producing anomalous results: D. Stuart, “Questioning the Discoverability Doctrine in Section 24(2) Rulings” (1996), 48 C.R. (4th) 351; Hogg, at section 41.8(d). In practice, it has proved difficult to apply because of its hypothetical nature and because of the fine-grained distinctions between the tests for determining whether evidence is “derivative” and whether it is “discoverable”: see Feeney, at paras. 69-71.

[121] The existing rules on derivative evidence and discoverability were developed under the Collins trial fairness rationale. They gave effect to the insight that if evidence would have been discovered in any event, the accused’s conscription did not truly cause the evidence to become available. The discoverability doctrine acquired even greater importance under Stillman where the category of conscriptive evidence was considerably enlarged. Since we have concluded that this underlying rationale should no longer hold and that “trial fairness” in the Collins/Stillman sense is no longer a determinative criterion for the s. 24(2) inquiry, discoverability should likewise not be determinative of admissibility.

[122] Discoverability retains a useful role, however, in assessing the actual impact of the breach on the protected interests of the accused. It allows the court to assess the strength of the causal connection between the Charter-infringing self-incrimination and the resultant evidence.

The more likely it is that the evidence would have been obtained even without the statement, the lesser the impact of the breach on the accused's underlying interest against self-incrimination. The converse, of course, is also true. On the other hand, in cases where it cannot be determined with any confidence whether evidence would have been discovered in absence of the statement, discoverability will have no impact on the s. 24(2) inquiry.

[123] To determine whether the admission of derivative evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute under s. 24(2), courts must pursue the usual three lines of inquiry outlined in these reasons, taking into account the self-incriminatory origin of the evidence in an improperly obtained statement as well as its status as real evidence.

[124] The first inquiry concerns the police conduct in obtaining the statement that led to the real evidence. Once again, the extent to which this inquiry favours exclusion will depend on the factual circumstances of the breach: the more serious the state conduct, the more the admission of the evidence derived from it tends to undermine public confidence in the rule of law. Were the police deliberately and systematically flouting the accused's Charter rights? Or were the officers acting in good faith, pursuant to what they thought were legitimate policing policies?

[125] The second inquiry focusses on the impact of the breach on the Charter-protected interests of the accused. Where a statement is unconstitutionally obtained, in many cases the Charter right breached is the s. 10(b) right to counsel, which protects the accused's interest in making an informed choice whether or not to speak to authorities. The relevant consideration at this stage will be the extent to which the Charter breach impinged upon that interest in a free and informed choice. Where that interest was significantly compromised by the breach, this factor will strongly favour exclusion. In determining the impact of the breach, the discoverability of the derivative evidence may also be important as a factor strengthening or attenuating the selfincriminatory character of the evidence. If the derivative evidence was independently discoverable, the impact of the breach on the accused is lessened and admission is more likely.

[126] The third inquiry in determining whether admission of the derivative evidence would bring the administration into disrepute relates to society's interest in having the case adjudicated on its merits. Since evidence in this category is real or physical, there is usually less concern as to the reliability of the evidence. Thus, the public interest in having a trial adjudicated on its merits will usually favour admission of the derivative evidence.

[127] The weighing process and balancing of these concerns is one for the trial judge in each case. Provided the judge has considered the correct factors, considerable deference should be accorded to his or her decision. As a general rule, however, it can be ventured that where reliable evidence is discovered as a result of a good faith infringement that did not greatly undermine the accused's protected interests, the trial judge may conclude that it should be admitted under s. 24(2). On the other hand, deliberate and egregious police conduct that severely impacted the accused's protected interests may result in exclusion, notwithstanding that the evidence may be reliable.

[128] The s. 24(2) judge must remain sensitive to the concern that a more flexible rule may encourage police to improperly obtain statements that they know will be inadmissible, in order to find derivative evidence which they believe may be admissible. The judge should refuse to admit evidence where there is reason to believe the police deliberately abused their power to obtain a statement which might lead them to such evidence. Where derivative evidence is obtained by way of a deliberate or flagrant Charter breach, its admission would bring the administration of justice into further disrepute and the evidence should be excluded.

4. Application to This Case

[129] The issue is whether the gun produced by Mr. Grant after Toronto police stopped and questioned him should be excluded from the evidence at his trial. The trial judge held that had a Charter breach been established, he would not have excluded the evidence. While the trial judge's s. 24(2) conclusion may not command deference where an appellate court reaches a different conclusion on the breach itself (see R. v. Grant, 1993 CanLII 68 (SCC), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 223, at pp. 256-57, per Sopinka J.; R. v. Harris, 2007 ONCA 574, 225 C.C.C. (3d) 193, at p. 212), the trial judge's underlying factual findings must be respected, absent palpable and overriding error.

[130] Here, the admissibility of Mr. Grant's incriminatory statements is not in issue, the statements having no independent evidentiary value. The only issue is the admission or exclusion of the gun. This falls to be determined in accordance with the inquiries described earlier.

[131] At the outset, it is necessary to consider whether the gun was "obtained in a manner" that violated Mr. Grant's Charter rights: see R. v. Strachan, 1988 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 980, and R. v. Goldhart, 1996 CanLII 214 (SCC), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 463. As explained above, we have concluded that Mr. Grant's rights under ss. 9 and 10(b) of the Charter were breached. The discovery of the gun was both temporally and causally connected to these infringements. It follows that the gun was obtained as a result of a Charter breach.

[132] Because the gun was discovered as a result of statements taken in breach of the Charter, it is derivative evidence. The question, as always, is whether its admission would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. To answer this question, it is necessary to consider the concerns that underlie the s. 24(2) analysis, as discussed above, in "all the circumstances" of the case, including the arbitrary detention and the breach of the right to counsel.

[133] We consider first the seriousness of the improper police conduct that led to the discovery of the gun. The police conduct here, while not in conformity with the Charter, was not abusive. There was no suggestion that Mr. Grant was the target of racial profiling or other discriminatory police practices. The officers went too far in detaining the accused and asking him questions. However, the point at which an encounter becomes a detention is not always clear, and is something with which courts have struggled. Though we have concluded that the police were in error in detaining the appellant when they did, the mistake is an understandable one. Having been under a mistaken view that they had not detained the appellant, the officers' failure to advise him of his right to counsel was similarly erroneous but understandable. It therefore cannot be characterized as having been in bad faith. Given that the police conduct in committing the Charter breach was neither deliberate nor egregious, we conclude that the effect of admitting the evidence would not greatly undermine public confidence in the rule of law. We add that the Court's decision in this case will be to render similar conduct less justifiable going forward. While police are not expected to engage in judicial reflection on conflicting precedents, they are rightly expected to know what the law is.

[134] The second inquiry under the s. 24(2) analysis focusses on whether the admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute from the perspective of society's interest in respect for Charter rights. This inquiry focusses on the impact of the breach on the accused's protected interests. Because the two infringed Charter rights protect different interests, it is necessary to consider them separately at this stage.

[135] The initial Charter violation was arbitrary detention under s. 9 of the Charter, curtailing Mr. Grant's liberty interest. This interaction, beginning as a casual conversation, quickly developed into a subtly coercive situation that deprived Mr. Grant of his freedom to make an informed choice as to how to respond. This is so, notwithstanding the fact that the detention did not involve any physical coercion and was not carried out in an abusive manner. We therefore conclude that the impact of this breach, while not severe, was more than minimal.

[136] The second Charter violation was breach of Mr. Grant's s. 10(b) right to counsel. Cst. Gomes, by his own admission, was probing for answers that would give him grounds for search or arrest. Far from being spontaneous utterances, the appellant's incriminating statements were prompted directly by Cst. Gomes' pointed questioning. The appellant, in need of legal advice, was not told he could consult counsel.

[137] As discussed, discoverability remains a factor in assessing the impact of Charter breaches on Charter rights. The investigating officers testified that they would not have searched or arrested Mr. Grant but for his self-incriminatory statements. Nor would they have had any legal grounds to do so. Accordingly, the fact that the evidence was non-discoverable aggravates the impact of the breach on Mr. Grant's interest in being able to make an informed choice to talk to the police. He was in "immediate need of legal advice" (Brydges, at p. 206) and had no opportunity to seek it.

[138] Considering all these matters, we conclude that the impact of the infringement of Mr. Grant's rights under ss. 9 and 10(b) of the Charter was significant.

[139] The third and final concern is the effect of admitting the gun on the public interest in having a case adjudicated on its merits. The gun is highly reliable evidence. It is essential to a determination on the merits. The Crown also argues that the seriousness of the offence weighs in favour of admitting the evidence of the gun, so that the matter may be decided on its merits, asserting that gun crime is a societal scourge, that offences of this nature raise major public safety concerns and that the gun is the main evidence in the case. On the other hand, Mr. Grant argues that the seriousness of the offence makes it all the more important that his rights be respected. In the result, we do not find this factor to be of much assistance.

[140] To sum up, the police conduct was not egregious. The impact of the Charter breach on the accused's protected interests was significant, although not at the most serious end of the scale. Finally, the value of the evidence is considerable. These effects must be balanced in determining whether admitting the gun would put the administration of justice into disrepute. We agree with Laskin J.A. that this is a close case. The balancing mandated by s. 24(2) is qualitative in nature and therefore not capable of mathematical precision. However, weighing all these concerns, in our opinion the courts below did not err in concluding that the admission of the gun into evidence would not, on balance, bring the administration of justice into disrepute. The significant impact of the breach on Mr. Grant's Charter-protected rights weighs strongly in favour of excluding the gun, while the public interest in the adjudication of the case on its merits weighs strongly in favour of its admission. Unlike the situation in R. v. Harrison, 2009 SCC 34, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 494, the police officers here were operating in circumstances of considerable legal uncertainty. In our view, this tips the balance in favour of admission, suggesting that the reputation of the justice system would not suffer from allowing the gun to be admitted in evidence against the appellant.

C. The Meaning of "Transfer" in Sections 84, 99 and 100 of the Criminal Code

[141] Mr. Grant argues that his conviction of possession of a firearm for the purposes of weapons trafficking under s. 100(1) of the Criminal Code should be quashed on the grounds that he did not "transfer" the firearm within the meaning of that section. Section 100(1) states:

100. (1) Every person commits an offence who possesses a firearm, a prohibited weapon, a restricted weapon, a prohibited device, any ammunition or any prohibited ammunition for the purpose of

- (a) transferring it, whether or not for consideration, or
- (b) offering to transfer it, knowing that the person is not authorized to transfer it under the Firearms Act or any other Act of Parliament or any regulations made under any Act of Parliament.

[142] In the Court of Appeal, Laskin J.A. noted that “[t]he word ‘transfer’ is defined in s. 84 to mean ‘sell, provide, barter, give, lend, rent, send, transport, ship, distribute or deliver’” (para. 72 (italics in original, underlining added)). He observed that the dictionary definition of “transport” is to “carry, convey or remove from one place or person to another” (para. 72 (emphasis in original)). He also noted that ss. 84 and 100 of the Code were enacted with reference to the Firearms Act, S.C. 1995, c. 39, and he considered this wider context. Laskin J.A. was not persuaded that there was any reason to depart from the plain meaning of the word. On this definition, Mr. Grant’s admission that he was “dropping off” the gun somewhere “up the road” entailed moving the gun from one place to another and was therefore sufficient to establish all elements of the offence defined by s. 100(1).

[143] Mr. Grant submits that a contextual reading of s. 100 and the related provisions reveals that Parliament intended to reserve the stiffest penalties for transfers that amount to weapons trafficking, not the mere movement of a firearm from place to place. Since the trial judge did not find that he was in possession of the gun for the purpose of transferring it to another person, Mr. Grant argues that the s. 100(1) conviction cannot stand.

[144] We agree with Mr. Grant that Parliament did not intend s. 100(1) to address the simple movement of a firearm from one place to another. First, according to the “associated meaning” principle of statutory interpretation, “when two or more words linked by ‘and’ or ‘or’ serve an analogous grammatical and logical function within a provision, they should be interpreted with a view to their common features”: McDiarmid Lumber Ltd. v. God’s Lake First Nation, 2006 SCC 58, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 846, at para. 30, per McLachlin C.J. See also R. Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (5th ed. 2008), at pp. 227-31. Once again, the definition of “transfer” is given in s. 84 as “sell, provide, barter, give, lend, rent, send, transport, ship, distribute or deliver”. Of these words, only “transport” can plausibly be said to include moving a thing from place to place without the thing actually changing hands. The common element is the notion of a transaction. This suggests a more restrictive meaning than indicated by the dictionary definition of “transport”.

[145] It should also be noted that s. 100(1)(a) applies to the transfer of a firearm, “whether or not for consideration”. Even if “transfer” is equated with “transport”, the underlined words suggest that the import of the provision is to criminalize the transfer of firearms for purposes that implicate others. In other words, the inclusion of the phrase “whether or not for consideration” in s. 100(1)(a) suggests that Parliament did not intend to criminalize simple movement of firearms by this provision, but rather transport for purposes that implicate another person. Further, the criminalization of an “offer” to transfer a firearm under s. 100(1)(b) suggests that a “transfer” is transactional in nature.

[146] We do not accept, as did Laskin J.A., the proposition that the more restrictive reading of s. 100(1) would “destroy the cohesion between the Criminal Code provisions on firearms and the Firearms Act” (para. 77). While it is undoubtedly true that Parliament intended to place tight restrictions on the movement of firearms, there are other provisions in both regimes that deal specifically with “transfers” that fall short of trafficking. Moving a firearm in an unauthorized manner could result in prosecution under s. 86(2) of the Criminal Code, which penalizes the transportation of a firearm in contravention of the regulations made pursuant to the Firearms Act. Moreover, the Firearms Act defines “transfer” differently from the Criminal Code, so their cohesion should not be overstated: see s. 21 of the Act.

[147] Finally, s. 100(1) appears in the Code under the heading “Trafficking Offences”. As the Court held in R. v. Davis, 1999 CanLII 638 \(SCC\), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 759, at para. 53, per Lamer C.J., headings “should be considered part of the legislation and should be read and relied on like any other contextual feature” (quoting R. Sullivan, Driedger on the Construction of Statutes (3rd ed. 1994), at p. 269). Firearms trafficking offences are extremely serious, carrying substantial penalties. Indeed, since amendments to the Code in 2008, a conviction under s. 100(1) now carries a mandatory minimum penitentiary sentence of three years for a first-time offender, up from one year when Mr. Grant was convicted. It should not be lightly assumed that Parliament intended to deem anyone moving a firearm from place to place without authorization to be a weapons trafficker, liable to at least three years’ imprisonment on a first offence. In our view, a contextual reading of the applicable provisions suggests the contrary. Mr. Grant’s offence was serious and potentially extremely dangerous, but on the evidence he did not commit the crime of trafficking.

[148] We would therefore allow the appeal on Count 4.

V. Conclusion

[149] We would allow the appeal on Count 4 (the trafficking charge) and enter an acquittal. On all other counts, we would dismiss the appeal.

The following are the reasons delivered by

[150] BINNIE J. — I concur with the disposition of the appeal proposed by my colleagues the Chief Justice and Charron J. and with their modified framework for determinations under s. 24\(2\) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms regarding the admission or rejection of evidence obtained in a manner that violates the Charter. I differ, with respect, on their approach to the definition of “detention” in ss. 9 and 10 of the Charter. In particular, I believe their approach lays too much emphasis on the claimant’s perception of psychological pressure, albeit as filtered through the eyes of the hypothetical reasonable person in the claimant’s situation. My colleagues summarize their position on this point as follows:

1. Detention under ss. 9 and 10 of the Charter refers to a suspension of the individual’s liberty interest by a significant physical or psychological restraint. Psychological detention is established either where the individual has a legal obligation to comply with the restrictive request or demand, or a reasonable person would conclude by reason of the state conduct that he or she had no choice but to comply. [Emphasis added; para. 44.]

My colleagues then set out a number of factors to help “determine whether the reasonable person in the individual’s circumstances would conclude that he or she had been deprived by the state of the liberty of choice” (ibid.).

[151] The Court’s continued embrace of a wholly claimant-centred approach may lead to the impression that it is more important to enquire whether the hypothetical reasonable person “in the individual’s circumstances” would think himself or herself to be detained than whether he or she is detained. The perspective of the person stopped (or a “reasonable person” caught in that particular situation) is important because it is that person’s liberty that is at issue, but, in my view, the claimant’s perspective does not exhaust the relevant considerations. I agree there can be no detention unless the liberty of the person stopped is (or is reasonably perceived by that person to be) significantly constrained, but there may be much happening of which the person stopped is unaware, and this other context ought potentially to affect the legal characterization of the encounter. I agree with Professor Stuart when he writes that the focus should not be exclusively on the state of mind of the accused. As Courts of Appeal have persuasively suggested, detention should also take into account the perceptions of the police. . . . [Otherwise] [t]hose perhaps most in need of Charter protection against coercive police practices will have none. On the other hand, it would be unfortunate if preliminary police questioning of any suspect would have to be peppered with Charter warnings.

(D. Stuart, Charter Justice in Canadian Criminal Law (4th ed. 2005), at p. 327)

My colleagues do take into account some police-related factors (e.g., whether the individual is singled out for “focussed investigation” (para. 44(2)(a)) but, as will be seen, they do so only to the extent this information is made evident to the person stopped.

[152] Also important, in my view, is an objective assessment of the facts of the encounter divorced from the perception of both parties, neither of whom may have a very clear idea of what is going on in the rush of events.

A. When Does a “Stop” Become a Detention?

[153] While the uniformed police embody society’s collective desire for public order and livable and safe communities, they also present a serious and continuing risk to the individual’s right to be left alone by the state in the absence of objective justification for the state’s intervention. Interactions between the police and members of the public are not only rich in diversity but exceedingly common. Quite apart from police assistance offered to the general public, a traditional part of the daily routine of the “cop on the beat” is to check out “suspicious persons”. Clear guidance on the rules governing such encounters is, or ought to be, an important part of police training: C. D. Shearing and P. C. Stenning, Police Training in Ontario: An Evaluation of Recruit and Supervisory Courses (1980), at p. 41. This case is about a pedestrian. No one doubts the importance of being able to determine at what moment an interaction between the police and a pedestrian is converted into a detention of that individual, thereby triggering the rights subsidiary to detention, including the right to involve his or her lawyer who can generally be expected to advise his or her client not to say anything further. In the first instance it is the police who must decide if a detention exists because they are the people who administer the caution and inform the person detained about the right to counsel. Their intentions and perceptions will inevitably be factored into their determinations whether disclosed to the claimant or not, and should be taken into account in the legal test for detention when the matter eventually comes before a judge.

[154] A growing body of evidence and opinion suggests that visible minorities and marginalized individuals are at particular risk from unjustified “low visibility” police interventions in their lives: R. v. Golden, 2001 SCC 83, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 679, at para. 83. See also A. Young, “All Along the Watchtower: Arbitrary Detention and the Police Function” (1991), 29 Osgoode Hall L.J. 329, at p. 390; D. M. Tanovich, “Using the Charter to Stop Racial Profiling: The Development of an Equality-Based Conception of Arbitrary Detention” (2002), 40 Osgoode Hall L.J. 145; Ontario Human Rights Commission, Inquiry Report. Paying the Price: The Human Cost of Racial Profiling (2003); Report of the Commission on Systemic Racism in the Ontario Criminal Justice System (1995), at p. 337. The appellant, Mr. Grant, is black. Courts cannot presume to be colour-blind in these situations.

[155] At the same time, members of visible minorities may, as much as anyone else, be approached and asked questions by police. While, even more so than others, they may feel unable to choose to walk away, the perspective of the police and the information (if any) the police possess when they initiate an encounter would help assess whether the liberty interest of the person stopped is truly at issue, even if the police perspective on the encounter is not made known by words or conduct to the person stopped.

B. A Brief History of the “Reasonable Perception” Test

[156] Our approach to detention, as with so much of this area of the law, draws heavily on the U.S. Fourth Amendment jurisprudence. Both societies, Canada and the United States, place a high value on the right of citizens to go about their business without being arbitrarily stopped by the police and told to give an account of activities that they consider to be none of the police's affair. We therefore want a definition of detention that protects our liberty. Accordingly, in R. v. Therens, 1985 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 613, Le Dain J. held, and subsequent cases have agreed, that a person is detained where he or she "submits or acquiesces in the deprivation of liberty and reasonably believes that the choice to do otherwise does not exist" (p. 644). This approach corresponded to earlier decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court establishing that "a person has been 'seized' [i.e. detained] within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment only if, in view of all the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave": United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544 (1980), at p. 554, endorsed in Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491 (1983), and subsequent cases.

[157] Stewart J. in Mendenhall stated quite categorically that the "subjective intention" of the state authority (a drugs enforcement officer) "to detain the respondent, had she attempted to leave, is irrelevant except insofar as that may have been conveyed to the respondent" (p. 554, fn. 6 (emphasis added)). The approach of excluding from consideration information not reasonably evident to the person stopped is endorsed by my colleagues at numerous points in their judgment, for example:

The question is whether the police conduct would cause a reasonable person to conclude that he or she was not free to go and had to comply with the police direction or demand. [para. 31]

...

Accordingly, we must consider all relevant circumstances to determine if a reasonable person in Mr. Grant's position would have concluded that his or her right to choose how to interact with the police (i.e. whether to leave or comply) had been removed. [para. 46]

...

In our view, the evidence supports Mr. Grant's contention that a reasonable person in his position (18 years old, alone, faced by three physically larger policemen in adversarial positions) would conclude that his or her right to choose how to act had been removed by the police, given their conduct. [para. 50]

[158] The Mendenhall approach to detention adopted in Therens and affirmed in this case by my colleagues has different consequences in the U.S. than it does here. In relation to the right to counsel, for example, that right does not arise in the U.S. "without delay" upon a psychological detention ("or seizure"), but only where there is "a 'formal arrest or restraint on freedom of movement' of the degree associated with a formal arrest": California v. Beheler, 463 U.S. 1121 (1983), at p. 1125; Oregon v. Mathiason, 429 U.S. 492 (1977), at p. 495. See also Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964), at pp. 490-91; Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), at p. 444; Thompson v. Keohane, 516 U.S. 99 (1995), at p. 112. Whether such a situation of formal restraint exists under U.S. law "depends on the objective circumstances of the interrogation, not on the subjective views harbored by either the interrogating officers or the person being questioned": Stansbury v. California, 511 U.S. 318 (1994), at p. 323 (emphasis added). In other words, in the U.S. psychological detention does not, without more, invoke entitlement to the assistance of counsel. The U.S. courts take a generous view of when "psychological detention" occurs because it triggers scrutiny under the Fourth Amendment of police conduct that would otherwise lie outside judicial oversight under their Constitution. In practical terms, the U.S. can live with such a broad claimant-centred definition because it does not have the effect of bringing in the lawyers at an early stage in encounters between the police and the citizen. The significant effect of a finding of detention in the U.S., as under our decision in R. v. Mann, 2004 SCC 52, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 59, is to require the police to meet the standard of reasonable suspicion. Thus, the Mendenhall doctrine of psychological detention, when imported into Canada, raises a complication under s. 10(b) not present in the United States.

C. Recognizing an “Obvious Tension”

[159] In this case, Laskin J.A., speaking for the Ontario Court of Appeal, recognized that:

The definition of “psychological detention” reflects a judicial balance between competing values. On the one hand, the police have the duty and the authority to investigate and prevent crime in order to keep our community safe. In carrying out their duty, they must interact daily with ordinary citizens. Not every such encounter between the police and a citizen amounts to a constitutional “detention”. This court and other courts have recognized that police must be able to speak to a citizen without triggering that citizen’s Charter rights.

...

On the other hand, ordinary citizens must have the right to move freely about their community.

((2006), 2006 CanLII 18347 (ON CA), 81 O.R. (3d) 1, at paras. 10 and 12)

[160] In the companion case of R. v. Suberu, 2009 SCC 33, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 460, where the police intercepted an individual as he tried to leave an Ontario liquor store where a fraud had just been committed, Doherty J.A., also speaking for the Ontario Court of Appeal, recognized the “obvious tension between the requirement to inform detained persons of their right to counsel and the proper and effective use of brief investigative detentions” (2007 ONCA 60, 85 O.R. (3d) 127, at para. 41).

[161] Having found a breach of s. 9, Laskin J.A. did not go on in this case to deal with the s. 10(b) right to counsel. However, as my colleagues treat Suberu in this Court as a more or less straightforward application of their analysis of detention in Grant, I propose to deal with both ss. 9 and 10(b) here.

[162] The Crown’s argument is that by introducing a right to legal counsel (and “to be informed of that right”) prematurely into commonplace interactions between police and members of the public, the Court would hamstring essential police services and unduly tilt the constitutional balance against the public interest in effective law enforcement. For the police, in Professor Uviller’s mellifluous phrase, “[t]he confession is the ‘queen of the evidentiary chessboard’” (quoted in Young, at pp. 365-66). When lawyers are on the scene, the potential for obtaining confessions tends to dry up.

[163] The defence, on the other hand, supports a broad definition of detention and quick access to legal advice because under a less generous Charter approach a member of the public risks serious prejudice to his or her defence before the lawyer can get involved, since few members of the public are clear about their Charter rights. The solution to this dilemma offered by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Suberu was to read down s. 10(b) so that the concept of “without delay” is stretched more readily to accommodate the reasonable needs of law enforcement (which in practice might well result in a situation similar to that prevailing in the U.S.). The problem with the Ontario court’s solution, as my colleagues note, is that the interpretation does not sit easily with what those words mean, whether interpreted purposefully, textually or contextually with the Charter.

[164] The appellant, supported by the Criminal Lawyers’ Association (Ontario) and the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, suggests that the “obvious tension” could be eased by declaring inadmissible any incriminating statements made by an accused between the moment the detention crystallized and the subsequent notification to the accused of the right to retain and instruct counsel. However, this presupposes that the s. 9 detention has indeed crystallized, which is the point in issue.

[165] Another way to ease the “obvious tension” (other than resort to s. 1) would be for the courts to re-examine the concept of “psychological detention” with a view to broadening the perspectives from which the encounter is viewed. This would help obviate some of the problems with a purely claimant-centred approach, in my opinion.

D. Problems With the Claimant-Centred Approach

[166] I believe there are a number of problems with the Court’s continuing endorsement of the Therens/Mendenhall approach to determine when a simple interaction crystallizes into a detention. Insistence that the claimant’s circumstances be viewed from the more detached perspective of a “reasonable person” provides in some cases a welcome corrective, but in other cases, by exaggerating the ability of ordinary people to stand up to police assertion of authority, that approach may compel the conclusion that the claimant had the choice to walk away whereas in reality no such choice existed.

1. The Perception of the Police May Be of Significance

[167] My colleagues refer to the “complex situation”, for example, where the non-coercive police role of assisting in meeting needs or maintaining basic order can subtly merge with the potentially coercive police role of investigating crime and arresting suspects so that they may be brought to justice. [para. 40]

I agree that this “subtle” change of police perspective is relevant to the analysis but it will not always be made apparent to a person who is unambiguously stopped but remains unsure whether the encounter is benign or perilous. Police investigators assemble a mosaic of facts. Apparent “general inquiries” may be designed, unknown to the person stopped, to elicit the missing piece of self-incrimination. The success of the police investigation may indeed depend on the police skill in masking their information and intentions from the person stopped.

[168] Of relevance in this respect is the judgment of Martin J.A. in R. v. Moran (1987), 1987 CanLII 124 (ON CA), 36 C.C.C. (3d) 225 (Ont. C.A.), leave to appeal refused, [1988] 1 S.C.R. xi, setting out some of the considerations he thought relevant to finding a detention, including the stage of the investigation, that is, whether the questioning was part of the general investigation of a crime or possible crime or whether the police had already decided that a crime had been committed and that the accused was the perpetrator or involved in its commission and the questioning was conducted for the purpose of obtaining incriminating statements from the accused; [p. 259]

These are matters that would certainly be known to the police but not necessarily communicated to the person stopped. Perhaps, as mentioned, the stage of the investigation will be intentionally concealed with a view to a more productive interrogation. Other Moran considerations would be apparent to the person stopped, for example, the nature of the questions: whether they were questions of a general nature designed to obtain information or whether the accused was confronted with evidence pointing to his or her guilt; [p. 259]

If, for example, the police arrive at a street disturbance and it is not clear to them whether the occurrence is a crime or an accident, and they tell everyone to stay put until the situation is clarified, such a “stay put” direction should carry a different legal consequence than if used at what is clearly a crime scene to hold an individual they believe is a likely suspect. In the former case, the situation may be explicable by reference to police responsibilities for public safety and order.

In the latter case, the police are attempting to gather evidence about (and from) a particular individual in relation to a particular crime. The reality is that in both cases, to borrow Laskin J.A.'s formulation in the court below, "any reasonable person hearing these words from a uniformed officer three feet away would treat them not as a request that might be ignored, but as a command that must be obeyed" (para. 24). Although in both cases the police command to "stay put" will likely constrain psychologically the individuals subject to the police direction from walking away, only in the latter instance ought the Charter right to be triggered because it is only in that instance that "a person may reasonably require the assistance of counsel" (Therens, at pp. 641-42).

2. The Uncertain Characteristics of the "Reasonable Person"

[169] In a useful commentary on the U.S. Mendenhall test, Professor Butterfoss writes:

Application of the test has created a broad "nonseizure" category of police-citizen encounters that permits officers substantial leeway in approaching and questioning citizens without being required to show objective justification for such conduct. This has been accomplished both by constructing a highly artificial "reasonable person," who is much more assertive in encounters with police officers than is the average citizen, and by ignoring the subjective intentions of the officer. The result is that fourth amendment rights of citizens are determined through a legal fiction. [Emphasis added.]

(E. J. Butterfoss, "Bright Line Seizures: The Need for Clarity in Determining When Fourth Amendment Activity Begins" (1988-1989), 79 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 437, at p. 439)

In other words, encounters with police that average citizens would consider left them with no choice but to comply are denied the status of "detentions" through the device of putting in their place an artificially robust and assertive "reasonable person". Self-incriminatory conduct may also be rationalized in the state's favour by the attributed sense of "moral or social duty on the part of every citizen to answer questions put to him or her by the police" (see R. v. Grafe (1987), 1987 CanLII 170 (ON CA), 36 C.C.C. (3d) 267 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 271). This gap between the reality on the street and the court constructed “reasonable person” is of particular relevance to visible minorities who may, because of their background and experience, feel especially unable to disregard police directions, and feel that assertion of their right to walk away will itself be taken as evasive and later be argued by the police to constitute sufficient grounds of suspicion to justify a Mann detention.

[170] Leaving aside the issue of visible minorities, is the concept of the reasonable person intended to describe average cooperative members of the public? If so, the Canadian reality is that such people will almost always regard a direction from a police officer as a demand that must be complied with. This was recognized in Therens (and adopted in this case by my colleagues) when Le Dain J. acknowledged that “[m]ost citizens are not aware of the precise legal limits of police authority” and “the reasonable person is [therefore] likely to err on the side of caution, assume lawful authority and comply with the demand” (p. 644). Viewed in this way, police instructions or demands readily constrain a claimant’s choice to leave and, therefore, on that interpretation, even the less intrusive encounters between the police and citizens ought frequently to be declared detentions despite the fact that at that stage such people do not reasonably require the assistance of counsel.

[171] On the other hand, perhaps the “reasonable person” is to be invested with a higher level of legal sophistication, leading to a more robust attitude towards the police. My colleagues refer to the reasonable person’s assessment being informed by “generally understood legal rights and duties” (para. 33; see also para. 37). This more erudite version of the “reasonable person” might know that apart from some statutory exceptions, he or she ordinarily has the right to walk away from the encounter regardless of what the police officer says, unless and until the police possess reasonable grounds to suspect involvement in a criminal offence and therefore grounds for a Mann-type investigative detention. If the test envisages the perception of this more knowledgeable type of “reasonable person”, then anything short of an investigative detention as described in Mann would fail to constrain freedom of choice, and whatever is said in those critical early moments of an encounter will be presumed to be “voluntary” and based on consent.

[172] A further problem with the “reasonable person” device is to define exactly what information this fictional person possesses. While “the factors” identified by my colleagues include “whether the police were providing general assistance; maintaining general order; making general inquiries regarding a particular occurrence; or, singling out the individual for focussed investigation” (para. 44(2)(a)), it is not suggested that the “reasonable person” is a mind-reader. On their view, this information can only affect the “reasonable person” assessment to the extent it is made manifest to the claimant, whose perception would otherwise remain oblivious and unaffected.

[173] Yet, another difficulty with calibrating the “reasonable person” approach is that it is not at all clear what experience this hypothetical individual brings to the assessment of the encounter and what criteria this individual applies in deciding whether or not the person stopped is free to choose to break off the encounter. There is a difference between the listing of a broad range of factors to be considered by a court and identifying their relative weight and importance.

[174] In the absence of explicit criteria, various judges will tend to read into the “reasonable person” their own projections of the moment at which, in their view, the person stopped ought to be able to call a lawyer. This creates the risk of a very results-oriented analysis. Perceptions will vary depending on the personality of the judge seized with the case. My colleagues emphasize at different places the need for deference to the assessment of the trial judges (e.g., para. 43) which may further complicate the task of developing a consistent approach. In other words, continued reliance on the “reasonable person” whose attributed experience and choice of criteria are unspecified except for a presumed commitment to “reasonableness” helps to mask rather than clarify the actual criteria being applied by the Court.

E. Broader Approach

[175] As a majority of the Court is satisfied with the Therens/Mendenhall claimant-centred approach, I will not belabour the existence of alternatives. However, I believe more attention should be paid to the objective facts of the encounter between a police officer and members of the public, whether or not such facts are made apparent to the person stopped.

[176] There is, of course, an important continuing role for psychological detention as perceived by the person stopped, but in that respect serious weight should be given to the values and experience of the person actually stopped, including the experience of visible minorities, and less emphasis on the hypothetical opinion of the “reasonable person” insofar as the latter is presumed to be able to handle such stressful encounters without sensing “significant . . . psychological restraint” (Mann, at para. 19). As mentioned, Mr. Grant is black. In determining whether he (or a reasonable person in his position) would feel free to choose to walk away from three policemen, contrary to their wishes in the circumstances here, his ethnicity raises a significant issue. As the above-mentioned studies show, trial judges differ in the weight they are willing to accord to ethnicity in such “low visibility” encounters, despite the over-representation of Aboriginals and other visible minorities in encounters with police patrols. That is why, from my point of view, the police perspective and the information (if any) the police possessed when they initiated the encounter is important to shed light on whether or not the liberty interest of the person stopped was truly compromised.

[177] I agree with my colleagues that a claim of psychological detention must meet the three-fold test of (i) a police command or direction (ii) compliance by the person now claiming a s. 9 detention and (iii) grounds for a reasonable belief that there was no choice but to comply. However, in my view, police words and conduct should be interpreted in light of the purpose of the encounter from the police perspective — whether disclosed to the person from whom cooperation is requested or not. The U.S. Model Code of Pre-Arrest Procedure (ALI 1975), § 110.1(2), for instance, includes special provisions for questioning suspects as opposed to seeking cooperation from citizens and requires warnings to suspects that no legal obligation exists to respond to questioning. See also the English Judges' Rules, Rules I and II (Practice Note (Judges' Rules)), [1964] 1 W.L.R. 152 (C.C.A.), at p. 153). The police know, but the claimant does not know, the point at which a person of interest begins to emerge as a suspect and ceases to be, as my colleagues put it, a person whose “rights are not seriously in issue” (para. 29).

[178] A central problem with the Therens/Mendenhall claimant-centred approach, as I see it, is that it does not take adequately into account what the police know and when they knew it except insofar as this information is conveyed to the person stopped, but which the police may not consider to be in their interest to convey. Police may know (as in Suberu) if a crime has allegedly been committed and whether they are making the approach to an individual with a view to obtaining general information or, on the other hand, corralling a suspect and collecting admissible evidence to bring him or her to justice. Possession of such knowledge may in fact place the police in an adversarial relationship to the person approached whether that person is aware of the jeopardy or not. It is the adversarial relationship together with the “stop” that generates the need for counsel. At that point, the power imbalance is significant. The unsuspecting suspect may fatally compromise his or her position simply through ignorance of his or her rights and the fact the police have now adopted an adversarial position. At that point, as Le Dain J. put it in Therens, “a person may reasonably require the assistance of counsel” (pp. 641-42), but may not have any idea of the perilous turn of events.

[179] On the other hand, a more benign police purpose may deprive even an unambiguous police command of the legal effect of a detention, and thereby enure to the benefit of the Crown. Had Constable Roughley in the Suberu case, for example, come rushing up to Mr. Suberu in the parking lot of the liquor store saying “Wait a minute. I need to talk to you before you go anywhere” because police had just received information, unknown to Mr. Suberu, that Mr. Suberu’s van had been wired with an explosive device by a local member of the Hell’s Angels, the detention analysis ought to be quite different although the constable’s words and the forcefulness of their expression may be the same.

[180] It is not controversial that in the early stages of a criminal investigation the police must be afforded some flexibility before the lawyers get involved. The police do have the right to ask questions and they need to seek the co-operation of members of the public, including those who turn out to be miscreants. The question is how to accommodate that need within a plausible framework of s. 9 analysis. In my view, without wishing to prolong this discussion, a better and broader approach to detention would explicitly take into account (i) the objective facts of such encounters, whether or not evident to the person stopped, as well as (ii) the perception of the police in initiating the encounter, whether or not evident to the person stopped, and (iii) whatever information the police possess at the time, which may or may not be known to the person stopped, as well as whatever change in the police perception occurs as the encounter develops. These matters should all be factored into a more comprehensive analysis of when a “detention” occurs for Charter purposes than is provided in the Therens/Mendenhall claimant-centred approach affirmed today by the Court.

F. Application to the Facts

[181] In this case, I agree with my colleagues that Mr. Grant was arbitrarily detained. The safety of school neighbourhoods is of great importance but under our system of law it cannot be achieved by random detention of pedestrians on the off-chance that some of them might (or might not) be implicated in criminal activity.

[182] The purpose of these police officers, whether or not couched in terms of community policing, was to investigate crime, whether actual or anticipated. Constable Worrell testified that when the officers drove past in an unmarked car, Mr. Grant “stared” at them in an unusually intense manner and continued to do so as they proceeded down the street. He wore a “big jacket” and was “fidgeting” with his coat and pants. Staring at an unmarked car and fidgeting are lawful activities but it was enough to cause three police officers to converge on Mr. Grant. The police purpose for initiating the encounter is important, I believe, and Constable Worrell testified:

Q. Well, when you stop these people, I take it, the object of the exercise in light of what you said about the nature of the area is to find out if perhaps they might be involved in swarmings or robberies or drugs?

A. That’s correct.

Q. And when you and your partner talked about potentially stopping Mr. Grant yourselves and what you had in mind was having a chat with him —

A. Mm-hmm.

Q. — to determine whether he might be involved in swarmings or robberies or drugs, correct?

A. It’s possible he may have been, but we didn’t know for sure.

The police had no information whatsoever that Mr. Grant may have been implicated in criminal activity or even whether a crime had been committed, but Mr. Grant’s further “fidget” with his jacket convinced Constable Gomes to take charge of the situation (whether or not Mr. Grant was aware of how his fidgets were being interpreted by Constable Gomes) and to order Mr. Grant to “keep his hands in front of him”. That command crystallized the detention.

[183] However, in my view, the finding of a detention is properly the product not only of Mr. Grant's perception (filtered through the hypothetical reasonable person) but also of the objective facts of why the encounter was initiated (crime detection) and the other facts surrounding the encounter whether or not evident to Mr. Grant, e.g., the agreement among the three officers (unknown to Mr. Grant) to converge on him and thereafter effectively to form "a small phalanx blocking the path in which the appellant was walking" (Laskin J.A., at para. 29). As Mr. Grant did not testify, we do not have any first-hand evidence of his perception, although his lack of choice must have been manifest when every time he moved Constable Gomes, who was standing only three feet away, moved in a corresponding way to maintain the nose-to-nose impasse. What we do have in considerable detail is the perception of each of the three police officers. Their forthright account of their own intentions and their acknowledged lack of any information that any crime was or was about to be committed, apart from a "hunch", none of which was conveyed to Mr. Grant, give rise to the conclusion that Mr. Grant was arbitrarily detained.

[184] I therefore concur in the conclusion of the Chief Justice and Charron J. that Mr. Grant was detained. I also agree with their analysis under s. 24(2) and the consequent disposition of the appeal.

English version of the reasons delivered by

[185] DESCHAMPS J. — The difficulty in resolving the problems related to detention and to the exclusion of evidence in three appeals now before the Court reveals a number of deficiencies in the applicable rules. These three cases show that it is sometimes hard to reconcile the protection of constitutional rights with the public interest in bringing cases to trial. I have read the reasons of the majority, and I agree with them that the tests for determining whether a person was actually detained and whether evidence should be excluded need to be reformulated. With respect, however, I must comment further on the application of the new rules concerning detention to the facts of this case. As for the factors to consider in deciding whether to admit or exclude evidence obtained in violation of constitutional rights, I find that the test proposed by the majority is problematic, and that it is inconsistent with the purpose of the constitutional provision that applies to such decisions. Although my analysis differs from the majority's, I reach the same conclusion as them.

1. Test for Determining Whether a Person Was Detained

[186] Where the state interacts with citizens in a criminal law context, be it in the streets or in a courtroom, the applicable rules must be clear so that all those involved in the criminal justice system know the scope of their respective rights and powers. I agree with the majority that the police cannot do their work effectively without the co-operation of the public (para. 39). The applicable rules must therefore take into account the fact that the police need to act so as to foster public co-operation, not to discourage it.

[187] In the instant case, the trial judge stressed the fact that the police officers, who were patrolling an area around four schools where numerous disturbances had been reported, had conducted themselves politely and seemed to have been conscientious in doing their work. On whether the law prohibits or should prohibit this type of police action, the trial judge quoted with approval the following comment by one of his colleagues:

We do not expect the police to sit in their station houses waiting for those who commit offences to walk in and confess. We expect them to be out in the community and when suspicious events occur to make inquiries. The Charter is not a barrier to those inquiries.

(2004 CarswellOnt 8779, at para. 9, quoting R. v. Orellana, [1999] O.J. No. 5746 (QL) (Ct. J.))

This approach is the very one on which the majority of this Court are basing the test adopted today to guide the public, law enforcement agencies and judges in determining at what point a person is “detained” in the legal sense of this term.

[188] In the companion case of R. v. Suberu, 2009 SCC 33, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 460, the majority of the Court acknowledge that police officers may interact with the public and that not every contact between a police officer and a member of the public constitutes detention. There is a clear distinction between the nature of the police action in the case at bar and that of the action in Suberu. Suberu concerns a targeted action by officers who had received specific information. In the case at bar, the action was one of prevention, and the officers’ approach was necessarily different. It will be helpful to consider the trial judge’s findings of fact.

[189] Constables Worrell and Forde were on patrol, in plainclothes in an unmarked car, in an area where four high schools are located. The area was experiencing problems related to intimidation, robberies and drug offences involving students. The two officers had been ordered to maintain a presence there for purposes of prevention. They drove past an individual, Mr. Grant, and noted that he was staring at them. After they had passed him, Constable Worrell turned around and saw that he was still watching them and that he was fidgeting with his clothes at his waist and pulling on his pants with his right hand. At this point, the officers felt that it would be appropriate to speak with him. As they continued along their way, they saw another officer, Constable Gomes, who was on patrol in a marked cruiser. They suggested that he go speak with Mr. Grant, which he did. While speaking with Constable Gomes, Mr. Grant behaved nervously and touched his clothes at his waist, which prompted Constable Gomes to ask him to keep his hands in front of him. At first, constables Worrell and Forde stayed apart from Mr. Grant and Constable Gomes, but on seeing that Mr. Grant still appeared nervous and continued to look at them, they decided to move closer to make sure everything was all right. They identified themselves, showing their badges, and then stood behind Constable Gomes. I will not repeat the exchange that took place between Constable Gomes and Mr. Grant. The relevant passages are reproduced in the majority's reasons.

All I need say here is that Mr. Grant made an incriminating statement.

[190] In analysing all these facts, the trial judge found that Mr. Grant had not been detained.

The following is his own lengthy summary of his reasons for so finding:

- (1) The Location being the sidewalk of a main street in the City of Toronto in full view of the public.
- (2) The means by which the police spoke to the accused; i.e., on the street, and the accused not being required to stay or get into any vehicle or any closed type of situation.
- (3) The time of day. It was broad daylight. It was approximately 12:30 p.m., the usual noon hour for students.
- (4) There was no physical force. There was no pat down search and there was no grabbing where someone, especially the accused, in any situation might feel intimidated.
- (5) There was no actual search or physical search, of course. There were just some questions put.
- (6) There was an absence of reasonable and probable grounds to conduct an arrest and there was no reason to take physical control of the accused until, of course, the marijuana and firearm surfaced.
- (7) What would Police Constable Gomes have done if the accused, for example, left the scene? He may have followed him. He may have asked him further questions. There again, that is subject to speculation.
- (8) The length of the interaction. It was short. It consisted of minutes. This was not a one-half hour or hour interrogation. It wasn't off the street or in a police cruiser.
- (9) The response of the other police officers. These officers stood behind Gomes, but they were not involved in the discussion. They didn't surround the accused nor did they detain him. And I may address that issue further in due course.
- (10) The nature of the conversation with Gomes. It was not in aggressive language. There were no demands or directions. The only request was that he keep his hands in front of him. There was no demand to enter a cruiser, and nothing was said that I find would be compelling. There were no threats or inducements. This officer just asked some general questions and in response to those questions the accused produced identification as to who he was, where he lived, and he even gave his phone number.

(11) The accused could have walked away. He could have walked around the one police officer or the three police officers and could have kept going. All he had to do, in my view, is say, “Excuse me.” To suggest for one moment that he couldn’t or they wouldn’t permit it is speculation. There was no evidence that the accused felt compelled or had a subjective belief in relation to anything. The inference is, that the accused decided to cooperate all the way with the police. The quantity of time spent was referred to.

I conclude very easily that this was a conversation of an extremely short duration, lasting no more than several moments, but no more than three or four minutes. So much so, that I find the ultimate crime, the solving of the crime and the arrest and search incidental to the arrest took some four minutes more or less.

I also find that the limited conversation between Police Constable Gomes and the accused was no more than that, a conversation and an attempt to chit chat or make chit chat. Here again, I find it was all meant to check on the temperature of the community.

(2004 CarswellOnt 8779, at para. 9)

[191] Unlike the trial judge, the Court of Appeal concluded that Mr. Grant had been detained: (2006), 2006 CanLII 18347 \(ON CA\), 81 O.R. (3d) 1. I agree with this conclusion: viewed as a whole, the facts support the conclusion that there was indeed a detention. However, I wish to point out that the detention came to a head when the officers asked Mr. Grant certain direct questions that, viewed objectively, might have caused a reasonable person to feel singled out, cornered and, therefore, detained. Owing to the nature of the questions asked by Constable Gomes, the line between prevention and suppression was crossed. Constable Gomes asked Mr. Grant if he had committed a crime. Once such a question had been asked of a person who had known he was being watched from the time he had crossed paths with constables Worrell and Forde — who had since arrived on the scene — the encounter could no longer be described simply as an interaction between a police officer and a member of the public. I agree with the Court of Appeal’s conclusion that the exchange was no longer an impromptu conversation that a young man such as Mr. Grant would think he could walk away from as he pleased.

[192] In light of the conclusion that Mr. Grant was detained, I must consider the power of the police to detain a person for investigation purposes in performing their crime prevention function. Unlike in the context of crime suppression, police officers who are charged with preventing crime — in particular, as in the instant case, in an area near schools experiencing problems related to violence — know that unlawful acts have been or will be committed, but do not know when, where or by whom a specific crime will be committed. They must therefore have some leeway to be able to perform this function adequately.

[193] Although I cannot conclude that the officers in the case at bar had a reasonable suspicion that an offence had been committed, I would not want what is said in this judgment to discourage them from intervening. As can be seen from the trial judge's reasons, the officers were calm and polite. Even though their actions may, viewed objectively, have constituted detention, that was most likely not intentional. It would therefore be best in future for police officers to avoid asking incriminating questions of people who are likely to be viewed as suspects. The direct questions in the instant case can be compared with the circumspect approach taken by the officers in R. v. Kang-Brown, 2008 SCC 18, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 456. If, in the course of an exchange of words in which officers act circumspectly, the behaviour of the person they are speaking with changes, the next question is whether the facts are sufficient to give rise to a reasonable suspicion that an offence has been or will be committed. If they are sufficient, it will then be open to the officers to exercise their power of investigative detention.

[194] In short, I believe it is important to educate the police about how their conduct affects members of the public. If they do not really intend to detain a person, they should — by their deeds and their words — let the person know that he or she is not being singled out.

2. Factors Supporting the Admission or Exclusion of Evidence Obtained in Violation of the Charter

[195] The majority propose revising the test developed in R. v. Collins, 1987 CanLII 84 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265, for admitting or excluding evidence obtained in violation of a right protected by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I agree with them that the test needs to be revised, but in my view, the formulation they propose is inconsistent with the purpose of s. 24(2). I will be proposing a simpler rule that focusses the analysis on two aspects: the societal interest in protecting constitutional rights and the societal interest in the adjudication of the case on the merits. On the basis of these two aspects, it will be possible to consider all the relevant circumstances in order to determine whether the exclusion or admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

A) Purpose of Section 24(2) of the Charter

[196] The identification of the purpose of s. 24(2) of the Charter is of prime importance for the determination of the factors to be considered in applying this provision. According to Professor David M. Paciocco, “[r]ecent experience in the United States has demonstrated that the vitality of the exclusionary rule depends entirely on the purposes that are identified for exclusion. This is because each of the rationales has its own level of vulnerability and its own sphere of operation” (“The Judicial Repeal of s. 24(2) and the Development of the Canadian Exclusionary Rule” (1989-90), 32 Crim. L.Q. 326, at p. 334). However, Professor Kent Roach cautions that “[i]f none of the approaches is in a preferred position, the choice of which rationale will prevail in a particular case is likely to be inconsistent and result-oriented” (“Constitutionalizing Disrepute: Exclusion of Evidence after Therens” (1986), 44 U.T. Fac. L. Rev. 209, at p. 228).

[197] Collins had the merit of setting out the first test for applying s. 24(2). But neither in that case nor in those that followed can the Court be said to have identified a guiding principle or taken a clear position ranking the various purposes that are often cited for the provision and can be drawn — sometimes implicitly and sometimes explicitly — from the case law. The failure to do so is surprising, given the importance the Court has attached to contextual analysis and to the need, in interpreting any provision, to consider its purpose.

[198] I accordingly agree with the majority that the purpose of s. 24(2) of the Charter is found in the words of the provision. Section 24 reads as follows:

24. (1) Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

(2) Where, in proceedings under subsection (1), a court concludes that evidence was obtained in a manner that infringed or denied any rights or freedoms guaranteed by this Charter, the evidence shall be excluded if it is established that, having regard to all the circumstances, the admission of it in the proceedings would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

The purpose of s. 24(2) is to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice.

[199] Since this purpose is a general one, it makes it possible to take the various functions of the criminal justice system into account. This purpose also makes it possible to identify a common denominator between ss. 24(1) and (2). It is clear that one of the purposes of the remedy provided for in s. 24(1), more specifically a stay of proceedings for abuse of process, is to maintain the repute of the administration of justice: R. v. Conway, 1989 CanLII 66 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1659, at p. 1667. Although a stay of proceedings can be granted only in the clearest of cases because it allows the accused to go free, the comparison with s. 24(2) is not without interest, especially in a case where the exclusion of evidence would in practice lead to the discharge of the accused by resulting in his or her acquittal.

[200] A court that must decide under s. 24(1) whether to order a stay of proceedings may consider the “balance . . . between the public interest in having all charges dealt with on their merits [and] the public interest in having all charges stayed to show the court’s determination to ensure the continued vigour of checks and balances in the criminal justice system” (R. v. Regan, 2002 SCC 12, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 297, dissent, at para. 231 (emphasis deleted); see also the majority’s reasons, at para. 57). This balancing exercise is also essential to the analysis required by s. 24(2). Under s. 24(2), the judge must decide whether the best way to maintain the reputé of the administration of justice would be to admit the evidence or to exclude it.

[201] I also agree with the majority’s proposition that the exclusionary rule has, primarily, a prospective societal role and that the judge’s analysis must focus on systemic concerns (para. 70). The court cannot consider the case of the accused person who is on trial without addressing the long-term impact of its decision on the administration of justice in general. If, where the stay of proceedings and the admission or exclusion of evidence are concerned, the point of convergence between the first and second subsections of s. 24 is the balancing of two factors, what distinguishes these provisions is that the purpose of the first is to provide for an individual remedy, whereas the ultimate purpose of the second lies in the societal interest in maintaining public confidence in the administration of justice. The first is focussed on the individual, the second on society.

[202] The statement that s. 24(2) has a long-term societal purpose is of great significance for the identification of the factors to be considered in the analysis. In my view, the test proposed by the majority, by focussing the analysis on the conduct of the police in the first branch and on the interest of the accused in the second, and by attaching less importance to the seriousness of the offence in the third, does not give sufficient consideration to the long-term societal interest that must guide the judge in reaching a decision.

B) The Test: Branches and Factors

[203] Since Collins, the courts have generally applied a test under which the factors relevant to the analysis to be conducted in applying s. 24(2) were grouped in three broad branches. This Court has applied this test in many subsequent decisions, including R. v. Greffe, 1990 CanLII 143 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 755, at pp. 783-84, in which Lamer J. (as he then was) summarized the test as follows:

The first set of factors are those relevant to the fairness of the trial. The second set of factors concerns the seriousness of the Charter violations as defined by the conduct of the law enforcement authorities. The third set of factors recognizes the possibility that the administration of justice could be brought into disrepute by excluding the evidence despite the fact that it was obtained in a manner that infringed the Charter.

[204] First, the courts had to determine the nature of the evidence obtained in violation of the rights of the accused. Where real evidence was adduced, admitting it rarely led to a finding that trial fairness had been impaired. Second, they had to assess the seriousness of the violation in light of both the interests protected by the infringed right and the state conduct. Third, the courts considered the consequences of excluding the evidence and determined, more specifically, whether the evidence was essential, having regard to the seriousness of the offence (Greffe, per Dickson C.J., at pp. 762-63).

[205] In the case at bar, the majority propose to reformulate the test. The new version continues to have three branches: a review of the state conduct, the impact of the violation on the Charter-protected interests and the public interest in an adjudication on the merits.

[206] It is appropriate that trial fairness is no longer a cornerstone of the test. One of the problems with the reliance on trial fairness in the first branch of the Collins test was that it is a concept with several possible meanings and can accordingly lead to confusion.

[207] Trial fairness is sometimes defined narrowly and sometimes more broadly. Defined narrowly, it concerns solely the reliability of the evidence. More broadly, trial fairness corresponds to “courtroom fairness” (P. Mirfield, “The Early Jurisprudence of Judicial Disrepute” (1987-88), 30 Crim. L.Q. 434, at pp. 444 and 452). In the latter sense, fairness is related to the concept of “conscriptive evidence”. Its purpose is to safeguard certain fundamental rights of the accused at trial, such as the right against self-incrimination. This interpretation is essentially the same as the one in R. v. Stillman, 1997 CanLII 384 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 607. Finally, trial fairness has been defined very broadly by certain commentators and in certain judgments (see the dissent in R. v. Burlingham, 1995 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 206, at para. 86). According to this approach, any use of evidence obtained in violation of constitutional rights is — regardless of the quality of the evidence (reliable, conscriptive, derivative, etc.) — a breach of trial fairness. It is clear that, although the concept of fairness seems to go hand in hand with any system of justice worthy of that name, it is not precise enough to serve as a reliable guide.

[208] The reformulation of the first of the criteria from Collins so as to exclude the trial fairness concept and take Charter-protected interests into account in the second branch of the new test is a refinement that may help judges refer to concrete and objective factors. I am in complete agreement that the greater the impact of the violation on the Charter-protected interests, the more likely it is that there will be negative consequences for public confidence in the administration of justice. For example, interference with bodily integrity and a search of a rented car will not have the same impact on the confidence an objective person with good knowledge of the circumstances of the case will have in the administration of justice (Collins, at p. 282).

[209] However, I cannot agree with focussing the analysis on the accused, as the purpose remains at all times to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice in the long term, and what is important is the public interest in the protection of constitutional rights. Nor can I accept that one of the factors — state conduct — formerly taken into account when analysing the seriousness of a violation is now a separate branch of the test. In pursuing the purpose of maintaining confidence in the administration of justice, the courts must dissociate themselves from violations of protected rights, regardless of whether or not they were intentional. Although state conduct is of course the source of the violation, it is but one of the factors to be considered in analysing the impact of the violation on Charter-protected interests.

[210] I find the majority's emphasis on state conduct puzzling in view of the purpose of s. 24(2). Although the majority acknowledge that the purpose of the s. 24(2) rule is neither to punish the police officers nor to compensate the accused, the importance they attach to this factor places the judge on a slippery slope. Since any distinction between the role of the exclusion of evidence as a way for a court to dissociate itself from a violation and its role as a deterrent — which has been sharply criticized — will be a fine one, I wonder what role this factor will actually play. The Court's attitude in this respect has already been criticized as being one of "doublespeak" (D. Stuart, Charter Justice in Canadian Criminal Law (4th ed. 2005), at pp. 543-44). I fear that the same word will also be used to refer to the new test. Moreover, by making state conduct a separate branch of the test, the Court is drawing closer to the rules applied in the United States, which are based on very different constitutional provisions and a very different socio-political context (see the reasons of Esson J.A. in R. v. Strachan (1986), 1986 CanLII 1281 (BC CA), 25 D.L.R. (4th) 567 (B.C.C.A.)).

[211] It might have been thought that the courts would over time have understood that it is unhelpful to begin the constitutional analysis by considering state conduct. The main problem with the importance attached to this factor is that the deterrent effect of the exclusion of evidence has never been proved empirically (S. Penney, “Taking Deterrence Seriously: Excluding Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence Under Section 24(2) of the Charter” (2004), 49 McGill L.J. 105, at p. 114).

[212] In the United States, many commentators have attempted to demonstrate that the exclusionary rule is either effective or ineffective as a deterrent, and the question is still open to debate: L. T. Perrin et al., “If It’s Broken, Fix It: Moving Beyond the Exclusionary Rule — A New and Extensive Empirical Study of the Exclusionary Rule and a Call for a Civil Administrative Remedy to Partially Replace the Rule” (1998), 83 Iowa L. Rev. 669; W. R. LaFave, Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment (4th ed. 2004), vol. 1, at pp. 32-37; Herring v. United States, 555 U.S. 1 (2009); Law Reform Commission of Canada, Working Paper 10, Evidence — The Exclusion of Illegally Obtained Evidence (1974), at pp. 19-20. The question has also been the subject of debate in Canada. According to Paciocco, at p. 340, s. 24(2) cannot have a deterrent effect, because it does not establish a clear and predictable rule requiring the exclusion of evidence. To other commentators, from the perspective of the conduct of state agents, exclusion is not an effective sanction. The police certainly have an interest in the conviction of an accused, but that interest is above all one of society as a whole. Administrative or disciplinary measures may have a greater deterrent effect on the police (Law Reform Commission, at pp. 20-22; R. v. Duguay, 1989 CanLII 110 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 93, at pp. 123-24, and Burlingham, at para. 104, per L’Heureux-Dubé J., dissenting). In my view, the reservations expressed regarding the effectiveness of the exclusion of evidence as a deterrent are an invitation to be very prudent as regards the importance attached to state conduct.

[213] Furthermore, a parallel can be drawn with the order for a stay of proceedings for abuse of process, which also has as its purpose the maintenance of public confidence in the administration of justice. As the Court pointed out in Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Tobiass, 1997 CanLII 322 \(SCC\), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 391, at para. 91, and in R. v. Taillefer, 2003 SCC 70, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 307, at para. 119, the purpose of such an order is not to punish state misconduct. In my view, there is no justification for attributing this role, even indirectly, to s. 24(2). Although I agree that the exclusion of evidence may have a deterrent effect, I do not think state conduct should be considered separately in the determination of what must be done to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice. If a judge must decide whether to admit or exclude evidence, a violation of rights must already have been proved. It is therefore the impact of that violation that needs to be examined, not the inherent seriousness of the state conduct.

[214] In sum, I agree with incorporating into the assessment of the impact of the violation a broader perspective according to which all Charter-protected interests are taken into account. However, this new approach should be focussed not on the accused, but on the public interest in the protection of constitutional rights. Moreover, even though this approach may permit the courts to examine state conduct in order to determine its impact on the protected interests and, if necessary, to dissociate themselves from it, the purpose being pursued is to maintain public confidence in the administration of justice. The need for the courts to dissociate themselves from state conduct is at most one factor to be considered in relation to the overall purpose. Furthermore, in applying the Collins test, the courts have considered both state conduct and the seriousness of the infringement of the interests protected by the violated right in their review of the seriousness of the violation. In my view, therefore, the proposed change incorporates into the test a branch that is in itself inconsistent with the purpose of the provision and that does not make the rule any clearer or easier to apply. I accordingly find that the objective of the reformulation has not been achieved.

[215] At the third stage of the Collins analysis, the judge had to determine the effect that excluding the evidence would have on the repute of the administration of justice. The third branch of the new test proposed by the majority requires the judge to assess the “public interest in an adjudication on the merits”. Although this formulation is clearly broad enough that it will be possible to consider the factors formerly regarded as important in the third branch of the Collins test, certain factors are unduly de-emphasized or simply disregarded in the new test.

[216] In this regard, the majority’s position on the seriousness of the offence being prosecuted is ambiguous. Although the majority describe this factor as a “valid consideration”, they mention that it “has the potential to cut both ways”, that is, in favour of either excluding or admitting evidence. Their justification for this position is that although the public has a heightened interest in an adjudication on the merits where the crime is a serious one, it also has a heightened interest in having a justice system that is above reproach, particularly where the penal stakes for the accused are high (para. 84). I note that they also consider the heightened interest of the accused in having a justice system that is above reproach, especially where the crime with which he or she is charged is a serious one. These comments by the majority help me put the problem in context, and they suggest that the interest of the accused is equal to that of society where the charge is serious. In addition to my doubts about how the seriousness of the offence actually fits into the majority’s test, I must say that I disagree with the proposition that in the analysis relating to the maintenance of the repute of the administration of justice, this factor is neutral.

[217] First of all, the third branch of the majority’s test requires the judge to consider the factors that weigh in favour of or against proceeding to trial. At first glance, it is hard to imagine how the seriousness of the offence, and even the harshness of the sentence, could weigh against proceeding to trial. However, it is conceivable that when the factor of the seriousness of the offence is combined with other circumstances — where, for example, the evidence is unreliable — the accused might claim to have a greater interest in not standing trial if he or she could face a harsher sentence owing to the seriousness of the charge. But this interest is subsumed in the public’s interest, which is of course opposed to having an accused convicted on the basis of unreliable evidence. Moreover, a well-informed person who is objective and is apprised of all the circumstances would surely be shocked if unreliable evidence were used in any criminal trial (R. v. O'Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, at para. 62).

[218] What the majority suggest is in reality that, on the one hand, the interest of the accused in having the evidence excluded increases with the seriousness of the offence and the harshness of the potential sentence and, on the other hand, the societal interest in an adjudication on the merits increases with the seriousness of the offence. The result is that this factor is considered to be neutral. But I find it unacceptable to place value in the benefit derived by the accused from the exclusion of reliable evidence. The accused has a legitimate interest in having his or her rights protected, but not in having the evidence truncated to his or her advantage. In other words, the outcome of the analysis cannot be factored into the analysis itself. Moreover, the protection of the interests of the accused is considered in the first and second branches of the test proposed by the majority, not in the third.

[219] The analysis to be conducted under s. 24(2) should not be more likely to result in the exclusion of evidence where the charge is murder than where it is theft. To the extent that the majority's approach has the effect of including, in the third branch of the test, factors related to the consequences of the charges for the accused, it is inconsistent with the analysis required at this stage.

[220] The suggestion that the effect of the factor of the seriousness of the offence is neutral because of the heightened societal interest in having a system of justice that is above reproach is also problematic. What might be criticized is the admission of evidence obtained in violation of constitutional rights. This implies that the violation is taken into account at this stage of the analysis. In other words, the violation will have been taken into account at every stage: at the first, in reviewing the conduct of the police; at the second, in assessing the impact of the violation on the protected interests; and lastly, at the third, in considering the interest in maintaining a system of justice that is above reproach. Furthermore, this approach evokes the broad concept of trial fairness even though that concept is not formally included in the test proposed by the majority. Thus, trial fairness would be reintroduced indirectly, but in a more diffuse sense that is potentially much broader than the one in which it was used in the approach developed in Collins and Stillman.

[221] In my view, assessing the seriousness of the offence is as important as determining whether the evidence is reliable or essential. To disregard this factor would make as little sense as to disregard the fact that an accused who is granted a stay of proceedings will not be prosecuted.

[222] If the role of the courts is to conduct trials to seek the truth about the commission of crimes, the importance of this role reaches its apogee where the crime is a particularly serious one. I think it goes without saying that society has a greater interest in an adjudication on the merits where the crime is a serious one, such as murder, sexual assault or importing hard drugs, than where it is less serious, as in the case of shoplifting, possession of cannabis or assault.

C) Proposed Test

[223] In short, I agree that the time has come for the Court to revisit the test for the admission or exclusion of evidence obtained in violation of a Charter right. I am proposing a simple test that takes into account both the public interest in protecting Charter rights and the public interest in an adjudication on the merits. I agree with the majority that the judge's approach should be to foster the maintenance of public confidence in the administration of justice in the long term, but I would add that it is by striking a fair balance between these two societal interests that this result will be attained. These are the only two aspects that a judge should consider in determining whether the maintenance of confidence in the administration of justice would be better served by admitting the evidence or by excluding it.

[224] On the branch related to the protection of constitutional rights, I would suggest that any facts that help show the effect of the violation on the protected rights be considered. In this respect, the state conduct that gave rise to the violation is obviously a relevant factor. However, the purpose of the judge's review is not to punish the police officers or to compensate the accused for the violation. Rather, it is to assess the impact of that conduct on the protected interests with a view to ultimately balancing the societal interest in the protection of constitutional rights against the role of the judicial system as the institution responsible for holding trials. There may be cases in which conduct is so serious that the courts feel a need to dissociate themselves from it and, in the end, to attach paramount importance to it in their analysis. In the test I am proposing, however, state conduct is but one of the factors to be considered in assessing the impact of the violation on the protected rights.

[225] The impact of a violation on protected interests will vary with the circumstances, and it would be impossible here to list all the circumstances that might be relevant. Suffice it to mention the place of the search, the nature of the evidence, the nature of the violated right, the urgency of the situation for the police officers, the availability of other less intrusive investigation methods, the officers' knowledge of the applicable law, their training, and the clarity of the law. In short, the judge must take into account all the facts that may be used to assess the long-term impact of his or her decision on the repute of the administration of justice, that is, not on the rights of the accused being tried, but rather on those of every individual whose rights might be violated in a similar way.

[226] As for the branch related to the public interest in an adjudication on the merits, I would suggest taking the reliability of the evidence into account. In my view, this consideration is crucial to the maintenance of public confidence. On the one hand, unreliable evidence will invariably undermine public confidence in the courts' ability to determine whether accused persons are guilty or innocent. On the other hand, a decision to exclude reliable evidence without good reason is also likely to be seen as an abdication by the court of its institutional role. As a corollary, whether the evidence in issue is essential or peripheral is highly significant. Similarly, the importance of the factor of the seriousness of the offence must be recognized, given society's strong interest in being protected from the commission of serious crimes. I have already explained why I feel this factor cannot reasonably be excluded without causing the test itself to bring the administration of justice into disrepute. This is why I would make it an important factor in the analysis.

[227] The question the judge must answer is whether the repute of the administration of justice would be better protected by admitting the evidence or by excluding it. In some cases, the impact on constitutional rights will be the determining factor because, owing to certain circumstances of the violation, the long-term effect of admitting the evidence would be to bring the administration of justice into disrepute. But the converse is also true. Thus, there will be other cases in which it is the public interest in an adjudication on the merits that should prevail: see, for example, the companion case of R. v. Harrison, 2009 SCC 34, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 494. Absent an error in principle, the decision is a matter for the trier of fact.

3. Application of the Principles to the Facts of the Case

[228] On whether admitting the weapon in evidence would have a positive effect on the repute of the administration of justice, I agree with the majority's conclusion. I refer to the following findings of fact made by the trial judge: the exchange lasted only a few minutes, the officers were polite to Mr. Grant, and they were motivated by a desire to take a proactive approach in patrolling an area near schools with serious problems related to youth crime and safety. On the protection of the public, it should be noted that the charge here is firearms-related, that it would be impossible to establish guilt without the evidence and that the evidence is eminently reliable.

[229] When balanced against each other, the limited impact of the violation on the protected interests and the great importance of the evidence for the purposes of the trial favour admitting the physical evidence. Furthermore, on the charge of possession of a firearm for the purposes of trafficking, I am in complete agreement with the majority.

[230] For these reasons, I reach the same conclusion as the majority.

Appeal allowed in part.

Solicitors for the appellant: Sack Goldblatt Mitchell, Toronto.

Solicitor for the respondent: Attorney General of Ontario, Toronto.

Solicitor for the intervener the Director of Public Prosecutions of Canada: Public Prosecution Service of Canada, Halifax.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General of British Columbia: Attorney General of British Columbia, Vancouver.

Solicitor for the intervener the Canadian Civil Liberties Association: Queen's University, Kingston.

Solicitors for the intervener the Criminal Lawyers' Association (Ontario): Meryl Edwardh Barristers Professional Corporation, Toronto.

TAB 15

Henry v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 24 (CanLII), [2015] 2 SCR 214

Source: Supreme Court of Canada

Date: 2015-05-01

File number: 35745

Other citations: 383 DLR (4th) 383 — 470 NR 200 — 251 ACWS (3d) 590 — [2015] 6 WWR 407 — [2015] EXP 1352 — 70 BCLR (5th) 1 — 18 CR (7th) 338 — 369 BCAC 47 — 336 CRR (2d) 270 — EYB 2015-251516 — JE 2015-743 — [2015] SCJ No 24 (QL)

Citation: Henry v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 24 (CanLII), [2015] 2 SCR 214, <<https://canlii.ca/t/ghdq1>>, retrieved on 2026-03-23

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

CITATION: Henry v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 24, [2015] 2 S.C.R. 214 DATE: 20150501
DOCKET: 35745

BETWEEN:

Ivan William Mervin Henry

Appellant

and

Her Majesty The Queen in Right of the Province of British Columbia as Represented by the Attorney General of British Columbia and Attorney General of Canada

Respondents

- and -

Attorney General of Ontario, Attorney General of Quebec, Attorney General of Nova Scotia, Attorney General of New Brunswick, Attorney General of Manitoba, Attorney General for Saskatchewan,

Attorney General of Alberta, Attorney General of Newfoundland and Labrador, Association in Defence of the Wrongly Convicted, David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights, British Columbia Civil Liberties Association, Canadian Civil Liberties Association, Criminal Lawyers' Association and Canadian Association of Crown Counsel
Intervenors

CORAM: McLachlin C.J. and LeBel, * Abella, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Wagner and Gascon JJ.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT: Moldaver J. (Abella, Wagner and Gascon JJ. concurring)
(paras. 1 to 100)

JOINT REASONS CONCURRING IN THE RESULT: McLachlin C.J. and Karakatsanis JJ.
(paras. 101 to 138)

* LeBel J. took no part in the judgment.

Henry v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 24, [2015] 2 S.C.R. 214

Ivan William Mervin Henry

Appellant

v.

Her Majesty The Queen in Right of the Province of British Columbia as represented by the Attorney General of British Columbia and Attorney General of Canada

Respondents

and

Attorney General of Ontario,
Attorney General of Quebec,
Attorney General of Nova Scotia,
Attorney General of New Brunswick,
Attorney General of Manitoba,
Attorney General for Saskatchewan,
Attorney General of Alberta,
Attorney General of Newfoundland and Labrador, Association in Defence of the Wrongly Convicted,

David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights,
British Columbia Civil Liberties Association,
Canadian Civil Liberties Association, Criminal Lawyers' Association and Canadian Association of Crown Counsel

Interveners

Indexed as: Henry v. British Columbia (Attorney General)

2015 SCC 24

File No.: 35745.

2014: November 13; 2015: May 1.

Present: McLachlin C.J. and LeBel,* Abella, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Wagner and Gascon JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Remedies — Damages — Civil action — Prosecutorial misconduct in criminal proceedings — Disclosure obligations of prosecutors — Wrongful non-disclosure — Malice — Claimant wrongfully convicted and incarcerated for almost 27 years — Claimant bringing civil action alleging breach of Charter rights resulting from Crown counsel's wrongful non-disclosure of relevant information — Damages under s. 24(1) sought against Crown — Whether s. 24(1) authorizes courts to award damages against Crown for wrongful non-disclosure — Level of fault claimant must establish to meet liability threshold for awarding s. 24(1) damages — Whether malice required — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 24(1).

H was convicted in 1983 of 10 sexual offences, declared a dangerous offender, and imprisoned for almost 27 years. In October 2010, the B.C. Court of Appeal quashed all 10 convictions and substituted acquittals for each, finding serious errors in the conduct of the trial and concluding that the guilty verdicts were unreasonable in light of the evidence as a whole. H brought a civil suit against the Attorney General of British Columbia (“AGBC”), seeking damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter for harm suffered as a consequence of his wrongful convictions and imprisonment.

H alleges that the Crown failed to make full disclosure of relevant information before, during, and after his trial. H made numerous requests for disclosure of all victim statements as well as medical and forensic reports. The Crown did not disclose any of the requested material before the commencement of trial. At trial, the Crown provided him with several victim statements, but approximately 30 additional statements were not disclosed. These statements revealed inconsistencies that could have been used to attack the already-suspect identification evidence put forward by the Crown. Key forensic evidence was also not disclosed. Furthermore, the Crown failed to disclose the existence of another suspect who had been arrested twice in the vicinity of the attacks.

In his Notice of Civil Claim, H pleaded various causes of action, including negligence, malicious prosecution, and breach of his ss. 7 and 11(d) Charter rights. The AGBC moved to strike the causes of action grounded in negligence and the Charter. The B.C. Supreme Court struck the negligence claim as inconsistent with this Court’s holding in Nelles v. Ontario, 1989 CanLII 77 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 170, but allowed H’s Charter claim to proceed since it was founded on allegations of malicious conduct. The court noted, however, that if H intended to pursue a Charter damages claim against the AGBC for conduct falling short of malice, he would have to seek leave to amend his pleadings. H applied for leave to amend his pleadings to claim Charter damages against the AGBC for non-malicious conduct. In permitting H to amend his claim accordingly, the application judge found that a threshold lower than malice should apply and that s. 24(1) damages awards are justified where the Crown’s conduct represents a marked and unacceptable departure from the reasonable standards expected of prosecutors. The Court of Appeal unanimously allowed the AGBC’s appeal, concluding that H was not entitled to seek Charter damages for the non-malicious acts and omissions of Crown counsel.

Held: The appeal should be allowed. Section 24\(1\) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms authorizes courts of competent jurisdiction to award damages against the Crown for prosecutorial misconduct absent proof of malice.

Per Abella, Moldaver, Wagner and Gascon JJ.: Where, as here, a claimant seeks Charter damages based on allegations that the Crown's failure to disclose violated his or her Charter rights, proof of malice is not required. Instead, a cause of action will lie where the Crown, in breach of its constitutional obligations, causes harm to the accused by intentionally withholding information when it knows, or would reasonably be expected to know, that the information is material to the defence and that the failure to disclose will likely impinge on the accused's ability to make full answer and defence. This represents a high threshold for a successful Charter damages claim, albeit one that is lower than malice. Only by keeping liability within strict bounds can a reasonable balance be struck between remedying serious rights violations and maintaining the efficient operation of our public prosecution system.

In Vancouver (City) v. Ward, 2010 SCC 27, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 28, this Court recognized that s. 24\(1\) of the Charter authorizes damage claims directed against the state for violations of the claimant's constitutional rights. The Chief Justice outlined a framework to determine the state's liability for Charter damages. Under this framework, the claimant must demonstrate that the state has breached one of his or her Charter rights and that an award of damages would serve a compensation, vindication, or deterrence function. Once that burden is met, the onus shifts to the state to rebut the claimant's case based on countervailing considerations.

The countervailing consideration at issue in this case relates to concerns over good governance. Ward recognizes that policy factors may justify restricting the state's exposure to civil liability by establishing a minimum threshold of gravity. If the threshold of gravity is set too low for a Charter damages claim alleging Crown misconduct, the ability of prosecutors to discharge their important public duties will be undermined, with adverse consequences for the administration of justice. Specifically, the spectre of liability may influence the decision-making of prosecutors and make them more "defensive" in their approach. A low threshold would also open up the floodgates of civil liability and force prosecutors to spend undue amounts of time and energy defending their conduct in court.

The AGBC submits that, to attract liability for Charter damages, the Crown's conduct must rise to the level of "malice". The malice standard has been extensively canvassed in this Court's malicious prosecution jurisprudence. Under the tort of malicious prosecution, a prosecutor will be liable for the decision to initiate or continue a prosecution against an individual without reasonable and probable cause, provided that such decision was characterized by malice. Malice requires more than recklessness or gross negligence. Rather, the plaintiff must demonstrate a willful and intentional effort on the Crown's part to abuse or distort its proper role within the criminal justice system. The malice standard will only be met in exceptional cases where the plaintiff can prove that a prosecutor's decision was driven by an improper purpose or motive, wholly inconsistent with Crown counsel's role as minister of justice.

There are several reasons why malice does not provide a useful liability threshold for Charter damages claims alleging wrongful non-disclosure by prosecutors. First, the malice standard is firmly rooted in the tort of malicious prosecution, which has a distinctive history and purpose. Second, malice requires an inquiry into whether the prosecutor was motivated by an improper purpose. Such an inquiry is apt when the impugned conduct is a highly discretionary decision such as the decision to initiate or continue a prosecution, because discretionary decision-making can best be evaluated by reference to the decision-maker's motives. However, the decision to disclose relevant information is not discretionary. It is a constitutional obligation which must be properly discharged by the Crown in accordance with an accused's Charter right to make full answer and defence. As such, the motives of the prosecutor in withholding information are immaterial. Third, unlike the decision to initiate or continue a prosecution, disclosure decisions do not fall within the core of prosecutorial discretion, and therefore do not warrant such an onerous threshold to insulate them from judicial scrutiny. Finally, a purposive approach to s. 24(1) militates against the malice standard.

While the malice standard is not directly applicable, the compelling good governance concerns raised in our malicious prosecution jurisprudence must be taken into account in determining the appropriate liability threshold for cases of wrongful non-disclosure. The liability threshold must ensure that Crown counsel will not be diverted from their important public duties by having to defend against a litany of civil claims. Moreover, a widespread “chilling effect” on the behaviour of prosecutors must be avoided. Therefore, the threshold must allow for strong claims to be heard on their merits, while guarding against a proliferation of marginal cases.

Good governance concerns mandate a high threshold that substantially limits the scope of liability. The standard adopted by the application judge, which is akin to gross negligence, does not provide sufficient limits. H submits that an even lower threshold — a simple breach of the Charter without any additional element of fault — should apply in this context. This approach fails to address the compelling policy and practical concerns that justify limiting prosecutorial liability. H alleges very serious instances of wrongful non-disclosure that demonstrate a shocking disregard for his Charter rights. His claim as pleaded meets the liability threshold established here. However, H’s exceptional case should not be used to justify a substantial expansion of prosecutorial liability.

Whether considered at the pleadings stage or at trial, the same formulation of the test applies. At trial, a claimant must convince the fact-finder on a balance of probabilities that (1) the prosecutor intentionally withheld information; (2) the prosecutor knew or ought reasonably to have known that the information was material to the defence and that the failure to disclose would likely impinge on his or her ability to make full answer and defence; (3) withholding the information violated his or her Charter rights; and (4) he or she suffered harm as a result. To withstand a motion to strike, a claimant would only need to plead facts which, taken as true, would be sufficient to support a finding on each of these elements.

The liability threshold focuses on two key elements: the prosecutor’s intent, and his or her actual or imputed knowledge. The purpose of these elements is not to shield prosecutors from liability by placing an undue burden on claimants to prove subjective mental states. Rather, they are designed to set a sufficiently high threshold to address good governance concerns while preserving a cause of action for serious instances of wrongful non-disclosure.

The consequences of setting a lower threshold in this context — simple negligence, or even the gross negligence standard adopted by the application judge — would be serious. This type of threshold implicates a duty of care paradigm that ignores the basic realities of conducting a criminal prosecution. The problems with a negligence-based standard are even more apparent when considering how this lower threshold would operate at the pleadings stage. It would be far too easy for a claimant with a weak claim to plead facts disclosing a cause of action for negligence and thus drive prosecutors into civil court. Bringing a Charter damages claim for prosecutorial misconduct should not be a mere exercise in artful pleading.

In addition to establishing a Charter breach and the requisite intent and knowledge, a claimant must prove that, as a result of the wrongful non-disclosure, he or she suffered a legally cognizable harm. Liability attaches to the Crown only upon a finding of “but for” causation. Regardless of the nature of the harm suffered, a claimant would have to prove, on a balance of probabilities, that “but for” the wrongful non-disclosure he or she would not have suffered that harm. The “but for” causation test may, however, be modified in situations involving multiple alleged wrongdoers.

H may seek to amend his pleadings to include a claim for Charter damages alleging that the Crown, in breach of its constitutional obligations, caused him harm by intentionally withholding information when it knew, or should reasonably have known, that the information was material to his defence and that the failure to disclose would likely impinge on his ability to make full answer and defence.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Karakatsanis J.: H need not allege that the Crown breached its constitutional obligation intentionally, or with malice, in order to access Charter damages. Applying the principles from Vancouver (City) v. Ward, 2010 SCC 27, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 28, to this case, H must plead facts that, if true, establish a breach of his Charter rights and that damages constitute an appropriate and just remedy to advance the purposes of compensation, vindication or deterrence. If proven at trial, the facts alleged by H would indisputably establish a breach of H's disclosure rights under s. 7 of the Charter, which had a direct and serious impact on the fairness of his trial. In these circumstances, an award of Charter damages under s. 24(1) may provide some compensation for the hardships H has endured and may also help publicly vindicate such a serious violation of the Charter rights the Crown is alleged to have breached. The objective of deterrence may also be served by an award of damages that highlights the need for the state to remain vigilant in meeting its constitutional obligations.

At step three of the Ward analysis, the government has an opportunity to advance any countervailing considerations that would make it inappropriate or unjust to award damages under s. 24(1). At the current stage of proceedings in this case, it is far from clear that there is an alternative remedy that will fulfill the functional objectives of Charter damages. As to good governance concerns, the second set of countervailing considerations discussed in Ward, those raised by the Attorney General of British Columbia are misplaced in this case. H's case does not involve the exercise of prosecutorial discretion in the usual sense of the term. The discretion to commence and pursue a prosecution is vital to the effective prosecution of criminal cases and claims can only be brought against prosecutors for misuse of this discretion if malice can be shown. The legal duty on the Crown to disclose relevant evidence, however, is not a discretionary function but a legal obligation. This obligation is absolute. The only discretion left to the prosecutor is a limited operational discretion relating to timing, relevance in borderline cases, privilege and protection of witness identity. An action for failure to disclose relevant evidence to the defence is different from an action for misuse of prosecutorial discretion in bringing or pursuing a prosecution. It is not an action for abuse of discretion, but an action for breach of a legal duty imposed on the state by the Charter. Recognizing H's claim will not chill the exercise of prosecutorial discretion, nor will it change the high standard of malice for tort actions for misuse of prosecutorial discretion, or divert prosecutors from their day-to-day work.

H should be allowed to amend his pleadings to include a claim for Charter damages based on a breach by the Crown of its constitutional obligation to disclose relevant information. On the facts as pleaded, Charter damages would be an appropriate and just remedy, serving one or more of the functions of compensation, vindication and deterrence.

Cases Cited

By Moldaver J.

Referred to: Nelles v. Ontario, 1989 CanLII 77 \(SCC\), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 170; Vancouver (City) v. Ward, 2010 SCC 27, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 28; R. v. 974649 Ontario Inc., 2001 SCC 81, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 575; Proulx v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2001 SCC 66, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 9; Miazga v. Kvello Estate, 2009 SCC 51, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 339; Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance), 2002 SCC 13, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 405; R. v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2011 SCC 42, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 45; R. v. Anderson, 2014 SCC 41, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 167; Krieger v. Law Society of Alberta, 2002 SCC 65, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 372; R. v. Babos, 2014 SCC 16, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 309; R. v. Nixon, 2011 SCC 34, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 566; R. v. Stinchcombe, 1991 CanLII 45 \(SCC\), [1991] 3 S.C.R. 326; R. v. Mills, 1999 CanLII 637 \(SCC\), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 668; Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3; Elguzouli-Daf v. Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, [1995] Q.B. 335; R. v. Walle, 2012 SCC 41, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 438; R. v. Daley, 2007 SCC 53, [2007] 3 S.C.R. 523; R. v. McNeil, 2009 SCC 3, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 66; R. v. B. (L.) (1997), 1997 CanLII 3187 \(ON CA\), 35 O.R. (3d) 35; Hill v. Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police Services Board, 2007 SCC 41, [2007] 3 S.C.R. 129; Clements v. Clements, 2012 SCC 32, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 181.

By McLachlin C.J. and Karakatsanis J.

Applied: Vancouver (City) v. Ward, 2010 SCC 27, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 28; referred to: R. v. Gamble, 1988 CanLII 15 \(SCC\), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 595; Mills v. The Queen, 1986 CanLII 17 \(SCC\), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863; Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance), 2002 SCC 13, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 405; Nelles v. Ontario, 1989 CanLII 77 \(SCC\), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 170; Miazga v. Kvello Estate, 2009 SCC 51, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 339; R. v. Stinchcombe, 1991 CanLII 45 \(SCC\), [1991] 3

S.C.R. 326; R. v. McNeil, 2009 SCC 3, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 66; Saskatchewan Federation of Labour v. Saskatchewan, 2015 SCC 4, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 401.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 7, 11\(d\), 24\(1\).

Constitution Act, 1982, s. 52.

International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 999 U.N.T.S. 171, art. 14(6).

Authors Cited

Roach, Kent. “A Promising Late Spring for Charter Damages: Ward v. Vancouver” (2011), 29 N.J.C.L. 135.

APPEAL from a judgment of the British Columbia Court of Appeal (Hall, MacKenzie and Stromberg-Stein JJ.A.), 2014 BCCA 15, 53 B.C.L.R. (5th) 262, 349 B.C.A.C. 175, 596 W.A.C. 175, 370 D.L.R. (4th) 742, 6 C.C.L.T. (4th) 175, 299 C.R.R. (2d) 35, 8 C.R. (7th) 108, [2014] 3 W.W.R. 231, [2014] B.C.J. No. 71 (QL), 2014 CarswellBC 100 (WL Can.), setting aside a decision of Goepel J., 2013 BCSC 665, 47 B.C.L.R. (5th) 335, 359 D.L.R. (4th) 171, 100 C.C.L.T. (3d) 298, 281 C.R.R. (2d) 24, [2013] 8 W.W.R. 518, [2013] B.C.J. No. 769 (QL), 2013 CarswellBC 990 (WL Can.). Appeal allowed.

Joseph J. Arvay, Q.C., Alison Latimer, Marilyn Sandford and Cameron Ward, for the appellant.

Peter Juk, Q.C., Karen A. Horsman and E. W. (Heidi) Hughes, for the respondent Her Majesty The Queen in Right of the Province of British Columbia as represented by the Attorney General of British Columbia.

Mitchell R. Taylor, Q.C., and Diba B. Majzub, for the respondent the Attorney General of Canada.

Hart Schwartz and Matthew Horner, for the intervener the Attorney General of Ontario.

Michel Déom and Amélie Dion, for the intervener the Attorney General of Quebec.

James A. Gumpert, Q.C., for the intervener the Attorney General of Nova Scotia.

Gaétan Migneault and Kathryn Gregory, for the intervener the Attorney General of New Brunswick.

Michael Conner and Denis Guénette, for the intervener the Attorney General of Manitoba.

Graeme Mitchell, Q.C., for the intervener the Attorney General for Saskatchewan.

Jolaine Antonio and Kate Bridgett, for the intervener the Attorney General of Alberta.

Frances Knickle and Philip Osborne, for the intervener the Attorney General of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Sean Dewart and Tim Gleason, for the intervener the Association in Defence of the Wrongly Convicted.

Marlys A. Edwardh and Frances Mahon, for the interveners the David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights and the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association.

Bradley E. Berg, Erin Hoult and Nickolas Tzoulas, for the intervener the Canadian Civil Liberties Association.

Richard Macklin, Breese Davies and Neil G. Wilson, for the intervener the Criminal Lawyers' Association.

Written submissions only by Paul J. J. Cavalluzzo and Adrienne Telford, for the intervener the Canadian Association of Crown Counsel.

The judgment of Abella, Moldaver, Wagner and Gascon JJ. was delivered by

MOLDAVER J. —

I. Overview

[1] Ivan Henry was convicted in March 1983 of 10 sexual offences involving 8 different complainants. He was declared a dangerous offender and sentenced to an indefinite period of incarceration. He remained imprisoned for almost 27 years. In October 2010, the British Columbia Court of Appeal quashed all 10 convictions and substituted acquittals for each, finding serious errors in the conduct of the trial and concluding that the guilty verdicts were unreasonable in light of the evidence as a whole: R. v. Henry, 2010 BCCA 462, 294 B.C.A.C. 96 (“Henry No. 1”), at para. 154.

[2] Mr. Henry brought a civil suit against the City of Vancouver (“City”), the Attorney General of British Columbia (“AGBC”), and the Attorney General of Canada (“AGC”), seeking damages for his wrongful convictions and imprisonment. The claims against the City and the AGC are not at issue in this appeal. We are concerned only with the claim against the AGBC for damages under s. 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Specifically, Mr. Henry alleges that the provincial Crown should be held liable for its failure — before, during, and after his criminal trial — to meet its disclosure obligations under the Charter. The sole question before us is the level of fault that Mr. Henry must establish to sustain a cause of action against the AGBC in these circumstances.

II. Factual Background

[3] This appeal arises from proposed amendments to the pleadings in Mr. Henry's civil case. Because this case is at the pleadings stage, the allegations of prosecutorial misconduct made by Mr. Henry — including those recited in this factual background — must be accepted as true.

A. Mr. Henry's 1983 Convictions

[4] From November 1980 to June 1982, a series of sexual assaults occurred in Vancouver. The perpetrator of each assault used a similar modus operandi: he targeted female victims who were alone at night in certain neighbourhoods, threatening them with a knife and covering their heads with a pillow or pillowcase. In many of the cases, the perpetrator told the victim that he had been “ripped off” and was owed money by someone who supposedly lived at the victim's residence: Henry No. 1, at para. 11. After investigation, Vancouver Police concluded that a single perpetrator was responsible for the attacks.

[5] Donald McRae lived in Mount Pleasant, one of the Vancouver neighbourhoods in which the assaults took place. In the spring of 1981, Mr. McRae was placed under police surveillance as a suspect, but was not arrested in connection with the attacks. In March 1982, Mr. Henry moved to a house in the same city block as Mr. McRae.

[6] Police came to regard Mr. Henry as a suspect, and he was arrested in May 1982. He was taken to the police station and forced to participate against his will in an identification line-up. When Mr. Henry refused to cooperate, an officer held him in a headlock to keep his head up so it could be seen by the complainants viewing the line-up. Some of the victims identified Mr. Henry as the perpetrator, but others did not, and the police decided to release him after these inconclusive results.

[7] Five days after Mr. Henry's arrest and release, Mr. McRae was arrested and charged with trespass by night for prowling outside a residence several blocks away from the locations of two of the previous assaults. Two months later, Mr. McRae was again arrested and charged with breaking and entering and theft at a residence six blocks away from one of the previous sexual assaults.

[8] Mr. Henry was re-arrested in July 1982, after the victim of a June attack made an identification from an array of photographs shown to her by the police. The photograph of Mr. Henry pictured him standing in front of a jail cell, with the arm of a uniformed officer visible in front of him. None of the six "foils" were photographed in this manner, and all six differed significantly from Mr. Henry in terms of age, hair style, and facial hair.

[9] Mr. Henry was charged with 17 offences, although only 10 of these ultimately proceeded to trial. He initially had legal representation, and made numerous requests for disclosure of all victim statements as well as medical and forensic reports. Despite these requests, the Crown did not disclose any of the requested material before the commencement of trial.

[10] Mr. Henry represented himself at trial. There was no reliable out-of-court identification suggesting he was the perpetrator, no evidence linking him to any of the victims, and no physical evidence placing him at any of the crime scenes. The Crown's entire case rested on in-court identifications of Mr. Henry by the complainants.

[11] At the outset of his trial, Mr. Henry again requested disclosure of all victim statements. The Crown provided him with 11 statements made by the 8 trial complainants. However, approximately 30 additional statements made by the complainants were not disclosed, including those contained in the notes of the original crime scene investigators. These statements revealed inconsistencies that could have been used to attack the already-suspect identification evidence put forward by the Crown.

[12] Furthermore, key forensic evidence was not disclosed. Investigators had recovered sperm from several of the crime scenes that could have been used to include or exclude a suspect based on blood type, yet this evidence was never brought to Mr. Henry's attention. The Crown also failed to disclose that Mr. McRae had been considered a suspect, and had been arrested twice in the vicinity of the attacks.

[13] At the conclusion of his trial, a jury convicted Mr. Henry on all 10 charges. He was declared a dangerous offender and sentenced to an indefinite period of incarceration.

B. Mr. Henry's Initial Appeal Efforts

[14] Mr. Henry's initial appeal to the British Columbia Court of Appeal was dismissed for want of prosecution because of his failure to file trial transcripts and appeal books. His application for leave to appeal to this Court was denied, [1984] 1 S.C.R. viii, as were several subsequent habeas corpus applications and a 1997 application to appoint counsel and reopen his appeal.

[15] In total, between 1984 and 2006, Mr. Henry filed more than 50 applications in different courts and with the federal Crown seeking to have his convictions reviewed, while continuing to seek disclosure relating to his case.

C. Project Smallman and the Unsolved Sexual Assaults

[16] Between November 1982 and July 1988, more than 25 sexual assaults occurred in close geographic proximity to the assaults for which Mr. Henry was convicted. These additional assaults bore similar hallmarks to those attributed to Mr. Henry. However, he could not have been the perpetrator, as he was in custody during this period. These ongoing assaults were not disclosed to him.

[17] In 2002, as part of an effort designated "Project Smallman", Vancouver Police reopened investigations into a number of unsolved sexual assaults committed between 1983 and 1988 that they believed were carried out by a single perpetrator. DNA evidence linked Mr. McRae to three of the assaults, and he pleaded guilty to these offences in May 2005.

[18] The similarity in both geography and modus operandi between these subsequent assaults and the assaults for which Mr. Henry was convicted led the provincial Crown to appoint an independent investigator to review Mr. Henry's convictions. On the recommendation of this investigator, the provincial Crown provided full disclosure to Mr. Henry, including information gathered during the initial police investigation that should have been disclosed at trial and information subsequently discovered during Project Smallman. Mr. Henry successfully applied to reopen his appeal and was released on bail pending a hearing on the merits. The application was unopposed by the Crown, based on the recommendation of the independent investigator.

D. Mr. Henry's Appeal and Acquittals

[19] In Henry No. 1, the British Columbia Court of Appeal considered Mr. Henry's appeal on the merits for the first time. In October 2010, Low J.A., for a unanimous court, found significant errors in the trial judge's jury instructions. He also found that the charges should have been severed, and a mistrial declared, after the Crown abandoned its submission that the evidence on each count should be treated as similar fact evidence. These errors would have been sufficient for Low J.A. to order a new trial. However, he also held that the evidence as a whole was incapable of proving identification, and the verdicts were therefore unreasonable. As a result, he substituted acquittals for each of Mr. Henry's 10 convictions.

E. Mr. Henry's Civil Claims

[20] Mr. Henry filed a civil action in June 2011, seeking damages against the City, the AGBC, and the AGC for harm suffered as a consequence of his wrongful convictions and incarceration. His claim against the City relates to the investigation of the crimes for which he was convicted, and the failure of the Vancouver Police to inform Crown counsel of the subsequent offences that were later re-investigated as part of Project Smallman. His claim against the AGC relates to the denial of his various applications for review of his convictions. As indicated, these claims are not at issue in this appeal.

[21] Mr. Henry's claim against the AGBC alleges that the Crown failed to make full disclosure of relevant information before and during his trial, and in subsequent proceedings. In his Notice of Civil Claim, he pleaded various causes of action: negligence, malicious prosecution, misfeasance in public office, abuse of process, and breach of his ss. 7 and 11(d) Charter rights. The AGBC moved to strike Mr. Henry's causes of action grounded in negligence and the Charter. In September 2012, Goepel J. of the British Columbia Supreme Court struck the negligence claim as inconsistent with this Court's holding in Nelles v. Ontario, 1989 CanLII 77 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 170; Henry v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2012 BCSC 1401 ("Henry No. 2"), at paras. 43-60. Goepel J. allowed Mr. Henry's Charter claim to proceed since it was founded on allegations of malicious conduct. However, he noted that, if Mr. Henry intended to pursue a Charter damages claim against the AGBC for conduct falling short of malice, he would have to seek leave to amend his pleadings (paras. 61-72).

III. Judgments Below

A. British Columbia Supreme Court, 2013 BCSC 665, 47 B.C.L.R. (5th) 335 (Goepel J.)

[22] Following the decision in Henry No. 2, Mr. Henry applied to amend his pleadings to claim Charter damages against the AGBC for non-malicious conduct. The AGBC opposed this application, arguing that a claim for Charter damages grounded in alleged prosecutorial misconduct requires proof of malice. The application judge rejected this submission.

[23] Goepel J. held that the case law on malicious prosecution is not dispositive of the required threshold. Relying on this Court's seminal decision on Charter damages in Vancouver (City) v. Ward, 2010 SCC 27, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 28, he observed that s. 24(1) affords courts a broad discretion to craft appropriate remedies, and that this discretion should not be limited "by casting it in a strait-jacket of judicially prescribed conditions" (para. 28, quoting Ward, at para. 18). However, he recognized that it may be necessary, as a matter of policy, for courts to mandate a minimum threshold of liability for a successful Charter damages claim.

[24] In Mr. Henry's case, Goepel J. found that there were competing policy considerations that must be weighed in arriving at the appropriate threshold. He determined that a threshold lower than malice should apply — namely, the standard for awarding costs in criminal proceedings for Charter breaches. Referring to this Court's decision in R. v. 974649 Ontario Inc., 2001 SCC 81, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 575 (“Dunedin”), he noted that costs awards made under s. 24(1) in criminal proceedings are only justified in limited circumstances where the Crown's conduct represents a marked and unacceptable departure from the reasonable standards expected of prosecutors. Goepel J. thus permitted Mr. Henry to amend his Notice of Civil Claim in accordance with this threshold.

B. British Columbia Court of Appeal, 2014 BCCA 15, 53 B.C.L.R. (5th) 262 (Hall J.A., MacKenzie and Stromberg-Stein J.J.A., Concurring)

[25] The Court of Appeal unanimously allowed the AGBC's appeal, concluding that Mr. Henry was not entitled to seek Charter damages for the non-malicious acts and omissions of Crown counsel.

[26] Speaking for the court, Hall J.A. relied heavily on this Court's “trilogy” of malicious prosecution cases — Nelles, Proulx v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2001 SCC 66, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 9, and Miazga v. Kvello Estate, 2009 SCC 51, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 339. He noted that, in Nelles, this Court rejected an absolute immunity for Crown counsel, and preserved a right to pursue civil damages against a prosecutor who acts intentionally to subvert justice. Referring to Proulx, he observed that “malicious prosecution can be an efficacious remedy to one harmed by prosecutorial misconduct” (para. 23).

[27] In the same vein, Hall J.A. determined that making Charter damages available to compensate for malicious acts and omissions of prosecutors would offer plaintiffs an effective recourse for Charter violations, but he was not prepared to go further. In his view, the application judge erred in adopting the lower standard of fault developed in criminal cases where costs were awarded. That standard — a marked and unacceptable departure from the reasonable standards expected of Crown counsel — was akin to gross negligence and would result in “a new head of liability against prosecutors” (para. 20).

[28] Hall J.A. rejected the view that Ward altered the parameters of civil liability for prosecutors. He underscored the fact that, in Ward, this Court recognized that good governance considerations can militate against Charter damages awards, and that existing causes of action in private law may provide the appropriate liability threshold in a particular context.

[29] Hall J.A. concluded that he was bound by this Court’s jurisprudence on the scope of civil liability for prosecutors, and therefore the malice threshold was applicable. In his view, “it would be an unwarranted extension of the language in Ward to find that the Supreme Court of Canada was altering the principles set forth in Nelles and Miazga” (para. 29). To the extent that prosecutorial liability ought to be expanded to include claims of negligence, it should be done by the legislature or a court of last resort. Accordingly, Hall J.A. allowed the appeal and dismissed Mr. Henry’s application to amend his pleadings.

IV. Analysis

A. Overview of the Charter Damages Threshold for Wrongful Non-disclosure by Prosecutors

[30] A constitutional question is posed in this case:

Does s. 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms authorize a court of competent jurisdiction to award damages against the Crown for prosecutorial misconduct absent proof of malice?

[31] In the context of Mr. Henry’s claims, I would answer this question in the affirmative. Where a claimant seeks Charter damages based on allegations that the Crown’s failure to disclose violated his or her Charter rights, proof of malice is not required. Instead, a cause of action will lie where the Crown, in breach of its constitutional obligations, causes harm to the accused by intentionally withholding information when it knows, or would reasonably be expected to know, that the information is material to the defence and that the failure to disclose will likely impinge on the accused's ability to make full answer and defence. This represents a high threshold for a successful Charter damages claim, albeit one that is lower than malice.

[32] I will discuss the legal basis and precise scope of this threshold in greater detail below. Briefly, it recognizes that while malice does not provide a useful or workable framework for dealing with allegations of wrongful non-disclosure by prosecutors, the policy underpinnings of this Court's malicious prosecution jurisprudence inform the proper scope of Crown liability for Charter damages in this context.

[33] I emphasize "this context" because, in my view, it is neither prudent nor necessary to decide whether a similar threshold would apply in circumstances not involving wrongful non-disclosure. Mr. Henry's claim against the AGBC is rooted in allegations that Crown counsel failed to disclose certain relevant information. It would be unwise to speculate about other types of prosecutorial misconduct that might violate the Charter, or to fix a blanket threshold that governs all such claims against the Crown. The threshold established in this case may well offer guidance in setting the applicable threshold for other types of misconduct, but the prudent course of action is to address new situations in future cases as they arise, with the benefit of a factual record and submissions.

B. Ward Provides the Governing Legal Framework

[34] Under s. 24(1) of the Charter,

[a]nyone whose rights or freedoms . . . have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

In Ward, this Court recognized that the language of s. 24(1) is broad enough to encompass damage claims for Charter breaches. Such claims are brought by an individual as a public law action directed against the state for violations of the claimant's constitutional rights.

[35] Charter damages are a powerful tool that can provide a meaningful response to rights violations. They also represent an evolving area of the law that must be allowed to “develop incrementally”: Ward, at para. 21. When defining the circumstances in which a Charter damages award would be appropriate and just, courts must therefore be careful not to stifle the emergence and development of this important remedy.

[36] However, Charter damages are not a silver bullet. They are just one of many remedies that may be available to individuals whose Charter rights have been breached, and their availability is not without limit. In Ward, the Chief Justice outlined a four-step framework to determine the state's liability for Charter damages:

The first step in the inquiry is to establish that a Charter right has been breached. The second step is to show why damages are a just and appropriate remedy, having regard to whether they would fulfill one or more of the related functions of compensation, vindication of the right, and/or deterrence of future breaches. At the third step, the state has the opportunity to demonstrate, if it can, that countervailing factors defeat the functional considerations that support a damage award and render damages inappropriate or unjust. The final step is to assess the quantum of the damages. [para. 4]

[37] Under this framework, the claimant bears the initial burden of making out a prima facie case. The claimant must demonstrate that the state has breached one of his or her Charter rights and that an award of damages would serve a compensation, vindication, or deterrence function. Once that burden is met, the onus shifts to the state to rebut the claimant's case based on countervailing considerations. The Chief Justice identified two important countervailing considerations, while maintaining that a “complete catalogue” of such considerations would be elaborated over time: Ward, at para. 33.

[38] The first countervailing consideration is the existence of alternative remedies. Section 24(1) is a broad remedial provision that provides a range of responses to Charter violations beyond a monetary award. In addition, there may be substantial overlap between private law and s. 24(1) actions against the government. Where the state can show that another remedy is available to effectively address a Charter breach — whether under the Charter or in private law — a damages claim may be defeated at the third step of Ward. For instance, if a declaration of a Charter breach would adequately achieve the objectives that would otherwise be served by a damages award, then granting damages as well as a declaration would be superfluous, and therefore inappropriate and unjust in the circumstances: Ward, at para. 37.

[39] The second countervailing consideration — and the one at issue in this case — relates to concerns over good governance. Ward does not define the phrase “[g]ood governance concerns” (para. 38), but it serves as a compendious term for the policy factors that will justify restricting the state’s exposure to civil liability. As the Chief Justice observed:

In some situations, . . . the state may establish that an award of Charter damages would interfere with good governance such that damages should not be awarded unless the state conduct meets a minimum threshold of gravity. [Emphasis added; para. 39.]

This is precisely what the AGBC, the AGC, and the numerous intervening Attorneys General argue in this case. There is a common theme driving their submissions: if the threshold of gravity is set too low for a Charter damages claim alleging Crown misconduct, the ability of prosecutors to discharge their important public duties will be undermined, with adverse consequences for the administration of justice.

[40] This theme finds expression in a number of specific policy concerns. For example, the Attorneys General argue that the spectre of liability may influence the decision-making of prosecutors and make them more “defensive” in their approach. The public interest is not well served when Crown counsel are motivated by fear of civil liability, rather than their sworn duty to fairly and effectively prosecute crime. By the same token, the Attorneys General suggest that a low threshold would open up the floodgates of civil liability and force prosecutors to spend undue amounts of time and energy defending their conduct in court instead of performing their duties.

[41] As I will explain, these concerns are very real, and they provide compelling reasons why the availability of Charter damages should be circumscribed through the establishment of a high threshold.

[42] Ward provides an example of a prior case where a heightened per se liability threshold was justified by policy reasons. In Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance), 2002 SCC 13, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 405, this Court held that Charter damages were unavailable for state action taken pursuant to a law, considered valid at the time but later declared invalid, unless the state action was “clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power” (para. 78). In other words, state actors were afforded a limited immunity for actions taken in good faith under a law they believed to be valid. Citing Mackin, the Chief Justice in Ward noted that, “absent threshold misconduct”, no cause of action for Charter damages will lie in these circumstances (para. 39).

[43] When a heightened per se liability threshold has been imposed, this will have consequences at the pleadings stage. To survive a motion to strike, a claimant must plead sufficient facts to disclose a reasonable cause of action: see R. v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2011 SCC 42, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 45. If the alleged Charter violation occurs in a context where courts have imposed a heightened per se liability threshold, the claimant must particularize facts that, if proven, would be sufficient to establish that the state conduct met the required threshold of gravity. The failure to do so will be fatal to the claim. With these principles in mind, I turn to the applicable threshold for wrongful non-disclosure by prosecutors.

C. Establishing the Charter Damages Threshold for Wrongful Non-disclosure by Prosecutors

(1) “Malice” Does Not Offer a Useful Liability Threshold for Wrongful Non-disclosure by Prosecutors

[44] The AGBC, the AGC, and the intervening Attorneys General unanimously submit that the Crown’s conduct must rise to the level of “malice” — as defined in the tort of malicious prosecution — to attract liability for Charter damages. I do not agree. As I will explain, the malice standard is ill suited to the task of adjudicating allegations of wrongful non-disclosure.

(a) The Malice Standard Articulated in the Malicious Prosecution Jurisprudence

[45] The malice standard has been extensively canvassed in this Court’s malicious prosecution trilogy — Nelles, Proulx, and Miazga. In Nelles, the Court ruled that Crown prosecutors do not enjoy absolute immunity from civil claims. Lamer J. (as he then was) held that policy considerations favour only a qualified immunity, and that Crown prosecutors are not shielded from claims of malicious prosecution. He outlined the four necessary elements of the malicious prosecution tort as follows: (1) legal proceedings “must have been initiated by the defendant”; (2) those proceedings “must have terminated in favour of the plaintiff”; (3) the defendant did not have “reasonable and probable cause” to initiate the proceedings; and (4) the defendant’s conduct was characterized by “malice, or a primary purpose other than that of carrying the law into effect” (pp. 192-93).

[46] This final element was described by Lamer J. in the following terms:

The required element of malice is for all intents, the equivalent of “improper purpose”. It has . . . a “wider meaning than spite, ill-will, or a spirit of vengeance, and includes any other improper purpose, such as to gain a private collateral advantage” To succeed in an action for malicious prosecution against the Attorney General or Crown Attorney, the plaintiff would have to prove both the absence of reasonable and probable cause in commencing the prosecution, and malice in the form of a deliberate and improper use of the office of the Attorney General or Crown Attorney, a use inconsistent with the status of “minister of justice”. In my view this burden on the plaintiff amounts to a requirement that the Attorney General or Crown Attorney perpetrated a fraud on the process of criminal justice and in doing so has perverted or abused his office and the process of criminal justice. [Emphasis in original; citation omitted.]

(Nelles, at pp. 193-94)

[47] In Proulx, the Court applied this standard in the Quebec civil law context. Iacobucci and Binnie JJ. affirmed that malice requires “more than recklessness or gross negligence” (para. 35). Rather, the plaintiff must demonstrate “a willful and intentional effort on the Crown’s part to abuse or distort its proper role within the criminal justice system” (ibid.). Proulx was a case where the plaintiff was successful in proving malice on “highly exceptional” facts (para. 44). Iacobucci and Binnie JJ. found that the Crown made “an active effort to obtain a conviction at any price” by misleading the court, and thus stepped out of its proper role as minister of justice (paras. 41 and 45). Furthermore, the prosecutor’s actions were motivated by an improper purpose since he allowed his office to be used to the ends of a private individual. Given these circumstances, his conduct amounted to “an abuse of prosecutorial power” that crossed the boundary set out in Nelles (paras. 44-45).

[48] Miazga is this Court’s most recent decision involving the tort of malicious prosecution, in which Charron J. reiterated that “malice in the form of improper purpose is the key to proving malicious prosecution” (para. 8). This high standard was, in her view, justified by the need to give prosecutors a sphere of independence from judicial scrutiny:

It is readily apparent from its constituent elements that the tort of malicious prosecution targets the decision to initiate or continue with a criminal prosecution. When taken by a Crown prosecutor, this decision is one of the “core elements” of prosecutorial discretion, thus lying “beyond the legitimate reach of the court” under the constitutionally entrenched principle of independence [Citation omitted; para. 6.]

[49] It is a bedrock principle that the exercise of core prosecutorial discretion is immune from judicial review, subject only to the doctrine of abuse of process: see R. v. Anderson, 2014 SCC 41, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 167, at para. 48; Krieger v. Law Society of Alberta, 2002 SCC 65, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 372, at para. 32. Abuse of process may be found where the Crown’s conduct “shocks the community’s conscience” or “offends its sense of fair play and decency”: R. v. Babos, 2014 SCC 16, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 309, at para. 41. The presence of bad faith and improper motives may indicate this type of conduct: see R. v. Nixon, 2011 SCC 34, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 566, at para. 68; Anderson, at para. 49.

[50] Seen in this light, the malice standard under the tort of malicious prosecution generally operates as an analogue in private law to the doctrine of abuse of process. The link between these two standards was made clear in Miazga:

Where an accused is wrongly prosecuted as a result of the prosecutor's abusive actions, he or she may bring an action in malicious prosecution. Like the test for abuse of process, however, there is a stringent standard that must be met before a finding of liability will be made, in order to ensure that courts do not simply engage in the second-guessing of decisions made pursuant to a Crown's prosecutorial discretion. [Emphasis added; para. 49.]

In highlighting this link, I should be clear that malice and abuse of process are distinct standards that have their respective areas of application in private and public law. That said, they have a similar purpose: they are high standards deliberately designed to capture only very serious conduct that undermines the integrity of the judicial process. By preserving this high bar for judicial intervention, the exercise of prosecutorial discretion can be properly protected.

[51] It is evident that the malice standard will only be met in exceptional cases where the plaintiff can prove, on a balance of probabilities, that a prosecutor's decision to initiate or continue a prosecution was driven by an improper purpose or motive. To be improper, that purpose or motive must be wholly inconsistent with Crown counsel's role as minister of justice. Miazga makes this point abundantly clear. As Charron J. observed, "[m]alice requires a plaintiff to prove that the prosecutor wilfully perverted or abused the office of the Attorney General or the process of criminal justice" (para. 80 (emphasis in original)). She went on to emphasize that conduct merely reflecting "incompetence, inexperience, poor judgment, lack of professionalism, laziness, recklessness, honest mistake, negligence, or even gross negligence" will necessarily fall short (para. 81 (emphasis added)).

(b) The Malice Standard is Not Applicable to Claims for Charter Damages Alleging Wrongful Non-disclosure

[52] The Attorneys General advance several arguments in favour of imposing malice as the liability threshold necessary to sustain a Charter damages award in this case. These arguments effectively boil down to a single core submission: the balancing of policy factors in Nelles — which led this Court to establish a qualified immunity shielding prosecutors from tort liability absent a showing of malice — is also dispositive here. Indeed, the heart of the AGBC’s submission is that “the specific cause of action alleged is immaterial to the policy rationale which underlies the immunity” (R.F., at para. 38). In other words, it is irrelevant that the claim at issue is brought under s. 24(1) of the Charter. If the qualified immunity in Nelles is to be effective, it must be treated as a general principle of law that applies equally to a claim for Charter damages as it does to an action in tort (ibid., at paras. 69-71).

[53] The AGBC makes a number of points in support of this submission. First, it argues that Nelles “assumed that an immunity rule would equally apply to a claim for Charter damages”, and that “this was one of the considerations that led the Court to reject absolute immunity” in favour of a qualified immunity based on malice (R.F., at para. 60). In support of this assertion, it cites the following passage from Nelles:

Granting an absolute immunity to prosecutors is akin to granting a license to subvert individual rights. Not only does absolute immunity negate a private right of action, but in addition, it seems to me, it may be that it would effectively bar the seeking of a remedy pursuant to s. 24(1) of the Charter. [p. 195]

According to the AGBC, the choice of a qualified rather than absolute immunity was meant to preserve the availability of damages in tort and under the Charter, and it is therefore implicit in Nelles that the liability threshold required in relation to tort actions would necessarily extend to s. 24(1) claims.

[54] Second, the AGBC emphasizes that Ward expressly connected the availability of Charter damages for prosecutorial misconduct to the tort of malicious prosecution:

Different situations may call for different thresholds, as is the case at private law. Malicious prosecution, for example, requires that “malice” be proven because of the highly discretionary and quasi-judicial role of prosecutors When appropriate, private law thresholds and defences may offer guidance in determining whether s. 24(1) damages would be “appropriate and just”. While the threshold for liability under the Charter must be distinct and autonomous from that developed under private law, the existing causes of action against state actors embody a certain amount of “practical wisdom” concerning the type of situation in which it is or is not appropriate to make an award of damages against the state.

(Ward, at para. 43)

The AGBC argues that the malice standard established in Nelles and elaborated in Proulx and Miazga has withstood the test of time, and is a sound and workable standard for civil claims against prosecutors. It embodies “practical wisdom” and represents a “careful balance” of competing concerns — on the one hand, “the need to ensure that the common law is responsive to claims of wrongful prosecution”, and on the other, the “the powerful policy considerations that support the existence of a qualified immunity” (R.F., at para. 72). In the AGBC’s view, there is no reason to depart from this careful balance when a claim alleging prosecutorial misconduct is framed as a claim for Charter damages under s. 24(1). While liability thresholds developed under the Charter are intended to be distinct from those in private law, it does not follow that common law immunities should simply be abandoned in the face of a Charter damages claim.

[55] Third, the AGBC argues that exempting s. 24(1) claims from the malice standard would have adverse consequences. If a claimant can prevail on a lower liability threshold in a Charter damages claim than under a related common law tort, the qualified immunity will lose much of its force and the careful balance of policy factors struck in Nelles will be destabilized.

[56] With respect, I do not find these points persuasive. In my view, Nelles and its progeny are not dispositive in this case, and malice does not provide a useful liability threshold for Charter damages claims alleging wrongful non-disclosure by prosecutors. I come to this conclusion for several reasons.

[57] First, the malice standard is firmly rooted in the tort of malicious prosecution, which has a distinctive history and purpose. The tort is a judicial creation of the 18th century, when prosecutions were carried out by private litigants: Miazga, at para. 42. This historical peculiarity should give us pause when we are called upon to transplant elements of this tort into new contexts far beyond those envisioned at the time of its creation. As Charron J. warned in Miazga:

Given that the tort of malicious prosecution predates the development of our contemporary system of public prosecutions, courts must take care not to simply transpose the principles established in suits between private parties to cases involving Crown defendants without necessary modification. [para. 44]

[58] Second, the purpose of the malicious prosecution tort must be kept in mind in determining whether to expand the reach of the malice standard. Recall that the wrongdoing targeted by this tort is the decision to initiate or continue an improperly motivated prosecution. In contrast, the alleged wrongdoing at issue in this case is markedly different — the Crown’s failure to discharge its constitutional obligations to disclose relevant information to Mr. Henry.

[59] The malice standard translates awkwardly into cases where the alleged misconduct is wrongful non-disclosure. Malice requires a showing of improper purpose on the part of the prosecutor. This “improper purpose” inquiry is apt when the impugned conduct is a highly discretionary decision such as the decision to initiate or continue a prosecution, because discretionary decision-making can best be evaluated by reference to the decision-maker’s motives. Unlike the decision to initiate or continue a prosecution, the decision to disclose relevant information is not discretionary. Rather, disclosure is a constitutional obligation which must be properly discharged by the Crown in accordance with an accused’s right to make full answer and defence, as guaranteed under ss. 7 and 11(d) of the Charter: see R. v. Stinchcombe, 1991 CanLII 45 (SCC), [1991] 3 S.C.R. 326, at p. 336; R. v. Mills, 1999 CanLII 637 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 668, at para. 5.

[60] I readily acknowledge that disclosure decisions often involve difficult judgment calls. As the intervener Attorney General of Ontario observes, disclosure decisions may require consideration of numerous factors, such as whether the information is subject to special protections for sexual assault complainants, special considerations concerning highly sensitive material, or one of the various privileges that attach to information obtained in the course of a criminal prosecution. Even the basic question of relevance may be difficult to assess before the Crown is made aware of the defence theory of the case, and where disclosure requests are not explained or particularized.

Furthermore, disclosure obligations are ongoing, which requires prosecutors to continuously evaluate the information in their possession.

[61] However, while I recognize that disclosure decisions pose challenges for prosecutors, they do not implicate the high degree of discretion involved in the decision to initiate or continue a prosecution. As described in Crown policy manuals throughout the country, the decision to lay charges is governed by two primary factors: first, whether there is a reasonable prospect of conviction and second, whether the prosecution would be in the public interest. Manifestly, the “public interest” factor puts substantial discretion in the hands of Crown counsel. That discretion gives prosecutors such a high degree of latitude that the only plausible way to contest it is to assess the underlying motives. No such discretion exists in the disclosure context, and it is therefore unhelpful to require proof of an improper purpose in an action alleging wrongful non-disclosure. Given that disclosure decisions are not a matter of discretion, the motives of the prosecutor in withholding certain information from the accused are immaterial.

[62] Third, the decision to initiate or continue a prosecution falls within the core of prosecutorial discretion, whereas disclosure decisions do not. Whether in private or public law, the threshold to intrude upon that core discretion must be onerous, since it squarely implicates the independence of prosecutors. As this Court held in Krieger:

Prosecutorial discretion refers to the use of those powers that constitute the core of the Attorney General’s office and which are protected from the influence of improper political and other vitiating factors by the principle of independence.

...

. . . these powers emanate from the office holder’s role as legal advisor of and officer to the Crown. In our theory of government, it is the sovereign who holds the power to prosecute his or her subjects. A decision of the Attorney General, or of his or her agents, within the authority delegated to him or her by the sovereign is not subject to interference by other arms of government. An exercise of prosecutorial discretion will, therefore, be treated with deference by the courts [paras. 43 and 45]

Both malice and abuse of process therefore represent very high thresholds deliberately chosen to insulate core prosecutorial functions from judicial scrutiny. In contrast, disclosure decisions are not part of core prosecutorial discretion:

In Stinchcombe, . . . the Court held that the Crown has an obligation to disclose all relevant information to the defence. While the Crown Attorney retains the discretion not to disclose irrelevant information, disclosure of relevant evidence is not . . . a matter of prosecutorial discretion but, rather, is a prosecutorial duty. [ibid., at para. 54]

[63] In Anderson, this Court held that “the Crown possesses no discretion to breach the Charter rights of an accused”, and that “prosecutorial discretion provides no shield to a Crown prosecutor who has failed to fulfill his or her constitutional obligations such as the duty to provide proper disclosure to the defence” (para. 45). This suggests that disclosure decisions will not necessarily warrant the same level of protection from judicial scrutiny as the decision to initiate or continue a prosecution. Indeed, in the course of criminal trials, disclosure is routinely subject to judicial review. This review is not predicated on a showing of abuse of process. Likewise, in an action for Charter damages, a threshold lower than malice is justified when a court is asked to determine whether the Crown is liable for wrongful non-disclosure.

[64] Finally, a purposive approach to s. 24(1) militates against the malice standard. As this Court held in Dunedin, “s. 24(1), like all Charter provisions, commands a broad and purposive interpretation” and “must be construed generously, in a manner that best ensures the attainment of its objects” (para. 18). Section 24(1) guarantees that rights are upheld by granting “effective remedies” to claimants, and is crucial to the overall structure of the Charter because “a right, no matter how expansive in theory, is only as meaningful as the remedy provided for its breach” (ibid., at paras. 19-20).

[65] In Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3, Iacobucci and Arbour JJ. stressed the importance of a purposive approach to remedies under s. 24(1):

A purposive approach to remedies in a Charter context gives modern vitality to the ancient maxim ubi jus, ibi remedium: where there is a right, there must be a remedy. More specifically, a purposive approach to remedies requires at least two things. First, the purpose of the right being protected must be promoted: courts must craft responsive remedies. Second, the purpose of the remedies provision must be promoted: courts must craft effective remedies. [Emphasis in original; para. 25.]

In my view, restricting the availability of Charter damages for wrongful non-disclosure to cases where the Crown acted with malice would offer neither a responsive nor effective remedy to claimants. A malice standard grounded in “improper purpose” sets too high a bar, and fails to respond adequately to the state conduct at issue. It is also not well suited to the disclosure context. A threshold specifically tailored to that context is preferable.

[66] For these reasons, I reject the application of the malice standard. In doing so, I do not in any way seek to undercut this Court’s malicious prosecution jurisprudence. The qualified immunity established in Nelles continues to govern tort actions for malicious prosecution. Furthermore, as I will explain, while the malice standard is not directly applicable, the policy factors outlined in Nelles inform the liability threshold in this case.

(2) Policy Concerns Informing the Liability Threshold for Wrongful Non-disclosure

[67] Disclosure is one of the Crown’s fundamental obligations in a criminal prosecution. The Crown is duty-bound to disclose relevant information to the defence, and this obligation is a continuing one. This stringent and, at times, heavy burden on the Crown guarantees an accused’s ability to make full answer and defence. Indeed, this was precisely the reason that the Court affirmed a constitutional right to disclosure more than two decades ago in Stinchcombe:

. . . there is [an] overriding concern that failure to disclose impedes the ability of the accused to make full answer and defence. This common law right has acquired new vigour by virtue of its inclusion in s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms as one of the principles of fundamental justice. . . . The right to make full answer and defence is one of the pillars of criminal justice on which we heavily depend to ensure that the innocent are not convicted. [Citation omitted; p. 336.]

[68] Canadians thus rightly expect that the Crown will fulfill its disclosure obligations with diligence and rigour. By and large, Crown attorneys working on the front lines of our criminal justice system exceed these expectations on a daily basis. I pause here to note that Mr. Henry’s allegations of non-disclosure arise, in the main, from events that occurred during the pre-Stinchcombe era, when Crown disclosure practices were not as robust as they are today. Nevertheless, our system remains imperfect, and wrongful failure to disclose is not a mere hypothetical — it can, and does, happen, sometimes taking an extraordinary human toll and resulting in serious harm to the administration of justice.

[69] At the same time, all failures to disclose are not made equal. Highly blameworthy conduct, such as the intentional suppression of crucial evidence to obtain a conviction at all costs, sits at one end of the spectrum. At the other, one finds good faith errors in judgment about the relevance of certain tangential information. Both scenarios constitute a breach of an accused's Charter rights. Yet, manifestly, these scenarios do not possess the same persuasive force in terms of justifying a Charter damages award under s. 24(1).

[70] Given the complex nature of many disclosure decisions, courts should be exceedingly wary of setting a liability threshold that would award Charter damages for even minor instances of wrongful non-disclosure. Crown counsel will, from time to time, make good faith errors. Exposing prosecutors to potential liability every time such errors are made would, in my view, interfere with the proper execution of prosecutorial functions. Setting the liability threshold too low would also pose a considerable risk that baseless damages claims against the Crown would proliferate.

[71] These compelling good governance concerns — raised in Nelles and its progeny — must be taken into account in determining the appropriate liability threshold for cases of wrongful non-disclosure. As the Chief Justice held in Ward, “the underlying policy considerations that are engaged when awarding private law damages against state actors may be relevant when awarding public law damages directly against the state” (para. 22). There are two policy considerations from the malicious prosecution trilogy that I wish to emphasize. First, the liability threshold must ensure that Crown counsel will not be diverted from their important public duties by having to defend against a litany of civil claims. Second, the liability threshold must avoid a widespread “chilling effect” on the behaviour of prosecutors.

[72] The first concern — diversion from duties — underscores the need for a high liability threshold. In the disclosure process, mistakes are certainly the exception rather than the rule. That said, if every minor instance of wrongful non-disclosure were to expose prosecutors to liability for Charter damages, they would find themselves spending much of their limited time and energy responding to lawsuits rather than doing their jobs. They “would be constantly enmeshed in an avalanche of interlocutory civil proceedings and civil trials”, an outcome that “bode[s] ill for the efficiency of [Crown prosecutors] and the quality of our criminal justice system”: Elgouzouli-Daf v. Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, [1995] Q.B. 335 (C.A.), at p. 349. That avalanche would no doubt contain a few strong claims of serious wrongful non-disclosure, but would invariably bring with it scores of meritless claims, each of which would have to be defended at the expense of core Crown functions. The collective interest of Canadians is best served when Crown counsel are able to focus on their primary responsibility — the fair and effective prosecution of crime. In my view, the liability threshold must allow for strong claims to be heard on their merits, while guarding against a proliferation of marginal cases.

[73] The second policy concern — the chilling effect on Crown counsel — also supports a high liability threshold. Fear of civil liability may lead to defensive lawyering by prosecutors. One consequence of this defensive approach would be disclosure decisions motivated less by legal principle than by a calculated effort to ward off the spectre of liability. The public interest is undermined when prosecutorial decision-making is influenced by considerations extraneous to the Crown’s role as a quasi-judicial officer.

[74] For these reasons, I conclude that good governance concerns mandate a threshold that substantially limits the scope of liability for wrongful non-disclosure. In my view, the standard adopted by the application judge, which is akin to gross negligence, does not provide sufficient limits. As I will explain, a negligence-type standard poses considerable problems, and ought to be rejected.

[75] Mr. Henry submits that an even lower threshold — a simple breach of the Charter without any additional element of fault — should apply in this context. The Chief Justice and Karakatsanis J. take this approach. Specifically, they adopt the Ward framework without modification and rely on case-by-case policy considerations at step three, rather than a heightened threshold, to limit liability. In my respectful view, this approach fails to address the compelling policy and practical concerns that justify limiting prosecutorial liability.

[76] For more than two decades, this Court has steadfastly affirmed the principle that prosecutorial liability should be carefully circumscribed. My colleagues reject the relevance of Nelles and its progeny to this case. In their view, our malicious prosecution jurisprudence has no bearing here, since “[t]he legal duty on the Crown to disclose relevant evidence does not involve prosecutorial discretion in the sense discussed in Nelles and Miazga” (para. 128). I grant that there are significant distinctions between the Crown’s discretionary decision to initiate or continue a prosecution, and its disclosure obligations. However, the policy concerns raised in the malicious prosecution trilogy are not confined to the exercise of core prosecutorial discretion. In my view, those concerns have a broader reach and are implicated wherever there is a risk of undue interference with the ability of prosecutors to freely carry out their duties in furtherance of the administration of justice.

[77] My colleagues’ proposal would permit claimants to pursue Charter damages based on any allegation that the Crown breached its disclosure obligations — whether the wrongful non-disclosure was intentional, negligent, or accidental. In my respectful view, this casts too wide a net, exposing prosecutors to an unprecedented scope of liability that would affect the exercise of their vital public function.

[78] No doubt many cases might be thwarted by countervailing considerations invoked at the third step of Ward — and in any event would attract a modest quantum of damages at step four, if the claimant were to succeed at trial. However, given the absence of a liability threshold, a claim alleging a relatively minor breach with minimal harm to the claimant might well survive a motion to strike at the pleadings stage, and could lead to an award of damages. With respect, I fear that my colleagues’ approach runs the risk of opening the floodgates to scores of marginal claims.

[79] My colleagues suggest that their proposal would not divert Crown counsel from their duties. In their view, since the inquiry would be focused “on the existence and relevance of the [undisclosed] documents, [and] not on the more complex questions of how discretion should have or could have been exercised”, the role of the prosecutor in civil proceedings would be limited (para. 132). With respect, I disagree. In my view, a detailed examination of prosecutors’ conduct is inevitable. Such an examination would be necessary, for example, to determine whether case-by-case considerations militate against an award of damages or to set the appropriate quantum of damages for a successful claim.

[80] Similarly, my colleagues imply that their proposal would not have a chilling effect — first, because Crown conduct is already tightly constrained by the obligation to disclose relevant information and second, because “it is the state and not the individual prosecutor who faces liability” (para. 129). With respect, I take a different view. As I have explained, while the obligation to disclose is non-discretionary, there are invariably difficult judgment calls to be made. Those difficult decisions should be motivated by legal principle, not the fear of incurring civil liability. Furthermore, the fact that damages claims lie against the state and not individual prosecutors does not mitigate this concern. Like all lawyers, Crown counsel are professionals who jealously guard their reputations and whose actions are motivated by more than personal financial consequences.

[81] I agree with my colleagues that Mr. Henry alleges very serious instances of wrongful non-disclosure that demonstrate a shocking disregard for his Charter rights. His claim as pleaded meets the threshold I would establish. However, we should be wary of using Mr. Henry’s exceptional case to justify a substantial expansion of prosecutorial liability. It is only by keeping liability within strict bounds that we can ensure a reasonable balance between remedying serious rights violations and maintaining the efficient operation of our public prosecution system.

D. Applying the Charter Damages Threshold for Wrongful Non-disclosure by Prosecutors

[82] As discussed, a cause of action for Charter damages will lie where the Crown, in breach of its constitutional obligations, causes harm to the accused by intentionally withholding information when it knows, or would reasonably be expected to know, that the information is material to the defence and that the failure to disclose will likely impinge on the accused's ability to make full answer and defence. I now turn to how this standard will operate in practice.

(1) Policy Concerns May Still Be Considered on a Case-by-Case Basis

[83] In setting a heightened per se threshold, I should not be taken as saying that there are no additional good governance concerns that could negate a claim for Charter damages in the wrongful non-disclosure context. There may be case-specific policy concerns that militate against an award, even if the claimant has made out the heightened per se threshold. For example, the claimant may have an adequate alternative remedy under the Charter or in private law. Where a case-specific policy concern tips the balance against a Charter damages award, this remedy may properly be denied.

(2) What a Claimant Must Show to Meet the Liability Threshold in Cases of Wrongful Non-disclosure

[84] The liability threshold is tailored to the wrongful non-disclosure context. There is no inquiry into the Crown's motive or purpose, which are concepts better-suited to cases where the exercise of core prosecutorial discretion is challenged. Rather, the focus is on two key elements: the prosecutor's intent, and his or her actual or imputed knowledge. Specifically, a cause of action will lie against the state — subject to proof of causation — where a prosecutor breaches an accused's Charter rights by intentionally withholding information when he or she knows, or would reasonably be expected to know, that the information is material to the defence and that the failure to disclose will likely impinge on the accused's ability to make full answer and defence.

[85] Whether considered at the pleadings stage or at trial, the same formulation of the test applies. At trial, a claimant would have to convince the fact finder on a balance of probabilities that (1) the prosecutor intentionally withheld information; (2) the prosecutor knew or ought reasonably to have known that the information was material to the defence and that the failure to disclose would likely impinge on his or her ability to make full answer and defence; (3) withholding the information violated his or her Charter rights; and (4) he or she suffered harm as a result. To withstand a motion to strike, a claimant would only need to plead facts which, taken as true, would be sufficient to support a finding on each of these elements.

[86] Nothing in the formulation of this test alters the methods by which finders of fact assess intent. The common sense inference that individuals intend the natural and probable consequences of their actions applies: R. v. Walle, 2012 SCC 41, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 438, at paras. 58-63, citing R. v. Daley, 2007 SCC 53, [2007] 3 S.C.R. 523. As a result, the evidentiary burden on the claimant is not a high one. To demonstrate that the Crown intentionally withheld information, a claimant need only prove that prosecutors were actually in possession of the information and failed to disclose it. Alternatively, a claimant could show that prosecutors were put on notice of the existence of the information and failed to obtain possession of it, in contravention of their disclosure obligations: see R. v. McNeil, 2009 SCC 3, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 66, at para. 49. In both of these circumstances, the intention to withhold may be inferred. This inference is available to the finder of fact, but is not mandatory. Furthermore, it is always open to the Crown to lead rebuttal evidence to show that the withholding was not intentional.

[87] The next element of the test relates to the Crown's knowledge of the materiality of the information and the consequences of withholding it. Under this element, to be material, the information must be relevant and "directed at a matter in issue in the case": R. v. B. (L.) (1997), 1997 CanLII 3187 (ON CA), 35 O.R. (3d) 35 (C.A.), at p. 44. That said, the mere fact that information is material to the defence does not necessarily mean that the failure to disclose it will likely impinge on the accused's ability to make full answer and defence. While related, the two concepts are distinct, and each must be established.

[88] Knowledge of the materiality of the information and the consequences of a failure to disclose can be imputed based on what a reasonable prosecutor would know in the circumstances. Once it is found that information was intentionally withheld which any prosecutor, acting reasonably, should have disclosed, I see no reason why an accused who has suffered harm should be denied a cause of action. I stress, however, that by incorporating a reasonableness aspect into the knowledge element, I am not endorsing a negligence-based standard as the applicable liability threshold. Taken together, the two elements I have described — intent, and actual or imputed knowledge — rise above a purely objective “reasonableness” or “marked departure” standard grounded in a duty of care paradigm.

[89] The purpose of the intent and knowledge elements is not to shield prosecutors from liability by placing an undue burden on claimants to prove subjective mental states. Rather, these elements are designed to set a sufficiently high threshold to address good governance concerns, while preserving a cause of action for serious instances of wrongful non-disclosure. As pleaded, the facts of Mr. Henry’s case would meet this threshold.

[90] One final point on the liability threshold bears mentioning. It is not uncommon in the course of a criminal prosecution for disclosure decisions to be challenged, and for a court to determine the lawfulness of the Crown withholding certain information. If a court rules that information sought by the defence need not be disclosed, then the Crown’s failure to disclose will have the benefit of a judicial imprimatur. It would not be accurate to say, in these circumstances, that the Crown intentionally “withheld” information from the accused. Even if the judicial determination is later overturned, no liability for Charter damages will lie for non-disclosure.

(3) Policy Implications of the Liability Threshold

[91] It may seem harsh to deny Charter damages for cases of wrongful non-disclosure which, while less serious, still result in a violation of an accused’s Charter rights. However, it is a reality that wrongful non-disclosures will cover a spectrum of blameworthiness, ranging from the good faith error, quickly rectified, to the rare cases of egregious failures to disclose exculpatory evidence. Given the policy concerns associated with exposing prosecutors to civil liability, it is necessary that the liability threshold be set near the high end of the blameworthiness spectrum. In reaching this conclusion, I do not purport to create silos of Charter violations, classifying some as worthy of concern and others as inconsequential. Courts should endeavour, as much as possible, to rectify Charter breaches with appropriate and just remedies. Nevertheless, when it comes to awarding Charter damages, courts must be careful not to extend their availability too far.

[92] Indeed, the consequences of setting a lower threshold in this context — simple negligence, or even the gross negligence standard adopted by the application judge — would be serious. This type of threshold implicates a duty of care paradigm that ignores the basic realities of conducting a criminal prosecution. Mr. Henry’s case illustrates the fact that the information ultimately disclosed to an accused is not simply a product of what prosecutors decide to disclose on their own initiative. Rather, disclosure depends on the interplay of a number of factors, including the rigour of the police investigation, the forthrightness of the police in communicating information to prosecutors, and the disclosure decisions taken by the Crown.

[93] A duty of care paradigm risks opening up a Pandora’s box of potential liability theories. For example, if prosecutors were subject to a duty of care, a claimant could allege that they failed to probe the police forcefully enough to ensure that relevant information was not being suppressed. Such an approach would effectively impose an obligation on prosecutors to “police” the police. In my view, widening the Crown’s exposure to liability in this way would be unwarranted. If police act improperly, then a civil claim can and should lie against them: see Hill v. Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police Services Board, 2007 SCC 41, [2007] 3 S.C.R. 129.

[94] The problems with a negligence-based standard are even more apparent when considering how this lower threshold would operate at the pleadings stage. The lower the threshold, the greater the number of claims that would have to be defended. The mere fact of having to respond to an onslaught of litigation, even if ultimately unsuccessful, would chill the actions of prosecutors and divert them from their proper functions. It would be far too easy for a claimant with a weak claim to plead facts disclosing a cause of action for negligence — simpliciter or gross — and thus drive prosecutors into civil court. Bringing a Charter damages claim for prosecutorial misconduct should not be a mere exercise in artful pleading. In contrast, the threshold I have outlined ensures that many unmeritorious claims will be weeded out at an early stage, either on a motion to strike or on a motion for summary judgment.

(4) The Causation Requirement

[95] In addition to establishing a Charter breach and the requisite intent and knowledge, a claimant must prove that, as a result of the wrongful non-disclosure, he or she suffered a legally cognizable harm. Liability attaches to the Crown only upon a finding of “but for” causation. In cases involving wrongful convictions, this “but for” test avoids the thorny issue of whether or not factual innocence is required — that is, proof that the accused did not in fact commit the crimes alleged. Instead, the focus of the inquiry is on the proceedings that occurred at the time of the intentional failure to disclose. That said, without deciding the issue, I would not foreclose the possibility that evidence of factual innocence or guilt could go to the quantum of damages.

[96] Harm can be shown by the claimant in different ways. I do not propose an exhaustive list, but offer several examples. A historical wrongful conviction would certainly qualify. Charter damages would also be available where the wrongful non-disclosure led to a conviction at trial that was later overturned on appeal, and ultimately replaced by an acquittal — either entered directly on appeal or following a new trial. Even if the claimant was acquitted at trial, a Charter damages award would be available where it could be shown that the charges would have been dismissed or withdrawn at an earlier stage of proceedings had proper disclosure been made. In such a case, damages might serve to compensate for time wrongfully spent in custody and any consequential harm suffered as a result of the criminal proceedings.

[97] Regardless of the nature of the harm suffered, a claimant would have to prove, on a balance of probabilities, that “but for” the wrongful non-disclosure he or she would not have suffered that harm. This guarantees that liability is restricted to cases where the intentional failure to disclose was actually the cause of the harm to the accused.

[98] The “but for” causation test may, however, be modified in situations involving multiple alleged wrongdoers. For example, where the claimant alleges that a wrongful conviction was caused in part by the failure of police to provide material information to prosecutors, and in part by the Crown’s failure to disclose, then a showing of “but for” causation will not be necessary.

In this scenario, the causation requirement will be satisfied if the claimant can prove that the prosecutorial misconduct materially contributed to the harm suffered: Clements v. Clements, 2012 SCC 32, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 181.

V. Conclusion

[99] I would allow the appeal. Proof of malice is not required to make out a cause of action for Charter damages against the provincial Crown in this case. Mr. Henry may seek to amend his pleadings to include a claim for Charter damages against the AGBC alleging that the Crown, in breach of its constitutional obligations, caused him harm by intentionally withholding information when it knew, or should reasonably have known, that the information was material to his defence and that the failure to disclose would likely impinge on his ability to make full answer and defence.

[100] As success is divided in this appeal, I would order costs in the cause throughout.

The following are the reasons delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND KARAKATSANIS J. —

I. Introduction

[101] This case raises questions about the availability of damages under s. 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms as a remedy for the breach of the Crown's constitutional disclosure obligations.

[102] The notice of civil claim in this case alleges egregious violations of an accused's right to disclosure, with devastating consequences. In 1983, Mr. Henry was convicted of 10 counts of sexual assault, declared a dangerous offender, and sentenced to an indefinite period of incarceration. Before, during, and in the many years after his trial, Mr. Henry repeatedly sought disclosure of exculpatory evidence held by the police and prosecution, to no avail. In 2002, police began re-investigating a series of unsolved sexual assaults. Ultimately, a Special Prosecutor was appointed to review Mr. Henry's convictions, leading to the 2008 disclosure of substantial police file materials. In 2010, the British Columbia Court of Appeal acquitted Mr. Henry on all counts, on the basis that the evidence as a whole was incapable of proving the element of identification: 2010 BCCA 462, 294 B.C.A.C. 96. He served nearly 27 years in prison. He now seeks an award of damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter, for the breach of the Crown's constitutional disclosure obligations.

[103] This appeal asks: What facts must Mr. Henry plead in order to be able to advance such a claim in court? In particular, must he allege malice or fault on the part of state officials who violated his rights?

[104] The Attorney General of British Columbia argues that claims for damages resulting from prosecutorial misconduct require, at a minimum, that the claimant establish malice. In our view, the Attorney General's argument is misplaced. Imposing a fault requirement for Charter damages, where the Crown has breached its duty to disclose, is inconsistent with the purpose of s. 24(1) and with the principled framework established in Vancouver (City) v. Ward, 2010 SCC 27, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 28, for assessing whether an award of damages would be appropriate and just in the circumstances of a particular case.

II. The Purpose of Section 24(1) and the Ward Framework

