To Whom It May Concern,

It is without reservation that I recommend the non-profit organization, Fentanyl Fathers, for any upper-level educational institution looking to educate its student body on the dangers of counterfeit pills and fentanyl use. The members of Fentanyl Fathers are dedicated individuals who have all been touched by the tragic repercussions of drug use and who honestly, often painfully, tell their stories to both students and parents. Their commitment to their mission of educating today's youth on the dangers of drug use is evident in every aspect of their operations, from their outreach to the community to their generous support services.

The members of Fentanyl Fathers don't just lecture, they engage with their audience through honest, often difficult, personal narratives. The students knew what they were hearing and seeing was real, which led to outstanding engagement throughout the presentation. It was hard not to be affected by their stories. Several members of our audience, teenagers and adults, came forward to express how much they were moved by the presentation.

The members of Fentanyl Fathers were all friendly, engaging, and easy to work with. I strongly encourage any high school to invite them to address its community.

Sincerely,
