

College Recruiting Resources

Playing baseball at the next level is a goal for many of our players. To make this dream a reality, it's essential to understand the recruiting process—including the rules, timelines, and strategies that will help you get noticed.

You Don't Need to Break the Bank

We strongly encourage players and families to educate themselves on the recruiting process and develop a plan that works for them. While some people spend significant money on recruiting services, this isn't always necessary. With knowledge and a solid plan, you can navigate this process effectively and affordably.

A Gradual Transition of Responsibility

We encourage parents to be actively involved early on, then gradually step back as players mature and take ownership of their recruiting journey. Think of it like learning to drive: you start in driver's education, progress to a learner's permit, and eventually earn your license and independence.

College coaches understand parental involvement, but they primarily want to communicate with the players themselves. By their junior year, players should be leading their own recruiting efforts. This means learning what coaches are looking for, understanding academic requirements, and developing strong communication and leadership skills.

Resources to Get Started

Below are select resources to help with this journey. Some are free, while others offer premium options—but all provide valuable educational content at no cost. This is a starting point; we'll continue adding and updating this list based on feedback from our network of coaches and players.
