Insider Threat

Cybercriminals around the world are constantly seeking ways to exploit vulnerabilities within organizations. One of the most common methods they utilize is known as an "insider threat."

What is an Insider Threat?

Insiders are employees, contractors, business partners, or vendors who have access to the organizations resources, including personnel, facilities, information, equipment, networks, and systems.

Who are the perpetrators?

Usually, people with malicious intent within the company, accidental mistake by an employee or a third party.

How prevalent is an Insider?

Insider threats are alarmingly common, accounting for 80% of data breaches across industries, with higher risks in sectors like healthcare, financial services, schools, and local governments. For those types of organizations, damage to reputations can extend beyond financial loss.

How bad is it?

Insider incidents cost millions of dollars in lost money and trust.

What can we do to protect our schools and municipalities?

Provide employees with a clear security policy, along with training on identifying insider threats and how to report them properly.
