While not all eucalyptus species are equally harmful, most eucalyptus species, particularly the widely planted "blue gum" (Eucalyptus globulus), can be considered potentially harmful to other plants when used as mulch due to their allelopathic properties, which means they release chemicals that can inhibit the growth of nearby plants; therefore, most species should be used with caution as mulch.

Key points to remember:

Species variation:
Though many eucalyptus species can be considered potentially harmful, the level of allelopathic effects can vary between different species.

Blue gum concern:
"Blue gum" eucalyptus is often cited as the most problematic species due to its widespread planting and strong allelopathic effects.

Proper use can mitigate harm:
If you choose to use eucalyptus mulch, ensure it is properly composted and used in moderation to minimize potential negative impacts on other plants.
