

RYAN L. ROBINSON , Sorrrows' EDGE

Humanity has been without big bad predators to fight or compete with. So, we fought ourselves instead. We put each other in categories, lists, and cages. How stupid we have been.

Can we survive the future lessons of life? What if we're just a third rate species in the universe? We may have to learn lessons we are not prepared for. Can we be strong or compassionate or understanding when we need to be?

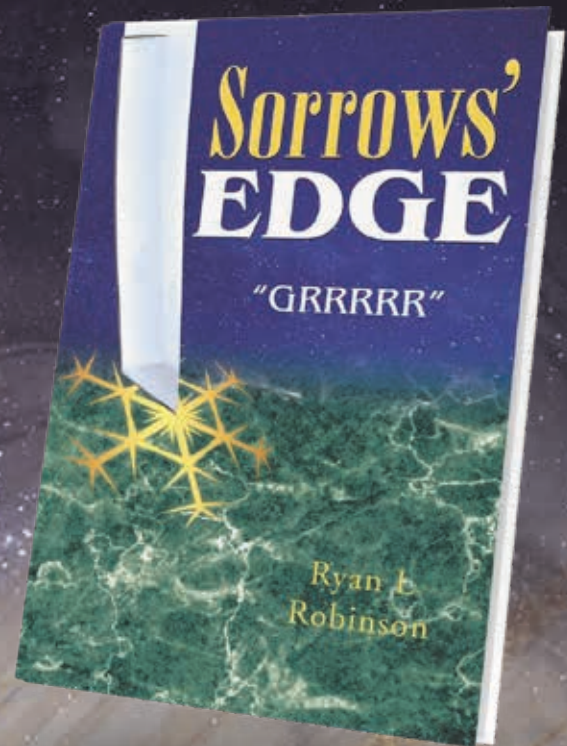

Will we have the wit and wisdom to escape or deal with our dilemmas? explores this possible future. The humans are put against mystery, colorful characters and the teaming dangers that are out there.

Ryan L Robinson is a retired Quality Manager of a small high-tech company in Southern California. He has degrees in electronics and computer science. One reviewer said, I was immediately struck by the unusual imagination and technical texture in his stories . . . He has been writing for many years and Sorrows' Edge is his second book. His first book is The Curse of Tecumseh.

"Robinson's futuristic world is an intriguing one in which humans have become second-class citizens in the vast universe. He hooks the reader from the beginning with the mysterious disappearance of an entire planet and the orders for McCormick to investigate. The author's description of the future is truly inventive and terrifying. Robinson has a knack for storytelling and world-building."
