Black Women and Breast Cancer: Awareness Must Lead to Action

By: The Real News Louisiana

NATCHITOCHES, La. — Behind every breast cancer diagnosis is a woman with people who love her, responsibilities she carries and a future she deserves to live. During Breast Cancer Awareness Month, the conversation must include the unequal burden facing Black women.

According to the American Cancer Society's 2025 report, Black women have a breast cancer death rate 38% higher than White women, despite a lower rate of diagnosis. That gap makes timely detection and access to quality treatment especially urgent. Continued on Page 4

The reasons are complex. Black women are more likely to develop triple-negative breast cancer, an aggressive form of the disease. Differences in access to quality care and later-stage diagnoses also contribute to poorer outcomes. Closing the gap requires attention throughout diagnosis and treatment.

Knowing what is normal for your breasts matters. A new lump, swelling, skin dimpling, a nipple turning inward or unusual nipple discharge should be checked by a healthcare professional. Many breast changes are not cancer, but they still deserve attention—even after a recent mammogram.

For women at average risk, the U.S. Preventive Services Task Force recommends mammograms every two years from ages 40 through 74. Women should discuss their family history and personal risk with their healthcare provider, because some need a different screening plan.

Here in our community, support can begin with simple acts: helping someone get to an appointment, offering childcare or listening when she says something feels wrong.

Pink ribbons bring visibility. Following through—with appointments, answers and support—gives that awareness purpose. Black women deserve to be heard, cared for and given every opportunity to survive.

Awareness Must Lead to Action.

Listen. Support. Stand with Black women.

Knowledge, Faith and Hope: My Life as a Cancer Survivor

By Wanda Lucas, Author | Survivor | Cancer Advocate | Cancer Buddy

As a 23-year survivor of Stage IV inflammatory breast cancer, I have learned that one of the greatest weapons in the fight against cancer is knowledge.

Fear can keep us from making an appointment, asking questions or acknowledging changes in our bodies. Sometimes we avoid answers because we are afraid of what we might hear. But what we do not know can hurt us. My journey has taught me the importance of paying attention, seeking answers and speaking up for our health.

I encourage people to know their family history, keep up with recommended screenings and talk with a health care provider about unusual changes. We should never assume that something is harmless simply because it does not hurt or because we cannot feel a lump.

Through You CancerV.I.V.E., I have turned my experience into a mission rooted in four principles: Validate, Illuminate, Victory and Educate.

To validate means acknowledging each patient's fears, feelings, struggles and experiences. Every journey matters, and every person deserves to be heard.

To illuminate means bringing awareness, knowledge, compassion and understanding into moments that can feel overwhelming. Sometimes, knowing someone cares can help a person take the next step.

Victory means celebrating every milestone. Completing treatment, receiving encouraging results or finding the strength to face another day are all moments worth honoring.

To educate means helping patients, families and communities ask questions, make informed decisions and advocate for the care they need.

My journey has also taught me that cancer does not discriminate, and neither should our compassion. I advocate for people affected by all cancers, across all races, genders and walks of life. No one should feel that their struggle is less important or that they must face it alone.

If uncertainty has kept you from taking action, I encourage you to ask questions and listen to your body. Encourage someone you love to do the same. You do not have to have every answer before reaching out for help.

Above all, I want people facing cancer to know that their diagnosis is not the whole of their story. There is still room for purpose, love, meaningful moments and hope.

I continue to share my story because I believe we can make a difference—one life, one voice and one act of compassion at a time. Keep the faith, embrace hope and never stop believing in the possibility of tomorrow.

WARD 1 CITY COURT JUDGE

Robert Owsley

Incumbent

— VS —

Cloyd Benjamin Jr.

Challenger

NATCHITOCHES, La. — Campaign announcements from Cloyd Benjamin Jr. and Judge Robert Owsley describe their priorities for Ward 1 City Court, with both emphasizing fairness, accountability and support for young people.

Benjamin outlines proposed community partnerships focused on prevention, public safety and second chances. Owsley highlights his service on the bench since 2020 and improvements his announcement says have been implemented during his tenure.

The following comparison is based on the candidates' supplied announcements.

Benjamin's announcement stresses that prevention and second-chance initiatives would complement the court's responsibility to follow the law. His proposed programs would require collaboration with partners who have the authority, expertise and resources to develop and carry them out.

Owsley's announcement emphasizes continuity and experience, pointing to technology upgrades, courthouse security, juvenile community service and family intervention as examples of his approach.

Editor's note: This comparison summarizes candidate-provided announcements and is not an independent verification of campaign claims. A topic absent from an announcement should not be interpreted as opposition to that policy.

Eliza Behrendsen Shares Her Breast Cancer Journey and Gratitude for Care

Eliza Brittain Behrendsen is no stranger to breast cancer. Her mother and mother-in-law passed away from it. As life sometimes goes, Eliza was caring for her mother-in-law when she herself felt a bump of sorts in her breast. Thinking it was just a cyst, Eliza thought she might need to get it drained. A busy mother of two- high- school aged sons and active with many projects and community events, Eliza really hoped the bump was nothing. However, somewhat concerned, she mentioned the “cyst” to her sister, Dr. Marguerite (Cissy) Picou. Dr. Picou immediately advised that Eliza get a mammogram. When Eliza had the mammogram, radiologist Dr. Ben Hogg said there was a spot that concerned him. He ordered an ultrasound which led to a needle biopsy of what he believed was a mass. Eliza went to general surgeon Dr. William Ball, Jr., who confirmed the mass was, in fact, cancer.

“My first reaction was to get a mastectomy, but Dr. Ball said there were other options,” Eliza explained. “He first tested lymph nodes, and there were no signs of cancer which was really good news. However, the mass was growing quickly, suggesting an aggressive cancer. I needed to have a lumpectomy as soon as possible.”

Eliza Brittain Behrendsen

“Dr. Ball has extensive training and experience with breast cancer. I knew he can do what surgeons at world renown places can do, and I trusted him to do what needed to be done. I had my surgery at NRMC, and Dr. Ball removed a fairly large mass, but you can barely tell now where it even was. The surgery went well,” Eliza explained.

“From Shay Ball, who is a nurse in Dr. Ball’s practice, to the nurses on the surgery unit, I had excellent care and great support. I felt taken care of and that everyone had my best interests at heart,” Eliza said. “I had the best possible surgery recovery. Chemotherapy and radiation therapy followed the surgery, and I am grateful to my husband who went with me to the treatments, and my supportive brothers and sisters really helped me.”

67,000 Louisiana Voters Mistakenly Marked Inactive After ‘Human Error’

BATON ROUGE, La. — Approximately 67,000 Louisiana voters were mistakenly switched to inactive status during routine maintenance of the state’s elections database on October 5, according to the Louisiana Secretary of State’s Office.

The Louisiana Illuminator reported that Trey Williams, deputy secretary for communications, attributed the mistake to “human error.” Williams said staff identified the problem and began correcting the affected records. The office also added safeguards intended to prevent a similar incident.

In its October 7 report, the Illuminator said officials expected to restore the correct statuses that day. Williams said the temporary error would not affect anyone’s eligibility or ability to vote.

Inactive Does Not Mean You Cannot Vote

Louisiana’s Secretary of State advises that voters listed as inactive remain eligible to vote but must confirm their residential address before casting a ballot. That can be done online, at the parish Registrar of Voters Office, or at the precinct on Election Day.

Natchitoches Parish residents can check their registration through the Louisiana Voter Portal or the free GeauxVote app. Anyone who notices incorrect information should contact the Registrar of Voters Office for assistance at \(318\) 357-2211.

Black Women and Breast Cancer: Awareness Must Lead to Action

Support Should Last Beyond October

Pink ribbons fill our communities each October, but women facing breast cancer need support long after awareness month ends. For Black women, turning awareness into action means creating space to be heard, ask for help and receive care without feeling alone.

A woman may be managing appointments while raising children, working and keeping her household together. She may appear strong while privately feeling overwhelmed. Strength should never become a reason to assume she needs less support.

Make Help Specific

“Let me know if you need anything” is well intended, but someone already carrying a heavy load may struggle to explain what she needs.

Offer something concrete. Ask whether she needs a ride, help with groceries, a prepared meal or someone to watch the children. Check before visiting and understand that she may need rest more than company.

Small, consistent acts can ease everyday pressures. Support does not have to be expensive to be meaningful.

Listen Without Pressure

Every woman’s experience is different. Some want to talk openly; others prefer privacy. Let her decide how much to share.

Avoid comparing her journey with someone else’s or insisting that she remain positive. Fear, frustration and uncertainty deserve room alongside faith and hope. Sometimes the most helpful response is simply, “I’m here, and I’m listening.”

Respect also means asking permission before posting photographs, sharing health updates or organizing public fundraising efforts.

Remember Life After Treatment

The end of treatment should not signal the end of community support. Ask what would help now rather than assuming everything has returned to normal. Continue checking in. Invite her to participate in everyday life while giving her freedom to decline. See the whole woman—her interests, relationships and goals—beyond her diagnosis.

Here in Natchitoches Parish, families, churches, businesses and neighbors can make compassion a year-round commitment.

Awareness brings attention. Action means showing up—and continuing to show up when the pink ribbons come down.

Black Families Deserve Protection When They Ask for Help

“Families deserve to be heard, treated with dignity and supported when they turn to institutions for safety.”

When a family calls for help, they are placing their trust in someone else’s hands. They expect someone to listen, take their concerns seriously and help protect the people they love.

For Black families, that moment can come with another question: Will we be treated as people who need protection, or as a problem to be managed?

Whether a family is reporting threats, seeking help for a loved one in crisis or asking what happened to their child, they deserve a response rooted in care and respect. They should not have to prove that their fear is reasonable before someone listens.

Safety means more than an officer arriving or a report being filed. It means understanding what happens next. It means having questions answered, knowing whom to contact and receiving follow-up when concerns remain unresolved.

When mental health is involved, the need for a thoughtful response becomes especially urgent. Families may be frightened, exhausted and unsure how to help. Responders need the training, support and judgment to recognize distress and work to calm a situation.

Protecting a person in crisis must remain central to the response.

The responsibility also reaches beyond law enforcement. Hospitals, schools, social service agencies, elected officials and community organizations all have a role. When families are passed from one office to another, responsibility can become scattered while their needs remain unmet.

Here in Natchitoches Parish, we should be willing to ask direct questions. Do families know where to turn? Are their concerns documented and followed up? Is there a clear way to raise questions about how they were treated? Can they do so without feeling intimidated or dismissed?

These questions belong in public conversations because trust grows through actions people can see.

Black families deserve protection without humiliation, answers without unnecessary obstacles and compassion without conditions. Their concerns deserve attention even when they have no influential connections and no public platform.

Community leaders can help by listening, explaining available resources and standing beside families as they seek answers. Institutions must do their part by communicating clearly and accepting accountability when their response falls short.

Calling for help takes trust. What happens after that call determines whether a family will feel safe enough to make it again.

The measure of a community’s commitment to safety is how it treats people when they are most vulnerable. When Black families reach out, they deserve to know that someone will listen—and that help will come with a commitment to keeping them safe.

DEFENDING BLACK VOTER POWER

Editor's note: The title and opening excerpt were provided by the NAACP. The accompanying commentary was written by The Real News Louisiana.

Our democracy faces a serious test when the protections meant to ensure fair representation become harder to enforce. The Supreme Court's ruling in Louisiana v. Callais raises urgent concerns about Black voting power and the future of equal representation.

On April 29, 2026, the Court struck down Louisiana's congressional map that included a second majority-Black district. The majority concluded that the Voting Rights Act did not require that additional district and that the state's use of race in drawing the map was unconstitutional. The ruling also narrowed the standards for challenging discriminatory district maps under Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act.

The justices sharply disagreed about the consequences. The majority framed its decision as enforcing constitutional limits on race-based districting. The dissent warned that the ruling undermined the law's ability to protect minority voters against discrimination.

For Louisiana communities, representation is more than lines on a map. It affects whose concerns reach Congress, whose neighborhoods receive attention and whose voices help shape public policy.

The distinction between voter suppression and vote dilution matters. This case concerns district boundaries and electoral representation rather than a direct restriction on casting a ballot. But access to the ballot and a fair opportunity to elect representatives are both essential to a healthy democracy.

Protecting Black voting rights requires sustained work beyond Election Day. Community organizations, churches and civic leaders can provide accurate election information, help residents check their registration, explain district changes and create opportunities to question candidates about issues that matter locally.
