

Aniete Etim

While serving at African Christian Schools, I first met Anitie Etim. He was president of his graduating class, valedictorian, but his most significant accomplishment was his ability to support his education. He had learned the trade of well-drilling and not only supported himself at Nigerian Christian Bible College, he supported another student as well.

Learning a vocation provided him the opportunity to attend college, assist other students, and have a viable trade and income upon graduation from NCBC. He is a great example of the value of vocational training for our preachers.
