Industrial Property...This is a treaty relating to patents which is adhered to 140 countries. It provides that each country guarantees to the citizens of other countries the same rights in patent and trademark (TM) matters that it gives to its own citizens. The treaty also provides for the right of priority in the case of patents (filing only), trademarks and industrial design (design patents). This right means that, on the basis of a regular first application in one of the member countries, the applicant may, within a certain period of time, apply for protection in all the other member countries (Almost the entire Earth). These later applications will then be regarded as if they have been filed on the same day as the first application. Thus, these later applications will have priority over applications for the same invention which may have been filed during the same period of time by other persons.
Moreover, these later applications, being based on the first application, will not be invalidated by any acts accomplished in the interval, such as, for example, publication, or exploitation of the invention, the sale of copies of the design, or use of the trademark. The period of time mentioned above, within the subsequent applications may be filed in the other countries, is 12 months in the case of first applications for patent and six months in the case of industrial designs and trademarks. Another treaty known as the Patent Cooperation Treaty, was negotiated at a diplomatic conference in June of 1970.
