Treat others the way you want to be treated, that's what our parents always tell us and the rule that we should follow throughout our entire lives. They also tell us how much we can help people on a daily basis. Even if you're at a store and an older person drops something, your parents always tell you to help pick it up, or at least that's what my mother tells me to do. Today, I'm going to be talking about how I help the people around me.

First off, my mom is very hard working to support me and my siblings, sometimes it's nice to just do the little things that make her life more easy. For example, washing dishes, moving laundry from the washer to the dryer, or even watering plants. These things may seem very small, but you never realize how much one little thing can help ease your parents lives.

Next, are my siblings. My older brother has helped me with my homework before, and has been my role model for my entire life. Since he has inspired me so much, I use what he taught me to help my little brother. My little brother is autistic, so it makes it much more difficult to help him learn and assist him in his learning. He is doing very well in his learning and I'm very proud of him. Even sometimes when my older brother is acting immature, I assist him because I feel it's my job because I'm his sibling. I do thank both of my siblings because of how much they've helped me throughout my lifetime.

Lastly, the people I have selected are my friends. I have done a lot of small things for my friends, because in the end it's really the little things that count. These things are such as giving tips on how to study something, helping them study something, or even doing assignments together and giving each other tips. These are some of the things I do to help my friends and my classmates.

Conclusively, these are some of the things I do to help the people most important to me. I'm not the only person who does these either, tons of kids everyday work diligently to assist their family and friends. There are even some kids that take helping to the next step, but not only helping their family but helping their community and the people in need. If we all try hard enough, one day we could all become like all of these extraordinary children that have taken things to the next level.
