The Hunter Legacy: Innovation & Accessibility

Hunter Marine has long been a titan in the North American boat-building industry. Founded by Warren Luhrs in 1973, the company revolutionized production sailing by focusing on high-volume interiors and innovative rigging solutions. Hunter's philosophy was built around making sailing accessible and enjoyable for everyone—from novice cruisers to seasoned liveaboards. Their commitment to durability and "the Hunter look" made them one of the most recognizable brands on the water for decades.

The builder's success stemmed from their willingness to challenge traditional design. By implementing advanced construction techniques and ergonomic layouts, Hunter created boats that felt much larger than their LOA (Length Over All) suggested. This legacy of "innovation under sail" is evident in every corner of their mid-90s designs, which remain some of the most sought-after used sailboats on the market today.

The Hunter 336: A Modern Cruiser Ahead of Its Time

The Hunter 336 is widely regarded as one of the most successful designs in Hunter's mid-size range. It was a pioneer in incorporating the "B&R Rig," which eliminates the need for a backstay, allowing for a large, powerful mainsail and a smaller, easy-to-tack jib. This design choice, coupled with a wide beam carried well aft, results in a stable, fast, and remarkably easy-to-sail vessel that excels in the varied conditions of the Great Lakes.

Inside, the 336 defies its 33-foot stature. The "super-saloon" layout features an open, airy cabin with massive amounts of natural light, thanks to Hunter's signature wrap-around windshield. With a large aft cabin featuring a queen-sized berth, a functional galley, and a private head with a shower, the Hunter 336 is a true "pocket cruiser" that offers the amenities and elbow room usually reserved for 36-footers.
