

The Real-Estate Stars of Hollywood

In the nation's hottest luxury-home market, a corps of young brokers hold the keys to L.A.'s best addresses.

EVEN THOUGH VIEWING HOURS ARE OVER, JONAH WILSON, A 35-YEAR-OLD REAL-ESTATE AGENT for Prudential, confidently strides up to a gigantic modern mansion in Beverly Hills. The home is so enormous it has three different addresses, and it's on the market for $5.6 million. It's a Tuesday afternoon, but to the town's Realtors, who cover houses from Venice to East Hollywood, it's "Caravan Day," when agents descend on all the new houses on the market and examine them for their clients. Wilson's current list includes a talent manager who wants a traditional home in Westwood for under $2.5 million and an actor couple dreaming of something big in Los Feliz. This offering fits neither bill, not least because the seller happens to be named Andrew Dice Clay and the house's decor is goombah chic—shag carpeting, satiny
