

Hollywood's Hot New Address

Why are so many young stars flocking to a single neighborhood in the Hollywood Hills?

THE VIEW FROM TOBEY MAGUIRE'S LOS ANGELES LIVING ROOM IS SURPRISINGLY SERENE. AN ENTIRE WALL OF SLIDING DOORS overlooks the infinity pool—one of those black-bottom jobs that gives the illusion of water cascading over the edge. Past the pool, the sky opens to a dramatic view of the valley below. While the traffic congeals on Sunset Boulevard, just a five-minute electric-car ride down the hill, the only sound you'll hear from Maguire's backyard are a few chatty swallows and a leaf blower in the distance. ¶ Step outside the heavy wooden gates that guard his $3.7 million digs, however, and things get a little frenzied. ¶ Maguire, along with many red-carpet rovers, has moved into a section of the Hollywood Hills known as the "bird streets," a cluster of narrow switchbacks with names like Thrasher, Blue Jay, Oriole, Warbler, and Mockingbird. Though the neighborhood has seen its share

BIRD'S-EYE VIEW: THOUGH THE AREA HAS SEEN ITS SHARE OF CELEBS IN RESIDENCE BEFORE—GEORGE HARRISON WROTE "BLUE JAY WAY" WHEN HE STAYED HERE IN 1967—NEVER HAVE SO MANY ACTORS ROOSTED IN THIS AVIAN ENCLAVE.
