On September 11, 2001, nearly 7,000 strangers landed unexpectedly in a small Canadian town, diverted in the immediate aftermath of the devastating terror attacks. When 38 international flights were unexpectedly diverted to Gander, Newfoundland, the town's 9,000 residents responded with an outpouring of support. Over five days, they transformed schools, homes, and community centres into temporary shelters for the stranded passengers and crew.

Locals spontaneously offered everything from meals and showers to phone calls home and comfort for those awaiting news. This extraordinary act of Canadian compassion during a global crisis became known as "Operation Yellow Ribbon," showcasing the deep generosity embedded in our communities.

The actions of Gander's residents proved that even in the darkest moments, Canada's open heart shines brightly. How do you remember the Canadian response during the time surrounding 9/11?
