and a newsletter

Thankyou, thankyouverymuch

Can you do Thanksgiving dinner on Zoom? It's harder to pass the sweet potatoes, but your crazy uncle won't be in your house.

No matter what Thanksgiving ends up looking like this year, the core message remains, which explains this experimental effort to shoo you over to read my latest blog post.

I can tell you that the post involves gratitude to particular people who happen to be blog subscribers. Some may not even realize they are subscribers, but you think that's going to stop me? It also has another shot of a wild turkey or two (shot in the photographic sense, and lower case for wild turkey, as I intend no reference to a Kentucky bourbon or its gonzo devotee, Hunter S. Thompson). It involves book recommendations that you dear people have given me over the years. Click here to read it.

Happy Thanksgiving to you from all of us here at jcannonbooks.com, which of course is just me.

Now read the blog item or my holiday will be ruined.

Turkey in the straw. And oaks. Paso Robles, California.

Kind regards,
