Sensory Friendly Shows at The Magik Theatre

The Magik Theatre was founded on the principle that every child should have access to Magik's literature-based programming that brings stories to life on the stage and engages young audiences. Magik realized that it needed to expand its programming to include productions that are accessible to neuro-diverse children, especially those on the autism spectrum and with sensory sensitivities.

In 2015, The Magik Theatre inaugurated its Sensory-Friendly Series with a stage adaptation of Mo Willem's beloved Elephant and Piggie. Eric Soto, a member of Magik's production department, remembers that first performance fondly: "There were parents who told me that this was the first time that their entire family could attend an event together. Usually, one parent stays home with their son who is autistic while the rest of the family goes out. This time they could be together as a family. Their child absolutely loved it."

For each Sensory-Friendly performance, Magik adapts its plays in the following manner:

- House lights are left on in the auditorium
- The volume on the actors' microphones is lowered
- The performance is displayed on a monitor in the lobby
- The audience size is limited to 150 individuals, so families have room to spread out
- University Health System provides free fidgets for patrons

During its 2017-18 season, Magik realized that it strayed from the singular purpose of the Sensory-Friendly Series. Many of the Sensory-Friendly performances were getting oversold, often with audiences of 250-300 individuals, and they were not reaching their target audience. "We decided to recommit ourselves to offering a truly sensory-friendly experience for our patrons," says Magik's General Manager, Shelley Weber, who introduced sensory-friendly adaptations to the organization. "For one thing, we moved the Sensory-Friendly performances to Saturday at 10:30am, so they would fall outside our typical weekend performance schedule, and we committed to capping those performances at 150 patrons. We also hired a consultant who specializes in accessible theatre to train Magik personnel in working with members of the autism community."

Last season, Magik limited itself to only three Sensory-Friendly performances in order to make adjustments to the programming. For the 2019-2020 season, Magik returns to offering five Sensory-Friendly performances. That's one adaptation for each production at The Magik Theatre.

It is with the support from the University Health System and other philanthropic organizations that Magik continues to offer educational programming that truly reaches all children of San Antonio and South Texas.

Since 2016, University Health System has served as the Accessibility Sponsor for The Magik Theatre. As the President & CEO of University Health System, George B. Hernández, Jr., states, "We are very proud to support sensory-friendly performances at The Magik Theatre. Ensuring all children have the ability to benefit from the arts with their family and friends in a welcoming, inclusive and relaxed environment is important, and our Children's Health team really enjoys going to these performances to meet families and help connect them to our services."

Family Life in the Modern World

by: Taylor Abrahamsen

In the busy modern world, our families are faced with struggles generations before did not experience. Parents and children alike are busier than ever, and opportunities to relax as a family seem further out of reach. Practices, community groups, and extending work hours bring many benefits to modern life, but are certainly not without their costs. The most earthshattering of which is the wellness of our children.

We live in a world where we have the most, but are deeply lacking in connection as a family. We all want the best for our children, and to show them endless amounts of love and care. Determining how to do that with the differences they face today can be a struggle. Being aware of this difference, and being proactive or correcting course, can set the future of your family on a different path with rippling benefits to the next generations. Taking time to connect, work together, play games, and being fully present with one another blesses each member of your family in so many ways.

Remember growing up and having chores? It may have been a pain to stop playing outside to come in and do the dishes but do you recall that sense of accomplishment and responsibly afterwards? How it felt to hear your mom say "nice job, thank you for being responsible." Children today have sporting and other activities that take up the time that in the past was filled by a part time job. They love the opportunities, and appreciate the sacrifices made to make it all possible, but we don't really question what's best. Then when it comes to responsibility, we try and let them be kids. Turns out more activities and less responsibilities may not be benefitting them. A 2015 survey of 1,001 parents by Braun Research shows we aren't passing on the tradition of chores. Inadvertently taking away from our children the self-esteem, delayed gratification, and sense of accomplishment associated with contributing to the home.

Seems previous generations may have had this right. Marty Rossman, emeritus associate professor of family education for the University of Minnesota, conducted a 20-year study of 84 children into adulthood. He determined that doing chores at ages 3-4 was "the strongest predictor of education completion, career success and stronger relationships in their mid-20s." That is a powerful statement, and perhaps part of the forgotten key to success.

Not only do chores benefit your children's future, working together as a family has proven to increase your bond and happiness. Working as a team helps your children to know they are valued, deepens your relationship, and can help them feel confident in communicating struggles to you. No matter your family structure, working together makes you stronger and is a way all families can devote time together. It also helps to increase the bond in your marriage. Working together helps you to remember your common goals, to laugh together; also, boys and men communicate best while working side by side.

Time as a family unit, whether it be working, playing, or any other connection helps to stabilize and strengthen children's mental health. Sadly, with the mass of technology available today we haven't been able to keep up with the potential side effects, and children are suffering the consequences. Think it may not be so bad? Unfortunately, research proves otherwise. Some great books on the impact of technology on children's brains and mental health are Glow Kids by Dr Nicholas Kardaras and NextTalk by San Antonian Mandy Majors.

Children now are faced with the stress and pressure of a constant presence of friends and enemies via social media. In addition to that, the horrors of adult content online. Children being able to open up, ask questions, and share with their parents is needed. Understanding the side effects and how to talk to your children about technology has never been more important. Today children are considered more anxious, depressed, lonely, and at risk of suicide than ever before. We must recognize the crisis at our feet and do our best to help our children feel like they can talk to us, and teach them how to recognize and better handle emotional turmoil. Its not about fearing the worst, but recognizing the reality of the struggles our kids face, and being intentional to strengthen the bond of connection so they feel open to communication.

The reality of today can seem daunting, thankfully the solution to this complex problem is simple. Family time being a priority. No matter your dynamic, making a commitment to spend time together connecting as a family can make a world of difference to your children, and one day theirs. We can't change the culture alone, but we can control how we react as a family to it. It's worth noting that intact families produce the most prepared, stable, and successful children. The 'children are resilient' concept has been disproven. That is not to say your family has to be cookie cutter perfect to do well by your children. Literally all families look different and have unique struggles.

The difference in connection is made by taking time to create relationships with your children, committing time together, and saying no once and a while to plans, instead spending time as a family. As we enter into a new year and new decade, challenge your family to beat the modern strain, disconnect from technology, and instead connect together.
