Why Do We Call Fries “Chips”?

Order chips in Ireland or the UK and you won’t get a bag of crispy snacks. You’ll get what Americans know as fries, usually a little thicker, golden on the outside and fluffy in the middle. What Americans call chips, we call crisps.

Chips have long been a staple of everyday food across Ireland and Britain, served alongside everything from fish and pies to burgers and sausages. But they’re just as good on their own, especially with plenty of salt and vinegar.

In Ireland, chips also come with some particularly good companions.
Curry sauce is a takeaway favorite, while gravy turns a simple plate of chips into proper comfort food.

So when you see Chips on our menu, don't worry.
You haven't accidentally ordered a bag of crisps.
Just remember: fries are chips, chips are crisps, and vinegar belongs on the table.

Egg in a Cup with Toast Soldiers

Across the UK and Ireland, it's a breakfast that evokes childhood, comfort, and slow mornings.

The tradition dates back to the Victorian era, when inexpensive porcelain egg cups became common in homes. Soft-boiled eggs were considered nutritious, elegant, and easy to eat. Serving them upright in a dedicated cup prevented the egg from rolling around and made it easy to crack the top neatly. The "soldiers" are strips of buttered toast, cut into long, narrow pieces. The name comes from their straight, upright appearance, resembling soldiers standing at attention. Once the top of the egg is tapped off with a spoon, the toast soldiers are dipped into the warm, runny yolk. For many children in Britain and Ireland, learning to tap the top off the egg, peel away the shell, sprinkle on a little salt and pepper, and dunk the toast is almost a rite of passage. It's one of those meals grandparents make for grandchildren, parents make before school, and adults often return to when they need a little comfort.

Afternoon Tea

Afternoon Tea is a much-loved British and Irish tradition, created as a little something to bridge the long stretch between lunch and dinner. Traditionally enjoyed in the afternoon, it is served as a leisurely selection of finger sandwiches, freshly baked scones with cream and jam, and small cakes or sweets, all accompanied by a proper pot of tea.

Despite often being called “High Tea,” the two are not quite the same. Afternoon Tea was traditionally a lighter, more elegant affair served in sitting rooms on low tables. High Tea was a heartier evening meal, eaten at the family dining table after the working day, with breads, meats, pies and other substantial dishes.

Here at The Pub, we serve Afternoon Tea: sandwiches, scones, sweet treats and plenty of tea, made for sharing, lingering and catching up. It isn't meant to be rushed. Settle in, pour another cup, and enjoy one of the nicest traditions from across the pond.
