SISAL YUCATAN

The main difference between Sisal and its more popular neighboring beach towns is the very fact of its isolation. It rarely appears on maps or guidebooks as a destination. Paradoxically it was one of the first and more important ports during the Colonial period. The Empress Carlota stopped there on her visit to Yucatán. It was the port from which all the henequén fiber known as Sisal was exported to the world. Presently the main activity there is fishing, the presence of which is noticeable in the town's streets where men prepare the boats and nets for next day's toss.

There is a section of town with weekend houses of people from Mérida who escape from the unbearable heat, and a growing seasonal population of Canadians who migrate to take advantage of our temperate weather.

The beach is desolate and calm, on holidays it becomes more populated but rarely do you see those motored vehicles that pester other beaches of the peninsula. Breeze is constant, but there are almost no waves to worry about, and the sea goes from a Caribbean turquoise to a darker Gulf of México's hue.

The seashore in Sisal is one of the last original coastal dunes remaining, with colorful and beautiful perfumed bushes, palm trees and cactae. The flora and fauna of the beach mix with that of the mangrove of the adjacent lagoon.

Sisaleños get around town on bicycles, tricycles and motortaxis, and every other Sunday they have baseball games and the characteristic religious processions on the streets with everybody participating. There are interesting Colonial buildings and monuments: a fortress, a lighthouse, the recently restored Customs Building, and a stone warrior's sculpture and plaque from the 16th century. At sunset a promenade on the pier with its typical sweetheart's benches becomes a must.

Cenotes and kayak tours are also a must.

Constant wind is perfect for sail sports such as Kitesurfing.
