I. The American Country in 2050

By 2050, approximately 37% of the American population is projected to consist of immigrants and their immediate American-born children, according to an earlier Pew Research Center projection. In 1950, this population accounted for approximately 23.1% of the American population. This represents a considerable transformation of the American country over the course of 100 years.

The Demographic Transformation of America

- 1950: Approximately 76.9% of Americans were third generation or beyond.
- 1960: 84% of immigrants were born in Europe or Canada.
- 1965: The Immigration and Nationality Act abolished the national origins quota system.
- 2024: Approximately 20% of immigrants identified as White alone, including Hispanic Whites.
- 2024: Approximately 15.6% of immigrants were non-Hispanic White.
- 2050: Approximately 63.1% of Americans are projected to be third generation or beyond.

The White American population is already declining as a percentage of the American population. Throughout our years of case work, we have examined racial targeting, discrimination, political hostility, and violence against White Americans. We feel that these experiences, alongside demographic changes and the potential loss of established heritage communities, present a serious concern for the future of White American families.

II. Fourth-Generational Warfare

Throughout our years of case work, we have examined fourth-generational warfare, communism, mass migration, foreign intelligence operations, organized crime, political activism, territorial warfare, and wars overseas. We have studied the ways in which modern conflicts extend into civilian communities and American institutions. These include information warfare, propaganda, espionage, political intimidation, economic disruption, and psychological warfare.

The American civilian population has experienced the consequences of warfare within its own country. Educational institutions, government offices, communications networks, businesses, and civilian infrastructure have become victims of severe targeting, often by political and global activists. The protection of these institutions is necessary in order to protect the American people.

Our case work has also examined the consequences of American involvement in wars overseas. Foreign conflicts can introduce political hostilities, security threats, and international disputes into American communities. We feel that American foreign policy must account for the consequences experienced by the American home front.

III. The Historical Harms Against Heritage Communities

Throughout history, heritage communities have experienced territorial displacement, wartime slavery, forced migration, religious persecution, political persecution, and ethnic violence. These experiences extend across American, Indigenous, European, and other heritage communities throughout the world. Entire communities have lost their homes, historical institutions, cultural traditions, and generations of family members through warfare.

We have examined the historical experiences of European heritage populations and the families who established their lives in America long ago. Many of these families experienced warfare, religious persecution, servitude, poverty, and political instability. Their descendants have established generations of family history within the American country.

The historical lesson is that heritage communities require territorial security and cultural preservation. Once a community becomes displaced, the restoration of its historical way of life can take generations. In some instances, entire communities and their traditions are permanently lost.

IV. Protest Violence and Civil Warfare

Throughout our case work, we have examined the escalation of political activism into violence against American communities. We have examined the destruction of businesses, historical monuments, religious institutions, public infrastructure, and private property. We have also considered the physical, psychological, and economic consequences experienced by American families during periods of civil unrest.

The demonstrations of 2020 represented a significant period of American political unrest. American communities experienced arson, assaults, killings, property destruction, and political intimidation. The families and businesses affected by these incidents experienced consequences that extended beyond normal protest and into forms of civil and foreign warfare.

Union of Saints considers organized and sustained political violence against civilian communities civil warfare in principle. We feel that coordinated attacks, territorial intimidation, and organized political violence should be treated as serious domestic security threats. Within our research, we designate these experiences of violent protest as civil warfare.

The American people have the constitutional right to peaceful protest. Those who engage in criminal violence, destruction, intimidation, and assaults against American civilians should face criminal accountability. We believe firmly in accountability and justice for victims of political violence. At this time, we feel that terrorist designations and accompanying penalties are reasonable for groups whose activities meet the legal requirements. Political causes provide no exemption from American law.

V. Communism and the Dismantling of Nations

Our research into communism has included revolutionary movements, political persecution, property confiscation, centralized government control, and the suppression of political opposition. We have examined the historical consequences experienced by civilian populations under communist regimes. These experiences include restrictions on individual liberties, the displacement of families, and the destruction of established political and cultural institutions.

We feel that Americans must understand the historical consequences of revolutionary movements that seek to dismantle constitutional institutions. Political organizations engaged in criminal activity, foreign interference, or organized violence should be investigated. Their leadership, funding, organizational relationships, and documented activities should form the basis of such investigations.

The American people require constitutional government, individual liberties, property rights, political representation, and national sovereignty. The preservation of these rights requires political accountability. Americans should understand the political movements they support and the historical consequences associated with their policies. For these reasons, we recognize violent Bolshevik and communist activities directed against our borders and national security as forms of modern warfare against the American people.

VI. Mass Migration and Territorial Security

The American country is experiencing a considerable demographic shift. Immigration policy affects housing, employment, public resources, political representation, and the cultural composition of American communities. These policies will have consequences for American families across generations.

We feel that the American people require a greater voice in determining the future of their country. American heritage families have legitimate interests in preserving their communities, maintaining their cultural traditions, and establishing a future for their children. These interests should be represented in American immigration and domestic policy.

We also recognize immigrants who genuinely love the American country, the American people, and American culture. We relate to those who respect American constitutional principles and wish to establish peaceful lives within the country. Our concerns regarding criminal infiltration and foreign interference are based upon the conduct of the individuals and organizations involved.

VII. Cartels, Organized Crime and Territorial Warfare

Among the more concerning subjects of our case work has been the relationship between transnational organized crime, cartels, human trafficking, political corruption, and territorial violence. These organizations can establish criminal networks across international borders and within civilian communities. Their activities present threats to the safety and security of the American people.

We feel that foreign nationals who participate in cartel violence, trafficking, espionage, terrorism, or territorial aggression against American communities should face applicable criminal and immigration proceedings. Political officials who knowingly participate in or facilitate these activities should also face investigation. We are aiming for American safety, justice, and their permanent removal where permitted by law.

The American people should be protected from foreign criminal organizations operating within their country. Their homes, businesses, communities, and children require security. Territorial security and the preservation of American law are responsibilities of both the American government and the American people. The American people must take an active role in the political fight to preserve their territory.

VIII. Racial Targeting and White American Protections

Throughout our years of case work, we have examined racial hostility, discrimination, political intimidation, and violence against White Americans. We have also examined the underreporting of hate crimes and the difficulties associated with establishing the full extent of racial targeting. The experiences of victims must be included in the national discussion surrounding racial violence.

We feel that White Americans require greater protections than they have received. Their heritage, homes, communities, and safety deserve the same protections afforded to other populations. The declining proportion of the White American population also presents concerns for families seeking to preserve their historical communities and cultural traditions.

Our position is that protective measures should correspond with the harms experienced by a population. Racial discrimination, organized targeting, and violence require accountability. After tireless research, we question whether certain documented incidents of racial targeting involve an intent to harm or destroy White heritage communities.

More harms and targeting? More protections.

IX. Political Leadership and the American Family

Union of Saints relates to the conservative values of American sovereignty, constitutional liberties, cultural preservation, territorial security, and the American family. We have examined political movements and policies that affect the security, independence, and welfare of American communities. We feel that the American people require political leadership that prioritizes these interests.

Our concerns regarding political leadership include support for political violence, racial discrimination, foreign interference, revolutionary extremism, and organized crime. Political officials should be held accountable for their documented conduct, legislative decisions, financial relationships, and organizational affiliations. These standards should apply throughout the American political system.

The American family requires political representation. Americans should have the opportunity to purchase homes, establish families, preserve their heritage, and raise their children within safe communities. Their concerns regarding immigration, economic security, racial violence, and the future of their country should be heard.

X. The American Home Front

The American people have participated in wars overseas, experienced economic hardships, endured periods of civil unrest, and sacrificed generations of family members in the service of their country. Throughout these experiences, American families have continued to establish their homes, communities, and cultural institutions. Their sacrifices and contributions form the history of the American country.

We feel that the American home front has received insufficient consideration throughout periods of international conflict and domestic political division. American families require economic stability, territorial security, personal safety, and the opportunity to preserve their heritage. American domestic and foreign policy should account for these needs.

The culture and the globe will continue to move around us. American heritage families should retain the freedom to preserve their traditions, establish their own communities, and determine the extent to which they participate in globalism. Their cultural independence and constitutional liberties require protection.

Our Final Verdict

Through years upon years of research, Union of Saints has examined the historical experiences of heritage communities, the consequences of warfare, the activities of criminal organizations, the development of political movements, and the transformation of the American country.

The historical lesson is that the security of a nation requires the security of its people. The displacement of heritage communities, the escalation of political violence, the loss of cultural institutions, and the destruction of civilian livelihoods can result in lasting suffering and hardship. The prevention of these harms requires territorial security, political accountability, and the enforcement of law.

Americans require sovereignty. They require cultural preservation, constitutional protections, territorial security, and political representation. They require the freedom to establish families, preserve their heritage, and live peacefully within their own country.

We feel that the American people have sacrificed enough through wars overseas, political hostilities, and domestic conflicts. The American family requires peace, security, and a future within the American country. The protection of the American home front must become the priority.

Moving Forward

We move forward in support of moderate conservatism, heritage preservation, and advocacy for native-born and immigrant White Americans. We characterize our experiences as racial warfare, fourth-generational warfare, global warfare, civil warfare, and communist warfare against the American people, including the harms and exploitation of immigrants and families.

We do not support illegal migration in any form, particularly where large numbers of unvetted immigrants place additional demands on necessary housing, grants, and American dollars. American populations are already struggling. We feel that Democratic immigration policies have failed to see the bigger picture, particularly the experiences of rural White American populations who have suffered historical repression, slavery, displacement, and economic hardship.

American veterans are suffering from homelessness, economic hardship, and other harms. We feel that their experiences have received insufficient political attention. The data and information we examined were exhaustive.

We have also examined the experience of White flight alongside “cultural dissonance,” particularly where cultural shifts are accompanied by the vilification of White Americans and their cultural communities. We recognize the desire of families to remove themselves from environments where they experience racial hostility. We feel that American heritage families require safety and the freedom to preserve their culture.

For these reasons, Union of Saints moves forward to protect our American spirit and heritage. We do so through our church. We are seeking protection and safety.

We no longer seek to be associated with activists who have participated in political violence against our own people and the American home front. We are actively, naturally, and soulfully removing our energy permanently from theirs. This violence won't be tolerated.
