Not everything in America is perfect, nor does it have to be. There are times when rules are tempered, not as a general practice, but in order to protect one another and preserve our spirit. The state does not always know best; however, it serves an important role in helping us maintain laws, boundaries, and borders. At times, even the state, or those who represent it, may be imperfect and often the state is imperfect, the state is made of humans after all. In those imperfect moments, America relies on its spiritual foundations; a higher moral compass that reminds us that law and spirit must work together.
