

A Funny Positive Note, Dating

Though I have chosen not to date and have focused on my studies, with little time “out” and about unless I am doing mundane errands, somehow men would still find ways to meet me. I was approached around my community. One time, a number was left on my vehicle, and another time, a card was left in my delivery packages.

I was asked for my number while getting the mail one day. I also noticed someone expressing interest in the parking lot, although I never spoke to him. This experience of solitude has been interesting.

It has been worth it to spend time on my own, just to have this understanding and knowledge. The men in Tucson are very handsome. I like the Tucson accent too.

One day, I went to get lunch at a taco drive-through, and they accidentally gave me tacos with meat in them. I drove to the construction site nearby, where I knew there were workers, and offered the tacos to the men. They were so good-looking! They were so grateful, too, and it was a nice, short exchange.

There is a very nice group of people here in Tucson. I am grateful for the interactions I have had. Although brief, they helped me understand the world from a new perspective.
